A "Most Remarkable Man"

[illegible] probably has few [illegible] than Mr. Phillips, [illegible] be 81 on May 24 (it was [illegible] birthday, too) but [illegible] vigorous in body, pre[illegible] and firm in opinion. He [illegible] according to his doctor, [illegible] remarkable old man in [illegible] and according to himself [illegible] reactionary in both music and [illegible].

He [illegible] to concerts in an automobile bearing R. I. plates 620, the [illegible] has held for exactly 40 years. In 54 years he worked for [illegible], Henry Lippitt & Co. and [illegible]hast-Stiles Co., and in all that time he was absent no more [illegible] months from illness. Mr. Phillips retired in 1937, too soon to benefit by Social Security and [illegible], but, as he says (see "Ruddigore"), "I'm not complaining." He and Mrs. Phillips live in a very comfortable house overlooking Narragansett Bay, across from Rocky Point. They have peace and quiet, and when they want anything different they can always come to Providence or go to New York or Boston.

"I used to work where I could see the orchestra instruments come in on the train," Mr. Phillips said. "They'd come in about 4 o'clock in the afternoon and then the Hopkins Transfer would load up and take them to Infantry Hall. In the evening we'd puff up the long stairs there. Do you remember the stairs? And then we'd follow them to the Albee Theater and then to the Metropolitan. But I've never been in Symphony Hall

A Little Pale Man

"Although I've heard all the conductors but Henschel and Rabaud, I guess I don't remember any of them particularly except Arthur Nikisch. He was a little man with very pale skin and big moustaches that curled up. He never used a baton. He had the most delicate, graceful hands. I can see them in the air now, the way he used to move them.

"He was what I'd call the passive type of conductor, not like this new man, Muench. Why, when I saw him he hopped right off the podium while he was conducting."

Mr. Phillips got out of his chair and gave a hearty hop into the air, as Mr. Meunch had done.

"I don't know whether I'll like him or not," he said, sitting down again. "I remember that in his last concert all the numbers except the last had no brass in them, except two or three French horns. Some people I talked to thought there was a little too much sameness. But in the last number the brass finished off in a blaze of glory."

Dissents on Koussevitzky

Mr. Phillips doesn't agree with the common belief that Dr. Koussevitzky is a notable maker of programs.

"Hasn't he ever heard of Wagner?" Mr. Phillips inquired. "We used to have whole evenings of Wagner. I like Brahms and Tchaikovsky, too. I don't like the modern Russians. I haven't anything against the young gentleman, but I don't care for Shostakovich. I like harmony. These dissonances may provide tone color but I don't like them. Tchaikovsky's Fifth Symphony is my favorite.

"I think Koussevitzky's idea is to be educational and bring up the people to new composers. I don't think anybody could get better results out of the orchestra than Koussevitzky. But it seems to me they play well under Burgin or anybody else. I've always admired the technical proficiency of the orchestra. Perhaps they're so proficient that they get sick and tired of Beethoven and Mozart, and want to tackle something new." He smiled. "But I'm a reactionary."

Mr. Phillips said he liked concertos and had heard "all the pianists "from the time Hofmann was in knee pants."

Recalling a recital by De Pachmann in Infantry Hall, he said: "The second part of the program was to be Chopin, which was what everybody wanted to hear him play. They weren't paying much attention to the first part, and De Pachmann sensed it. Perhaps they were whispering or rattling programs. Suddenly De Pachmann turned right round and pushed both his hands out at the audience, like this, and hissed at them. Hissed right at them. If that didn't stop them! Then he finished that part of the program. Of course they were all quiet as soon as he hit the Chopin.

"Among the violinists, I think Kreisler was one of the greatest, though he's fallen off a lot now. Nobody can touch Lily Pons as a coloratura. And when it comes to Wagner, Melchior and Traubel are quite a team. Melchior's high notes are not so good as they were, but he's a good dramatic singer. Traubel has a superb physique and voice. I lake Wagner. Parts of the love music from 'Tristan and Isolde' are wonderful."

He said that he often listens to OCTOGENARIAN: George Frederic Phillips says audiences in Providence have changed completely.

Missed Seeing Only Two Leaders of Boston Group radio music but that radio "dulls a number, takes the vitality out of it."

"I have a good ear and a good memory for music," he went on. "When I was a young fellow I studied piano, but I don't play now. Music is a splendid inheritance. I inherited it from my mother's side. There wasn't much music on the Phillips said. There is a lot of comfort and entertainment in music.

Recalls Music Box Incident

"I remember when I was only a boy, working as an office boy, I went into a watchmaker's to pay a bill and the watchmaker had a big music box and he played it for a customer. 'Isn't that beautiful?' he said to the customer.

"'I suppose it is to you,' the customer said. 'To me it's just so much noise.'

"I took it all in. I remembered that. I never forgot it."

Audiences in Providence, he said, have "changed completely" in recent decades.

"The families on the east side of the river have passed out of the cultural life," he commented. "They used to be the big supporters of places like the Opera House. Think of it. Providence is the second city in New England and doesn't support one first-class theater. Years ago the people in the business used to talk of Providence as 'a good 50-cent town.' I saw Edwin Booth and Modjeska in 'The Merchant of Venice' for $1.50 in the Opera House. Now prices are so high. Last month Mrs. Phillips and I heard the D'Oyly Carte company do Gilbert and Sullivan in New York, and I never heard so fine a rendition. The chorus was superb. But the tickets were $9. That brings up my New England thrift. I hate like the devil to pay that. But I hope to hear them in Boston again.

Has Clean Driving Record

Mr. Phillips also discussed his experiences with automobiles.

"My driving record has never had a mark against it," he said, "not even anything trivial. If I had to go to court for driving I'd just throw myself on the mercy of the court and he'd let me off with costs on account of my good record, I hope.

"My first car was a 16-horsepower Franklin, a small car, 90-inch wheelbase, that I bought in 1908. It cost $1850 f. o. b. Syracuse and then you had to buy top, windshield and everything else separate. Everything was extra. There were 12 dry cell batteries on the running board for ignition. The car didn't have power enough to get out of its own way. I took out the dry cells and chucked them away and got a storage battery.

"I had two Franklins, a Cadillac, a Buick, a Mora, a Marmon and a Plymouth. In the early days you took your chance on a car. If it didn't run, they just said, 'You got a lemon.' That was all the consolation you got. I imagine you never heard of the Mora. It cost $2100 before it was equipped. It had a very powerful engine—it would go right up the side of a house. But the chassis was too light and it would shake and rattle if you began to go too fast. They didn't make them for very long."

Mr. and Mrs. Phillips were preparing to drive to Providence that night in their Plymouth to see Jane Cowl in "The First Mrs. Fraser."

"At 80," Mr. Phillips said, "I certainly appreciate the fact that I can still see, hear and get up and go around."

Retiring Boston Orchestra Leader and Successor

Serge Koussevitzky

Herald Tribune—Acme

Charles Muench

Koussevitzky

(Continued from page one)

vision point to security and incredible accomplishment."

The silver jubilee season will complete a period of service almost twice as long as that of any previous conductor. Mr. Koussevitzky's predecessors were George Henschel (1881-'84), Wilhelm Gericke (1884-'89) and 1897-1906); Artur Nikisch (1889-'93); Emil Paur (1893-'97); Karl Much (1906-'08 and 1912-'18); Max Fiedler (1908-'12); Henri Rabaud (1918-'19), and Pierre Monteux (1919-'24. Mr. Koussevitzky's length of continuous service has been probably exceeded in this country only by the late rFederick Stock with the Chicago Symphony (1905-'43).

Mr. Muench comes to the position with an illustrious career to commend him. After early training on the violin with his father, Ernest Muench, and with Lucien Capet in Paris and Carl Flesch in Berlin, he was made professor of the Strassbourg Conservatory.

In 1926 he went to Leipzig, where he served as concert master in the Gewandhaus Orchestra under Wilhelm Furtwaengler. In 1932, he returned to Paris and conducted concerts of the Paris Symphony Orchestra, the Lamoureux Orchestra and the Straram Orchestra.

Mr. Muench succeeded Philippe Gaubert as conductor of the Paris Conservatory Orchestra in 1938. He founded the Paris Philharmonic Orchestra in the 1930s and is its regular conductor.

He first came to the United States to conduct the Boston Symphony as a guest on Dec. 27, 1946, and first appeared in New York with the Philharmonic Symphony Orchestra on Jan. 23, 1947. He was guest conductor of both orchestras also in 1947-'48, and will be with the Philharmonic for four weeks next season.

Koussevitzky Retiring in 1949: Muench to Conduct Bostonians

By The Associated Press

BOSTON, April 8.—Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, seventy-four, Russian-born conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will retire at the end of his silver jubilee 1948-'49 season, Henry B. Cabot, president of the trustees, said tonight.

His successor will be the fifty-seven-year-old Alsatian-born conductor, Charles Muench, who has appeared several times with the Boston Symphony.

Mr. Koussevitzky's letter of resignation said his decision to resign was taken because "I feel that it will not be possible for me to continue my present strenuous obligations for the length of sixteen to eighteen weeks of our active winter season." Mr. Cabot said Mr. Koussevitzky would continue as director of the Berkshire Music Center, at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass.

The announcement came at the annual meeting of the Society of Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Symphony Hall.

Mr. Muench, at present conductor of the Paris Conservatory Orchestra and the Paris Philharmonic, will take over leadership of the Boston Symphony at the beginning of its sixty-ninth season in October, 1949. He left New York today by plane for France to complete engagements in France, Holland and Belgium.

Mr. Cabot told Mr. Koussevitzky before some 700 Friends of the orchestra, "You have given so generously of your great and courageous spirit, which has made possible joy and happiness to hundreds and thousands of hungry and appreciative audiences all over the world.

"And we know at Tanglewood, too, you have lighted a torch that will shine on through troublesome or peaceful times, and by your ummer of 1915," wa rouble of importin who sang very well he orchestra. Ne hor poet was on h which does not pa

(Continued on page 19, column 4)

SIC

prise me.

Doubtless because his retirement, Ser was greeted yester orchestra and audie that this token of not have been obse
the masses of peo out throughout the all, the Sibelius played so often th know by now wh hear it again or n ing for mythical ap the music is in prog impolite to the music conductor, who are surpassingly fine per to the majority of the want to listen to opinion, for insta Sibelius Symphony h too much and ough rest; but it is certa endurance, even for the music, to stay a magnificent sound

The Brahms Th work which migh for a while, save tha ment is one of th and invigorating wrote. Througho
Dr. Koussevitzky a were in the vein.
Sibelius went bett than the Brahms, parison on an level.

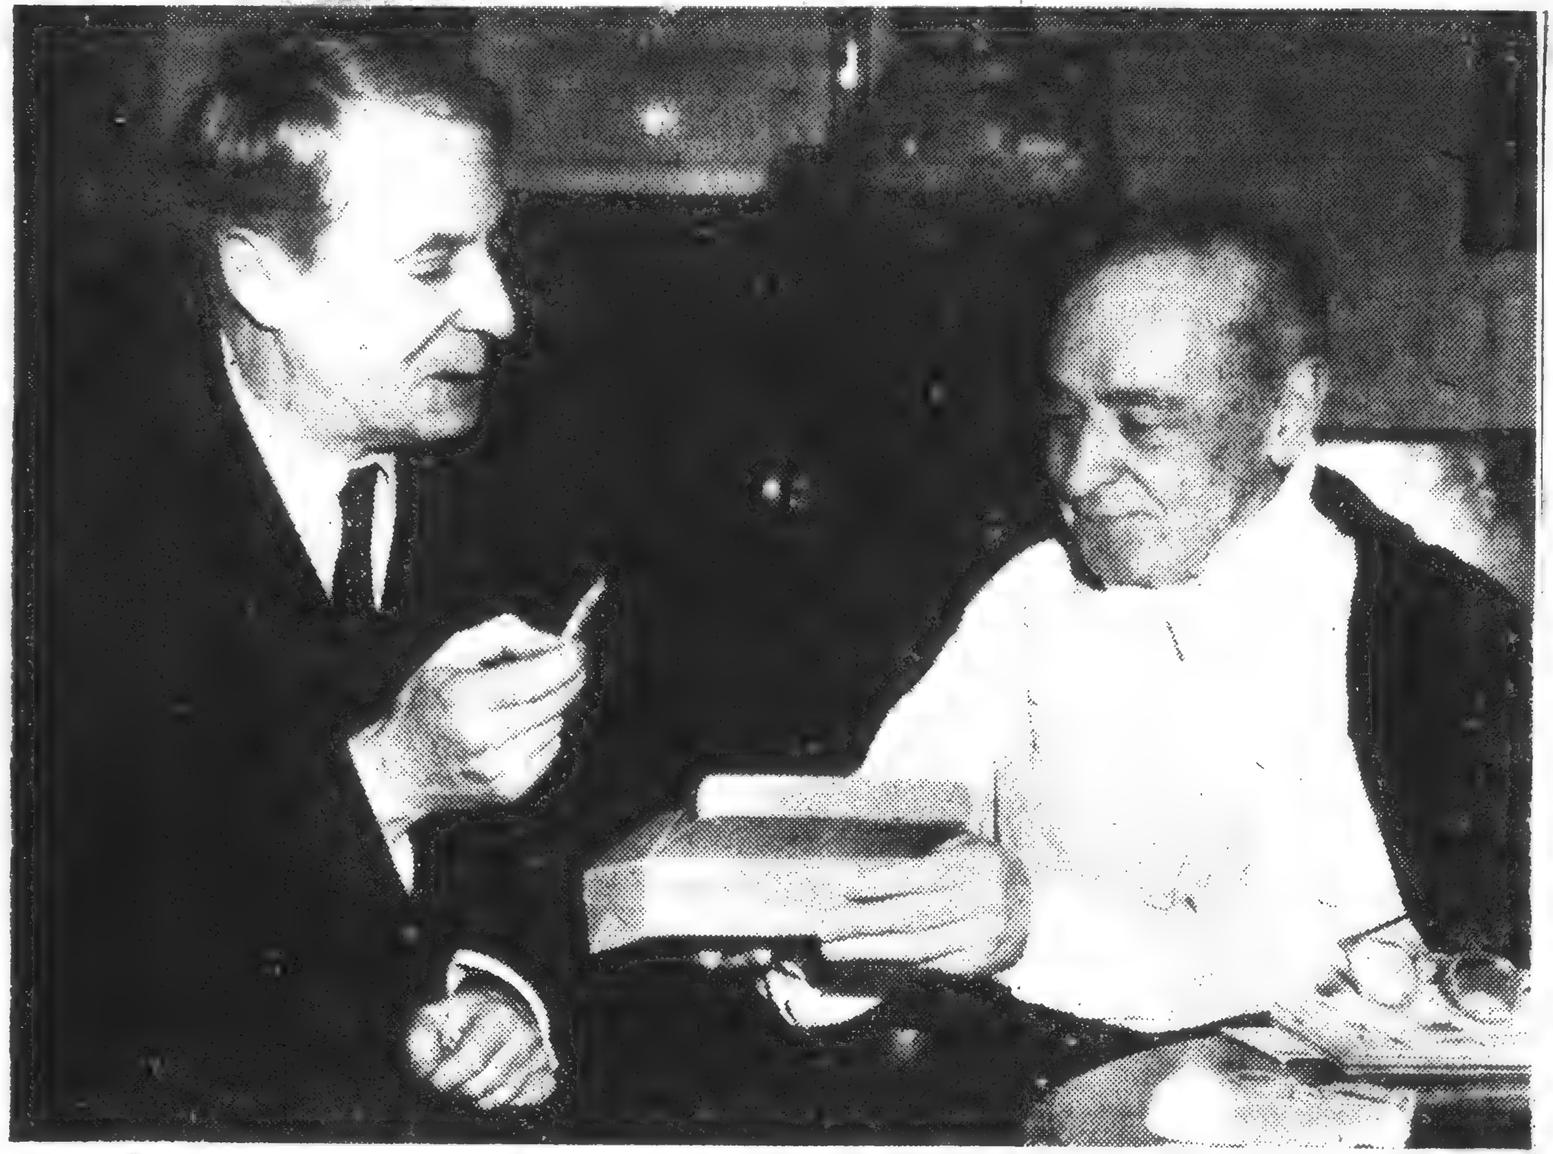
[13]

N SCIENCE MONITOR, BOSTON, FRIDAY, APRIL 9, 1948

Boston Symphony Conductors



Associated Press

Charles Münch, left, will succeed Dr. Serge Koussevitzky as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra after the season of 1948-49. Here he is sharing with Dr. Koussevitzky a box of crackers in the latter's dressing room at Symphony Hall on one of the occasions when he served recently as guest conductor. Dr. Koussevitzky, shown here with his famous broadcloth cape over his shoulders, is said to consider Mr. Münch a leader capable of retaining in the orchestra the tremendous tonal qualities for which it has become famous.

Münch Chosen Conductor To Succeed Koussevitzky

Another era in the great history of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was heralded yesterday with the announcement that Charles Münch will conduct the orchestra after Dr. Serge Koussevitzky resigns the leadership at the end of the 1948-49 season.

The announcement came at the annual meeting of the Society of Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, as Henry B. Cabot, President, read to Dr. Koussevitzky the letter from the Trustees of the orchestra accepting the resignation.

It was a matter of regret, Mr. Cabot said, "that the time is so near at hand for the conclusion of the most brilliant leadership and the most devoted service which the orchestra has ever enjoyed from anybody."

The prompt appointment of a successor to the famous conductor, who will have completed 25 years of service with the Boston Symphony at the end of next season, was indication of the Trustees' determination that the orchestra shall continue to have the advantages of uninterrupted leadership by a permanent conductor.

Dr. Koussevitzky's retirement was no surprise to the musical public generally, for it had been anticipated for some time that the quarter-century mark would be selected by him as an appropriate time for the step.

Mr. Münch's selection as successor was not so generally anticipated. He has conducted the orchestra as a guest on three occasions recently, and whereas he was greeted with loud and prolonged applause by the audiences, his reception by the critics was not so single-hearted. Some considered him too largely concerned with selling to the audience his own virtuosity rather than the qualities of the music. Others were lukewarm about him; still others praised him for vigor and imagination.

Mr. Münch came to the United States in 1946 and conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra first on Dec. 27 of that year. He is a native of Strasbourg, Alsace. He founded in 1932 the Paris Philharmonic Orchestra which he has conducted ever since. He also has been conductor of the Paris Conservatory Orchestra. He returned to Europe by plane yesterday to fill engagements in France, Holland, and Belgium.

His appointment is said to meet with the hearty approval of Dr. Koussevitzky.

In the letter confirming his decision to resign, Dr. Koussevitzky also made public that he will continue to direct the Berkshire Music Center. Furthermore, he will open each Symphony season in Boston as guest conductor of the first concert as long as he wishes to do so.

Accepting the resignation, the Trustees remarked on the fact that Dr. Koussevitzky's service with the orchestra has been almost twice as lengthy as that of any other conductor in the long history of the organization.

"You have given so generously of your great and courageous spirit," said the Trustees, "which has made possible joy and happiness to hundreds and thousands of hungry and appreciative audiences all over the world. And we know at Tanglewood, too (the Berkshire Music Center), you have lighted a torch that will shine on through troublesome or peaceful times, and by your vision point to security and incredible accomplishment.

"Our heartfelt thanks and God bless you always."

The Berkshire center gives promising music students an opportunity during the summer months of studying in association with great professional musicians.

DR. KOUSSEVITZKY RETIRES

When Dr. Serge Koussevitzky steps down at the end of next season as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra it will be at the age of 75 and after twenty-five years as its conductor and after five decades of music making. Those acquainted with the concerts of the Boston Symphony in its annual visits to New York and over the radio will feel more than a twinge of regret at his departure. For under his aegis the Boston has become a virtuoso ensemble of first rank and the "Boston tone" a criterion for all but two or three other orchestras in the country.

His sympathy and understanding of contemporary music has been one of the most beguiling features of his tenure. He has not only played modern compositions but by commissioning new works through the Koussevitzky Foundation has made it possible for them to come into being. His summer concerts at Tanglewood have provided excellent music in beautiful surroundings and a valuable training school for instrumentalists, conductors and composers.

It is pleasant to remember that Dr. Koussevitzky will appear as an occasional guest conductor and will still be active during the summer months at Tanglewood. And we know that his experience and counsel will be available to composers and students in the long years ahead which all those indebted to him for his music making in the past will wish him.

Nabokov Work Has Its First Performance

By L. A. Sloper

Serge Koussevitzky was warmly greeted yesterday when he returned to the stand for the eleventh program of the Boston Symphony season. He had chosen these works: Nabokov, "The Return of Pushkin," an elegy in three parts for high voice and orchestra (first performance); Debussy, "La Damoiselle Élue"; Tchaikovsky, "Letter Scene" from Eugène Onégin," and "Francesca da Rimini."

The soloists were Marina Koshetz in the Nabokov, the Debussy and the Tchaikovsky air; and Eunice Alberts for the second voice in the Debussy. The assisting chorus was the Wellesley College Choir.

* * *

Mr. Nabokov's work was composed by commission of the Koussevitzky Music Foundation and dedicated to the memory of Mme. Natalie Koussevitzky. His Lyric Symphony was played here in 1930. He has composed the ballet, "Union Pacific," and other works.

His new work is a setting of Pushkin's verses celebrating his return to the scene of his exile. Divided into an Andante, an Allegretto and a Lento assai, the composition made no particular impression. It is conventional in style, and consists, for long stretches, of chords accompanying the solo voice, and in others, of sequences of no great originality.

* * *

Miss Koshetz is the daughter of Nina Koshetz. She is the possessor of one of those voices characteristic of Russian sopranos, with pinched tones and a marked vibrato, with a tendency to depart from pitch. However, this faulty production at the start of the concert may have been due in part to nervousness incidental to her Boston debut, for in the Tchaikovsky air her voice was much more satisfactory in the middle register, though it still was unfree in the upper range and, because of the failure to place tones properly, it could be heard clearly only when the orchestra was hushed. She imparted a measure of dramatic fervor to this music, but it was impossible at any time to tell what language she was singing in.

Her performance in the Debussy was subject to the same criticisms [illegible] in the Nabokov. The contr[illegible] role in this piece was taken by Eunice Alberts, the daughter of another distinguished singer, the Boston soprano, Adèle Alberts. The daughter's voice is round, warm and full of color.

The Wellesley College Choir proved that not all the good choral singing comes out of Harvard and Radcliffe. The young women sang with good tone and expression. That they could do so, placed on the stage as they were, was a wonder, for they were crowded in between the violas and the cellos like apples in a barrel. Why they could not have been placed at the rear, as choruses have been placed before for this and other works, is hard to understand. Perhaps Dr. Koussevitzky wanted to try them out as an orchestral choir, but the arrangement was so out of visual balance, and so clumsily managed, as to nullify any possible gain in total balance.

THE NEW YORK TIMES, FRIDAY, APRIL 9, 1948.

KOUSSEVITZKY DUE TO RETIRE IN 1949

Conductor Will Then Round Out 25 Years in Boston Post—Munch Will Succeed Him

By JOHN H. FENTON

Special to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

BOSTON, April 8—Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will retire at the close of next season as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra after rounding out his twenty-fifth year in that post, it was announced today.

He will be succeeded by Dr. Charles Munch, conductor of the Paris Conservatory Orchestra.

The Russian-born Dr. Koussevitzky, who will be 74 years of age in July, said he found it impossible to "continue my strenuous obligations for the length of the sixteen to eighteen weeks of our active winter season."

Dr. Koussevitzky will continue, however, as director of the Berkshire Music Center at Stockbridge, Mass. He also is expected to appear with the symphony occasionally as special guest conductor.

Announcement of Dr. Koussevitzky's retirement was made this afternoon at the annual meeting of the Society of Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. It was read by Henry B. Cabot, president of the trustees.

Will Conduct 13 Concerts

During the coming season, Dr. Koussevitzky will conduct the orchestra in thirteen concerts. Guest conductors will be used in eleven. This is the same arrangement which has been followed in the present season.

Dr. Koussevitzky, a conductor in his native country, fled from the Bolsheviks in 1920. Before assuming the baton of the Boston Orchestra permanently, he had appeared in England, Germany, France and Spain.

To Boston, Dr. Koussevitzky brought his brilliant interpretation of the contemporary composers, Sibelius and Stravinsky. He has received honorary doctorates from Harvard and Brown Universities. In 1903, before he was 30, Dr. Koussevitzky was decorated by the Czar of Russsia. He was made a Knight of the French Legion of Honor in 1924.

Mr. Munch, the new conductor, was born in Strasbourg, Alsace, Sept. 26, 1891. His first teacher was his father, Ernest Munch, who was director of the Choeur Saint-Guillaume in Strasbourg. His chosen instrument was the violin, which he studied with his father and later with Lucien Capet in Paris and with Carl Flesch in Berlin.

Founded Paris Philharmonic

In 1919 Mr. Munch was made professor of the Strasbourg Conservatory and conductor of the orchestra there. He went to Leipzig in 1926 as a concert master under Wilhelm Furtwaengler.

Mr. Munch went to Paris in 1932. After conducting concerts of the Paris Symphony Orchestra and the Lamoureux and Straram Orchestras, he founded the Paris Philharmonic Orchestra, of which he since has been the regular conductor. In 1938, he succeeded Philippe Gaubert as conductor of the Paris Conservatory Orchestra. He still holds that post.

Mr. Munch made his first American appearance as guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Dec. 27, 1946. He also conducted the Boston orchestra for three weeks of the present season.

Mr. Muench left New York today for France to fulfill spring engagements as conductor in France, Holland and Belgium.

IN MUSIC POST CHANGES

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky

Dr. Charles Munch

IL 9, 1948.

CHANGES

ge Koussevitzky

Charles Munch

Muench to Succeed Koussevitzky When Conductor Retires in 1949

(Continued from First Page)

e Boston Symphony, Dr. Koussevitzky will conduct the opening concert of each symphony season after his retirement, for as many years as he wishes.

At the meeting of the Friends of the Symphony, Cabot read the letter of resignation which Dr. Koussevitzky sent to the trustees. It read in part:

"I am moved to take this decision because I feel that it will not be possible for me to continue my present strenuous obligations for the length of 16 to 18 weeks of our active winter season.

"It is not without deep concern and heartache that I shall come to part with an orchestra to which I have devoted 25 years of my life and am bound by a quarter of a century of uninterrupted work and artistic achievement.

"Let me express to you my warm and heartfelt appreciation for your confidence and friendship throughout these long years, that helped to make my work a labor of love, possible only in an atmosphere of understanding and harmony."

REGRET EXPRESSED

Addressing himself directly to Dr. Koussevitzky, who had conducted a brief concert for the Friends, the president of the trustees said, "The trustees have asked me to accept your resignation and to express for all of them their regret that the time is so near at hand for the conclusion of the most brilliant leadership and the most devoted service which the orchestra has ever enjoyed from anybody.

"Your letter gives us some comfort, however, for it reaffirms the association which will continue through your position as director of the Berkshire Music Center. For our part, and we hope you will feel the same, we should like to broaden this association by anticipating that you will return to us as a very special guest in the winter season.

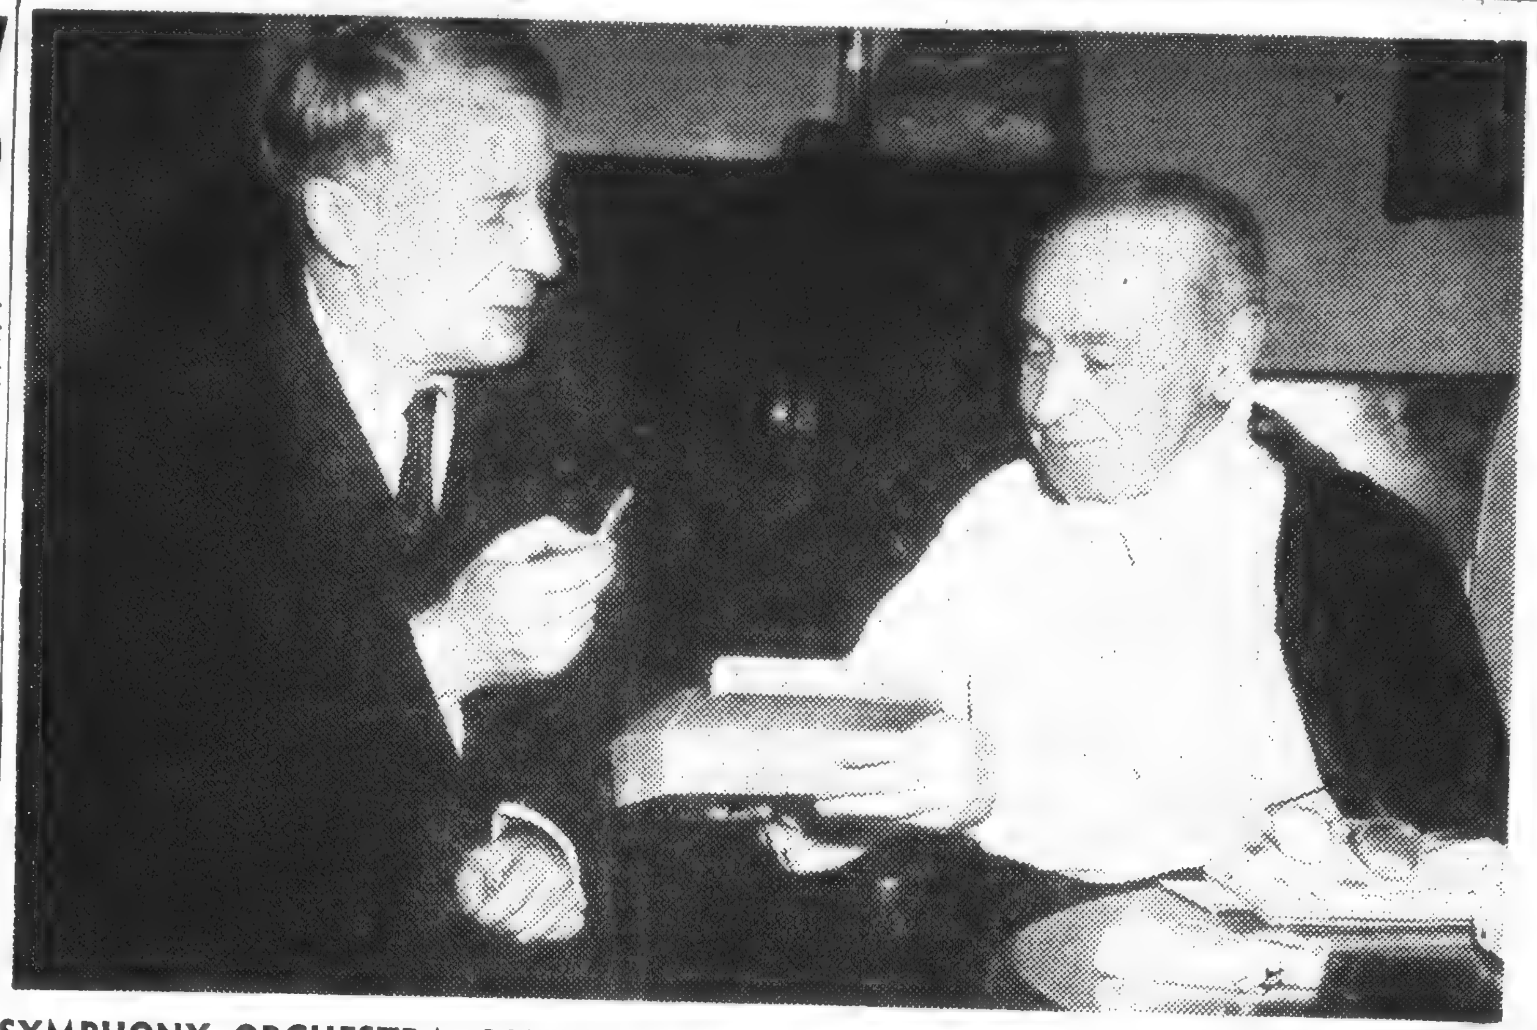
"You have given so generously of your great and courageous spirit which has made possible joy and happiness to hundreds and thousands of hungry and appreciative audiences all over the world. And we know at Tanglewood, too, you have lighted a torch that will shine on through troublesome or peaceful times, and by your vision point to security and incredible accomplishment.

"Our heartfelt thanks and God bless you always."

LONG SERVICE

Dr. Koussevitzky's silver jubilee next season will complete a period of service almost twice as long as that of any previous conductor. Previous longest was the 13 years of Wilhelm Gericke's two terms, 1884 to 1889 and 1898 to 1906.

During his 24 years as the Symphony's director, Dr. Koussevitzky has become a familiar figure in the musical life of the United States, through the orchestra's numerous tours and its weekly nationwide radio programs. His outstanding performances as conductor will be perpetuated by a long list of recordings.



SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA CONDUCTOR AND SUCCESSOR—Charles Muench (left), 56-year-old Alsatian-born conductor, is shown with Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, 74, during a visit to Boston. Muench will succeed Dr. Koussevitzky in 1949.

RKSHIRE CENTER

Koussevitzky Gets Heartfelt Tribute Here

Boston's Conductor Ends Bushnell Series Of Symphony Events

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Serge Koussevitzky, was presented in the final concert of the Bushnell series Tuesday night. The program [illegible]

[illegible]

Mr. Piston's Symphony.

[illegible]

syncopation and the general air of martial rat-ta-plan of the second and fourth movements suggest the contemporary Russian (if they still own him over there). Actually, Mr. Piston was probably rooting around in our own, native popular musical modes when he thought them up.

Except for certain ingratiating melodies and rhythms in the last movement, this Third is not a symphony for the concert hall loller. It is intense, complex and shrewd—and it requires concentrated listening, as well as the aural adjustment that much modern symphonic writing still demands. It is the work of an expert composer and one with things musical and emotional to say seriously and clear-eyed. Its reception last evening was not too enthusiastic, but Mr. Piston got at least a friendly if not over-interested hand from the house as he took bows on the stage with Dr. Koussevitzky.

Not Heart-to-Heart.

Mozart had been the opening fare on the program and Wagner was the closing. Dr. Koussevitzky was in a mood to make music with the most loving care, but he did not receive a similar response from the orchestra. The players must have had the Piston on their minds, for they played the "Kleine Nachtmusik" and a lot of the "Jupiter" in rather heavyhanded fashion. Dr. Koussevitzky continually had to quiet them, to shush them. The slow section of the Mozart attained a fine beauty of reading and playing, glowing under the mutes with unusual Romanticism, however. The Wagner excerpts, dramatic though they were, were roughly played in many spots.

T. H. P.

"He makes a quick study of a new piece, too. I went over the score of the Ernest Bloch concerto with him one evening at my home. Next day I took off on a concert tour, from which I returned about 12 days later. In that time Mr. Munch had learned, rehearsed and performed the piece. His memory is good, although he does not make a feature of memorizing minutely like a Toscanini or Mitropoulos.

"Personally Munch hasn't even the normal amount of egocentricity. Apart from music, I'd say he is a completely relaxed person, also completely unacademic and a man of high principle. He's thoughtful, too. Just the other night he came to my house for dinner, and he arrived with a big bunch of beautiful roses for my wife.

"Later in the evening, he told me that I ought to learn his two games of solitaire, for they can while away a good many dull hours when you are in trains on tour. One of the games is called 'Napoleon,' and I can't remember the name of the other. The one I really learned that night is more complicated than Canfield, and I can see how it could amuse you between concert stops. Munch told me he has played those games for years.

"I doubt that Mr. Munch is much of a social lion," smiled Hendl. "When he got back from an engagement in Houston, Tex., I asked him how he had spent his leisure between concerts. Do you know what he said? 'I had a fine time going every day to the zoological gardens to watch four new lion cubs.'"

2 Men Played With Munch

In the New York Philharmonic are two men who have known and played with Munch in France, Messrs. Temerson and Fortier, violinist and string bass.

"Do you remember how you told me some years ago when you came back from France, that there was a new and very talented conductor named Charles Munch?" beamed Zirato at the stocky, dark and neat-mustached Fortier.

"I do very well," smiled back the dapper bass player.

"I played for Munch in Paris," added Temerson, a man who speaks volubly whether English or French. "You know he was a very fine violinist before he became a conductor. He was concert master of the Gowandhaus Orchestra in Leipsic, some 20 years ago when Wilhelm Furtwaengler was conductor. I'l never forget, either, how when Toscanini came to conduct in Paris say about 17 years ago, Munch just for the experience, took his violin and slipped unannounced into the fiddle section and played the whole concert through while Toscanini conducted. At that time Munch already was known himself as a conductor. Munch is a deeply educated man, a fine scholar and what you would call generally cultured.

"Most of his life he devotes to music, although he has his friends and can be charmingly conversational and convivial. He knows about French antique furniture, too."

"Le Beau Charles"

It remains to be seen whether Boston will bestow an affectionate nickname upon Munch after he has taken over at Symphony Hall. If so, probably no improvement can be made over what the French call him: "Le Beau Charles."

In appearance, with his sensitive but no ascetic face (as Bostonians already know), his handsome silvery hair, slim figure and elegant manner, he indeed is "Le Beau Charles."

It remains also to be seen whether the ladies of Back Bay and Dedham, Cambridge and the North Shore, will form a special, and very feminine bloc of admirers, as did the Parisienes of the swank Faubourgs in Paris some time ago. Granted the difference of temperament between Paris and Boston, one suspects the same thing will happen.

It took a visit to New York to discover that the conductor was accompanied on his latest visit to Boston by his wife. She is said to be of a retiring disposition and with no inclination to reflect the rays of the spotlight.

It is further said her maiden name was Aubrey, that she is connected with one of the great chocolate manufacturing families of Switzerland and that she is wealthy in her own right. Mme. Munch dislikes flying and therefore sailed back to France on the Queen Mary some weeks before her husband departed from La Guardia Field Thursday evening.

Herbert F. Peyser, an editor of the periodical, Musical America, and a veteran of many years as musical journalist in Europe, furnished the little known fact that Munch was invited to conduct in St. Louis early in the war. He got as far as the Azores where some technical difficulty about passport, or the like, suddenly ended the journey. Munch returned to Paris, and carried on his work as conductor of the Paris Conservatory Orchestra, a job complicated by the fact that he had to fight the subtle machinations of the Nazis to win him over to their side.

Born in Alsace when that province was under German rule, Munch was thoroughly French, and he would have nothing to do with Third Reich collaboration. In his own way he fought the Nazis tooth and nail and emerged a winner.

Munch is a relative by marriage of Albert Schweitzer, the great Bach authority, theologian and medical missionary who has spent many years in Africa. Munch and Schweitzer both are natives of the Alsatian city of Strasbourg. Schweitzer as a young man was organist there, studied with the musical Munch family and married into it. The two men are devoted friends.

In Europe Munch has been famed for his encouragement of contemporary music. The chances are, since most of his time in the United States has been taken up by touring, that he has not had much opportunity to study the work of American composers. It is said, nevertheless, that already he has shown interest in some American scores friends have delivered to him.

Speaks Little English

At the present time there is something of a language barrier, for Munch speaks but a little English.

"He speaks the most precise and cultivated French, however," said Temerson.

The fact was corroborated by Vera Zorina, the ballet dancer turned actress, who had the spoken title role when Munch presented Honegger's "Jeanne D'Arc au Bucher" in New York last Winter.

"He was insistent about getting every accent correct when we were rehearsing," said Miss Zorina in the book-lined living room of the brownstone house in the East 60's where she and her husband, recording executive Goddard Lieberson, live.

"He was a hard taskmaster, but very pleasant to work with. I think

[134]

Villa-Lobes' 'Madona'; Musical Highlights of 1947

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

Owing to exceptional tightness of space in the paper following the 10th Boston Symphony concert a considerable portion of my review of that event was of necessity cut. Unfortunately, the inscrutable powers effecting this excision eliminated any mention whatever of the first performance anywhere of Heitor Villa-Lobos' Symphonic Poem, "Madona." Hence I am taking this opportunity to congratulate Mr. de Carvalho on his skillful interpretation of a difficult score and to examine a few first impressions of it.

The composer's own comments on this Symphonic Poem seemed to me no more than pious mumbo-jumbo. Evidently they were intended as a tribute to the late Mme. Natalie Koussevitzky. "There was an indefinable expression in her features which at once inspired in me an intuitive and definite confidence, remaining as an inexplicable and enduring memory of a being possessed with rare gifts of kindness," writes Mr. Villa-Lobos. And he indicates that "Madona" is an expression of this inspiration. Considering that he received this powerful impression in his Paris days, presumably in the 1920s, and that he is the prolific author of more than a thousand works, it took him a curiously long time to realize his emotions in tone.

At any rate the poem has a good deal of aural fascination. You listen, taking in the novel and exotic sonorities, noting the strongly individual flavor of the music and the sustained atmosphere of tranquillity. It is, as an admirer observes, an unselfconscious pouring forth of sound. I only question, as with so much of Villa-Lobos whether you would greatly want to hear it again. It has a certain amount of charm, but it is also rather amorphous; and tone poems, like any musical composition, require spine and skeleton. This may be an unfair recollection of the piece, but its qualities, oddly enough with a composer of such originality, do grow dim in retrospect.

OPERA HIGHLIGHTS

And now the annual question—what stood out musically during the past year? The most significant happenings were in the operatic field. Gian-Carlo Menotti's opera, "The Medium," has been amply discussed in these columns, so there is no need to emphasize further its importance in the contemporary development of opera. Secondly, Mr. Goldovsky's production of Mozart's "Idomeneo" is still green in our memory. The performance of this extraordinary work last summer at Tanglewood and in the Opera House on Dec. 21 were outstanding events of 1947.

The establishment of the New England Opera Theater in the Opera House with a repetition of its successful "Figaro" in English is something which is a great credit to Mr. Goldovsky's sagacity and skill and to the many faithful friends who have supported the venture from the first. For the sake of the record this enterprise also produced in 1947 Menotti's "The Old Maid and the Thief" and Puccini's "The Cloak" and "Boheme." It is a coincidence to recall that by far the most successful of the Metropolitan's offerings here last year was also a spirited "Boheme", which marked the local debut of Tagliavini.

We had only one visiting orchestra in 1947, the San Francisco Symphony, which gave a pleasant concert in April. It was merely thought in some quarters that Mr. Monteux might have made a wiser selection than the Brahms First for the last half of his program. Speaking of Brahms, 1947 was his anniversary year, and Mr. Koussevitzky duly celebrated the event. Aside from the works we hear all the time anyway, there were performed the Alto Rhapsody, the Requiem and the Serenade in A major, this last, a most charming early work. The disappointment in this celebration was that we did not get the superb Double Concerto Op. 102, which was done at the Berkshire Festival in 1946 and which is the most neglected of Brahms' masterpieces.

Both new and unfamiliar music was produced by the Boston Symphony at about the usual rate. The best new works, however, were both given this autumn, Honegger's Liturgical Symphony (introduced by Mr. Muench), and Hindemith's Symphonia Serena (introduced by Mr. Burgin). Honegger's Symphony for Strings was favored by Mr. Koussevitzky during 1947, but it was actually first played by Mr. Muench at the end of 1946. Bruckner's Ninth was finally played by Mr. Walter in its original version. Mr. Bernstein offered notable revivals of Stravinsky's Sacre and Hindemith's Violin Concerto (with Ruth Posselt). Mr. Koussevitzky also served Stravinsky well by letting us hear again the Symphony of Psalms. Neither Vaughan Williams' 5th nor Rachmaninoff's 3rd Symphonies, however, would make any year specially noteworthy.

Other notable events of 1947 more or less at random, were: The performance of Beethoven's Violin Concerto by Ginette Neveu; Claudio Arrau's recital; a remarkable ballad singer, Richard Dyer-Bennet; the Harvard Symposium on Music Criticism; the Grillers' two concerts and especially their performance for the first time here of Bloch's Quartet. There were many other fine recitals; but lists are never very readable and in any case our thoughts are now forward into 1948.

Isaac Stern to Play with Symphony

The 12th pair of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall will be conducted by Serge Koussevitzky next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. Dr. Koussevitzky will then introduce the new Third Symphony by Walter Piston, which mas written by commission of the Koussevitzky Music Foundation and dedicated to the memory of Mme. Natalie Koussevitzky. The symphony was completed last summer. Prokofieff's First Violin Concerto will be performed by Isaac Stern, the young violinist, who is to make his first appearance with this orchestra. Isaac Stern, now 27, was born in San Francisco. He studied there with Naoum Blinder and in New York with Louis Persinger. It was in 1943 that he made his first appearance in Carnegie Hall.

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA CONDUCTOR AND SUCCESSOR—Charles Muench (left), 56-year-old Alsatian-born conductor, is shown with Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, 74, during a visit to Boston. Muench will succeed Dr. Koussevitzky in 1949.

Music Lovers, Symphony Players Like Muench, Alsatian-Born Conductor Long Famed in Europe

Charles Muench, 56-year-old Alsatian-born conductor who will succeed Dr. Serge Koussevitzky at the opening of the 1949-1950 concert season, already has won enthusiastic approval from Boston music lovers who heard the current season's concerts at which he was guest conductor.

Completing two weeks of guest conducting with concerts last weekend, he was given an ovation by the critical Friday afternoon audience. The continued bursts of applause brought him back from the wings three times for acknowledgments before intermission, and another three times at the end of the program.

USES NO SCORE

A big man, six feet tall, handsome and with a shock of unruly gray hair, he conducts with vigorous gestures. He uses a baton, but frequently shifts it to his left hand to free his right for lively movement. Like several of today's younger conductors, he uses no score.

He spoke almost no English when he arrived in the United States in December, 1946. Although his English has improved to the point where—as a friend expressed it last night—"he can express himself until he gets involved, and then gives up," he addresses the musicians in French.

Members of the orchestra were delighted at the announcement of his appointment. They expressed themselves as having enjoyed his leadership, both in rehearsals and in concerts, during the one week last November and two this spring when he was guest conductor.

The Symphony conductor-elect is married. The couple have no children. It was not known last night when they planned to take up residence in Boston.

BORN IN ALSACE

Muench, who will take over the Symphony at the peak of its ability and while it is generally regarded as the world's finest orchestra, was born in Strasbourg, Alsace, Sept. 26, 1891, of a French mother and Alsatian father.

His father, Ernest Muench, who was director of the Choeur Saint-Guillaume in Strasbourg, was his first teacher. The [illegible] family includes two [illegible] of Charles who likewise have distinguished themselves musically.

The violin was Charles Muench's chosen instrument. Besides the tutorship of his father he studied with Lucien Capet in Paris and Carl Flesch in Berlin. In [illegible] he was made professor at the Strasbourg Conservatory and conductor of its orchestra.

In 1926 he went to Leipzig as concert master of the Gewandhaus Orchestra under Wilhelm Furtwangler. Six years later he transferred his activities to Paris where he conducted concerts of the Paris Symphony, Lamoureux and Straram orchestras.

He also founded the Paris Philharmonic Orchestra, of which he has since been the regular conductor. In 1938 he succeeded Philippe Gaubert as conductor of the Paris Conservatory Orchestra, a position he likewise still holds.

His first appearance as guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was Dec. 27, 1946, shortly after his arrival in this country

---

Muench to Succeed Koussevitzky When Conductor Retires in 1949

(Continued from First Page)

Muench, conductor of the Paris Conservatory Orchestra and the Paris Philharmonic, has appeared several times as guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, including three weeks of the present season's concerts.

He has been in America since December, 1946. During that time, he has made guest appearances with orchestras in New York, Chicago, Montreal, Cleveland, on the Pacific coast and in Texas. He left New York yesterday by plane to fulfill spring engagements in France, Holland and Belgium.

Six feet tall, he is a striking figure on the platform and critics unanimously have commented on the vigor of his gestures. During his guest conducting, he won the complete confidence and admiration of the Boston Symphony musicians. His contract with the Boston orchestra is for three years.

BERKSHIRE CENTER

Dr. Koussevitzky, although retiring as conductor of the Symphony, will continue as director of the Berkshire Music Center, the summer school of the Boston Symphony Orchestra founded at Tanglewood in 1940. The Berkshire center fulfilled a lifelong plan of Dr. Koussevitzky for a school where talented young musicians could perform in association with the foremost professionals.

Holding a position which might [illegible] "emeritus" of the Boston Symphony, Dr. Koussevitzky will conduct the opening concert of each symphony season after his retirement, for as many years as he wishes.

At the meeting of the Friends of the Symphony, Cabot read the letter of resignation which Dr. Koussevitzky sent to the trustees. It read in part:

"I am moved to take this decision because I feel that it will not be possible for me to continue my present strenuous obligations for the length of 16 to 18 weeks of our active winter season.

"It is not without deep concern and heartache that I shall come to part with an orchestra to which I have devoted 25 years of my life and am bound by a quarter of a century of uninterrupted work and artistic achievement.

"Let me express to you my warm and heartfelt appreciation for your confidence and friendship throughout these long years, that helped to make my work a labor of love, possible only in an atmosphere of understanding and harmony."

REGRET EXPRESSED

Addressing himself directly to Dr. Koussevitzky, who had conducted a brief concert for the Friends, the president of the trustees said, "The trustees have asked me to accept your resignation and to express for all of them their regret that the time is so near at hand for the conclusion of the most brilliant leadership and the most devoted service which the orchestra has ever enjoyed from anybody.

"Your letter gives us some comfort, however, for it reaffirms the association which will continue through your position as director of the Berkshire Music Center. For our part, and we hope you will feel the same, we should like to broaden this association by anticipating that you will return to us as a very special guest in the winter season.

"You have given so generously of your great and courageous spirit which has made possible joy and happiness to hundreds and thousands of hungry and appreciative audiences all over the world. And we know at Tanglewood, too, you have lighted a torch that will shine on through troublesome or peaceful times, and by your vision point to security and incredible accomplishment.

"Our heartfelt thanks and God bless you always."

LONG SERVICE

Dr. Koussevitzky's silver jubilee next season will complete a period of service almost twice as long as that of any previous conductor. Previous longest was the 13 years of Wilhelm Gericke's two terms, 1884 to 1889 and 1898 to 1906.

During his 24 years as the Symphony's director, Dr. Koussevitzky has become a familiar figure in the musical life of the United States, through the orchestra's numerous tours and its weekly nationwide radio programs. His outstanding performances as conductor will be perpetuated by a long list of recordings.

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL
Boston Symphony Orchestra

By CYRUS DURGIN

The 67th season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra ends with the Symphony Hall concerts of yesterday afternoon and tonight. It also ends amid the exaltations and tonal splendors of Brahms' First Symphony, a work which has served conductor Serge Koussevitzky as closing piece on many such occasions in the past. The program begins with the B minor Concerto Grosso, Op. 6, No. 12, by Handel, and includes the Second Suite from Prokofieff's ballet score "Romeo and Juliet."

The audience was well aware that this seasonal ending is the last but one of Serge Koussevitzky's long regime as conductor. Accordingly, they joined the orchestra in rising when he first appeared on the stage, and at the end they stood paying him noisy tribute with their handclapping and cheers. It was a bit of a wrench to realize that when we say goodby to him a year hence, he will return only occasionally as guest conductor. In the meantime, however, the sadness inevitable on that occasion may be put aside in expectation of the brilliant season we may expect to begin next Fall when Mr. Koussevitzky enters his 25th and Silver Jubilee year.

Since the Koussevitzky strings have always had their special quality of strong resonance, rich color and crystal clarity, it was fitting to show them off in the Handel Concerto Grosso. Once again they showed that satin sheen which are their glory and the despair of any string body less individually talented and collectively disciplined. The performance was admirable in respects of expression and style, although I thought the conductor took the larghetto a little too slowly.

The dramatic interpretation of Prokofieff's "Romeo and Juliet" music—a really extraordinary expression in sound of what goes on in the Shakespearean tragedy—made one wish again that some American ballet company would present the work entire. That should be a great experience. The excerpts that we know are proof that this is music by a master of orchestral writing as well as a poet of tone [illegible] of broad conception [illegible] power.

The [illegible] miliarity [illegible] upon [illegible] phony [illegible] strength [illegible] Yet [illegible] Mr. K[illegible]

Koussevit
Munch to

Dr. Serge Koussevit retire as music directo
Boston Symphony Orch
the end of the sea
1948-49.

He will be succeed
Charles Munch, the Fren ductor who last week c ed a fortnight as guest le the orchestra.

This was announced day by Henry B. Cabot, dent of the trustees, at t nual meeting in Symphon of the Society of Friends
Boston Symphony Orches

The news came as a st

Koussevitzky to Retire; Munch to Succeed Him

By CYRUS DURGIN

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will retire as music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the end of the season of 1948-49.

He will be succeeded by Charles Munch, the French conductor, who last week completed an engagement as guest leader of the orchestra.

This was announced yesterday by Henry B. Cabot, president of the trustees, at the annual meeting in Symphony Hall of the Society of Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The news came as a startling climax, following a brief business session and a musical interlude in which Dr. Koussevitzky conducted the orchestra in two Wagner Preludes: those to "Lohengrin" and "Die Meistersinger."

See SYMPHONY Page 2

Symphony

Continued from the First Page

Next season will be Dr. Koussevitzky's 25th at the head of what often has been termed "the greatest orchestra in the world today," and it will have the character of a Silver Jubilee, with special features planned.

His actual retirement will follow the Berkshire Festival of 1949, which he will conduct.

The distinguished musician will then be 75. He will continue to be active director of the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood, and will make guest appearances with the Boston Symphony both during the main seasons here and at the Berkshire Music Festivals.

Charles Munch signed in New York on Wednesday a contract as music director, beginning in October, 1949. He flew from New York last night to fill Spring engagements in France, Holland and Belgium. Mr. Munch was born in Strasbourg, Alsace, Sept. 26, 1891, of a French mother and an Alsatian father.

THE BOSTON DAILY GLOBE—FRIDAY, APRIL 9, 1948

NEW BOSTON SYMPHONY MAESTRO BOWS IN—Charles Munch (left), new conductor, shown with Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, retiring after 25 years as director at the end of next season.

His first teacher was his father, Ernest Munch, director of the Choeur Saint-Guillaume in Strasbourg. His instrument was the violin, which he studied later with Lucien Sapet in Paris and Carl Flesch in Berlin. He was made professor at the Strasbourg Conservatory and conductor of the orchestra there in 1919. He became concert master of the Leipsic Gewandhaus Orchestra, under Wilhelm Furtwaengler, in 1926.

In 1932 he founded the Paris Philharmonic orchestra, which he has since conducted. Previously he had directed the Paris Symphony, the Lamoreaux and Straram orchestras. Since 1938, when he succeeded Philippe Gaubert, Mr. Munch also has been conductor of the Paris Conservatory orchestra.

Mr. Munch first came to the United States in 1946 and made his American debut in Boston Dec. 27. He returned to Symphony Hall last November and again in March. He has made guest appearances with other American orchestras.

Koussevitzky Holds Record

Dr. Koussevitzky has directed the Boston Symphony nearly twice longer than any other conductor in its history. The two terms of Wilhelm Gericke, who had the next longest tenure, totalled 13 years.

In his quarter century in the United States, Dr. Koussevitzky has become a commanding figure of the American musical scene, famed for his concerts here and in other cities, known to a vast radio audience across the country.

The many recordings he has made with the Boston orchestra are a preservation of the brilliance and especial quality of his art. Dr. Koussevitzky also has come to be regarded with true affection for his whole-hearted devotion in furthering modern music, notably that by American composers.

The founding of the Berkshire Music Center in 1940 was the realization of his lifelong desire to develop a school where young musicians of exceptional talent could receive the benefits of association with foremost musicians. Already the Berkshire Music Center has produced conductors, instrumentalists and singers who are making their mark.

Mr. Cabot announced the change in leadership by reading to the audience of about 700 Friends, the following letter from Dr. Koussevitsky:

"My dear Friends:

"It is a profound regret to me and a painful duty to confirm by the present letter my decision to resign as Conductor and Music Director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra following the season 1948-1949, which will also mark my 25th anniversary with our great and loved Orchestra.

"I am moved to take this decision because I feel that it will not be possible for me to continue my present strenuous obligations for the length of 16 to 18 weeks of our active Winter season.

"It is not without deep concern and heartache that I shall come to part with an orchestra to which I have devoted 25 years of my life and am bound by a quarter of a century of uninterrupted work and artistic achievement.

"I take comfort in the thought, however, that our association will not be completely severed, and as Director of the Berkshire Music Center I shall continue to serve the great educational and cultural cause, radiating from Tanglewood, thus carrying on the responsibility for a unique venture which you helped me to bring to life and which has developed to become an outstanding chapter in the history of the Boston Symphony.

"Let me express to you my warm and heartfelt appreciation for your confidence and friendship throughout these long years, that helped to make my work a labor of love, possible only in an atmosphere of understanding and harmony."

Mr. Cabot replied as follows:

"Dear Dr. Koussevitsky:

"Last Wednesday at the trustees' meeting you presented a letter to the board resigning as conductor and music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra following the season of 1948-1949, which will mark the 25th anniversay of your leadership with you—may I say, our—orhestra. That meeting was adjourned until today and the trustees have asked me to accept your resignation and to express for all of them their regret that the time is so near at hand for the conclusion of the most brilliant leadership and the most devoted service which the orchestra has ever enjoyed from anybody.

"Your letter gives us some comfort, however, for it re-affirms the association which will continue through your position as director of the Berkshire Music Center. For our part, and we hope you will feel the same, we should like to broaden this association by anticipating that you will return to us as a very special guest in the Winter season.

"You have given so generously of your great and courageous spirit which has made possible joy and happiness to hundreds and thousands of hungry and appreciative audiences all over the world. And we know at Tanglewood, too, you have lighted a torch that will shine on through troublesome or peaceful times, and by your vision point to security and incredible accomplishment.

"Our heartfelt thanks and God bless you always."

During the business meeting, at which Oliver Wolcott was unanicously re-elected chairman of the Society of Friends, the present financial prospects of the orchestra were discussed. For the current year, $156,000 in subscriptions has been pledged by the Friends, of whom there are 324 new members.

The weekly radio broadcasts now have 21 cooperative sponsors through the country, and although broadcasting receipts are said to be about $7000 less than the previous season, the loss is expected to be made up by royalties from increased sales of recordings. General expenses, however, have gone up.

Following the business meeting and concert, tea was served in the upper Huntington av. foyer.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

For the final program of this, his 24th and next-to-the-last season as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky has judiciously combined the old, the not-so-old and the relatively new. As heard yesterday, this program put the orchestra through its best paces, Handel's Concerto Grosso in B minor, the twelfth and last of the set that he wrote in just over a month in the fall of 1739, originally brought to our attention by Dr. Koussevitzky himself, again set forth the glories of the Boston strings. To be sure, the conductor was over-deliberate with the broad and beautiful Larghetto, but we are used to that. Making slow movements a bit too slow is one of his specialties.

At the opposite tonal extreme was the Second Suite from Prokofieff's ballet, "Romeo and Juliet." When the composer introduced the suite to us 10 years ago, at a concert of his own music, he played all seven numbers. Dr. Koussevitzky has got it down to four (which he has recorded) and no doubt they are the cream of the crop. I wouldn't remember, though I do recall that now-omitted Dance of the West Indian Slave Girls was very striking.

Anyway, the four numbers made such an agreeable impression yesterday that one longed for more of the same sort. This ballet is satirical and has little to do with Shakespeare. Indeed, the note of irony in Prokofieff's music is one of its happiest features. It is also deft and brilliant, superbly orchestrated, and for pure delight would be hard to equal in its particular sphere. The performance yesterday represented orchestral virtuosity of the highest sort.

For years Dr. Koussevitzky ended every season with the First Symphony of Brahms. For a while he replaced that work with the Ninth of Beethoven. Yesterday the Brahms was back in its honored position. Koussevitzky's eloquence with it, though sometimes a bit un-Brahmsian, is as familiar as the music itself.

This has been an interesting season and general comment upon it will appear on the music page tomorrow. Mention will not then be made of the fact, however, that at the regular concerts 40 composers were down for 73 numbers, not the largest total we have had by any means, due to the presence of many works of more than average length. Of these 40, seven were native-born Americans. Last year there were but three. Three others on the present list, Hindemith, Schoenberg and Stravinsky, are now American citizens, and there are two Brazilians. So the Western Hemisphere didn't fare so badly—composers and 16 works.

MUSIC

Symphony Concert

The 24th concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, was given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows:

Concerto Grosso for strings in B minor		Handel
"Romeo and Juliet" 2d Suite	Op. 64	Prokofieff
Symphony No. 1 in C minor	Op. 68	Brahms

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

The final concert of the Boston Symphony season is always an event tinged with melancholy. Except when the weather is unseasonably warm there seems no good reason why the concerts should stop. So Dr. Koussevitzky takes the curse off the occassion, or, in another sense, adds to our burden of regret, by offering a resplendent performance of Brahms First Symphony. It is certainly his favorite for this role of winding up the season. This year, in fact, we have heard all four of the Brahms Symphonies, which is almost too much of a good thing in so far as variety of program-making is concerned. If at all costs we must have so much Brahms, why not the Double Concerto, one of his greatest symphonic works?

The one near-novelty of the program was Prokofieff's Second Suite from "Romeo and Juliet," though it may be familiar to many of us from the orchestra's recording of it. Dr. Koussevitzky evidently thinks that the entire Suite is overlong. It was a bit too long on the program which Prokofieff himself conducted here in 1938, but would it not have fitted well at yesterday's concert? At any rate we were not given the chance to find out. The most impressive section is the finale, "Romeo at Juliet's Grave," which is serious music of passionate intensity. The opening makes superb use of contrasted fortissimi and pianissimi, and the two middle sections are ballet music of great distinction.

One of Prokofieffs chief attributes is his extraordinarily musical sense of humor. It asserts itself again and again throughout his works, with many a sly twist harmonically or melodically and all manner of ingeniously contrived tricks. It would seem advisable to ignore Shakespeare in listening to this Suite. The music speaks for itself, and any references to Shakespeares characters are, as the novelists always apologize, purely coincidental.

Dr. Koussevitzky rather exaggerated the allargando conclusions in the Handel Suite, but otherwise the strings sounded superbly in it. All afternoon, as a matter of fact, we heard glowing orchestral sound and playing. It was a fitting end to the season. Some general remarks on the Symphony season will be found in the Sunday Herald, where there is more space to discuss the various aspects thereof.

Juilliard Concert

Koussevitzky Conducts Third in Student Aid Series

By Francis D. Perkins

JULLIARD ORCHESTRA AND CHORUS, Serge Koussevitzky, guest conductor, concert yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall. The program:

Overture to "Egmont" .... Beethoven
Symphony No. 9, in D minor .... Beethoven
Soloists: Mariquita Moll, soprano; Margaret Roggero, contralto; John Druary, tenor; Harry Wayne, basso.

For the third and last concert of its Carnegie Hall series for the benefit of its Student Aid Fund, the Juilliard School of Music enlisted the services of an eminent guest conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, who directed memorable performances of two works of Beethoven, the "Egmont" overture and the Ninth Symphony. Except for the Boston Symphony Orchestra's musical director, all of the more than 300 participants were Juilliard students. Apart, however, from a sense of youthful and intent enthusiasm, there was nothing to suggest that this was a student performance.

The prevailing quality of the orchestral playing and the choral singing spoke well not only for the leadership and inspiration provided by the conductor, but also for the preparation that must have preceded the final rehearsals. The instrumental standard which marked yesterday afternoon's concert was one to be expected of a first class major symphony orchestra, while this noteworthy professional standard was not accompanied by an impression of routine. On Dr. Koussevitzky's part, the concert suggested that he enjoys working with student musicians; this impression had also been given by the festival which he presented with his Berkshire Music Center students in 1942.

The members of the orchestra, judging by yesterday's program, are accomplished instrumentalists; there were no apparent weak spots in the ensemble's various sections. An occasional preponderance in the strings in proportion to the woodwinds, which was noticeable in the symphony, could be attributed to the seating of the musicians on a necessarily crowded stage. The lyricism of the tone of the violins and the artistry of this section's phrasing was one feature of the concert; another was the exceptional vitality and exuberance that characterized the triumphant close of the "Egmont" overture. The performance as a whole told of eager devotion, pervasive vitality and an inherent freshness in the interpretation of the music. Both works are among the perennial masterpieces of symphonic literature; both are familiar, but the performance impressed its hearers with the quality of the music rather than reminding them of its familiarity.

The singing of the chorus, trained by Robert Shaw, deserved the highest praise in all respects, including quality and balance of tone and conveyance of the emotions of the music and of Schiller's text, which was sung in the original German. The tone was clear, full and firm, giving no hint of the difficulties of the vocal in the finale of the Ninth Symphony; the choral music was presented with memorable momentum and expressiveness.

The quartet of soloists compared very favorably with other groups that have sung in the Ninth Symphony here in recent years even if yesterday, as in all or nearly all of the performances this reviewer has heard in the last thirty years, it did not entirely disguise the difficulties of its assignment. Miss Moll's voice seemed to be of unusual caliber, in brightness and firmness of tone and effectiveness at high altitudes; it needed more evenness of phrasing. Mr. Druary sang his principal solo with a pleasing, if slightly tense quality of tone; Mr. Wayne's introductory solo, while needing slightly more firmness, had a well phrased and musical presentation. Mr. Shaw shared in the applause bestowed upon the conductor, singers and instrumentalists by a large audience.

THE HARTFORD TIMES. WEDNESDAY,

'Goodbye Koussevitzky' In Hartford Applause

By CARL E. LINDSTROM

It was less than a week ago that Dr. Serge Koussevitzky's forthcoming retirement was announced. If he conducts a limited number of concerts next season, no one knows yet whether any of these will be in this city and doubtless many people in Bushnell Hall last night thought they might be listening to his last Hartford performance.

There was an ovation when he first appeared. The man, who has always been warmly received here, was applauded with unusual heartiness after every number.

The sentiments of his admirers must have been apparent to him, for Koussevitzky, who is a sensitive artist, began his program with an urbanity customary to those pleased moments when he produces his best Mozart and he quickly ran an artistic temperature which culminated in as lush and plangent a Wagner as his sonorous Boston Symphony is capable of.

From the Little Night Music to the Lohengrin Prelude and the Meistersinger Overture, it was a typical Koussevitzky program (and who wanted anything else?) because the middle of it was given over to a contemporary American score and a Boston one at that, Walter Piston's new Third Symphony.

* * *

WITHOUT KOUSSEVITZKY what are we going to do about today's music? Not much probably, because there isn't a single one of our visiting maestros who has courage enough to get very far away from Tschaikowsky and Brahms and Debussy. They would play Raff and Delibes if that were what they thought the customers wanted.

It would be inadequate and sentimental to talk about Koussevitzky's retirement unless proper notice were taken of his evangelical bias in favor of living composers, particularly if they live in this country. He brought us Shostakovich and Hindemith when nobody asked him to, but he insisted upon Copland and Schuman and Harris.

Last night I changed my mind about Piston. Up to now he has been, for me, very professorial and efficient and uninteresting. I had the feeling that he didn't want you to know what his music was about, just as his own notes in last night's program seemed intended to be as uninformative as possible.

* * *

BUT HIS THIRD Symphony is more than mere technique. He did not seem to be preoccupied with design, although the climax in each movement was magnificently managed.

Possibly this Piston symphony has a program, but since it isn't vouchsafed to us, the meaning is anybody's guess, particularly anybody who was moved by it even if he happens to be a critic. The march-like finale is a hint; so is the dialectic scherzo.

Certainly the slow movement is subjective, and there is tone painting which is sometimes impressionistic, sometimes atmospheric. No self-respecting composer is going to supply a scenario and say that he is depicting a camp meeting or a clambake or a lynching, but Mr. Piston's symphony struck me as being about people, and for people. I cannot imagine people not asking to hear it a second time and a third because there is a mesmeric undertone which argues: This has a good deal to do with you.

It really leads one to wonder what difference there is between Mozart and Piston, between Piston and Wagner, except dates and styles? Yes, this perhaps: Composers do not work miracles; they don't try to do so. They are content to make patterns or to report what they have observed. Miracles don't happen today. And they didn't in Wagner's day, except that Wagner was the kind of genius who made them happen.

There is no other word but miracle to describe the Lohengrin Prelude. From the standpoint of architecture, it was a matchless crescendo, but that is not enough. It was not real; it was from another world altogether that Koussevitzky took it. For many, this must have been the peak of the program; perhaps for Koussevitzky. It set him aglow.

This concert had everything—the aristocratic Jupiter Symphony, the excitement of a modern work superbly done, the brilliance of the over-familiar but never-to-do-be-denied Meistersinger Prelude.

It had the seal, the hallmark of Koussevitzky.

Esplanade's Twentieth

The Fourth of July, 1929, meant more than a day of firecrackers and frolic at the height of a stock market boom. It was the day that a young Boston Symphony Orchestra member, Arthur Fiedler, carried out the courage of his convictions in the first Esplanade Concert that broadened Boston's outdoor musical life from a silver cornet band to symphonies in a shell. From the start, through boom times and depression, the melodic and beautiful summer evenings have been a public service and a public privilege, with small contributions from thousands providing the support.

Next month the concerts begin their 20th season, no longer an experiment. The conductor still is Arthur Fiedler. The first wooden shell of 1929 is only a memory as is the larger, steel plate structure that served from 1934 to 1940. Eight years ago, on July 2, the present and permanent granite Hatch Memorial Shell was dedicated to Boston's lovers of good music of whom 20,000 will gather on the green in a single evening and 250,000 will throng to the Esplanade lawn over the season.

As the audience has grown in size and enthusiasm, so has the orchestra nearly doubled from its 46 musicians of the first five years and its repertoire expanded from mere attraction to the educational delight of the listeners. Symphonies now are old friends, rather than curiosities, with admirable balance of popular repertory. The growth of the music has not dwarfed the setting of informality and charm. Its success is a tribute to practical genius that feared neither the unknown nor financial uncertainty. Anything less than the concerts' continuance would be unthinkable.

Herald

CINCINNATI, O.
ENQUIRER
MAY 1 - 1948

[illegible] by a special [illegible] mission were promised by Miller.

Johnson To Conduct In Week Of Concerts Of Boston Symphony

Thor Johnson, Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra Conductor, accepted an invitation yesterday to be guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at four concerts in Boston the week of January 17, 1949.

In recognition of the honor accorded to the young Cincinnati conductor, J. M. O'Kane, Orchestra Manager, is making plans to obtain a guest conductor for local concerts Johnson was scheduled to direct here January 22 and 23.

Last night Johnson conducted the first concert of the May Festival at Ann Arbor.

ROANOKE, VA.
TIMES
[illegible] 1948

BEETHOVEN'S NINTH SYMPHONY will be directed by Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at his appearance as guest conductor with the Juilliard Chorus and Orchestra on May 9, in the last of three concerts at Carnegie Hall in New York.

The director is appearing with the youthful orchestra as part of a plan to give students at the Juilliard School of Music the opportunity of playing under the direction of the world's greatest conductors.

Book of the Month Club News
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MAY - 1948

NOWADAYS Brooklyn's reputation has become so much a matter of accent and a ball team, that we're glad to repeat a bit of ultra refinement overheard at a concert at the Brooklyn Academy of Music. Five times a season the Boston orchestra plays there, and on this occasion Koussevitsky was introducing a new singer—a young girl with a beautiful voice. It was the opportunity of a lifetime. The girl was making her debut with the best orchestra and with one of the most renowned conductors in the country. And she made good. After her songs the applause was deafening. She came out for call after call. Kousevitsky shook her hand and the men of the orchestra tapped their stands with enthusiasm. It was at this point that the little woman in the third row was heard to say: "Such a lovely girl! Isn't it too bad she has to earn her living!"

MUSKOGEE, OKLA.
PHOENIX
MAY

'BOSTON POPS ORCHESTRA' TO OPEN ON TUESDAY

The American Broadcasting Company will present the first of this season's "Pops" concerts by the Boston Pops Orchestra, Arthur Fiedler conducting, from Symphony Hall in Boston next Tuesday night at 8:[illegible] [illegible] will be the 63rd season of the summer programs by the Boston Symphony Orchestra musicians and the 19th for Fiedler, who first presided in the season of 1930.

The "Pops" were founded by Wilhelm Gericke, second conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra as a means of employing the musicians during the summer months. They have become an integral part of the season and ABC each year broadcasts not only these and the regular fall and winter concerts, but also some of the programs from the Esplanade on the Charles River and the more recently esetablished Berkshire Festival, founded by Serge Koussevitzky who, at the conclusion of next season, will retire as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra after 25 years of service in that capacity.

Symphony Hall loses its austere surroundings and, with seats removed and replaced by tables at which cooling refreshments are served provides an ideal setting for enpoyment of lighter musical fare.

BRIDGEPORT, CONN.
HERALD

STRAVINSKY: L'HISTOIRE DU SOLDAT, OCTET FOR WIND INSTRUMENTS - Last summer in the Concert Theater at Tanglewood, the Boston Symphony's summer capital in Lenox, Mass., young Leonard Bernstein (whom many had guessed would succeed Serge Koussevitzky instead of Charles Munch) conducted two works Igor Stravinsky had composed for small groups, "The Soldier's Tale," a setting for a fairy tale about a soldier, violin and the devil, played by seven instruments, and Octet for Wind Instruments. The former, which usually employs a narrator in concert hall performance but does not here, is a complex work in the style of a suite in which each of the seven participants is treated as a solo instrument; some of it is difficult to take, but it is first-class as a technical feat. The octet is easier to listen to and superbly played, in spite of its [illegible], by the excellent Bostonians. The recording is so good that we congratulate Red Seal [illegible] the men who did the [illegible] Gilbert and [illegible]

ERIE, PA.
DISPATCH-HERALD-SUN
[illegible] 1948

To Retire

AFTER 25 years as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. [illegible] Koussevitzky, 7 announces he will resign after the 1948 season.

Juilliard Concert

Koussevitzky Conducts Third in Student Aid Series

By Francis D. Perkins

JUILLIARD ORCHESTRA AND CHORUS, Serge Koussevitzky, guest conductor, concert yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall. The program:
Overture to "Egmont" .... Beethoven
Symphony No. 9, in D minor .... Beethoven
Soloists: Mariquita Moll, soprano; Margaret Roggero, contralto; John Druary, tenor; Harry Wayne, basso.

For the third and last concert of its Carnegie Hall series for the benefit of its Student Aid Fund, the Juilliard School of Music enlisted the services of an eminent guest conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, who directed memorable performances of two works of Beethoven, the "Egmont" overture and the Ninth Symphony. Except for the Boston Symphony Orchestra's musical director, all of the more than 300 participants were Juilliard students. Apart, however, from a sense of youthful and intent enthusiasm, there was nothing to suggest that this was a student performance.

The prevailing quality of the orchestral playing and the choral singing spoke well not only for the leadership and inspiration provided by the conductor, but also for the preparation that must have preceded the final rehearsals. The instrumental standard which marked yesterday afternoon's concert was one to be expected of a first class major symphony orchestra, while this noteworthy professional standard was not accompanied by an impression of routine. On Dr. Koussevitzky's part, the concert suggested that he enjoys working with student musicians; this impression had also been given by the festival which he presented with his Berkshire Music Center students in 1942.

The members of the orchestra, judging by yesterday's program, are accomplished instrumentalists; there were no apparent weak spots in the ensemble's various sections. An occasional preponderance in the strings in proportion to the woodwinds, which was noticeable in the symphony, could be attributed to the seating of the musicians on a necessarily crowded stage. The lyricism of the tone of the violins and the artistry of this section's phrasing was one feature of the concert; another was the exceptional vitality and exuberance that characterized the triumphant close of the "Egmont" overture. The performance as a whole told of eager devotion, pervasive vitality and an inherent freshness in the interpretation of the music. Both works are among the perennial masterpieces of symphonic literature; both are familiar, but the performance impressed its hearers with the quality of the music rather than reminding them of its familiarity.

The singing of the chorus, trained by Robert Shaw, deserved the highest praise in all respects, including quality and balance of tone and conveyance of the emotions of the music and of Schiller's text, which was sung in the original German. The tone was clear, full and firm, giving no hint of the difficulties of the vocal in the finale of the Ninth Symphony; the choral music was presented with memorable momentum and expressiveness.

The quartet of soloists compared very favorably with other groups that have sung in the Ninth Symphony here in recent years even if yesterday, as in all or nearly all of the performances this reviewer has heard in the last thirty years, it did not entirely disguise the difficulties of its assignment. Miss Moll's voice seemed to be of unusual caliber, in brightness and firmness of tone and effectiveness at high altitudes; it needed more evenness of phrasing. Mr. Druary sang his principal solo with a pleasing, if slightly tense quality of tone; Mr. Wayne's introductory solo, while needing slightly more firmness, had a well phrased and musical presentation. Mr. Shaw shared in the applause bestowed upon the conductor, singers and instrumentalists by a large audience.

THE HARTFORD TIMES. WEDNESDAY,

'Goodbye Koussevitzky' In Hartford Applause

By CARL E. LINDSTROM

It was less than a week ago that Dr. Serge Koussevitzky's forthcoming retirement was announced. If he conducts a limited number of concerts next season, no one knows yet whether any of these will be in this city and doubtless many people in Bushnell Hall last night thought they might be listening to his last Hartford performance.

There was an ovation when he first appeared. The man, who has always been warmly received here, was applauded with unusual heartiness after every number.

The sentiments of his admirers must have been apparent to him, for Koussevitzky, who is a sensitive artist, began his program with an urbanity customary to those pleased moments when he produces his best Mozart and he quickly ran an artistic temperature which culminated in as lush and plangent a Wagner as his sonorous Boston Symphony is capable of.

From the Little Night Music to the Lohengrin Prelude and the Meistersinger Overture, it was a typical Koussevitzky program (and who wanted anything else?) because the middle of it was given over to a contemporary American score and a Boston one at that, Walter Piston's new Third Symphony.

* * *

WITHOUT KOUSSEVITZKY what are we going to do about today's music? Not much probably, because there isn't a single one of our visiting maestros who has courage enough to get very far away from Tschaikowsky and Brahms and Debussy. They would play Raff and Delibes if that were what they thought the customers wanted.

It would be inadequate and sentimental to talk about Koussevitzky's retirement unless proper notice were taken of his evangelical bias in favor of living composers, particularly if they live in this country. He brought us Shostakovich and Hindemith when nobody asked him to, but he insisted upon Copland and Schuman and Harris.

Last night I changed my mind about Piston. Up to now he has been, for me, very professorial and efficient and uninteresting. I had the feeling that he didn't want you to know what his music was about, just as his own notes in last night's program seemed intended to be as uninformative as possible.

* * *

BUT HIS THIRD Symphony is more than mere technique. He did not seem to be preoccupied with design, although the climax in each movement was magnificently managed.

Possibly this Piston symphony has a program, but since it isn't vouchsafed to us, the meaning is anybody's guess, particularly anybody who was moved by it even if he happens to be a critic. The march-like finale is a hint; so is the dialectic scherzo.

Certainly the slow movement is subjective, and there is tone painting which is sometimes impressionistic, sometimes atmospheric. No self-respecting composer is going to supply a scenario and say that he is depicting a camp meeting or a clambake or a lynching, but Mr. Piston's symphony struck me as being about people, and for people. I cannot imagine people not asking to hear it a second time and a third because there is a mesmeric undertone which argues: This has a good deal to do with you.

It really leads one to wonder what difference there is between Mozart and Piston, between Piston and Wagner, except dates and styles? Yes, this perhaps: Composers do not work miracles; they don't try to do so. They are content to make patterns or to report what they have observed. Miracles don't happen today. And they didn't in Wagner's day, except that Wagner was the kind of genius who made them happen.

There is no other word but miracle to describe the Lohengrin Prelude. From the standpoint of architecture, it was a matchless crescendo, but that is not enough. It was not real; it was from another world altogether that Koussevitzky took it. For many, this must have been the peak of the program; perhaps for Koussevitzky. It set him aglow.

This concert had everything—the aristocratic Jupiter Symphony, the excitement of a modern work superbly done, the brilliance of the over-familiar but never-to-do-be-denied Meistersinger Prelude.

It had the seal, the hallmark of Koussevitzky.

Esplanade's Twentieth

The Fourth of July, 1929, meant more than a day of firecrackers and frolic at the height of a stock market boom. It was the day that a young Boston Symphony Orchestra member, Arthur Fiedler, carried out the courage of his convictions in the first Esplanade Concert that broadened Boston's outdoor musical life from a silver cornet band to symphonies in a shell. From the start, through boom times and depression, the melodic and beautiful summer evenings have been a public service and a public privilege, with small contributions from thousands providing the support.

Next month the concerts begin their 20th season, no longer an experiment. The conductor still is Arthur Fiedler. The first wooden shell of 1929 is only a memory as is the larger, steel plate structure that served from 1934 to 1940. Eight years ago, on July 2, the present and permanent granite Hatch Memorial Shell was dedicated to Boston's lovers of good music of whom 20,000 will gather on the green in a single evening and 250,000 will throng to the Esplanade lawn over the season.

As the audience has grown in size and enthusiasm, so has the orchestra nearly doubled from its 46 musicians of the first five years and its repertoire expanded from mere attraction to the educational delight of the listeners. Symphonies now are old friends, rather than curiosities, with admirable balance of popular repertory. The growth of the music has not dwarfed the setting of informality and charm. Its success is a tribute to practical genius that feared neither the unknown nor financial uncertainty. Anything less than the concerts' continuance would be unthinkable.

CINCINNATI, O.
ENQUIRER
MAY 1 - 1948

mission were promised by Miller.

Johnson To Conduct In Week Of Concerts Of Boston Symphony

Thor Johnson, Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra Conductor, accepted an invitation yesterday to be guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at four concerts in Boston the week of January 17, 1949.

In recognition of the honor accorded to the young Cincinnati conductor, J. M. O'Kane, Orchestra Manager, is making plans to obtain a guest conductor for local concerts Johnson was scheduled to direct here January 22 and 23.

Last night Johnson conducted the first concert of the May Festival at Ann Arbor.

ROANOKE, VA.
TIMES
MAY 2 - 1948

BEETHOVEN'S NINTH SYMPHONY will be directed by Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at his appearance as guest conductor with the Juilliard Chorus and Orchestra on May 9, in the last of three concerts at Carnegie Hall in New York.

The director is appearing with the youthful orchestra as part of a plan to give students at the Juilliard School of Music the opportunity of playing under the direction of the world's greatest conductors.

MUSKOGEE, OKLA.
PHOENIX
MAY

'BOSTON POPS ORCHESTRA' TO OPEN ON TUESDAY

The American Broadcasting Company will present the first of this season's "Pops" concerts by the Boston Pops Orchestra, Arthur Fiedler conducting, from Symphony Hall in Boston next Tuesday night at 8:30. This will be the 63rd season of the summer programs by the Boston Symphony Orchestra musicians and the 19th for Fiedler, who first presided in the season of 1930.

The "Pops" were founded by Wilhelm Gericke, second conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra as a means of employing the musicians during the summer months. They have become an integral part of the season and ABC each year broadcasts not only these and the regular fall and winter concerts, but also some of the programs from the Esplanade on the Charles River and the more recently esetablished Berkshire Festival, founded by Serge Koussevitzky who, at the conclusion of next season, will retire as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra after 25 years of service in that capacity.

Symphony Hall loses its austere surroundings and, with seats removed and replaced by tables at which cooling refreshments are served provides an ideal setting for enpoyment of lighter musical fare.

BRIDGEPORT, CONN
HERALD
MAY 2 - 1948

STRAVINSKY: L'HISTOIRE DU SOLDAT, OCTET FOR WIND INSTRUMENTS — Last summer in the Concert theater at Tanglewood, the Boston Symphony's summer capital in Lenox, Mass., young Leonard Bernstein (whom many had guessed would succeed Serge Koussevitzky instead of Charles Muench) recorded two works Igor Stravinsky had composed for small groups, "The Soldier's Tale," a setting for a fairy tale about a soldier, violin and the devil, played by seven instruments, and "Octet for Wind Instruments." The former, which usually employs a narrator in concert hall performance but does not here, is a complex work in the style of a suite in which each of the seven participants is treated as a solo instrument; some of it is difficult to take, but it is first-class as a technical feat. The octet is easier to listen to, and superbly played, in spite of its intricacies, by the excellent Bostonians. The recording is so good that we congratulate Red Seal for naming the men who did the job, Richard Gilbert and Fred Lynch. (Victor)

Book of the Month Club News
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MAY - 1948

NOWADAYS Brooklyn's reputation has become so much a matter of accent and a ball team, that we're glad to repeat a bit of ultra refinement overheard at a concert at the Brooklyn Academy of Music. Five times a season the Boston orchestra plays there, and on this occasion Koussevitsky was introducing a new singer—a young girl with a beautiful voice. It was the opportunity of a lifetime. The girl was making her debut with the best orchestra and with one of the most renowned conductors in the country. And she made good. After her songs the applause was deafening. She came out for call after call. Koussevitsky shook her hand and the men of the orchestra tapped their stands with enthusiasm. It was at this point that the little woman in the third row was heard to say: "Such a lovely girl! Isn't it too bad she has to earn her living!"

ERIE, PA.
DISPATCH-HERALD-SUN
MAY 2 - 1948

To Retire

AFTER 25 years as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky, 73, announces he will resign after the 1948 season.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
MAY

RECORDS: BEST SELLERS AND MUSICAL TASTE

By HOWARD TAUBMAN

BEST-SELLING figures are not necessarily an indication of merit, but they provide a revealing clue to the tastes of a large segment of the public. This is particularly [illegible] case of records which, [illegible] reach into homes [illegible] concert and [illegible].

The three major companies—[illegible] Columbia and Decca—have [illegible] best sellers for the past year [illegible] and any one interested in musical trends in this [illegible] might do well to study and analyze them.

[illegible] best-selling "red seal" [illegible] 1947 in the order of their popularity were:

Tchaikovsky's Nutcracker Suite, played by the Philadelphia Orchestra under the direction of Eugene Ormandy.

Tchaikovsky's Piano Concerto No. 1, in B flat minor. (The work itself ranks second, but the demand at Victor is divided between two performances: one by Vladimir Horowitz and the NBC Symphony under Arturo Toscanini's leadership and the other by Artur Rubinstein and the Minneapolis Symphony Orchestra with Dimitri Mitropoulos conducting.)

Beethoven's "Moonlight" Sonata, performed by Horowitz. (This work was always a prime favorite among record purchasers, particularly in the performance by Ignace Jan Paderewski.)

Beethoven's Fifth Symphony, played by Toscanini and the NBC Symphony Orchestra.

Rimsky-Korsakoff's Scheherazade Suite, with Pierre Monteux conducting the San Francisco Symphony Orchestra.

Rachmaninoff's Piano Concerto No. 2, in C minor. (Here again there are two Victor recordings which, together, have achieved best-selling rating for the work: one by Sergei Rachmaninoff and the Philadelphia Orchestra conducted by Ormandy and the other by Rubinstein and the NBC Symphony conducted by Vladimir Golschmann.)

Offenbach's Gaité Parisienne, played by the Boston "Pops" Orchestra under Arthur Fiedler's direction.

Tchaikovsky's Violin Concerto, with Jascha Heifetz and the London Philharmonic led by John Barbirolli.

Ravel's Bolero, with Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Gershwin's Rhapsody in Blue, with José and Amparo Iturbi (in their two-piano version) sharing honors with a recording by Jesús Maria Sanromá and the Boston "Pops" under Fiedler.

Now consider Columbia's best-selling "masterworks" albums for 1947 in the order of their popularity. (Columbia has supplied us only with its ranking five):

Rhapsody in Blue, with Oscar Levant, the Philadelphia Orchestra and Ormandy.

Strauss Waltzes, with André Kostelanetz and his orchestra.

Khatchaturian's Gayne Suite (this is the thing with the immensely popular Sabre Dance), played by the New York Philharmonic-Symphony under Efrem Kurtz.

Nutcracker Suite, with the New York Philharmonic under Artur Rodzinski.

Hansel and Gretel, in the Metropolitan Opera performance with Risë Stevens and Nadine Conner and Max Rudolf conducting.

Decca depends largely on foreign-made recordings in this field and sells these at higher prices than the other companies. It does not reach comparable sales figures on some items in its list of serious music. Its first ten, however, are also symptomatic:

Stravinsky's Petruchka, with Ernest Ansermet conducting.

Khatchaturian's Piano Concerto, with Moura Lympany as pianist.

Delibes' Sylvia Ballet Music.

Tchaikovsky's Swan Lake Ballet.

Mozart's Piano Concerto No. 15 (K. 450), with Kathleen Long as soloist.

Ravel's Bolero, with Charles Munch conducting.

Britten's Peter Grimes Suite. (This recording by the Concertgebouw Orchestra of Amsterdam under the direction of Eduard van Beinum was released only a few weeks ago and it has climbed into the list of best sellers).

Saint-Saëns' Piano Concerto No. 2, with Miss Lympany as soloist.

Franck's Symphonic Variations, with Eileen Joyce as pianist and Munch conducting.

Schubert's Unfinished Symphony, with Anatol Fistoulari conducting.

Albums, of course, are not the only measure of popular taste. The single disks and the demand for them have something to tell us.

Columbia's five leading singles in 1947 were:

Bach-Gounod's Ave Maria, with Kostelanetz and his orchestra.

Malotte's The Lord's Prayer, with Nelson Eddy.

Liszt's Hungarian Rhapsody No. 2, with Ormandy and the Philadelphia.

Villa-Lobos' Bachianas Brasileiras No. 5, with Bidu Sayao.

Selections from La Bohème, with Richard Tauber conducting the London Symphony Orchestra.

Victor's top ten among the "red seal" singles in 1947 were:

Chopin's Polonaise in A flat, Op. 53, with Iturbi.

Debussy's Clair de lune, with Iturbi.

Addinsell's Warsaw Concerto, with Fiedler and Boston "Pops."

Cade's Jalousie, with Fiedler and Boston "Pops."

Liszt's Liebestraum, with Iturbi.

Strauss' Blue Danube Waltz, with Leopold Stokowski and the Philadelphia.

Calloway's The Whiffenpoof Song, with Robert Merrill and Russ Case and his orchestra.

Waldteufel's Skaters Waltz, with Toscanini and NBC Symphony.

Harmati's Bluebird of Happiness with Jan Peerce.

Liszt's Hungarian Rhapsody No. 2, with Alexander Brailowsky.

As you glance over all these best sellers you discover that they encompass relatively few of the towering masterpieces of musical literature. The great public demand—and this has held true for many years in the record field—continues to be for works that have come to be designated as semi-classical, an awkward descriptive term but one that has an unmistakable meaning for the trade and the public.

The serious student of public taste may conclude that the best sellers prove that no progress is being made, but such a conclusion may be superficial. The salient fact is that records have been selling in increasingly huge numbers in recent years, and this means that they have been reaching a new public.

The new collector may start with the so-called semi-classics but experience has shown that he goes on, more often than not, to bigger and better things. The impressive sales figures compiled by recordings of fine scores, which may not reach the top ten but which sell nevertheless in large quantities, bear this out.

Public taste may be developing slowly, but it is developing, and it is growing on a massive front. The size of the audience is a factor not to be dismissed lightly.

REVIEWS

Omphale's Shining Wheel by Saint-Saëns, not one of the war-horses of the single-disk repertory is done elegantly by Sir Thomas Beecham and the Royal Philharmonic Orchestra (Victor).

Weber's Oberon Orchestra is played brilliantly by the Boston Symphony under Koussevitzky (Victor), and his Freischuetz Overture gets a sumptuous reading from the Philadelphia led by Eugene Ormandy (Columbia). Neither work, however, has been neglected in the past.

Mr. Ormandy and the Philadelphians also offer Weber's Invitation to the Dance (Columbia), arranger not identified. Could it be Mr. Ormandy?

Leopold Stokowski and "his Symphony Orchestra," as it is billed without further detailing, play Enesco's Rumanian Rhapsody in A, Op. 11, No. 1 (Victor).

Day Photographers, St. Louis

Vladimir Golschmann, conductor of recording of Rachmaninoff's Piano Concerto No. 2, on the best-selling list for 1947.

DALLAS, TEXAS
NEWS
MAY 1948

DIAL SUGGESTIONS

Boston 'Pops' To Start 1948 Series

By FAIRFAX NISBET

Two debaters from North Texas State College, Denton, will appear on a radio broadcast of "We, the People" (8 p.m. over KRLD). After defeating the University of Florida in finals of the 34-team meet, the NTSC team received the Sigurd F. Larmon trophy as the national champion college debaters of the second annual National Invitation Debate Tournament at West Point Saturday.

ARTHUR FIELDER

Team members are David Cotton of Sherman and Keith Parks of Belleville, Ark.

◆

One of the surest ways for the radio fan to know that winter is definitely gone, and summer is right here at us, is when the summer replacement shows start making their air appearances.

Some shows vary the summer replacement diet, but others have a regular warm weather standby. One of the latter is the Boston Symphony broadcast, the music lovers' delight during the winter.

The radio listener gets the same treatment as Boston Symphony audiences. The summer show, Boston "Pops" concert, is just as much of an institution in the land of the bean, the cod fish, the Lowells, the Cabots and Lodges as the Boston Symphony.

Tuesday the Boston "Pops" will be heard in its first 1948 broadcast (WFAA-570, and WFAA-FM, at 8:30 p.m.) with Arthur Fiedler, who has been the summer season conductor for lo these many seasons, on the podium.

The initial program, in the customary lighter vein, will include "Knightsbridge" March, Overture to "The Gypsy Baron," "Masquerade" Suite; Waltzes from "The Count of Luxemburg," and excerpts from "Finian's Rainbow," "Allegro," "Brigadoon" and "High Button Shoes."

◆

GUESTS: Janet Blair, movie actress, will be the visiting celebrity of Bob Hope's show (WFAA-WBAP-820, at 9 p.m.). . . . Irving Berlin will make the first of two appearances this week Tuesday on the "Supper Club" (WFAA-WBAP-820, at 6 p.m.).

◆

DISCUSSION FORUM: "Should the United Nations Be Revised With or Without Russia?" will be the topic of debate when the broadcast of "America's Town Meeting of the Air" is heard Tuesday (WFAA-570, at 7:30 p.m.) from the Henry Clay High School auditorium in Lexington, Ky. A. H. Feller, general counsel and director of the legal department of the U.N., and Rep. Jacob K. Javits (Rep.) of New York, who is a member of the House foreign affairs committee, will argue the negative position, Rep. Estes Kefauver (Dem.) of Tennessee a member of the House judiciary committee and special committee on small business, and Ely Culbertson, chairman of the Citizens Committee for United Nations Reform, will support proposals to revise the United Nations.

◆

MUSIC: Margaret Ann Luecke, pianist and composer from Texas State College for Women, Denton, will be guest artist featured on Tuesday's "Cadenza" program (WFAA-570, and WFAA-FM, at 7 p.m.). Her program will include her own composition Fantasy in D Minor, in addition to Capriccio, Opus 116, No. 3, by Brahms, Danse by Debussy, and Prelude, No. 3, by Gershwin.

CINCINNATI, OHIO
TIMES-STAR
MAY 3 - 1948

Johnson to Lead Boston Symphony

Thor Johnson, Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra conductor, will appear as guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra during the week of Jan. 17-23. Johnson, who is currently filling an engagement as guest conductor at the Ann Arbor (Mich.) May Festival, has been invited by Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, musical director of the Boston orchestra, to conduct four concerts.

The Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra concerts on Jan. 21 and 22, with Zino Francescatti as violin soloist, will be presented under the baton of a guest conductor whose name will be announced later, according to J. M. O'Kane, manager.

O'Kane expressed the pleasure of the orchestra management and directors at the news of Johnson's Boston engagement, which he termed "well-merited recognition" of the Cincinnati conductor's ability.

[138]

STAGE—SCREEN

MATTER OF MUSIC

Surveying Symphony's 67th Season---With Praise and Blame Where Needed

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

In surveying the Boston Symphony's 67th season, which ended last evening, it is difficult not to think in terms of a year from now: to consider Dr. Koussevitzky's great work with and for the orchestra as accomplished, and to speculate upon Mr. Muench who, after a month's acquaintance all-told, is still pretty much an unknown quantity, as to what he will play and how he will play it. That, with a chief conductor, will be a novel experience for us. No doubt, he has his pet pieces, and they are probably different from Dr. Koussevitzky's. Someone should remind him that we don't really need to hear the four Symphonies of Brahms and the Second and Fifth of Sibelius every season.

The most brilliant performance of the period now under consideration came, not from Dr. Koussevitzky or his appointed successor, but from Leonard Bernstein. I refer, of course, to his revival, after 30 years, of the Second or "Resurrection" Symphony of Mahler. The composer deserves some of the credit for the work's sensational success with two audiences, but he owed much to Mr. Bernstein, as did we all, for his able marshalling of orchestra, chorus and soloists, his inspired interpretation. It is the general feeling that Mr. Bernstein, for all his remarkable gifts, is still too young to be in supreme command of one of the major American orchestras. But give him time. He has the goods, and we didn't have to import him.

A Choral Season

This was very much a choral season. Besides the Mahler, we had Stravinsky's "Oedipus Rex," with the Harvard Glee Club; Dubussy's "The Blessed Damozel," with the Wellesley College Choir; and, from Mr. Muench with the Cecilia Society, Debussy's "Martyrdom of St. Sebastian." This last performance was a fine one, but the piece itself hardly deserves the emphasis that has been placed upon it hereabouts. As well as appearing in the Mahler Symphony, the Harvard-Radcliffe Chorus participated in Beethoven's "Missa Solemnis," given last Tuesday evening in aid of the orchestra's pension fund.

Most important of the many new pieces were Hindemith's "Symphonia Serena" and Ives' "Three places in New England" (both from Mr. Burgin) and the Fourth Symphony of Malipiero. Mr. Muench offered the "Symphonie Liturgique" of Honegger, which proved impressive in spots and missed fire elsewhere. He introduced a pleasant suite from the "Dardanus" of old Rameau, otherwise, in his three pairs of concerts he stuck to repertory pieces. It is a pity that we did not get his remarkable version of Berlioz's "Fantastique," but heard it instead from Eleazar de Carvalho in a performance of no more than routine excellence. That young man from Brazil, like Mr. Bernstein, another Koussevitzky pupil and protege, has ability but is hardly what the Boston Symphony should be getting in the way of a guest conductor when men like Walter, Mitropoulos, Szell and Reiner are available. Mr. Carvalho presented in the way of novelties, old and new, the curious Chamber Symphony of Schoenberg, for 15 instruments, out of place at a Symphony concert, an academic "Prologue and Fugue" by Guarnieri, and the appealing "Madonna" of Villa-Lobos.

This last was commissioned by the Koussevitzky Music Foundation, as were the Symphony of Malipiero, a work of great intensity that we should hear again, Piston's scholarly and agreeable Third Symphony, the inconsequential Fourth Symphony of David Diamond and Harold Shapero's Symphony for Classical Orchestra. I did not hear the Shapero work, which, like the Diamond, was conducted by Mr. Bernstein, but the consensus of opinion was that it didn't amount to much. The music of Charles Ives was a long time making its way to Symphony Hall and his Suite proved one of the hits of the season. Among the world premiers was that of Cowell's Short Symphony that, as was said at the time should have been labelled "Suite in the Early American Manner."

Two wholly new works required soprano soloists: Nabokov's "The Return of Pushkin," (Marina Koshetz) and Barber's "Knoxville: Summer of 1915," (Eleanor Steber). I missed the Nabokov, which was generally conceded to be of poetic character. Barber's piece was doomed to failure through the very nature of James Agee's prose poem that he had put into music. A local novelty was the Cello Concerto of Khatchaturian (Edmund Kurtz). Heard in company with Prokofieff's barbaric "Sythian Suite," and the inflated Fifth Symphony of Shostakovitch, it had some people temporarily persuaded that the Soviet government had a point when it cracked down on "the big three."

* * *

Conservatory Chorus

Under the direction of Lorna Cooke de Varon, the Conservatory Chorus, will give a concert at Jordan Hall on Wednesday evening. Esther-May Barrett, soprano, sings there on Thursday evening.

PEORIA, ILL.
JOURNAL TRANSCRIPT
MAY 5 1948

—International Photo

AFTER 25 years as conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, 73, announces [illegible] resign after the 1948 season.

SAN FRANCISCO, CALIF.
CALL BULLETIN
MAY 4 1948

Pulitzer Awarc Winners Named

(Reprinted from yesterday's late editions)

NEW YORK, May 3 (AP).—The St. Louis Post-Dispatch today won the 1947 Pulitzer prize for the most disinterested and meritorious public service rendered by an American newspaper during the last year.

The award was for the coverage of the Centralia, Ill., mine disaster and "the follow-up which resulted in impressive reforms in mine safety laws and regulations."

"A Streetcar Named Desire," by Tennessee Williams, won the annual prize for an original American play.

The prize for distinguished fiction went to "Tales of the South Pacific," by James A. Michener.

George E. Goodman of the Atlanta, Ga., Journal won the prize for a distinguished example of local reporting in 1947.

Two awards were made for a distinguished example of reporting on national affairs.

These went to Bert Andrews of the New York Herald Tribune and Nat S. Finney of the Minneapolis Tribune.

Other journalism awards went to:

Distinguished example of reporting of international affairs—Paul W. Ward of the Baltimore Sun.

Distinguished editorial writing—Virginius Dabney of the Richmond, Va., Times-Dispatch.

Distinguished example of a cartoonist's work—Reuben L. Goldberg of the New York Sun.

Outstanding example of news photography—Frank Cushing of the Boston Traveler for his photograph, "Boy Gunman and Hostage." This picture was serviced by the Associated Press on a spot basis.

The other prizes in the field of letters were:

Distinguished book of history of the United States—Bernard de Voto for "Across the Wide Missouri."

Distinguished American Biography—Margaret Clapp for "Forgotten First Citizen: John Bigelow."

Distinguished volume of verse—W. H. Auden for "The Age of Anxiety."

The annual music prize went to Walter Piston for his Symphony No. 3, first performed by the Boston Symphony in January of this year.

The annual $1,500 scholarship to an art student certified as the most promising and deserving by the National Academy of Design was awarded Philip Anthony Moose of New York City.

Each of the individual Pulitzer prizes carries an award of $500. The Post-Dispatch receives a gold medal valued at $500.

VENTURA, CALIF.
STAR-FREE PRESS
MAY 8 1948

Koussevitsky Honored By Music League

NEW YORK— (Special) —Acclaimed by the nation's music critics as the conductor who during 1947-48 contributed "the most outstanding service to young American musicians," Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, last night was honored with the National Music League's 1947-48 award at a dinner in the Town Hall club.

The dinner was given in celebration of the 10th anniversary of the National Music League, America's only non-profit, cooperative concert bureau, which has launched such musicians as Rise Stevens and Carroll Glenn.

The dean of America's conductors was chosen by a poll of music editors of more than 500 daily newspapers for encouraging young American composers, singers and instrumentalists by giving many of them their first opportunity to present their work and talents to the public.

At the same time awards were presented to the "Metropolitan Opera Auditions of the Air" radio program and WNYC, New York City's municipally-owned station.

The Metropolitan Auditions award was received by Judge E. M. Martin, vice-president of Farnsworth Television and Radio corporation of Indianapolis, sponsors of the program, and George Sloane, chairman of the board of the Metropolitan Opera company.

The award was granted on the basis of a poll of music editors of 500 daily newspapers ... to the "radio program that had done the most for young American musicians."

WNYC's award was for "giving opportunities to young American musicians to launch their career in the world's metropolis."

N. ADAMS, MASS.
TRANSCRIPT
MAY 8

KOUSSEVITZKY WINS LAURELS FOR WORK

Service to Young Musicians Recognized

New York, May 8 [illegible] Dr. Serge K[illegible] of the Boston Symphony [illegible] and director of the Berkshire Music Center [illegible] was honored with the National Music League's 1947-48 award [illegible] dinner at the Town Hall [illegible]

The dinner was given [illegible] National Music League [illegible] America's conductors was chosen by a poll of music editors of more than 500 daily newspapers for encouraging young American composers, singers and instrumentalists by giving many of them their first opportunity to present their work and talents to the public.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
NEWS
MAY [illegible] 194

Koussevitzky Feted For His Services to American Musicians

Acclaimed by the nation's music [illegible] who during 1947-48 [illegible] "the most [illegible] to young [illegible] Dr. Serge K[illegible]tor of the [illegible]hestra, last [illegible] with the National Music League's 1947-'48 [illegible] the Town Hall [illegible]

T[illegible]iven in celebration [illegible] Anniversary [illegible]usic League, [illegible]-profit, co-op[illegible]au, which has [illegible]sicians as Rise Stevens [illegible] Glenn.

[illegible] conducting [illegible] Symphony Orchestra, [illegible] come to Springfield next season for his only concert in this area. The event will be under the auspices of the Springfield Orchestra Association.

SALT LAKE CITY, U
DESERET NEWS
MAY [illegible] 1948

Koussevitsz Honor as T

NEW YORK—Acclaime the nation's music critics a conductor who during 19 contributed "the outsta service to young American icians," Dr. Serge Koussev nductor of the Boston ny Orchestra, last nigh red with the National e's 1947-48 award at the Town Hall Club DINNER WAS G
ation of the Tent

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE
MAY 8 - 1948

Koussevitzk s Honored f His Aid to Youn ins Award for Servic New Musicians, Giver National Music Lea

e National Music Le ig a dinner last night a Hall Club to celebrate anniversary of its reor named Serge Koussev director of the Boston
Orchestra, as the co
o contributed "the ding service to y n musicians" during son. This award was asis of a poll of the
of more than 500
rs. Dr. Koussev
e briefly in thank facsimile of Ri autograph score of ger." ague also anno exceptional servic rican musicians t municipal radi

C, and to the M tions of the Air e silver plaques ese awards wer
Seymour N. S
[illegible] of WNYC, on beh yor William O'Dwyer;
Martin, vice-president rnsworth Television and rporation of Indian nsors the opera gram, and Geor
irman of the Metr Association's boa ector.

The Metropolitan Au
ward, as the "radio pr which had done the most for merican musicians," was sed on a national poll of per music editors. The W ward, "for giving outstandi ortunities to young America cians to launch their care e world's music metropoli sed on a poll of the city's itors.

Robert E. Simon, presid league and also presid negie Hall, was the ster at the dinner. The akers, besides Dr. Kousse Martin, Mr. Sloan an el, were Mrs. Anna C. ux, director of the leag roll Glenn, violinist, who career under the le ices.

connection with the a
Mr. Simon made p sent to him on Apr rnor Thomas E. Dewe that the National e has made a consi ibution to the advance culture in America, g e which has been ne years. "The musicia
he wrote, "has depe measure upon his to obtain financi
the difficult ea
g such resources ave been obliged ht, which has b e our nation is t st musical in the s in young peop ent."

HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES
MAY 8 - 1948

Koussevitzky Receives Music League's Award

New York—Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, received the National Music League's 1947-48 award last night at a dinner at the Town Hall Club.

The dean of America's conductors was chosen by a poll of daily newspaper music editors for encouraging young composers, singers and instrumentalists by giving many of them first opportunities to present their work.

NEW YORKER
NEW YORK CITY
MAY 8 - 1948

ANOTHER [illegible] (137) presents two [illegible] Stravinsky compositions—the Octet for Wind Instruments and the music for "L'Histoire du Soldat," [illegible] rather revolutionary ballet. Both were written [illegible] ago, but they still rank among the more [illegible] products of this [illegible] master. They are played by members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra conducted by Leonard Bernstein. I'm not sure which of the items I prefer. The Octet, [illegible] work, is, I suppose, more [illegible] self-sufficient, but I [illegible] equally [illegible] by the ballet music [illegible] jerky, episodic confection, here delivered [illegible] instruments. The [illegible] I like most [illegible] is that it is enjoyably picaresque, especially the soldiers' march, tango, waltz, ragtime, and devil dance. I have a hard time, in the case of an erratic piece such as this, judging the skill and expressiveness of the performance, but I can report that the music comes across strongly and is intelligently presented. This album, by the way, is well recorded.

ROCHESTER, N. Y.
TIMES-UNION
MAY 8 - 1948

Conductor Honored By Music League

Serge Koussevitzky (right) receives from Robert E. Simon Jr., president of National Music League, the league's 1947-48 award for his "unstinting efforts" to aid young Americans in bringing their talents to public notice, during ceremonies at league's annual dinner at Town Hall Club in New York yesterday. The conductor also received facsimile of original score of Wagner's "Die Meistersinger." (Acme Telephoto.)

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
MAY 8 - 1948

KOUSSEVITZKY URGES MUSICIANS' SUBSIDY

Serge Koussevitzky, retiring conductor of the Boston Symphony, spoke a word for Government subsidy [illegible] last night. The occasion was the National Music League's tenth anniversary dinner at the Town Hall Club, where he was named the "conductor who has done most for young American musicians."

"This organization [illegible] just what young artists need," he said, "but I cannot understand why the Government of a [illegible] country does not do this work." He also spoke of the [illegible] of selecting truly gifted [illegible], recalling that few [illegible] remember the names of [illegible] noted for more [illegible] fifty years ago.

Dr. K[illegible] was presented with [illegible] copy of the Overture [illegible] Wagner's "Die Meistersinger" [illegible] award by Robert E. S[illegible] league's president. Silver plaques were given to George E. Sloan, chairman of the board [illegible] Metropolitan Opera Association, representing the Opera Auditions of the Air, and by Seymour Siegel, director of Station WNYC for the radio program and station which have done most in their fields for young American musicians.

The awards were based upon a poll of 500 music editors of major newspapers. The ceremony was broadcast over WNYC.

A-8 Post May 2

STAGE—SCREEN

MATTER OF MUSIC

Surveying Symphony's 67th Season--- With Praise and Blame Where Needed

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

In surveying the Boston Symphony's 67th season, which ended last evening, it is difficult not to think in terms of a year from now: to consider Dr. Koussevitzky's great work with and for the orchestra as accomplished, and to speculate upon Mr. Muench who, after a month's acquaintance all-told, is still pretty much an unknown quantity, as to what he will play and how he will play it. That, with a chief conductor, will be a novel experience for us. No doubt, he has his pet pieces, and they are probably different from Dr. Koussevitzky's. Someone should remind him that we don't really need to hear the four Symphonies of Brahms and the Second and Fifth of Sibelius every season.

The most brilliant performance of the period now under consideration came, not from Dr. Koussevitzky or his appointed successor, but from Leonard Bernstein. I refer, of course, to his revival, after 30 years, of the Second or "Resurrection" Symphony of Mahler. The composer deserves some of the credit for the work's sensational success with two audiences, but he owed much to Mr. Bernstein, as did we all, for his able marshalling of orchestra, chorus and soloists, his inspired interpretation. It is the general feeling that Mr. Bernstein, for all his remarkable gifts, is still too young to be in supreme command of one of the major American orchestras. But give him time. He has the goods, and we didn't have to import him.

A Choral Season

This was very much a choral season. Besides the Mahler, we had Stravinsky's "Oedipus Rex," with the Harvard Glee Club; Dubussy's "The Blessed Damozel," with the Wellesley College Choir; and, from Mr. Muench with the Cecilia Society, Debussy's "Martyrdom of St. Sebastian." This last performance was a fine one, but the piece itself hardly deserves the emphasis that has been placed upon it hereabouts. As well as appearing in the Mahler Symphony, the Harvard-Radcliffe Chorus participated in Beethoven's "Missa Solemnis," given last Tuesday evening in aid of the orchestra's pension fund.

Most important of the many new pieces were Hindemith's "Symphonia Serena" and Ives' "Three places in New England" (both from Mr. Burgin) and the Fourth Symphony of Malipiero. Mr. Muench offered the "Symphonie Liturgique" of Honegger, which proved impressive in spots and missed fire elsewhere. He introduced a pleasant suite from the "Dardanus" of old Rameau, otherwise, in his three pairs of concerts he stuck to repertory pieces. It is a pity that we did not get his remarkable version of Berlioz's "Fantastique," but heard it instead from Eleazar de Carvalho in a performance of no more than routine excellence. That young man from Brazil, like Mr. Bernstein, another Koussevitzky pupil and protege, has ability but is hardly what the Boston Symphony should be getting in the way of a guest conductor when men like Walter, Mitropoulos, Szell and Reiner are available. Mr. Carvalho presented in the way of novelties, old and new, the curious Chamber Symphony of Schoenberg, for 15 instruments, out of place at a Symphony concert, an academic "Prologue and Fugue" by Guarnieri, and the appealing "Madonna" of Villa-Lobos.

This last was commissioned by the Koussevitzky Music Foundation, as were the Symphony of Malipiero, a work of great intensity that we should hear again, Piston's scholarly and agreeable Third Symphony, the inconsequential Fourth Symphony of David Diamond and Harold Shapero's Symphony for Classical Orchestra. I did not hear the Shapero work, which, like the Diamond, was conducted by Mr. Bernstein, but the consensus of opinion was that it didn't amount to much. The music of Charles Ives was a long time making its way to Symphony Hall and his Suite proved one of the hits of the season. Among the world premiers was that of Cowell's Short Symphony that, as was said at the time should have been labelled "Suite in the Early American Manner."

Two wholly new works required soprano soloists: Nabokov's "The Return of Pushkin," (Marina Koshetz) and Barber's "Knoxville: Summer of 1915," (Eleanor Steber). I missed the Nabokov, which was generally conceded to be of poetic character. Barber's piece was doomed to failure through the very nature of James Agee's prose poem that he had put into music. A local novelty was the Cello Concerto of Khatchaturian (Edmund Kurtz). Heard in company with Prokofieff's barbaric "Sythian Suite," and the inflated Fifth Symphony of Shostakovitch, it had some people temporarily persuaded that the Soviet government had a point when it cracked down on "the big three."

Conservatory Chorus

Under the direction of Lorna Cooke de Varon, the Conservatory Chorus, will give a concert at Jordan Hall on Wednesday evening. Esther-May Barrett, soprano, sings there on Thursday evening.

SAN FRANCISCO, CALIF.
CALL BULLETIN
MAY 4 1948

Pulitzer Award Winners Named

(Reprinted from yesterday's late editions)

NEW YORK, May 3 (AP).—The St. Louis Post-Dispatch today won the 1947 Pulitzer prize for the most disinterested and meritorious public service rendered by an American newspaper during the last year.

The award was for the coverage of the Centralia, Ill., mine disaster and "the follow-up which resulted in impressive reforms in mine safety laws and regulations."

"A Streetcar Named Desire," by Tennessee Williams, won the annual prize for an original American play.

The prize for distinguished fiction went to "Tales of the South Pacific," by James A. Michener.

George E. Goodman of the Atlanta, Ga., Journal won the prize for a distinguished example of local reporting in 1947.

Two awards were made for a distinguished example of reporting on national affairs.

These went to Bert Andrews of the New York Herald Tribune and Nat S. Finney of the Minneapolis Tribune.

Other journalism awards went to:

Distinguished example of reporting of international affairs—Paul W. Ward of the Baltimore Sun.

Distinguished editorial writing—Virginius Dabney of the Richmond, Va., Times-Dispatch.

Distinguished example of a cartoonist's work—Reuben L. Goldberg of the New York Sun.

Outstanding example of news photography—Frank Cushing of the Boston Traveler for his photograph, "Boy Gunman and Hostage." This picture was serviced by the Associated Press on a spot basis.

The other prizes in the field of letters were:

Distinguished book of history of the United States—Bernard de Voto for "Across the Wide Missouri."

Distinguished American Biography—Margaret Clapp for "Forgotten First Citizen: John Bigelow."

Distinguished volume of verse—W. H. Auden for "The Age of Anxiety."

The annual music prize went to Walter Piston for his Symphony No. 3, first performed by the Boston Symphony in January of this year.

The annual $1,500 scholarship to an art student certified as the most promising and deserving by the National Academy of Design was awarded Philip Anthony Moose of New York City.

Each of the individual Pulitzer prizes carries an award of $500. The Post-Dispatch receives a gold medal valued at $500.

VENTURA, CALIF.
STAR-FREE PRESS
MAY 8 -1948

Koussevitsky Honored By Music League

NEW YORK— (Special) —Acclaimed by the nation's music critics as the conductor who during 1947-48 contributed "the most outstanding service to young American musicians," Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, last night was honored with the National Music League's 1947-48 award at a dinner in the Town Hall club.

The dinner was given in celebration of the 10th anniversary of the National Music League, America's only non-profit, cooperative concert bureau, which has launched such musicians as Rise Stevens and Carroll Glenn.

The dean of America's conductors was chosen by a poll of music editors of more than 500 daily newspapers for encouraging young American composers, singers and instrumentalists by giving many of them their first opportunity to present their work and talents to the public.

At the same time awards were presented to the "Metropolitan Opera Auditions of the Air" radio program and WNYC, New York City's municipally-owned station.

The Metropolitan Auditions award was received by Judge E. M. Martin, vice-president of Farnsworth Television and Radio corporation of Indianapolis, sponsors of the program, and George Sloane, chairman of the board of the Metropolitan Opera company.

The award was granted on the basis of a poll of music editors of 500 daily newspapers ... to the "radio program that had done the most for young American musicians."

WNYC's award was for "giving opportunities to young American musicians to launch their career in the world's metropolis."

N. ADAMS, MASS.
TRANSCRIPT
MAY 8 - 1948

KOUSSEVITZKY WINS LAURELS FOR WORK

Service to Young Musicians Recognized

New York, May 8—Acclaimed by the nation's music critics as the conductor who during 1947-48 contributed "the most outstanding service to young American musicians" Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra and director of the Berkshire Music Center, Stockbridge, last night was honored with the National Music league's 1947-48 award at a dinner at the Town hall club.

The dinner was given in celebration of the 10th anniversary of the National Music league. The dean of America's conductors was chosen by a poll of music editors of more than 500 daily newspapers for encouraging young American composers, singers and instrumentalists by giving many of them their first opportunity to present their work and talents to the public.

SALT LAKE CITY
DESERET NEWS

Koussevits

Honor as

NEW YORK—Acclaim nation's music critics conductor who during contributed "the outst service to young American icians," Dr. Serge Kousse nductor of the Bost ny Orchestra, last ni red with the N
's 1947-48 awa
he Town Hall C DINNER WA
tion of the T

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE
MAY 8 - 1948

Koussevitzk
s Honored f HisAid to You

ins Award for Servic
New Musicians, Give National Music Le

National Music Le g a dinner last night a Hall Club to celebrat anniversary of its reo named Serge Kousse director of the Boston
Orchestra, as the co
o contributed "the ding service to n musicians" durin
son. This award was asis of a poll of the f more than 500
rs. Dr. Kousse
e briefly in thank facsimile of R autograph score o ger." ague also ann exceptional serv rican musicians municipal ra C, and to the tions of the A e silver plaqu
ese awards w
Seymour N. of WNYC, on b
William O'Dwyer
vice-president Television a of Ind nsors the ope gram, and G rman of the M Association's Metropolitan ard, the "radio had done the most musicians," sed on a national poll aper music editors.
ward, "for giving outsta rtunities to young Ame icians to launch their e world's music metr sed on a poll of the tors.
Robert E. S league and negie Hall ster at the akers, beside Martin, el, were M ix, director roll Glenn, career u ices.
connection
Mr. Sim sent to rnor Tho that th e has m bution to ulture in which h years. "T he wrote measure to obtai
the di such ve bee

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
NEWS
MAY 8 - 1948

Koussevitzky Feted For His Services to American Musicians

Acclaimed by the nation's music critics as the conductor who during 1947-'48 contributed "the most outstanding service to young American musicians," Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, last night was honored with the National Music League's 1947-'48 award at a dinner at the Town Hall Club, New York.

The dinner was given in celebration of the Tenth Anniversary of the National Music League, America's only non-profit, co-operative concert bureau, which has launched such musicians as Rise Stevens and Carroll Glenn.

Dr. Koussevitzky, conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will come to Springfield next season for his only concert in this area. The event will be under the auspices of the Springfield Orchestra Association.

HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES
MAY 8 - 1948

Koussevitzky Receives Music League's Award

New York—Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, received the National Music League's 1947-48 award last night at a dinner at the Town Hall Club.

The dean of America's conductors was chosen by a poll of daily newspaper music editors for encouraging young composers, singers and instrumentalists by giving many of them first opportunities to present their work.

PEORIA, ILL.
JOURNAL TRANSCRIPT
MAY 5 - 1948

—International Photo

AFTER 25 years as conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, 73, announces he will resign after the 1948 season.

NEW YORKER
NEW YORK CITY
MAY 8 - 1948

ANOTHER album (Victor 1197) presents two seldom-heard Stravinsky compositions—the Octet for Wind Instruments and the music for "L'Histoire du Soldat," an odd and, in its day, rather revolutionary ballet. Both were written over a quarter-century ago, but they still rank among the more diverting products of this vigorous modern master. They are played by members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Leonard Bernstein. I'm not sure which of the items I prefer. The Octet, a cheerful work, is, I suppose, more nearly self-sufficient, but I was equally fascinated by the ballet music, a jerky, episodic confection, here delivered by seven instruments. The thing I like most about it is that it is enjoyably picaresque, especially the soldiers' march, tango, waltz, ragtime, and devil dance. I have a hard time, in the case of an erratic piece such as this, judging the skill and expressiveness of the performance, but I can report that the music comes across strongly and is intelligently presented. This album, by the way, is well recorded.

ROCHESTER, N. Y.
TIMES-UNION
MAY 8 - 1948

Conductor Honored By Music League

Serge Koussevitzky (right) receives from Robert E. Simon Jr., president of National Music League, the league's 1947-48 award for his "unstinting efforts" to aid young Americans in bringing their talents to public notice, during ceremonies at league's annual dinner at Town Hall Club in New York yesterday. The conductor also received facsimile of original score of Wagner's "Die Meistersinger." (Acme Telephoto.)

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
MAY 8 - 1948

KOUSSEVITZKY URGES MUSICIANS' SUBSIDY

Serge Koussevitzky, retiring conductor of the Boston Symphony, spoke a word for Government subsidy of musicians last night. The occasion was the National Music League's tenth anniversary dinner at the Town Hall Club, where he was named the "conductor who has done most for young American musicians."

"This organization is just what young artists need," he said, "but I cannot understand why the Government of a democratic country does not do this work." He also spoke of the difficulty of selecting truly gifted new musicians, recalling that few people remember the names of performers noted for mere brilliance only fifty years ago.

Dr. Koussevitzky was presented with a handwritten copy of the Overture to Wagner's "Die Meistersinger" as his award by Robert E. Simon, the league's president. Silver placques were given to George E. Sloan, chairman of the board of the Metropolitan Opera Association, representing the Opera Auditions of the Air, and by Seymour Siegel, director of Station WNYC, for the radio program and station which have done most in their fields for young American musicians.

The awards were based upon a poll of 500 music editors of major newspapers. The ceremony was broadcast over WNYC.

[139]

. ADAMS, MASS.
TRANSCRIPT

AY 8 - 1948

SEVITZKY WINS URELS FOR WOR

e to Young Musicia Recognized

York, May 8—Acclaimed ion's music critics as or who during 1947-48 c "the most outstanding young American musicia rge Koussevitzky, condu Boston Symphony orche rector of the Berkshire nter, Stockbridge, last onored with the National ague's 1947-48 award at the Town hall club. dinner was given in cel f the 10th anniversary nal Music league. The de ca's conductors was chos of music editors of mor aily newspapers for enc young American com rs and instrumentalists many of them their fi nity to present their wo ts to the public.

SPRINGFIELD, MAS
NEWS

MAY 8 - 1948

Koussevitzky Fete For His Service American Mu

Acclaimed by the natio critics as the conductor ing 1947-'48 contributed " outstanding service to American musicians," D Koussevitzky, conducto Boston Symphony Orche night was honored with tional Music League's award at a dinner at Hall Club, New York.

The dinner was give bration of the Tenth A of the National Musi America's only non-pro erative concert bureau, launched such musicia Stevens and Carroll Gl Dr. Koussevitzky, the Boston Symphony will come to Springfiel son for his only conc area. The event will b auspices of the Spri chestra Association.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

MAY 8 - 1948

OUSSEVITZKY URG MUSICIANS' SUBS

Serge Koussevitzky, re nductor of the Boston hony, spoke a word for G ent subsidy of musician ght. The occasion was th onal Music League's tenth ersary dinner at the Tow lub, where he was name conductor who has done m oung American musicians. "This organization is jus oung artists need," he said cannot understand why th rnment of a democratic c does not do this work." H spoke of the difficulty of se truly gifted new musicians, ng that few people remem names of performers no mere brilliance only fifty ago.

Dr. Koussevitzky was p ed with a handwritten c the Overture to Wagner "Meistersinger" as his aw Robert E. Simon, the president. Silver plaque given to George E. Sloan man of the board of the M tan Opera Association, re ing the Opera Auditions of and by Seymour Siegel, dir Station WNYC, for the ra gram and station which h most in their fields fo American musicians.

The awards were based poll of 500 music editors newspapers. The ceremo broadcast over WNYC.

SALT LAKE CITY, UTAH
DESERET NEWS

Kousevitszky Wins Honor as Top Conductor

NEW YORK—Acclaimed by [illegible] music critics as the [illegible] who during 1947-48 [illegible] the outstanding [illegible] young American musicians, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, [illegible] of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, last night was honored with the National Music League's 1947-48 award at a dinner at the Town Hall Club.

THE DINNER WAS GIVEN in celebration of the Tenth Anniversary of the National Music League, America's only non-profit, co-operative concert bureau, which has launched such musicians as Rise Stevens and Carroll Glenn.

The dean of America's conductors was chosen by a poll of music editors of more than 500 daily newspapers for encouraging young American composers, singers and instrumentalists by giving many of them their first oppurtunity to present their work and talents to the public.

At the same time awards were presented to the "Metropolitan Opera Auditions of the Air" radio program and WNYC, New York City's municipally-owned station.

THE METROPOLITAN AUDITIONS award was received by Judge E. M. Martin, vice-president of Farnsworth Television and Radio Corp. of Indianapolis, Ind., sponsors of the program, and George Sloane, chairman of the board of the Metropolitan Opera Company.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE

MAY 8

Koussevitzky Is Honored for His Aid to Young

Wins Award for Service to New Musicians, Given by National Music League

The National Music League [illegible] a dinner last night at the Town Hall Club to celebrate the [illegible] anniversary of its reorganization [illegible] named Serge Koussevitzky, [illegible] of the Boston Symphony Orchestra as the conductor [illegible] contributed "the most [illegible] service to young American musicians" during the [illegible] season. This award was made [illegible] a poll of the music [illegible] of more than 500 daily newspapers. Dr. Koussevitzky, [illegible] briefly in thanks, re[illegible] a facsimile of Richard [illegible] autograph score of "Die [illegible]."

The League also announced [illegible] exceptional services for American musicians to New York City's municipal radio station WNYC and to the Metropolitan Auditions of the Air radio program. The silver plaques representing these awards were accepted by Seymour N. Siegel, [illegible] of WNYC on behalf of [illegible] William O'Dwyer; Edwin [illegible] vice-president of the [illegible] Television and Radio Corporation of Indianapolis, [illegible] sponsors the opera auditions program, and George A. [illegible] chairman of the Metropolitan Opera Association's board of [illegible].

The Metropolitan Auditions [illegible] radio program [illegible] done the most for young American musicians" was also based on a national poll of newspaper music editors. The WNY[illegible] award for [illegible] outstanding c[illegible] to young American m[illegible] to launch their careers [illegible] world's music metropolis" [illegible] on a poll of the city's mu[illegible]

Robert E. Simon, presiden[illegible] [illegible] The ot[illegible] Dr. Koussevitzky [illegible] Mr. Martin, Mr. Sloan and M[illegible] [illegible] League.

In [illegible] League has made a [illegible] contribution to the [illegible] of music in America [illegible] The musician's [illegible] has depended in large measure upon his [illegible] ability to obtain financial backing during the difficult early years. Lacking such resources, many of them have been obliged to give up the fight, which has been a pity because our nation is today one of the most musical in the world and abounds in young people of really fine talent."

CLEVELAND, OHIO
PLAIN DEALER

MAY 9 - 1948

By Stewart Matter

RECORD collectors long have been awaiting truly satisfactory recording of the Beethoven "Symphony No. 9, the Choral," but there have been none that fulfill the overwhelming demands of the score. Nor does the new recording by Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony come any nearer than the others.

We were given to understand that Toscanini was to have recorded it following the electrifying performance he gave of it some months back, but it seems a conductor cannot always perpetuate his best works. Koussevitzky in this recording seems to be so occupied with sheer ensemble perfection that he loses sight of the profound philosophic and esthetic core which binds this work together. One marvels at the technical attainment of the orchestra, for the playing is in itself super-perfection, to such an extent that emotion finds no resting place. The chorus directed by Robert Shaw likewise is so precise that that good fellowship of which Schiller so joyously sings has no welcome.

Of the other versions that by Weingartner is dated mechanically but from an interpretative point it still holds a warm spot in my heart. Here we had an inspired Beethoven scholar, a superlative group of musicians and soloists of the highest calibre. The Ormandy version suffers in much the same manner as the new Koussevitzky, with the chorus and soloists not in rapport with the sense of the thing. If one wants to glory in utter perfection of orchestral playing, either the Koussevitzky or Ormandy will be the answer. But there is something over and beyond the printed score which Beethoven intended. Toscanini's performance had everything, perfection and inspiration, but it seems that the public again is forced to wait. Victor set 1190.

CHICAGO, ILL.
TRIBUNE

MAY 9 - 1948

on the Aisle

by Claudia Cassidy

Considering the campaign waged against Artur Rodzinski, you might have expected him to get all the worst of it, but I am not so sure it turned out quite that way. He left Chicago a far more popular man than when he arrived, and, what is more important, a far greater musician.

The Chicago Symphony orchestra, we had been told, was about to mutiny if left under his direction. Yet it played for him as it had seldom played before. When he left, his stock of photografs had reached rock bottom and some 50 players had them as autografed treasures. Some of them helped remove his name plate from the dressing room door, others waited for the photograf in the foyer, which is in safe keeping just in case it goes up in that foyer again. If this was mutiny you would not have recognized it, least of all from Sydney Baker, the brilliant young first trumpet, who had just been dismissed over Rodzinski's written protest.

• • •

I don't think Mr. Baker was more than 17 when he was given that post by Frederick Stock. He had such a joyous, soaring tone some of us called him "The Golden Cockerel" from the Rimsky-Korsakoff score. He went to war and I heard him playing first trumpet in the orchestra of "Winged Victory." Whatever he did, he was in uniform and it wasn't symphonic music. He came back to a conductor who constantly had the brass blowing itself hoarse. He lost some of his skill. But under Rodzinski he was making a brilliant comeback. Mr. Rodzinski's protesting letter, dated April 24, states that Mr. Baker "within the last few months has improved in a most incredible way and is steadily becoming an outstanding artist on his instrument." He asked "that this grave injustice be corrected and the action of dismissal be rescinded immediately." Mr. Baker was not reinstated.

This whole situation has been a labyrinth thru which you feel your way with care. For example, it was being spread about town that Serge Koussevitzky had stated he would not return to Chicago while Rodzinski was here. How this could be reconciled with Koussevitzky's outspoken interview in Rodzinski's favor (no other conductor has been so imperiously courageous) I couldn't tell you, but the story was being industriously peddled just the same. Asked by telegraf to confirm or deny this, Koussevitzky instantly replied: "Learn with amazement and concern rumors that I will not come to Chicago while Rodzinski is there. These rumors are not true. I strongly protest."

• • •

As you undoubtedly know, Rodzinski made official reply to the charges against him just before he left Chicago at the end of the orchestra's season. Perhaps you would like to read the statement, which follows:

"Au revoir, Chicago! To my music you have responded with inspiring warmth. Only a very small group within the Orchestral association remain deaf.

"On Jan. 13 I was arbitrarily cashiered without a hearing or notice. Defamatory and false statements were published about me. I was charged with feigning illness to avoid taking the podium -- in truth I conducted when in great physical pain, against the advice of my physicians. I was charged with the responsibility for the orchestral deficit -- in truth I had nothing to do with expenditures. I was charged with repeating the Tuesday and Thursday-Friday concerts against the wishes of the trustees -- in truth this was suggested by the president and manager so that the development of the orchestra would be faster.

"I know that those who care about the truth can not believe the vile and fantastic whisperings and canards which have been maliciously and secretly spread.

"I have asked, time after time, for a hearing before the whole association, most recently on April 17; but, contrary to the American way, no hearing has ever been afforded me.

"Efforts have been made to stir up a mutiny in the orchestra. But I, who have built several orchestras and conducted many, have found these musicians fully sensitive to my every indication. They have been superb. Together we have given Chicago our best in music.

"Despite these injustices, I have felt in Chicago entire harmony pervading audience and orchestra. Action taken in the name of the Orchestral association forces me to leave Chicago, but my concerts here mean everything to me and I shall be happy only when I can return to complete the job for which I came -- to make Chicago a foremost music center."

• • •

Under questioning at the interview, some interesting things came out. One, just comical, that when "Tristan and Isolde" was being prepared the manager of the orchestra asked whether in the first act the chorus was on or off stage. Rodzinski, twinkling, said if they were offstage swimming around Tristan's ship he hoped they had bathing suits. Two others were not comical at all.

One was Rodzinski's statement, condensed here, that when officials of the Chicago Symphony approached him in December, 1946, he was negotiating a three year renewal of contract with the New York Philharmonic. When he decided, after much pressure, to come to Chicago, it was on the promise that the commitment would be kept secret until he made his arrangements with the Philharmonic. He was then, says the statement, offered a long term contract in Chicago, but took the traditional handshake instead. Just 10 days later he was notified that negotiations for New York were off since he had committed himself to Chicago. Arthur Judson, New York Philharmonic manager, says the statement, had been in Chicago and had been given the news by Edward L. Ryerson, president of the Orchestral association.

The third statement speaks for itself. Toward the season's end Mr. Rodzinski went to Mr. Ryerson with this proposition. He asked for 10 weeks as guest conductor at reduced salary and offered to give Mr. Ryerson an undated letter of resignation to be used should things go wrong. He asked that at the closing concerts the two go on the stage of Orchestra hall, tell the public they had reached an understanding, and try again. He was told, "Don't be too hopeful."

But the people of Chicago have not lost hope.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

MAY 9 - 1948

GUEST CONDUCTOR WITH YOUNG JUILLIARD MUSICIANS

Eileen Darby (Graphic House)

Serge Koussevitzky prepares for this afternoon's performance of Beethoven's Ninth with school orchestra and chorus.

THE HARTFORD TIMES. WEDNESDAY,

'Goodbye Koussevitzky' In Hartford Applause

By CARL E. LINDSTROM

It was less than a week ago that Dr. Serge Koussevitzky's forthcoming retirement was announced. If he conducts a limited number of concerts next season, no one knows yet whether any of these will be in this city and doubtless many people in Bushnell Hall last night thought they might be listening to his last Hartford performance.

There was an ovation when he first appeared. The man, who has always been warmly received here, was applauded with unusual heartiness after every number.

The sentiments of his admirers must have been apparent to him, for Koussevitzky, who is a sensitive artist, began his program with an urbanity customary to those pleased moments when he produces his best Mozart and he quickly ran an artistic temperature which culminated in as lush and plangent a Wagner as his sonorous Boston Symphony is capable of.

From the Little Night Music to the Lohengrin Prelude and the Meistersinger Overture, it was a typical Koussevitzky program (and who wanted anything else?) because the middle of it was given over to a contemporary American score and a Boston one at that, Walter Piston's new Third Symphony.

* * *

WITHOUT KOUSSEVITZKY what are we going to do about today's music? Not much probably, because there isn't a single one of our visiting maestros who has courage enough to get very far away from Tschaikowsky and Brahms and Debussy. They would play Raff and Delibes if that were what they thought the customers wanted.

It would be inadequate and sentimental to talk about Koussevitzky's retirement unless proper notice were taken of his evangelical bias in favor of living composers, particularly if they live in this country. He brought us Shostakovich and Hindemith when nobody asked him to, but he insisted upon Copland and Schuman and Harris.

Last night I changed my mind about Piston. Up to now he has been, for me, very professorial and efficient and uninteresting. I had the feeling that he didn't want you to know what his music was about, just as his own notes in last night's program seemed intended to be as uninformative as possible.

* * *

BUT HIS THIRD Symphony is more than mere technique. He did not seem to be preoccupied with design, although the climax in each movement was magnificently managed.

Possibly this Piston symphony has a program, but since it isn't vouchsafed to us, the meaning is anybody's guess, particularly anybody who was moved by it even if he happens to be a critic. The march-like finale is a hint; so is the dialectic scherzo.

Certainly the slow movement is subjective, and there is tone painting which is sometimes impressionistic, sometimes atmospheric. No self-respecting composer is going to supply a scenario and say that he is depicting a camp meeting or a clambake or a lynching, but Mr. Piston's symphony struck me as being about people, and for people. I cannot imagine people not asking to hear it a second time and a third because there is a mesmeric undertone which argues: This has a good deal to do with you.

It really leads one to wonder what difference there is between Mozart and Piston, between Piston and Wagner, except dates and styles? Yes, this perhaps: Composers do not work miracles; they don't try to do so. They are content to make patterns or to report what they have observed. Miracles don't happen today. And they didn't in Wagner's day, except that Wagner was the kind of genius who made them happen.

There is no other word but miracle to describe the Lohengrin Prelude. From the standpoint of architecture, it was a matchless crescendo, but that is not enough. It was not real; it was from another world altogether that Koussevitzky took it. For many, this must have been the peak of the program; perhaps for Koussevitzky. It set him aglow.

This concert had everything—the aristocratic Jupiter Symphony, the excitement of a modern work superbly done, the brilliance of the over-familiar but never-to-do-be-denied Meistersinger Prelude.

It had the seal, the hallmark of Koussevitzky.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
WORLD-TELEGRAM

MAY 10 1948

Juilliard-Boston Symphony Concert.

With Serge Koussevitzky conducting, the Juilliard School of Music Orchestra and Chorus, and soloists Mariquita Moll, soprano; Margaret Roggero, contralto; Joahn Druary, tenor, and Harry Wayne, bass, presented a well-balanced and often dramatically effective performance of the Beethoven Ninth Symphony. The program, which opened with the same composer's "Egmont" Overture, was the last of three given in aid of the Student Aid Fund of the Juilliard School of Music. A large audience attended.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
POST

MAY 9 - 1948

Juilliard Concert

The Juilliard School of Music will present the Juilliard Chorus and Orchestra in Carnegie Hall Sunday afternoon, with Serge Koussevitzky as guest conductor in a performance of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony. Soloists will be Mariquita Moll, soprano, Margaret Roggero, contralto, John Druary, tenor, and Harry Wayne, bass. Mozart's Symphony No. 39, in E-flat Major, will open the concert.

HUDSON, N. Y.
DAILY STAR

MAY 10 1948

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY HONORED IN NEW YORK

NEW YORK, May 9—Acclaimed by then ation's music critics as the conductor who during 1947-48 contributed "the most outstanding service to young American musicians," Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, director of the Berkshire Music Center and conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Friday night was honored with the National Music League's award at a dinner at the Town Hall Club.

Dr. Koussevitzky was chosen by a poll of music editors of more than 500 daily newspapers for encouraging young American composers, singers and instrumentalists by giving many of them their first opportunity to present their work and talents to the public.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
POST

MAY 10 1948

Music...

Koussevitzky Conducts Juilliard Orchestra

By HARRIET JOHNSON

With a chorus of almost 250 voices, and an orchestra with a personnel of over 100, the Juilliard School of Music gave a concert yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall that in its vigor seemed "to shake the tree of life itself," (thanks to Edwin Arlington Robinson for the latter phrase.) Serge Koussevitzky, no less reserved or impressive than he is with his own orchestral Bostonians, functioned as guest conductor and directed a performance of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony which, in addition to its other virtues, blazed with the energy of youth and culminated in an extraordinary rendition of the final choral movement.

Dr. Koussevitzky received ovations at the opening and closing of the concert from the sold-out, demonstrative audience. They also applauded young Robert Shaw who had trained the exciting chorus and took a bow at the concert's conclusion. The event was the final one in a series of three given this season for the benefit of the school's student aid fund.

"Those kids work much harder than the usual professional orchestra," said a listener at the conclusion of the opening Beethoven "Egmont" overture. It was obvious that the players were doing their utmost to carry out the wishes of their eminent guest maestro and, considering the circumstances, they achieved an excellent result. When the performance began, there was evidence of tension. the accents were overridden and the string quality was not of the best. but on other counts the standard of execution was admirable. And it was very interesting to see how, as the performance progressed, the various sections of the orchestra, though no less consecrated, were more relaxed and produced a more beautiful and inspiring sound.

Dr. Koussevitzky conducted with superb skill, demanding the utmost in precision and dynamics from these young people, and yet adjusting tempos so that the whole was a model of clarity without losing any of the communicative excitement which characterized the entire afternoon's proceedings.

It is no exaggeration to say that the finale, with its great but usually unsingable chorus, set to a text taken from Schiller's "Ode to Joy," was thrilling in its impact. The indications of the score had been obeyed to the letter, down to the last "staccato," and the cumulative effect of the big group was of spontaneous soaring unhindered by the instrumental texture of Beethoven's vocal writing. Of the 250 members, approximately half were instrumental students and half voice "majors." The vibrant quality and responsiveness of their singing, however, were worthy of a full group of professional singers. Maybe some of those winds or strings have undiscovered, hidden gold in their vocal cords! The four soloists Mariquita Moll, soprano; Margaret Roggero, contralto; John Druary, tenor ,and Harry Wayne, bass, were all musically competent and Miss Moll disclosed a lyric voice of exceptional power and quality which could easily cope with the work's fiendish soprano tessitura.

It was a performance that, like a giant mill wheel, gained momentum as it continued. and never lessened an inch in dramatic breathlessness until the final note had struck.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
JOURNAL AMERICAN
MAY 10 1948

Koussevitzky At Carnegie

By MILES KASTENDIECK

Koussevitzky proved his greatness anew in Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon.

Having been cited by the National Music League on Friday as the conductor who had done most in stimulating our awareness of young American musicians, he showed what the Julliard Orchestra and Chorus could do with Beethoven's Ninth Symphony when properly inspired.

This was a concert made exciting by the response of youth to great leadership. The orchestra has never sounded better, and its intent following of the conductor's wishes was a tribute to both itself and him The crispness and the nuance of the playing were notable instances of hearty cooperation. The young musicians had definitely come under his spell.

The performance also served to underline the growth of Koussevitzky's interpretation of Beethoven.

Some of it is open to question as in the tempo of the slow movement and the virtuosity in finale pages of the last. But he has attained a clarity of insight which was singularly emphasized yesterday in the transparency and the coloring of the playing.

Chorus and soloists responded as did the orchestra. Mariquita Moll met the demands of the soprano part well, if somewhat over-brilliantly. Margaret Roggero, ontralto; John Druary, tenor, and Harry Wayne, bass, complete a satisfactory quartet.

The program opened with Beethoven's overture to "Edgmont."

Spanish Dancers

Rosario and Antonio have come into their own. Their exhibition of Spanish dancing at the Adelphi Theatre last night was the finest in their career. For sheer brilliance, Antonio must be reckoned one of the most exciting dancers before the public today.

They can still improve artistically, although Antonio has crossed the threshold into art. Their company, too, is the best they have yet assembled.

There was a breathless incisiveness to Antonio's footwork. He imparted plenty of virtuosity and passion in his dancing.

What was more important, was the emergence of personality in the various numbers. The audience found the performance increasingly engaging as the evening progressed.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE
MAY 10 1948

Juilliard Concert

Koussevitzky Conducts Third in Student Aid Series

By Francis D. Perkins

JULLIARD ORCHESTRA AND CHORUS, Serge Koussevitzky, guest conductor, concert yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall. The program:

Overture to "Egmont"...............Beethoven
Symphony No 9, in D minor........Beethoven
Soloists: Mariquita Moll, soprano; Margaret Roggero, contralto; John Druary, tenor; Harry Wayne, basso.

For the third and last concert of its Carnegie Hall series for the benefit of its Student Aid Fund, the Juilliard School of Music enlisted the services of an eminent guest conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, who directed memorable performances of two works of Beethoven, the "Egmont" overture and the Ninth Symphony. Except for the Boston Symphony Orchestra's musical director, all of the more than 300 participants were Juilliard students. Apart, however, from a sense of youthful and intent enthusiasm, there was nothing to suggest that this was a student performance.

The prevailing quality of the orchestral playing and the choral singing spoke well not only for the leadership and inspiration provided by the conductor, but also for the preparation that must have preceded the final rehearsals. The instrumental standard which marked yesterday afternoon's concert was one to be expected of a first class major symphony orchestra, while this noteworthy professional standard was not accompanied by an impression of routine. On Dr. Koussevitzky's part, the concert suggested that he enjoys working with student musicians; this impression had also been given by the festival which he presented with his Berkshire Music Center students in 1942.

The members of the orchestra, judging by yesterday's program, are accomplished instrumentalists; there were no apparent weak spots in the ensemble's various sections. An occasional preponderance in the strings in proportion to the woodwinds, which was noticeable in the symphony, could be attributed to the seating of the musicians on a necessarily crowded stage. The lyricism of the tone of the violins and the artistry of this section's phrasing was one feature of the concert; another was the exceptional vitality and exuberance that characterized the triumphant close of the "Egmont" overture. The performance as a whole told of eager devotion, pervasive vitality and an inherent freshness in the interpretation of the music. Both works are among the perennial masterpieces of symphonic literature; both are familiar, but the performance impressed its hearers with the quality of the music rather than reminding them of its familiarity.

The singing of the chorus, trained by Robert Shaw, deserved the highest praise in all respects, including quality and balance of tone and conveyance of the emotions of the music and of Schiller's text, which was sung in the original German. The tone was clear, full and firm, giving no hint of the difficulties of the vocal in the finale of the Ninth Symphony; the choral music was presented with memorable momentum and expressiveness.

The quartet of soloists compared very favorably with other groups that have sung in the Ninth Symphony here in recent years even if yesterday, as in all or nearly all of the performances this reviewer has heard in the last thirty years, it did not entirely disguise the difficulties of its assignment. Miss Moll's voice seemed to be of unusual caliber, in brightness and firmness of tone and effectiveness at high altitudes; it needed more evenness of phrasing. Mr. Druary sang his principal solo with a pleasing, if slightly tense quality of tone; Mr. Wayne's introductory solo, while needing slightly more firmness, had a well phrased and musical presentation. Mr. Shaw shared in the applause bestowed upon the conductor, singers and instrumentalists by a large audience.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
SUN
MAY 10 1948

The Music Makers

By IRVING KOLODIN

Koussevitzky Conducts Juilliard Players.

The main purpose of Serge Koussevitzky's appearance as conductor of the Juilliard Orchestra and Chorus in Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon was accomplished to a thunder of cheers at the end of Beethoven's "Choral" Symphony. The players had been challenged to an exacting standard of performance and proved they could accomplish it; the singers of the chorus and solo quartet were in no way indulged by Koussevitzky's demands of pace or accent, physical or emotional expression. In fact few recent sopranos have sung this music as well as Mariquita Moll, whose big open voice dominated the entire ensemble when it was her turn to extend herself.

IRVING KOLODIN

Considered objectively, however, as a Koussevitzky supervised performance of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony, there were other less affirmative things to be said. It was hard to comprehend, for example, why a chorus of more than 200 voices should be utilized, so that in more than a few points in the finale the orchestra was scarcely audible. This unbalance was repeated in the orchestra itself through the use of a large string section producing waves of tone that were no favor to the wind players, especially the oboes, flutes and clarinets.

The accent on mass in the composition of the ensemble was reflected in the style of the performance itself, which was rather dry tonally, meticulous to the point of fussiness. Those familiar with Koussevitzky's conception of this work could recognize all its familiar characteristics, leaving no doubt of the faithful execution by the students. The power of so many young voices shouting Beethoven's marching phrases could not fail to stir the listener, but it was more by the impact of the sound than by an expression of meaning. John Druary was the excellent tenor, Harry Wayne an able bass, lighter in sound than is customary. The contralto has little exposed singing in this score, so that the report on Margaret Roggero must be noncommital.

An audience that crowded the hall added a substantial sum to the Student Aid Fund of the Juilliard School. The afternoon began with a hard-driven performance of Beethoven's "Egmont" overture.

Anne Katz Heard In Debut Recital

The waning weeks of the music season are memorable for at least one gifted singer. Anne Katz is her name. She made her debut yesterday afternoon in Town Hall, described as a contralto, though mezzo-soprano or even dramatic soprano might be an apter designation. Her program did not allow an idea about the complete potentialities of her voice, since it was composed almost exclusively of slow songs. How Miss Katz would fare in music calling for rapidity of attack is anybody's guess, but in a Handel group, two of the Brahms "Vier Ernste Gesaenge," and songs by Schubert and Mendelssohn, she displayed a voice of beautiful quality. It had amplitude, color and warmth. The middle and high registers were especially appealing; in the lower one she was forced to make obvious preparation.

Interpretively, Miss Katz is an intelligent artist who has yet to become familiar with minutiae of phrasing and inflection. At present she is a little inflexible in rhythm and somewhat rigid in conception; and she often lets her voice do what her mind should. Since the voice itself is of a rather overwhelming nature, one was not inclined to quibble; more experience should provide the needed subtlety in phrasing and dynamics. There were several novelties on the program—three uninteresting Hebrew songs by Meyer Posner, Abraham Schwadron and Lazar Weiner; a deeply-felt "Lamentation of David" by Herbert Fromm; and two workmanlike and well constructed songs ("Swan" and "The Harp") by Marion Bauer. Erich Itor-Kahn was the accompanist.

H. C. S.

INFORMATION OBSCURED

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

MAY 10 194

STUDENT UNITS LED BY KOUSSEVITZKY

Juilliard Chorus and Orchestra Present Beethoven's Ninth in Carnegie Hall

By OLIN DOWNES

A gallant adventure and in the sum of it a noble accomplishment was the performance yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony, by Serge Koussevitzky and the chorus and orchestra of the Juilliard School. The concert was given in aid of the Juilliard Students' Fund, and for the education benefit of the Juilliard Students' Fund, and for the educational benefit of the students who, thanks to Koussevitzky's generosity, had the opportunity of rehearsing and performing under his guidance.

The plan worked. The performance of the symphony, polish of detail aside, was one of the most stirring that we remember. The performers brought to the sovereign conception of the leader their degree of training, of musical perceptiveness and responsiveness of spirit. What Koussevitzky accomplished in the circumstances was thrilling to observe. As only a great artist, and a veteran of wisdom and experience may know, he understood how to release and inspire, how to shape and control the youthful energies and expressive forces at his command.

He knew what to ask for, and not insist upon. He went to the core of the music, and saw to it that its essential message and not merely its technical problems was comprehended by the executants. He kindled the imagination as well as the enthusiasm of those who obeyed him. And it seemed, also, that he himself felt challenged and inspired.

Good Material in Group

The orchestra is still a students' orchestra, with good material, but not fused in tone or style, and not, obviously, routined and accustomed in the repertory as the established orchestras of our civic centers. The essential thing, one presumes, was simplicity and clarity of outline, and afterward [illegible] fell into place, while musical natures took their course.

The proclamation of the opening theme which leaps from the orchestra like a bolt from Jove struck the keynote of a memorable reading. Its articulation, so rugged, simple and spacious, was a thing to remember. It contrasts notably in the retrospect of the mysterious announcement of the choral theme, which has seldom sounded so significant and premonitory, in the finale.

But, of course, the jagged heroic theme is only the half of the necessary material of the opening movement. The companion element, furnished by the lyrical theme and sob-themes, is the other essential of this part of the work. These lyrical themes were sung with as much intensity and pathos as the heroic theme was given energy and profile by their side. The great climax over the rolling drums was unforgettable; its corollary was the tragical coda. The scherzo, the dance of the stars and planets, was more yeasty and less finished, but it had cosmic spirit. Rarely has the slow movement so held its melodic line and absorbed the listener by its mystical tenderness as it did on this occasion.

Most of Chorus Experienced

The finale, technically so difficult, interpretively a problem even more formidable, was a triumph. The chorus stood at Dr. Koussevitzky's command. Precision and a fine elan characterized it, and exciting and cohesive part of the grand structure.

Then there was a surprisingly capable solo quartet; the baritone, Harry Wayne, who made his initial pronouncement with excellent understanding and clearness of enunciation; the fine sonority of John Druary's exultant tenor in the march variation; the highly competent singing of Mariquita Moll and Margaret Roggero, making a group that performed with exceptional security and grasp of their parts.

These singers may have been placed too far forward for the best balances in the score, but how good it was to hear the quartet passages clearly and authoritatively treated, and not as a difficult and dangerous operation which must be gotten through as quickly and cautiously as possible. The quartet was now an integral part of the score—voices, also, of Beethoven, absorbed in his dream—heaven only knows how impossible—of human brotherhood and a greater future for mankind. The finale was yesterday the capstone of the symphony, and not an incongruous experiment at the end of the score.

The Ninth Symphony was prefaced by the "Egmont" overture, played with similar effect, in a similar spirit. The sentence of Edgar Lee Masters sticks in one's mind: "Genius is wisdom and youth." Youth and talent were present in evident numbers on the stage. Wisdom, and youth too, were to be felt in the person and spirit of Koussevitzky, the veteran master and artist, who had completed one of the high achievements of his career.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
WORLD-TELEGRAM

MAY 10 1948

Stravinsky's 'L'Histoire du Soldat' Appears in First Modern Waxin

Collector interest is bound to center around new recording releases. Many a record library was started because a passerby saw in a music store window that a favorite artist of his had just recorded a piece of music also to his taste. New releases of the past few days include some interesting sets.

Igor Stravinsky's "L'Histoire du Soldat" has been in the record catalogs before, but now we have the first modern recording. Leonard Bernstein, the just-resigned conductor of the New York City Symphony, presides over a small group of Boston Symphony Orchestra musicians. Seven musicians only are required for the work which was played for records last fall at the Boston Orchestra's Berkshire estate, Tanglewood. In addition to the "Soldier's Tale," Victor has included the "Octet for Wind Instruments" in the same album to make a king-size offering of Stravinsky chamber music.

We would not go so far as to claim that this is a set for every home which owns a phonograph. Chamber music does not have too wide an audience. Mr. Stravinsky's chamber music is even harder than most to grasp.

Intricate Music.

It is recommended that no one except hardened chamber-music-of-the-moderns listeners try to take both works in the present album at one sitting. The music is complex, intricate stuff and requires listening with the brain as well as the ear. Some chamber music, such as the Borodin "String Quartet No. 2," makes easy melodic listening. Mr. Stravinsky camps on the other side of the river. His stuff is definitely for the initiate. Those who are well seasoned to Mr. Stravinsky's idiom are undoubtedly already in raptures about this new set.

Much more fundamental in a good record library is the Mendelssohn violin concerto. This lovely and appealing work is hand tailored for the bow of a good romantic violinist with a lush singing tone. Mischa Elman is just the man. In a new Victor release, Mr. Elman takes on the Mendelssohn concerto and breezes home an easy winner over technical obstacles of the piece. Desire Defauw leads the Chicago Symphony Orchestra in the accompaniment, which dates the recording a few months back. Be that as it may, the Mendelssohn concerto is a candidate for almost every musical home and this recording of it will fill the bill nicely.

For Grownups, Too.

Efrem Kurtz has been doing well lately with the music of the contemporary Russian composers. His recording of the "Gayne Suite" started Mr. Khatchaturian off in this country. Now that we have learned to spell this one, Mr. Kurtz is back with Kabalevsy.

The music on this occasion is "The Comedians," a suite drawn from what originally was music for a play. The score was written for children, but like "Peter and the Wolf" it has found an adult audience, too. In this new Columbia set Mr. Kurtz leads the New York Philharmonic in a performance which reveals the music to be a first cousin to Mr. Khatchaturian's current output. It is appropriately slick, nice and jingly and nowhere intended to be particularly serious. Taken as strictly lightweight stuff, it is amusing and should find an audience. The recording part of the set has been well handled.

For sheer orchestral sound on records, Sir Thomas Beecham has entered an outstanding candidate. The veteran British conductor is once more before his orchestra, this time the Royal Philharmonic Orchestra, to perform the music of his countryman Frederick Delius. Recording in England, Sir Thomas has given to records his reading of "Brigg Fair." There are some mighty orchestral passages in this score with which the engineers had a field day. Now available in this country as a Victor release, "Brigg Fair" is another demonstration by Sir Thomas that the music of Delius was meant to be listened to. A better recording of this work would be hard to imagine.

Once more we have a new version of the Tchaikovsky "Symphony No. 4." This work has been done on disks so often we have lost count of the total number of editions. We can think of six offhand. Now Mr. Ormandy has had a go at it with the Philadelphia Orchestra, for Columbia.

Competent Reading.

Why we keep getting this same score time after time is a question which only the recording repertoire directors can answer. The Philadelphia Orchestra does a fine sounding job of this standard favorite, as would be expected from this ensemble. The performance is not the most thrilling which could be imagined, but a good, competent one and bly a fair match for Mr. S ski's competing set with the Orchestra on Victor.

Mis Maryla Jonas, the pianist, continues her car Columbia records with a per ance of Robert Schu
"Scenes of Childhood." This little suite which contains near immortal "Traumerei fragment which received a co erable boost in popularity recent motion picture. Miss J plays acceptably well an been accorded respectable re
ing. Welcome as this set with no lack of respect to Jonas, we would have prefe domestic release of the G Columbia version by Walter seking. In this sort of m Gieseking an probably outpla other living pianist. Since Gieseking's records apparen not to be had, Miss Jonas recommended as a very rea second choice.

WASHINGTON, D. C.
TIMES HERALD

MAY 11 1948

Serge Honored

NEW YORK, May 10 (NY News)—Serge Koussevitzky, retiring conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, received an award based upon a poll of about 500 music editors, as the conductor who has done the most for young American musicians.

NEW YOR
PM

MAY 11

Hague

Dr. Kou
With J

An audience which negie Hall Sunday af an extraordinarily in formance of Beeth
Symphony by the chorus of the Juilliard School of Music under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky. One would expect such a performance from Dr.
Koussevitzky working with his own
Boston orchestra and professional soloists and chorister
was able to achieve ably comparable res dent forces and a fe hearsals is indeed marvel at. Not only enlarge one's admir Koussevitzky's condu it also discloses tha abundance of you talent available at Ju flects high credit o training methods.

• •

Under the spell sevitzky's magnetic l student orchestra pla common precision an few imperfections in roughnesses of tone were more than con
by the underlying vi pressiveness of the p purely orchestral mo first was set forth breadth and power; t the requisite verve a of sound, and the along mellifluously an the overall tone of th ing especially clear the choral finale, th
Schiller's Ode to Jo of the huge chorus w ly clean and vigorous,
in its impact, and t student soloists outdi of intonation and in effectiveness many foursome heard her cent seasons.

•

At the conclusion
ance there was a pr

NEW YORK, N. Y.
PM
MAY 11 1948

—Hague—

Dr. Koussevitzky Scores With Juilliard Musicians

PM Reviews
THE JUILLIARD ORCHESTRA AND CHORUS, Serge Koussevitzky, guest conductor; soloists, Mariquita Moll, soprano; Margaret Roggero, contralto; John Druary, tenor; Harry Wayne, bass; Sunday afternoon at Carnegie Hall.
Overture to *Egmont*______Beethoven
Symphony No. 9 in D minor____Beethoven

Hague

An audience which packed Carnegie Hall Sunday afternoon heard an extraordinarily impressive performance of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony by the orchestra and chorus of the Juilliard School of Music under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky. One would expect such a performance from Dr. Koussevitzky working with his own Boston orchestra and professional soloists and choristers, but that he was able to achieve not unfavorably comparable results with student forces and a few days of rehearsals is indeed something to marvel at. Not only does it greatly enlarge one's admiration for Dr. Koussevitzky's conductorial genius; it also discloses that there is an abundance of youthful musical talent available at Juilliard and reflects high credit on the school's training methods.

• • •

Under the spell of Dr. Koussevitzky's magnetic leadership, the student orchestra played with uncommon precision and spirit. What few imperfections in execution and roughnesses of tone there were, were more than compensated for by the underlying vitality and expressiveness of the playing. Of the purely orchestral movements, the first was set forth with notable breadth and power; the second had the requisite verve and brightness of sound, and the third flowed along mellifluously and affectingly, the overall tone of the strings being especially clear and sweet. In the choral finale, the setting of Schiller's Ode to Joy, the singing of the huge chorus was rhythmically clean and vigorous, and dramatic in its impact, and the quartet of student soloists outdid in accuracy of intonation and in general vocal effectiveness many a professional foursome heard hereabouts in recent seasons.

* * *

At the conclusion of the performance there was a prolonged ovation for Dr. Koussevitzky, who shared his bows with Robert Shaw, in recognition of Shaw's part in training the chorus. The concert was the last of three Carnegie Hall events sponsored this season by the Juilliard School, the proceeds of which are donated to the school's Student Aid Fund. —ROBERT A. HAGUE

SUMTER, S. C.
ITEM
MAY 11 1948

Serge Kousevitzky Honored At Banquet

New York—Acclaimed by the nation's music critics as the conductor who during 1947-48 contributed "the most outstanding service to young American musicians," Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston symphony orchestra, last night was honored with the National Music league's 1947-48 award at a dinner at the Town Hall club.

The dinner was given in celebration of the Tenth Anniversary of the National Music league, America's only non-profit, cooperative concert bureau, which has launched such musicians as Rise Stevens and Carroll Glenn.

The dean of America's conductors was chosen by a poll of music editors of more than 500 daily newspapers for encouraging young American composers, singers and instrumentalists by giving many of them their first opportunity to present their work and talents to the public.

At the same time awards were presented to the "Metropolitan Opera Auditions of the Air" radio program and WNYC, New York's municipally-owned station.

The Metropolitan Auditions award was received by Judge E. M. Martin, vice-president of Farnsworth Television and Radio Corp. of Indianapolis, Ind., sponsors of the program, and George Sloane, chairman of the board of the Metropolitan Opera company.

The award was granted on the basis of a poll of music editors of 500 daily newspapers as to the "radio program that had done the most for young American musicians."

WNYC's award was for "giving outstanding opportunities to young American musicians to launch their careers in the world's metropolis."

OREGON CITY, ORE.
ENTERPRISE
MAY 16 1948

Koussevitzky To Leave Boston Symphony

Serge Koussevitzky upon the completion of twenty five years as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the close of the 1948-49 season will resign his post. Boston feels keenly his going but a commanding figure in the world of music has been chosen to succeed him in Charles Munch, director of the Paris Philharmonic which he founded, and of the Paris Conservatory Orchestra, who has met with what the Boston newspapers call "tremendous success" during his two seasons in America.

Koussevitzky, it should be recalled, brought the Boston Symphony into great artistic leadership among orchestras from a quite low estate into which it fell after the first world war and his emminence as a conductor was enduring during the quarter of a century, not alone because of the fine and exacting leadership he gave it but because of a stability of personal character. There were no outbreaks of passion, nor glorification of human weaknesses that had to be excused in the admiration of his work as is too, too often the case with some other eminent musicians and actors—and every good conductor must, it seems, have something of the actor. He pioneered much new good music while maintaining the highest orchestral standards and while a stern disciplinarian of players he succeeded in holding an esprit de corps in his organization that gave the orchestra great stability and vigor to go with its artistic superiority. The Boston Symphony in the popular and particular minds of music followers had notable eminence during his reign. He outlived long ago the few eccentricities and extremes that marked his early years and in their place brought stature to his role and true pride in him to Boston.

Koussevitzky will continue to direct the historic Berkshire Music Center and Festival and will occasionally return to Boston as Guest Conductor to the delight of those in the Boston following who may for a while, as is their privilege be restless under the galloping tempo of Mr. Munch and the Parisian flavor of his interpretations.

CHICAGO, ILL.
TRIBUNE
[illegible]

• • •

In a poll taken among music editors of more than 500 newspapers by the National Music league, Serge Koussevitzky has been acclaimed as the conductor who during 1947-48 contributed "the most outstanding service to young American musicians."

• • •

Herbert Owen Reed, author of "A Workbook in the Fundamentals of Music," and Nicolai Berezowsky, composer, have been awarded Guggenheim fellowships for 1948.

• • •

NEW YORK, N. Y.
PM

MAY 16 1948

Hague

Listening to Discs . . .

Two by Stravinsky

Igor Stravinsky's L'Histoire du Soldat (The Soldier's Tale) has been released by RCA Victor in an album which also contains his Octet for Wind Instruments. Both pieces are beautifully played by members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the sensitive and perceptive direction of Leonard Bernstein. The recordings, made last Summer in the acoustically felicitous Theater-Concert Hall at Tanglewood, are also first-rate from a mechanical standpoint. (Victor DM 1197, five 12-inch discs, $7.25.)

Hague

Composed in 1918 for a stage work based on the ancient Russian tale of the soldier and his violin and the devil, the score of Soldat calls for only seven instruments—clarinet, bassoon, trumpet, trombone, violin, double bass and percussion. Each part demands a high degree of virtuosity of the performer—a demand which is admirably met in the present performance. And it is a tuneful, picturesque, witty and sardonic score—music of concise elegance, lean and economical yet uncommonly expressive in its simplicity, that is wonderful fun to listen to.

Equally irresistable is the Octet, which dates from 1923 and marks Stravinsky's turning to the creation of absolute music in the classical style. Graceful, cheerful, bright-humored and mercurial-rhythmed, it touches lightly on a diversity of moods; and there is an effortless brilliance about the writing for the various wind instruments, individually and together, that is as miraculous as it is enthralling.

Tune-Detective Note: That ubiquitos Sabre Dance of Khachaturian's would seem to be an enlargement, or rather, a sort of mortification, of a playful little theme which occurs in the opening Soldier's March of Stravinsky's Soldat.

Other Recent Sets

Bach: MAGNIFICAT IN D, Robert Shaw conducting the RCA Victor Chorale and Orchestra; Susanne Freil, soprano; Blanche Thebom, mezzo-soprano; Ernice Lawrence, tenor; Paul Matthen, bass (Victor DM 1182, five 10-inch discs, $6). Bach's dramatic setting of the Virgin Mary's hymn of praise from St. Luke I, 46-55. The singing of Mr. Shaw's choristers is impressive and the soloists do well enough. Recording, satisfactory.

Beethoven: SYMPHONY NO. 4, Cleveland Orchestra under George Szell (Columbia MM 705, four 12-inch discs, $6). A good, straightforward performance of Beethoven's sunny and lyrical Fourth. Superior to the previously available recordings of this work.

Beethoven: SYMPHONY NO. 9 ("CHORAL"), Boston Symphony under Serge Koussevitzky; with the Berkshire Festival Chorus, Robert Shaw, director; and Frances Yeend, soprano; David Lloyd, tenor; Eunice Alberts, contralto; James Pease, bass (Victor DM 1190, eight 12-inch discs, $11). This is not the first-rate waxing of the Ninth you have been waiting for. Mechanically, the recording is disappointingly inferior: surfaces are poor, and both instrumental and vocal sounds are muddy and distorted in many places. Nor does Dr. Koussevitzky's interpretation inspire any bravoes. Only in the choral finale does the performance come near to measuring up to the magnificence of the music.

* * *

Brahms: QUARTET NO. 3, in B-flat major, Op. 67, Guilet String Quartet (Vox 208, four 12-inch discs, $6). One of Brahms' most ingratiating and polished chamber works, performed con amore by one of the finest quartets of our time. The beautifully balanced ensemble of the Messrs. Guilet, Gorodetsky, Brieff and Laporte bring to this music notable brightness of tone, warmth of feeling and refinement of style. The quality of the recording itself is a bit uneven, but on the whole is better than the general run of Vox releases.

Brahms: SONATA NO. 3, in D minor, Op. 108, Isaac Stern, violin, and Alexander Zakin, piano (Columbia MM 730, three 12-inch discs, $4.75). Mr. Zakin's none too felicitous piano tone tends to overbalance Mr. Stern's more expressive violin in the climaxes. A lovely piece, though, and for the most part brilliantly set forth. Recording, fair.

Britten: FOUR SEA INTERLUDES AND PASSACAGLIA FROM "PETER GRIMES," Concertgebouw Orchestra of Amsterdam under Eduard van Beinum (Decca EDA 50, three 12-inch FFRR discs, $7.35). First recordings to be released here of the orchestral interludes from the Benjamin Britten opera which this year had its first presentation at the Met. The highly evocative Dawn, Sunday Morning, Moonlight and Storm music, and the dramatic and affecting Passacaglia—the center-piece of the whole opera, which bridges the two scenes of Act II—are expertly and vividly performed. Excellent recording: the instrumental sounds are reproduced with remarkable clarity and fidelity.

* * *

Bruch: SCOTTISH FANTASY, Op. 46, Jascha Heifetz, violin, and the RCA Victor Symphony under William Steinberg, with Stanley Chaloupka, harp (Victor DV 11, three 12-inch vinylite discs, $7.35; also on regular discs, DM 1183, $4.75). Charming, colorful, lushly romantic, if essentially second-rate, music based on Scottish folk tunes, so affectionately and adroitly performed by Mr. Heifetz and his collaborators that it should delight even the most fastidious listeners. Unfortunately, the recording is not as distinguished as the performance, and there are some crackling surface noises on the set I have.

Ravel: PIANO CONCERTO FOR THE LEFT HAN[illegible] Robert Casadesus and the [illegible]ladelphia Orchestra under Eugene Ormandy (Columbia MX 288, two 12-inch discs, $3.50). A welcome waxing of the arresting tour de force of jazz rhythm and romantic sentiment which Ravel originally wrote for the one-armed Austrian pianist Paul Wittgenstein. Mr. Casadesus' left hand pulls off all the miracles

MORE

PITTSFIELD, MASS.
BERKSHIRE EAGLE

MAY 19 1948

Name Confusion In Sight for New BSO Conductor

Charles Muench, director of the Paris Conservatoire Orchestra, rarely has been bothered by mistaken identity. And in taking over the baton of Serge Koussevitzky before the Boston Symphony he would not anticipate trouble of that sort, invading the realm of the Lowells, Cabots and O'Sullivans. But when he starts next spring, he will find another man also bearing the un-New Englandish name of Muench already occupying Boston's civic spotlight. For C. (also for Charles) Lawrence Muench, president of the Hood Rubber Company, has been named president of the Boston Chamber of Commerce, on a platform whose major plank is the clean-up of civic administration by adoption of a city-manager form of government. The two men were not related.

Incidentally, the extreme singularity of the Koussevitzky name, on the other hand, some years ago impelled Serge's nephew, who also is in the music business, to decapitate his own name to avoid confusion with the older master. The nephew is Fabien Sevitsky, director of the Indianapolis Symphony.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

MAY 28 1948

PISTON WINS AWARD

Horblit $1,000 Prize Presented to Composer for Symphony

BOSTON, May 27 (AP)—Prof. Walter Piston of Harvard today received the Boston Symphony Orchestra's $1,000 Horblit Award for 1948 for his Third Symphony, which won the Pulitzer Prize.

The award, established last year by Mark M. Horblit of Boston, is intended to recognize outstanding symphonic compositions by residents of the United States.

The selection committee consists of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra; A. Tillman Merritt, head of the Harvard College Music Department, and Henry B. Cabot, president of the trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The new symphony will be presented by Dr. Koussevitzky at the Berkshire Music Festival at Tanglewood on July 31.

CINCINNATI, O.
POST

MAY 18 1948

Music: An Abundance Of Charles Muenches

BY ELEANOR BELL

Now it turns out there will be two Charles Muenches in Boston when Le Beau Charles, our Charles, the one who guest-conducted our Cincinnati Symphony, takes over the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1949. It seems impossible, doesn't it?

HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

Lindstrom Urges Tolerant Judging

The duty of a small-city music critic is to create a healthy climate for music in his area of influence, to discourage centralization by his encouragement of local composers, schools and other musical activities—and always to remember the kind of criterion he can afford to have in a small city.

Carl E. Lindstrom, music critic and managing editor of The Hartford Times, told the New England Music Critics Symposium today that there should be more than one inflexible yardstick with which to measure musical efforts. He said a great orchestra, for instance, should be measured by one yardstick and a local musical group or artist by another, more tolerant, yardstick.

* * *

IS THERE a kind of criticism which tends to produce less music, to discourage performers and more importantly to discourage audiences?" he asked. "If there is that kind of criticism, and I believe there is, I'm going to quarrel with it."

Mr. Lindstrom, who is also chairman of the Symposium and Music Festival here today and tomorrow, spoke on "Music Centralization as Viewed from the Small City." He deplored the siphoning of small-city talent by the large musical centers such as New York. He said the retention of local talent in their own regions was one of the primary functions of the music critic.

Citing Hartford as an example, the local critic cited several instances of Hartford players and musicians now engaged with orchestras in distant cities.

"You see what has happened to us," he said. "These people were trained in Hartord, but they are unable to make careers here because we have no symphony orchestra. There we have one phase of centralization—the trend away from the smaller city to the large one.

"The more acute phase, however, is that which attracts talent to only the very largest cities like New York, Chicago and a center such as Hollywood—the tragedy here being that ever so many of these people are completely submerged in the over-supply of first-rate talent."

* * *

THE SPEAKER pointed out that Hartford had had its own orchestra at various times in the past. From around the turn of the century to about 1920, the Hartford Philharmonic was supported mainly by a single benefactor. When this orchestra passed out of existence, and attempt to establish another one failed. With WPA, he said, we had a federally subsidized group which was broken up at the onset of the war.

"These previous attempts have brought on a spirit of defeatism as regards a symphony orchestra in this town," he asserted, "and we now have no symphony orchestras except those which exist on a scholastic basis in the Hartt School of Music and the Hartford School of Music."

Mr. Lindstrom urged fellow critics to pass judgment on a Boston Symphony concert as the performance of a master orchestra of which perfection is expected. On the other hand, he said, the performance of a baccalaureate pianist should be treated as a debut, pure and simple.

* * *

"THINGS MUST be judged for what they are," he insisted. "And if the music critic is going to apply the New York criterion to every budding violinist, there's going to be an awful lot of bud-nipping on the small-city musical level—and it won't be long before you have no grass roots culture at all."

The speaker said that if it weren't the business of a critic to create a healthy climate for music, he was not only wasting his time, "but he becomes a harmful influence, and the valuable space his stuff takes up in the paper were better devoted to another comic strip."

Mr. Lindstrom also believed another plain duty of the music critic was the encouragement of the contemporary composer—first of all the composer in his own region.

"The resistance on the part of the public to new music, strange music—and in music the new is always strange—is terrific," he reminded his audience. "There are times when it seems to be an immovable object. Actually this resistance can be worn down as the steady dripping wears away the stone. And perhaps my comparison is a little too extravagant because I sometimes wonder whether the public isn't more willing to be led than we sometimes think."

He believed the living composer hadn't come out very well in daily newspaper criticism because of the critic's inclination to "play safe."

"It seems to me that the critic's function with regard to the living composer is to prepare the mind of the public, if possible, for what is about to be produced," he added. "That's a big enough job to keep any of us busy."

CINCINNATI, O.
ENQUIRER
MAY 23 1948

American Premiere Planned For Opera By Prokofieff

NEW YORK, May 22—(UP)—The American premiere of "The Duenna," an opera by the Russian composer Serge Prokofieff, will be given by the Lemonade Opera in New York on June 1.

The work is based on the play of Richard Brinsley Sheridan and has a libretto in English, translated from the Russian by Jean Karsavina. It will be given 13 performances during the company's season of four weeks. The other operas in its repertoire are "Don Giovanni," "La Serva Padrona" and "Hansel and Gretel."

This new company, which takes its name from the lemonade served to patrons, is a refreshing experiment in American presentation of opera. The performances are given in the small Greenwich Mews Playhouse in Greenwich Village. The company also has had one tour and will undertake another. It has expanded somewhat from its original idea, which was "to provide a showcase for young talented artists to reach the public, at the same time presenting this public with stimulating opera in English in an intimate lyric theater."

* * *

ONE of the pleasant surprises of the New York music season as it drew to its close was the presentation of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony by the Juillard School of Music. It was given in Carnegie Hall to a capacity audience which contributed handsomely to the students' fund of the school.

The performers were all students of Juillard. There was a full symphony orchestra, a chorus of 250 trained by Robert Shaw, and the usual soloists. The conductor was Serge Koussevitzky, who agreed to serve in the interests of stimulating the aspiring young musicians under this charge for the occasion.

The result was astounding. Schiller's "Ode To Joy," as conceived by Beethoven in extremely difficult music, was not only fresh and inspiring but done with musicianship which on many occasions has not even been approached by seasoned professionals. Among the four soloists, Mariquita Moll and John Druary had the trying soprano and tenor roles. Both are sure to be heard from in the professional field and possibly in a big way.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
MAY 24 1948

ALFRED HOLY

Special to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

BOSTON, May 23—Word has been received here of the death in Vienna, on May 8 of Alfred Holy, first harpist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra from 1913 to 1928. He was composer of many works for the harp. His age was 82.

News of the death was contained in a letter received today by Elford Caughey, second harpist of the Boston Symphony.

Mr. Holy was born in Portugal of Czech parents. His father, director of the music conservatory at Oporto, trained his son in music. The son played in the Vienna Philharmonic until he was brought to Boston by Dr. Karl Muck, then conductor of the Boston Symphony.

Surviving are his widow and two sons, all of Vienna.

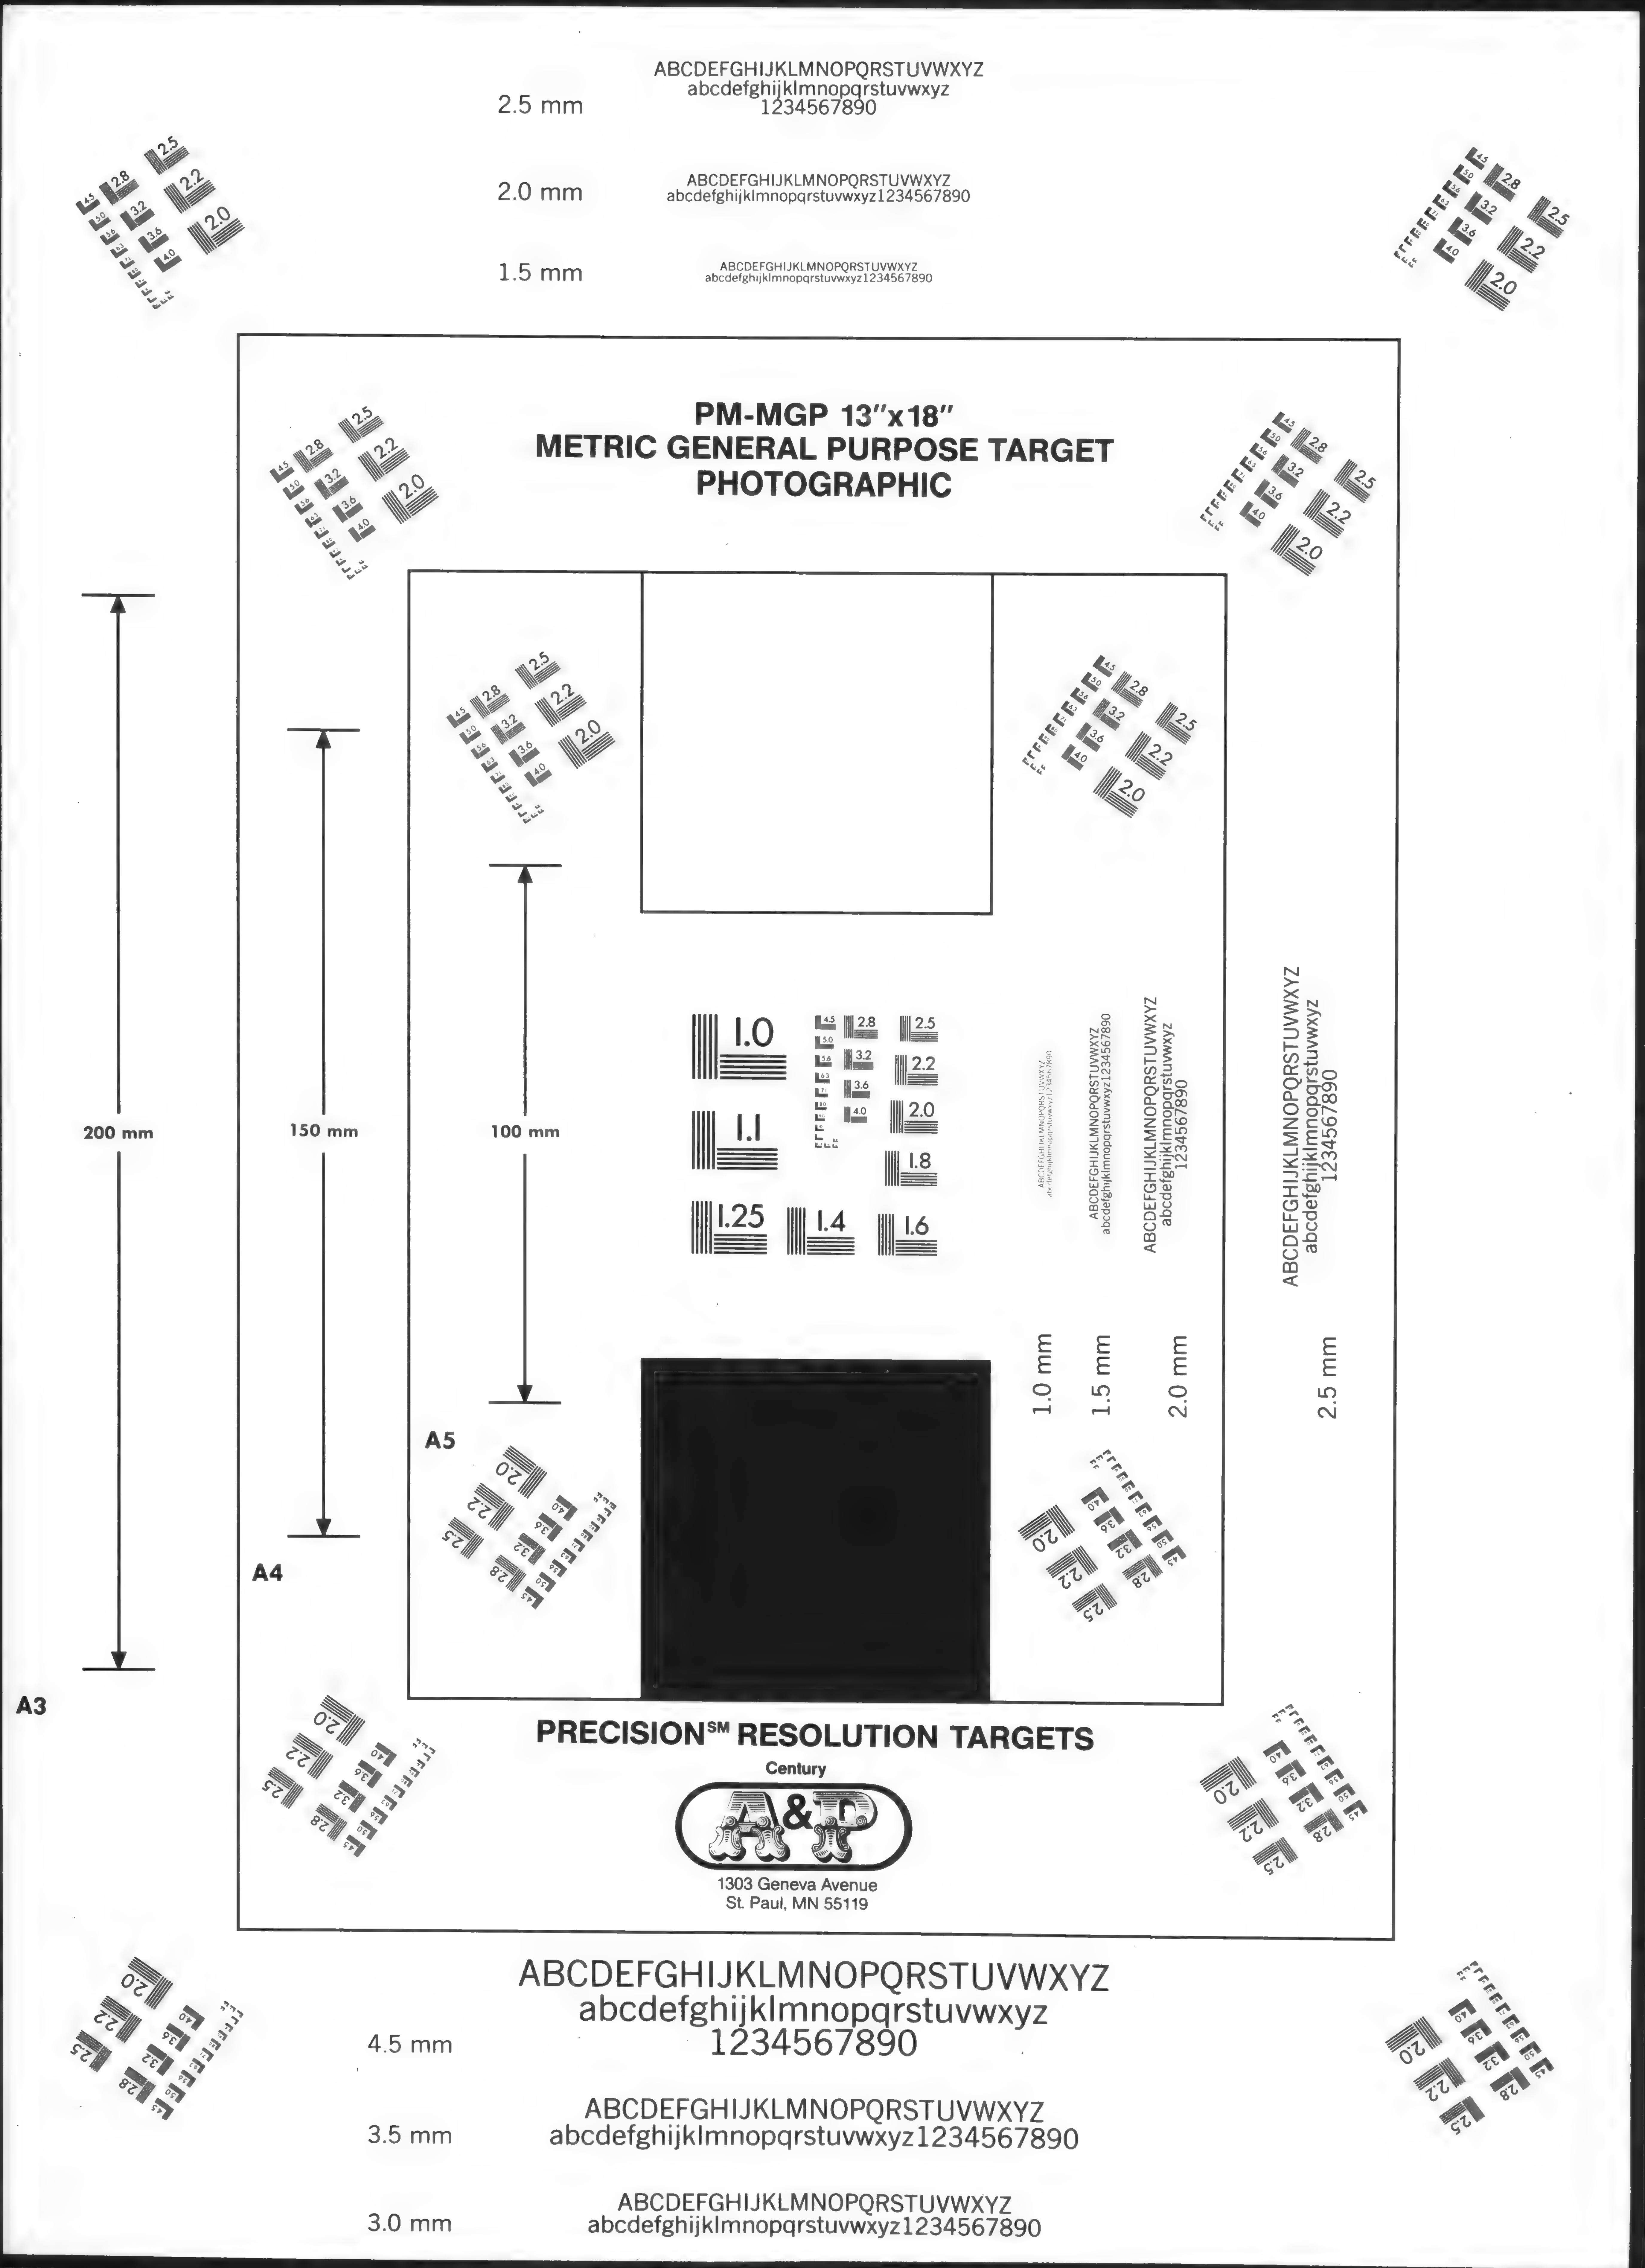
REDUCTION
RATIO
16x

2.5 mm
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

2.0 mm
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.5 mm
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC



1.0 mm
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.5 mm
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

2.0 mm
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

2.5 mm
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century
A&P 1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

4.5 mm
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

3.5 mm
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

3.0 mm
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

THE ORIG
ROMEIKE
PRESS CLIPPINGS
220 W. 19th St., NEW YORK 11, N.Y.
Tel. CHelsea 3-8860
Cir. (D 538,914) (S 1 002 765)
This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
MAY

Pulitzer Prizes Go to 'Streetcar' And Michener's Stories of Pacific

By FRANK S. ADAMS

The 1948 Pulitzer Prize for the best original American play was awarded yesterday to "A Streetcar Named Desire," by Tennessee Williams. The award for the most distinguished fiction in book form went to "Tales of the South Pacific" by James A. Michener.

Dr. Frank D. Fackenthal, acting president of Columbia University, announced fourteen awards in the fields of journalism, letters and music. It was the thirty-first year of the Pulitzer Prizes, which are awarded annually by the trustees of Columbia University on recommendation of the Advisory Board of the Graduate School of Journalism.

Dr. Fackenthal himself received from the Advisory Board, meeting for the last time before his forthcoming retirement as acting president of Columbia on June 7, a scroll in recognition of his long services in connection with the development of the Pulitzer Prizes. The scroll assured him of "the Pulitzer Prize of our friendship in perpetuity."

The gold medal awarded annually "for the most disinterested and meritorious public service rendered by an American newspaper during the year," went to The St. Louis Post-Dispatch for its coverage of the mine disaster at Centralia, Ill., and its subsequent campaign for reforms in mine safety laws.

Four prizes were awarded for reporting. George E. Goodwin of The Atlanta Journal, won the prize for local reporting, for an exposé of vote frauds. Two awards were made in the field of national reporting, to Bert Andrews of The New York Herald Tribune, and Nat S. Finney of The Minneapolis Tribune. Paul W. Ward of The Baltimore Sun won the prize for reporting international affairs.

Virginius Dabney of The Richmond (Va.) Times-Dispatch won the prize for distinguished editorial writing; Reuben L. (Rube) Goldberg of The New York Sun received the similar award for a distinguished cartoon, and Frank Cushing of The Boston Traveler was named the winner of the $500 prize for the best news photograph.

The prizes in letters included awards to "Across the Wide Missouri," by Bernard DeVoto, in the field of American history; to "Forgotten First Citizen: John Bigelow," by Margaret Clapp, in the field of biography, and to "The Age of Anxiety," by W. H. Auden, in poetry.

[147]

Piston Wins Music Prize

The prize for distinguished musical composition was awarded to Walter Piston for his Symphony No. 3, which had its first performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra last January.

Each of the individual prizes carries an award of $500. The gold medal for The St. Louis Post-Dispatch is valued at the same amount.

An annual scholarship of $1,500 to the art student in America who is certified as "the most promising and deserving" by the National Academy of Design, with which the Society of American Artists has been merged, was awarded to Philip Anthony Moose of 139 West Ninety-fifth Street.

In accordance with their custom in recent years, the trustees deferred the awards of the three traveling scholarships for graduates of the School of Journalism until the completion of the academic year. These scholarships have a value of $1,500 each and are conferred upon the three highest ranking students in the class.

The Advisory Board re-elected three of its members to serve terms lasting until 1952. They were Sevellon Brown of The Providence (R. I.) Journal-Bulletin; Kent Cooper of The Associated Press, and William R. Mathews of The Arizona Daily Star of Tucson, Ariz.

The other members of the Advisory Board are Robert Choate, The Boston Herald; Gardner Cowles, The Des Moines (Ia.) Register and Tribune; Palmer Hoyt, The Denver Post; Frank R. Kent, The Baltimore Sun; John S. Knight, Knight Newspapers, Inc.; Arthur Krock, THE NEW YORK TIMES; Stuart H. Perry, The Adrian (Mich.) Telegram; Harold S. Pollard, The New York World-Telegram, and Joseph Pulitzer, The St. Louis Post-Dispatch.

Newspaper's Campaign Through

The award to The St. Louis Post-Dispatch was the result of a long campaign begun by that newspaper after the mine disaster at Centralia, Ill., which cost 111 lives on March 25, 1947. The newspaper assigned a staff of seven reporters to investigate the many ramifications of the situation, in the minefield, in Springfield, the Illinois State capital, and in the Bureau of Mines in Washington.

As a result of their news stories and the editorials and cartoons with which The Post-Dispatch followed up their efforts, the Illinois Legislature enacted two laws strengthening mine inspections; the Centralia Coal Company, operator of the mine, was indicted and fined $1,000 after it had pleaded nolo contendere, and the director of the Illinois Mines and Minerals Department resigned. He was later indicted and is awaiting trial.

Mr. Goodwin, a 30-year-old former naval officer, won the prize for local reporting by an extensive investigation of vote frauds in Telfair County, Georgia, at the general election on Nov. 5, 1946. He spent several weeks investigating the frauds before writing his [illegible] Atlanta Journal beginning March 2, 1947.

[148]

2 National Affairs Awards

Mr. Andrews received one of the two awards for reporting on national affairs for his stories on the State Department's loyalty inquiry, the first of which appeared in The New York Herald Tribune on Nov. 1. They told in detail of the way in which an unnamed State Department employe had been dismissed as a bad security risk, without having had an opportunity to defend himself.

The award to Mr. Finney was for a series of articles charging the Truman Administration with planning to put the ordinary affairs of Federal civilian agencies under a system of censorship. His first story on this subject appeared in The Minneapolis Tribune Oct. 19.

Mr. Ward won the prize for international reporting for a series of stories on daily life in the Soviet Union, for which he conducted research while he was in Moscow for the meeting of the Council of Foreign Ministers early in 1947. After his return to this country he wrote a series of nineteen articles that appeared in The Baltimore Sun between April 30 and May 18, 1947.

The award of the prize for editorial writing to Mr. Dabney was made on the basis of his entire volume of work during 1947. The terms of this award provide that the test of excellence shall be "clearness of style, moral purpose, sound reasoning and power to influence public opinion in what the writer conceives to be the right direction."

Mr. Goldberg, veteran cartoonist of the New York Sun, won the prize for cartoons for a drawing that appeared in that newspaper on July 22. It showed a huge atom [illegible] and [illegible] d De [illegible]

Picture of Fight with Police

The [illegible] was [illegible] Mr. [illegible] a picture [illegible] Boy Gunman at Bay," which appeared in The Boston Traveler of June 23, 1947. It showed a youthful gunman who was engaged in a pistol fight with the police, holding a school boy in front of him as a shield. Mr. Cushing heard of the battle over a police radio while on another assignment in the vicinity, and took the picture before the police overpowered the thug.

The victory of "A Streetcar Named Desire" marked the second time that the Pulitzer Prize and the New York Drama Critics Award have gone to the same play. The only other time was in 1940, when William Saroyan's "The Time of Your Life," received both awards. Mr. Saroyan rejected the Pulitzer prize, but Columbia informed him that the award would remain in the Pulitzer records, notwithstanding his attitude.

Mr. Michener's book is not a novel, but a collection of short stories. It was published by the Macmillan Company. Mr. DeVoto's prize-winning history was published by Houghton Miflin Company; the prize-winning biography by Margaret Clapp was published by Little Brown & Co., and Mr. Auden's volume of verse was published by Random House.

A musical version of "Tales of the South Pacific" is being prepared by the well-known collaboration of Richard Rodgers and Oscar Hammerstein 2d. They also will present the show in the fall in conjunction with Leland Hayward and Joshua Logan.

Sketches of Those Added by Columbia to the Roll of Pulitzer Prize Winners

Sketches of the winners of the Pulitzer awards follow:

THE RECIPIENTS OF 1948 PULITZER PRIZES AND TWO OF THE WINNING WORKS

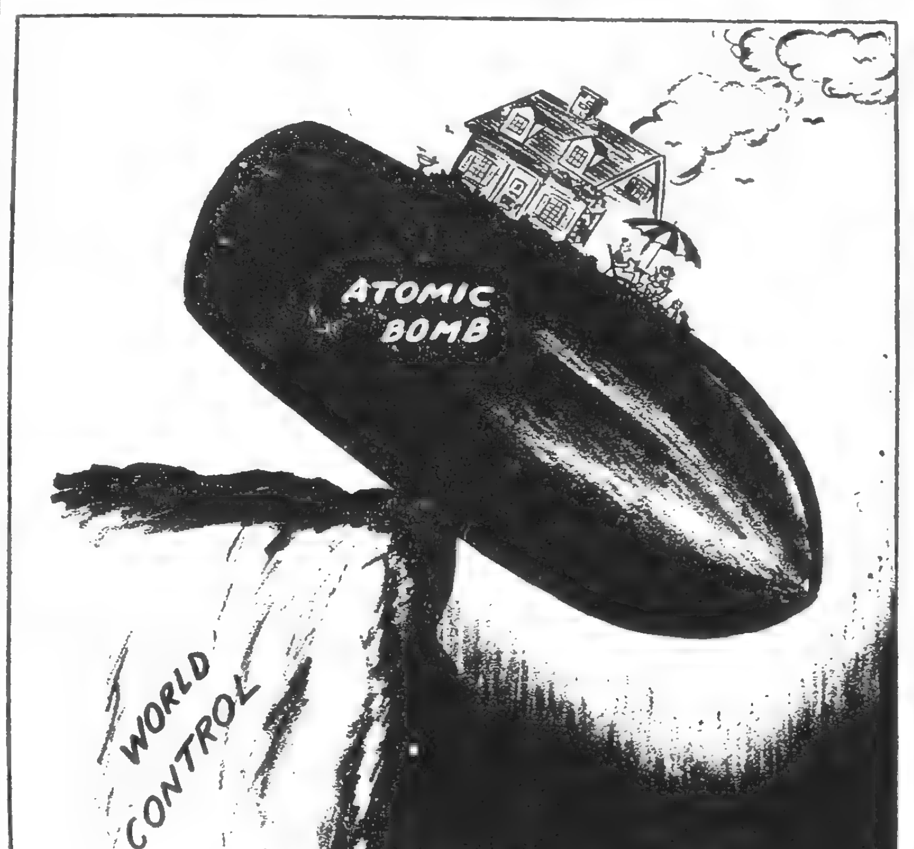
George E. Goodwin
Local Reporting

Nat S. Finney
National Reporting

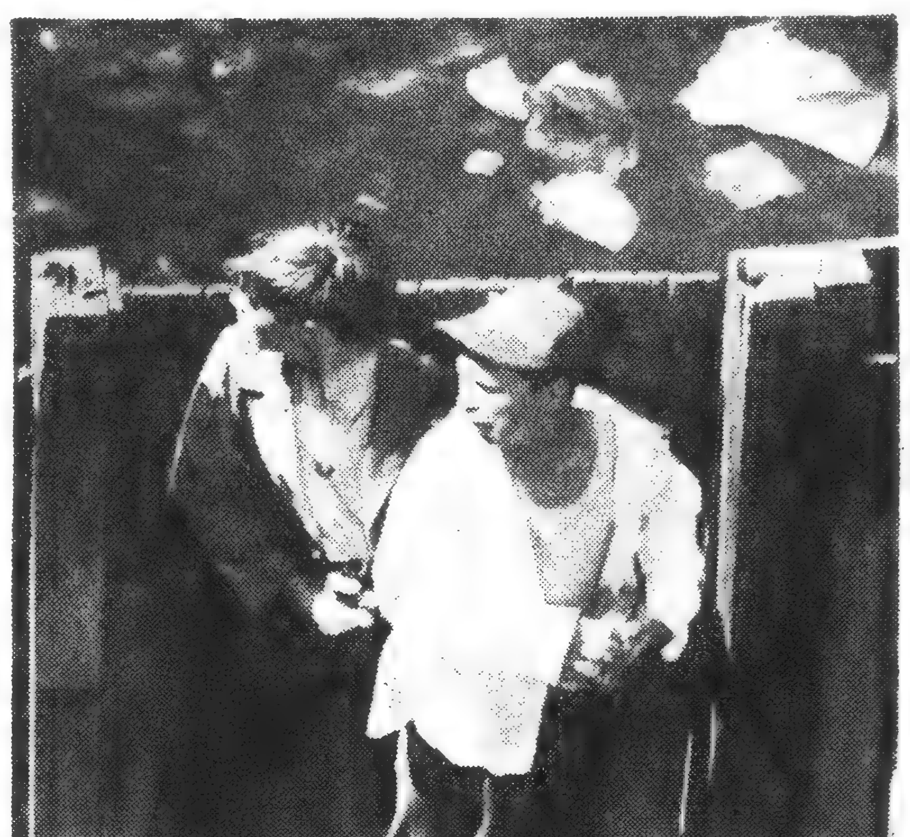
Bert Andrews
National Reporting

Paul W. Ward
International Reporting

Virginius Dabney
Editorial Writing



Rube Goldberg's cartoon, "Peace Today"



Mr. Cushing's picture, "Boy Gunman at Bay"

Reuben L. Goldberg
Cartoon

James A. Michener
Fiction

Tennessee Williams Play

Frank Cushing
Photography

W. H. Auden
Poetry

Walter Piston
Music

Margaret Clapp
Biography

Bernard DeVoto
History

Tennessee Williams

Tennessee Williams was born Thomas Lanier Williams in Columbus, Miss., in 1914. He abandoned his given name when he felt he had "compromised" it by the imperfection of his early writing, and he took Tennessee as a gesture to his pioneer ancestors in that state. His first play to reach Broadway, "The Glass Menagerie," won the New York Drama Critics Circle Prize in 1945.

Five years earlier his "Battle of Angels" had failed in a Boston tryout. In the interval, Mr. Williams worked as a waiter, an elevator operator, a movie usher and at other odd jobs to stay alive while continuing to write. He got a job writing scripts for the movies but it lasted only six months.

After the success of "The Glass Menagerie," he obtained a production for "You Touched Me," a play he had written earlier in collaboration with Donald Windham. This play failed, and Mr. Williams' next entry on Broadway was "A Streetcar Named Desire."

Before "Streetcar" was produced, another Williams play, "Summer and Smoke," received its first production in the Dallas (Tex.) Theatre '47 last summer under Margo Jones' direction. Miss Jones will put the play on here next season. At present Mr. Williams is continuing to write while on a visit to Italy.

James A. Michener

James A. Michener served in some capacity or other on forty-nine islands in the Pacific from Australia to Tarawa. Joining the Navy as an apprentice seaman, he presently found himself atoll-hopping as a trouble shooter in aviation maintenance. The manuscript of "Tales of the South Pacific" was almost completed when he received his appointment as senior historical officer for the area from New Guinea to Tahiti.

His volume of wartime stories was admittedly his first attempt at popular writing. Questioned about his previous publications, he recently replied cryptically that they were "professional educational books, with lots of footnotes." For some years he has been an editor in the educational department of Macmillan Company, book publishers.

Born in New York in 1907, Mr. Michener's interest in people and places has carried him to the far corners of the world. A graduate of Swarthmore College, he received scholarships to study in Europe and later sailed the Mediterranean as an able-bodied seaman in the British merchant navy.

His home is in New York. He now is at work on a novel entitled "The Homeward Journey," concerning the emotional and intellectual development of a young man during the Twenties and Thirties.

Bernard A. DeVoto

Bernard Augustine DeVoto is one of the most versatile figures in contemporary American literature. He is also one of the most prolific. From light fiction to authoritative social history, he has published an average of one book a year for the last twenty-four years. He also has edited several other volumes, too, and written hundreds of articles and essays

He has probably gained his largest audiences as a historian of America's expansion to the West. It was in this role that he published "The Year of Decision: 1846," a best-seller four years ago; and then his prize-winning "Across the Wide Missouri" last fall. This deals with the decline of American fur trade early in the Nineteenth Century.

Mr. DeVoto has carried on a virtually separate career as "John August." Under this pen name, he has written several novels and dozens of "slick" magazine stories, which he says have paid for the time he spends in study and serious work.

A former instructor at Northwestern University and at Harvard, Mr. DeVoto contributes a monthly article to Harper's Magazine. Although a native of Utah, he has lived in Cambridge, Mass., for almost a quarter of a century.

Margaret Clapp

Miss Margaret Clapp, whose "Forgotten First Citizen: John Bigelow" won this year's biography award, is an assistant professor of history at Brooklyn College.

The volume is her first published work. Undertaken at the suggestion of Prof. Allan Nevins at Columbia University, with whom she was taking graduate study, it brought her a Doctorate of Philosophy a year before it was published last summer.

Miss Clapp had previously traveled through much of the United States while teaching at several schools, including New Jersey College for Women. In the war years she did special research for the British Broadcasting Corporation.

A native of East Orange, N. J., which is still her permanent home, Miss Clapp was graduated from Wellesley College in 1930. She received her Master's Degree from Columbia seven years later.

Now engaged in teaching courses in American history covering the periods from 1876 to the outbreak of the First World War and also the contemporary era, she said last evening that he was "looking about at various subjects" for a second book, but "nothing is definite yet."

W. H. Auden

Wystan Hugh Auden, who won the Pulitzer Prize for Poetry with "The Age of Anxiety: A Baroque Eclogue," is considered by many to have had, except for T. S. Eliot, the greatest influence on the modern generation of poets.

An American citizen since 1946, Mr. Auden was born in England in 1907. Educated at Gresham's School, Holt, and at Christ Church, Oxford, he first attracted attention in the early thirties when with Stephen Spender and C. Day Lewis he joined the cult of those bent on rebelling against their own heritage.

When he arrived in the United States last year, Mr. Spender said of his long-time friend that he was "the most successful intellectual poet since Alexander Pope." Arthur Koestler declared recently that "he has unquestioned genius."

Mr. Auden was honored in England with the King's Gold Medal in 1937 in recognition of his meritorious work as a young poet. He received an award of merit from the American Academy of Arts and Letters and the National Institute of Arts and Letters in 1945.

Mr. Auden is the author of "Poems" (1930); "The Ascent of F6" (1937), and "The Double Man" (1941). With Christopher Isherwood he collaborated on "Journey to a War" (1939), and "On the Frontier" (1939).

Walter Piston

Walter Piston has ranked as one of America's outstanding composers for many years. His music in all forms has been admired for its craftsmanship and has been played throughout the world, including performances by the Philharmonic-Symphony and the Washington National and Boston Symphonies.

He was born in Rockland, Me., in 1894 and is of Italian descent. In 1924 he received his B.A. from Harvard, where he is now Professor of Music. He studied composition with Nadia Boulanger in Paris, and has held the Guggenheim and John Knowles Paine fellowships.

The Third Symphony was commissioned by the Koussevitzky Music Foundation. Other commissions were awarded by the League of Composers (Quintet for Flute and String Quartet); the Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge Foundation (Partita for Violin, Viola and Organ); the International Society for Contemporary Music (Divertimento for Nine Instruments); the Alice M. Ditson Fund (Second Symphony); the Columbia Broadcasting System and the Dallas Symphony Orchestra.

He has also been active in the League of Composers, the Paderewski Fund for the Encouragement of American Composers and the Lili Boulanger Memorial Fund. He is the author of "Principles of Harmonic Analysis," "Harmony" and "Counterpoint."

Virginius Dabney

Virginius Dabney has been editor of The Richmond Times-Dispatch for twelve years. Born at University, Va., on Feb. 8, 1901, he received a B. A. degree from the University of Virginia in 1920, and an M. A. degree in 1921.

After teaching French for a short time at the Episcopal High School in Richmond, Mr. Dabney served as a reporter on The Richmond News Leader from 1922 until 1928. In the latter year he joined the editorial staff of The Times-Dispatch, becoming chief editorial writer in 1934 and editor in 1936.

Mr. Dabney is a member of the board of directors of the Council for Democracy; the board of trustees of the Institute of Early American History and Culture; the board of directors of the Southern Regional Council and the Richmond Library Board.

He won the Lee Editorial Award of the Virginia Press Association and the Lee School of Journalism of Washington and Lee University for "distinguished editorial writing during the year 1937." He is married and has three children.

For many years the Richmond editor contributed regular articles on southern affairs to THE NEW YORK TIMES. He is the author of "Liberalism in the South" and "Below the Potomac." Last month he was re-elected as a director of the American Society of Newspaper Editors.

Rube Goldberg

In his forty-four-year career as an artist, the versatile Rube Goldberg, political cartoonist for The New York Sun, has won wide notice, especially for the amazing appliances that decorated his inventive drawings. He joined The Sun more than ten years ago.

The seed of those "inventions" was planted when he studied mining engineering at the University of Southern California, which gave him a B. S. degree in 1904.

Reuben Lucius Goldberg was born in San Francisco on July 4, 1883, a son of Max and Hannah Goldberg. At the age of 12 he studied art from a sign painter for a year and a half. "The sign painter fell off a scaffold and the lessons ended," Rube explained.

He was a cartoonist on The San Francisco Chronicle in 1904-05, then with The Bulletin there until 1907, when he began cartooning and sports writing for The New York Evening Mail. His lampooning was featured in more than 200 newspapers, but he never drew a continuity and finally, in 1936, he gave up comic strips.

His political cartooning, which started as a three-a-week proposition, is distributed by the Bell Syndicate.

He was married in 1916 to the former Irma Seaman. They have two sons, Thomas George, 29, a painter, and George W. George, 28, a Hollywood scenario writer. The Goldbergs live at 88 Central Park West and have a summer home near Northport, L. I.

George E. Goodwin

George E. Goodwin, who is a native of Atlanta, Ga., has been a reporter and feature writer on The Atlanta Georgian, The Charleston News and Courier, The Washington Times-Herald and The Miami Daily News. He joined the staff of The Atlanta Journal in the latter part of 1945. He is 30 years old.

Mr. Goodwin received his early education in the public schools of Atlanta and was graduated from Washington and Lee University in 1939. In World War II he served as a naval officer for three years. He was overseas for twenty months, serving as intelligence officer for motor torpedo boat squadrons.

He is a deacon in the Presbyterian Church and a Sunday school teacher. He is also a member of Delta Tau Delta social fraternity and of Sigma Delta Chi, professional journalism fraternity.

Bert Andrews

Award of a Pulitzer prize to Bert Andrews, chief of The New York Herald Tribune's Washington Bureau, marks the third time this year Mr. Andrews has been honored for distinguished reporting from the nation's capital.

He won the Pulitzer prize for his articles reporting the State Department's practices in dismissing its employes for security reasons.

On Feb. 12, for his reporting of the same story, he received the Heywood Broun Memorial Award, sponsored by the American Newspaper Guild. He had received the Heywood Broun award in 1945. On March 24 he won the Newspaper Guild of New York's Front Page Award for "distinguished Washington correspondence."

Mr. Andrews was born in Colorado Springs, Col. After three years at Stanford University, he joined The Sacramento Star, in California, in 1924. Before he joined The New York Herald Tribune in 1937, excepting for a five-month stint with the Paris (France) Herald, Mr. Andrews had worked successively for The San Diego Sun, The Chicago Herald-Examiner, The Detroit Times and The New York American. He has been his newspaper's chief Washington correspondent since 1941.

Mr. Andrews is married and the father of two children.

Nat S. Finney

A series of stories describing Government proposals to impose a form of peacetime censorship on Government facts and utterances won a Pulitzer award for Nat S. Finney of The Minneapolis Tribune's Washington Bureau. The same stories earlier had won for him the Raymond Clapper 1947 Award for "outstanding Washington reporting."

He was born in Stewartville, Minn., on Oct. 10, 1903, and received a B. A. degree from the University of Minnesota in 1927.

Mr. Finney began his newspaper career in 1925, when he became a cub reporter on The Minneapolis Star. From 1929 to 1930 he was with the publishing house of Harcourt, Brace & Co., and from 1930 to 1933 he was editor of a building trade publication.

In 1933 he returned to The Minneapolis Star as a reporter. Subsequently he was picture editor, city editor and feature editor of The Minneapolis Star Journal. In 1941, he joined the Washington Bureau of The Minneapolis Tribune.

Mr. Finney covered the 1946 Bikini atomic bomb tests, and, in 1947, wrote a series of articles from England on that country's post-war problems.

Paul W. Ward

Paul W. Ward, a member of the staff of The Baltimore Sun since 1930, has been a frequent writer on the problems of world peace in the last three years. He covered the Moscow conference of the Council of Foreign Ministers, the Dumbarton Oaks Conference of 1944, the San Francisco peace conference of 1945 and the meeting of Council of Foreign Ministers in Paris in the summer of 1946 and its later meeting of the Council in New York that November.

Mr. Ward is 42 years old and a native of Ohio. He joined the staff of The Baltimore Sun after serving for several years on the staff of The New Bedford Standard. He was transferred to The Sun's Washington Bureau after three years and in 1937 he was sent to London to take charge of The Sun's bureau there. He was in London at the outbreak of World War II.

He returned to this country in 1940. Since then, he has been serving on The Sun's Washington Bureau and most of his work has dealt with State Department news and developments in this nation's foreign relations.

Frank Cushing

Frank Cushing, photographer for The Boston Traveler who won a Pulitzer Prize for his news picture of a boy gunman and his hostage, could win only second place among his Boston colleagues in their 1947 annual contest, he grinningly recalled yesterday.

Mr. Cushing, who is 32 years of age, has been an employe of the Boston Herald-Traveler Corporation sixteen years. He began as a messenger boy in the dispatch department.

He spent three and a half years in the Army Air Force as an aerial photographer. On one of his fifty missions over North Africa and Italy, however, he took over a machine gun and brought down a German fighter plane.

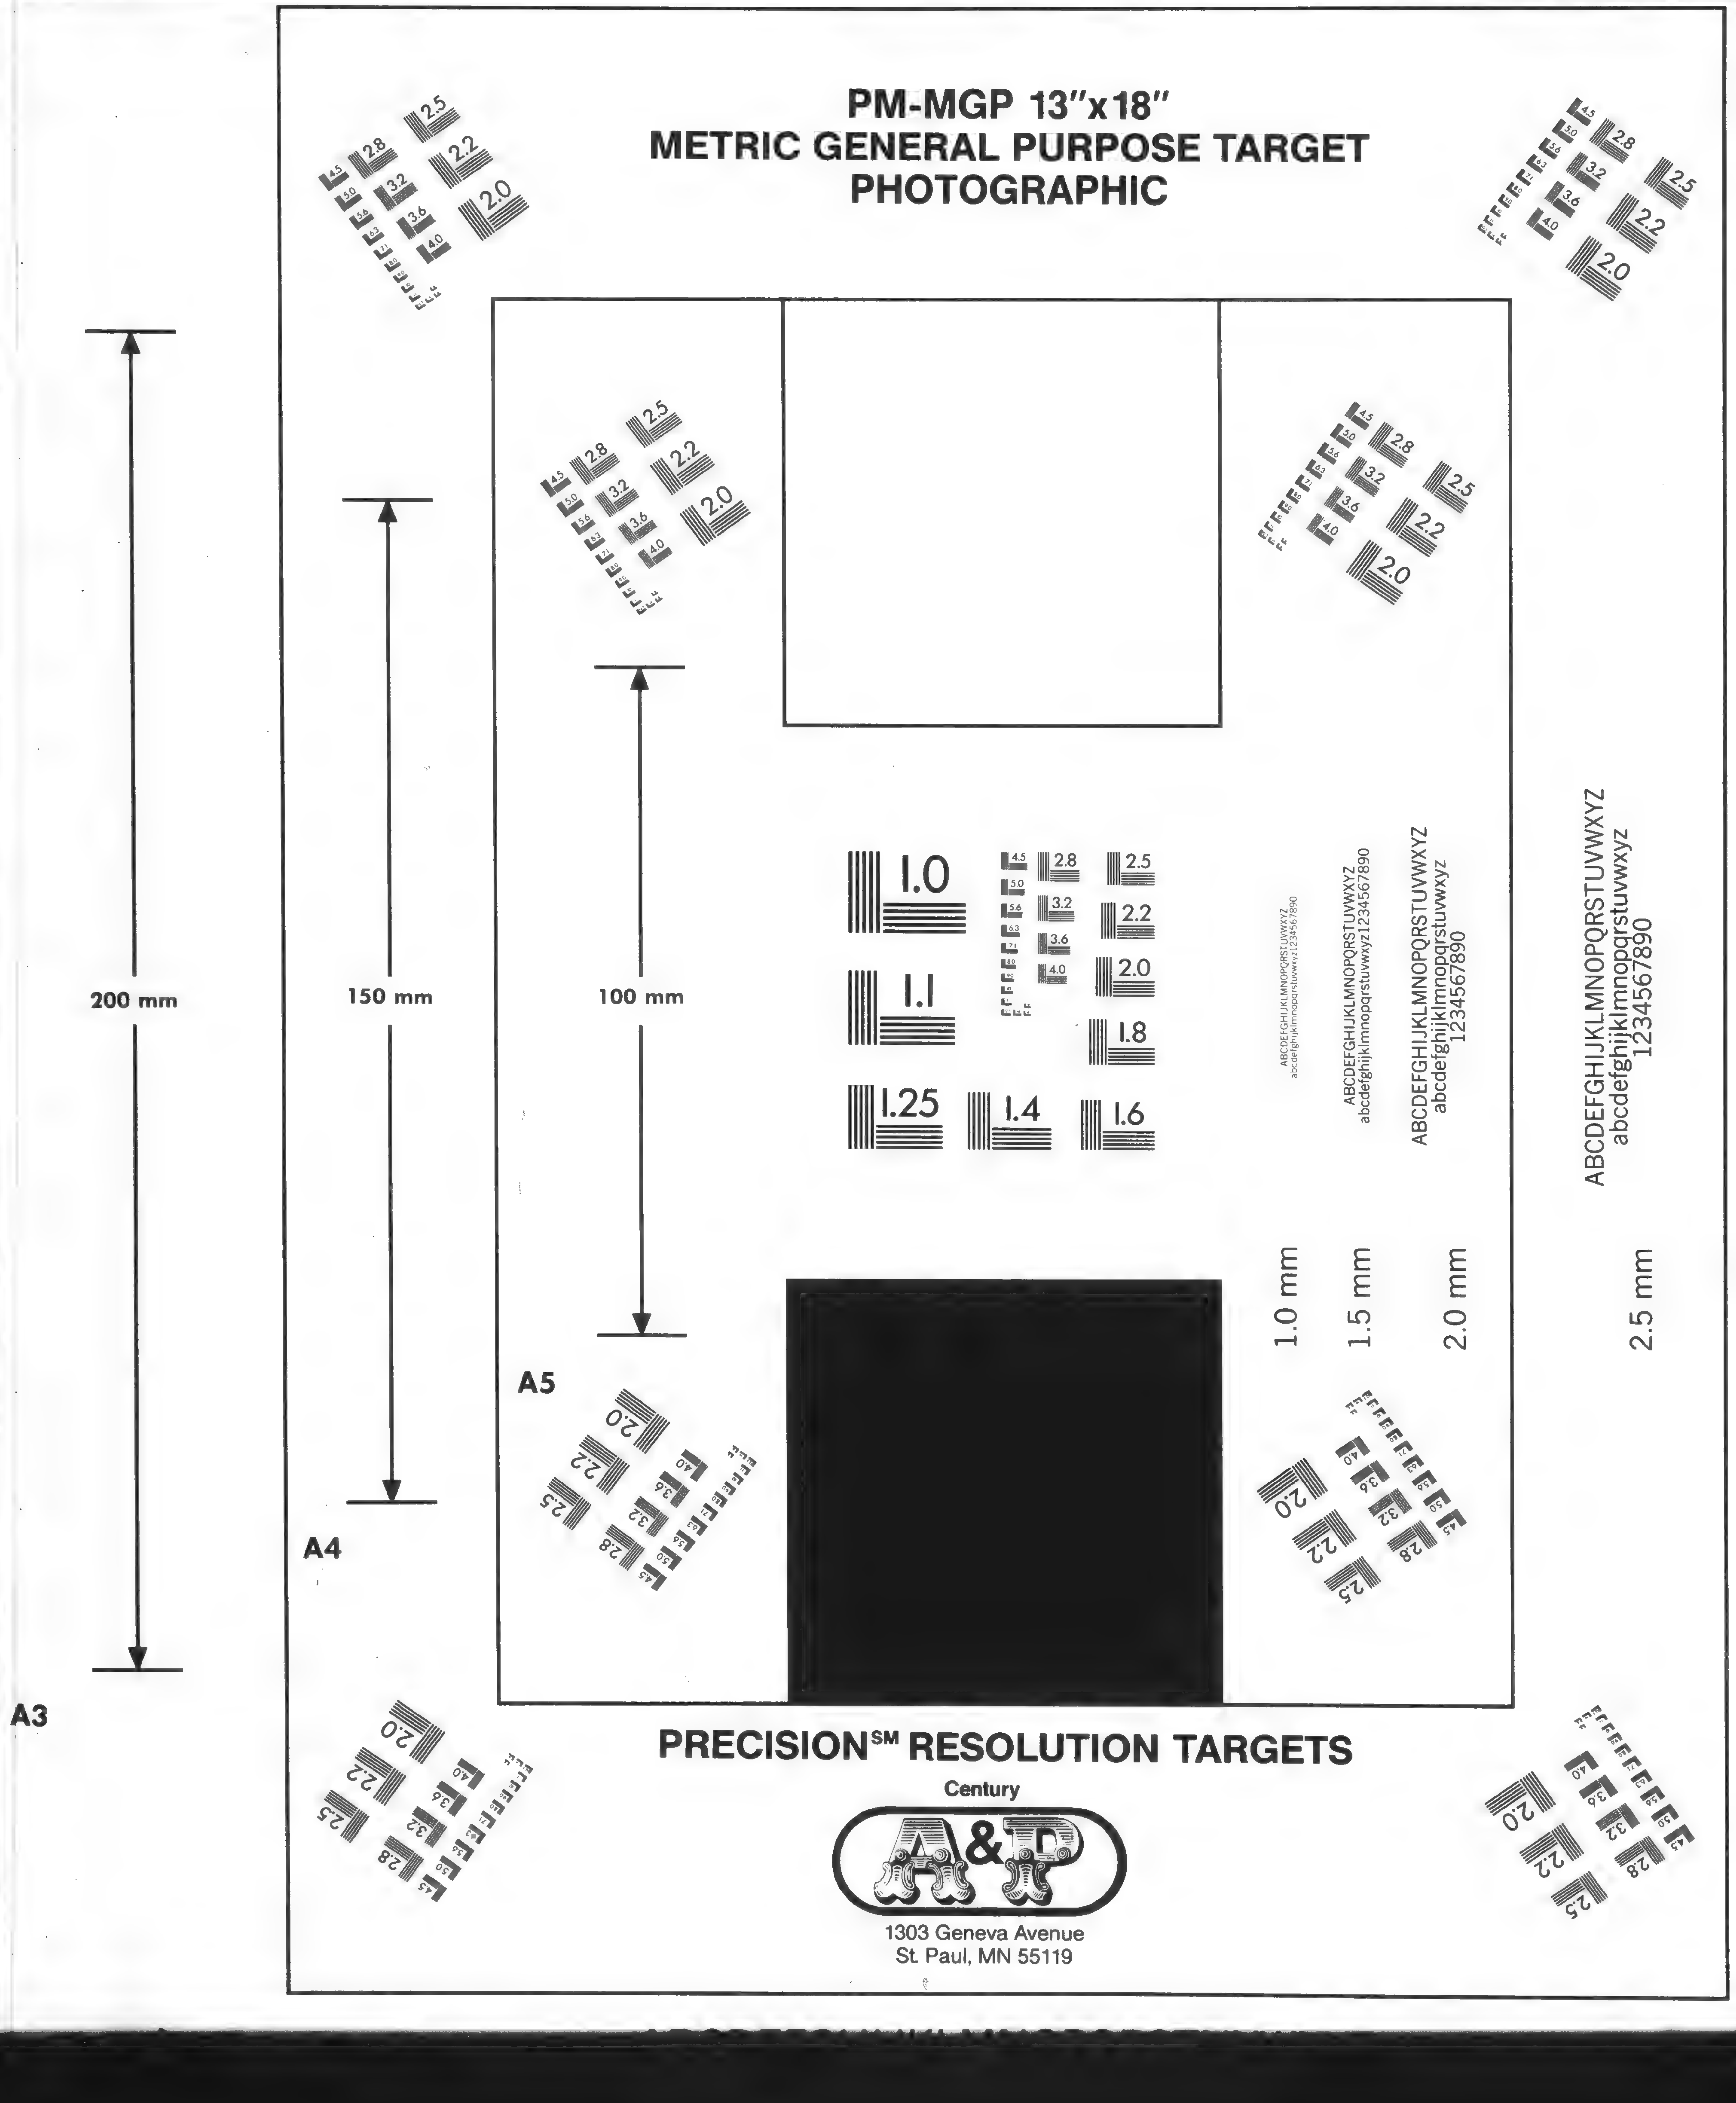
He was on another assignment, involving a $5,000 restaurant hold-up, when he heard a radio call for police cars to go to Roxbury, where a 15-year-old boy had held up a store. He offered rides to the scene to photographers from two other Boston papers but they declined.

Mr. Cushing made his picture from the second floor of a near-by house, by crawling out on the roof of an ell. The picture shows the boy gunman holding a revolver against another boy and daring the police to come and get him. They eventually did.

Mr. Cushing's picture was printed in 500 newspapers. It also won for him a first prize in a 1947 contest of the New England members and managing editors of The Associated Press.

REDUCTION
RATIO
14x

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC



200 mm
150 mm
100 mm
A3
A4
A5
1.0
1.1
1.25
1.4
1.6
1.8
2.0
2.2
2.5
2.8
3.2
3.6
4.0
4.5
5.0
5.6
6.3
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890
1.0 mm
1.5 mm
2.0 mm
2.5 mm

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century
A&P

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

THE ORIG
ROMEIKE
PRESS CLIPPINGS
220 W. 19th St., NEW YORK 11, N.Y.
Tel. CHelsea 3-8860
Cir. (D 538,914) (S 1,002,765)
This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
MAY 4 - 1948

ulitzer Prizes Go to 'Streetcar' And Michener's Stories of Pacific

By FRANK S. ADAMS

The 1948 Pulitzer Prize for the best original American play was awarded yesterday to "A Streetcar Named Desire," by Tennessee Williams. The award for the most distinguished fiction in book form went to "Tales of the South Pacific" by James A. Michener.

Dr. Frank D. Fackenthal, acting president of Columbia University, announced fourteen awards in the fields of journalism, letters and music. It was the thirty-first year of the Pulitzer Prizes, which are awarded annually by the trustees of Columbia University on recommendation of the Advisory Board of the Graduate School of Journalism.

Dr. Fackenthal himself received from the Advisory Board, meeting for the last time before his forthcoming retirement as acting president of Columbia on June 7, a scroll in recognition of his long services in connection with the development of the Pulitzer Prizes. The scroll assured him of "the Pulitzer Prize of our friendship in perpetuity."

The gold medal awarded annually "for the most disinterested and meritorious public service rendered by an American newspaper during the year," went to The St. Louis Post-Dispatch for its coverage of the mine disaster at Centralia, Ill., and its subsequent campaign for reforms in mine safety laws.

Four prizes were awarded for reporting. George E. Goodwin of The Atlanta Journal, won the prize for local reporting, for an exposé of vote frauds. Two awards were made in the field of national reporting, to Bert Andrews of The New York Herald Tribune, and Nat S. Finney of The Minneapolis Tribune. Paul W. Ward of The Baltimore Sun won the prize for reporting international affairs.

Virginius Dabney of The Richmond (Va.) Times-Dispatch won the prize for distinguished editorial writing; Reuben L. (Rube) Goldberg of The New York Sun received the similar award for a distinguished cartoon, and Frank Cushing of The Boston Traveler was named the winner of the $500 prize for the best news photograph.

The prizes in letters included awards to "Across the Wide Missouri," by Bernard DeVoto, in the field of American history; to "Forgotten First Citizen: John Bigelow," by Margaret Clapp, in the field of biography, and to "The Age of Anxiety," by W. H. Auden, in poetry.

Piston Wins Music Prize

The prize for distinguished musical composition was awarded to Walter Piston for his Symphony No. 3, which had its first performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra last January.

Each of the individual prizes carries an award of $500. The gold medal for The St. Louis Post-Dispatch is valued at the same amount.

An annual scholarship of $1,500 to the art student in America who is certified as "the most promising and deserving" by the National Academy of Design, with which the Society of American Artists has been merged, was awarded to Philip Anthony Moose of 139 West Ninety-fifth Street.

In accordance with their custom in recent years, the trustees deferred the awards of the three traveling scholarships for graduates of the School of Journalism until the completion of the academic year. These scholarships have a value of $1,500 each and are conferred upon the three highest ranking students in the class.

The Advisory Board re-elected three of its members to serve terms lasting until 1952. They were Sevellon Brown of The Providence (R. I.) Journal-Bulletin; Kent Cooper of The Associated Press, and William R. Mathews of The Arizona Daily Star of Tucson, Ariz.

The other members of the Advisory Board are Robert Choate, The Boston Herald; Gardner Cowles, The Des Moines (Ia.) Register and Tribune; Palmer Hoyt, The Denver Post; Frank R. Kent, The Baltimore Sun; John S. Knight, Knight Newspapers, Inc.; Arthur Krock, THE NEW YORK TIMES; Stuart H. Perry, The Adrian (Mich.) Telegram; Harold S. Pollard, The New York World-Telegram, and Joseph Pulitzer, The St. Louis Post-Dispatch.

Newspaper's Campaign Through

The award to The St. Louis Post-Dispatch was the result of a long campaign begun by that newspaper after the mine disaster at Centralia, Ill., which cost 111 lives on March 25, 1947. The newspaper assigned a staff of seven reporters to investigate the many ramifications of the situation, in the minefield, in Springfield, the Illinois State capital, and in the Bureau of Mines in Washington.

As a result of their news stories and the editorials and cartoons with which The Post-Dispatch followed up their efforts, the Illinois Legislature enacted two laws strengthening mine inspections; the Centralia Coal Company, operator of the mine, was indicted and fined $1,000 after it had pleaded nolo contendere, and the director of the Illinois Mines and Minerals Department resigned. He was later indicted and is awaiting trial.

Mr. Goodwin, a 30-year-old former naval officer, won the prize for local reporting by an extensive investigation of vote frauds in Telfair County, Georgia, at the general election on Nov. 5, 1946. He spent several weeks investigating the frauds before writing his

---

Sketches of Those Added by Columbia to the Roll of Pulitzer Prize Winners

THE RECIPIENTS OF 1948 PULITZER PRIZES AND TWO OF THE WINNING WORKS

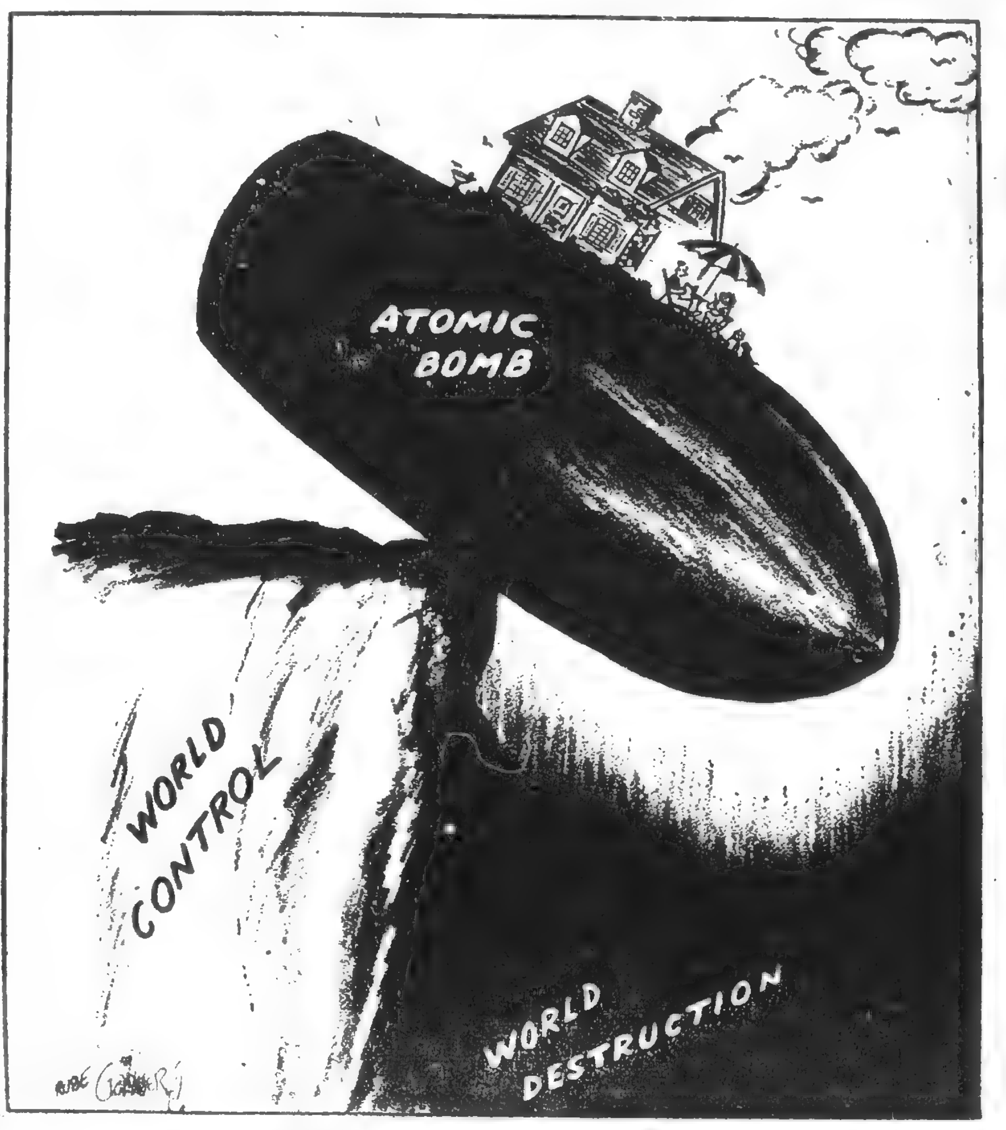
George E. Goodwin
Local Reporting

Nat S. Finney
National Reporting

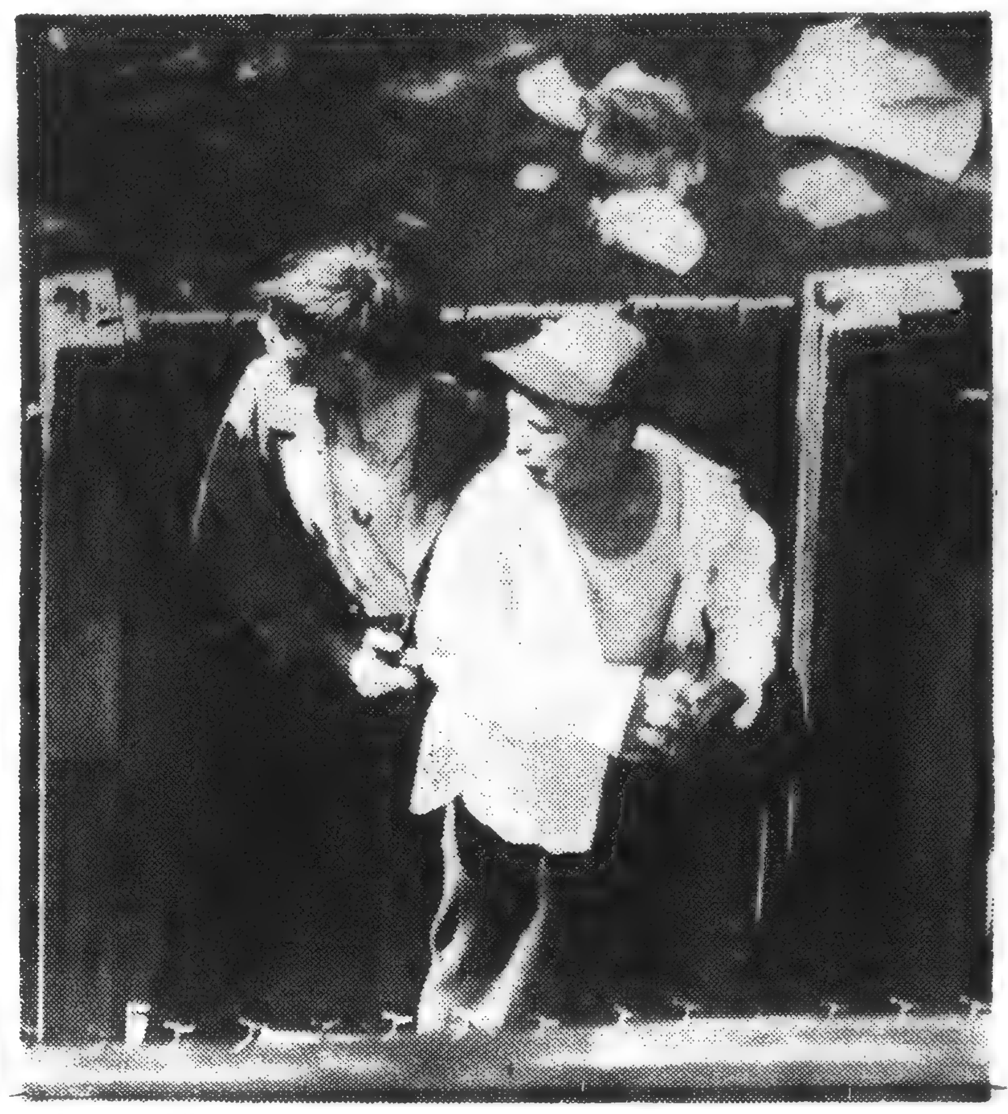
Bert Andrews
National Reporting

Paul W. Ward
International Reporting

Virginius Dabney
Editorial Writing



Rube Goldberg's cartoon. "Peace Today"



Mr. Cushing's picture, "Boy Gunman at Bay"

Reuben L. Goldberg
Cartoon

James A. Michener
Fiction

Tennessee Williams Play

Frank Cushing
Photography

W. H. Auden
Poetry

Walter Piston
Music

Margaret Clapp
Biography

Bernard DeVoto
History

Sketches of the winners of the Pulitzer awards follow:

Tennessee Williams

Tennessee Williams was born Thomas Lanier Williams in Columbus, Miss., in 1914. He abandoned his given name when he felt he had "compromised" it by the imperfection of his early writing, and he took Tennessee as a gesture to his pioneer ancestors in that state. His first play to reach Broadway, "The Glass Menagerie," won the New York Drama Critics Circle Prize in 1945.

Five years earlier his "Battle of Angels" had failed in a Boston tryout. In the interval, Mr. Williams worked as a waiter, an elevator operator, a movie usher and at other odd jobs to stay alive while continuing to write. He got a job writing scripts for the movies but it lasted only six months.

After the success of "The Glass Menagerie," he obtained a production for "You Touched Me," a play he had written earlier in collaboration with Donald Windham. This play failed, and Mr. Williams' next entry on Broadway was "A Streetcar Named Desire."

Before "Streetcar" was produced, another Williams play, "Summer and Smoke," received its first production in the Dallas (Tex.) Theatre '47 last summer under Margo Jones' direction. Miss Jones will put the play on here next season. At present Mr. Williams is continuing to write while on a visit to Italy.

James A. Michener

James A. Michener served in some capacity or other on forty-nine islands in the Pacific from Australia to Tarawa. Joining the Navy as an apprentice seaman, he presently found himself atoll-hopping as a trouble shooter in aviation maintenance. The manuscript of "Tales of the South Pacific" was almost completed when he received his appointment as senior historical officer for the area from New Guinea to Tahiti.

His volume of wartime stories was admittedly his first attempt at popular writing. Questioned about his previous publications, he recently replied cryptically that they were "professional educational books, with lots of footnotes." For some years he has been an editor in the educational department of Macmillan Company, book publishers.

Born in New York in 1907, Mr. Michener's interest in people and places has carried him to the far corners of the world. A graduate of Swarthmore College, he received scholarships to study in Europe and later sailed the Mediterranean as an able-bodied seaman in the British merchant navy.

His home is in New York. He now is at work on a novel entitled "The Homeward Journey," concerning the emotional and intellectual development of a young man during the Twenties and Thirties.

Bernard A. DeVoto

Bernard Augustine DeVoto is one of the most versatile figures in contemporary American literature. He is also one of the most prolific. From light fiction to authoritative social history, he has published an average of one book a year for the last twenty-four years. He also has edited several other volumes, too, and written hundreds of articles and essays

He has probably gained his largest audiences as a historian of America's expansion to the West. It was in this role that he published "The Year of Decision: 1846," a best-seller four years ago; and then his prize-winning "Across the Wide Missouri" last fall. This deals with the decline of American fur trade early in the Nineteenth Century.

Mr. DeVoto has carried on a virtually separate career as "John phy award, is an assistant professor of history at Brooklyn College.

The volume is her first published work. Undertaken at the suggestion of Prof. Allan Nevins at Columbia University, with whom she was taking graduate study, it brought her a Doctorate of Philosophy a year before it was published last summer.

Miss Clapp had previously traveled through much of the United States while teaching at several schools, including New Jersey College for Women. In the war years she did special research for the British Broadcasting Corporation.

A native of East Orange, N. J., which is still her permanent home, Miss Clapp was graduated from Wellesley College in 1930. She received her Master's Degree from Columbia seven years later.

posers for many years. His music in all forms has been admired for its craftsmanship and has been played throughout the world, including performances by the Philharmonic-Symphony and the Washington National and Boston Symphonies.

He was born in Rockland, Me., in 1894 and is of Italian descent. In 1924 he received his B.A. from Harvard, where he is now Professor of Music. He studied composition with Nadia Boulanger in Paris, and has held the Guggenheim and John Knowles Paine fellowships.

The Third Symphony was commissioned by the Koussevitzky Music Foundation. Other commis-

Virginius Dabney

Virginius Dabney has been editor of The Richmond Times-Dispatch for twelve years. Born at University, Va., on Feb. 8, 1901, he received a B. A. degree from the University of Virginia in 1920, and an M. A. degree in 1921.

After teaching French for a short time at the Episcopal High School in Richmond, Mr. Dabney served as a reporter on The Richmond News Leader from 1922 until 1928. In the latter year he joined the editorial staff of The Times-Dispatch, becoming chief editorial writer in 1934 and editor in 1936.

Mr. Dabney is a member of the board of directors of the Council for Democracy; the board of trustees of the Institute of Early American History and Culture; the board of directors of the Southern Regional Council and the Richmond Library Board.

He won the Lee Editorial Award of the Virginia Press Association and the Lee School of Journalism of Washington and Lee University for "distinguished editorial writing during the year 1937." He is married and has three children.

For many years the Richmond editor contributed regular articles on southern affairs to THE NEW YORK TIMES. He is the author of "Liberalism in the South" and "Below the Potomac." Last month he was re-elected as a director of the American Society of Newspaper Editors.

Rube Goldberg

In his forty-four-year career as an artist, the versatile Rube Goldberg, political cartoonist for The New York Sun, has won wide notice, especially for the amazing appliances that decorated his inventive drawings. He joined The Sun more than ten years ago.

The seed of those "inventions" was planted when he studied mining engineering at the University of Southern California, which gave him a B. S. degree in 1904.

Reuben Lucius Goldberg was born in San Francisco on July 4, 1883, a son of Max and Hannah Goldberg. At the age of 12 he studied art from a sign painter for a year and a half. "The sign painter fell off a scaffold and the lessons ended," Rube explained.

He was a cartoonist on The San Francisco Chronicle in 1904-05, then with The Bulletin there until 1907, when he began cartooning and sports writing for The New York Evening Mail. His lampooning was featured in more than 200 newspapers, but he never drew a continuity and finally, in 1936, he gave up comic strips.

His political cartooning, which started as a three-a-week proposition, is distributed by the Bell Syndicate.

He was married in 1916 to the former Irma Seaman. They have two sons, Thomas George, 29, a painter, and George W. George, 28, a Hollywood scenario writer. The Goldbergs live at 88 Central Park West and have a summer home near Northport, L. I.

George E. Goodwin

George E. Goodwin, who is a native of Atlanta, Ga., has been a reporter and feature writer on The Atlanta Georgian, The Charleston News and Courier, The Washington Times-Herald and The Miami Daily News. He joined the staff of The Atlanta Journal in the latter part of 1945. He is 30 years old.

Mr. Goodwin received his early education in the public schools of Atlanta and was graduated from Washington and Lee University in 1939. In World War II he served as a naval officer for three years. He was overseas for twenty months, serving as intelligence officer for motor torpedo boat squadrons.

He is a deacon in the Presbyterian Church and a Sunday school teacher. He is also a member of Delta Tau Delta social fraternity and of Sigma Delta Chi, professional journalism fraternity.

Bert Andrews

Award of a Pulitzer prize to Bert

Award for "distinguished Washington correspondence."

Mr. Andrews was born in Colorado Springs, Col. After three years at Stanford University, he joined The Sacramento Star, in California, in 1924. Before he joined The New York Herald Tribune in 1937, excepting for a five-month stint with the Paris (France) Herald, Mr. Andrews had worked successively for The San Diego Sun, The Chicago Herald-Examiner, The Detroit Times and The New York American. He has been his newspaper's chief Washington correspondent since 1941.

Mr. Andrews is married and the father of two children.

Nat S. Finney

A series of stories describing Government proposals to impose a form of peacetime censorship on Government facts and utterances won a Pulitzer award for Nat S. Finney of The Minneapolis Tribune's Washington Bureau. The same stories earlier had won for him the Raymond Clapper 1947 Award for "outstanding Washington reporting."

He was born in Stewartville, Minn., on Oct. 10, 1903, and received a B. A. degree from the University of Minnesota in 1927.

Mr. Finney began his newspaper career in 1925, when he became a cub reporter on The Minneapolis Star. From 1929 to 1930 he was with the publishing house of Harcourt, Brace & Co., and from 1930 to 1933 he was editor of a building trade publication.

In 1933 he returned to The Minneapolis Star as a reporter. Subsequently he was picture editor, city editor and feature editor of The Minneapolis Star Journal. In 1941, he joined the Washington Bureau of The Minneapolis Tribune.

Mr. Finney covered the 1946 Bikini atomic bomb tests, and, in 1947, wrote a series of articles from England on that country's post-war problems.

Paul W. Ward

Paul W. Ward, a member of the staff of The Baltimore Sun since 1930, has been a frequent writer on the problems of world peace in the last three years. He covered the Moscow conference of the Council of Foreign Ministers, the Dumbarton Oaks Conference of 1944, the San Francisco peace conference of 1945 and the meeting of Council of Foreign Ministers in Paris in the summer of 1946 and its later meeting of the Council in New York that November.

Mr. Ward is 42 years old and a native of Ohio. He joined the staff of The Baltimore Sun after serving for several years on the staff of The New Bedford Standard. He was transferred to The Sun's Washington Bureau after three years and in 1937 he was sent to London to take charge of The Sun's bureau there. He was in London at the outbreak of World War II.

He returned to this country in 1940. Since then, he has been serving on The Sun's Washington Bureau and most of his work has dealt with State Department news and developments in this nation's foreign relations.

Frank Cushing

Frank Cushing, photographer for The Boston Traveler who won a Pulitzer Prize for his news picture of a boy gunman and his hostage, could win only second place among his Boston colleagues in their 1947 annual contest, he grinningly recalled yesterday.

Mr. Cushing, who is 32 years of age, has been an employe of the Boston Herald-Traveler Corporation sixteen years. He began as a messenger boy in the dispatch department.

He spent three and a half years in the Army Air Force as an aerial photographer. On one of his fifty missions over North Africa and Italy, however, he took over a machine gun and brought down a German fighter plane.

He was on another assignment, involving a $5,000 restaurant hold-up, when he heard a radio call for

[148]

Academy of Design, with which the Society of American Artists has been merged, was awarded to Philip Anthony Moose of 139 West Ninety-fifth Street.

In accordance with their custom in recent years, the trustees deferred the awards of the three traveling scholarships for graduates of the School of Journalism until the completion of the academic year. These scholarships have a value of $1,500 each and are conferred upon the three highest ranking students in the class.

The Advisory Board re-elected three of its members to serve terms lasting until 1952. They were Sevellon Brown of The Providence (R. I.) Journal-Bulletin; Kent Cooper of The Associated Press, and William R. Mathews of The Arizona Daily Star of Tucson, Ariz.

The other members of the Advisory Board are Robert Choate, The Boston Herald; Gardner Cowles, The Des Moines (Ia.) Register and Tribune; Palmer Hoyt, The Denver Post; Frank R. Kent, The Baltimore Sun; John S. Knight, Knight Newspapers, Inc.; Arthur Krock, THE NEW YORK TIMES; Stuart H. Perry, The Adrian (Mich.) Telegram; Harold S. Pollard, The New York World-Telegram, and Joseph Pulitzer, The St. Louis Post-Dispatch.

Newspaper's Campaign Through

The award to The St. Louis Post-Dispatch was the result of a long campaign begun by that newspaper after the mine disaster at Centralia, Ill., which cost 111 lives on March 25, 1947. The newspaper assigned a staff of seven reporters to investigate the many ramifications of the situation, in the minefield, in Springfield, the Illinois State capital, and in the Bureau of Mines in Washington.

As a result of their news stories and the editorials and cartoons with which The Post-Dispatch followed up their efforts, the Illinois Legislature enacted two laws strengthening mine inspections; the Centralia Coal Company, operator of the mine, was indicted and fined $1,000 after it had pleaded nolo contendere, and the director of the Illinois Mines and Minerals Department resigned. He was later indicted and is awaiting trial.

Mr. Goodwin, a 30-year-old former naval officer, won the prize for local reporting by an extensive investigation of vote frauds in Telfair County, Georgia, at the general election on Nov. 5, 1946. He spent several weeks investigating the frauds before writing his stories, which appeared in The Atlanta Journal beginning March 2, 1947.

2 National Affairs Awards

Mr. Andrews received one of the two awards for reporting on national affairs for his stories on the State Department's loyalty inquiry, the first of which appeared in The New York Herald Tribune on Nov. 1. They told in detail of the way in which an unnamed State Department employe had been dismissed as a bad security risk, without having had an opportunity to defend himself.

The award to Mr. Finney was for a series of articles charging the Truman Administration with planning to put the ordinary affairs of Federal civilian agencies under a system of censorship. His first story on this subject appeared in The Minneapolis Tribune Oct. 19.

Mr. Ward won the prize for international reporting for a series of stories on daily life in the Soviet Union, for which he conducted research while he was in Moscow for the meeting of the Council of Foreign Ministers early in 1947. After his return to this country he wrote a series of nineteen articles that appeared in The Baltimore Sun between April 30 and May 18, 1947.

The award of the prize for editorial writing to Mr. Dabney was made on the basis of his entire volume of work during 1947. The terms of this award provide that the test of excellence shall be "clearness of style, moral purpose, sound reasoning and power to influence public opinion in what the writer conceives to be the right direction."

Mr. Goldberg, veteran cartoonist of the New York Sun, won the prize for cartoons for a drawing that appeared in that newspaper on July 22. It showed a huge atomic bomb, with a house and family on top, perched precariously on a cliff labeled "World Control," but threatening to topple into a gulf marked "World Destruction."

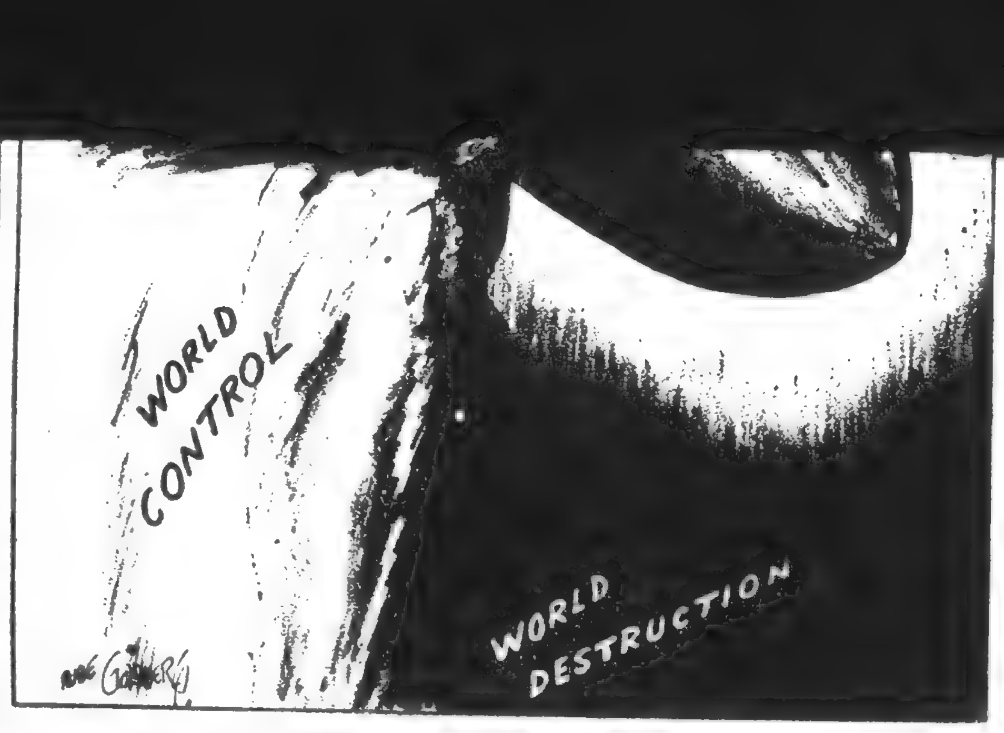
Picture of Fight with Police

The prize for news photography was won by Mr. Cushing through a picture captioned "Boy Gunman at Bay," which appeared in The Boston Traveler of June 23, 1947. It showed a youthful gunman who was engaged in a pistol fight with the police, holding a school boy in front of him as a shield. Mr. Cushing heard of the battle over a police radio while on another assignment in the vicinity, and took the picture before the police overpowered the thug.

The victory of "A Streetcar Named Desire" marked the second time that the Pulitzer Prize and the New York Drama Critics Award have gone to the same play. The only other time was in 1940, when William Saroyan's "The Time of Your Life," received both awards. Mr. Saroyan rejected the Pulitzer prize, but Columbia informed him that the award would remain in the Pulitzer records, notwithstanding his attitude.

Mr. Michener's book is not a novel, but a collection of short stories. It was published by the Macmillan Company. Mr. DeVoto's prize-winning history was published by Houghton Miflin Company; the prize-winning biography by Margaret Clapp was published by Little Brown & Co., and Mr. Auden's volume of verse was published by Random House.

A musical version of "Tales of the South Pacific" is being prepared by the well-known collaborating team of Richard Rodgers and Oscar Hammerstein 2d. They also will present the show in the fall in conjunction with Leland Hayward and Joshua Logan.



Rube Goldberg's cartoon, "Peace Today"

Mr. Cushing's picture, "Boy Gunman at Bay"

Reuben L. Goldberg
Cartoon

James A. Michener
Fiction

Tennessee Williams Play

Frank Cushing
Photography

W. H. Auden
Poetry

Walter Piston
Music

Margaret Clapp
Biography

Bernard DeVoto
History

James A. Michener

James A. Michener served in some capacity or other on forty-nine islands in the Pacific from Australia to Tarawa. Joining the Navy as an apprentice seaman, he presently found himself atoll-hopping as a trouble shooter in aviation maintenance. The manuscript of "Tales of the South Pacific" was almost completed when he received his appointment as senior historical officer for the area from New Guinea to Tahiti.

His volume of wartime stories was admittedly his first attempt at popular writing. Questioned about his previous publications, he recently replied cryptically that they were "professional educational books, with lots of footnotes." For some years he has been an editor in the educational department of Macmillan Company, book publishers.

Born in New York in 1907, Mr. Michener's interest in people and places has carried him to the far corners of the world. A graduate of Swarthmore College, he received scholarships to study in Europe and later sailed the Mediterranean as an able-bodied seaman in the British merchant navy.

His home is in New York. He now is at work on a novel entitled "The Homeward Journey," concerning the emotional and intellectual development of a young man during the Twenties and Thirties.

Bernard A. DeVoto

Bernard Augustine DeVoto is one of the most versatile figures in contemporary American literature. He is also one of the most prolific. From light fiction to authoritative social history, he has published an average of one book a year for the last twenty-four years. He also has edited several other volumes, too, and written hundreds of articles and essays

He has probably gained his largest audiences as a historian of America's expansion to the West. It was in this role that he published "The Year of Decision: 1846," a best-seller four years ago; and then his prize-winning "Across the Wide Missouri" last fall. This deals with the decline of American fur trade early in the Nineteenth Century.

Mr. DeVoto has carried on a virtually separate career as "John August." Under this pen name, he has written several novels and dozens of "slick" magazine stories, which he says have paid for the time he spends in study and serious work.

A former instructor at Northwestern University and at Harvard, Mr. DeVoto contributes a monthly article to Harper's Magazine. Although a native of Utah, he has lived in Cambridge, Mass., for almost a quarter of a century.

Margaret Clapp

Miss Margaret Clapp, whose "Forgotten First Citizen: John Bigelow" won this year's biography award, is an assistant professor of history at Brooklyn College.

The volume is her first published work. Undertaken at the suggestion of Prof. Allan Nevins at Columbia University, with whom she was taking graduate study, it brought her a Doctorate of Philosophy a year before it was published last summer.

Miss Clapp had previously traveled through much of the United States while teaching at several schools, including New Jersey College for Women. In the war years she did special research for the British Broadcasting Corporation.

A native of East Orange, N. J., which is still her permanent home, Miss Clapp was graduated from Wellesley College in 1930. She received her Master's Degree from Columbia seven years later.

Now engaged in teaching courses in American history covering the periods from 1876 to the outbreak of the First World War and also the contemporary era, she said last evening that he was "looking about at various subjects" for a second book, but "nothing is definite yet."

W. H. Auden

Wystan Hugh Auden, who won the Pulitzer Prize for Poetry with "The Age of Anxiety: A Baroque Eclogue," is considered by many to have had, except for T. S. Eliot, the greatest influence on the modern generation of poets.

An American citizen since 1946, Mr. Auden was born in England in 1907. Educated at Gresham's School, Holt, and at Christ Church, Oxford, he first attracted attention in the early thirties when with Stephen Spender and C. Day Lewis he joined the cult of those bent on rebelling against their own heritage.

When he arrived in the United States last year, Mr. Spender said of his long-time friend that he was "the most successful intellectual poet since Alexander Pope." Arthur Koestler declared recently that "he has unquestioned genius."

Mr. Auden was honored in England with the King's Gold Medal in 1937 in recognition of his meritorious work as a young poet. He received an award of merit from the American Academy of Arts and Letters and the National Institute of Arts and Letters in 1945.

Mr. Auden is the author of "Poems" (1930); "The Ascent of F6" (1937), and "The Double Man" (1941). With Christopher Isherwood he collaborated on "Journey to a War" (1939), and "On the Frontier" (1939).

Walter Piston

Walter Piston has ranked as one of America's outstanding composers for many years. His music in all forms has been admired for its craftsmanship and has been played throughout the world, including performances by the Philharmonic-Symphony and the Washington National and Boston Symphonies.

He was born in Rockland, Me., in 1894 and is of Italian descent. In 1924 he received his B.A. from Harvard, where he is now Professor of Music. He studied composition with Nadia Boulanger in Paris, and has held the Guggenheim and John Knowles Paine fellowships.

The Third Symphony was commissioned by the Koussevitzky Music Foundation. Other commissions were awarded by the League of Composers (Quintet for Flute and String Quartet); the Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge Foundation (Partita for Violin, Viola and Organ); the International Society for Contemporary Music (Divertimento for Nine Instruments); the Alice M. Ditson Fund (Second Symphony); the Columbia Broadcasting System and the Dallas Symphony Orchestra.

He has also been active in the League of Composers, the Paderewski Fund for the Encouragement of American Composers and the Lili Boulanger Memorial Fund. He is the author of "Principles of Harmonic Analysis," "Harmony" and "Counterpoint."

berg, political cartoonist for The New York Sun, has won wide notice, especially for the amazing appliances that decorated his inventive drawings. He joined The Sun more than ten years ago.

The seed of those "inventions" was planted when he studied mining engineering at the University of Southern California, which gave him a B. S. degree in 1904.

Reuben Lucius Goldberg was born in San Francisco on July 4, 1883, a son of Max and Hannah Goldberg. At the age of 12 he studied art from a sign painter for a year and a half. "The sign painter fell off a scaffold and the lessons ended," Rube explained.

He was a cartoonist on The San Francisco Chronicle in 1904-05, then with The Bulletin there until 1907, when he began cartooning and sports writing for The New York Evening Mail. His lampooning was featured in more than 200 newspapers, but he never drew a continuity and finally, in 1936, he gave up comic strips.

His political cartooning, which started as a three-a-week proposition, is distributed by the Bell Syndicate.

He was married in 1916 to the former Irma Seaman. They have two sons, Thomas George, 29, a painter, and George W. George, 28, a Hollywood scenario writer. The Goldbergs live at 88 Central Park West and have a summer home near Northport, L. I.

George E. Goodwin

George E. Goodwin, who is a native of Atlanta, Ga., has been a reporter and feature writer on The Atlanta Georgian, The Charleston News and Courier, The Washington Times-Herald and The Miami Daily News. He joined the staff of The Atlanta Journal in the latter part of 1945. He is 30 years old.

Mr. Goodwin received his early education in the public schools of Atlanta and was graduated from Washington and Lee University in 1939. In World War II he served as a naval officer for three years. He was overseas for twenty months, serving as intelligence officer for motor torpedo boat squadrons.

He is a deacon in the Presbyterian Church and a Sunday school teacher. He is also a member of Delta Tau Delta social fraternity and of Sigma Delta Chi, professional journalism fraternity.

Bert Andrews

Award of a Pulitzer prize to Bert Andrews, chief of The New York Herald Tribune's Washington Bureau, marks the third time this year Mr. Andrews has been honored for distinguished reporting from the nation's capital.

He won the Pulitzer prize for his articles reporting the State Department's practices in dismissing its employes for security reasons.

On Feb. 12, for his reporting of the same story, he received the Heywood Broun Memorial Award, sponsored by the American Newspaper Guild. He had received the Heywood Broun award in 1945. On March 24 he won the Newspaper Guild of New York's Front Page sequently he was picture editor, city editor and feature editor of The Minneapolis Star Journal. In 1941, he joined the Washington Bureau of The Minneapolis Tribune.

Mr. Finney covered the 1946 Bikini atomic bomb tests, and, in 1947, wrote a series of articles from England on that country's post-war problems.

Paul W. Ward

Paul W. Ward, a member of the staff of The Baltimore Sun since 1930, has been a frequent writer on the problems of world peace in the last three years. He covered the Moscow conference of the Council of Foreign Ministers, the Dumbarton Oaks Conference of 1944, the San Francisco peace conference of 1945 and the meeting of Council of Foreign Ministers in Paris in the summer of 1946 and its later meeting of the Council in New York that November.

Mr. Ward is 42 years old and a native of Ohio. He joined the staff of The Baltimore Sun after serving for several years on the staff of The New Bedford Standard. He was transferred to The Sun's Washington Bureau after three years and in 1937 he was sent to London to take charge of The Sun's bureau there. He was in London at the outbreak of World War II.

He returned to this country in 1940. Since then, he has been serving on The Sun's Washington Bureau and most of his work has dealt with State Department news and developments in this nation's foreign relations.

Frank Cushing

Frank Cushing, photographer for The Boston Traveler who won a Pulitzer Prize for his news picture of a boy gunman and his hostage, could win only second place among his Boston colleagues in their 1947 annual contest, he grinningly recalled yesterday.

Mr. Cushing, who is 32 years of age, has been an employe of the Boston Herald-Traveler Corporation sixteen years. He began as a messenger boy in the dispatch department.

He spent three and a half years in the Army Air Force as an aerial photographer. On one of his fifty missions over North Africa and Italy, however, he took over a machine gun and brought down a German fighter plane.

He was on another assignment, involving a $5,000 restaurant hold-up, when he heard a radio call for police cars to go to Roxbury, where a 15-year-old boy had held up a store. He offered rides to the scene to photographers from two other Boston papers but they declined.

Mr. Cushing made his picture from the second floor of a near-by house, by crawling out on the roof of an ell. The picture shows the boy gunman holding a revolver against another boy and daring the police to come and get him. They eventually did.

Mr. Cushing's picture was printed in 500 newspapers. It also won for him a first prize in a 1947 contest of the New England members and managing editors of The Associated Press.

INFORMATION OBSCURED

THE MUSIC JOURNAL

D TED TO THE ADVANCEMENT OF MUSIC IN AMERICA

A Living usic Culture

SERGI SSEVITZKY

The distinguished co of the Boston Symphony Orchestra discusses th of a living musical culture and compares Americ ope in this respect.

our time people to a ousness. Musi est to ach
It is,
and aim in the masse in music living co people, and and living con and their elders
sional music.
of a living say, in ge ducing musical we divide i is the plan development– professional mu-than the reach of in some deof general mu-is to bring the

to music and sic into life.
manner, but ral culture, in a more im-professional ation, just because of

of the masses,
the course of culprocess of its development. In the sense in which we understand it, this problem is new to music, and up to now has been little developed. Its solution requires new methods of work because it depends on the sensitiveness of the leader-professionals and on their ability to bring music closer to the general public, but remaining at all times on that higher level, on which art at the given moment stands.

The active drawing of the wide masses nearer to music consists in breaking down the artificial barriers between the initiated and the uninitiated, and in making the language of music as accessible to the general understanding and emotion as is the spoken language. But the most important step of all is to introduce into the consciousness of listeners the truly spiritual essence of music, which stands high above the level of mere amusement and entertainment.

One of the greatest vices of European culture (of art, at any rate) has been that art was detached from the people. Fortunately, this is not true in America to any such extent as in Europe. It is largely up to us, leaders in this field, to act in such a way as to make a severance between musical culture and the people impossible in the future.

That is why we place such heavy emphasis on the problem of general musical education. The people must be linked with music organically and not merely by accident based on mutual sympathy or taste. The strength of this link is the guarantee of the entire future growth of music in the country.

The second main plan is concerned with the professional sphere of music, which from our point of view is directly connected with the first plan of extra-professional musical education.

If the professional sphere does not develop as a natural product of the first plan and receive living nourishment from it, it will inevitably die, turning into academism, regardless of whether it be called Classicism or Modernism. Therefore, the basic principle in this field is freedom from any kind of routine and the establishment of a link between musical execution, truly free musical creative work, and the living cultural consciousness.

We believe that every artist and worker in the field of art must stand vigilantly at his post, "on guard" in whatever place and in whatever capacity. This means that he must so serve his cause that it be a service to the common work of tential composers than the old European systems of patronage, in which so often promising young talents were found more or less by chance, came to the notice of wealthy or influential persons, and were dependent on the latters' bounty for education.

(Continued on page 78)

---

America is a musical nation, full of talent. Some of its finest composition potential has for years been going into Tin-Pan Alley—it had nowhere else to go. The modern college department should be able to attract more and more of this country's composer talent to itself, give it proper training in composition, and, which is so important, accompany this training with the

THE MUSIC JOURNAL
TED TO THE ADVANCEMENT OF MUSIC IN AMERICA

Living usic Culture

SERGE SSEVITZKY

The distinguished c of the Boston Symphony Orchestra discusses th of a living musical culture and compares Americ ope in this respect.

time people to a sciousness. Music eatest to ach
It is,
and aim in the masse in music living co people, and
and living con
and their elders
ssional music.
of a living
say, in gen ducing musical we divide it

re is the plan development—professional mu-in the reach of tial in some deof general mu-is to bring the
to music and sic into life.
manner, but

ral culture, in s a more imeven professional tion, just because of
of the masses,
the course of cul
ery process of its development. In the sense in which we understand it, this problem is new to music, and up to now has been little developed. Its solution requires new methods of work because it depends on the sensitiveness of the leader-professionals and on their ability to bring music closer to the general public, but remaining at all times on that higher level, on which art at the given moment stands.

The active drawing of the wide masses nearer to music consists in breaking down the artificial barriers between the initiated and the uninitiated, and in making the language of music as accessible to the general understanding and emotion as is the spoken language. But the most important step of all is to introduce into the consciousness of listeners the truly spiritual essence of music, which stands high above the level of mere amusement and entertainment.

One of the greatest vices of European culture (of art, at any rate) has been that art was detached from the people. Fortunately, this is not true in America to any such extent as in Europe. It is largely up to us, leaders in this field, to act in such a way as to make a severance between musical culture and the people impossible in the future.

That is why we place such heavy emphasis on the problem of general musical education. The people must be linked with music organically and not merely by accident based on mutual sympathy or taste. The strength of this link is the guarantee of the entire future growth of music in the country.

The second main plan is concerned with the professional sphere of music, which from our point of view is directly connected with the first plan of extra-professional musical education.

If the professional sphere does not develop as a natural product of the first plan and receive living nourishment from it, it will inevitably die, turning into academism, regardless of whether it be called Classicism or Modernism. Therefore, the basic principle in this field is freedom from any kind of routine and the establishment of a link between musical execution, truly free musical creative work, and the living cultural consciousness.

We believe that every artist and worker in the field of art must stand vigilantly at his post, "on guard" in whatever place and in whatever capacity. This means that he must so serve his cause that it be a service to the common work of culture, defending it from inner decline and outer disruption.

(Continued on page 78)

KOUSSEVITZKY

(Continued from page 11)

It must not be forgotten that the only ground for our authority is the love for us and for our work, and if this were absent all else would be futility and emptiness however well we might be "armed" with knowledge and skill.

For such love to be able to arise it is necessary, first of all, that we ourselves do not merely smoulder, but keep aflame with love for that which we serve and those whom we serve—for living art and living men.

[148]

LEWISTON, ME.
SUN
JUN 11 1948

Koussevitzky Will Resign At Close of Current Season

The resignation of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky at the end of the season 1948-1949, as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, on the completion of 25 years of service, was announced recently by Henry B. Cabot, president of the trustees. He made the announcement at the annual meeting of the Society of Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall.

The Silver Jubilee season of Serge Koussevitzky will round out a period of service almost twice as long as that of any previous conductor (Wilhelm Gerick's two terms totalled 13 years, 1884-1889 and 1898-1906). During these years he has become a familiar figure in the musical life of this country, not only by the orchestra's numerous tours, but also by its weekly nation-wide ABC broadcasts. His outstanding performances as conductor will be perpetuated by a long list of recordings.

Features are planned in honor of the anniversary and Silver Jubilee season. Dr. Koussevitzky will conduct the Berkshire Festivals of 1948 and 1949. He will remain the director of the Berkshire Music Center, the Summer school of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, founded at Tanglewood in 1940. The Berkshire Music Center is the realization of Dr. Koussevitzky's lifelong plan to develop a school where young musicians of exceptional talent may have the experience of performance in association with foremost professional musicians. The school has produced conductors, players and singers who have figured notably in the orchestra's performances and who have made their mark in other musical organizations throughout the country.

The trustees, aware that the orchestra's eminence has depended upon long and continuous association with a single conductor, have taken immediate steps toward maintaining the line of its past. They have invited Charles Munch to succeed Serge Koussevitzky, and the Parisian conductor, before sailing for Europe, signed a contract to become the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra beginning with its 69th season in October, 1949. Mr. Munch will fulfill Spring engagements as conductor in France, Holland and Belgium.

As was the case with Serge Koussevitzky, now 74, Charles Munch will come to this orchestra in the prime of his life, from Europe, and with an illustrious career to commend him. He was born at Strasburg, Alsace, on September 26, 1891, of a French mother and an Alsatian father. His first teacher was his father, Ernest Munch, who was the director of the Choeur Saint-Guillaume at Strasbourg. He has two brothers who have likewise distinguished themselves musically. The chosen instrument of Charles Munch was the violin, which he studied with his father and later with Lucien Capet at Paris and Carl Flesch at Berlin. In 1919 he was made professor of the Strasbourg Conservatory and conductor of the orchestra there. Going to Leipzig in 1926, he served as concert master in the Gewandhaur Orchestra under Wilhelm Furtwangler. In 1932 he went to Paris and after conducting concerts of the Paris Symphony Orchestra, the Lamoureux Orchestra and the Straram Orchestra, he founded the Paris Philharmonic Orchestra, of which he has since been the regular conductor. In 1938 he succeeded Philippe Gaubert as conductor of the Paris Conservatory Orchestra, a position he likewise still holds. Mr Munch first came to this country last season and made his first American appearance conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra as guest on December 27, 1946. Last season and this he has made guest appearances in a number of American cities, conducting the Boston Symphony concerts.

VALLEJO, CALIF.
MORNING TIMES-HERALD
JUN 13 1948

French Orchestra To Tour America

For the first time since 1920-21, when Toscanini brought the La Scala Orchestra from Milan for a tour of the United States, a major European symphony orchestra will tour this country. The French Orchestra National, under the direction of Charles Munch, will arrive in New York on October 13. The tour will be under the auspices of the French government, which has made all transportation arrangements, and will take a minimum of six weeks.

Charles Munch, by the way, has been announced as the successor to Serge Koussevitzky when he retires from the Boston Symphony in 1949. Founder of the Paris Philharmonic Orchestra in 1932, Munch is also conductor of the Paris Conservatory Orchestra. He made his American debut in Boston in 1946.

Koussevitzky will have completed twenty-five years with the Boston orchestra when he retires following the Berkshire festival in 1949.

DENVER, COLO.
POST
JUN 18 1948

Lowells, Cabots, Lodges Make Way for Muenchs

BOSTON, June 18. — (UP) — The un-New Englandish name of Muench promises to become a power in this realm of the Lowells, Cabots and Lodges. Charles Muench will take over the baton of Serge Koussevitzky as permanent conductor of the Boston symphony next spring and Charles Muench, president of Hood Rubber company, has just become president of the Chamber of Commerce. The two men are not related.

MONTGOMERY, ALA.
ALABAMA JOURNAL
JUN 8- 1948

Muenches Move In

BOSTON — (AP) — The un-New Englandish name of Muench may become a power in this realm of Lowells, Cabots and Lodges. Charles Muench will take over the baton of Serge Koussevitzky as permanent conductor of the Boston Symphony next Spring, and Charles Lawrence Muench, president of Hood Rubber Co., has just become president of the Chamber of Commerce. The two are not related.

MATTER OF MUSIC

June 20 1948

Pronouncing Mr. Munch's Name Rightly and Other Topics Following From That

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Symphony Hall has let it be known that Dr. Koussevitzky's successor, who takes over in the fall of '49, and who has heretofore been identified to the readers of this and most other American newspapers as Charles Muench, wishes that in future his name be spelled Munch, and pronounced in the French fashion. We have here the troubling business of the German umlaut. For Mr. Munch's name is German, or rather Alsatian; and when he came along, that amounted to the same thing. Incidentally, his mother was French, and in the matter of racial characteristics, he takes after her. There is nothing of the stolid Teuton about him, and his way with German music is sometimes quite unorthodox.

CLOSER TO "PINCH"

The umlaut is, of course, the two little dots that appear over the "u" in Mr. Munch's name and which give it the sound of the French "u," something closer to "pinch" than it is to "punch." Most American newspapers do not provide umlauts, accents, cedillas and the like. When there is an umlaut, as you probably know, you merely insert an "e" after the vowel over which it is placed. To stick to musical names and titles, you do it in the case of Buelow. "Tannhaeuser," Schoenberg, "Der Freischuetz" etc. Once in a while a writer makes bold to Anglicize the name of a character in opera, as Shaw does in "The Perfect Wagnerite," when he substitutes Brynhild for the awkward Bruennhilde. He also writes Mimmy for Mime, Loki for Loge, Alberic for Alberich and Sieglinda for Sieglinde. When pronounced they sound okay.

It is Mr. Munch's name, and he has a right to say how it shall be written. But I am afraid he doesn't know the American public's penchant for pronouncing foreign names the way they look. When his name becomes a household word, as Koussevitzky's is now, some households will think of it as rhyming with lunch, and it will suggest to them what the dictionary defines as "chewing with an audible crunching sound."

Handel Had Problem

When he went to England, Handel was in a similar fix. His surname was Handel, with an umlaut over the "a," and you will often see it on programs as Haendel. At first he made it Hendel and finally settled for Handel, which is really the proper spelling today, though the Germans have never accepted it. For them he is still Haendel.

At least "le beau Charles," as his French lady admirers call him, would not be the first conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to have his name mispronounced. The present incumbent protected himself by getting rid of that ever-confusing "w." When he first spelled his name with Latin characters, he made it Kussewitzky. At least, that is how it appears in the older lexicons. You often heard Monteux called Montoe. And as for Muck, a lot of people made it rhyme with duck, and the connotation was not a flattering one. Another faction preferred Mewk. George Szell, now in Cleveland, was in line for the job. My pronouncing biographical dictionary makes it "shell." Most people say "zell." Actually, "sell" is correct. It's a nice mess.

In that it sounds the same (supposedly) to everyone and is written in a standardized notation, music may be called the one truly international language. Nevertheless, it is still not all plain sailing. In the 19th century, first German, then French, and finally English and American composers began to use their own language for tempo indications and expression marks, in place of the customary Italian. They did the same thing with the names of instruments. Beethoven, a pioneer in this respect, adopted German expression marks in his Sonata, Opus 90, and a few subsequent works, and he called Opus 106 a "Grosser Sonate fuer das Hammerklavier."

In scores you will encounter Violino, Violon, Violin, Geige and even Fiddle. As the expressive range of music increased, the indications for performance in Italian, German, French and English became more and more elaborate and explicit. Scriabin used some of the most extravagant of expression marks, but he considerably wrote them in French, not Russian.

Must Be Linguist

The point is, that in order to understand everything that may appear on a page of printed music, you have to be something of a linguist. Strauss and Mahler have done pretty well in the matter of German terms and directions. Our own MacDowell was one of the most resourceful devisers of English expression marks. But it is Percy Grainger that really takes the cake. He writes for "big" and "little" fiddles. He wishes to have piano chords "harped". And molto crescendo gives way to "louden lots." They say that national and racial consciousness were also behind this linguistic expansion in musical terms and names. Fortunately, the Poles, Czechs, Hungarians, Russians, Finns and Scandinavians decided that in this respect discretion was the better part of patriotism. We have troubles enough as it is.

WHEELING, W. VA.
NEWS-REGISTER
JUN 20 1948

Bach and Lalo Albums Give Diverse Charm

By Robert Permar

Choice items by Bach and Lalo appear in the current Victor lists offering diversified but ever sound musical appeal. We refer to albums Nos. 1211 (three 12-inch doubles) of the sixth Brandenburg Concerto in B-flat, and 1207 (four 12-inch doubles) of the Symphonie Espagnole. Both are first-rate musically and acoustically—the former by Koussevitzky and the Boston, which has given us the best Bach orchestra's since Dr Karl Muck directed the same ensemble; and the latter by Paris Orchestre Colonne under Jean Fournet, and with Yehudi Menuhin as solo violinist.

With all respect for Dr. Elbin's pets, RCA-Victor has something that no other recording company can hope to equal. That is, access to the best of the European recordings and the work at Tanglewood, which is now the greatest annual festival extant, better than Saltzburg ever dreamed of being and, in the field of general music, what Bayreuth is to the music-drama. The Bach work is a product of the latter; the Lalo opus of the former. The United States has become, of course, the capital of world music.

Standard Kept

RCA-Victor takes the broad view of this, and for this we honor Dave Sarnoff's gallant band. Theirs is, of course, a commercial enterprise. They are in business to make money, and they have made plenty. But, by skillful management, they have also kept the highest of artistic standards. If you don't think so, inspect their products for the last ten years in The Seddie Permar Memorial Collection of your Ohio County Public Library, where all red seals go for free hearing or borrowing there.

There is no point here in hashing over again the structure of these two compositions. They are definitely established classics. The musically informed person who does not know them is poor indeed, because they catch two of the most assured masterpieces of the orthodox and romantic schools. Hardy navigator that he is, Dr. Koussevitzky steers his impeccable ensemble through the majestic Bach score, with superb "concertino" by Joseph dePasquale and Jean Cauhape, violists.

The same is true of the Lalo piece—perhaps the finest of Spanish music, though written by a Frenchman, and we are not forgetting "Carmen" by another "Frog." This simply hits the heights in this idiom of suite for violin and orchestra and, of course, Menuhin extracts the last measure of charm from its colorful melodies, [illegible] rhythms

---

LOS ANGELES, CAL.
TIMES
[illegible]

PRIVATE LIVES BY PAUL FORD

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY'S SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY EATS HOT OATMEAL AND HONEY BEFORE A CONCERT.
A WASHINGTON INSTITUTION!
FBI CHIEF, J. EDGAR HOOVER, LIVES IN THE WASHINGTON HOUSE IN WHICH HE WAS BORN... A LIFELONG RESIDENT OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA, HE HAS NEVER BEEN ENTITLED TO VOTE.
— BLISS 6-21

Various Musical Matters; the Esplanade 20th Concert Season

By HOWARD WATSON

[illegible] string [illegible] for how [illegible] chair, is [illegible] wilderment, [illegible] ment for [illegible] Were it [illegible] of interest [illegible] apprecia- [illegible] might [illegible] the reader [illegible] for the writer. [illegible] satisfaction [illegible] ter in the [illegible] king he [illegible] and that is [illegible] ts to help [illegible] couragement [illegible] are barred [illegible] A vaca- [illegible] has no [illegible] about lavish [illegible] the violinist [illegible] Symphony Orchestra [illegible] this year, [illegible] the Esplanade [illegible] if a public [illegible] Victor for [illegible] Aaron Cop- [illegible] most colorless [illegible] ful composi- [illegible] a number of [illegible]

[illegible] ffered as partial [illegible] certainly not [illegible] the object of [illegible] he extension of [illegible] universally ac- [illegible] Boston Sym- [illegible] On Tuesday, July [illegible] great musical [illegible] open the 20th [illegible] of the Esplanade [illegible] conductorship of [illegible] Such an anniversary [illegible] not only an event [illegible] to the musical [illegible] also the occasion [illegible] to Arthur Fiedler, [illegible] imaginative, initiative and hard work, the first of [illegible] was given on July 4, 1929.

EXPERIMENT TO INSTITUTION

The venture was originally an experimental contribution to Boston's summer time musical pleasure, offering free outdoor concerts by a brilliant symphonic ensemble. Within a relatively short time, however, the Esplanade Concerts became an institution of such importance that the annual attendance has mounted to close on a quarter of a million persons, representing all ages and all walks of life, drawn from Boston and its many suburbs.

Unlike other outdoor orchestral series, the Esplanade Concerts are without enclosure, gates, or ticket windows. When you step from the sidewalk onto a vast lawn facing the stage, you are in what passes for an auditorium. You may settle yourself on the grass, stand on the outskirts or hire a chair for a dime, but the chairs are not prearranged. You get yours from a stockpile and put it in any unoccupied territory you choose. No matter how affluent you may be, you cannot hire a reserved seat. This scheme of affairs has since shaped the character of the concerts through the years; small contributions from thousands have furnished the support, as the years have taken toll of the pioneer donors.

NEW PUBLIC CREATED

Unquestionably to the credit of these concerts is the creation of a new public for symphonic music, developed with careful planning and along easy stages by Mr. Fiedler. From a modest start, with programs containing one or two movements of a symphony, the seventh season found audiences eager to accept all nine of the Beethoven symphonies (save for the choral finale of the Ninth). A year later the four Brahms symphonies were received with great enthusiasm and Mr. Fiedler's judgment proved as good as his intentions. While the popular repertory is not disdained, nor contemporary composers neglected, the public is now on friendly and familiar terms with the great pieces of the symphonic repertoire, for the rhapsodies of Gershwin and Enesco, the tone poems of Sibelius and Liszt, the ballets of Bluck and Massenet, the concertos of Grieg and Handel keep company with excerpts from the operas of Verdi and Wagner, overtures from Auber to Weber, and miscellaneous Americana from Allen to Youmans.

From the original forty-six musicians in 1929, the orchestra is currently double that size. The first shell, built of wood, has been replaced by the present magnificent granite structure made possible largely through the bequest of Maria Hatch for that purpose.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
JUN 27 1948

RECORDS: REQUIEM

Columbia's Version of Brahms Score Made With Viennese Artistic Forces

By HOWARD TAUBMAN

SOME weeks ago there were no complete recordings of Brahms' German Requiem available; now there are two. The Victor version was discussed in this column a fortnight ago. The Columbia recording has arrived and its turn is in order.

Columbia's set was made in Vienna last fall. The conductor is Herbert von Karajan. The orchestra is the Vienna Philharmonic. The chorus is the Singverein der Gesellschaft der Musik Freunde in Wien—the organization that took part in the première of the Requiem in December, 1867. The soloists are Elizabeth Schwarzkopf, soprano, and Hans Hotter, baritone.

Mr. von Karajan, of whom one has heard fine reports musically and whose record in the war is quite another thing, is evidently a conductor of stature. His handling of the Requiem discloses that he understands the music profoundly. The shape and feeling of the work as a whole are projected with sensitivity and subtlety. Tonal proportions, both of chorus and orchestra, are molded with refinement, but that does not mean that big passages lose their weight and grandeur.

Miss Schwarzkopf is a singer with a delicate, neatly controlled voice, and she sings with musical feeling. Mr. Hotter's voice is not so impressive as advance reports of his work have indicated, but he, too, knows his business.

The recording is good, if not brilliant. The essential musical line is conveyed, though one would wish that the highest and lowest frequencies had more vibrancy.

Mr. von Karajan's sympathies are more deeply attuned to this music than those of Robert Shaw, who conducted the Victor recording. There is more virtuosity in the choral work of Mr. Shaw's singers, but you do not get a musical line that is as fluid and sensitive as the Viennese group's.

However, the Columbia set comes in ten twelve-inch disks boxed in two albums, while the Victor recording is in one album of nine twelve-inch disks and is, therefore, somewhat lower in price.

More Khatchaturian

The vogue for the pleasant, bouncing music of Aram Khatchaturian, which has now spread from the concert hall to the juke-box crowd, has prompted the record-makers to issue further pressings of his work.

Victor offers still another version of the Gayne Ballet Suite. This time it is played by the Chicago Symphony Orchestra under the direction of its recent conductor, Artur Rodzinski. This department has lost count of how many recent releases have been devoted to Khatchaturian, in particular to this ballet music and its Sabre Dance. Mr. Rodzinski's version is full of drive and color, and the dance which has won best-seller rating, gets a rousing performance. The album has two twelve-inch disks.

Disc has dug up another dance of similar stripe by Khatchaturian, this time Dagger Dance, and offers it in a mettlesome performance played by the Bolshoi Theatre State Orchestra. On the reverse side of the single ten-inch record is the Galop from Khatchaturian's Masquerade Suite, played by the Santa Monica Symphony Orchestra under Jacques Rachmilovich's direction.

Two by Bostonians

There are two new albums at hand from the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the leadership of Serge Koussevitzky, both from Victor. They are Bach's Brandenburg Concerto No. 6, in B flat (three twelve-inch disks) and Ravel's Rapsodie Espagnole (two twelve-inch disks).

The Bach work was recorded last summer at Tanglewood and it is a clear, vigorous account of the score. Joseph de Pasquale and Jean M. Cauhape, violists, contribute sturdy solo playing. The recording itself is alive and resonant. This set makes the fifth of the six Brandenburg concertos that Mr. Koussevitzky has recorded for Victor; only the First is lacking.

If the Bach is good, the Ravel is outstanding. Mr. Koussevitzky has always had a special feeling for the nuance and color of the French composer's music.

Religious Albums

The Jewish Reconstructionist Foundation, Inc. has issued an album devoted to What Is Torah? This cantata, with words by Ira Eisenstein and music based on Jewish religious and folk music by Judith Kaplan Eisenstein, has been performed hundreds of times. It seeks to convey what the Torah has meant to generations of Jews. The effective work has narration by Norman Rose and Ruth York; Robert H. Segal is the soloist, and the Mount Neboh (New York) Temple Choir sings the choral passages. Stanley Gewirtz provides a child's voice, and Isidor Geller is at the piano. The album has two twelve-inch disks.

From Bibletone comes an album of Hymns of Comfort and Joy, sung by the National Vesper Radio Quartet. The hymns in the set of five ten-inch disks are The Lord Is My Shepherd, O Beautiful, for Spacious Skies, Come Ye Disconsolate, Dear Lord and Father of Mankind, O Love That Wilt Not Let Me Go, Blest Be the Tie That Binds, Be Still My Soul, A Mighty Fortress Is Our God, God of Our Fathers and Immortal Love Forever Full.

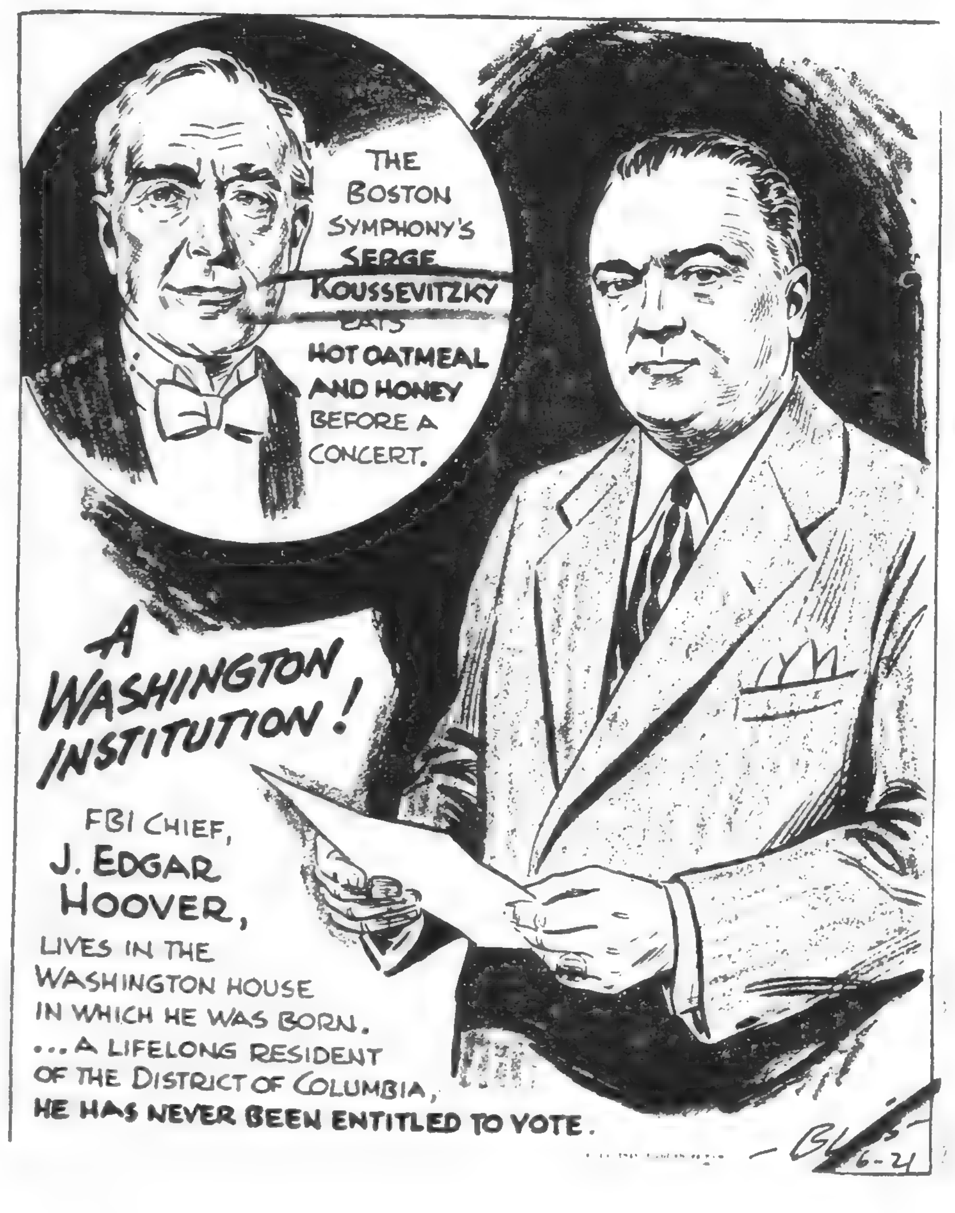
BURLINGTON, VT.
FREE PRESS

JUN 21 1948

PRIVATE LIVES

By Paul Ford



THE BOSTON SYMPHONY'S SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY EATS HOT OATMEAL AND HONEY BEFORE A CONCERT.
A WASHINGTON INSTITUTION!
FBI CHIEF, J. EDGAR HOOVER, LIVES IN THE WASHINGTON HOUSE IN WHICH HE WAS BORN. ... A LIFELONG RESIDENT OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA, HE HAS NEVER BEEN ENTITLED TO VOTE.
Bliss 6-21

ROTO BOSTON SUNDAY HERALD 15 CENTS

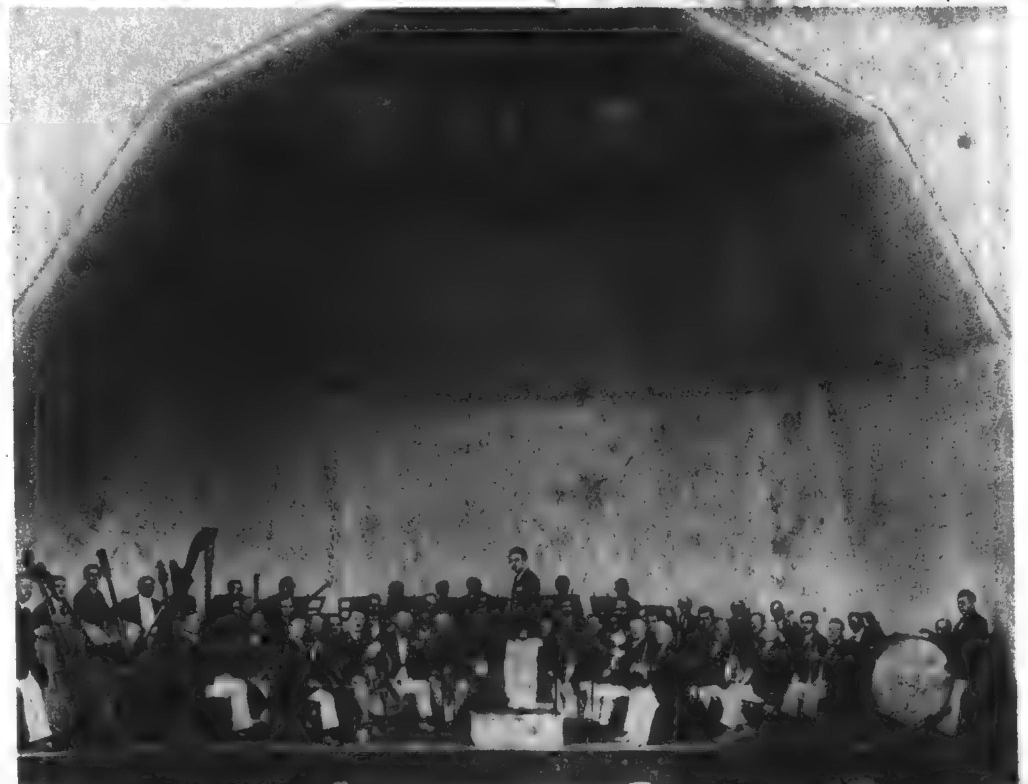
BOSTON, SUNDAY, JUNE 27, 1948

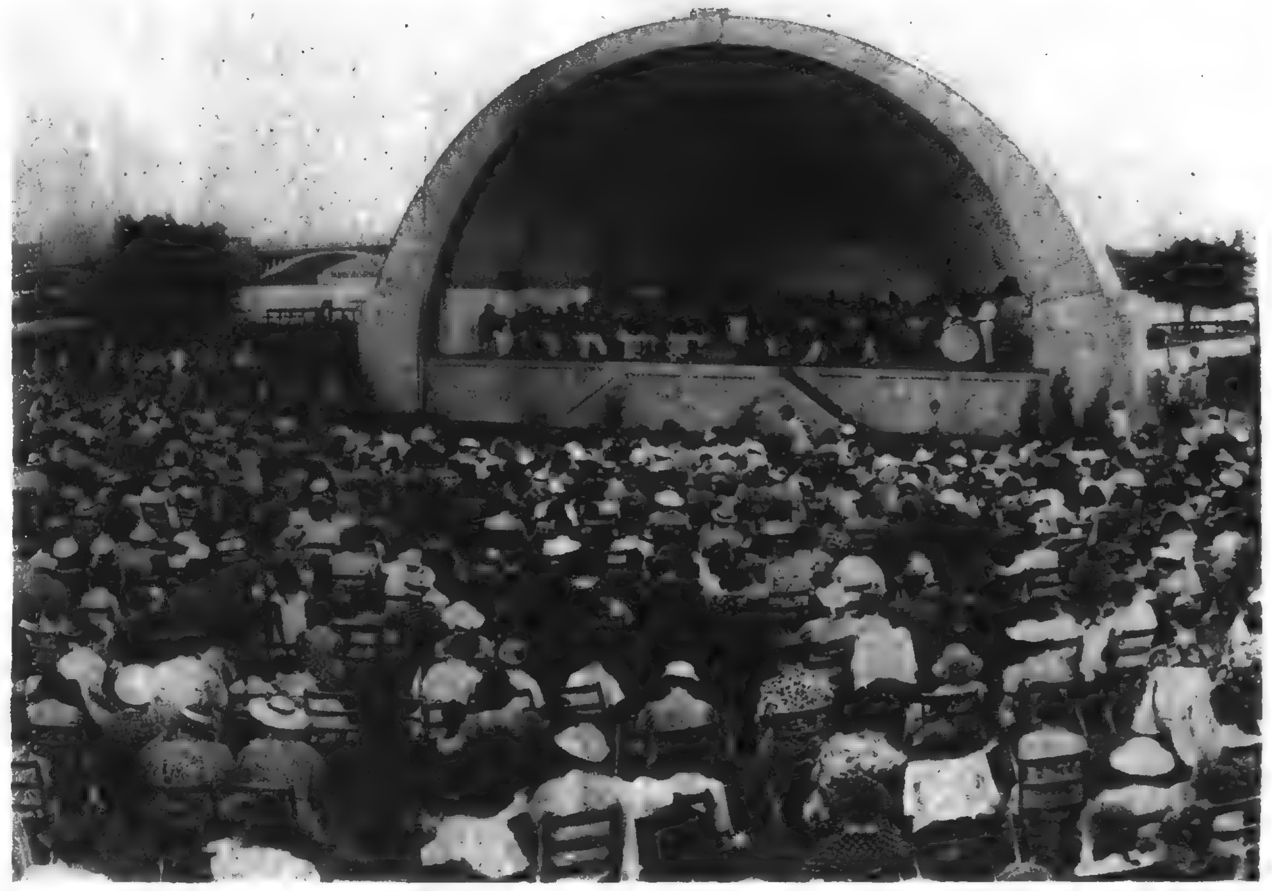
★ ★ ★

[151]

20th SEASON AT THE ESPLANADE



THE FIRST SHELL of wood was constructed by the Metropolitan District Commission in 1929.

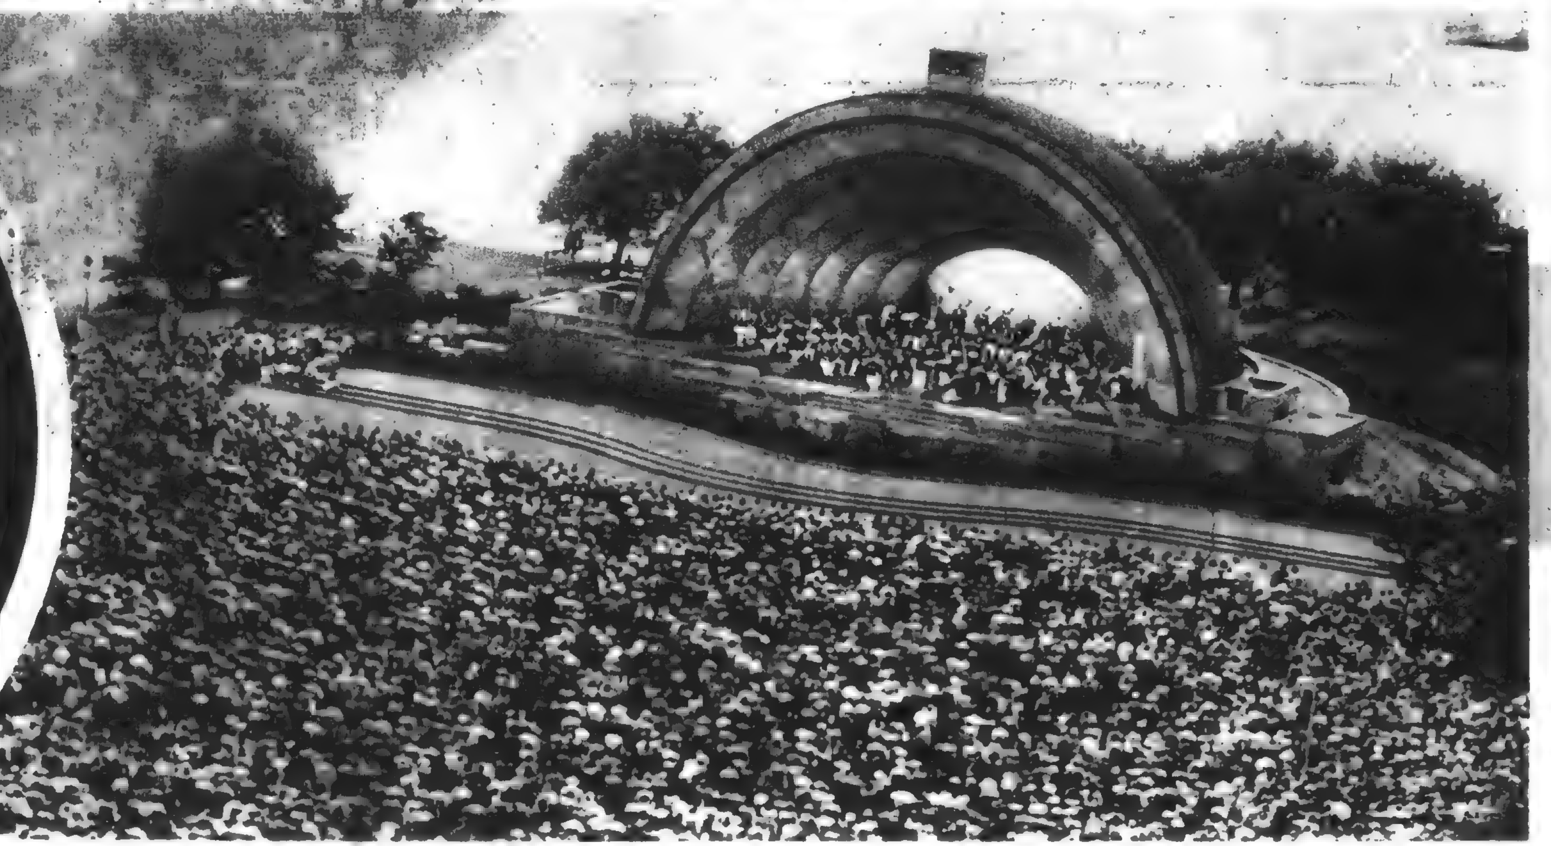


MADE OF STEEL PLATE, the second shell was built in 1934.

POISED IN SILHOUETTE. A dramatic moment as Arthur Fiedler raises his baton.

CAPTIVE OF MUSIC. A study in concentration.

A BOSTON INSTITUTION EVOLVES—Started by Arthur Fiedler as an experiment in 1929, the Esplanade Concerts, which will open another season July 6, have developed into an important and popular phase of the city's musical life. Today "symphonies under the stars" are produced by an orchestra which has grown from an initial 40 to 90 and the musical fare has attracted the respect of the critic as well as the esteem of the public.



THRONGS OF MUSIC LOVERS gather before the Hatch Memorial Shell, dedicated in 1940.

A SEA OF FACES assure the orchestra of its increasing popularity.

YOUTH AND INFORMALITY PREVAIL at the Esplanade throughout the season.

THE NEW YORK TIMES, SUNDAY, MAY 9, 1948.

GUEST CONDUCTOR WITH YOUNG JUILLIARD MUSICIANS

Eileen Darby (Graphic House)

Serge Koussevitzky prepares for this afternoon's performance of Beethoven's Ninth with school orchestra and chorus.

RECORDS: KOUSSEVITZKY LEADS BEETHOVE

By HOWARD TAUBMAN

COMPARED with the other symphonies of Beethoven, the Ninth has received little attention from the people who make records. The other eight, even those relatively less popular, have been recorded time and time again, but appearances of the Ninth on disks have been rare.

The fact that a chorus and soloists are needed is hardly sufficient reason to militate against the Ninth. Plenty of recordings employ such forces, if not larger groupings. Nor can the relative neglect be explained on the ground that Beethoven's Choral Symphony is a long work and would require a large album. Nowadays it is not at all uncommon to have full operas and oratorios recorded in several fat albums.

Your guess as to the reason for this state of affairs is as good as the next man's. In any event, there is a new recording of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony, and perhaps it will be followed by others so that the customer will have as wide a range of selection for this work as he has with most of the other staples of the repertory.

Made at Tanglewood

The new recording is by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the leadership of Serge Koussevitzky. The soloists are Frances Yeend, soprano; Eunice Alberts, contralto; David Lloyd, tenor, and James Pease, bass. The Berkshire Music Festival Chorus, which takes part, was prepared by Robert Shaw. The recording was made in the Shed at Tanglewood in the Berkshires during the Beethoven cycle of the 1947 Berkshire Symphony Festival.

Despite the fact that the Shed is open at the sides, its acoustics are extraordinary, as anyone who has attended the festival knows. They prove to be felicitous for recordings, and it may be assumed that this album, the first to be made in the Shed, will be followed by many others if the record stoppage is lifted before the next festival begins. It may be, of course, that Victor, which made this recording, has others in its backlog that were made last year.

The sound of orchestra and chorus is captured with satisfactory fidelity on the eight twelve-inch disks of the album. The records we heard have a good deal of surface noise. Victor plans to issue this recording on vinylite disks where the surface noise should be much less obtrusive.

Mr. Koussevitzky has given Beethoven's gigantic work a sober and sensitive reading. The orchestral tone is something to hear, and the chorus is quite good for a group that was formed and rehearsed in a period of less than six weeks. The soloists manage their difficult music tolerably.

Older Versions

The old Columbia version directed by Felix Weingartner is not so satisfactory technically, though there is much to be said for the conductor's grasp of the score's grandeur. Leopold Stokowski and the Philadelphia Orchestra made a Victor recording quite some time ago, but Mr. Koussevitzky's conception is superior.

The finest performance of the symphony is that by Arturo Toscanini, and if the unforgettable interpretation that he directed over the radio a week ago could be made available on disks, that would be the thing to buy. Surely, the National Broadcasting Company took a recording off the air, but a lot of kinks in union negotiations would have to be ironed out before that could be turned into a commercial release. Some day perhaps it may be done. If it is, that would be the recording of the Ninth you would want to own. In the meantime, the new version will do.

OTHER REVIEWS

Bach: Coffee Cantata. Benjamin De Loache, baritone; William Hain, tenor; Ethyl Hayden, soprano, with instrumental ensemble directed from harpsichord by Ernest Victor Wolff. (Musicraft, four twelve-inch disks). This is Bach in a frivolous mood. In setting Picander's text poking fun at the addiction of women to coffee, Bach tossed off a pleasant little score. The lines, whatever hilarity they

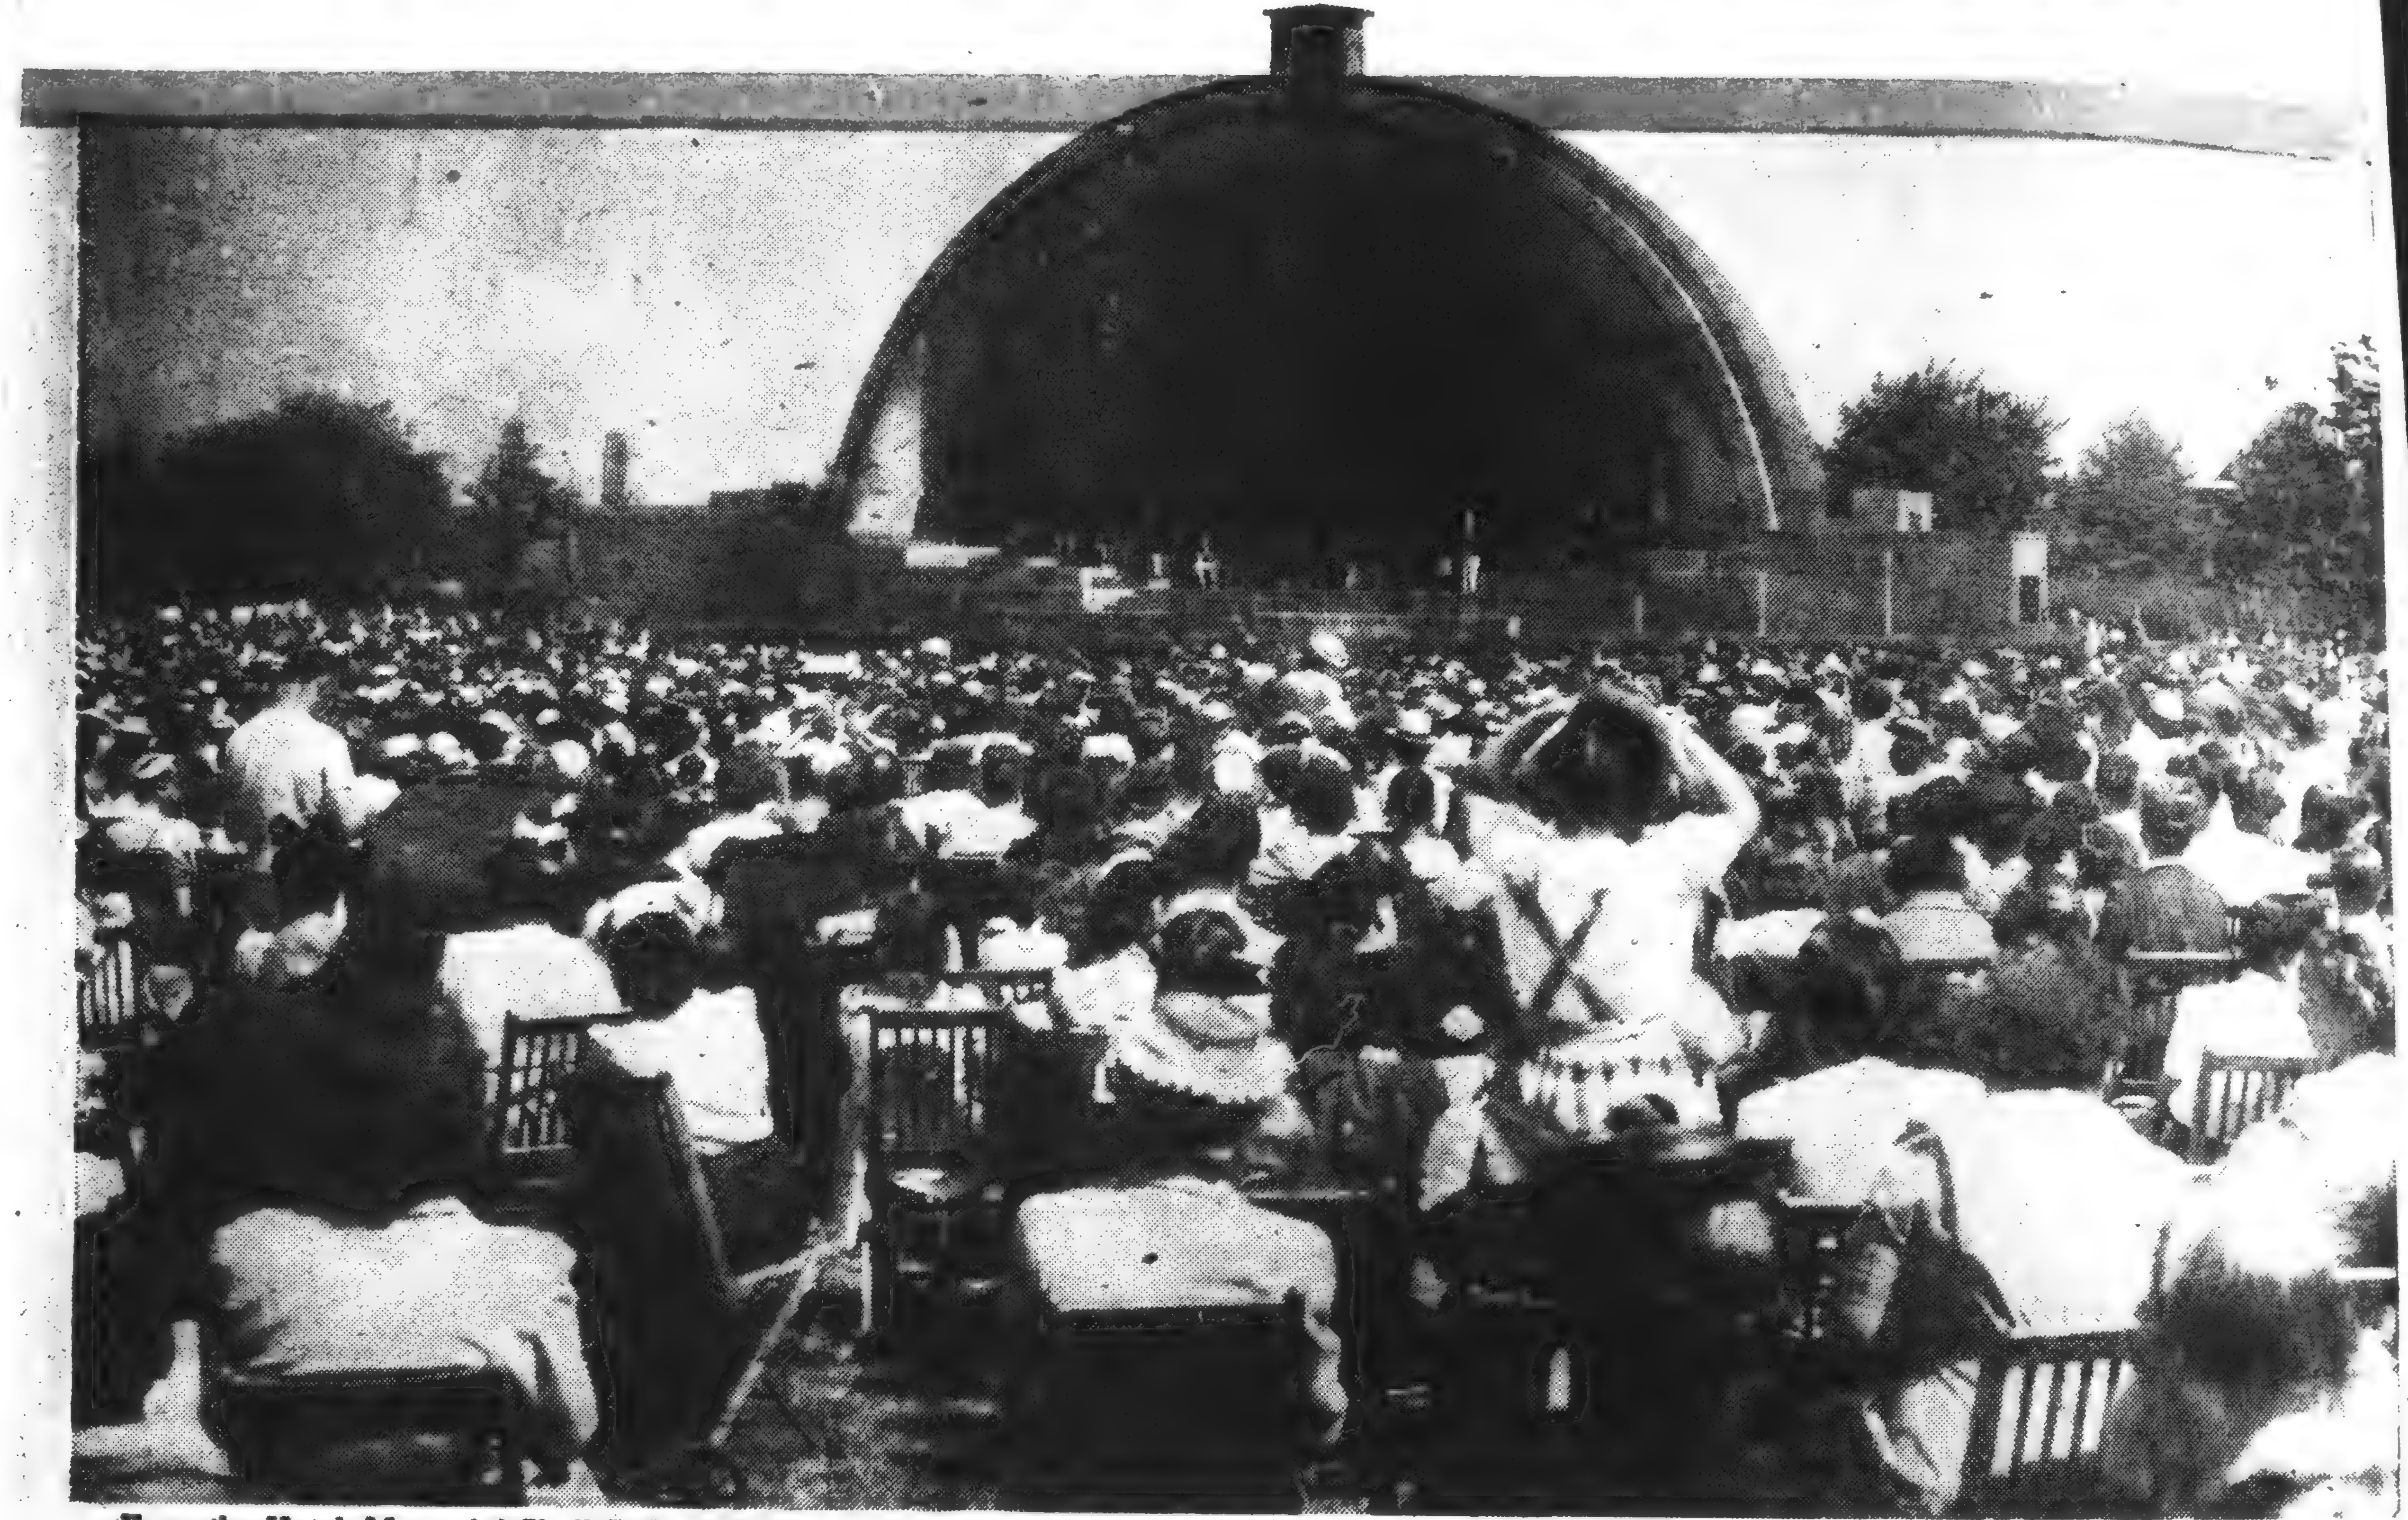
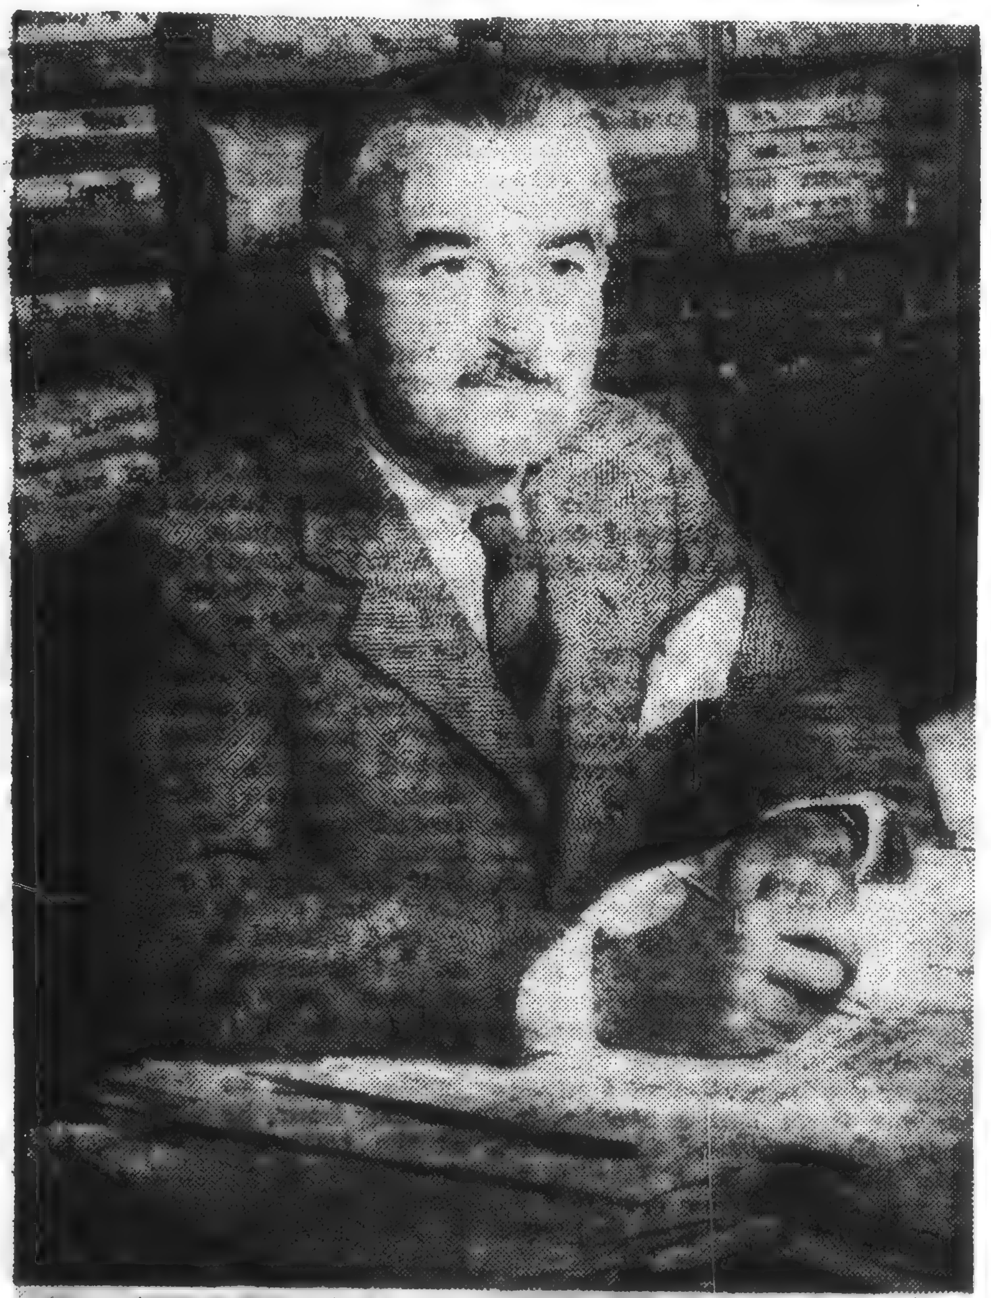
M. Robert Rogers and European Serge Koussevitzky, who has conducted a recording of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony with Boston Orchestra and Tanglewood Choir.

[132]

Music for the Millions



From the Hatch Memorial Shell Arthur Fiedler sends forth his music to huge audiences of 30,000 and more who prefer symphonies to the beer garden type.



Arthur Fiedler, who opens his 20th season of the famous Esplanade Pop Concerts next month, says he has the most perfect audience anywhere.

By ELEANOR ROBERTS

THE most enthusiastic audiences in the country today are not those who attend opening night at the opera nor those who, true to proper Bostonian tradition turn up regularly at the Symphony on Friday afternoon, but the bootblacks, dowagers, housewives and clerks who gather nightly at the Esplanade concerts.

And they've been turning up for 19 years.

They are, says Conductor Arthur Fiedler who opens his 20th season of the famous concerts on the banks of the Charles this July 6th, the most perfect audience anywhere. Always courteous, spontaneous in their reactions, attentive and loyal.

They do not rustle programs. If they did, with the nightly audience running about 25,000, the results acoustically would be deafening.

They sit through evenings when it pours and pours, chanting to their beloved maestro and his 75 Boston Symphony musicians, "We'll stay, if you'll play."

FIEDLER SCEPTICAL

They even shocked Fiedler's backers who predicted the conductor would surely lay an egg if he presented heavy symphonies to such an audience, by cheering madly for more!

Fiedler fed his devotees at the Shell all of Beethoven's symphonies with the necessary omission of the choral Finale of the Ninth, one season; four of Brahms the next, and then promptly tossed Tchaikovsky and Wagner at them with such impressive results that the beer garden music which characterized his first program became a thing of the past.

Esplanade concerts have come a long way since the night of July 4, 1929 when 47 players led by their conductor turned to face an audience of 2000.

Not even Fiedler, in his wildest dreams as a young and ardent first violinist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra visualized his free Esplanade concerts into a New England institution that would rival the bean and the cod.

"Frankly," grinned Mr. Fiedler as he sat in his office after rehearsal, alternately mopping his brow and gulping a glass of ale, "I was dubious. I thought we might have to junk it after the first season."

Instead, Fiedler's first orchestral concert in the open not only put him on the musical map, but set the pace for "shell" concerts in other cities throughout the United States.

DISAPPOINTED BUT ONCE

In 19 seasons of Esplanade concerts one strange fact has asserted itself in the minds of the concert going public.

There is such a thing as "Fiedler weather."

It is a meteorological phenomenon that stumps top forecasters. Although Shell audiences have been known to sit out a concert in the drenching rain, it has become almost a legend that while it may pour in Belmont, thunder in Newton, and hail in Melrose, at the Hatch Memorial Shell it is usually fair.

When the concerts first started Fiedler began to notice several of his men were AWOL. After a vociferous blast the next day the maestro learned the answer. Inevitably they chorused, "But it rained so hard we were sure there would be no concert."

"Ah," said Fiedler softly, "rain, yes, in Brookline, in Medford, but on the Esplanade? NO!"

After that they reported rain or shine and Fiedler rapidly adopted the motto "If there's an audience—we'll play."

Only once did his followers disappoint him. That was on a dark, murky evening about two years ago when a raincoated audience, umbrellas raised settled themselves for a night of Schubert and Saint-Saens.

Fiedler, appropriately enough, started the Prelude to "The Deluge" by Saint-Saens when a terrific clap of thunder drowned out every note.

"I was a little worried," the conductor confessed, "both about the orchestra and the audience as well as myself, but in spite of the storm we continued.

"When I turned around to take my bow,, Mr. Fiedler related dryly, "I discovered that my audience had fled to shelter. There was nothing but a vast expanse of empty seats."

TRIBUTE TO DEMOCRACY

As a true democratic institution, Esplanade concerts most certainly rank with the town meeting. When 30,000 people gather six nights a week on camp chairs or on the grass of the Esplanade to listen to good music, properly presented by Conductor Fiedler and his Symphony players, it is a tribute to democracy.

The Bill of Rights, as someone

Arthur Fiedler's Esplanade Concerts, Starting 20th Season, Draw Greater Crowds Than The Red Sox or Frankie Sinatra—And The Backers Considered It a Dubious Project At The Beginning

once pointed out, gives Esplanade concert listeners the right to walk away any time they want to, not that many ever take advantage of this privilege.

However, if they don't like the music or they get restless they can saunter off without having to brave the icy stares of an usher.

There are no reserved seats, no "white tie and tails" required, no passing of the hat. If the night is extremely hot the orchestra is apt to play in its shirtsleeves, its impeccable conductor dispensing with his usual sartorial splendor only to the point of discarding his jacket.

Very few people ever think of the concerts in terms of monuments to civil liberties. Yet they are the very essence of the democratic spirit. No one-group audience assembles on the banks of the Charles for the summer concerts. People of every social and racial background conceivable come to the concerts for one reason only—they like music!

WHAT MUSIC MEANS

The best indication of how much music means to these people was given in a terse little statement, many years ago by the late Captain Albert Chapman of the MDC. The first Metropolitan District Commission captain in charge of policing the concert grounds, remarked one day, "I've never seen the beat of this. Not only are there no reports of pickpockets in a crowd of this size, but these people even return lost umbrellas!"

During the war the concerts were considered to be such a morale booster to the people that even when the late Eugene M. Hultman, chairman of the MDC which has jurisdiction over the concert grounds, expressed grave concern over the crowd danger of some 25,000 to 30,000 people gathering in one place, they were allowed to continue on the basis of beginning and ending in the daylight hours.

With such a great cross section of the American public attending the concerts, Fiedler has received some very strange requests. The most unusual of these was a letter from a Back Bay dowager of note who inquired the cost of one concert.

Further inquiry revealed that she wished to "purchase" a concert to be dedicated to the memory of her late husband who, with her, rarely missed a night at the Hatch Memorial Shell.

It was to be done, she informed Mr. Fiedler, in the strictest secrecy. All she asked was that a few of her husband's favorite concertos and symphonic selections be included in the program.

CHOCOLATE ON CHAIRS

Fiedler carried out her wishes to the letter and to this day only the conductor knows the identity of the mysterious woman who "bought" an Esplanade concert.

Esplanade concert devotees have expressed their fondness for both Fiedler and the orchestra in many unusual ways, but the classic example of good will was the kindly old lady who, one torrid night, distributed chocolate bars to each of the musicians—leaving one on each seat.

Of course, the obvious happened. The men, nattily attired in white flannels sat down without looking!

The same woman—of exceptionally good family—was once so carried away by a Strauss waltz that she promptly got up and pirouetted in front of the audience—to thunderous applause.

Fiedler never discourages such spontaneous reactions.

"Why should I?" he asks. "I want them to enjoy themselves."

He purposely doesn't try to shush an audience because the concerts were founded in a spirit of informality and Fiedler has tried to keep them that way.

Only once, when a group of young rowdies got tough, did the maestro assert himself.

"I gave them a damn good bawling out," he chuckled. "And they apologized!"

A PROVING GROUND

Fiedler likes nothing better than dressing inconspicuously and sauntering around among shell audiences on his night off.

"I hear things like, 'That isn't Fiedler conducting tonight, is it?' Then the reply, 'Sure it is. Don't you know Fiedler yet after all these years?'

"I learn how insignificant personality becomes in the presence of good music, and from the expression on the faces of these people I discover how much it really means to them. To see relaxation come to tired faces, to see new hope in the eyes of the discouraged is a very great experience."

Esplanade concerts have been the proving ground for young concert artists. Fiedler has long been known as the fairy godfather of talented young musicians, always willing to give them a chance if he thinks they're good.

Such young celebrities as Luise Vosgerchian of Watertown, a pianist of great and now acknowledged ability; Robert Menga, the boy violinist; Gerson Yessin, another 'teen age pianist, all made their musical debuts under Fiedler's sponsorship, got their first big breaks at Pops or Shell concerts.

Romances have flourished too, on the Esplanade, as young couples listened to the ballet music from Tchaikovsky's "Nutcracker Suite," or Strauss' "Cagliostro Waltzes," and many couples have written Fiedler grateful letters overflowing with thanks for his unsuspecting role as Cupid.

Just how much a part of the people the Esplanade concerts are is evidenced in the manner in which they are supported. Some 20,000 letters are sent at the beginning of the season to a cross section of the American public. These go to business groups, musical groups, and those who write in about the broadcasts as well as the public spirited and philanthropic citizens who usually get in back of this sort of project.

One-third of the income is derived from contributions from this source. Another third comes from free will offerings made on the grounds when some drop a coin, others a bill, into the program booth slots.

Still another third comes from the chair rentals, the income of which is divided. While chairs at nearly every other public gathering have jumped to 25c and 50c, they still remain the original 10c at the Esplanade—loftily impervious to inflation

It is a matter of pride to those interested in Esplanade concerts that there have been no heavy contributions since the initial year. The greatest sum totals are by contribution of $5, $10 and $25, by nickels, dimes and quarters on the grounds. This indicates how much "of the people" shell concerts are.

Esplanade concerts and culture draw a bigger crowd consistently than the Red Sox, the Braves or Frankie Sinatra. Better still, the people come because they want to—not because it's "the thing to do" socially.

Today, in its 20th season Fiedler and his concerts are the wonder of the entertainment world the pride of a city already rich in culture!

Many a sunny afternoon the children come in droves to hear the special music Fiedler has prepared for them.

Even rain doesn't discourage the thousands who come from all over Greater Boston to hear the Esplanade concerts on the banks of the Charles River.

[illegible] YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

AUG 1 - 1948

ORCHESTRAL PITCH

Battle to Establish Best Standard Continues

By OLIN DOWNES

THE article which appeared in these columns some weeks ago upon the subject of orchestral pitch has aroused some interesting correspondence and by this means elicited some additional facts, not in the article referred to, which modify certain of the conclusions then reached.

Thus it was pointed out that the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Dr. Koussevitzky, plays today at a higher pitch than any other American orchestra. So much is true. The assumption was that this pitch was instituted for the first time in the orchestra's history.

We are indebted to Gordon Hendricks, the musician and pitch specialist of this city, who tells us that in its first years the Boston Symphony played at A-448.5, or four cycles and a fraction higher than its pitch of today. As it happens, this was the same pitch, current in Paris in 1859, for which Berlioz fought when he functioned as one of the French commission of pitch of that year. "But that is not surprising," says Mr. Hendricks, "because no composer has cared much about singers' feelings of pitch since Beethoven came along and instrument-writing came into its day."

The commission, which numbered among its members Auber, Halévy, Meyerbeer, Rossini and Thomas, did not support Berlioz. It settled on the pitch that was approximately 435.4—approximately, because the instruments which aimed to establish 435 were imperfect.

Beginning of Change

When did the rise of pitch from the "classic pitch," which lasted approximately from the time of J. S. Bach to Beethoven, occur? It is easy to oversimplify the answer to such a question. The change, one would say in broad outline, occurred through the tendencies of the nineteenth-century composers and the instrument-makers to secure more brilliancy of tone and virtuosity in execution from the instruments, and in the change from a vocal to an orchestra conception in the musical art. That change was consistently in progress from Beethoven's time onward, and in spite of "neo-classicism" and its concepts remains dominant in music today.

But Mr. Hendricks isolates as an example if not as the determinative occasion when the change was initiated by the new instruments of the regimental band, of which the Emperor Alexander of Russia was an honorary colonel at the Vienna Congress of 1815. The instruments of that band, made by Stephan Koch, were pitched half a tone sharper than the accepted pitch of that time. This sudden change made it impossible to use this band with the choruses in an oratorio that celebrated the return of the Emperor Francis; and, "as the bands of Vienna were called in to assist in the performance of operas in the opera houses, the pitch of the theatres began to rise, and the poor singers were left up the creek."

Variations

As a matter of fact, orchestras have since played as high as 454 in Covent Garden in the Seventies, and 457.5 (Johann Strauss, London, 1897)—a standard generally maintained till the Eighteen Nineties, after which it began to fall.

It must, however, be realized that under various circumstances pitch cannot be exactly maintained, and that to insist upon such theoretical exactitude may be a fetish. Pitch varies with temperature, size of hall and other conditions of performance. Orchestras may vary in pitch between the passages which accompany the solo instrument or voice and the tuttis when the orchestra players have only themselves to consider!

Mr. Hendricks' letter bears surprising testimony to this. We quote:

"In October of '39 the Concertgebouw Orchestra in Amsterdam under Willem Mengelberg performed the first piano concerto of Beethoven—I do not know the pianist, but that is of course unimportant — and a Brahms symphony. During the tuning of the orchestra for the Beethoven the A was 440, although the orchestral average was 441. In the tuttis the orchestra went up to 443, but "After the intermission of the Mengelberg broadcast the orchestra tuned its instruments to 443. In the first part of the symphony an A of a horn was identified as 444. A few minutes later a tutti was 441.5. In the second part, a horn was 442, and at the same time the orchestra was 442.5. In the third movement the strings has 442.5, while in the finale the horns played at 443."

Pitch Battle

What of the singers? The pitch war, that is, the war to raise pitch or to lower it, is really between them and the instrumentalists. Mr. Hendricks began his investigations of acoustics when he was studying the tenor recitatives in Bach's "St. Matthew" Passion. "In singing in company with instruments," he observes, "singers have a choice of many pitches within a fifth of a semi-tone, without actually singing out of tune with the instruments. This is because of the temperament used today, which I think eliminates the difference in color of keys—except within great distances in pitch—but which, in the piano at least, is not a pure set of intervals."

And to get down to brass tacks, this, which may well give us pause: "Mr. O. J. Murphy of the Bell Telephone Laboratories, who wrote [illegible] on this subject in 1940, told me that singers were rarely measureable. A constant tone of a duration of one-half second suffices to make the frequency measureable, and no singer that any of these authorities on acoustics heard in the course of their surveys could stay on a pitch for a half second."!!!

Time was when a world-famous cancatrice could dictate her pitch. The Steinway pitch of Adelina Patti's piano in 1882, was A-435—practically the "French diapason." The pitch of the entire Paris Opera was lowered in 1824 for the soprano Mme. Branchu.

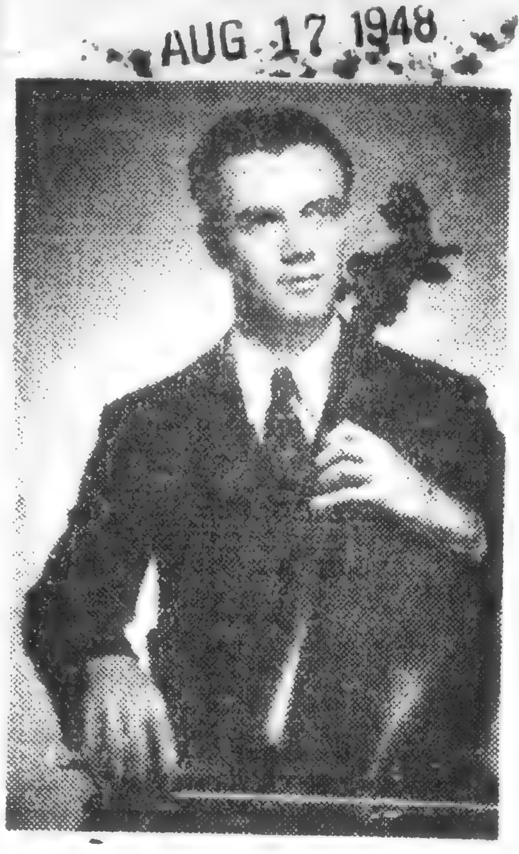
Difference of Opinion

Now the shoe is on the other foot, and Mr. Hendricks has a bone to pick with Koussevitzky. "Koussevitzky says that his listeners have 'become accustomed to the higher pitch and change would mean a wholesale adjustment in the woodwinds of various orchestras.' Which is of course ridiculous, as other orchestras are not nearly so sharp as his and it has been shown that simple playing can alter pitch enough to conform to standards.

"It is no more sensible or desirable to have different actual pitches than it is for us to have four quarts in a gallon in New York and four and a half in Boston. Standards of pitch were settled upon to protect works of art and the ears of listeners, and should not be varied from."

ATLANTIC CITY, N. J.
PRESS

AUG 17 1948



SAMUEL MAYES, 'cellist, will be featured in a recital with Edna Bockstein tonight on the Ventnor Pier.

Bockstein, Mayes Play In Recital

The Ventnor Music Festival reaches the midway mark tonight wih a recital on Ventnor Pier by two outstanding musicians, Edna Bockstein, pianist, and Samuel Mayes, 'cellist.

Sponsored by the Ventnor City League, the August concert series got off to auspicious beginnings with full house audiences, according to Dr. E. Harrison Nickman, chairman of the League's concert committee. Nathan Hoffman is president of the sponsoring organization.

Edna Bockstein, attractive and charming American pianist, has given numerous recitals in her native New York City since making her debut in Town Hall there in 1941. She has played with the New York Philharmonic and Carnegie Pops Orchestra as soloist, and has performed on radio networks and at war relief and bond rally concerts. She is also a poet and has set many of her own writings to music.

Mayes, first 'cellist with the great Philadelphia Orchestra, is well known to music lovers in this area who will have their last opportunity to hear him before he joins the Boston Symphony, also as first 'cellist, [illegible] Mayes also has appeared as soloist in New York's Town Hall.

OMAHA, NEBR.
MORNING WORLD-HERALD

AUG [illegible] 1948

The Recording Ban

Eight months have passed since James Caesar Petrillo banned phonograph recordings. Mr. Petrillo doesn't seem to be uninterested in ending the ban. Neither, for that matter, do the recording companies. So valuable time is being lost.

The principal loss is in the field of classical recordings. Some of the loss is probably irreparable.

Consider, for example, the case of Arturo Toscanini, perhaps the world's greatest symphonic conductor. Though still at the height of his power, Toscanini is 82 and cannot be expected to go on indefinitely. . At the time the recording ban went on he was scheduled to have another try at a "perfect" recording of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony, and a complete recording of "Traviata." Music lovers the world around have been waiting for these recordings; now they may never hear them.

There are other conductors in somewhat the same position. Serge Koussevitsky, 74, is beginning his last season with the Boston Symphony. Pierre Monteux, 73, is still leading his fine San Francisco Symphony, but cannot go on forever.

Aside from these, there are younger men whose works ought to be recorded. And there are many items in the record catalogs that ought to be replaced with versions recorded with techniques only recently discovered in this Country and England.

But Mr. Petrillo says no. He says no because he thinks his union is not getting a fair cut of the profits reaped by juke boxes and radio disc jockeys. About 20 per cent of records are used for such purposes. The 80 per cent played in homes are in no way involved in the dispute—but the owner of a home phonograph suffers nonetheless.

It would be quite easy, by amending the copyright act, to compel the juke box owners and disc jockeys to pay royalties to the musicians whose work they use. But, under the Taft-Hartley Act, the royalties cannot be paid to Mr. Petrillo's union—and that is the sticking point.

AT BERKSHIRE FESTIVAL TODAY

Nan Merriman, mezzo-soprano soloist, and Leonard Bernstein, the conductor, in Mahler's "Resurrection" Symphony at Tanglewood.

NEW REPUBLIC
NEW YORK, N. Y.
AUG 23

MUSIC: Records

THE PERFORMANCE by Serge Koussevitzky of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony at Tanglewood last summer was recorded on the spot (Victor DM-1190; $11). The Berkshire Festival Chorus, trained with precision and beauty of tone by Robert Shaw, gives the album its main distinction. The Boston Symphony Orchestra plays in too urbane a manner; the Ninth Symphony demands sinew and even a certain roughness rather than polished elegance. The soloists are no better than usual, except for Frances Yeend, soprano, who negotiates the appallingly slow ascent to the high B with a good deal of vocal poise. Since no fully satisfactory recording of the Ninth Symphony has ever been made, this one will do as well as any.

The first four of Bach's six Brandenburg Concertos, recorded by Otto Klemperer for German Polydor long before the war, are now available in domestic repressings (Vox 618, $7.35; 619, 620 and 621, $5.25 each). Klemperer handles the music in a fashion which has now gone out of style. He employs a large and sometimes muddy orchestra in place of the tiny group Bach had in mind, and sometimes chooses tempos considerably different from those recommended by experts in Baroque music nowadays. Within his horizon, Klemperer's interpretation is effective enough, but for many modern listeners the records will hardly constitute more than a document of the taste of a generation now past and gone.

To Columbia, with its backlog of unissued materials, Artur Rodzinski is still conductor of the Philharmonic-Symphony, even if he has gone clear through another orchestra and out the other side since leaving New York. His recording of Brahms's Second Symphony (Columbia MM-725; $7.10), made while he was still with the Philharmonic, displays the luminous execution he taught that orchestra, but plods rather literally through the music.

A much more enlivening Brahms performance is contributed by the Guilet Quartet in Brahms's Quartet No. 3, in B flat major (Vox 208; $6), one of the composer's most rewarding chamber works, missing from all catalogues for several years.

Emma Schaver, soprano, sings a group of songs of displaced people (Vox 635; $4.75) with poignant, tragic overtones. The best item in the set of six is Ravel's setting of the "Kaddisch," for it is the only arrangement which is not hoked up with the decorative trappings of radio production. The album is called "I Believe," after the title of one of the songs.

CECIL SMITH

[156]

THE PHILA. FORUM
PHILA., PA
SEPT. 1948

Annual Philadelphia Concert

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY conducting

"The peerless orchestra," Olin Downes, New York Times

CELEBRATING DR. KOUSSEVITZKY'S TWENTY-FIFTH ANNIVERSARY AS MUSICAL DIRECTOR

On April 15 last, the day of their Philadelphia Forum concert, Dr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony received Radio's highest citation for "outstanding entertainment in music," The George Foster Peabody Award.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
SEP 2 - 1948

MUSIC GROUPS DUE TO ASK AID OF U. S

Most Could Overcome Deficits if Permitted to Keep 20% Charge Levied for Taxes

OPERA REMITTED $450,000

Debt for 1947-48 Season Was $220,000—Boston Symphony Manager Backs Plan

By HOWARD TAUBMAN

Faced by deficits that appear to be inevitable for years to come, many of America's music organizations plan to turn to the Federal Government for a measure of relief, it became known yesterday.

Although every opera company and orchestra of significance abroad depends on state and municipal subsidies for the balancing [illegible] a survey made by THE NEW YORK TIMES showed that only a few communities in this [illegible] make grants from the [illegible] treasury to their music organizations. However, there is little or no disposition on the part of directors and managements in this country to expect Federal subsidies for music at this time, the survey indicated.

The consensus among the heads of musical groups in the United States was that the Federal Government could provide relief by repealing the Federal tax of 20 per cent on admissions.

The case for this proposal was put yesterday by George E. Judd, manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, when he said:

"The only prospect I see for this orchestra, and I think it might apply to several others, to avoid substantial operating deficits would be by a return to the original tax-exempt status which non-profit organizations with certain standards enjoyed prior to the last war.

"In this case I believe the public would be willing to continue to pay what they now pay with the tax. It would amount to increasing our gross revenues 20 per cent and would represent the first sizable increase in ticket revenue in recent years. I think you will find that most of us have not changed our prices materially, though the public has been paying more on account of the tax."

Taxes Seen Covering Deficits

Figures brought out by THE TIMES survey indicated that repeal of the Federal admisions tax for music organizations that are nonprofit cultural institutions might make the difference between a deficit and a surplus for some of them, provided that they could keep on charging the present scale for tickets.

The deficit of the Metropolitan Opera Association for the 1947-48 season was about $220,000. The opera association turned over to the Federal Government more than $300,000 in admissions taxes collected for performances in New York alone. An additional $150,000 in taxes was remitted for performances by the opera company on tour.

The top ticket price at the Metropolitan today is $7.50 including tax. During the last four seasons the house has played to capacity audiences virtually at every performance, and it is not believed likely that there would be any diminution in the size of the audience if the public knew that the entire $7.50 a ticket were going to the company instead of the present situation, under which $6.25 of that sum goes to the opera and $1.25 to the Federal Government.

The deficit of the New York Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra for 1947-48 was $109,200. The amount turned over to the Government in admission taxes was $125,000.

The Philadelphia Orchestra had a deficit of $176,000 last season. It paid $64,000 to the Federal Government in taxes. In addition, there was a 10 per cent city tax, with $32,000 being turned over to the city of Philadelphia, making a total of $96,000 paid out in taxes.

30,000 Debt, $180,000 to U. S.

In Boston the symphony orchestra had a deficit of about $30,000 last season, when it played to audiences totaling nearly 1,000,000 persons in the flesh in its regular season, its "Pop" concerts and its festival at Tanglewood in the Berkshires. Its payments to the Federal Government for admission taxes amounted to $180,000.

The managers of the nation's musical organizations have been aware of what repeal of the admissions tax would do for their budgets but they have hesitated to take a public stand on the issue in the past.

They have discussed the matter at meetings, and privately some have approached leaders of Congress from their states to appeal for tax relief. It was learned yesterday that Senator Robert A. Taft, Republican leader, was asked [illegible] to do something about the [illegible]

It is understood that representatives of leading musical organizations may get together after the Presidential campaign to discuss further ways and means for an approach to Congress.

The judgment of most managers and directors is that repeal of the admissions tax would be a more feasible approach to the problem of perpetual deficits than a campaign for Federal subsidies. Some heads of musical groups appeared to be opposed to an appeal for Federal subsidies on grounds of principle. They argued that if you believed in the theory of free enterprise you were bound to support it all the way down the line.

A few insisted that schools, museums, hospitals and other cultural and service institutions were not expected to operate within a strict interpretation of the theory. They said that government support of culture was not only necessary but bound to come.

CHATTANOOGA, TENN.
TIMES
SEP 5 - 1948

BANE OF MUSICIANS IS ADMISSION TAX

Non-Profit Groups in Red Because Wartime Law Is Still Being on Books

BY HOWARD TAUBMAN
New York Times News Service.

NEW YORK, Sept. 4—Faced by deficits that appear to be inevitable for years to come, many of America's music organizations plan to turn to the Federal Government for a measure of relief.

Consensus among the heads of musical groups in the United States was that the Federal Government could provide relief by repealing the Federal tax of 20 per cent on admissions.

The case for this proposal was put today by George E. Judd, manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, when he said:

"The only prospect I see * * * to avoid * * * deficits is a return to the tax-exempt status which non-profit organizations * * * enjoyed prior to the last war.

"It would amount to increasing our gross revenues 20 per cent. I think you will find that most of us have not changed our prices materially, though the public has been paying more on account of the tax."

Tax Devours Surpluses

The survey indicated that repeal of the Federal admissions tax for nonprofit cultural music organizations might make the difference between a deficit and a surplus for some of them.

The deficit of the Metropolitan Opera Association for the 1947-48 season was about $220,000. The opera association turned over to the Federal Government more than $300,000 in taxes collected in New York alone. An additional $150,000 in taxes was remitted for performances by the company on tour.

The deficit of the New York Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra for 1947-48 was $109,200. Admission taxes were $125,000.

The Philadelphia Orchestra had a deficit of $176,000 last season. It paid $64,000 to the Federal Government in taxes. In addition, there was a 10 per cent city tax.

In Boston the symphony orchestra had a deficit of about $30,000 last season, when it played to audiences totaling nearly 1,000,000 persons in the flesh in its regular season, its "pop" concerts and its festival at Tanglewood in the Berkshires. Federal admission taxes amounted to $180,000.

Some managers have approached leaders of Congress. Sen. Robert A. Taft, Republican leader, was asked recently to do something about the matter.

HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES
SEP 8 - 1948

Koussevitzky Opens Final Season Oct. 8

On Oct. 8 in Symphony Hall, Boston, Serge Koussevitzky will open his 25th and last season as director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. This will be the 68th season of the orchestra.

The conductor will base his opening program on the program which was his choice for his opening concert in Boston in the autumn of 1924. It will thus include Vivaldi's Orchestral Concerto in D minor, and Brahms' Variations on a Theme by Haydn. Honegger's String Symphony will replace the same composer's "Pacific 231." Beethoven's 7th Symphony will close the program.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its usual four series of concerts in Symphony Hall: 24 Friday afternoon and 24 Saturday evening concerts. In the shorter series there will be six Sunday afternoon and nine Tuesday evening concerts. All seats for the two evening series are entirely subscribed by the season.

The soloists will include pianists Rudolf Firkusny, Nicole Henriot, Myra Hess, Vladimir Horowitz and Soulima Stravinsky, who will play when his father conducts; the violinist, Jascha Heifetz, and the violoncellist, Gregor Piatigorsky.

The orchestra will give six concerts in Sanders Theater, Cambridge, two each in New Haven, Hartford and Newark, and single concerts in Springfield, Hunter College, New York, New Brunswick, Philadelphia, Washington, D. C., Pittsburgh, Cincinnati, Cleveland, Chicago, Milwaukee, Ann Arbor, Detroit and Rochester, N. Y.

ATLANTA, GA.
JOURNAL
SEP 6 - 1948

Remove the Federal Tax From Opera and Symphony

ARE OPERA and symphonic music worth federal protection from bankruptcy? The question is not academic, nor is it unimportant. Many Americans—perhaps it can be said millions of Americans—cherish the Metropolitan Opera, the Philharmonic and other great orchestras as cultural assets of the nation which must be preserved.

A calm statistical survey made by the New York Times indicates that the grave financial difficulties which threaten the permanence of several of our leading musical associations can be averted by repeal of the federal tax on admission to amusements.

For example, the deficit of the Metropolitan Opera Assn. for the 1947-48 season was about $220,000. For performances in New City alone, the Met had turned $300,000 over to the Internal Revenue Collector, and an additional $150,000 from admissions on tour.

The Philharmonic's deficit last season was $109,000, but the government got $125,000 in admissions taxes.

The Philadelphia Orchestra went $176,000 into the red in '47-'48, but paid $96,000 in federal and city taxes.

The Boston Orchestra fell short by $30,000 of meeting expenses but remitted $180,000 to the Treasury.

Except for these taxes, it is argued, all four of those enterprises, which are civic in nature and non-profit in principle, would have been self-supporting. The top ticket price at the Met is $7.50, including tax, the box office retaining $6.25 and sending $1.25 to Washington. That's a heavy tax on culture.

It seems to The Journal that immunity might well be granted to the Metropolitan and the civic orchestras throughout the country. The sum total of the taxes collected means little to the treasury, yet there is a staggering load on each contributing enterprise. In Europe such institutions receive governmental subsidy. The point has not yet been reached to make such subsidies necessary here, but surely the federal treasury can spare collections which threaten the continuance of great cultural performances.

Through radio, by the generosity of the broadcasting companies and the public spirit of some advertisers, the world's best music now is carried to every citizen who cares to listen. Opera and symphony music no longer are available to the wealthy only. They are brought to all, and nothing should be permitted to abolish the great privilege.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE
SEP 9 - 1948

Boston Symphony Starts Its 68th Season Oct. 8

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will begin its sixty-eighth season and its twenty-fifth and last under Serge Koussevitzky's direction, on Friday afternoon and Saturday night, Oct. 8 and 9, in Boston's Symphony Hall. Dr. Koussevitzky's program will include Vivaldi's concerto in D minor and Brahms's Variations on a Theme by Haydn, which this conductor offered in his first Boston concert in October, 1924; Honegger's symphony for strings, and Beethoven's seventh symphony. The list of guest leaders includes two Americans who studied with Dr. Koussevitzky at Tanglewood, Leonard Bernstein and Thor Johnson, the latter conductor of the Cincinnati Symphony; Eleazar de Carvalho, Igor Stravinsky and Ernest Ansermet, of the Orchestra de la Suisse Romande in Geneva. Soulima Stravinsky, pianist, will be a soloist in a Boston concert under his father's direction.

The dates of the Boston Symphony's five Wednesday night and five Saturday afternoon concerts at Carnegie Hall are Nov. 10-13, Jan. 12-15, Feb. 16-19, March 16-19 and April 13-16. The orchestra will also give a concert at Hunter College.

COLUMBUS, OHIO
DISPATCH
[illegible] 2 1948

Koussevitzky Opens Last Season Oct. 8

ON Friday afternoon, Oct. 8, in Symphony Hall, Serge Koussevitzky will open his 25th and last season as the music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. This will be the 68th season of the orchestra.

Through a quarter of a century, Dr. Koussevitzky has devoted the greater part of his career to his orchestra, while identifying himself with the country which is now his own. He has concerned himself deeply with the musical growth of America and the development of its foremost composers through performance.

The conductor will base his opening program on the program which was his choice for his opening concert in Boston in the autumn of 1943. It will thus include Vivaldi's Orchestral Concerto in D minor, and Brahms Variations on a theme by Haydn. Honeggers String Symphony will replace the same composer's "Pacific 231." Beethoven's 7th Symphony will close the program.

EAST LIVERPOOL, O.
REVIEW

SEP 8 - 1948

What's The Pitch?

By HARRY A. M'CREA

A LETTER-WRITER to the New York Times reports that he and a friend used sound-measuring equipment to check a broadcast of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and verified for their own satisfaction what has been known for years—that the Boston orchestra tunes to a higher pitch than any other major orchestra.

Standard pitch is the sound given off by a tuning fork vibrating 435 times a second at 15 degrees centigrade. The Boston orchestra's pitch is 444.4 vibrations, although the Times correspondent reported that it varied slightly from this.

Standard pitch was established in 1859 when a delegation of musicians, including Jan Halevy, Meyerbeer, Auber, Rossini and Ambroise Thomas, recommended to the French government that the 435-vibration standard be made official. France approved and other countries followed suit, Great Britain being the last. For years London's Covent Garden Opera orchestra tuned to a 456-vibration pitch. British military bands used such a variety of pitches that in 1929 the army issued an order adopting the French standard.

—:—

BEFORE THE French took their standarization step, pitch varied widely. Early organ builders didn't worry about it. For organ pipes, diameters and wind pressures weren't specified, so that no two organs had the same pitch. Most were tuned to a very high pitch. Usually it was more than 500 vibrations. When the violin replaced the lute and the viol, however, it was necessary to lower the pitch because the new instrument would not stand the high tensions to which the older instruments were adaptable.

The Boston orchestra's higher pitch helps give it a tone quality that sets it off from other symphony orchestras, although this quality isn't detected by the average radio listener. The Boston orchestra's tone quality is described as taut, sharp. This is in part due to its higher pitch and also to its conductor, Serge Koussevitsky, a strict disciplinarian, whose personality is reflected in the kind of music his men produce.

The Philadelphia orchestra is the only other major symphonic organization with a tone quality that experts find readily identifiable. This quality is described as autumnal, golden, because of the orchestra's magnificent string section.

—:—

NOW THAT Dr. Koussevitsky is retiring as the Boston orchestra's conductor, it will be interesting to see if his successor, Charles Muench, puts his musicians on standard pitch. It also will be interesting to watch for other subt e changes that won't be a matter of weeks or months.

During his 25 years at Boston, Dr. Koussevistky had a distin guished career, keeping the o chestra at the high standard se by his predecessors, Nikisch, Muc and Monteux. There are some wor shipers at the shrine of Johan Sebastian Bach, however, who wis the good doctor had not sought t secret of the music of the man Eisenach.

I once spent a musical evenin with a Bach devotee who had th scores and recordings of th Brandenburg concertos as done b Koussevitsky and as done by th Busch Chamber Players. The goo doctor had a rough evening.

DALLAS, TEX.
NEWS
SEP [illegible]

Koussevitsky In His Final Boston Season

Special to The News

BOSTON, Mass., Sept. 14.—Beginning Oct. 8 in Boston's Symphony Hall, Serge Koussevitzky will open his twenty-fifth and last season as the music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and ~~the orchestra's sixty~~-eighth season. Dr. Koussevitzky will base his opening program on the program which was his choice for his opening concert in Boston in the autumn of 1924. It will include Vivaldi's Orchestral Concerto in D Minor and Brahm's Variations on a Theme by Haydn. Honegger's String Symphony will replace the same composer's "Pacific 231." Beethoven's Seventh Symphony will close the program.

Guest conductors for the longer series in Boston will include a famous composer and a distinguished visitor from Europe—Igor Stravinsky and Ernest Ansermet. Three conductors who have developed their talents under Dr. Koussevitzky's tutelage at Tanglewood will appear as guests: Leonard Bernstein, Eleazar de Carvalho (from Brazil) and Thor Johnson (conductor of the Cincinnati Orchestra). Soloists will include the pianists Rudolf Firkusny, Nicole Henriot, Myra Hess, Vladimir Horovitz and Soulima Stravinsky, who will play when his father conducts; the violinist Jascha Heifetz; and the cellist, Gregor Piatigorsky. The orchestra will fulfill twenty-six out-of-town engagements during the forthcoming season.

[158]

HOUSTON, TEX.
CHRONICLE

Koussevitzky's 25th and Last Season in Boston Opens Oct. 8

BOSTON, Sept. 11.—(Sp)—Serge Koussevitzky will begin his twenty-fifth and last season as musical director of the Boston Symphony orchestra Friday, Oct. 8, at Symphony Hall. It will be the sixty-eighth season of the orchestra.

Charles Munch, brilliant French conductor, has been engaged for the orchestra's 1949-50 season.

For a quarter of a century, Dr. Koussevitzky has concerned himself with the musical growth of America and the development of its foremost composers through performances of their works.

The conductor will base his opening concert on the program which was chosen for his first concert in Boston in the autumn of 1924. It will include Vivaldi's Concerto in D Minor, and Brahms' Variations on a Theme by Haydn. Honegger's String Symphony will replace the same composer's "Pacific 231." Beethoven's 7th Symphony will close the program.

The Boston Symphony orchestra will give its usual four series of concerts in Symphony Hall: 24 Friday afternoon and 24 Saturday evening concerts. In the shorter series there will be six Sunday afternoon and nine Tuesday evening concerts. All seats for the two evening series are completely subscribed for the season.

Guest conductors for the longer series will include a famous composer and a distinguished visitor from Europe: Igor Stravinsky and Ernst Ansermet. Three conductors who have developed their talents under the direction of Dr. Koussevitzky at the Berkshire Music Center in Tanglewood, and who have since taken their places in the concert world, will appear as guests. They are Leonard Bernstein, Eleazar de Calavho, and Thor Johnson.

The soloists will include pianists Rudolf Firkusny, Nicole Henriot, Myra Hess, Vladimir Horowitz, and Soulima Stravinsky, who will play when his father conducts; Jascha Heifetz, violinist, and Gregor Piatigorsky, 'cellist.

MUSICAL WHISPERS

By AL WOHL

Howdy Folks,

IT'S GOOD TO BE BACK.

Now that the summer vacation is almost over, and all of the wandering musicians are looking forward to a successful fall and winter season, let us sit back and take inventory of what happened during the past two months.

The Metropolitan threatened to close their doors, crying wolf, but the underlying factor that prompted the board to threaten to close up shop was the fact that the stage hands union was asking for a raise in pay. The Union retracted their demand and the Met will open on schedule. To my way of thinking, if all of the present members of the board would hand in their resignation, and elect business men, who know to operate big business. I am sure that the Met would end their season every year with a handsome profit, instead of a deficit.

"The "Give-Away Radio Programs" are in the news again. Many complaints were made to the FCC, but nothing has been done as yet. All one hears is a lot of talk and nothing else. Many a good program is not being heard, on account of the particular time schedule which interferes with some give-away program. The 'Stop The Music Program" is sensational at the present time. By the way, here's a hint for you. It is not a fish but a fowl, in fact it is a large holiday bird, and it's perched on a tree. Now get to work on it.

A Maestro's Finale

Serge Koussevitzky begins his last season ~~with~~ the Boston Symphony on October 8. It will be interesting to note that the final program will be a duplicate of the first Boston concert Koussevitzky in 1924. He will open up with Vivaldi's Concerto in D minor and will end the program with Beethoven's 7th Symphony. Among the guest conductors will be Igor Strawinsky, with his son Soulima as piano soloist. Leonard Bernstein and Thor Johnson. . . Speaking of Bernstein, the musical grapevine has it that he will take over the conducting as permanent conductor of the Palestine Philharmonic Symphony this fall. The Philadelphia and the Cleveland Orchestra have their respective schedules all mapped out for the coming season.

LOS ANGELES, CAL.
TIMES

Serge Koussevitzky will begin his 25th and ~~final~~ season as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Oct. 8, playing a program that is practically a replica of the one with which he introduced himself to Bostonians in the fall of 1924. It will consist of Vivaldi's Concerto in D Major, Brahms' Variations on a Theme by Haydn, and Beethoven's Seventh Symphony. Honegger's "Pacific 231" on the original program will be replaced by the same composer's String Symphony. Guest conductors during the coming Boston season will be Igor Stravinsky, Ernest Ansermet and three young men whose talents were developed under Koussevitzky at the Berkshire Music Center: Leonard Bernstein, Eleazar de Carvalho, and Thor Johnson.

Herald - July 20, '48

Cry from the Esplanade

The Esplanade concerts are in their last week, and a fearsome $5000 deficit looms. There is a cry for a little help.

When the crowds mass in front of the Shell, it is natural for a man (or woman) to look around and say, "Gosh, what a bunch, they must be giving a lot; I don't need to." But the fact remains that the contributions at the seven tables and by mail fall seriously short of the $30,000 shoestring that the concerts go on.

Philadelphia is having to give up a large chunk of its Robin Hood Dell concerts because subscriptions are 'way below the $150,000 budget they operate on there. Here we have a far more reasonable expense sheet, and no tickets. Surely we can go along with a little more.

There is no high pressure campaign for the Esplanade concerts. It is only a little that is asked. But if everyone who goes to this week's concerts puts a dollar in on one day or another, the budget will be met.

Monitor Sept 18

rt—Music—Theater

ty Season

New Works And Revivals On Schedule

Novelties and revivals of works introduced here by Serge Koussevitzky in the last 24 years will be heard in his last season as director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which starts with the concerts of Oct. 8 and 9.

American composers who will be represented by new works include Irving Fine, Leo Sowerby and Howard Hanson. There will also be novelties by European and South American composers, to be announced later.

Recalling the service of Koussevitzky to the American composer there will be revivals of works sponsored by the conductor. Represented on this list will be Copland, Piston, Schuman, Barber, Harris, and Cowell.

There also will be revivals of important European works which have been introduced to these concerts by Koussevitzky. These will include Bach's Mass in B minor, Bartók's Concerto for Orchestra, Prokofiev's Fifth Symphony of Shostakovitch.

Vladimir Horowitz, who made his Boston debut in 1928, playing the Third Piano Concerto by Rachmaninov, will repeat that work, and Jascha Heifetz will repeat Prokofiev's Second Violin Concerto, which he played here in 1937.

The season, which will be the sixty-eighth by this orchestra, will include the two longer series of 24 Friday afternoon and 24 Saturday evening concerts and the shorter series of 9 Tuesday evening and 6 Sunday afternoons in Symphony Hall. Subscription tickets are still to be had for the two afternoon series only.

The guest conductors will be Igor Stravinsky, Ernst Ansermet, Leonard Bernstein, Eleazar de Carvalho, and Thor Johnson. The soloists will include Rudolf Firkusny, Nicole Henriot, Myra Hess, Vladimir Horowitz, Soulima Stravinsky, Jascha Heifetz, and Gregor Piatigorsky.

N. ADAMS, MASS.
TRANSCRIPT
SEP 23 1948

Koussevitzky Leaves For Boston Oct. 8

Now Resting in Lenox—To Prepare for His 25th and Last Season as Boston Symphony Conductor.

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will leave his ~~Lenox summer home,~~ where he has been resting since the close of the Berkshire festival and Berkshire Music center last month, to prepare for the opening of the Boston Symphony orchestra season, his 25th and last as conductor, on Oct. 8.

Rehearsals of the orchestra after its six-week vacation will start with his arrival in Boston in preparation for the 50 or more concerts in that city and its score of road appearances during the autumn, winter and spring.

Dr. Koussevitzky has interrupted his vacation in Lenox to lay out preliminary plans for the new season and decide on the major works to be presented. These, he indicated at Lenox yesterday, will include several new works and many of the now recognized pieces which he has introduced in his quarter century with the Boston orchestra. His resignation as its conductor will be effective after the new season and the festival season at Tanglewood next summer. He will continue as director of the Berkshire Music center at Tanglewood, however.

JERSEY CITY, N. J.
JERSEY JOURNAL
SEP 22 1948

Fiscal Success Aim Of J. C. Symphony

Do the music lovers of Hudson County support their own symphony orchestra?

According to facts gleaned from Benjamin J. Lucarelli, president of the Jersey City Philharmonic, other Philharmonic leaders and experts in the concert management field, they do not.

But this is nothing unusual in that virtually every large musical organizations in the United States does not only fail to pay its way, but actually the collective debt of serious music in the nation is estimated at $15 million.

What is unusual about Jersey City is that men like Lucarelli have set out to defy the situation with a determination to beat the saddest set of circumstances that have ever confronted American music.

"We are interested in nothing less than success," Lucarelli says. "We feel that fiscal success is our only means toward accomplishing the advancement and popularization of the better music in this corner of New Jersey."

As the recreational and cultural expenditures of the average American family disintegrate under the pressure of high prices, the fiscal facts of American music are these:

Almost all musical organizations have operating deficits they count upon as certain as death or taxes. The exception that proves the rule is the Hollywood Bowl series.

The national average for receipts through ticket sales is about 30 per cent.

Most of the income of musical organizations—about 60 per cent on the national average—goes to artists and personnel.

IMMEDIATE PROBLEMS

The Jersey City Philharmonic's immediate problems, as it enters its tenth anniversary season, are these:

The Philharmonic has upped its total annual budget to $29,000, an increase of some $4,000 over last year.

If the Hudson group is to come anywhere near meeting this, the Philharmonic must, at least, play to capacity audiences at all its performances—a feat in itself—, and increase by 50 per cent its income from program advertising.

How does the Philharmonic support itself? Its major income results from direct contributions from patrons and donors, and from program advertising. A lesser portion comes from seasonal subscribers. A minute amount is interests from two endownment, and an infinitismal amount, which might be measured in a fraction of a per cent, comes from box office sales.

Business and industrial houses help out a great deal by buying large blocks of seats seasonally for their personnel. This has been found to pay off in better personnel relations, the companies report.

Most of the subscriptions and donor receipts are raised in the annual fall campaign.

The prospect of individual wealthy sponsors, like Kahn of the Metropolitan, Higginson of the Boston Symphony, and Mackay of the New York Philharmonic is a fact less actual than it is historical.

BENEFACTORS

The nearest the Jersey City Philharmonic has come to this are the sudden, hurry-up searches by its leaders for large sums to meet an overnight financial reverse or the cost of a new promotional project. The Philharmonic has had several such benefactors.

American musical promoters are turning an envious eye toward the many foreign countries where music is subsidized, if only in part, by government. American managers feel that non-profit opera and music, and that's just about all of it, deserve no less consideration from government than do schools, libraries and museums, in that they are no less cultural efforts.

CITY CONCERTS

The city of Jersey City comes close to this in that Mayor Frank H. Eggers and the board of education usually contract each year for the presentation of a number of free children's concerts through the auspices of the Philharmonic.

Although Hudson's concert goers do not pay anywhere near the cost of their musical enjoyment [illegible] patronage is not the problem [illegible] Jersey City Philharmonic [illegible] plays to an 80 per cent [illegible] slightly better than the national average.

And though deficit has become a family word in Philharmonic management as with most other musical enterprises [illegible] are met, if only through [illegible] contributions from patrons [illegible] benefactors.

Concludes Lucarelli: "So [illegible] the Philharmonic talks [illegible] determination toward [illegible] civic and cultural aims [illegible] going ahead of these financial difficulties. Hudson's music lovers can feel a certain pride in its orchestra and the many excellent men and women who work so unselfishly toward defying these discouraging circumstances."

BENJAMIN LUCARELLI

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
SEP 23 1948

KOUSSEVITZKY LISTS SEASONAL NOVELTIES

A new [illegible] Britten [illegible] "Peter Grimes" [illegible] world premiere [illegible] Serge Koussevitzky's [illegible] final season [illegible] the Boston Symphony Orchestra [illegible] be presented.

Among [illegible] performances [illegible] Oliver Messiaen [illegible] the Koussevitzky [illegible] tion; a symphony [illegible] piano concerto [illegible] the latter [illegible] Firkusny as soloist [illegible] by Irving Fine.

Vaughan Williams' [illegible] phony, which had its American première at the Berkshire [illegible] last July [illegible] phony of [illegible] for first Boston [illegible] mer [illegible] Oct. 15.

In addition [illegible] Brazilian [illegible] troduce [illegible] his own [illegible] Fernandez [illegible] Villa-Lobos.

Works [illegible] Koussevitzky [illegible] during the [illegible] clude Bach's [illegible] "Faust" Symphony [illegible] certo for [illegible] Fifth Symphony [illegible] "Daphnis" and "Song [illegible] gale" and the [illegible] by Shostakovitch.

SPRINGF
MORNI

KOUSSEVITZ FINAL SE STARTS

Boston Symphony ~~Will Introduce~~ New Work

In preparation for his 2 son in America as cond ston Symphony Orche ussevitzky will return end of this month. F concert in Symphony his program will recall debut in 1924. Koussevitzky, at h n Lenox, has been plans for his final s introduce some new le interest. Benjami composed his ope for Tanglewood, h mphony which wi premiere by this Messiaen, outstandi er generation of F composed, by c ussevitzky Musi w symphony o for large fo performed this sea

---

HARTFORD, CO
TIMES
SEP

Koussevitsky Rea For Final Season

In preparation for his 25 final season in America a ductor of the Boston Sym Orchestra, Serge Koussevits return to Boston at the end month. For his opening con Symphony Hall on Oct. 8, h gram will recall his Am debut in 1924. The orchest give a concert in Hartford 16 at Bushnell Memorial.

Dr. Koussevitsky has spending his time at his su home in Lenox in laying o plans for his final season. I introduce some new wor notable interest. Benjamin ten. who composed his "Peter Grimes," for Tangle has written a new sym which will have its world p ere by this orchestra.

Olivier Messiaen, outsta among the younger generati French composers, has com by commission of the Kous y Music Foundation, a mphony of unusual length r large forces which wi rformed this season. The ymphony by Ralph Vaug illiams which had its Ame emiere at the Berkshire estival last July will figure . Koussevitsky's third pro Oct. 22.

A Toccata by Irving Fine introduced at the same rts. Stravinsky will condu ite from his Ballet, "Orfe w symphony by Leo Sower nounced, and a piano con Howard Hanson (with Ru rkusny as soloist). Eleaza rvalho, the Brazilian nductor, will introduce two rks from his own country fonia by Fernandez, and m carara by Villa Lobos. ussevitsky announces for the first Boston performa the 7th Symphony by Gu ler.

MIDDLETOWN, CO
PRESS
SEP 24 194

USIC SCHOLARSHIPS PLA

A special grant of $4,000 for ships in private instrumental d operatic study was anno nday, Sept. 24, by Moshe Pa rector of the Julius Hartt M undation in Hartford.

The grant was announced si usly with the appointment t nestral instrument staff d musicians associated with on Symphony, New York monic Symphony and Philade orchestras. Those appointed Kenton Terry, flute; Fred trombone; Sigmund Hering, trum Simeon Bellison, clarinet; double bass; and Joseph viola.

Aim ony

upport their ow

min J. Lucarell her Philharmoni nt field, they d

N LUCARELLI

cal enjoyment, patt the problem: the Philharmonic usually per cent full house.
than the national 'deficit" has become rd in Philharmonic as with most other rprises, the deficits nly through hurry-up from patricious ben-

Lucarelli: "So when onic talks about its toward fulfilling its ural aims and keep-these financial diffin's music lovers can pride in its orches-many excellent men who work so unseldefying these discumstances."

W YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
EP 23 1948

VITZKY LISTS
NAL NOVELTIES

ymphony by Benjamin mposer of the opera, mes," will receive its ère during Serge Kous-forthcoming twentynal season as conductor ton Symphony Orchesother novelties also will d.

he new works up for are a symphony by saien, commissioned by vitzky Music Foundaphony by Leo Sowerby, rto by Howard Hanson, be given with Rudolf soloist, and a Toccata Fine.
Williams' Sixth Symch had its American the Berkshire Festival and the Seventh Symustav Mahler are slated oston hearings, the for-ct. 22 and the latter on, Eleazar de Carvalho, uest conductor, will innew compositions from country, a Sinfonia by and "Manducarara" by o be revived by Dr.

ky, which he introduced past in Boston, will in-
B minor Mass, Liszt's mphony, Bartók's Con-
Orchestra, Prokofieff's mphony, Stravinsky's
"Song of the Nightin-the Seventh Symphony kovich.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
MORNING UNION

KOUSSEVITZKY'S FINAL SEASON STARTS OCT. 8

Boston Symphony Conductor ~~Will Intro~~duce Many New Works

[illegible]

6th Symphony by Ralph Vaughan-Williams, which had its American premiere at the Berkshire Music Festival last July, will figure upon Dr. Koussevittzky's third program, Oct. 22. A Toccata by Irving Fine will be introduced at the same concerts. Stravinsky will conduct a suite from his ballet, "Orfeo." A new symphony by Leo Sowerby is announced and a piano concerto by Howard Hanson (with Rudolph Firkusny as soloist). Eleazar de Carvalho, the Brazilian guest conductor, will introduce two new works from his own country; a Sinfonia by Fernandez, and Manducarara by Villa Lobos. Dr. Koussevitzky announces for Oct. 15 the first Boston performance of the 7th Symphony by Gustave Mahler.

His program will revive a number of works which he has introduced to these concerts in the course of 24 years. These will include: Bach's Mass in B Minor, Bela Bartok's Concerto for Orchestra, Proofieff's 5th Symphony, Lizt's "Faust" Symphony, Stravinsky's "Ode" and "Song of the Nightingale," and the 7th Symphony by Shostakovich. Vladimir Horowitz, who made his Boston debut in 1928 playing the Third Piano Concerto by Rachmaninoff, will repeat that work and Jascha Heifetz will return to repeat Prokofieff's Second Violin Concerto which he played here in 1937. Jesus Maria Sanroma will return to repeat Ravel's Piano Concerto, which he gave its first American performance under Koussevitzky's direction on April 22, 1932.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's 68th season will include concerts in Cambridge, New Haven, Hartford, Newark, Springfield, New York (Carnegie Hall and Hunter College), Brooklyn, New Brunswick, Philadelphia, Washington, Pittsburgh, Cincinnati, Cleveland, Chicago, Milwaukee, Ann Arbor, Detroit, Rochester. Guest conductors will be: Igor Stravinsky, Ernst Ansermet, Leonard Bernstein, Eleazar de Carvalho, and Thor Johnson. Solists will include: Firkusny, Nicole Henriot, Myra Hess, Horowitz, Soulima Stravinsky, Heifetz, and Piatigorsky.

SYRACUSE, N. Y.
HERALD-AMERICAN
SEP 26 1948

Dr. Koussevitzky Maps His 25th And Final Boston Symphony Season

IN PREPARATION FOR his 25th and final season in America as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will return to Boston at the end of this month. For his opening concert in Symphony Hall, Oct. 8, his program will recall his American debut in 1924. Dr. Koussevitzky has been at his summer home in Lenox, Mass., making plans for his final season. He will introduce some new works of notable interest. Benjamin Britten, who composed his opera, "Peter Grimes," for Tanglewood, has written a new symphony which will have its world premiere by this orchestra. Olivier Messiaen, outstanding among the younger generation of French composers, has composed, by commission of the Koussevitzky Music Foundation, a new symphony described as of unusual length and for large forces which will be performed this season. The Sixth Symphony by Ralph Vaughan-Williams which had its American premiere in the Berkshire Music Festival last July will figure upon Dr. Koussevitzky's third program Oct. 22. A Toccata by Irving Fine will be introduced at the same concerts. Stravinsky will conduct a suite from his ballet, "Orfeo." A new symphony by Leo Sowerby is announced, and a piano concerto by Howard Hanson (with Rudolf Firkusny as soloist). Eleazar de Carvalho, Brazilian guest conductor, will introduce two new works from his own country; a Sinfonia by Fernandez, and Manducarara by Villa Lobos. Dr. Koussevitzky announces for Oct. 15 the first Boston performance of the Seventh Symphony by Gustav Mahler.

HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

Koussevitsky Ready For Final Season

In preparation for his 25th and final season in America as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitsky will return to Boston at the end of this month. For his opening concert in Symphony Hall on Oct. 8, his program will recall his American debut in 1924. The orchestra will give a concert in Hartford Mar. 16 at Bushnell Memorial.

Dr. Koussevitsky has been spending his time at his summer home in Lenox in laying out his plans for his final season. He will introduce some new works of notable interest. Benjamin Britten, who composed his opera, "Peter Grimes," for Tanglewood, has written a new symphony which will have its world premiere by this orchestra.

Olivier Messiaen, outstanding among the younger generation of French composers, has composed, by commission of the Koussevitsky Music Foundation, a new symphony of unusual length and for large forces which will be performed this season. The 6th Symphony by Ralph Vaughan-Williams which had its American premiere at the Berkshire Music Festival last July will figure upon Dr Koussevitsky's third program on Oct. 22.

A Toccata by Irving Fine will be introduced at the same concerts. Stravinsky will conduct a suite from his Ballet, "Orfeo." A new symphony by Leo Sowerby is announced, and a piano concerto by Howard Hanson (with Rudolf Firkusny as soloist). Eleazar de Carvalho, the Brazilian guest conductor, will introduce two new works from his own country; a Sinfonia by Fernandez, and manducarara by Villa Lobos. Dr. Koussevitsky announces for Oct. 15 the first Boston performance of the 7th Symphony by Gustav Mahler.

MIDDLETOWN, CONN.
PRESS
SEP 24 1948

MUSIC SCHOLARSHIPS PLANNED

A special grant of $4,000 [illegible]

[illegible] New York [illegible] Symphony and Philadelphia [illegible] These appointed [illegible] Fred [illegible] Herman [illegible] bass [illegible] viola [illegible] Joseph De-

---

ALBANY, N. Y.
TIMES-UNION
SEP 26 1948

Music

By EDGAR S. VAN OLINDA

REID Callahan, president of the Albany Symphony orchestra, announces the appointment of Edgar Curtis of Boston as conductor of the local group for the season of 1948-9, succeeding Ole Winningstad. Alexander Leslie, previously announced to head the orchestra, found that his duties as conductor of the Springfield orchestra would not permit him sufficient time to handle both assignments.

Mr. Curtis, of Scotch parentage, studied piano in Aberdeen under Rudolph Serkin, internationally known teacher and soloist. He came to the United States in 1939, continuing his work with Mr. Serkin. He studied conducting under Fritz Reiner of the Pittsburgh orchestra and Serge Koussevitsky of the Boston Symphony, spending several seasons with the school at Tanglewood. He is now a member of the faculty of Boston university as conductor and teacher of instrumentation. Mr. Curtis will commute between Springfield, his home, and Albany each Tuesday for rehearsals and on the days of the concerts by the local group.

* * *

After three months of work and play at his summer studio at Chazy lake, Reinald Werrenrath began teaching at the Albany Conservatory of Musical Art, 42 Dove street, last Thursday. One of the busiest concert and oratorio singers for more than 30 years and a leading baritone of the Metropolitan Opera company, Dr. Warrenrath has taken more time off each season for teaching and conducting, until these activities have consumed the major portion of his working hours. This year marks the opening of his ninth consecutive season as vocal teacher in Albany, and his seventh as conductor of the Mendelssohn club.

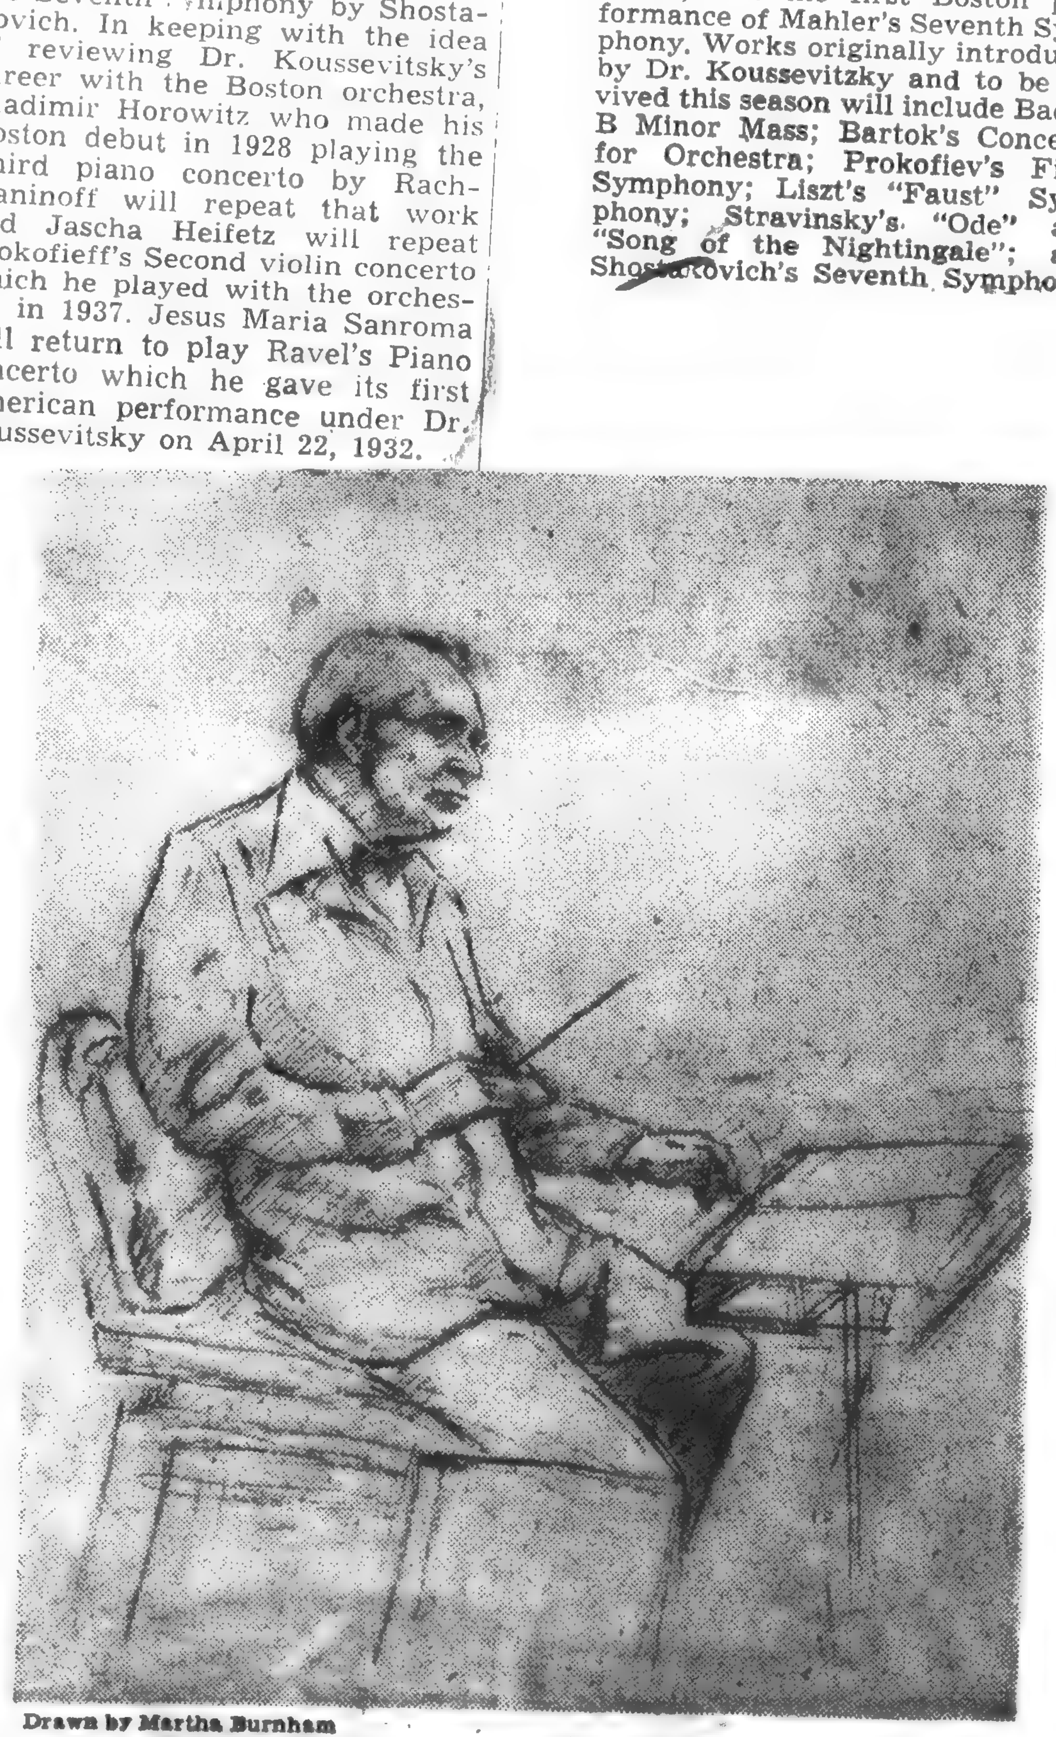
Davenport Iowa
Democrat
SEP 26 1948

SERGEI KOUSSEVITSKY

. . . in preparation for his 25th and final season as conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra will return to Boston late this month from his summer home at Lenox, Mass. For his opening concert in Symphony Hall in Boston, on Oct. 8, his program will recall his American debut in 1924. Altho he will introduce many new works this season, his programs will revive a number of works which he has introduced to the Boston concerts in the course of 24 years.

AMONG THE

. . . works which Dr. Koussevitsky will revive this season are Bach's Mass in B Minor; Bela Bartok's concerto for orchestra, Prokofieff's Fifth Symphony, Listz's "Faust" symphony, Stravinsky's "Ode" and "The Song of the Nightingale" and the Seventh Symphony by Shostakovich. In keeping with the idea of reviewing Dr. Koussevitsky's career with the Boston orchestra, Vladimir Horowitz who made his Boston debut in 1928 playing the Third piano concerto by Rachmaninoff will repeat that work and Jascha Heifetz will repeat Prokofieff's Second violin concerto which he played with the orchestra in 1937. Jesus Maria Sanroma will return to play Ravel's Piano concerto which he gave its first American performance under Dr. Koussevitsky on April 22, 1932.



Drawn by Martha Burnham

Serge Koussevitzky, beginning his twenty-fifth and final season as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Oct. 8.

DALLAS, TEX.
NEWS
[illegible] 1948

THE MUSICAL DIGEST

By ERIC CLAUDIN

New Britten Symphony On Boston Calendar

BOSTON: For his twenty-fifth and final season in America as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky will introduce many new works of considerable interest. Benjamin Britten has written a new symphony which will have its world premiere by the orchestra, and Olivier Messiaen has composed a new symphony of unusual length and for large forces to be performed this season.

Other notable events will be the Sixth Symphony by Ralph Vaughan Williams; a Toccata by Irving Fine; Stravinsky conducting a suite from his ballet "Orfeo"; a new symphony by Leo Sowerby; a piano concerto by Howard Hanson; a Sinfonia by Fernandez; Manducarara by Villa-Lobos, and the first Boston performance of Mahler's Seventh Symphony. Works originally introduced by Dr. Koussevitzky and to be revived this season will include Bach's B Minor Mass; Bartok's Concerto for Orchestra; Prokofiev's Fifth Symphony; Liszt's "Faust" Symphony; Stravinsky's "Ode" and "Song of the Nightingale"; and Shostakovich's Seventh Symphony.

SCHENECTADY, N. Y.
GAZETTE
SEP 28 1948

Carl Fischer Inc. has announced the opening of a new concert hall for early October. It occupies the entire second floor of the publisher's new building at 165 West 57th street in New York. The hall has a professional stage and is wired for recording and a public address system. It is planned after European recital halls with ornamental vaulted ceiling, patrons' loges and arched paneled mirrors. The walls are beige with gold draperies.

Serge Koussevitzky plans to introduce some new works of notable interest to the Boston audience during the coming season. Included are a new symphony by Benjamin Britten (a world premiere) and a new symphony by Olivier Messiaen. Ralph Vaughan-Williams Sixth Symphony, which had its American premiere at Tanglewood during the summer, will be played in Boston on Oct. 22. A Toccata by Iring Fine will be introduced at the same concert.

Stravinsky will conduct the Boston orchestra in a suite from his ballet, "Orfeo." A new symphony by Leo Sowerby has been announced and a piano concerto by Howard Hanson (with Rudolf Firkusny as soloist). The first Boston performance of Gustav Mahler's seventh symphony will be performed on Oct. 15.

Guest conductors for the year have been announced as Igor Stravinsky, Ernst Ansermet, Leonard Bernstein, Eleazar deCarvalho and Thor Johnson.

FINDLAY, OHIO
REPUBLICAN COURIER
SEP 30 1948

Hawthorne Cottage Is Restored As Important Music Center

MAESTRO and students at work in a famous studio—Serge Koussevitzky, left, directs Seymour Lipkin at the piano, as Howard Shanet of Hunter College, New York, watches.

HAWTHORNE'S red house, which has been restored by the National Federation of Music Clubs for the studios of Serge Koussevitzky and Gregor Piatigorsky, cellist.

LENOX, Mass.—(AP)—The Hawthorne cottage at Tanglewood, between Lenox and Stockbridge, Mass., has been restored and now houses three studios, including Serge Koussevitzky's class in advanced orchestral conducting.

Mrs. Guy Patterson Gannett of Portland, Me., former president of the National Federation of Music Clubs and chairman of the committee for restoration, has presented the house where Nathaniel Hawthorne lived in 1850-1851 to the Berkshire Music Center.

There the novelist wrote "The House of Seven Gables."

A two-day music festival was arranged for the dedication.

Manning Hawthorne, the oldest grandson of the novelist, and Henry Wadsworth Longfellow Dana, great grandson of the poet, were among scheduled speakers, as was Mrs. Royden J. Keith of Chicago, national president of the federation and Gay Tapley of Portland, Me.

TEACHER AND PUPIL—Richard Burgin, right, associate director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, shown with Jan Stocklinski, concertma[redacted]pringfield Symphony, who was his pupil for several years. They were talking shop last night at the Auditorium before the rehearsal for tonight's opening concert. Mr. Burgin will play Brahms' Violin Concerto in D Major.

Burgin Misses His Dinner To Attend Rehearsal Here

Fortified Only by Pie and Coffee for Practice for Performance Here Tonight

What with a concert in Boston in the afternoon and a rehearsal in Springfield at night, Richard Burgin, associate director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, hardly had time to eat yesterday.

In fact, he stepped on the stage at the Auditorium to rehearse Brahms' Concerto in D Major at 8.30 last night after a "dinner" of a cup of coffee and a piece of pie.

Hurry, Hurry!

A car from Springfield was at Symphony Hall, Boston, to meet him and bring him to this city as soon as the afternoon performance ended. The driver suggested along the way that they stop for dinner, but Mr. Burgin was more anxious about keeping his appointment promptly than satisfying his appetite. So, not until they were nearly to Springfield and seemed to have a few minutes to spare did Mr. Burgin agree to pause—for coffee and pie.

As he came on the stage, where the 85 members of the Springfield Symphony were already polishing up portions of the concerto for tonight's opening performance of the 1948-49 season, the violin soloist was alert and ready for the practice.

He conferred briefly, in low tones, with Alexander Leslie, director of the Springfield Symphony, and then went to work. The entire concerto was played, with interruptions now and then as Mr. Burgin, by simply lowering his violin, indicated all was not quite up to standard.

A rather short man with gray hair, Mr. Burgin is soft-spoken and is an artist who plays without flourishes. Dissatisfaction and disapproval he suggests by a fleeting gesture or expression, without emphasis. Satisfaction and approval he seems to stress, as a pleasant smile plays around his mouth.

It is the type of smile and winning expression that earns the best possible results from a group of musicians.

Spots Smoothed Out

When the Brahms' work had been finished, Mr. Burgin turned back through the score on Mr. Leslie's stand and pointed out three or four spots he wished to repeat with the orchestra. This was done, the Burgin smile of approval flashed, the soloist thanked the members of the orchestra and strode briskly off the stage.

Mr. Leslie gave a few final instructions to the musicians and dismissed them. The rehearsal was over.

Besides Brahms' Violin Concerto in D Major played by Mr. Burgin, the program for tonight's opening concert includes the Academic Overture by Brahms and the Symphony No. 2 in C Minor by Tschaikowsky, the "Little Russian" symphony. The concert will begin at 8.30 in the Municipal Auditorium.

THE CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR, BOSTON, SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 25, 1948 Art—Music—Theat cast—New Works for the Symphony Season An

New Works by Benjamin Britten and Olivier Messiaen Scheduled

New symphonies by Benjamin Britten and Olivier Messiaen will be among the novelties to be presented by Dr. Koussevitzky in his twenty-fifth and final season as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The season begins on Oct. 8.

The Sixth Symphony of Ralph Vaughan Williams, which had its first American performance at Tanglewood last July, will be heard at the third pair of concerts, Oct. 22-23. A Toccata by Irving Fine of the Harvard Music Department will be on the same program.

Messiaen's work, commissioned by the Koussevitzky Music Foundation, is reported to be of unusual length and for large forces. It was originally announced for last season. Britten's symphony will have its world première here.

Igor Stravinsky, who appeared at these concerts in Dr. Koussevitzky's first season, will conduct a suite from his Ballet, "Orfeo." A new symphony by Leo Sowerby is announced, and a piano concerto by Howard Hanson, with Rudolf Frikusny as soloist.

Eleazar de Carvalho, Brazilian guest conductor, will introduce two new works from his own country: a Sinfonia by Fernandez and "Manducarara" by Villa-Lobos. Ernst Ansermet, as guest, will introduce here the Symphonie Concertante by his fellow Swiss composer, Frank Martin. Dr. Koussevitzky announces for Oct. 15 the first Boston performance of the Seventh Symphony by Gustav Mahler.

A number of works which were introduced in the course of 24 years under Dr. Koussevitzky's leadership will be revived. Ravel's Piano Concerto, introduced here on April 22, 1932, by Jesús Maria Sanromá, will be repeated by the same pianist. Vladimir Horowitz, whose debut in 1928 in Rachmaninov's Third Piano Concerto is especially remembered, and Jascha Heifetz, who played the Second Violin Concerto of Prokofiev, will return in the same works. Stravinsky's Piano Capriccio will be performed by Soulima Stravinsky under his father's direction.

Also to be heard are Bach's Mass in B minor, Béla Bartók's Orchestral Concerto, Prokofiev's Fifth Symphony, Liszt's "Faust" Symphony, Stravinsky's "Ode" and "Song of the Nightingale," and the Seventh Symphony by Shostakovitch (this to be conducted by Leonard Bernstein).

Ernst Ansermet and Thor Johnson will make their first appearances as guest conductors in Boston. Soloists to be heard for the first time here are the pianists, Nicole Henriot (from France) and Soulima Stravinsky. Other soloists include Myra Hess, Rudolf Firkusny, Vladimir Horowitz, Jascha Heifetz, and Gregor Piatigorsky. Season tickets for the Friday afternoon series and the Sunday afternoon series in Symphony Hall are still to be had. The Saturday evening series and the Tuesday evening series are completely subscribed.

Munch Program

The Symphonie Fantastique of Berlioz will be the principal number on the program of the Orcheestre National of France, Charles Munch, conductor, at its concert in Symphony Hall on Oct. 20. The other items will be the Toccata by Walter Piston, Debussy's "La Mer" and "The Apprentice-Sorcerer" by Dukas.

Operti in 'My Romance'

LeRoi Operti, a native Bostonian, who it is said has appeared in every theater in Boston, including the old Boston Theater and the Castle Square, has joined the cast of "My Romance," which returns to the Shubert on Wednesday, Oct. 6. Mr. Operti began his career as a boy soprano in a South Boston Methodist Episcopal church.

MONTREAL, CANADA
STAR

OCT [illegible]

Boston Gets New Conductor

Muench Succeeds Serge Koussevitzky

CH[illegible] MUENCH, [illegible] has [illegible] nominated this year as [illegible] Serge Koussevitzky to [illegible] permanent conductor of [illegible] Symphony Orchestra. [illegible] by the French [illegible] direct L'Orchestre [illegible] France on its first tour [illegible] America, which will in- [illegible] appearance in Montreal. [illegible] France's most celebrated instrumentalists, [illegible] at Notre Dame [illegible] Thursday evening, [illegible] as a presentation of [illegible] Festivals.

[illegible] representing his [illegible] highest musical sense [illegible] man who, it is claimed, [illegible] as much as any of his [illegible] to make known [illegible] culture beyond the borders [illegible] country both before and after the Second World War.

* * *

FOR the better part of two seasons he has been one of the most sought after conductors in the United States. His concerts with the New York Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra have familiarized his name to many music lovers as well as to the Carnegie Hall audiences in New York. He has also directed as guest such orchestras as the Chicago Symphony, the Cleveland Orchestra, the Los Angeles Philharmonic and the Cincinnati and Minneapolis Symphony Orchestras

---

GRAND RAPIDS, MICH.
PRESS

OCT 3 [illegible]

Boston's Symphony Plans New Works

Boston—UP—Serge Koussevitzky, opening his twenty-fifth and final season as conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra on Oct. 8, will introduce several new works during the concerts.

Among them will be a symphony by the British composer, Benjamin Britten; a symphony by Olivier Messiaen, French composer; a toccata by Irving Fine; a symphony by Leo Sowerby; a piano concerto by Howard Hanson, and two new Brazilian works by Fernandez and Villa-Lobos, to be conducted by Eleazar de Carvalho, Brazilian guest conductor.

FLINT, MICH.
JOURNAL

OCT 3 1948

[illegible] integrity.

Koussevitzky Plans To Give New Works

Serge Koussevitzky, opening his 25th and final season as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Oct. 8, will introduce several new works during the concerts.

Among them will be a symphony by the British composer, Benjamin Britten; a symphony by Olivier Messiaen, French composer; a toccata by Irving Fine; a symphony by Leo Sowerby; a piano concerto by Howard Hanson, and two new Brazilian works by Fernandez and Villa-Lobos, to be conducted by Eleazar de Carvalho, Brazilian guest conductor.

OKLAHOMA CITY, OKLA.
OKLAHOMAN

OCT 3 [illegible]

Koussevitzky Nearing End

IN preparation for his twenty-fifth and final season in America as conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky will return to Boston at the end of this month. For his opening concert in Symphony Hall on October 8 his program will recall his American debut in 1924.

Dr. Koussevitzky has been spending his time at his summer home in Lenox in laying out plans for his final season. He will introduce some new works of notable interest. Benjamin Britten, who composed his opera, "Peter Grimes" for Tanglewood, has written a new symphony which will have its world premiere by this orchestra. Olivier Messiaen, outstanding among the younger generation of French composers, has composed by commission of the Koussevitzky Music Foundation a new symphony of unusual length and for large forces which will be performed this season. The Sixth Symphony by Ralph Vaughan-Williams which had its American premiere at the Berkshire Music Festival last July will figure in Dr. Koussevitzky's third program on October 22. A Toccata by Irving Fine will be introduced at the same concerts. Stravinsky will conduct a suite from his Ballet, "Orfeo". A new symphony by Leo Sowerby is announced, and a piano concerto by Howard Hanson (with Rudolf Firkusny as soloist). Eleazar de Carvalho, the Brazilian guest conductor, will introduce two new works from his own country; a Sinfonia by Fernandez, and Manducarara by Villa Lobos. Dr. Koussevitzky announces for October 15 the first Bonston performance of the Seventh Symphony of Gustav Mahler.

His program will revive a number of works which he has introduced to these concerts in the course of 24 years.

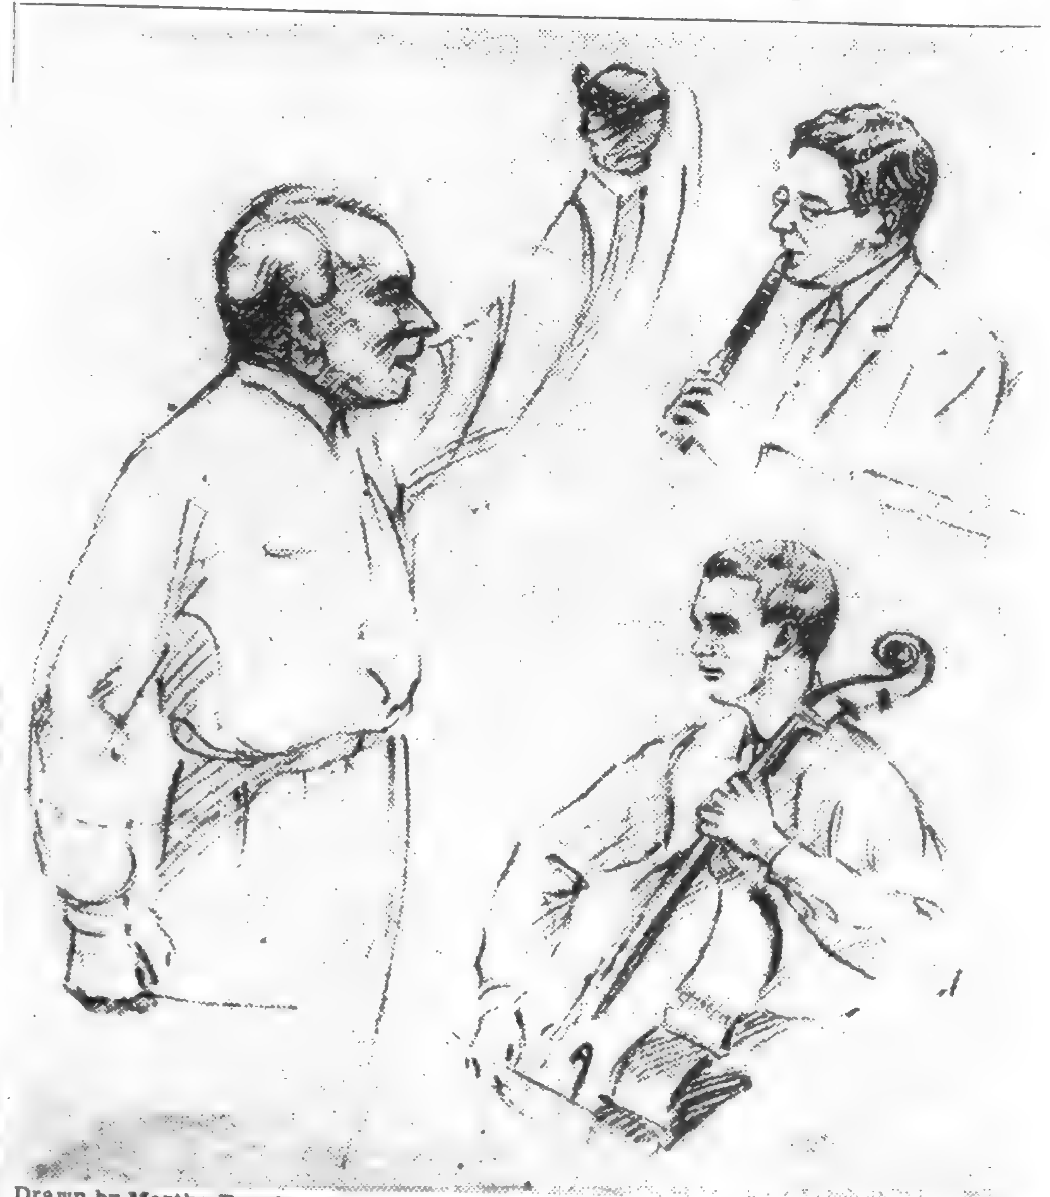
The Boston Symphony orchestra's sixty-eighth season will include concerts in Cambridge, New Haven, Hartford, Newark, Springfield, New York, Brooklyn, New Brunswick, Philadelphia, Washington, Pittsburgh, Cincnnati, Cleveland, Chicago, Milwaukee, Ann Arbor, Detroit and Rochester.

PAGE TEN B. Her Oct 3

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, who begins his 25th and final season as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra with the regular Friday afternoon and Saturday evening concerts at Symphony Hall this week.

THE CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR, BOSTON, THURSDAY, OCTOBER 7, 1948

h New Music by Romberg—Art Show



Drawn by Martha Burnham

Rehearsal sketches as the Boston Symphony Orchestra starts its sixty-eighth season. At left: Koussevitzky, at the beginning of his twenty-fifth season as musical director. Upper right: Manuel Valerio, who takes over the chair of first clarinet. Lower right: Samuel Mays, who comes from the Philadelphia Orchestra to be leader of the cello section.

Monit. Oct 2

A

Concert

Few Changes In Personnel Of Symphony

There will be few important changes in personnel when the Boston Symphony Orchestra gathers next Monday morning to begin rehearsals for its final season under Dr. Koussevitzky.

Manuel Valerio has been promoted to first clarinet, succeeding the late Victor Polatschek. Attilio Poto has been engaged as third clarinet.

Samuel Mays of the Philadelphia Orchestra has been chosen to head the cello section, replacing Jean Bedetti, resigned.

Hubert Sauvlet has resigned from the violin section, and Sheldon Rotenberg replaces him.

BOSTON SUNDAY GLOBE FOR OCTOBER 3, 1948

Koussevitzky's Silver Jubilee as Symphony Conductor

By LANING HUMPHREY

Floodgates of memory and musical history will swing wide at Symphony Hall next Friday when Serge Koussevitzky opens his 25th and final season as conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra. Coming to Boston and America for the first time in 1924, more or less on trial as the local orchestra's first Russian conductor, he remained to fill the longest and most epoch-making engagement in the annals of the orchestra; to place it and himself in the top rank in the musical world; to make constant contributions to musical history; to become a citizen of Boston, Lenox, and the United States.

STILL PLANNING—Tireless at 73, here is Koussevitzky planning his jubilee, while vacationing at his Summer home, "Serenak," in Lenox.

SIGNIFICANT SESSION—[illegible] back in 1924-25, Koussevitzky confers with D[illegible]chibald T. Davison about having the Harvard [illegible] Club and Radcliffe Choral Society sing [illegible] the orchestra. The collegians have done it ever since, in masterpieces of Bach, Beethoven, and Br[illegible].

(Photo Bachrach)

VIRTUOSO—Musical histories cite Koussevitzky as one of only three men to attain rank as a virtuoso on the bass viol. He wrought miracles of tone and dexterity with it in a recital in Symphony Hall in 1927.

HAPPY DAY—A very happ[illegible] Koussevitzky is shown taking his oath of allegian[illegible] as a citizen of the United States, in 1941. In a busy career which found him commuting between Boston and Europe for many Summers, he [illegible] was not quite sure abcut his permanent home. No one has been a prouder American citizen.

ONLY THE PLAYERS see Koussevitzky thus—eyes not only off the score, but closed in revery over its beauties as he and his men bring them to realization.

PAWTUCKET, R. I.
TIMES

OCT 8 - 1948

Last Season Begins For Koussevitzky

Conductor, 74, In 25th Year As Leader Of Boston Symphony

BOSTON (AP)—With a silver baton and a program of the old and new in great music, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky today began his 25th and final season as director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Now 74, he has held the post longer than anyone in the orchestra's 67-year history.

At the end of the 1948-49 season, he will be succeeded by Charles Muench, 56-year-old French conductor.

A tireless worker, the Russian-born Koussevitzky built the ensemble to world leadership and brought to fame many young conductors and composers.

He also introduced conservative Boston to a wide range of modern music. Sometimes, as when he first conducted Stravinsky's "Rites of Spring," he was heartily booed.

But most of the indignant dowagers who walked out on that program stayed to applaud when it was repeated in later seasons. Some were among wartime audiences that cheered "Kousey's" direction of a work by the Brazilian conductor-composer Villa Lobos that required noisemakers and a section of picket fence.

Handkerchiefs should be hung over the line and pinned in the middle instead of at the corners.

PORTSMOUTH, N. H.
HERALD-TIMES

OCT 8 1948

'Kousey' to Quit After 25 Years

BOSTON, Oct. 8 (AP)—With a silver baton and a program of the old and new in great music, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky today began his 25th and final season as director of the Boston Symphony orchestra.

Now 74, he has held the post longer than anyone in the orchestra's 67-year history.

At the end of the 1948-49 season, he will be succeeded by Charles Muench, 56-year-old French conductor.

A tireless worker, the Russian-born Koussevitzky built the ensemble to world leadership and brought to fame many young conductors and composers.

He also introduced conservative Boston to a wide range of modern music. Sometimes, as when he first conducted Stravinsky's "Rites of Spring," he was heartily booed.

But most of the indignant dowagers who walked out on that program stayed to applaud when it was repeated in later seasons.

Some were among wartime audiences that cheered "Kousey's" direction of a work by the Brazilian conductor-composer Villa Lobos that required noisemakers and a section of picket fence.

QUINCY, MASS.
PATRIOT LEDGER

OCT 8 1948

Koussevitzky Begins 25th And Last Year With Boston Symphony

BOSTON, Oct. 8—(AP)—With a silver baton and a program of the old and new in great music, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky today began his 25th and final season as director of the Boston Symphony orchestra.

Now 74, he has held the post longer than anyone in the orchestra's 67-year history.

At the end of the 1948-49 season, he will be succeeded by Charles Muench, 56-year-old French conductor.

A tireless worker, the Russian-born Koussevitzky built the ensemble to world leadership and brought to fame many young conductors and composers.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

OCT 8 - 1948

SYMPHONY ANNIVERSARY

Boston, Oct. 8.—(AP)—With a silver baton and a program of the old and new in great music, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky today began his 25th and final season as director of the Boston Symphony orchestra. Now 74, he has held the post longer than anyone in the orchestra's 67-year history. At the end of the 1948-49 season, he will be succeeded by Charles Muench, 56-year-old French conductor. Koussevitzky will continue as director of the Berkshire music center, the Boston Symphony's summer school at Tanglewood, in Lenox. He founded it in 1940.

JOHNSON CITY, TENN.
PRESS-CHRONICLE

KOUSSEVITZKY GETS OVATION AT BOSTON

Conductor of Symphony Orchestra Opens His Final Season

Boston, Oct. 8.—(UP)—Using a silver baton, Serge Koussevitzky opened his 25th and final season as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra today.

The orchestra members and audience at Symphony Hall gave the Russian-born conductor a standing ovation as he entered. He acknowledged the applause with several bows and then began the concerto in D minor for orchestra and organ by Vivaldi, the same work with which he opened his first season.

NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
STANDARD-TIMES

Koussevitzky Begins His Final Season

BOSTON, Oct. 8 (AP) — With a silver baton and a program of the old and new in great music, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky today began his 25th and final season as director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Now 74, he has held the post longer than anyone in the orchestra's 67-year history. At the end of the 1948-49 season, he will be succeeded by Charles Muench, 56-year-old French conductor.

NEWPORT, VT.
EXPRESS

OCT 8 - 1948

Koussevitzky Begins His 25th Season

BOSTON, Oct. 8, (AP)—With a silver baton and a program of the old and new in great music, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky today began his 25th and final season as director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Now 74, he has held the post longer than anyone in the orchestra's 67-year history.

At the end of the 1948-49 season he will be succeeded by Charles Muench, 56-year-old French conductor.

A tireless worker, the Russian-born Koussevitzky built the ensemble to world leadership and brought to fame many young conductors and composers.

He also introduced conservative Boston to a wide range of modern music. Sometimes, as when he first conducted Stravinsky's "Rite of Spring," he was heartily booed.

But most of the indignant dowagers who walked out on that program stayed to applaud when it was repeated in later seasons. Some were among wartime audiences that cheered "Kousey's" direction of a work by the Brazilian conductor-composer Villa Lobos that required noisemakers and a section of picket fence.

NEW HAVEN, CONN.
REGISTER

OCT 8 -

Koussevitzky Begins Last Season, His 25th, With Boston Symphony

Boston, Oct. 8—(AP)—With a silver baton and a program of the old and new in great music, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky today began his 25th and final season as director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Now 74, he has held the post longer than anyone in the orchestra's 67-year history.

At the end of the 1948-49 season, he will be succeeded by Charles Muench, 56-year-old French conductor.

A tireless worker, the Russian-born Koussevitzky built the ensemble to world leadership and brought to fame many young conductors and composers.

He also introduced conservative Boston to a wide range of modern music. Sometimes, as when he first conducted Stravinsky's "Rites of Spring," he was heartily booed.

But most of the indignant dowagers who walked out on that program stayed to applaud when it was repeated in later seasons. Some were among wartime audiences that cheered "Kousey's" direction of a work by the Brazilian conductor-composer Villa Lobos that required noisemakers and a section of picket fence.

On the program of Koussevitzky's first symphony hall concert in September, 1924 was Arthur Honneger's lively "Pacific 231."

The modern French composer also was represented today by a more recent—and soothing—work: "String Symphony."

Koussevitzsky's new baton is a silver jubilee gift from radio station, WBMS, Boston. It is a reproduction in silver of the white birch stick—no bigger than a pencil—that has guided the orchestra for the past 25 years.

An American citizen since 1941, Koussevitzky plans to make his winter home in nearby Brookline after his retirement.

He still will continue as director of the Berkshire Music Center, the Boston Symphony's summer school at Tanglewood, in Lenox. He founded it in 1940.

[16

OSTON SUNDAY GLOBE FOR OCTOBER 3, 1948

Koussevitzky's Silver Jubilee as Symphony Conductor

By LANING HUMPHREY

Floodgates of memory and musical history will swing wide at Symphony Hall next Friday when Serge Koussevitzky opens his 25th and final season as conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra. Coming to Boston and America for the first time in 1924, more or less on trial as the local orchestra's first Russian conductor, he remained to fill the longest and most epoch-making engagement in the annals of the orchestra; to place it and himself in the top rank in the musical world; to make constant contributions to musical history; to become a citizen of Boston, Lenox, and the United States.

STILL PLANNING—Tireless at 73, here is Koussevitzky planning his jubilee, while vacationing at his Summer home, "Serenak," in Lenox.

SIGNIFICANT SESSION—Here, back in 1924-25, Koussevitzky confers with Dr. Archibald T. Davison about having the Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe Choral Society sing with the orchestra. The collegians have done it ever since, in masterpieces of Bach, Beethoven, and Brahms.

VIRTUOSO—Musical histories cite Koussevitzky as one of only three men to attain rank as a virtuoso on the bass viol. He wrought miracles of tone and dexterity with it in a recital in Symphony Hall in 1927.

HAPPY DAY—A very happy Koussevitzky is shown taking his oath of allegiance as a citizen of the United States, in 1941. In a busy career which found him commuting between Boston and Europe for many Summers, he long was not quite sure abcut his permanent home. No one has been a prouder American citizen.

ONLY THE PLAYERS see Koussevitzky thus—eyes not only off the score, but closed in revery over its beauties as he and his men bring them to realization.

PAWTUCKET, R. I.
TIMES
OCT 8 - 1948

Last Season Begins For Koussevitzky

Conductor, 74, In 25th Year As Leader Of Boston Symphony

BOSTON (AP)—With a silver baton and a program of the old and new in great music, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky today began his 25th and final season as director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Now 74, he has held the post longer than anyone in the orchestra's 67-year history.

At the end of the 1948-49 season, he will be succeeded by Charles Muench, 56-year-old French conductor.

A tireless worker, the Russian-born Koussevitzky built the ensemble to world leadership and brought to fame many young conductors and composers.

He also introduced conservative Boston to a wide range of modern music. Sometimes, as when he first conducted Stravinsky's "Rites of Spring," he was heartily booed.

But most of the indignant dowagers who walked out on that program stayed to applaud when it was repeated in later seasons. Some were among wartime audiences that cheered "Kousey's" direction of a work by the Brazilian conductor-composer Villa Lobos that required noisemakers and a section of picket fence.

Handkerchiefs should be hung over the line and pinned in the middle instead of at the corners.

QUINCY, MASS.
PATRIOT LEDGER
OCT 8 1948

Koussevitzky Begins 25th And Last Year With Boston Symphony

BOSTON, Oct. 8—(AP)—With a silver baton and a program of the old and new in great music, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky today began his 25th and final season as director of the Boston Symphony orchestra.

Now 74, he has held the post longer than anyone in the orchestra's 67-year history.

At the end of the 1948-49 season, he will be succeeded by Charles Muench, 56-year-old French conductor.

A tireless worker, the Russian-born Koussevitzky built the ensemble to world leadership and brought to fame many young conductors and composers.

NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
STANDARD-TIMES
OCT 8 - 1948

Koussevitzky Begins His Final Season

BOSTON, Oct. 8 (AP) — With a silver baton and a program of the old and new in great music, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky today began his 25th and final season as director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Now 74, he has held the post longer than anyone in the orchestra's 67-year history. At the end of the 1948-49 season, he will be succeeded by Charles Muench, 56-year-old French conductor.

PORTSMOUTH, N. H.
HERALD-TIMES
OCT 8 1948

'Kousey' to Quit After 25 Years

BOSTON, Oct. 8 (AP)—With a silver baton and a program of the old and new in great music, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky today began his 25th and final season as director of the Boston Symphony orchestra.

Now 74, he has held the post longer than anyone in the orchestra's 67-year history.

At the end of the 1948-49 season, he will be succeeded by Charles Muench, 56-year-old French conductor.

A tireless worker, the Russian-born Koussevitzky built the ensemble to world leadership and brought to fame many young conductors and composers.

He also introduced conservative Boston to a wide range of modern music. Sometimes, as when he first conducted Stravinsky's "Rites of Spring," he was heartily booed.

But most of the indignant dowagers who walked out on that program stayed to applaud when it was repeated in later seasons.

Some were among wartime audiences that cheered "Kousey's" direction of a work by the Brazilian conductor-composer Villa Lobos that required noisemakers and a section of picket fence.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN
OCT 8 - 1948

SYMPHONY ANNIVERSARY

Boston, Oct. 8.—(AP)—With a silver baton and a program of the old and new in great music. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky today began his 25th and final season as director of the Boston Symphony orchestra. Now 74, he has held the post longer than anyone in the orchestra's 67-year history. At the end of the 1948-49 season, he will be succeeded by Charles Muench, 56-year-old French conductor. Koussevitzky will continue as director of the Berkshire music center, the Boston Symphony's summer school at Tanglewood, in Lenox. He founded it in 1940.

JOHNSON CITY, TENN.
PRESS-CHRONICLE
OCT 8

KOUSSEVITZKY GETS OVATION AT BOSTON

Conductor of Symphony Orchestra Opens His Final Season

Boston, Oct. 8.—(UP)—Using a silver baton, Serge Koussevitzky opened his 25th and final season as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra today.

The orchestra members and audience at Symphony Hall gave the Russian-born conductor a standing ovation as he entered. He acknowledged the applause with several bows and then began the concerto in D minor for orchestra and organ by Vivaldi, the same work with which he opened his first season.

NEWPORT, VT.
EXPRESS
OCT 8 - 1948

Koussevitzky Begins His 25th Season

BOSTON, Oct. 8, (AP)—With a silver baton and a program of the old and new in great music, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky today began his 25th and final season as director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Now 74, he has held the post longer than anyone in the orchestra's 67-year history.

At the end of the 1948-49 season, he will be succeeded by Charles Muench, 56-year-old French conductor.

A tireless worker, the Russian-born Koussevitzky built the ensemble to world leadership and brought to fame many young conductors and composers.

He also introduced conservative Boston to a wide range of modern music. Sometimes, as when he first conducted Stravinsky's "Rites of Spring," he was heartily booed.

But most of the indignant dowagers who walked out on that program stayed to applaud when it was repeated in later seasons. Some were among wartime audiences that cheered "Kousey's" direction of a work by the Brazilian conductor-composer Villa Lobos that required noisemakers and a section of picket fence.

NEW HAVEN, CONN.
REGISTER
OCT 8 - 19

Koussevitzky Begins Last Season, His 25th, With Boston Symphony

Boston, Oct. 8—(AP)—With a silver baton and a program of the old and new in great music, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky today began his 25th and final season as director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Now 74, he has held the post longer than anyone in the orchestra's 67-year history.

At the end of the 1948-49 season, he will be succeeded by Charles Muench, 56-year-old French conductor.

A tireless worker, the Russian-born Koussevitzky built the ensemble to world leadership and brought to fame many young conductors and composers.

He also introduced conservative Boston to a wide range of modern music. Sometimes, as when he first conducted Stravinsky's "Rites of Spring," he was heartily booed.

But most of the indignant dowagers who walked out on that program stayed to applaud when it was repeated in later seasons. Some were among wartime audiences that cheered "Kousey's" direction of a work by the Brazilian conductor-composer Villa Lobos that required noisemakers and a section of picket fence.

On the program of Koussevitzky's first symphony hall concert in September, 1924 was Arthur Honneger's lively "Pacific 231."

The modern French composer also was represented today by a more recent—and soothing—work: "String Symphony."

Koussevitzsky's new baton is a silver jubilee gift from radio station, WBMS, Boston. It is a reproduction in silver of the white birch stick—no bigger than a pencil—that has guided the orchestra for the past 25 years.

An American citizen since 1941. Koussevitzky plans to make his winter home in nearby Brookline after his retirement.

He still will continue as director of the Berkshire Music Center, the Boston Symphony's summer school at Tanglewood, in Lenox. He founded it in 1940.

[163]

Boston Audiences Have Changed Very Little in 24 Years, Says Koussevitzky

By CYRUS DURGIN

LENOX—Serge Koussevitzky strolled thoughtfully on the grassy terrace of his Berkshire manse, high on the hillside above Lenox. It was one of those treasurable green-gold-and-russet days of late September, when the sun is warm and for a moment time seems to pause just to let you absorb an unforgettable mood picture.

Dressed as always in a harmonious color combination—brown jacket and trousers, white cap and shoes—the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra looked ruddy and rested. For a month and a little more he had been recuperating from the heat and hard work of the Tanglewood Festival, and preparing for the opening of the new Symphony season. When he steps before the Friday audience at Symphony Hall this week, it will be a rare and momentous occasion, for Mr. Koussevitzky will be entering his 25th and last season as the illustrious director and interpretive wizard of the Boston Orchestra. For him and for those of us who have sat before him for numerous years it will be a little sad as well as brilliant. The season to come will be full of symphonic pleasures, but it will also be hail and farewell.

As he looked out thoughtfully over the beautiful view of Lake Mahkeenac and the hills beyond, you might have thought that he was ruminating. Far from it! Just that morning he had learned that the Philadelphia Orchestra was up against new salary demands and had decided to cancel the season of 1948-49.

"I foresaw all this 10 years ago!" he declared, his greenish-hazel eyes flashing as he spoke. "I could have told you then that all this would happen. The situation of symphony orchestras in this country is not good. Financially, I mean. The rich people who used to support them liberally no longer can afford to do so. Much of their income goes in huge taxes. The time has come for the government to support art in our country. The people need art and there is no other source of steady, adequate financial assistance.

Government support of the arts has for years been a subject close to Koussevitzky's heart—and anyone who knows the Koussevitzky tenacity will tell you that once he has fastened upon an idea he does not give it up until success has been won. Over luncheon—which included vegetables fresh from the Koussevitzky garden—he elaborated on his belief. The spacious dining room rang with the intensity of his conviction.

"We musicians and you critics and other people who love the art must ask that a congress be called to request the government to subsidize orchestras, museums and so on. There must be a practical plan. After all, the culture of a nation is reflected as much in its art (by which he meant all forms of art) as by its science.

His life long, Koussevitzky has been a small, slight bundle of energy—mind as well as body. He speaks his mind, which never has been sheltered by an Ivory Tower. Whether working hard over music or relaxing in the pastoral quiet of his country home, the world and our troubles are never far from his mind.

"We are living in such dangerous times," he reiterated, "just as if we were on the side of a volcano that might explode at any minute. The Russians are so stupid and aggressive. But we must never get out of Berlin. If we should leave Germany, I think I know what would happen. The minute we did that, the Russians would claim that at last Germany was united. They would set up a government—a Bolshevik government, of course—and shout: 'Here is the real German Government.' And it would be a Bolshevik state. France would follow, and Italy, because they would not have the strength to resist. Then practically all of Europe would be Bolshevized.

"The Soviets do not have the racial hatred of the Fascists or the Nazis, but they have what is quite as bad: class hatred. I know for I saw it all. I worked for three years under that regime when it was new. They did not harm me because 10 years before the Bolsheviks came I had begun to give the Russian people the spiritual food of music. I gave them free concerts, and thousands who had never heard a symphony orchestra before, got a taste of the joys of music.

In a sense the career of Koussevitzky has been a long and amazing metamorphosis. Who on that July day when he was born in Tver, North Russia, could have foretold that he would become one of the three greatest virtuosi of the double-bass in the history of music? That he would be known the world over as a brilliant orchestral interpreter with a fabulous ear for glorious color and richness of sound? That he would come to the United States, enjoy the longest tenure on record as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, become an American citizen, develop a Summer music festival into the best such on this continent, bring the Boston Symphony to a new golden period of perfection, become a foremost apostle of American music and as integral a part of Bostonian life as anything you could name—including the Braves?

Looking back on his career at Symphony Hall, what might stand out as the peak of his achievements, the most vivid memory of all? It is with a smile puzzled and perhaps a little wry that he answers:

"I cannot tell you. No experience, no one piece of music. I see it all complete. When I have conducted the first performance of a composition by Aaron Copland, by Walter Piston or Roy Harris—to speak only of new music—I have thought at the time that it is the greatest ever written. But as the years go on and more and more new things have been done, I look back upon these 24 years as a whole.

"Of course I have had the satisfaction of seeing certain American pieces accepted by the public which were debated and even opposed at the beginning."

MUSICAL CONVERSATION—Serge Koussevitzky and Cyrus Durgin, the Globe's drama and music critic, are absorbed in talking about Mahler's Seventh Symphony, which the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will introduce here Oct. 15 and 16.

Koussevitzky thinks that Boston audiences have not changed a great deal since he arrived in the Autumn of 1924.

"They have changed a little, but from the start they were receptive to the new pieces. I do think, however, that they have come to like Brahms much more than they did. I have noticed the greatest change in public acceptance in Pittsburgh and Chicago. The first time I went to Pittsburgh I played Scriabin's 'Poeme de l'Extase' and the audience laughed all the way through. The same thing happened in Chicago. But now, Pittsburgh and Chicago, of the cities outside of Boston, are the quickest to grasp the new works.

"I am not retiring to be lazy," he grinned. "There will be the Berkshire Music Center. I want to lengthen the time of the Summer sessions, and I want to build, eventually, a Greek theatre. My idea would be to bring in the finest writers, composers, poets and dramatists and present our own tragedies in the Greek manner, tragedies of our own time that would illuminate our own lives.

"Then there is the Koussevitzky Music Foundation, which is set up to go on permanently, long after my death. Everything that I had when my first wife died I put into the Foundation. The capital cannot be touched, and only the income is spent in commissioning new music each year. We ask, every year, a foremost American and European composer to produce new scores. For those they are given $1000. We also commission a lesser-known, younger, American and foreign composer with a stipend of $500. Sometimes we ask for smaller works, and for those the composers receive $250, to encourage them.

"There has been only one outside contribution to the Foundation funds, because I do not like to ask for money. That was five years ago, when in honor of my 20th anniversary, the Boston Symphony trustees asked me what I would like as a gift at that time. I told them: 'I don't want any gift, but if you have some money to buy one, please give it to the Koussevitzky Music Foundation. They did that, and it meant $16,000 added to the capital fund.

"Boston My Home"

"I shall guest conduct, too. In fact, I have so many offers now that if I accepted them all I should be busier than I ever have been. But naturally I could not do that. Next year I shall stay here at Seranek through October, then go to New York and other places. January, February and March my my wife and I shall live in Arizona. We discovered Phoenix last Winter, and the beauty of the desert is fascinating. I consider Boston as my home, but I cannot take the Winter climate here any more. Of course we shall continue to keep a house in Boston, and we want to hear the Boston Symphony often."

---

ere, back in Archibald T.
Glee Club a th the orchestra. The since, in masterpieces hms.

y Koussevitzky is shown ce as a citizen of the a busy career which en Boston and Europe
g was not quite sure
No one has been a N.

---

egins Last Seas
ith Boston Symp

silver baton and a program of t Koussevitzky today began his 25th n Symphony Orchestra.

post rches-eason, harles conssian-en-and con-rvative modern n he "Rites
booed.
dow-t pro-hen it easons.
audi-usey's"
Brazil-
Lobos and a vitzky's ert in Honnemposer by a -work:
n is a o sta-a re-white a penchestra
e 1941,
ke his ookline irector er, the school
He

N. ADAMS, MASS.
TRANSCRIPT

OCT 8 1948

Koussevitzky Starts 25th, Final Season

Opens Program of Old and New in Great Music With Silver Baton—Charles Muench to be Successor.

Boston, Oct. 8 (AP)—With a silver baton and a program of the old and new in great music, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky today began his 25th and final season as director of the Boston Symphony orchestra.

Now 74, he has held the post longer than anyone in the orchestra's 67-year history.

At the end of the 1948-49 season, he will be succeeded by Charles Muench, 56-year-old French conductor.

A tireless worker, the Russian-born Koussevitzky built the ensemble to world leadership and brought to fame many young conductors and composers.

He also introduced conservative Boston to a wide range of modern music. Sometimes, as when he first conducted Stravinsky's "Rites of Spring," he was heartily booed.

But most of the indignant dowagers who walked out on that program stayed to applaud when it was repeated in later seasons. Some were among wartime audiences that cheered "Kousey's" direction of a work by the Brazilian conductor-composer Villa Lobos that required noisemakers and a section of picket fence.

LOWELL, MASS.
SUN & CITIZEN-LEADER

OCT 8 - 1948

Final Season for Koussevitzky

Famous Conductor With Hub Group 25 Years

BOSTON, Oct. 8 (AP)—With a silver baton and a program of the old and new in great music, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky today began his 25th and final season as director of the Boston symphony orchestra.

Now 74, he has held the post longer than anyone in the orchestra's 67-year history.

At the end of the 1948-49 season, he will be succeeded by Charles Muench, 56-year-old French conductor.

A tireless worker, the Russian-born Koussevitzky built the ensemble to world leadership and brought to fame many young conductors and composers.

He also introduced conservative Boston to a wide range of modern music. Sometimes, as when he first conducted Stravinsky's "Rites of Spring," he was heartily booed.

But most of the indignant dowagers who walked out on that program stayed to applaud when it was repeated in later seasons. Some were among wartime audiences that cheered "Kousey's" direction of a work by the Brazilian conductor-composer Villa Lobos that required noisemakers and a section of picket fence.

HOLYOKE, MASS.
TRANSCRIPT TELEGRAM

OCT 8 - 1948

KOUSSEVITZKY BEGINS HIS FINAL SEASON

BOSTON, (U.P.) — Serge Koussevitzky raised his swizzle-stick sized baton today and began his 25th and final season as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Koussevitzky opened the Boston Symphony's 68th season.

The Russian-born conductor, now an American citizen, will retire at the end of the season and be replaced by Charles Munch of Paris.

---

a pound for one of the compositions as compard with $48 charged by the Krupp firm in Germany.

Defense counsel said this charge was "ridiculous." They agreed that Krupp sold the metal for $48 a pound but said the German firm's tools manufactured from it were three times as expensive as those of the Carboloy Co

---

NEWPORT, R. I.
NEWS

OCT 8 1948

"KOUSEY'S" FINAL SEASON

Boston Symphony Director, 74, To Retire After 25 Years

BOSTON, Oct. 8 (AP)—With a silver baton and a program of the old and new in great music, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky today began his twenty-fifth and final season as director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Now 74, he has held the post longer than anyone in the orchestra's 67-year history.

At the end of the 1948-49 season he will be succeeded by Charles Muench, 56-year-old French conductor.

A tireless worker, the Russian-born Koussevitzky built the ensemble to world leadership and brought to fame many young conductors and composers.

He also introduced conservative Boston to a wide range of modern music. Sometimes, as when he first conducted Stravinsky's "Rites of Spring," he was heartily booed.

SALEM, MASS.
NEWS

OCT 8 - 1948

Dr. Koussevitzky Starts 25th, Final Symphony Season

Boston, Oct. 8 (AP) — With a silver baton and a program of the old and new in great music, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky today began his 25th and final season as director of the Boston Symphony orchestra.

Now 74, he has held the post longer than anyone in the orchestra's 67-year history.

At the end of the 1948-49 season, he will be succeeded by Charles Muench, 56-year-old French conductor.

A tireless worker, the Russian-born Koussevitzky built the ensemble to world leadership and brought to fame many young conductors and composers.

He also introduced conservative Boston to a wide range of modern music. Sometimes, as when he first conducted Stravinsky's "Rites of spring," he was heartily booed.

But most of the indignant dowagers who walked out on that program stayed to applaud when it was repeated in later seasons. Some were among wartime audiences that cheered "Kousey's" direction of a work by the Brazilian conductor-composer Villa Lobos that required noisemakers and a section of picket fence.

[164]

WALTHAM, MASS.
NEWS TRIBUNE

OCT 8 - 1948

Koussevitsky Begins Last Season Leading Symphony

BOSTON, Oct. 8 (AP)—With a silver baton and a program of the old and new in great music, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky today began his 25th and final season as director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Now, 74, he has held the post longer than anyone in the orchestra's 67-year history.

At the end of the 1948–49 season, he will be successed by Charles Muench, 56-y e a r-old French conductor.

A tireless worker, the Russian-born Koussevitzky built the ensemble to world leadership and brought to fame many young conductors and composers.

He also introduced conservative Boston to a wide range of modern music. Sometimes, as when he first conducted Stravinsky's "Rites of Spring," he was heartily booed.

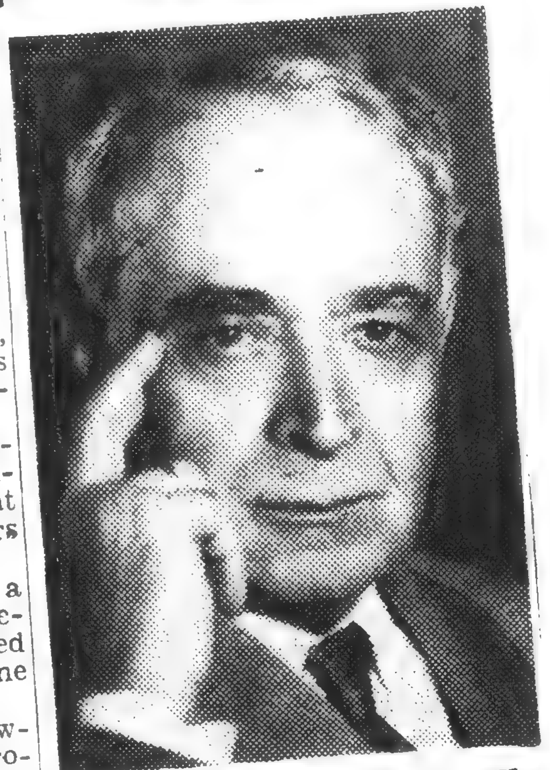
But most of the indignant dowagers who walked out on that program, stayed to applaud when it was repeated in later seasons. Some were among wartime audiences that cheered "Kousey's" direction of a work by the Brazilian conductor-composer Villa Lobos that required noise-makers and a section of picket fence.

Trav Oct 8

PAGE EIGHTEEN

Koussevitzky Lifts Baton On Final Symphony Series

[By the Associated Press]



DR. SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY

With a silver baton and a program of the old and new in great music, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky today began his 25th and final season as director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Now 74, he has held the post longer than anyone in the orchestra's 60-year history.

At the end of the 1948-49 season, he will be succeeded by Charles Muench, 56-year-old Frnech conductor.

A tireless worker, the Russian-born Koussevitzky built the ensemble to world leadership and brought to fame many young conductors and composers.

He also introduced Boston to a wide range of modern music. Sometimes, as when he first conducted Stravinsky's "Rites of Spring," he was heavily booed.

But most of the indignant dowagers who walked out on that program stayed to applaud when it was repeated in later seasons. Some were among wartime audiences that cheered "Kousey's" direction of a work by the Brazilian conductor-composer Villa Lobos that required noisemakers and a section of picket fence.

On the program of Koussevitzky's first Symphony Hall concert in September, 1924, was Arthur Honneger's lively "Pacific 231."

The modern French composer also was represented today by a more recent—and soothing—work: "String Symphony."

Koussevitzky's new baton is a silver jubilee gift from radio station WBMS, Boston. It is a reproduction in silver of the white birch stick—no bigger than a pencil—that has guided the orchestra for the past 25 years.

An American citizen since 1941, Koussevitzky plans to make his winter home in Brookline after his retirement.

He still will continue as director of the Berkshire music center, the Boston Symphony's summer school at Tanglewood, in Lenox. He founded it in 1940.

BRATTLEBORO, VT.
REFORMER

OCT 8 - 1948

Koussevitzky Opens Last Boston Symphony Season

BOSTON (AP)—With a silver baton and a program of the old and new in great music, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky today began his 25th and final season as director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Now 74, he has held the post longer than anyone in the orchestra's 67-year history.

At the end of the 1948-49 season he will be succeeded by Charles Muench, 56-year-old French conductor.

A tireless worker, the Russian-born Koussevitzky built the ensemble to world leadership and brought to fame many young conductors and composers.

He also introduced conservative Boston to a wide range of modern music. Sometimes, as when he first conducted Stravinsky's "Rites of Spring," he was heartily booed.

But most of the indignant dowagers who walked out on that program stayed to applaud when it was re- ated in later seasons. Some were ng wartime audiences that ed "Kousey's" direction of a by the Brazilian conductor- r Villa Lobos that required kers and a section of picket

---

LYNN, MASS.
ITEM

OCT 8 - 1948

Koussevitzky Notes 25th Anniversary in Boston

BOSTON, Oct. 8.—(AP)—With a silver baton and a program of the old and new in great music, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky today began his 25th and final season as director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Now 74, he has held the post longer than anyone in the orchestra's 67-year history.

At the end of the 1948-49 season, he will be succeeded by Charles Muench, 56 - year - old French conductor.

A tireless worker, the Russian-born Koussevitzky built the ensemble to world leadership and brought to fame many young conductors and composers.

He also introduced conservative Boston to a wide range of modern music. Sometimes, as when he first conducted Stravinsky's "Rites of Spring," he was heartily booed.

But most of the indignant dowagers who walked out on that program stayed to applaud when it was repeated in later seasons. Some were among wartime audiences that cheered "Kousey's" direction of a work by the Brazilian conductor-composer Villa Lobos that required noisemakers and a section of picket fence.

ATHOL, MASS.
NEWS

OCT 8 - 1948

Koussevitzsky Begins 25th, Final Year As Symphony Conductor

Boston, Oct. 8 (AP) — With a silver baton and a program of the old and new in great music, Dr. Serge Koussevitsky today began his 25th and final season as lirector of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Now 74, he has held the post longer than anyone in the orchestra's 67-years history.

At the end of the 1948-49 season he will be succeeded by Charles Muench, 56-year-old French conductor.

A tireless worker, the Russian-born Koussevitsky built the ensemble to world leadership and brought to fame many young conductors and composers.

He also introduced conservative Boston to a wide range of modern music. Sometimes, as when he first conducted Stravinsky's "Rites of Spring," he was heartily booed.

But most of the indignant dowagers who walked out on that program stayed to applaud when it was repeated in later seasons. Some were among wartime audiences that cheered "Kousey's" diirection of a work by the Brazilian conductor-composer Villa Lobos that required noise-makers and a section of picket fence.

KEENE, N. H.
SENTINEL

OCT 8 - 1948

Koussevitzky Begins 25th Year in Boston

Boston, Oct. 8 (AP)—With a silver baton and a program of the old and new in great music, Dr. Serge Kousevitzky today began his 25th and final season as director of the Boston Symphony orchestra.

Now 74, he has held the post longer than anyone in the orchestra's 67-year history.

At the end of the 1948-49 season, he will be succeeded by Charles Muench, 56-year-old French conductor.

A tireless worker, the Russian-born Koussevitzky built the ensemble to world leadership and brought to fame many young conductors and composers.

He also introduced conservative Boston to a wide range of modern music. Sometimes, as when he first conducted Stravinsky's "rites of spring," he was heartily booed.

But most of the indignant dowagers who walked out on that program stayed to applaud when it was repeated in later seasons. Some were among wartime audiences that cheered "Kousey's" direction of a work by the Brazilian conductor-composer Villa Lobos that required noisemakers and a section of picket fence.

WORCESTER, MASS.
GAZETTE

OCT 8 - 1948

PARTING NOTE

Koussevitzky Begins Final Boston Season

BOSTON, Oct. 8 (AP)—With a silver baton and a program of the old and new in great music, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky today began his 25th and final season as director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Now 74, he has held the post longer than anyone in the orchestra's 67-year history.

At the end of the 1948-49 season, he will be succeeded by Charles Muench, 56, French conductor.

A tireless worker, the Russian-born Koussevitzky built the ensemble to world leadership and brought to fame many young conductors and composers.

He also introduced conservative Boston to a wide range of modern music. Sometimes, as when he first conducted Stravinsky's "Rites of Spring," he was heartily booed.

But most of the indignant dowagers who walked out on that program stayed to applaud when it was repeated in later seasons. Some were among wartime audiences that cheered "Kousey's" direction of a work by the Brazilian conductor-composer Villa Lobos that required noisemakers and a section of picket fence.

On the program of Koussevitzky's first Symphony Hall concert in September, 1924, was Arthur Honneger's lively "Pacific 231."

The modern French composer also was represented today by a more recent—and soothing—work :"String Symphony."

Koussevitzky's new baton is a silver jubilee gift from radio station, WBMS, Boston. It is a reproduction in silver of the white birch stick—no bigger than a pencil—that has guided the orchestra for the last 25 years.

GLENS FALLS, N. Y.
POST STAR

OCT 8 - 1948

Five novelties have been announced by Serge Koussevitsky for the sixty-eighth season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which opens in Boston's Symphony Hall this afternoon.

One is a new symphony by Benjamin Britten, to be performed for the first time. A new symphony by the French composer, Olivier Messiaen, described as of unusual length and for large forces, commissioned by the Koussevitsky Music Foundation, will also be introduced. Ralph Vaughan Williams' sixth symphony, played by this orchestra at Tanglewood on Aug. 7, will be introduced to the Boston subscribers on Oct. 22, along with a toccata by Irving Fine, and Rudolf Firkusny will be soloist in a piano concerto by Howard Hanson.

Eleazar de Carvålho, one of this season's guest conductors, will introduce two Brazilian works; a sinfonia by Fernandez and Villa-Lobos' "Manducara" and Igor Stravinsky will conduct a suite from his ballet "Orfeo."

THE BOSTON DAILY GLOBE—SATURDAY, OCTOBER 9,

Today IN SOCIETY

Patrons of Koussevitzky's Debut in Boston Attend His 25th Opening

By MARJORIE W. SHERMAN

[illegible] Serge [illegible] and yes- [illegible] the [illegible] the box [illegible] filled [illegible] to [illegible] that [illegible] of a [illegible] new [illegible] the [illegible] yesterday's [illegible] that [illegible] listened [illegible] the re- [illegible] Vivaldi [illegible] Franklin W. [illegible] brown suit [illegible] the same as [illegible] Friday after- [illegible] ago, as she [illegible] with violinist [illegible] guest. Mrs. [illegible] was another [illegible] standing, familiar [illegible] conductor's platform, [illegible] years ago, and [illegible] and Seares, [illegible] Coolidges, [illegible] most of them [illegible] seats from which [illegible] Serge Koussevitzky [illegible] afternoon.

[illegible] Paine in her [illegible] black and white. [illegible] friends every [illegible] the George [illegible] quarter-century con- [illegible] Wallace Good- [illegible] and Anne Griswold, [illegible] abroad, talked Paris [illegible] friends—the Eben [illegible] Symphony plans [illegible] Judd—Mrs. Augustus [illegible] Henry A. Murray, and [illegible] K. Thorndike gathered [illegible] Lucy Rantoul [illegible] cocoa suit with a [illegible] of nutria—Mrs. [illegible] Saltonstall had a young [illegible] and so did Mrs. Fred- [illegible] —Mrs. George H. Swift [illegible] Mrs. Lawrence [illegible] came in together, both [illegible] —Mrs. Ralph [illegible] over from Beacon [illegible] custom of Fri- [illegible] -goers, and Mrs. [illegible] Stevenson also walked [illegible] slim and attractive [illegible] brown tweeds—and still [illegible] familiar audience [illegible] Hovey, blonde and [illegible] black and yellow wool [illegible] Lyman—Mrs. Donald [illegible] Fenno answering [illegible] her sister Pauline, [illegible] England, working [illegible] Reading, head of the [illegible] Volunteer Services—Mrs. [illegible] French in a smart [illegible] besieged for tickets for [illegible] fashion luncheon [illegible] Cushman Club—Isa- [illegible] the season's first [illegible] Warren—Mrs. [illegible] and her sister. [illegible] in good-looking [illegible] Karolik—Ar- [illegible] Mrs. John Yerxa—and [illegible]

MR. CHILDERS TO WED MISS TINKER—Of particular interest to [illegible] Boston relatives and [illegible] announcement today [illegible] engagement of Miss Irene Tinker, daughter of Mr. and [illegible] M. Tinker of Wilmington, [illegible] Erskine Barton Childers of Ireland.

[illegible] Tinker is a member of the [illegible] at Radcliffe College. [illegible] now studying at Stanford University, is a grandson of Mrs. Albert N. Dow and the late Gen. Dow of Wellesley Hills, and a cousin of Mrs. Warren Lothrop of Cambridge. His parents are Mr. and Mrs. Erskine Hamilton Childers of Dublin.

MRS. FRANKLIN W. HOBBS, among Bostonians at opening of the Symphony season yesterday who attended Dr. Koussevitzky's first concert here 25 years ago.

Both Miss Tinker and her fiance are associated with the United States National Student Association. She is public relations director for the Northern New England region, and he is chairman of the California-Nevada-Hawaii Region. Last Summer he toured western South America as Latin American representative to investigate Inter-American student relations for the association. He studied at Dublin University for two years.

MR. HAWKRIDGE TO WED MISS CROUSE—Mr. and Mrs. Wellington Shelton Crouse of Bethlehem, Conn., announce the engagement of their daughter, Edith Eccleston, to Edwin Hawkridge, son of Mr. and Mrs. Leslie Dean Hawkridge of Newton Center.

Miss Crouse studied at the Seiler School in Harrisburg and at Smith College. She is a graduate of the University of California. After serving as a nurses' aid during the war she is now assisting in bacteriological research at the Long Island College of Medicine.

Mr. Hawkridge, a graduate of Dartmouth, was a lieutenant in the Navy aboard the U.S.S. Wadsworth, which was awarded the Presidential Unit Citation during the war.

Koussevitzky Given Ovation as He Opens Last Hub Season

By CYRUS DURGIN

Serge Koussevitsky began at Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon his 25th and last season as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

For that reason the occasion was one of considerable sentiment as well as pleasurable expectation. There was more than the usual significance when orchestra and audience rose to greet him.

Continuing applause kept him standing trim, ruddy and smiling in the white radiance of a spotlight, for what seemed to be minutes.

Then, with his familiar gesture, he bade all be seated and turned to the music. This was the Vivaldi Concerto in D minor, in the edition of Alexander Siloti.

When Koussevitsky first stepped before the Boston public, Oct. 10, 1924, this Concerto was the very first work he conducted.

To musicians and some of the public, a fine analysis of Koussevitzky performances of 1924 and '48 would be extraordinarily interesting. Perhaps they might find considerable difference in his treatment of Vivaldi then and now. But, one can be certain, both performances must have shared one characteristic, and that is rich, clear, ocean-deep and rainbow-colored tone of the Boston strings.

Program Fashioned After 1924 Concert

The initial program for this 25th anniversary season was planned to duplicate, insofar as practicable, that introductory one of 1924. Both the Vivaldi and the Brahms Variations on a Theme by Haydn were retained. Berlioz' "Roman Carnival" Overture was dropped out. Honegger's Symphony for Strings replaced his "Pacific 231" which, though in its day a sensational evocation of mechanical power, probably would seem dated now.

Koussevitzky no longer finds interest in the music of Scriabine, so the latter's "Poem of Ecstasy" was put aside in favor of Beethoven's Seventh Symphony.

From first to last, yesterday afternoon, the concert was one of superlative orchestral playing and interpretation of absolute mastery and distinction.

Brahms' Haydn Variations may be growing a bit lacklustre by reason of over-familiarity, but how they glowed and sang yesterday!

Honegger's remarkable wartime Symphony, introduced by Munch two seasons ago and repeated by Koussevitzky last season, was a sheer triumph of string virtuosity and re-creative conducting.

In lesser hands the spreading counterpoint, occasionally unsymmetrical phrases and odd accents might create just a thicket of sound. With Koussevitzky, as with Munch, the notes formed a large pattern of logic and expression. But are three trumpets needed to blare the exciting chorale that comes in toward the end?

Koussevitzky's way with Beethoven, ever dynamic but now more equable in tempo, needs no description. The Seventh yesterday was all eloquence until the last five or six pages, when speed got out of hand.

As he promised, the conductor used for the opening piece the silver baton presented to him last Saturday by radio station WBMS.

Only four changes have been made in the personnel of the orchestra. Samuel Mayes has succeeded Jean Bedetti, resigned, as first cellist, while Manuel Valerio has moved up to first clarinet following the death, last July, of Victor Polatschek. Attilio Poto has joined the clarinet section, and Sheldon Rotenberg is now a member of the second violins.

E BOSTON HERALD, SATURDAY, OCTOBER 9, 1948

MUSIC

Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, gave the first concert of its 68th season in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. The program was as follows:

Concerto in D minor for orchestra .... Vivaldi
Variations on a Theme by Haydn, Op. 56A .... Brahms
Symphony for Strings.......... Honegger
Symphony No. 7 in A major, Op. 92 .... Beethoven

By RUDOLPH ELIE

With a lifetime of triumphs behind him it is hard to imagine how Serge Koussevitzky could walk onto the stage of Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon to conduct the first concert of his 24th—and valedictory—season and achieve, in one concert, the apotheosis of all the triumphs he has ever attained, but he did, and those fortunate enough to have been present can only count themselves lucky to have had a part in it.

His was, in the first place, an incredible physical performance. A man of 75 conducting an orchestra of 110 men with all the vigor, the control, the energy and the endurance of an athlete half his years. How is this possible? Because of a creative spirit so intense there is no such thing as weariness. Because of an mpulse to communicate the musical vision he knows within himself so boundless there is no such thing as physical barrier? I don't know, but it is a source of endless wonder and mystery to me.

Yet yesterday's concert, attended by all the social commotion that lends a flavor all its own to the opening concert of the season, was a good deal more than a physical accomplishment. For the sound of the orchestra, the perfection of its playing, the response of all its choirs and the blend of all its voices into one incomparable texture is the result of 24 years of the most painstaking schooling done in the thankless atmosphere of rehearsal. Thus the orchestra has become, in Koussevitzky's hands, a virtuoso instrument that fulfills every demand put upon it while he, freed of the technical concerns of the time beater during performance, can allow himself full interpretative scope.

This was evident throughout the concert which, in point of programming, made an appropriately sentimental gesture to the first program the conductor performed in Symphony Hall. It was evident in the Vivaldi Concerto (with which he made his debut in 1924), where, in the slow movement, he took it at a much broader tempo than is usually considered representative of the baroque style, yet gave it a nobility and a spaciousness that was entirely beautiful.

It was evident in the Brahms, especially in the scherzo variation, where his extreme lightness and delicacy of touch was magical, and again in the siciliana variation where his modelling of the interplay of melodic lines was exquisite. The Honegger Symphony for Strings, which seems to me as fine a composition as the war years produced, again gave full play to his interpretative powers. This is a work that on paper has its share of astringency, not to say dissonance so-called. But it doesn't seem possible that any one in the hall yesterday could have missed, in Dr. Koussevitzky's sweeping conception, the emotional impact of the work, which is, I venture to say, on the road to becoming a modern classic.

The concert, needless to say, reached its climax in the performance of Beethoven's Seventh, a work that never fails to astonish the listener with the variety of its rhythms, the freshness of its inspiration and the vigor of its conception. Dr. Koussevitzky never flagged for a moment, rushing through the scherzo and the finale to bring the work to a breathless conclusion and to earn an equally breathless ovation. It was some concert!

Save for a new first cellist (whose very brief solo in the Honegger revealed that we have another fine artist in our midst) and the replacement of the late Victor Polatschek by Manuel Valerio as first clarinetist, I didn't note many changes in the orchestra personnel. Next week the program offers the first performance of Mahler's Seventh Symphony in Boston, and Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition."

PORTLAND, ME.
EXPRESS

Kousse̲v̲i̲t̲z̲k̲y̲ Starts Last Year As Boston Symphony Director

Boston, Oct. 8. (AP)—With a silver baton and a program of the old and new in great music, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky today began his 25th and final season as director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Now 74, he has held the post longer than anyone in the orchestra's 67-year history.

At the end of the 1948-49 season, he will be succeeded by Charles Muench, 56-year-old French conductor.

A tireless worker, the Russian-born Koussevitzky built the ensemble to world leadership and brought to fame many young conductors and composers.

He also introduced conservative Boston to a wide range of modern music. Sometimes, as when he first conducted Stravinsky's Rites of Spring, he was heartily booed.

But most of the indignant dowagers who walked out on that program stayed to applaud when it was repeated in later seasons. Some were among wartime audiences that cheered "Kousey's" direction of a work by the Brazilian conductor-composer Villa Lobos that required noise-makers and a section of picket fence.

On the program of Koussevitzky's first symphony hall concert in September, 1924 was Arthur Monneger's lively Pacific 231.

The modern French composer also was represented today by a more recent—and soothing—work: String Symphony.

Koussevitzky's new baton is a silver jubilee gift from Radio Station, WBMS, Boston. It is a reproduction in silver of the white birch stick—no bigger than a pencil—that has guided the orchestra for the past 25 years.

An American citizen since 1934, Koussevitzky plans to make his winter home in nearby Brookline after his retirement.

He still will continue as director of the Berkshire Music Center, the Boston Symphony's summer school at Tanglewood, in Lenox. He founded it in 1940.

[166]

BOSTON, SATURDAY, OCTOBER 9, 1948 Art—Music—Theat

—Koussevitzky Begins Finc

Conductor Receives Ovation at First Concert

By L. A. Sloper

Serge Koussevitzky received an ovation from a standing audience and orchestra yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall as he began his twenty fifth and final season as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The conductor was at the top of his form and the orchestra was in mid-season fettle. The personnel is little changed at the key desks: Samuel Mays has come from the Philadelphia Orchestra to take Jean Bedetti's place as first cellist, and Manuel Valerio has been moved to the first clarinet's desk, succeeding the late Victor Polatschek. Thus Dr. Koussevitzky is able to obtain instant adherence to his slightest wish.

It was an occasion of sentimental as well as musical value; perhaps the sentimental aspects were predominant. Twenty five years is a long time for a man to direct the artistic activity of a symphony orchestra; longer than any other man has controlled the destinies of this orchestra. The program was reminiscent of the first he led in Boston. Undoubtedly many in the audience recalled that concert.

It is a pleasure to report that Dr. Koussevitzky operates with undiminished power and poetic imagination. He is a much better conductor today than he was 24 years ago. He has put aside many of his mannerisms, his extravagances. He still has full control of the flexible instrument which he has built and which has helped him express his artistic visions. His plans for the year indicate that he is still exploring; at the second concert, he is bringing Mahler's Seventh Symphony to a first Boston hearing, and many other novelties are scheduled.

The program of this first concert was conventional except for one item—Honegger's Symphony for Strings—which oddly enough has a passage for three trumpets. It had been played twice before at these concerts, and once at Tanglewood. The performance on this occasion confirmed the impression that the piece is really a tone poem, describing the despair of Parisians in 1941, the march of the invaders, the suffering of the inhabitants under the occupation, and the final expression of faith in survival (this is where the trumpets come in). I still cannot see the work as a formal symphonic pattern.

The other works on the program were Vivaldi's Concerto in D minor for orchestra with organ, Brahms' Variations on a Theme of Haydn, and Beethoven's Seventh Symphony. All were performed with the intensity and eloquence to which we have become accustomed from Koussevitzky.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE
OCT 9 - 1948

Koussevitzky Acclaimed As He Starts Last Season

BOSTON, Oct 8 (UP).—Using a silver baton, Serge Koussevitzky opened his twenty-fifth and final season as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra today.

The orchestra members and audience at Symphony Hall gave the Russian-born conductor a standing ovation as he entered. He acknowledged the applause with several bows and then began the Concerto in D minor for orchestra and organ by Vivaldi, the same work with which he opened his first season.

Dr. Koussevitzky continued his blending of the old and new in music. At his debut in Symphony Hall in 1924 he featured the first American performance of Honegger's "Pacific 2-3-1," a symphonic poem inspired by a locomotive.

Today's performance contained a new work by the same composer, "Symphony for Strings," while the second half of the program was revoted to Beethoven's Seventh Symphony.

BATON ROUGE, LA.
ADVOCATE
[illegible]

Koussevitzky Opens 25th Season as Conductor Of Boston Symphony

Boston, Oct. 8 (UP)—Using a silver baton, Serge Koussevitzky opened his 25th and final season as conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra today.

The orchestra members and audience at Symphony hall gave the Russian-born conductor a standing ovation as he entered. He acknowledged the applause with several bows and then began the concerto in D minor for orchestra and organ by Vivaldi, the same work with which he opened his first season.

Koussevitsky continued his blending of the old and new in music. At his debute in Symphony hall in 1924, he featured the first United States performance of Honegger's "Pacific 2-3-1" a symphonic poem inspired by a locomotive.

Today's performance contained a new work by the same composer, "Symphony for Strings," while the second half of the program was devoted to Beethoven's Seventh Symphony.

MONTPELIER, VT.
ARGUS
OCT 9 - 1948

Koussevitsky In 25th Season As Symphony Leader

Boston, Oct 9 -(AP)- With a silver baton and a program of the old and new in great music, Dr. Serge Koussevitsky yesterday began his [illegible] final season as director of the Boston Symphony orchestra.

Now 74, he has held the post longer than anyone in the orchestra's 67-year history.

At the end of the 1948-49 season. He will be succeeded by Charles Muench, 56-year-old French conductor.

A tireless worker, the Russian-born Koussevitsky built the ensemble to world leadership and brought to fame many young conductors and composers.

Te also introduced conservative Boston to a wide range of modern music. Sometimes, as when he first conducted Stravinsky's "Rites of Spring" he was heartily booed.

But most of the indignant dowagers who walked out on that program stayed to applaud when it was repeated in later sessions.. Some were among wartime audiences that cheered "Kousey's" direction of a work by the Brazilian conductor-composer Villa Lobos that required noisemakers and a section of picket fence.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN
OCT 9 - 1948

Koussevitzky Gets Ovation at Boston

Boston, Oct. 8.—(UP)—Using a silver baton Serge Koussevitzky opened his 25th and final season as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra today.

The orchestra members and audience at Symphony Hall gave the Russian-born conductor a standing ovation as he entered. He acknowledged the applause with several bows and then began the concerto in D minor for orchestra and organ by Vivaldi, the same work with which he opened his first season.

BOSTON HERALD, SATURDAY, OCTOBER 9, 1948

MUSIC

Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, gave the first concert of its 68th season in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. The program was as follows:

Concerto in D minor for orchestra .... Vivaldi
Variations on a Theme by Haydn, Op. 56A .... Brahms
Symphony for Strings .... Honegger
Symphony No. 7 in A major, Op. 92 .... Beethoven

By RUDOLPH ELIE

With a lifetime of triumphs behind him it is hard to imagine how Serge Koussevitzky could walk onto the stage of Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon to conduct the first concert of his 24th—and valedictory—season and achieve, in one concert, the apotheosis of all the triumphs he has ever attained, but he did, and those fortunate enough to have been present can only count themselves lucky to have had a part in it.

His was, in the first place, an incredible physical performance. A man of 75 conducting an orchestra of 110 men with all the vigor, the control, the energy and the endurance of an athlete half his years. How is this possible? Because of a creative spirit so intense there is no such thing as weariness. Because of an mpulse to communicate the musical vision he knows within himself so boundless there is no such thing as physical barrier? I don't know, but it is a source of endless wonder and mystery to me.

Yet yesterday's concert, attended by all the social commotion that lends a flavor all its own to the opening concert of the season, was a good deal more than a physical accomplishment. For the sound of the orchestra, the perfection of its playing, the response of all its choirs and the blend of all its voices into one incomparable texture is the result of 24 years of the most painstaking schooling done in the thankless atmosphere of rehearsal. Thus the orchestra has become, in Koussevitzky's hands, a virtuoso instrument that fulfills every demand put upon it while he, freed of the technical concerns of the time beater during performance, can allow himself full interpretative scope.

This was evident throughout the concert which, in point of programming, made an appropriately sentimental gesture to the first program the conductor performed in Symphony Hall. It was evident in the Vivaldi Concerto (with which he made his debut in 1924), where, in the slow movement, he took it at a much broader tempo than is usually considered representative of the baroque style, yet gave it a nobility and a spaciousness that was entirely beautiful.

It was evident in the Brahms, especially in the scherzo variation, where his extreme lightness and delicacy of touch was magical, and again in the siciliana variation where his modelling of the interplay of melodic lines was exquisite. The Honegger Symphony for Strings, which seems to me as fine a composition as the war years produced, again gave full play to his interpretative powers. This is a work that on paper has its share of astringency, not to say dissonance so-called. But it doesn't seem possible that any one in the hall yesterday could have missed, in Dr. Koussevitzky's sweeping conception, the emotional impact of the work, which is, I venture to say, on the road to becoming a modern classic.

The concert, needless to say, reached its climax in the performance of Beethoven's Seventh, a work that never fails to astonish the listener with the variety of its rhythms, the freshness of its inspiration and the vigor of its conception. Dr. Koussevitzky never flagged for a moment, rushing through the scherzo and the finale to bring the work to a breathless conclusion and to earn an equally breathless ovation. It was some concert!

Save for a new first cellist (whose very brief solo in the Honegger revealed that we have another fine artist in our midst) and the replacement of the late Victor Polatschek by Manuel Valerio as first clarinetist, I didn't note many changes in the orchestra personnel. Next week the program offers the first performance of Mahler's Seventh Symphony in Boston, and Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition."

ST. LOUIS, MO.
POST DISPATCH
OCT 10 1948

HERE AND THERE ON THE AIR

UNPLEASANT news for lovers of symphonic music: The A.B.C. net does not plan to broadcast Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts this fall and winter. . . . Start of a comment series by Mrs. Eleanor Roosevelt and her daughter, Mrs. Anna Roosevelt Bottiger, has been postponed. KXOK has been asked if it will carry the program at 2:45 p.m. Monday through Friday, beginning Nov. 8. It is reported the program will cost $3250 a week plus time on the air. . . . C.B.S. has set for Wednesday night, Nov. 3, an hour-long documentary about the movie industry in terms of the conception, development and production of "The Best Years of Our Lives." . . . A Mutual net crew is touring the country recording the reactions of children affected by divorce suits for a documentary about problems of marriage set for Monday night. Oct. 25. .

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE
OCT 10 1948

Koussevitzky Acclaimed As He Starts Last Season

BOSTON, Oct 8 (UP).—Using a silver baton, Serge Koussevitzky opened his twenty-fifth and final season as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Friday.

The orchestra members and audience at Symphony Hall gave the Russian-born conductor a standing ovation as he entered. He acknowledged the applause with several bows and then began the Concerto in D minor for orchestra and organ by Vivaldi, the same work with which he opened his first season.

Dr. Koussevitzky continued his blending of the old and new in music. At his debut in Symphony Hall in 1924 he featured the first American performance of Honegger's "Pacific 2-3-1," a symphonic poem inspired by a locomotive.

Friday's performance contained a new work by the same composer, "Symphony for Strings," while the second half of the program was revoted to Beethoven's Seventh Symphony.

TAMPA, FLA.
TRIBUNE
OCT 10 1948

CONDUCTOR APPLAUDED

BOSTON, Oct. 9.—(U.P.)—Using a silver baton, Serge Koussevitzky opened his 25th season as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra today. The orchestra members and audience at Symphony Hall gave the Russian-born conductor a standing ovation as he entered. He acknowledged the applause with several bows and then began the Concerto in D Minor for orchestra and organ by Vivaldi, the same work with which he opened his first season.

Today IN SOCIETY

Patrons of Koussevitzky's Debut in Boston Attend His 25th Opening

By MARJORIE W. SHERMAN

[illegible] last time, Serge [illegible] Lng- [illegible] and yes- [illegible] stepping [illegible] the [illegible] ovation. [illegible] filled, [illegible] the box [illegible] filled [illegible] burnished [illegible] to [illegible] the [illegible] that [illegible] of a [illegible] new [illegible] for the

[illegible] yesterday's [illegible] that [illegible] listened [illegible] the re- [illegible] Vivaldi [illegible] Franklin W. [illegible] brown suit [illegible] same as [illegible] Friday after- [illegible] ago, as she [illegible] violinist [illegible] guest. Mrs. [illegible] was another [illegible] commanding, familiar [illegible]'s platform, [illegible] years ago, and [illegible] Seares, [illegible] Coolidges, [illegible] most of them [illegible] from which [illegible] Serge Koussevitzky [illegible] afternoon. [illegible] Paine, in her [illegible] black and white, [illegible] friends every [illegible]—the George [illegible]-century con- [illegible] Wallace Good- [illegible] Anne Griswold, [illegible] talked Paris [illegible]—the Eben [illegible] Symphony plans [illegible] Todd—Mrs. Augustus [illegible] A. Murray, and [illegible] K. Thorndike gathered [illegible] Lucy Rantoul [illegible] suit with a [illegible] of nutria—Mrs. [illegible] had a young [illegible] so did Mrs. Fred- [illegible] Ayer—Mrs. George H. Swift [illegible] daughter, Mrs. Lawrence [illegible] came in together, both [illegible] suits—Mrs. Ralph [illegible] walked over from Beacon [illegible] immemorial custom of Fri- [illegible] Symphony-goers, and Mrs. [illegible] H. Stevenson also walked [illegible] slim and attractive [illegible] brown tweeds—and still [illegible] big familiar audience [illegible] Hovey, blonde and [illegible] black and yellow wool [illegible] Lyman—Mrs. Donald [illegible]—Elizabeth Fenno answering [illegible] her sister Pauline, [illegible] England, working [illegible] Reading, head of the [illegible] Services—Mrs. [illegible] French in a smart [illegible] asked for tickets for [illegible] fashion luncheon [illegible] Cushman Club—Isa- [illegible] the season's first [illegible] Warren—Mrs. [illegible] and her sister, [illegible] good-looking [illegible] Maxim Karolik—Ar- [illegible] John Yerxa—and

MR. CHILDERS TO WED MISS TINKER—Of particular interest to [illegible] many Boston relatives and friends is the announcement today of the engagement of Miss Irene Celeste Tinker, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. John M. Tinker of Wilmington, Del., to Erskine Barton Childers of Dublin, Ireland.

Miss Tinker is a member of the [illegible] class at Radcliffe College. Mr. Childers, who is now studying at Stanford University, is a grandson of Mrs. Albert N. Dow and the late Gen. Dow of Wellesley Hills, and a cousin of Mrs. Warren Lothrop of Cambridge. His parents are Mr. and Mrs. Erskine Hamilton Childers of Dublin.

Both Miss Tinker and her fiance are associated with the United States National Student Association. She is public relations director for the Northern New England region, and he is chairman of the California-Nevada-Hawaii Region. Last Summer he toured western South America as Latin American representative to investigate Inter-American student relations for the association. He studied at Dublin University for two years.

MR. HAWKRIDGE TO WED MISS CROUSE—Mr. and Mrs. Wellington Shelton Crouse of Bethlehem, Conn., announce the engagement of their daughter, Edith Eccleston, to Edwin Hawkridge, son of Mr. and Mrs. Leslie Dean Hawkridge of Newton Center.

Miss Crouse studied at the Seiler School in Harrisburg and at Smith College. She is a graduate of the University of California. After serving as a nurses' aid during the war she is now assisting in bacteriological research at the Long Island College of Medicine.

Mr. Hawkridge, a graduate of Dartmouth, was a lieutenant in the Navy aboard the U.S.S. Wadsworth, which was awarded the Presidential Unit Citation during the war.

MRS. FRANKLIN W. HOBBS, among Bostonians at opening of the Symphony season yesterday who attended Dr. Koussevitzky's first concert here 25 years ago.

Koussevitzky Given Ovation as He Opens Last Hub Season

By CYRUS DURGIN

Serge Koussevitsky began at Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon his 25th and last season as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

For that reason the occasion was one of considerable sentiment as well as pleasurable expectation. There was more than the usual significance when orchestra and audience rose to greet him.

Continuing applause kept him standing trim, ruddy and smiling in the white radiance of a spotlight, for what seemed to be minutes.

Then, with his familiar gesture, he bade all be seated and turned to the music This was the Vivaldi Concerto in D minor, in the edition of Alexander Siloti.

When Koussevitsky first stepped before the Boston public, Oct. 10, 1924, this Concerto was the very first work he conducted.

To musicians and some of the public, a fine analysis of Koussevitzky performances of 1924 and '48 would be extraordinarily interesting. Perhaps they might find considerable difference in his treatment of Vivaldi then and now. But, one can be certain, both performances must have shared one characteristic, and that is rich, clear, ocean-deep and rainbow-colored tone of the Boston strings.

Program Fashioned After 1924 Concert

The initial program for this 25th anniversary season was planned to duplicate, insofar as practicable, that introductory one of 1924. Both the Vivaldi and the Brahms Variations on a Theme by Haydn were retained. Berlioz' "Roman Carnival" Overture was dropped out. Honegger's Symphony for Strings replaced his "Pacific 231" which, though in its day a sensational evocation of mechanical power, probably would seem dated now.

Koussevitzky no longer finds interest in the music of Scriabine, so the latter's "Poem of Ecstasy" was put aside in favor of Beethoven's Seventh Symphony.

From first to last, yesterday afternoon, the concert was one of superlative orchestral playing and interpretation of absolute mastery and distinction.

Brahms' Haydn Variations may be growing a bit lacklustre by reason of over-familiarity, but how they glowed and sang yesterday!

Honegger's remarkable wartime Symphony, introduced by Munch two seasons ago and repeated by Koussevitzky last season, was a sheer triumph of string virtuosity and re-creative conducting.

In lesser hands the spreading counterpoint, occasionally unsymmetrical phrases and odd accents might create just a thicket of sound. With Koussevitzky, as with Munch, the notes formed a large pattern of logic and expression. But are three trumpets needed to blare the exciting chorale that comes in toward the end?

Koussevitzky's way with Beethoven, ever dynamic but now more equable in tempo, needs no description The Seventh yesterday was all eloquence until the last five or six pages, when speed got out of hand.

As he promised, the conductor used for the opening piece the silver baton presented to him last Saturday by radio station WBMS.

Only four changes have been made in the personnel of the orchestra. Samuel Mayes has succeeded Jean Bedetti, resigned, as first cellist, while Manuel Valerio has moved up to first clarinet following the death, last July, of Victor Polatschek. Attilio Poto has joined the clarinet section, and Sheldon Rotenberg is now a member of the second violins.

Music Again: A Few Remarks Probably Best Left Unsaid

Oct 10 Herald

By RUDOLPH ELIE, JR.

It is, if I may employ a tired but true phrase, with mingled pleasure and regret that I find myself back on this page of a Sunday, for the time being, writing of things musical. It is a pleasure because writing about music is to me a happy occupation; it is a regret because I am sorry to see my distinguished predecessor and good friend Alexander Williams leave a field in which he had few equals.

He will not, I am sure, mind my revealing his plans, for it must have been obvious to his many admirers during the 16 years he held the post of music critic on The Herald that he was as interested, and as gifted, in writing about literature as he was about music. Thus he succumbed at last to the offer, made to him some time ago, to become an associate editor for the firm of Little Brown. We of The Herald were reluctant to see him go, but we cannot but wish him well.

Having begun on so intimate a vein I might as well hold forth sketchily on my own views on writing of music and musicians. In the first place, although it is nearly impossible to exactly define the difference between a reviewer and a critic since both necessarily imply the expression of personal opinion, I vastly prefer to be known as a reviewer, not a critic. For criticism is a full-time occupation consisting of judging and defining creative work according to certain standards and to hand down opinions as to its merit or lack of merit.

The Awkward "I"

Clearly, this is no field to be invaded armed only with a few blunt paragraphs of newspaper space and one or two hearings of a major musical work. Your critic doesn't—or at least to my way of thinking shouldn't—go around saying that somebody's symphony is terrible, period, unless he has plenty of room to state his case, or unless he is so very eminent in his field that his opinion obviously springs from a prodigious background of just perception. Critics of this calibre operate today in the musical quarterlies, and it is in them the musically advanced reader may seek considered musical judgments and complicated technical analyses.

In years gone by, when the tempo of life wasn't quite so frantic and journalism hadn't become so specialized, newspapers granted the space necessary to a conscientious critic to develop his theme as a matter of course. A full-page discussion of a symphony concert or an opera was the rule. There wasn't the terrific global news coverage that now makes it possible for a newspaper to print news and pictures from all quarters of the world almost from hour to hour.

Today, in short, so many international matters vital to our security and our lives scream for attention in the daily press that long, technical analyses or "critiques" are not only out of the question but out of gear with the times. And so it seems to me that critic should first of all review the day-to-day musical events of his time as on-the-record accounts, reflecting meanwhile his own artistic standards, maintaining his own artistic integrity and venturing opinions and impressions that neither he nor anyone else construes as the ultimate word.

Another thing that occurs to me is the status of that awkward pronoun "I". Frequently writers who indulge in the first person receive copies of their articles with all the "I's" encircled in red pencil. They are anonymous communications, to be sure, but they do indicate that many people, and with reason, are repelled by writing filled with "I's".

No Final Word

In The Roving Reporter, which will continue to appear as before, I have always hoped to make the first person as inoffensive and as universal as possible. That is to say, the first person of The Roving Reporter is not exactly intended to be me nor to reflect always my own personal opinions or feelings, but to reflect the point of view of the "normal neurotic" so amusingly portrayed in the recent musical show "Small Wonder." Actually, people have written in to comment on articles I've written about my children when I had not written about my children at all (and have never yet identified them as such), but was writing about children. In fine, I've always felt somehow that what happens to me, what I see, feel and think, happens, is seen, felt and thought by almost everyone in my particular milieu.

In reviewing music, however, the personal pronoun can mean no one else but me. As the opinion or impression of one very fallible mortal it cannot be (and I trust no one interprets it to be) The Final Word. I can only hope that the opinions and impressions I may express will coincide generally with those who read them, but I take full responsibility for them and expect those who disagree to take exception as freely as they wish.

And so, as I return to an occupation that has always seemed to me worthwhile (though not quite so all-important as I used to think it), I sincerely trust my readers will see that I do not set myself up as God's own chosen musical mouthpiece, and that I hope only to entertain, possibly instruct and occasionally interpret and always convey my own enthusiasm for an art that each year seems to me more unapproachable, more inspiring and more beautiful.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
OCT 10 1948

RECORDS: MODERN

A Number of Contemporary Works Among Latest Items Released

By HOWARD TAUBMAN

A RESPECTABLE number of new recordings of contemporary works has reached the market in recent weeks. At least two of these compositions appear in the repertory with reasonable regularity, and they have been around long enough so that they scarcely can be described as new. The others are not particularly experimental. But let us not throw stones at any manifestation of a sense of responsibility for what is happening in our generation.

Serge Prokofieff belongs to our generation, even though he has been composing successfully for more than thirty years. His Classical Symphony in D, Op. 25, which he wrote thirty-one years ago, is a thoroughly established score. It is a rare season in which the major symphony orchestras do not program it at least once. Its blend of the classic spirit with the witty, sophisticated comment of the twentieth century has given it a special cachet in the affections of conductors and audiences.

Serge Koussevitzky has been especially fond of the work, and his performance with the Boston Symphony Orchestra (Victor, two twelve-inch disks) has crispness, sprightliness and a rich, orchestral tone. On the fourth side is Danse Finale from Prokofieff's early ballet, Chout, which is less restrained than the symphony and calls for all kinds of virtuosity from the orchestra. Its youthful gusto is engaging.

Gershwin Score

George Gershwin's An American in Paris is another score full of youth and high spirits, although its general atmosphere is far from the sophistication of a Prokofieff. It may not appear on symphonic programs quite so often as the Prokofieff symphony, but, like the Rhapsody in Blue, it is not forgotten. Its bounciness and even its occasional obviousness are disarming.

Somehow the work distils the naive good feeling that prevailed in the world in the Twenties. More than a description of an American's visit to the Paris in those days, it shapes up as a truthful evocation of the state of mind of the delighted, untroubled tourist of those nostalgic years. It would be hard for a composer to approximate this quality in a musical travelogue today.

Leonard Bernstein conducts the RCA Victor Symphony Orchestra (Victor, two twelve-inch disk a gay, colorful performance. has a flair for music of this He gives the jazz rhythms full value without any trace of consciousness.

Igor Stravinsky's Danses Cor tantes also uses modern rhyth but they have a subtlety, intric and variety that were not wit the scope of a composer like Gers win, whose training was much mc limited. This score was commi sioned by Werner Janssen and rected by Mr. Stravinsky—wi the Janssen Symphony—in its pı mière in February, 1942. The ne year it was turned into a ballet.

The music is charming in i verve and freshness. Surely this one of Stravinsky's most accessib pieces among his later works. Th composer conducts the RCA Victc Chamber Orchestra in a brisk, i cisive performance. On the six side he leads the RCA Victor Syı phony Orchestra in his Scherzo la Russe, which was composed Paul Whiteman's ensemble in 1944 and which also has all the ingredients for popularity.

Zoltán Kodály's Dances of Marosszék, played discriminatingly by Andor Foldes, pianist (Vox, two twelve-inch disks), were composed in 1930. The work uses several folk dances of the Transylvanian district, weaving a tasteful and fanciful pattern around them. The music has simplicity and charm. You will find in it none of the wildness that Kodály's more gifted countryman, the late Béla Bartók, conveyed in his handling of folk material.

The fourth side has two pieces from Seven Pieces for Piano, Op. 11, and these are also in a light folk vein.

On a single twelve-inch Victor disk Maro Ajemian, pianist, plays two examples of Bartók's treatment of folk music—Rondo No. 1 on a Folk Tune and Bulgarian Dance, No. 1, both from Mikrokosmos. These pieces, intelligently performed, are more concise and less obvious than the Kodály music. On the reverse side Miss Ajemian is joined by her sister, Anahid, violinist, in Khatchaturian's Chant Poème, a lush, rhapsodic piece for which the only word is schmalz.

BOSTON, THURSDAY, OCTOBER 14, 1948

use—Preview of Symphony

Mahler Seventh to Be Heard For First Time in Boston

Mahler's Seventh Symphony will be played this week end for the first time in Boston. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in performances of the work tomorrow afternoon and Saturday evening in Symphony Hall. Sharing the same program will be Modest Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition," scored for orchestra by Maurice Ravel.

The Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra was the first to produce Mahler's Seventh Symphony; the composer conducted this performance in Prague on Sept. 19, 1908. Although the work was scarcely understood by the public at the première, modern listeners have generally grown into a keener appreciation for Mahler's gifts as a composer.

* * *

Conceived in titanic proportions, the Mahler Seventh employs the following instrumentation: piccolo, four flutes, three oboes, English horn, three clarinets, three bassoons, double-bassoon, four horns, three trumpets, three trombones, bass tuba, four tympani, harp, mandolin, guitar, bass drum, cymbals, triangle, gong, cowbells, glockenspiel, bells, tambourine, side drum, and strings.

The symphony is in five movements, rather than the usual four, and it further departs from the classical form by ignoring the accepted scheme of fast and slow tempi.

Paul Stefan wrote in his book on Mahler: "The work, distinguished by the two movements called 'Nachtmusik' as interludes, is a single great nocturne . . . and curiously enough, when Mahler wished to 'vindicate' the cowbells . . . he explained to the orchestra that they were not intended to depict anything pastoral, but rather to signify the last greeting from earth that still reaches the wanderer on the loftiest heights."

Speaking of the finale, Stefan said that it was "like an early morning walk when the sun is rising over the mountain snow.... Like distant mountain peaks, just before the first light of the sun strikes them, the summits of this music are great and near, with the most splendid lines, folds, abysses, and contrapuntal intersections between one and the other. . . . The pinnacles gradually grow purple, and morning light transforms the weird aspects."

* * *

The first movement in E minor, Adagio, 4-4 time, is monumental in structure. Its melodies move with a sweeping flow, mounting into great swells and eddies of sound. Five themes are introduced, developed, and woven into the contrapuntal fabric.

"Serenade" is the title of the second movement (Allegro moderato, C minor, 4-4 time). It begins with a horn call, followed by another call in the distance. A scherzo-like march soon appears, and these two themes entwine and develop. Cowbells tinkle afar off. The movement comes to a close with bird-like sounds from the flute. It is mountain night-music, filled with triplets and trills.

The third movement is titled "Shadow-like." It is in D minor, 3-4 time. The instrumentation is somewhat lighter; strings, woodwinds, and horns predominate. Mahler employs lilting rhythms, reminiscent of Spain, and melodies that move in unexpected lines.

* * *

The fourth movement is another serenade marked Andante amoroso, in F major, 2-4 time. It is a moving love song, tender at first, but mounting into a passion that approximates Wagner's Liebestod. Mahler's reserved use of a guitar and a mandolin provides a romantic background for the emotional eloquence of the melody.

"Rondo-Finale" is the heading of the last movement (Allegro ordinario, C major, 4-4 time). It opens with a solo on the kettledrums, followed by a fanfare for horns. Brilliant passages ensue, alternating between the strings and the brass playing fortissimo. A minuet-like theme is introduced that moves with dash and swing.

The finale builds steadily to a thundering climax with bells pealing forth, and the symphony then sonorously comes to an end.

H. R.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
OCT 31 1948

THE WORLD OF MUSIC: SCHOENBERG IN ALBUQUERQUE

Composer Lets Orchestra There Have Premiere of 'A Survivor From Warsaw'

By ROSS PARMENTER

THOUGH one of the most famous and influential of living composers, Arnold Schoenberg has never been prolific. A world première of one of his new works is news. It is doubly so when he bestows it unexpectedly on an out-of-the-way, amateur organization. And that is what he has done. He has given "A Survivor From Warsaw" to the Albuquerque Civic Symphony Orchestra to be played for the first time in its home city in New Mexico on Thursday night.

Having been commissioned by the Koussevitzky Music Foundation, the work was expected to be played for the first time by the Boston Symphony. The Albuquerque première was a surprise even to Serge Koussevitzky, who said he was very "pleased" when the news was relayed to him last week.

Kurt Frederick, the conductor of the Albuquerque orchestra and an acquaintance of the composer, got the première by just asking for it. When he wrote making the request and asking the fee, the composer replied: "You may introduce it if you will copy the parts and send them to me after your concert."

The work calls for a men's chorus and a narrator who describes life in a concentration camp. The narration is in English, but the bellowed commands of the sergeant in charge will be in German and the prayer at the end will be in Hebrew. Dr. Sherman Smith, head of the Chemistry Department of the University of New Mexico, will be the narrator.

[169]

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
O[illegible] 10 [illegible]48

FRENCH ORCHESTRA

Its Visit and Performances Here Should Prove Illuminating to Us

By OLIN DOWNES

N[illegible] [illegible]day afternoon, Oct. [illegible] French Orchestre [illegible] under the direction [illegible] Charles Munch, [illegible] American debut in [illegible] This will be the [illegible] of the orchestra's [illegible] tour, arranged under [illegible] the French Gov[illegible] the American Aid [illegible] Inc., which will carry [illegible]zation in a series of [illegible] concerts, as far as [illegible] Coast, and southward [illegible] and New Orleans, and [illegible] Boston and to Quebec [illegible]al and Toronto in Canada [illegible] a vista for musicians as [illegible]tizens of two great nations [illegible]ntemplate.

[illegible] Orchestre National, numbering [illegible] ninety-six players, is esti[illegible] the finest French orchestras [illegible] have survived the war. Its [illegible] visit has analogies to [illegible] France's oldest and greatest [illegible] the Société des Concerts [illegible] Conservatoire, which toured [illegible] after the first World [illegible] the direction of André [illegible]ager, in the season of 1918-[illegible] This famous ensemble, in the [illegible] its visit, made musical [illegible] the United States. The [illegible] of the latter organization [illegible] the leadership of Charles Munch, who conducted with significant effect in this country last season and who next season succeeds Koussevitzky as leader of the Boston Symphony, should add another significant chapter to the annals.

The Orchestre National is much younger than its historical senior organization. The Société des Concerts du Conservatoire was founded by Habeneck in 1828. The Orchestre National, the leading radio as well as concert orchestra in France of today, was organized under government sponsorship more than a century later, in 1934. Thus the aftermath of the two most terrible of wars has brought to America two outstanding orchestras which have prominently exemplified French symphonic culture.

The Orchestre National, youngest of important French symphonic orchestras, which has probably maintained more regularly than any other the identity of its personnel, has been very highly mentioned in the European press in late seasons. There will be much curiosity to compare it, not only in point of technic and tone quality, but also style, with our own symphonic organizations.

National Characteristics

[illegible] orchestras, especially the orchestras which are products of the ripened culture of certain foreign nations, have national as well as technical and tonal characteristics of their own. Thus the instinctive lyricism of the best Italian orchestras, particularly manifest in the singing of their strings; the long famous ascendancy of the French players of wind instruments; the mellowness of German brass.

These qualities are more or less [illegible]tional—admitting that [illegible] such [illegible]ralities are notoriously capable of exceptions which can disprove the rule. But there are other distinctions between orchestras of different nationalities, on the stylistic and interpretive side, which [illegible] deeper. There are subtle [illegible]ces of spirit and sensibility [illegible] profoundly affect interpretation [illegible] cast new light even upon [illegible]ar scores.

A [illegible]al French orchestra of [illegible] under a conductor of singular [illegible]creative temperament [illegible] for leadership, should [illegible] of national genius [illegible] a highly suggestive way. In America we pride ourselves upon [illegible] orchestras, which we [illegible] both [illegible] security and [illegible] maintain. They are or[illegible]s of international stature and leadership. Their excellences are [illegible] and are properly extolled among us. It is implicit, none the less, in the circumstances, that the performance of the Orchestre National will have characteristics neither to be imitated nor successfully reproduced here. It is reasonable to expect this from the Orchestre National of France, and the experience should be rewarding.

The Orchestre National has had a dramatic career. It existed precariously and lived dangerously in France of the Occupation. Many of its members served in the armed forces, and some in the underground. Slowly, individually and in groups, and frequently at the greatest personal risk, the players reassembled in Marseille in the free zone. Still numerically weak, they resumed their concerts in that city in September of 1941. Following the Liberation they made the Theâtre de Champs Elysées their permanent home.

Before the war, in 1935, Arturo Toscanini had headed this orchestra at a series of concerts he gave in Paris. In 1946 the Orchestre National gave concerts in Brussels and Berlin; in the spring of 1947 it toured Switzerland, and was last June and July in England, including among its engagements there appearances at the London Music Festival.

New York Guest

During the coming season M. Munch will appear as guest conductor with the New York Philharmonic Symphony, as previously announced, aside from his leadership of the visiting French orchestra in the earlier part of the season. During the American tour of the Orchestre National he will on certain occasions give place as leader to Baptiste Mari, the tuba player of the orchestra who has occupied a similar position in the orchestra of the Lamoureux Concerts, and who will conduct at matinee concerts scheduled to take place at Lima (Ohio), Minneapolis, Denver and Provo (Utah).

The orchestra makes a very intensive trip, during which it will live in a train of Pullman cars by an arrangement which will preclude complications attendant upon lodgings in various cities and transfers of baggage and accouterments en route.

One expects these artists to be curious concerning our own orchestras and standards of performance, etc. But one ventures to anticipate another experience, not less interesting to them: experience of the American panorama and the various communities and kinds of people that make America, which is by no means a country of an eastern boundary. The new adventure begins west of New York, and becomes always the more phenomenal with the trek over the Rockies to the Sierras, where still there are the impressions of fresh frontiers. And all frontiers of land and of spirit are to be passed, for better understandings among all the nations and their arts.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE
OCT 14 [illegible]

Munch Arrives With Orchestra For Tour of U.S.

French Symphony to Play in 36 Cities; Appears At Carnegie Hall Sunday

Dr. Charles Munch, conductor of the Orchestre National de France, arrived in Hoboken at 8 a. m. yesterday with ninety-six members of his orchestra on the Holland-America liner Nieuw Amsterdam. Five other musicians had come the previous day by air.

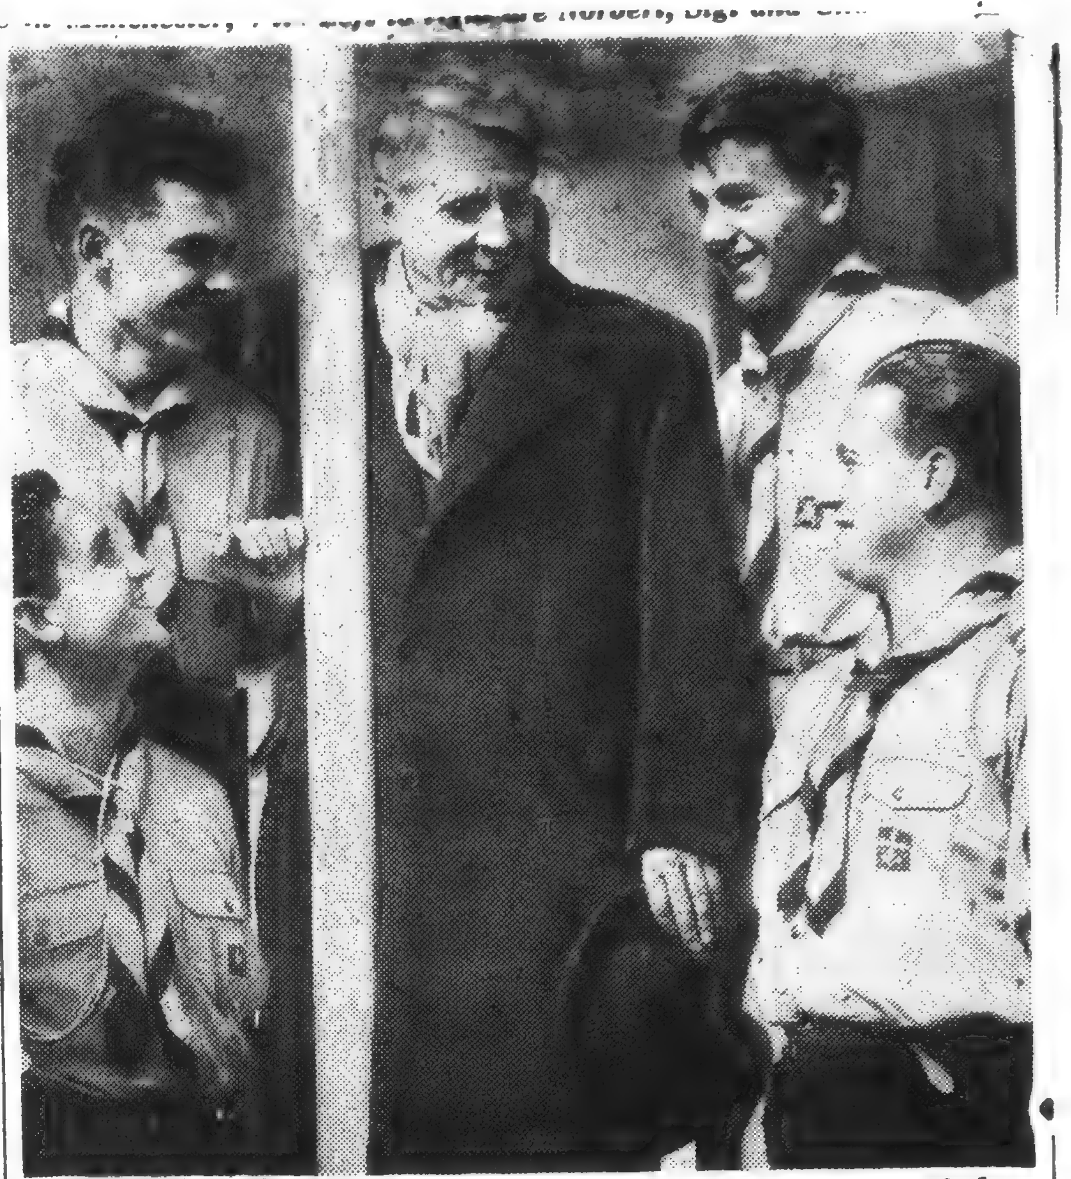
The orchestra will play forty concerts in a thirty-six-city tour of the United States, opening at Bridgeport, Conn., on Thursday, and playing at Carnegie Hall on Sunday. Their visit is the first by a French orchestra since 1919.

One American composition, a toccata written especially for this tour by Walter Piston, will be played at all forty concerts. The remainder of the programs will consist of French music. When in France the orchestra devotes a large part of its repertoire to American music, and has played under five American guest conductors since the war.

Dr. Munch will succeed Serge Koussevitsky as conductor of the Boston Symphony for the 1949-'50 season.

Dr. Munch said he was an enthusiastic admirer of modern American composers, particularly Samuel Barber, Aaron Copland, Gian-Carlo Menotti and Mr. Piston.

The orchestra's Carnegie Hall program will include the Overture from "Le Roi de L'Ys," by Lalo; "Symphonie Liturgique," by Honegger; "Le Tombeau de Couperin," by Ravel, and "Bacchus et Ariane," by Roussel, in addition to the Piston toccata.



French Boy Scouts greeting Dr. Charles Munch, conductor of the Orchestre National de France, aboard the Nieuw Amsterdam. Dr. Munch will succeed Serge Koussevitzky as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the 1949-'50 season

---

TIAN SCIENCE MONITOR, BOSTON, SATURDAY, OCTOBER 16, 1948 A

Week—Koussevitzky with Unfam

Composer's Seventh Symphony Presented fo

By L. A. Sloper

Serge Koussevitzky introduced Mahler's Seventh Symphony to Boston yesterday at the second Friday afternoon concert of the season in Symphony Hall. Apparently this was the third performance in the United States of the symphony in its entirety. Since it requires an hour and a quarter for its performance, there was only one other work on the program: the Moussorgsky - Ravel "Pictures at an Exhibition."

No doubt this performance of the Seventh Symphony will revive temporarily the controversy over Mahler. Except that it has no voice part, the symphony contains practically everything to support opposing opinions.

One thing it does demonstrate: that Mahler was not merely a "song-symphonist." That is, the end movements and the central Scherzo are conceived in instrumental terms and are given roughly symphonic development. Very roughly, in fact; for the composer does not readily submit to forms. The themes are not arresting, their treatment is spasmodic, altogether the impression is confirmed that the composer is a willful, undisciplined bundle of emotions, turning hither and thither and never staying put.

Nevertheless, I find the better Mahler in two of those movements, rather than in the two much - advertised Nachtmusiken. There is a genuine Mahlerian beauty in the slow middle section of the development of the first movement, and through most of the Scherzo there is originality, a charming wit, a graceful playfulness and a notable resourcefulness in orchestration.

In this Scherzo, for once in Mahler, you never know what is going to happen next, and you are kept on edge to find out as the themes chase one another across the orchestra with perverse pauses and sudden vanishments and unexpected reappearances in another part of the orchestral forest. This movement is great fun.

And in the slow part of the first movement working-out, where references are made to three themes, there are exquisite harmonies, a closely woven contrapuntal texture and a quiet certainty of utterance which leave no doubt of the composer's power.

The Nachtmusiken are less fascinating. The first one (second movement), which is in march time, rattles along with little suggestion of a serenade. The horn n night-music, nd trills.

---

nent is titled s in D minor, umentation is strings, woodpredominate.
ting rhythms,
in, and melon unexpected

vement is an-rked Andante or, 2-4 time. It ong, tender at into a passion es Wagner's s reserved use mandolin pro-background for quence of the is the heading ment (Allegro-r, 4-4 time). It on the kettle-y a fanfare for passages ensue,

eep the strings ying fortissimo.
me is introduced
ash and swing.
ds steadily to a ax, with bells
d the symphony
omes to an end.
H. R.

QUERQUE

Dr. Koussevitzky for more than twenty-five years conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra made it the outstanding Symphony of the World.

BERKSHIRE MUSIC CENTER

Opening Address By

DR. SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY
Director, Boston, Mass.

IT is always a deep joy to welcome everyone of you—old timers as well as newcomers—to Tanglewood.

It is also gratifying to realize that the Berkshire Music Center is steadily growing as an institution of permanent value. This is proved by the widening interest and support of the Friends of our Music Center, for which we thank its Chairman, Dr. Lewis Perry, and is especially made evident this summer by the contribution of the Hawthorne Cottage by such a prominent and nation-wide organization as the National Federation of Music Clubs. To the former President of the Federation and the initiator of this project, Mrs. Guy Patterson Gannett, who is responsible for bringing the historical cottage to life for the use of our Tanglewood family, we express our warm appreciation and gratitude.

Mentioning the Tanglewood family brings to mind another heartening event in the past year: the founding of the Berkshire Music Center Alumni Association—a welcome sign of the enduring ties of Tanglewood and the growing nucleus of its past, present and future members.

Let me briefly speak here for all those to whom Tanglewood means more than a mere spot on the map of the Berkshire Hills. We have recently suffered a loss, which deeply affected and saddened our hearts: it is the passing of Mrs. Hepburn, who was born on this very soil, who had dreamed of music as a child on these very grounds and whose devotion for music in later years led her to offer Tanglewood as a sanctuary for the creation in America of a world center of music, culture and the arts. Her memory shall live among us as it shall forever live in Tanglewood.

On this opening day of our sixth season, once again we are ready for a full program of the Berkshire Music Center, to which our faculty has given much thought and in which we shall take active part. As in the past seasons, the measure of our intent and capacity to immerse ourselves in music will bear fresh evidence of the productive experience and results of our work. When preparing for our season and addressing you, my young friends, I think of you not as a group of young people of average student age, but as mentally and artistically mature, above the average. I am, therefore, speaking of music not in a limited and strictly professional sense, but in a universal aspect, which is in line with the concept of our Music Center. The fact that we live in an extraordinary age cannot be overlooked.

The physicist calls it the atomic age; the mystic sees in it the approach of apocalyptic times; the world-view of the musician must encompass both, for the musician holds his head in the clouds, and his feet on the ground. His creative vision and inspiration carry him above and beyond his times; yet his work marks his epoch and leaves "footprints on the sands of time." In our eventful and disturbing age, we traverse a world of unrest, of changing values and crumbling frontiers. Within this year we witnessed the loss of independence of several countries, the expansion of power of others, the advent of a new state born of ancient roots in blood and strife; and the slaying of one, who has truly been called the apostle of peace, by the hand of a fellow countryman. We further witnessed an act of moral injustice, committed against the creative freedom and genius in our own artistic realm. Shall we remain silent when art is attacked at its very roots and when abnormal pressure is allowed to take place of truth?

We well know that art cannot be subjected to conditions of spiritual dependence; art cannot be dominated by external influences and crushed under the thumb of the mass. Who can judge the creative artist? Who has the temerity to condemn and morally persecute him, and lead him to surrender his personal independence and judgment? The sound criterion of a judge or critic of art should be both high and deep; a critic of art must not only possess high integrity and knowledge, but also a profound insight into the creative work and mind. He must strive to develop, within himself, the power of penetration and illuminating sensitivity, so that he can perceive the mystery of the creative state and process, and from that basic perception he will proceed to build up a constructive criticism. Narrow-mindedness, subjectivity of views and submission to ideals other than the pursuit of truth, have no place in constructive criticism and authoritative judgment of the Arts. The loss of freedom brought upon the creative artist by external negative forces, is equivalent to the loss of life and to spiritual strangulation. But let the artist be on guard against no lesser dangers caused by his inner lack of moral fortitude, which can be fatal and suicidal. A creative act—when truly creative—is always a mystery. If a creative artist is governed by motives other than the urge to create—he lowers his moral standard and loses the most precious thing of all—his creative freedom.

(continued on page 44)

Koussevitzky

(continued from page 20)

This is especially true in music. If a composer falls to the lure of predominant material interests, he clips the wings of his spiritual flight and creativity. The work of a composer cannot be weighed down and defeated by material ends. His aims and vision impell him to create an ethical, pure and elevated world—a world in which man can recover dignity, moral courage and spiritual force. Beethoven described music as "the entrance into the higher world of knowledge which comprehends mankind but which mankind cannot comprehend." We, musicians, are initiated into this higher order of knowledge; we are deeply aware of the transcendent power of music. Not by an armor of steel shall we help to restore faith to man, but by the pure, untarnished metal of our art. We shall not promise bread, work, and housing to crowds, for we are not invested with the power of the ageless great inquisitor. But we have other gifts to offer which we know to be of lasting value to man.

It is surprising and disturbing to note, how little faith is shown by present-day leaders of humanity in the creative and regenerating capacity of spiritual and cultural values. We read of millions of dollars assigned for the vast European recovery program, but all is to go for physical needs and none for the relief of the spiritual vacuum and cultural hunger of a sick mankind. Man indeed, has lost himself in the conflict with life; he is demoralized and stands on the verge of spiritual failure. The sickness of the human soul 'is revealed in many obvious ways, but more so in the hopelessness and meaninglessness of man's existence, and in the literary and philosophic trends of thought. America, the only country in our civilization spared the devastating results of the last War, was destined not only to become the custodian of cultural and artistic values, but also a leading country in the Arts, and especially in music. In Europe, however, one is not aware of it. The American "Marshall Plan" speaks primarily of the power and value of the dollar. To the morally hungry and mentally destitute of the people of Europe, America is still the dollar-making country, the country of "mass-production" and material welfare, void of cultural foundation and interest. This misconception of America, and of the plentitude of American cultural life and her artistic achievements, must be corrected. Our belief in the blessings which art brings into the world is our credo. We believe that Art helps to release man from the grip of mental misery and blank fear; we believe that Art will triumph over excessive materialism and the cold reality and obsession of war.

While writing this and thinking of my voice as solitary in a desert, I happened to read an article which was like a response to my lonely call. This article by Raymond B. Fosdick is entitled: "Not Dollars Alone—Faith is also Needed." Let me quote from it: "There is a spiritual hunger in the world today that is not being satisfied by American export. The sickness of the human soul cannot be relieved by a diet of guns and machinery." Here is a word by a humanitarian, an American of high culture, a man of true heart and mind. We welcome this word because it rings from our own hearts.

In the first year following V.E.-Day, in 1946, I spoke from this stage in Tanglewood, of the need of spiritual food to a hungry and still bleeding world, urging for the support of the Fine Arts by our Government and pointing to the importance of Art, as fortifying and completing the structure of the state. The years since have

(continued on next page)

WFL PEDAL TUNED TYMPANI AVAILABLE ON IMMEDIATE DELIVERY

"We Can Lick Your Drum Problems!"

At W.F.L. DRUM COMPANY, we're educational-minded. Good drums go with good drumming, and we have just the material you need! FREE Drum Instruction Wall Charts to hang in your practice rooms, Rudimental Drum Sheets for your students, and informative, up-to-the-minute Drum booklets and Tympani tips are yours for the asking. Just fill out the coupon below, and this wealth of free material is yours.

Our new WFL PEDAL TUNED TYMPANI combine all the best tympani features accumulated by Wm. F. Ludwig over a period of fifty years as a player and manufacturer. Three outstanding models offer a choice for every taste. W.F.L. also has one of the largest selections of concert and parade drums to be found anywhere. Ask your W.F.L. dealer to give you specifications and quotations . . . or send for our free color catalog.

WM. F. LUDWIG
President

Instruction Books

No. 1050—"Swing Drumming" by Wm. F. Ludwig Jr....$1.50
No. 1010—"Drum Solo and Ensemble Collection".......$1.00
No. 1000—"Baton Twirling Instruction Method" $1.00
No. 1070—"Drum Corps Manual" by Wm. F. Ludwig Sr....$1.00
No. 1060—"Complete Drum Instructor" by Wm. F. Ludwig Sr. $1.50

Remember Wm. F. Ludwig for the latest and finest in percussion instruments!

W. F. L. DRUM COMPANY
1728-36 N. Damen Ave. • Chicago, Illinois
World's Largest Drum and Tympani M'f'r's.

SEND FOR FREE DRUM CHARTS

WM. F. LUDWIG
W. F. L. Drum Co.
1728-36 N. Damen Ave., Chicago, Ill.
........Send me your FREE drum instruction material, and illustrated booklets.
.......Send the new W.F.L. drum catalog.
Name..
Address..
School..
City..................................State....................

strengthened our faith and singled out the significant place of the musician in our world.

The lofty mission of music of our time makes an increased demand upon the high moral standing of the musician, his integrity and complete devotion to his art. How far has the musician progressed on this ascending path? What is his actual standing in the life and society of our day? By way of an answer let us examine and question the past. In less than two centuries, the standing of the musician has undergone a remarkable evolution and counts three distinctive periods.

The first period finds the musician in the inconspicuous place of an "Entertainer," a member of the staff and at the service of some princely European court. It was not unusual, for example, to read notices asking for a valet or a steward who would also be a good accompanist. It is interesting to note that despite these circumstances the musician of that period manifested an astounding spiritual independence, a profound individuality and exceptional creative powers, for this was the epoch of such inimitable masters and geniuses as Haydn and Mozart, which partly covered the time of Beethoven.

The second period extends into the post-romantic era, when the musician finds himself wrapped in a cloak of exclusiveness and adorned with a halo of the privileged; he becomes "l'enfant gate" of his society which takes pleasure in his eccentricities, his long hair, and allows him to break accepted and conventional rules. The artist, however, was soon to realize the artifice of this position and to detect the condescending attitude of society to him. He was eager to free himself of such travesty and to claim recognition on equal grounds with society. Now we have entered a third state — a period which was pointed out to us by great artists who were also great men. It seems only yesterday that we had among us Paderewski—the musician - patriot, statesman and aristocrat of the spirit. We still have with us—though not among us—Albert Schweitzer—the musician-philosopher, scientist and humanitarian, who has set a singular example for mankind. The advent of such men announces a new era in music, an era where outer perfection brought to a definite point of attainment does not suffice, but where a new dimension is sought—the infinite fourth dimension which rests with and within us. This elevated concept asks for a new spiritual strength, for an increased concentration and penetration into the innermost strata of self.

When a student decides to become a musician, let him first take counsel with himself. Does he possess the true gift and qualifications that give him a right to step upon the stage, where thousands of eyes watch him and thousands of hearts beat in anticipation of the message he is to bring through music and his art? Will he indeed open the gates of heaven and let the people experience ecstasy for an infinitesimal moment? Or will the gates stay closed and heaven remain a promise unfulfilled? A musician should realize that the new strength of which we speak lies in the coordination and cooperation of all his faculties, both as an artist and as a human being. He should be true to himself, on as well as, off the stage. He should be clean inside and out. Goethe said: "Strive for true humanity; become yourself a man who is true to his inner nature, a man whose deed is in tune with his character." The true artist-man will not submit to circumstances or to passing whims of society; rather, he will conquer circumstances and guide society, not with self-satisfaction but with self-confidence born of a fullconsciousness and acceptance of his mission and task. As one chosen by destiny and richly endowed by nature, the artist must have a sense of obligation toward those who are denied these riches. It is for him to repay nature and to offer his gifts to humanity, in all humility of heart, as an act of gratitude for the grace bestowed upon him.

UNIFORMS Styled to "BEAT THE BAND"
Write For Free Catalogue SHOWING UNIFORMS IN COLORS
GELHAAR
ESTABLISHED 1890
COMPETETIVE PRICES
UNIFORM COMPANY
KANSAS CITY MISSOURI

★

Sunderman

(continued from page 22)

ing the same thing he is, and the cost for the trial period is greatly minimized. Class method is the sound approach for the preliminary stages. Who wants to pay five dollars per half hour lesson, particularly at the beginning stages, when the child is learning the names of the lines and spaces, and is being shown where middle C is on the instrument? The author has employed the class method of teaching young and old beginning pianists, and has had excellent results. This method makes no thesis for the idea that finished artists can result from class instruction. We do maintain that satisfying exploratory and functional musical activity can result from the group method of music study.

First Serious Musical Study. After some music study it will become patent to the parent that the child may not have an intense passion for music. At least the child allows play to interfere with his music practice. The parent may be even required to assist the child with his practice. The question is very often asked, "If I have to sit down and practice with my child, does that mean that his interest in music is not too strong, and he may not have sufficient musical ability to justify the tedious practice sessions which seem to accompany each lesson."

All people do things because of incentive. Children very often do not like to practice by themselves. They like to be partners of an enterprise. They want to excel and do so in a hurry.

Try to get your child in some playing ensemble. No one is enthused over the learning process in any activity. Golf is no fun if a person is continually dubbing the ball. Likewise, music will come easier if the child gets the "feel" every once in a while that he has achieved or has made comparatively good progress; at least in a group of players he can compare himself with

NEW HAVEN, CONN.
REGISTER
OCT 16 1948

MUSIC

Muench Excels As Conductor In Woolsey Concert

In the opinion of the writer, the next conductor of the Boston Symphony, Charles Muench, will make an admirable successor to Serge Koussevitzky. While the two men are suppesed to represent the Slavic and the Central European schools of conducting respectively, they have much in common.

The superb instrument which is the Orchestre National of France, in their Woolsey Hall concert last evening (the second in their current tour), inevitably provoked comparisons with perhaps our finest symphonic orchestra, the one which last night's conductor will lead next season.

In regard to technical matters, there is little to choose from, as both orchestras are made up of top-flight artists, though the French orchestra has a number of women players. The principal difference seems to lie in the tonal qualities of the string and brass sections of the two groups. The Boston string section has a thinner and more brilliant tone than that of the French orchestra and converesly, the French brasses have a brighter tone, due possibly to the fact that the French use turmpets of a higher pitch than our American musicians do. The string tone of the visiting group is a thing of beauty, however, and of superb quality.

Both Koussevitzky and Muench are self-made conductors. Their conductorial gestures are quite similar, and their virtues and faults are pretty much alike. Both occasionally hurry tempos for dramatic effect; both like to let the brasses go and each has an uncanny ability for obtaining tonal balances. Mr. Muench will certainly carry on the Koussevitzky traditions established in his 25 years reign of the Boston Symphony.

This reviewer was particularly interested in two works on last evening's program, and one of them provided a disappointment. This was the Ravel suite, "Le Tombeau de Couperin", by Ravel. I heard the composer conduct the Boston Symphony in this work some 20 years ago. Originally composed for the piano, the suite ends with a Toccata, which was left out last evening for some reason. It is easily the most dynamic number in the work and in its original form is a showpiece for piano still featured by many keyboard artists.

The other work referred to was the Toccata by Harvard's Walter Piston, with whom the writer had the good fortune to study with some years ago. Mr. Piston composed this work especially for this tour at the behest of Mr. Muench and admirably succeeded in his expressed de- sire to incorporate into it some the facets of French orchestr style. It was just "as French" any other work on the program.

Mr. Muench conducted the enti program without scores. The Ravel suite, which harmonic in its comp

pared

gic

CITY OVERWHELMS FRENCH ORCHESTRA

N.Y. [illegible] 10/16/48

Musicians Here on Good-Will Tour Find Variety of Things That Astonish, Please Them

Members of the Orchestre National de France were so overwhelmed by the "formidable, extraordinary" New York yesterday that they had almost nothing to say about the world of music.

Some of the ninety-six musicians, virtually all of them here for the first time, were interviewed as they clambered aboard their three special buses at the Bryant Hotel to embark on the second lap of their transcontinental good-will tour. Last night's concert by the orchestra, which arrived here with Conductor Charles Muench last Wednesday, was given in New Haven, Conn.

Henri Bronschwak, violin soloist, said he was "enchanted by the lighted bridges and Broadway at night." The subways, however, have perplexed him, for the direction signs are not as clear as those of the Paris Metro. But he admitted this was offset by the "quality of the ice cream and the whiteness of the bread."

Food turned out to be a favorite topic of discussion with the majority. Maurice Lenoble, manager of the orchestra, which belongs to the French Broadcasting System, thought the food here was good but noted that "the American palate is not the same as the French."

"Our first dinner, had turkey with sweet potatoes," he said. "Those potatoes are very strange things for a meal. And fruit cups before a meal. Imagine eating the dessert first!"

Many of the musicians spoke eagerly of the beauty of New York and praised the design of its layout. Jean Perotin, second bass soloist, described it as a "fantastic dream world." Nearly all of them had visited the Empire State Building and were "overwhelmed." They were almost equally impressed by "the beautiful little Trinity Church, surrounded by all those huge, impressive buildings."

On their trip to Bridgeport, Conn., where they played Thursday evening, their chief impression was the vast number of automobiles on the roads. "It looked as if everyone were leaving the race track at the same time," Georges Pallas, second leader of second violins, commented.

Mme. Maria Barsalou, second violinist and spokesman for the seventeen women in the group, thought women's clothes were more practical here but not as stylish as those in Paris. Henri Arque, trombonist, noted most the bigness of everything—"your city is bigger than ours, your buildings are bigger, even your men and women are bigger."

Mr. Muench said the tour was "a gesture of gratefulness from France to America." The opening concert in Bridgeport was a great success, he declared, and American audience reaction was the same as the French. "After all," he said, "all over the world all people love what is beautiful and good."

William Corcoran, one of the bus drivers, was enthusiastic about his passengers, who will give their only New York concert tomorrow night at Carnegie Hall.

"I've driven a lot of American musicians, but I'll take these people any day," he said. "You don't see any trouble or temperament among them. Especially about food. They eat whatever is arranged for them, with no complaints. Lots of American musicians aren't like that."

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 16, 1948

MUSIC

Koussevitzky Conducts Boston Premiere of Mahler's 7th Symphony

By CYRUS DURGIN

All things come in time. Now we have Serge Koussevitzky to thank for the Boston premier of the Seventh Symphony by Gustav Mahler, at Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. This second program by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was devoted to two of the six great M's of music, for there was but one other piece: "Pictures at an Exhibition" by Modeste Moussorgsky, in the orchestral version by Ravel.

It would have been something to be present at the first performance of Mahler's Seventh, in Prague in September of 1908. I can imagine that the adulence was pretty well baffled. Like most of what Mahler wrote, the Seventh is long and repetitive, and at the same time definitely a "big" work. There is a great deal of the striding, marchlike music he was so fond of, frequent horn and trumpet calls, and all available weight of strings, wind and percussion for an imposing, even grandiloquent finale.

Of the five movements — which take an hour and 20 minutes—the first is a loud and dramatic allegro with a slow introduction; the second and fourth a curious pair of nocturnes, and the fifth a fast rondo which somehow doesn't seem to have the importance a finale ought to have. The third movement I have left for last, because I fancy there is little else like it anywhere in music. Called "shadow-like," it is a cherzo with most unusual tunes, rhythms, accents and scoring. It is a movement restless, uneasy, perhaps foreboding, and really calls for the word "neurotic."

First acquaintance is a poor basis for drawing conclusions, but it seems reasonable to say that the Seventh Symphony is unconventional Mahler. Though full of the external traits: the wayward snatches of melody, the sliding harmonies, the quick changes of pace and rhythm, and above all the wonderful scoring, this is nevertheless relatively impersonal. Unlike the Second, Fifth and Ninth symphonies, and "Das Lied von der Erde," the Seventh avoids the extremes of emotional brooding and exaltation.

Probably there are only a half-dozen orchestras in the world able to play this difficult score adequately. Yesterday's performance was magnificent, with the wind players, hard-pressed practically all the way, giving freely of their glorious best. The score calls for three instruments not usually demanded at Symphony concerts: guitar, clarinet and cowbells!

It might have been better to preface the Mahler Seventh with a brief overture, and to call intermission after the first movement of the Symphony. An hour and 20 minutes of unbroken active listening is a long time, and, further, even Ravel's brilliant orchestration seemed a little less than scintillating after Mahler. The whole afternoon was one of breath-taking beauty of performance and one of the best examples you could have of Serge Koussevitzky's dazzling prowess as interpretive conductor

THEATRE AND CONCERT TODAY

"THE EMPEROR'S NEW CLOTHES"—N. E. Mutual Hall. Tributary Children's Theatre production of this famous tale. At 2:30.

BOSTON SYMPHONY—Symphony Hall. Serge Koussevitzky conducts the first performance in Boston of Mahler's Seventh Symphony. Moussorgsky's "Picture at an Exhibition" in the orchestration by Ravel completes the program. At 8:30.

"GHOSTS"—N. E. Mutual Hall. Boston's Tributary Theatre presents the Ibsen tragedy. At 8:30.

"MINNIE AND MR. WILLIAMS"—Wilbur. Richard Hughes' new play with Eddie Dowling and Josephine Hull starred. At 2:30 and 8:30.

"MACBETH"—Esquire. Orson Welles' film version of the Shakespeare tragedy. At 2:45 and 8:45.

"CHARLESTON 1822"—Majestic. New play by Dorothy Heyward presented by the Theatre Guild, with Juano Hernandez and Canada Lee among the leading players. At 2:30 and 8:30.

"THE LEADING LADY"—Copley. New comedy by Ruth Gordon, with the Wollaston-born star in the title role, and Ian Keith, John Carradine and Wesley Addy chief among the supporting players.

"HARVEY"—Colonial. Mary Coyle Chase's Pulitzer Prize-winning comedy, with Frank Fay starred. At 2:30 and 8:30.

"HAMLET"—Astor. Laurence Olivier's film version of the Shakespeare tragedy, with the famed English actor in the title role. At 12, 3:15 and 8:30.

E BOSTON HERALD, SATURDAY, OCTOBER 16, 1948

MUSIC

Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, gave the 2d concert of the 68th season in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. The program was as follows:

Symphony No. 7 .... Mahler
Pictures at an Exhibition .... Moussorgsky

By RUDOLPH ELIE

If any composer has made good in Boston in the last few years it is certainly Gustav Mahler—and he nearly 40 years in his grave.

To be sure we have heard his "Song of the Earth" and his Ninth Symphony from time to time, while various movements from the other symphonies, the Adagietto of the Fifth Symphony, for instance, are occasionally done. Yet two of his symphonies, the Second and Fourth, achieved enormous success on their performances here within the last two seasons. And yesterday the Seventh, never before played here, was received with a cordiality verging on astonishment. Where, the audience seemed to be expressing, has this music been all our lives?

It has been biding its time, like most of this composer's music, waiting for the world to catch up with it. Not that its texture is difficult in the sense that Bartok's is; the listener will find little in Mahler of the dissonant tensions or the astringent melodies of contemporary composers who are, in effect, 40 years ahead of us. What has been needed for the understanding of Mahler is the disenchanted, disillusioned, almost heart-broken point of view of the post-war world. We know now—as Mahler knew in 1908—that everything doesn't fit into neat little boxes; that things aren't all white or all black anymore; that there is no end to conflict, to pain, to spiritual and physical misery.

Yet we know—as Mahler knew—that with it exists a world of beauty, of wonderful, joyous things, even of courage and hope. Thus it is that now we can listen to music that offers within its framework everything from vulgarities to sublimities, nursery jingles to military fanfares, jangling cowbells to soaring strings, twangling mandolins to violent bursts on the timpani—and not find it in the least incongruous. On the contrary, if yesterday's audience was any criterion, nothing seemed to make more sense than this neglected work by a neglected composer.

Not all of it, perhaps, for the Seventh Symphony, like the others, is excessively protracted. Mahler, who hated long-windedness in others, was incredibly long-winded himself; this, and his lack of foresight in employing a musical apparatus that might well break any modern orchestra's budget, hasn't helped his cause, either. So, for four movements of this work (all five last well over 70 minutes), the Seventh was a joy.

The first movement was strong, virile, exciting, tumultuous; the second was an altogether delightful pastorale; the third, a nebulous scherzo with a quaint, waltz-like middle section; the fourth, an incredibly beautiful serenade. But either the last movement or the listener's capacity to listen goes all to pieces, and I strongly suspect it is the music. It just doesn't fulfill the work and I don't know why, when you get right down to it, it can't be omitted, for this is no cyclical work but a series of moods strung together.

Neither the orchestra nor Dr. Koussevitzky can be complimented too highly for the performance of this exceedingly complicated work. The orchestra has rehearsed it for two solid weeks; Dr. Koussevitzky has lived with it for months; the performance was not short of spectacular. And it was a thrill to watch Dr. Koussevitzky's leadership, to observe the consummate musicianship of his beat, his cueing, his control and, above all, his inspiration.

As if he feared for the success of the Mahler, he finished with one of his best things, Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition," with a view to bringing down the house. Which he did.

Society Opens New Season At Symphony

By ALISON ARNOLD

Boston's winter social season began offic[illegible] the 68th se[illegible] concert[illegible] Hall and [illegible] of April [illegible] will be [illegible] day afternoons [illegible] 2:30. Luncheon [illegible] served early and [illegible] hostess would think of [illegible] anything to [illegible] red-letter afternoons.

The first [illegible] always [illegible] friends after [illegible] termission [illegible] the long summer [illegible] concert was [illegible] well, since it marked the [illegible] of Dr. Serge Ko[illegible] son as conductor. [illegible] program was Vivaldi's [illegible] D minor, which he [illegible] at his first concert with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall 24 years ago, and Brahms' Variations on a Theme [illegible] Haydn which also w[illegible] Boston concert.

Yesterday's [illegible] Honegger's Symphony for Strings which was modern enough to make many in the audience cringe a bit. But Beethoven's Seventh Symphony more than compensated them, for Boston audiences prefer the traditional in music, and no concert is considered entirely satisfactory unless it contains some Beethoven or Brahms.

The huge hall was filled in spite of the drizzle; the weather never keeps Symphony-goers at home. Some arrived on crutches, as definite proof that nothing short of serious illness would prevent their attendance. All ages were represented, including snow-haired dowagers, young ma[illegible], debutantes and small boys and [illegible] spellbound at the size of the hall.

Mrs. Robert Treat Paine, as chic as ever, sat in her usual first-balcony seat, a much coveted situation for Symphony concerts. Mrs. William Dana Orcutt took time off from preparing her Mornings of Diversion programs to attend, and stopped to chat with Miss Ann Sacker during the intermission.

Shades of gray were popular. Mrs. Alvan T. Fuller wore a gray tailored suit, and Mrs. Edward A. Taft and Mrs. Alfred R. McIntyre also chose gray. Mrs. Bayard Warren wore beige tweeds; and also in beige was Mrs. John F. Yerxa. Mr. and Mrs. Benjamin O. Gardner attended together; and among others were Mrs. Louis Curtis, Jr., Mr. and Mrs. Eben Draper, Mrs. Isabella Grandin, Mrs. Charles Gaston Smith and Mrs. Frank H. Stewart.

Still others were: Mrs. F. W[illegible]worth Bush, M[illegible] Robert H. [illegible], Mrs. A[illegible] W. Bell, Mrs. A[illegible] N. Ra[illegible] Mrs. Frank A. B[illegible], M[illegible] Henry Endicott, Mrs. William Dexter, Mr. Robert H. Hopkins, Mrs. F. Delano Putnam, Mrs. John T. Bottomley, Mr. Maxim Karolik, Mrs. Abbott Hastings, Mrs. Will[illegible] Beal, Mrs. Robert Muller, Miss Sabra Harwood, Miss Mary Lothrop, Mrs. Frederick Ayer, Mr. W[illegible] G[illegible]rich, Mrs. John B. A[illegible] M[illegible] George H. Swift, Mrs. Henry F. Livermore and her daughter, Miss Joanne Livermore, Mrs. F[illegible] Bradley, M[illegible] Charles G. M[illegible] Jr., Mrs. Edward B. Sinnott, Mrs. Edwin J. Cohn and her daughter, Miss Sally Higginson, Mrs. Douglas Crocker and her daughter, Miss Constance Crocker, Mrs. Charles H. W. Mandeville, and Mrs. Alfred Donovan and her [illegible] Catherine M[illegible]

[173]

Opens eason
phony

N ARNOLD
ter social season yesterday. For on of symphony d at Symphony now until the end
roper Bostonians usual seats Fris, promptly at on on Fridays is d tea late, and no
think of planning terfere with these rnoons.
cert of the season
a homecoming, as eet during the in-he first time after
er. But yesterday's he nature of a fare-rked the beginning ssevitzky's last sea-or. Included in the Vivaldi's concerto in he also conducted ert with the Boston
estra, in Symphony
o, and Brahms' Va-
Theme by Haydn,
a part of his first rogram also included mphony for Strings, ern enough to make

dience cringe a bit.
Seventh Symphony
pensated them, for s prefer the tradiand no concert is ely satisfactory un-some Beethoven or was filled in spite the weather never ny-goers at home.

on crutches, as at nothing short of would prevent their ages were repre-
g snow-haired dowarrieds, debutantes, and girls spellbound
e hall.
Treat Paine, as chic her usual first-balch coveted situation concerts. Mrs. Wil-cutt took time off her Mornings of ams to attend, and at with Miss Amy
the intermission.
y were popular. Mrs.
wore a gray tailored Edward A. Taft and McIntyre also chose yard Warren wore nd also in beige, was erka. Mr. and Mrs.
Gardiner attended among others, were
is, Jr., Mr. and Mrs.
Mrs. Isabella Granrles Gaston Smith,
k H. Stewart.
vere: Mrs. F Wads-
rs. Eliot Guild, Mrs. venson, Mrs. Arthur
ugustus N Rantoul,
Bourne, Mrs. Henry
William Dexter, Mrs
kins, Mrs. F. Delano
John T Bottomley, arolik, Mrs Abbott
Willis Beal, Mrs.
Miss Sabra Har-
ary Lothrop, Mrs.
Mr. Wallace Good-
mes B. Ayer, Mrs.
ift, Mrs. Homer, F.
her daughter, Miss more, Mrs Ralph
Charles G. Mixter, rd B Simmons, Mrs
and her daughter, gimson, Mrs Douglas her daughter, Miss
er, Mrs. Charles H. and Mrs. Alfred er young daughter.

MONTREAL, CANADA
GAZETTE

OCT [illegible]

[illegible] CORDIALE: Charles Muench, called France's greatest [illegible] Boston affairs with Serge Koussevitzky, whom [illegible] season as permanent conductor of the Boston [illegible]. This season Muench has brought the Orches- [illegible] France to this continent for an extended tour of [illegible] American cities. The celebrated orchestra, which [illegible] sponsorship of the French Government, [illegible] Notre Dame Church on Thursday by the

---

WHEELING, W. VA.
NEWS-REGISTER

14 [illegible]

Boston's New Symphony Director Arrives From Paris

—Acme Telephoto

Charles Muench, French conductor who is replacing Serge Koussevitsky as director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is greeted by French-American Boy Scouts of Troop 320, New York City, on his arrival in New York yesterday on board the SS Nieuw Amsterdam.

Burgin Conducts the Symphony Concerts Friday and Saturday

Richard Burgin, concertmaster and associate conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will direct the concerts of next Friday at 2:30 and Saturday at 8:30 in Symphony Hall. The program: Brahms: Third Symphony; Poulenc: Concerto for Organ, Strings and Tympani (first time at these concerts); Hindemith: Metamorphosis of Themes by Weber.

Mr. Burgin will also conduct the first concert of the Cambridge series, Tuesday, at 8:30 in Sanders Theatre. He will present Brahms' Third Symphony; the adagio from Bruckner's String Quintet, played by the massed strings, for the first time at these concerts, and the suite from Rimsky-Korsakoff's opera "The Fairy Tale of Tsar Saltan."

Serge Koussevitzky will open the Sunday afternoon series this afternoon at 3 in Symphony Hall. His program will consist of the D minor Concerto by Vivaldi; Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition," orchestrated by Ravel, and Beethoven's Seventh Symphony.

MUSIC

Dr. Koussevitzky in His Final Season

By WARREN STOREY SMITH

Among those who will hear Serge Koussevitzky begin on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening of this week his 25th and final season as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra there will be some, perhaps many, who were present on the corresponding occasions 24 years ago. Again, most of those who filled Symphony Hall at those two historic concerts were getting their first glimpse of the handsome Russian, just turned to 50, who in no time at all had been able to elicit from the familiar orchestra a quite unfamiliar brilliance and sensuous beauty of tone.

Recalls First Meeting

For this particular member of the Friday afternoon congregation it was by no means a first glimpse of Koussevitzky. The preceding encounter, though one of the earlier events in his newspaper career, remains the most picturesque of them all. Informed that the conductor would remain in New York for a few days after his arrival from Europe, the enterprising Post decided to scoop its rivals and despatch its new music critic to the Big City. Furthermore, in order that the interviewer might find his subject in a state of repose, and hence completely communicative, he was instructed to accompany the immigration and health officers to quarantine and board the Aquitania there. Actually, Koussevitzky came to Boston that very day and was met by representatives of the other papers. But I am sure the Post no more regretted the New York junket than I did.

In the little group on the great Cunarder's deck, as she sailed up New York Harbor that morning, were Mme. Koussevitzky who, in contrast to her husband, spoke English, and the conductor's secretary, Dr. Zederbaum, who acted as interpreter. Koussevitzky talked of many things, including, of course, his Boston plans. He was confident of his success with the Boston public and press, but New York plainly had him worried. As it turned out, his triumph there was destined to be as complete as it was in Boston, but it was not the same "Veni, vidi, vici" business that it was in what was to be the city of his adoption. Told that a certain European conductor, much in evidence in New York, was not much liked there, Koussevitzky replied that New York showed good taste!

In response to a direct inquiry regarding the availability of the New England Conservatory as a feeder for the Orchestra, Koussevitzky was assured that it had already functioned as such. However, it was some time before he made full use of that resource, preferring to get most of his replacements from Europe.

Koussevitzky's art has broadened and deepened considerably in these 24 years, though the range of his musical interest and sympathies has narrowed. This is shown in his combined desire and inability to reproduce this week his initial program. Keeping their place, as already noted here, are Vivaldi's D minor Concerto and Brahms' Variations on a Theme of Haydn. The "Roman Carnival" Overture of Berlioz has been scrapped. Since Honneger's symphonic locomotive, "Pacific 231," no longer rides the orchestral rails, it will be replaced by that composer's String Symphony. Most significant of all is the substitution of Beethoven's Seventh Symphony for Scriabin's "Poem of Ecstasy." With the Russian mystic Koussevizky has blown hot, cold and hot again. He is now definitely out.

Other Concerts

In other concerts, this coming season will be one of reminiscence. Promised revivals are of Ravel's Piano Concerto (Sanroma), the Rachmanioff Third (Horowitz), the Second Violin Concerto of Prokofieff (Heifetz), the B minor Mass of Bach, the "Faust" Symphony of Liszt, the Orchestral Concerto of Bartok, the Fifth Symphony of Prokofieff, the Seventh of Shostakovitch (Bernstein) and works by sundry Americans.

Stravinsky Will Conduct

On the basis of advance but incomplete information from Symphony Hall, it was stated here that Stravinsky would not conduct when his son, Soulima, appeared as pianist in his father's Capriccio. That was a mistake. Stravinsky will conduct, introducing a Suite from his ballet, "Orpheus." To be revived are his "Ode" and "Song of the Nightingale." Other novelties not yet announced here are symphonies by Britten, Messiaen and Sowerby, a Toccata by Irving Fine, new pieces by Fernandez and Villa-Lobos (Carvalho) and a Symphonie Concertante by the Swiss Frank Martin (Ansermet). A new name among the soloists is that of the young and gifted French pianist, Nicole Henriot.

Introduce Seventh of Mahler

At the concerts of next week Koussevitzky will introduce to Boston the Seventh Symphony of Mahler. In November Mr. Mitropoulos will give New York its first complete hearing of that problematical work in 25 years. The two so-called Intermezzi have been since performed there under Klemperer. Like the Fifth and the Sixth (given its American premiere in New York last season by Mitropoulos), the Seventh is purely orchestral. As a rooter for Mahler these many years, I cannot help being secretly pleased at the way in which his music is now coming into favor. No longer do I feel that mine is a voice crying in the wilderness,

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE

OCT 17 1948

VISITORS FROM FRANCE

By FRANCIS D. PERKINS

THE Orchestre National, which arrived from France last Wednesday and has already played under Charles Munch's direction in Bridgeport and New Haven, will give the only New York concert scheduled for this tour tonight in Carnegie Hall, for the benefit of the activities maintained by America Aid to France, Inc. This concert, which is under the patronage of the French Ambassador, Henri Bonnet, will be the first to be given here by a European orchestra in nearly twenty-eight years — since January, 1921, when the orchestra of the Teatro alla Scala in Milan departed after a short and triumphant tour under Arturo Toscanini's leadership.

Tonight's concert might also be regarded as marking the thirtieth anniversary of the opening of the last American tour by a noted French orchestra—that of the Societe des Concerts du Conservatoire, which gave its first program in this country at the Metropolitan Opera House on Oct. 15, 1918, under Andre Messager's conductorship. The program was devoted to French music: Berlioz's overture to "Benvenuto Cellini"; the Franck symphony, Saint-Saens's "Le Rouet d'Omphale," Dukas's "L'Apprenti Sorcier," Debussy's "Nuages" and "Fetes" and Lalo's "Norwegian Rhapsody." In a second concert, Oct. 20, Alfred Cortot was the soloist in Saint-Saens's piano concerto in C minor.

The program which Mr. Munch will conduct this evening is, naturally, primarily devoted to French music but will also introduce an American work, a toccata composed for this tour by Walter Piston at the conductor's request. The French list includes two familiar works, Lalo's overture to "Le Roi d'Ys" and Ravel's "Le Tombeau de Couperin"; Arthur Honegger's third, or "Liturgical Symphony," which Mr. Munch introduced to us in a Philharmonic-Symphony concert on Jan. 23, 1947, and the second suite from Albert Roussel's "Bacchus et Ariane," which also figured in one of Mr. Munch's Philharmonic programs two winters ago.

History of the Orchestra

The conductor, who becomes the artistic head of the ~~Boston~~ Symphony Orchestra next season, needs no verbal introduction, but a few lines about the history of the Orchestre National and its present status as the principal artistic organ of the French National Radio System may be pertinent. On the latter point, the writer is greatly indebted to Henri Barraud, one of France's prominent younger composers, who is director of music for the French National Radio and artistic director for its Network No. 1, or national program—which, he said, might be considered as a counterpart of both the British Broadcasting Corporation's regular Home Service and of its cultural Third Program—but inclining more toward the latter. He is taking part in the management of the orchestra during this tour.

The Orchestre National was founded in 1934 as the official symphonic group of the French Broadcasting System and soon became known as one of the foremost of France's symphonic organizations; Arturo Toscanini chose it for his Paris concerts in 1935. With the onset of World War II, which halted a projected European tour, it gave many public concerts in addition to its radio programs. When the war halted the tour, the orchestra continued its broadcasts from the National Radio's temporary headquarters in Rennes until France's temporary defeat in June, 1940. At that time the orchestra became scattered—some of the musicians were military prisoners; some were under the close surveillance of the occupying authorities; some were at home striving to protect their families. But the directors of the National Radio and the musicians who had been able to make their way to unoccupied France began the task of reorganization. The orchestra resumed its broadcasts at Marseilles in September, 1941, and returned to Paris early in 1943.

After the liberation, with headquarters at the Theatre des Champs Elysees, the orchestra began a series of broadcasts aimed towards the reestablishment of musical contacts, both at home and between France and the other Allied nations. During the postwar years it has made several tours abroad, including a week's series in London last year.

Its Home Activities

At present the French official radio system maintains three orchestras in Paris, the Orchestre National, the Orchestre Radio Symphonique and the Orchestre Lyrique, as well as six orchestras, each with between fifty and sixty members, in Lille, Strasbourg, Lyons, Marseilles, Toulouse and Nice. The total number of musicians employed by the system is approximately 800.

Of the three official radio orchestras in Paris, the Orchestre National is the largest and, as its title suggests, the most important; it has more than 100 members, of whom 96 are making the American tour. The Orchestre Lyrique devotes its programs mainly to operatic music and concert music of a lighter character.

At the Theatre des Champs Elysees the Orchestre National gives concerts every Thursday and on alternate Mondays; there are thirty services, including rehearsals, each month, which means that the number of rehearsals for each program varies between three and five. No tickets are sold for the regular concerts, but many concerts, like those of the N B C Symphony here, are given for nonpaying audiences. At present there is no permanent chief conductor; a plurality of the concerts are under the direction of Roger Desormieres, who is in charge of much of the modern music offered; others, especially those in which Debussy's music is featured, are conducted by D. E. Inghelbrecht.

The list of leaders also includes a young French conductor, Ernest Bout, and a Polish conductor, Paul Klecki. Many foreign musicians have appeared with the orchestra, including several Americans, as conductors and as soloists. Contemporary American music has been liberally represented in the Orchestre National's programs, which aim to keep abreast of contemporary musical developments both in France and elsewhere.

Touring in Buses

During its American tour, which is sponsored by the French government, the orchestra will travel in three chartered buses, while a tractor trailer at the head of the caravan will carry the instruments. The musicians, it is announced, chose this method of transportation as the best means of seeing the country. While only one concert has been scheduled for New York, it is much to be hoped that an opportunity can be found for a second performance before the orchestra departs early in December, with a program providing a chance for better acquaintance with the works of the latest generation of French composers. What can be done in one program, of course, is limited, and tonight's French list is well diversified.

Distance and expense, of course, make trans-Atlantic tours infrequent events, either by European orchestras here or by American orchestras in Europe—the last was by the Philharmonic-Symphony under Mr. Toscanini in 1930. But, in either case, such tours are valuable and desirable, from the standpoint of international cultural understanding as well as from that of musical gratification, and the present tour of the Orchestre National is a memorable event deserving the warmest of welcomes.

THE NEW YORK TIMES, SUNDAY, OCTOBER 17,

CONDUCTORS WHO RETURN TO NEW

Charles Munch, who will lead the visiting Orchestre National of France at Carnegie Hall tonight. It is the first visit to this country by this Parisian ensemble.

BRIDGEPORT, CONN.
HERALD

OCT 17 1948

SAD MUSIC REVIEW

French Let Down In Premiere Here

Meager Audience at Klein Thrilled By Muench and Orchestre National

By NANCY HENDRICK

Probably it isn't fair to compare this week's performance of the Orchestre National of France with those of the Connecticut Symphony, but there's something wrong somewhere when a second-rate aggregation playing mostly schmalz can pack 'em into the Klein Memorial and a first-class orchestra, playing a program of exciting music, draws an audience of less than half the hall.

This was the Orchestre National's first experience with an American audience and it must have been disheartening.

Fresh off the boat they arrived in the U. S. earlier in the week and this was their first concert in America members of the group and their leader, the renowned Charles Muench, must have been astounded at their reception in the New World.

NO LOVE FOR IT HERE?

Those who heard the orchestra were enthusiastic to the point of "Bravos!" but the number was so few that members of the audience felt like apologizing instead of applauding.

The occasion might have been a means of promoting international good will even if the orchestra were not top flight.

But an ensemble of the stature of this group deserves the patronage of music-lovers over and above the question of national hospitality.

But perhaps Bridgeporters aren't music-lovers.

This might explain the size of the Connecticut Symphony audiences.

In an almost totally unfamiliar program which included Honegger and Piston, the French orchestra made such music as hasn't been heard on the banks of the Pequonnock in many a weary year.

Any part of the Honegger "Symphonie Liturgique" might be used on "Stop the Music" as a mystery melody—and they could give away the Connecticut Symphony fiddle by fiddle as booby prizes.

MUENCH TO BOSTON

But even this diet over-spiced with modernity was manna for those who have been forced to eat Pablum.

A real music critic might be able to do justice to the orchestral coloration, the nuances, the quivering sensitivity, the delicacy and the dash of the Orchestre National, under Charles Muench's baton.

This pinch-hitter can only say that unlike the Connecticut Symphony which under Saidenburg is neither loud nor good, the French musicians are both loud and good and soft and good.

They play the fast parts fast and the slow parts slow and the solo voices sound like concert artists.

And they never, never play a clinker.

As for Charles Muench, isn't it enough to say that the Boston Symphony has hired him as successor to Dr. Serge Koussevitzky?

As the song says, Boston, "You don't know how lucky you are."

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE
OCT 17 1948

VISITORS FROM FRANCE

By FRANCIS D. PERKINS

THE Orchestre National, which arrived from France last Wednesday and has already played under Charles Munch's direction in Bridgeport and New Haven, will give the only New York concert scheduled for this tour tonight in Carnegie Hall, for the benefit of the activities maintained by Ameri^a Aid to France, Inc. This concert, which is under the patronage of the French Ambassador, Henri Bonnet, will be the first to be given here by a European orchestra in nearly twenty-eight years — since January, 1921, when the orchestra of the Teatro alla Scala in Milan departed after a short and triumphant tour under Arturo Toscanini's leadership.

Tonight's concert might also be regarded as marking the thirtieth anniversary of the opening of the last American tour by a noted French orchestra—that of the Societe des Concerts du Conservatoire, which gave its first program in this country at the Metropolitan Opera House on Oct. 15, 1918, under Andre Messager's conductorship. The program was devoted to French music: Berlioz's overture to "Benvenuto Cellini"; the Franck symphony, Saint-Saens's "Le Rouet d'Omphale," Dukas's "L'Apprenti Sorcier," Debussy's "Nuages" and "Fetes" and Lalo's "Norwegian Rhapsody." In a second concert, Oct. 20, Alfred Cortot was the soloist in Saint-Saens's piano concerto in C minor.

The program which Mr. Munch will conduct this evening is, naturally, primarily devoted to French music but will also introduce an American work, a toccata composed for this tour by Walter Piston at the conductor's request. The French list includes two familiar works, Lalo's overture to "Le Roi d'Ys" and Ravel's "Le Tombeau de Couperin"; Arthur Honegger's third, or "Liturgical Symphony," which Mr. Munch introduced to us in a Philharmonic-Symphony concert on Jan. 23, 1947, and the second suite from Albert Roussel's "Bacchus et Ariane," which also figured in one of Mr. Munch's Philharmonic programs two winters ago.

History of the Orchestra

The conductor, who becomes the artistic head of the Boston Symphony Orchestra next season, needs no verbal introduction, but a few lines about the history of the Orchestre National and its present status as the principal artistic organ of the French National Radio System may be pertinent. On the latter point, the writer is greatly indebted to Henri Barraud, one of France's prominent younger composers, who is director of music for the French National Radio and artistic director for its Network No. 1, or national program—which, he said, might be considered as a counterpart of both the British Broadcasting Corporation's regular Home Service and of its cultural Third Program—but inclining more toward the latter. He is taking part in the management of the orchestra during this tour.

The Orchestre National was founded in 1934 as the official symphonic group of the French Broadcasting System and soon became known as one of the foremost of France's symphonic organizations; Arturo Toscanini chose it for his Paris concerts in 1935. With the onset of World War II, which halted a projected European tour, it gave many public concerts in addition to its radio programs. When the war halted the tour, the orchestra continued its broadcasts from the National Radio's temporary headquarters in Rennes until France's temporary defeat in June, 1940. At that time the orchestra became scattered—some of the musicians were military prisoners; some were under the close surveillance of the occupying authorities; some were at home striving to protect their families. But the directors of the National Radio and the musicians who had been able to make their way to unoccupied France began the task of reorganization. The orchestra resumed its broadcasts at Marseilles in September, 1941, and returned to Paris early in 1943.

After the liberation, with headquarters at the Theatre des Champs Elysees, the orchestra began a series of broadcasts aimed towards the reestablishment of musical contacts, both at home and between France and the other Allied nations. During the postwar years it has made several tours abroad, including a week's series in London last year.

Its Home Activities

At present the French official radio system maintains three orchestras in Paris, the Orchestre National, the Orchestre Radio Symphonique and the Orchestre Lyrique, as well as six orchestras, each with between fifty and sixty members, in Lille, Strasbourg, Lyons, Marseilles, Toulouse and Nice. The total number of musicians employed by the system is approximately 800.

Of the three official radio orchestras in Paris, the Orchestre National is the largest and, as its title suggests, the most important; it has more than 100 members, of whom 96 are making the American tour. The Orchestre Lyrique devotes its programs mainly to operatic music and concert music of a lighter character.

At the Theatre des Champs Elysees the Orchestre National gives concerts every Thursday and on alternate Mondays; there are thirty services, including rehearsals, each month, which means that the number of rehearsals for each program varies between three and five. No tickets are sold for the regular concerts, but many concerts, like those of the N B C Symphony here, are given for nonpaying audiences. At present there is no permanent chief conductor; a plurality of the concerts are under the direction of Roger Desormieres, who is in charge of much of the modern music offered; others, especially those in which Debussy's music is featured, are conducted by D. E. Inghelbrecht.

The list of leaders also includes a young French conductor, Ernest Bout, and a Polish conductor, Paul Klecki. Many foreign musicians have appeared with the orchestra, including several Americans, as conductors and as soloists. Contemporary American music has been liberally represented in the Orchestre National's programs, which aim to keep abreast of contemporary musical developments both in France and elsewhere.

Touring in Buses

During its American tour, which is sponsored by the French government, the orchestra will travel in three chartered buses, while a tractor trailer at the head of the caravan will carry the instruments. The musicians, it is announced, chose this method of transportation as the best means of seeing the country. While only one concert has been scheduled for New York, it is much to be hoped that an opportunity can be found for a second performance before the orchestra departs early in December, with a program providing a chance for better acquaintance with the works of the latest generation of French composers. What can be done in one program, of course, is limited, and tonight's French list is well diversified.

Distance and expense, of course, make trans-Atlantic tours infrequent events, either by European orchestras here or by American orchestras in Europe—the last was by the Philharmonic-Symphony under Mr. Toscanini in 1930. But, in either case, such tours are valuable and desirable, from the standpoint of international cultural understanding as well as from that of musical gratification, and the present tour of the Orchestre National is a memorable event deserving the warmest of welcomes.

THE NEW YORK TIMES, SUNDAY, OCTOBER 17

CONDUCTORS WHO RETURN TO NEW

Charles Munch, who will lead the visiting Orchestre National of France at Carnegie Hall tonight. It is the first visit to this country by this Parisian ensemble.

BRIDGEPORT, CONN.
HERALD
OCT 17 1948

SAD MUSIC REVIEW

French Let Down In Premiere Here

Meager Audience at Klein Thrilled By Muench and Orchestre National

By NANCY HENDRICK

Probably it isn't fair to compare this week's performance of the Orchestre National of France with those of the Connecticut Symphony, but there's something wrong somewhere when a second-rate aggregation playing mostly schmalz can pack 'em into the Klein Memorial and a first-class orchestra, playing a program of exciting music, draws an audience of less than half the hall.

This was the Orchestre National's first experience with an American audience and it must have been disheartening.

Fresh off the boat—they arrived in the U. S. earlier in the week and this was their first concert in America—members of the group and their leader, the renowned Charles Muench, must have been astounded at their reception in the New World.

NO LOVE FOR IT HERE?

Those who heard the orchestra were enthusiastic to the point of "Bravos!" but the number was so few that members of the audience felt like apologizing instead of applauding.

The occasion might have been a means of promoting international good will even if the orchestra were not top flight.

But an ensemble of the stature of this group deserves the patronage of music-lovers over and above the question of national hospitality.

But perhaps Bridgeporters aren't music-lovers.

This might explain the size of the Connecticut Symphony audiences.

In an almost totally unfamiliar program which included Honegger and Piston, the French orchestra made such music as hasn't been heard on the banks of the Pequonnock in many a weary year.

Any part of the Honegger "Symphonie Liturgique" might be used on "Stop the Music" as a mystery melody—and they could give away the Connecticut Symphony fiddle by fiddle as booby prizes.

MUENCH TO BOSTON

But even this diet over-spiced with modernity was manna for those who have been forced to eat Pablum.

A real music critic might be able to do justice to the orchestral coloration, the nuances, the quivering sensitivity, the delicacy and the dash of the Orchestre National, under Charles Muench's baton.

This pinch-hitter can only say that unlike the Connecticut Symphony which under Saidenburg is neither loud nor good, the French musicians are both loud and good and soft and good.

They play the fast parts fast and the slow parts slow and the solo voices sound like concert artists.

And they never, never play a clinker.

As for Charles Muench, isn't it enough to say that the Boston Symphony has hired him as successor to Dr. Serge Koussevitzky?

As the song says, Boston, "You don't know how lucky you are."

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

1948

Two Orchestras to Play Here This Week

French Group and Boston Symphony to Fill Dates

THE Providence Community concert Association and the Boston Symphony Orchestra will ~~launch their seasons~~ here this week. The association will present the Orchestre National of France, with Charles Munch conducting, tomorrow night in the Metropolitan Theater. The Bostonians will play at the Met Tuesday night under the baton of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky.

A lecture-recital, "Music for Films," will be given by Prof. Fred Sternfeld of the Dartmouth College music department in Faunce House Theater this afternoon at 4 o'clock. The lecture, sponsored by the Brown University music department and the Faunce House board of governors, is open to the public.

Elaine Golde will be presented by Miss Beatrice Ward in a pianoforte recital in Studio 15, at 385 Westminster Street, this afternoon at 3 o'clock. On Wednesday night at 8:30 o'clock Christopher Lynch, tenor, will be presented by the Veridames of Providence College in a recital in Hope High School Auditorium.

Symphony Program Change

Instead of the originally announced Seventh Symphony by Mahler and Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition," Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will conduct here Tuesday night the program with which he opened his 25th anniversary season with the Boston Symphony in Boston. The change was made after the conductor discovered that because of its great length the Mahler symphony would have brought the Providence concert to a close too late for the orchestra to catch its usual train back to Boston.

The program which will be heard here follows in general outline the one which Koussevitzky conducted at his initial concert in this country and is thus strongly marked by historical associations. It includes works by Vivaldi, Brahms, Honegger and Beethoven.

The Orchestre National, leading radio and concert orchestra of France will appear here tomorrow night for the first time outside New York where it made its American debut yesterday. Charles Munch will conduct an entirely French program with the exception of a Toccata by Walter Piston, the American composer. Programs for the week:

DR. SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY (center) poses with Eleazar de Calvalho (left) and Leonard Bernstein, both coming here as guest conductors with the Boston Symphony this season.

Oct 19 Globe

Koussevitzky Reviving Music He Introduced Here Over 24 Years

In preparation for his 25th and final season in America as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky will return to Boston at the end of this month. The season will begin in Symphony Hall on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Oct. 8 and 9, with a program recalling this conductor's American debut in 1924, and including Vivaldi's Concerto in D Minor, Brahms' Variations on a Theme of Haydn, Honegger's Symphony for Strings, and Beethoven's Seventh Symphony.

Dr. Koussevitzky has been spending his time at his Summer home in Lenox in laying out plans for his final season. His programs will revive a number of works which he introduced to these concerts in the course of 24 years. These will include: Bach's Mass in B Minor, Bela Bartok's Concerto for Orchestra, Prokofieff's Fifth Symphony, Liszt's "Faust" Symphony, Stravinsky's "Ode" and "Song of the Nightingale," and the Seventh Symphony by Shostakovich. Vladimir Horowitz, who made his Boston debut in 1928 playing the Third Piano Concerto by Rachmaninoff, will repeat that work, and Jascha Heifetz will repeat Prokofieff's Second Violin Concerto which he played here in 1937.

Twenty-four years ago Dr. Kousevizky had little acquaintance with the symphonic music of American composers, of which there was far less than now. In the course of those years he has encouraged the artistic development of a number of them, singling out and introducing music of importance. Works by the following composers will be revived: Copland, Piston, Schuman, Barber, Harris and Cowell. New Music by Irving Fine, Leo Sowerby, and Howard Hanson will be introduced. Some outstanding music by European and South American composers will be introduced in the course of the season and these will shortly be announced.

The season, which will be the 68th by this orchestra, will include the two longer series of 24 Friday afternoon and 24 Saturday evening concerts and the shorter series of nine Tuesday evenings and six Sunday afternoons in Symphony Hall. Subscription tickets are still to be had for the two afternoon series only.

The guest conductors will be Igor Stravinsky, Ernest Ansermet, Leonard Bernstein, Eleazar de Carvalho, and Thor Johnson. The soloists will include: Rudolf Firkusny, Nicole Henriot, Myra Hess, Vladimir Horowitz, Soulima Stravinsky, Jascha Heifetz, and Gregor Piatigorsky.

MUENCH, NEW SYMPHONY LEADER, TO ACCENT U. S. COMPOSERS

To Direct French Group Tomorrow

CHARLES MUENCH

"Le Beau Charles" Muench, Alsatian-born conductor who was selected to shape a new era in Boston's musical history when he takes up the baton of the Boston Symphony Orchestra next fall, stopped briefly here yesterday, bringing with him a French orchestra and a decidedly A9merican slant on things musical.

The visit of the silvering tower of a man, whose every movement is a tribute to Old World grace, came as a prelude to his appearance tomorrow evening at Symphony Hall to lead the Orchestra National of France in the first Boston concert of a French orchestra since 1918.

Although a guest conductor here last spring just before the announcement he would succeed Dr. Serge Koussevitsky who recently started his silver jubilee season in Boston, Muench's appearance at the concert tomorrow will give music lovers their first chance to see and hear their new maestro in action since his appointment.

He declared in an interview at the Hotel Lenox before leaving for a concert last night in Providence that both with the French orchestra and the Boston Symphony when he assumes its directorship he would give a great deal of time to American composers.

"I have a great deal of admiration for your young composers," he said with a strong French accent in one of the few statements he made without relying on an interpreter.

In tangible demonstration of this admiration of American creative ability, he announced, that he had included in the program for tomorrow night the "Toccata" by Walter Piston of Cambridge, Harvard professor of music, whose compositions caught Muench's attention last spring.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

OCT 19 1948

MUSIC

Orchestre National, With Muench Conducting, Pleases at Met

By RUTH TRIPP

Providence was honored last evening by a visit from the Orchestre National of France, Charles Muench conducting. The concert, at Metropolitan Theater, was the first of the Providence Community Concert Association series and the second of a "Good Will Tour" of the United States and Canada which this eminent orchestra began in New York on Sunday evening.

Muench appeared here last season on two occasions as guest conductor of the ~~Boston Symphony~~ Orchestra. His conducting last evening reinforced the substantial record he established then, for vigorous and colorful interpretations. It did not take the audience very long last evening to appraise the magnificent ensemble which Muench conducted. Their applause was spontaneous and hearty.

The program:

I.	Le corsaire—ouverture	Hector Berlioz
II	Iberia	Claude Debussy
III.	Bacchus et Ariane	Albert Roussel
	Intermission
IV.	Toccata	Walter Piston
	Written especially for Charles Muench and played for the first time anywhere in the world on this Good Will Tour of the Orchestre National.
V.	Le Tombeau de Couperin	Maurice Ravel
VI.	Daphnis et Chloe 2 e suite d'orchestre	Maurice Ravel

The interesting program was, with one exception, entirely by French composers. It began with the Berlioz Overture to "Le Corsair", a rousing piece which showed to advantage the full tone of the brass section and the clean cut quality of the string choirs.

The familiar Debussy Suite "Iberia" was picturesque, and rather like an attractive railway poster. The second part, "Les Parfums de la Nuit" had a luxurious delicacy and as it led into the section descriptive of the "Fete", the mood changed with extraordinary subtlety.

Roussel's music is not played enough in this country to give one a feeling of assurance in commenting on its exotic qualities. Sometimes its texture is thick and heavy and then again it is thin and angular. It takes a group of French musicians to extract as much exciting music as we heard last evening from the "Bacchus et Ariane" score. The fragmentary themes were fascinating and his use of solo instruments, very interesting. A powerful climax closed the work.

A first hearing anywhere was given the "Toccata" by the American composer, Walter Piston. To be more exact, we heard the second performance in these United States to this interesting composition which was written by the Boston musician especially for this tour. It is a fine example of the excellent writing for orchestra which Mr. Piston produces A vigorous statement of themes was followed by swift moving contra puntal figures. With great clarity, single lined melodic figures by the strings were contrasted with reed and brass themes in four parts. The middle portion presented an unusually beautiful melody. The orchestra gave a convincing performance of this work and it took its place beside the French compositions with dignity and worth.

The Ravel numbers were most gratifying. They are familiar here and it was utterly delightful to hear the musicians step daintily through the discreet and well-mannered dissonances of "Le Tombeau de Couperin". The "Daphnis and Chlo" Suite, (the second) was displayed with marvelous orchestral color. The orchestra gave us a memorable performance and they brought anew to their Rhode Island audience, a sense of appreciation for the contribution of French artistry in the world of music.

24 Oct 19 Trib

MUSIC

By VIRGIL THOMSON

ORCHESTRE NATIONAL, Charles Munch, conductor, Sunday night in Carnegie Hall. The program:

"Le Corsaire" (overture)	Hector Berlioz
Symphonie Liturgique	Arthur Honegger
Toccata (first New York performance),	Walter Piston
Le Tombeau de Couperin	Maurice Ravel
Second Suite from "Bacchus et Ariane,"	Albert Roussel

French Loveliness

FEW musical delights are so deeply satisfying, both sensuously and intellectually, as a good French orchestra, in form, playing French music under a good French conductor; and the Orchestre National, playing Sunday night in Carnegie Hall under Charles Munch, offered exactly that. From beginning to end the concert was both electrifying and delicious. For any who might have had doubts about the ability of this, or of any other European orchestra, to bear comparison with our million-dollar-a-year groups, such hesitations were relieved after the opening overture (Berlioz's "Corsaire") and not at any time again brought to mind.

* * *

In certain ways, this orchestra, playing at its best, does better work than we are accustomed to hear. The clean unanimity of its string playing, the exactitude of its string and woodwind balances, the shading and stability of its percussion section and, of course, the matchless phrasings and other tonal refinements of the French woodwind soloists are standards of comparison that our orchestras, preoccupied in many cases by the grosser appeals of emphasis and warmth, do not always try to meet. On the question of brass, America follows the German taste for heavy round sounds. The French thinner brasses, which operate as woodwinds in soft passages and in loud ones as a stronger counterpart to the nasal timbre of strings, oboes and bassoons, are consciously avoided in this country, even in the performance of French music.

* * *

How brilliant, how tender and how poetic French music can sound when played in the French way is a rare experience for us. That the experience was welcome to Sunday night's large and distinguished audience was proved by the volume and spontaneity of the applause. There was no real question possible; the Orchestre National is a first-class orchestra by anybody's standards and master of that particular style of execution that is one of France's solidest contributions to music.

That style is one of equilibration, of clear balances and clean colors, of poetic luminosity rather than of animal warmth. And the whole repertory of French music composed since Berlioz has been designed to profit by the sophistication of so matchless an executive possibility. When French orchestras are not in form or well led, which is all too often, they are without vitality. When they are really playing and playing French music under a good leader, which is not at all a regular or predictable circumstance, they give the model of everything an orchestra can and should do with the most sophisticated orchestral music in the world.

* * *

Walter Piston's Toccata, composed for this tour, sounded handsome beside the Gallic sonorities of Berlioz and Honegger and Ravel and Roussel. It sounded well because it is an interesting and vigorous piece, in spite of a certain weightiness in the scoring. Ravel's "Tombeau de Couperin" (four section from it) was the high point of the evening, however; the best music and the best performance. Roussel's second "Bacchus et Arianne" suite is a lovely work and a specialty of this conductor. I have long wondered why others do not use it to supplement Ravel's "Daphnis and Chloe" and "La Valse" in the all-too-short list of possible works to end a concert program. Perhaps they will from now on.

Vive la France!

Charles Munch

Who conducted the Orchestre National Sunday night in Carnegie Hall

---

ENTERS HIS 25TH AND LAST YEAR

Koussevitzky Given Warm Greeting at Symphony

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Twenty-four years ago tomorrow there was an exciting Friday afternoon concert at Symphony Hall, the American debut, no less, of the Symphony Orchestra's new conductor, Serge Koussevitzky. Yesterday afternoon this great leader, now a beloved figure in Boston, entered upon his 25th and, sad to say, his final season. There is one consolation: we shall have him occasionally as guest.

HEARTY GREETING

At the first concert of the year it is customary for the audience to stand in greeting. The only difference yesterday was that this rite was of longer duration and that the handclapping was considerably heartier. Finally, Dr. Koussevitzky signified that enough was enough and turned to the first piece on the program, which was also the first piece on his initial program, Vivaldi's Concerto in D minor.

The next number on the original list, Berlioz' "Roman Carnival" Overture, was dropped, but the third item, Brahms' Variations on a Theme of Haydn, was retained. From here on sentiment lost out. No longer does Dr. Koussevitzky feel that Honegger's locomotive piece, "Pacific 231," is suitable material, and he replaced it with that composer's relatively recent symphony for Strings, heard in each of the past two seasons. Nor could he bring himself to perform Scriabin's "Poem of Ecstasy"; there must be something more substantial, and Beethoven's Seventh Symphony took its place. That first list was unquestionably on the junky side, but it did serve to show what the new [illegible]ector could do with an orchestra. You could sum it up as five pieces, and the one that was heard yesterday, and will be heard again this evening, as three pieces and a masterpiece, meaning, of course, the Symphony of Beethoven.

Vivacious Tempo

No doubt the Vivaldi and Brahms numbers sounded very much as they had 24 years before. However, the one is definitely period music, and the other is 24 years older than it was then. It begins to sound academic, and all Koussevitzky's magic could not redeem it from this taint of scholasticism, the beautiful seventh variation, and one or two others, aside. The Honegger Symphony is a fine work, the first two movements of which bespeak the sadness of Occupied France, in which it was composed, while the chorale at the end in which a trumpet (Dr. Koussevitzky uses three) may double the first violin, voices the hope of deliverance. It is an obvious trick and sure-fire. Yesterday's audience, like its predecessors, rose to it.

Although it was not to be predicted, the joyous seventh was the climax of the afternoon. Neither the Koussevitzky nor the Boston Symphony of 24 years ago could have duplicated precisely this inspired performance. The only flaw, if you wish to consider it so, was the conductor's tempo in the finale. As one of the younger listeners put it, if the orchestra had played any faster, it would have played itself right off the stage. Yet the excitement was undeniable, with the frenzies of music and performance reflected in the enthusiasm of the audience.

ENTERS HIS 25TH AND LAST YEAR

Koussevitzky Given Warm Greeting at Symphony

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Twenty-four years ago tomorrow there was an exciting Friday afternoon concert at Symphony Hall, the American debut, no less, of the Symphony Orchestra's new conductor, Serge Koussevitzky. Yesterday afternoon this great leader, now a beloved figure in Boston, entered upon his 25th and, sad to say, his final season. There is one consolation: we shall have him occasionally as guest.

HEARTY GREETING

At the first concert of the year it is customary for the audience to stand in greeting. The only difference yesterday was that this rite was of longer duration and that the handclapping was considerably heartier. Finally, Dr. Koussevitzky signified that enough was enough and turned to the first piece on the program, which was also the first piece on his initial program, Vivaldi's Concerto in D minor.

The next number on the original list, Berlioz' "Roman Carnival" Overture, was dropped, but the third item, Brahms' Variations on a Theme of Haydn, was retained. From here on sentiment lost out. No longer does Dr. Koussevitzky feel that Honegger's locomotive piece, "Pacific 231," is suitable material, and he replaced it with that composer's relatively recent symphony for Strings, heard in each of the past two seasons. Nor could he bring himself to perform Scriabin's "Poem of Ecstasy"; there must be something more substantial, and Beethoven's Seventh Symphony took its place. That first list was unquestionably on the junky side, but it did serve to show what the new director could do with an orchestra. You could sum it up as five pieces, and the one that was heard yesterday, and will be heard again this evening, as three pieces and a masterpiece, meaning, of course, the Symphony of Beethoven.

Vivacious Tempo

No doubt the Vivaldi and Brahms numbers sounded very much as they had 24 years before. However, the one is definitely period music, and the other is 24 years older than it was then. It begins to sound academic, and all Koussevitzky's magic could not redeem it from this taint of scholasticism, the beautiful seventh variation, and one or two others, aside. The Honegger Symphony is a fine work, the first two movements of which bespeak the sadness of Occupied France, in which it was composed, while the chorale at the end in which a trumpet (Dr. Koussevitzky uses three) may double the first violin, voices the hope of deliverance. It is an obvious trick and sure-fire. Yesterday's audience, like its predecessors, rose to it.

Although it was not to be predicted, the joyous seventh was the climax of the afternoon. Neither the Koussevitzky nor the Boston Symphony of 24 years ago could have duplicated precisely this inspired performance. The only flaw, if you wish to consider it so, was the conductor's tempo in the finale. As one of the younger listeners put it, if the orchestra had played any faster, it would have played itself right off the stage. Yet the excitement was undeniable, with the frenzies of music and performance reflected in the enthusiasm of the audience.

---

24 Oct 19 Trib

MUSIC

By VIRGIL THOMSON

ORCHESTRE NATIONAL, Charles Munch, conductor, Sunday night in Carnegie Hall. The program:
"La Corsaire" (overture)........Hector Berlioz
Symphonie Liturgique.........Arthur Honegger
Toccata (first New York performance), Walter Piston
Le Tombeau de Couperin.........Maurice Ravel
Second Suite from "Bacchus et Ariane," Albert Roussel

French Loveliness

FEW musical delights are so deeply satisfying, both sensuously and intellectually, as a good French orchestra, in form, playing French music under a good French conductor; and the Orchestre National, playing Sunday night in Carnegie Hall under Charles Munch, offered exactly that. From beginning to end the concert was both electrifying and delicious. For any who might have had doubts about the ability of this, or of any other European orchestra, to bear comparison with our million-dollar-a-year groups, such hesitations were relieved after the opening overture (Berlioz's "Corsaire") and not at any time again brought to mind.

* * *

In certain ways, this orchestra, playing at its best, does better work than we are accustomed to hear. The clean unanimity of its string playing, the exactitude of its string and woodwind balances, the shading and stability of its percussion section and, of course, the matchless phrasings and other tonal refinements of the French woodwind soloists are standards of comparison that our orchestras, preoccupied in many cases by the grosser appeals of emphasis and warmth, do not always try to meet. On the question of brass, America follows the German taste for heavy round sounds. The French thinner brasses, which operate as woodwinds in soft passages and in loud ones as a stronger counterpart to the nasal timbre of strings, oboes and bassoons, are consciously avoided in this country, even in the performance of French music.

* * *

How brilliant, how tender and how poetic French music can sound when played in the French way is a rare experience for us. That the experience was welcome to Sunday night's large and distinguished audience was proved by the volume and spontaneity of the applause. There was no real question possible; the Orchestre National is a first-class orchestra by anybody's standards and master of that particular style of execution that is one of France's solidest contributions to music.

That style is one of equilibration, of clear balances and clean colors, of poetic luminosity rather than of animal warmth. And the whole repertory of French music composed since Berlioz has been designed to profit by the sophistication of so matchless an executive possibility. When French orchestras are not in form or well led, which is all too often, they are without vitality. When they are really playing and playing French music under a good leader, which is not at all a regular or predictable circumstance, they give the model of everything an orchestra can and should do with the most sophisticated orchestral music in the world.

* * *

Walter Piston's Toccata, composed for this tour, sounded handsome beside the Gallic sonorities of Berlioz and Honegger and Ravel and Roussel. It sounded well because it is an interesting and vigorous piece, in spite of a certain weightiness in the scoring. Ravel's "Tombeau de Couperin" (four section from it) was the high point of the evening, however; the best music and the best performance. Roussel's second "Bacchus et Arianne" suite is a lovely work and a specialty of this conductor. I have long wondered why others do not use it to supplement Ravel's "Daphnis and Chloe" and "La Valse" in the all-too-short list of possible works to end a concert program. Perhaps they will from now on.

Vive la France!

Charles Munch

Who conducted the Orchestre National Sunday night in Carnegie Hall

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

OPERA OPENS NOV. 29 WITH VERDI WORK

B[illegible] Will Conduct 'Otello' With Vinay, Warren and Licia Albanese in Leads

9 NEW ARTISTS WILL SING

6 Americans, 3 Europeans to Join Company—5 Revivals Planned for Season

By HOWARD TAUBMAN

[illegible] Metropolitan Opera's sixty-[illegible] 48-19 season will open on Nov. [illegible] Verdi's "Otello," [illegible] announced yesterday by [illegible], general manager. [illegible] will be headed by [illegible] as Otello, Leonard W[illegible] and Licia Albanese as Desdemona, with Fritz [illegible] conducting.

[illegible] that have not been [illegible] some seasons will be [illegible] to the repertory as re-[illegible] according to Mr. Johnson's [illegible]. They will be Monte-[illegible] "L'Amore del Tre Re," Don-[illegible] "L'Elisir d'Amore," Verdi's [illegible] Thomas' "Mignon" and S[illegible] "Salome."

[illegible]'s "Marriage of Figaro," [illegible] "Otello" has been ab-[illegible] only a season, will be [illegible], as will Benjamin Brit-[illegible] Grimes," which had [illegible]politan Opera première [illegible].

[illegible] singers will join the [illegible] Americans and three [illegible]. They are Anne Bol-[illegible], Marilyn Cotlow, Gertrude R[illegible] and Ljuba Welitsch, so-[illegible] Jean Browning Madeira, [illegible] Paul Franke, tenor; F[illegible] Guarrera, baritone, and I[illegible] Tajo and Lubomir Vichego-n[illegible] bassos.

[illegible] to the musical staff [illegible] Fritz Reiner, international-[illegible] conductor, who will di-[illegible] the revival of "Salome" and other works; Tibor Kozma, who [illegible] opera in Czechoslovakia be[illegible] coming to this country, a[illegible] Thomas Mayer, who became an assistant conductor late last season and will become a perma-n[illegible] member of the company this year.

Johnson Testifying in Chicago

Mr. Johnson, who was in Chicago testifying in a suit against an organization that had taken [illegible] Metropolitan, did not [illegible] press yesterday for the [illegible] announcement for the season. This was the first time he had been absent since he became general manager in 1935. Mr. [illegible] office said that he w[illegible] available to answer [illegible] embarrassing or not, [illegible]

In his statement Mr. Johnson said that "the successful arrange-[illegible] for the sixty-fourth season" was an indication of the funda-mental unity of purpose which ex-ists among all the varied groups within the opera organization."

Despite the delay caused by the [illegible] with some of the un-[illegible] summer, Mr. Johnson's [illegible] observed "that most of [illegible] previously planned f[illegible] season have been [illegible] probably will be—real-[illegible] that it may be pos-s[illegible] to announce additions to the repertory at a later date.

It is known that Mussorgsky's 'Khovanschina" was considered for next season. Whether it will be put on remains to be settled. Another work about which there will be curiosity is Prokofieff's "War and Peace," which has been announced for two seasons and which was once promised in a concert version for this year.

With respect to the artistic personnel of the company, the statement said that the difficulties in planning the season had caused a delay in negotiations with individual artists. Many contracts are pending and the complete roster will be made public as soon as the artists have been signed.

Company's Teamwork Praised

Mr. Johnson's statement paid tribute "to the spirit of teamwork and cooperation shown by all departments in preparing for the coming season during the shortened period of preparation." He said that the percentage of subscription renewals, plus requests from new subscribers, was as high as any in the last ten years.

Of the new American singers, Miss Bollinger, a lyric soprano, was born in Idaho, studied in Tennessee and California and has had concert and operatic experience.

Miss Cotlow, coloratura soprano, who was a 1948 winner in the Metropolitan Opera Auditions of the Air, grew up in Los Angeles and has sung in opera and concert in New York, Central City and other places.

Miss Ribla, born in New York, has appeared in opera, concert and on the radio, including an appearance with Arturo Toscanini in a Verdi program.

Miss Madeira, born in Centralia, Ill., began her musical career as a pianist and then switched to singing. She has sung the title role of Menotti's "The Medium" in London and Paris.

Mr. Franke, Boston-born, studied in New England and has sung opera there, including appearances at the Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood.

Mr. Guarrera, born in Philadelphia, studied at the Curtis Institute, served in the Navy, sang at Tanglewood, appeared with Toscanini at La Scala in Milan last summer and won an Opera Auditions of the Air for 1948.

Of the new foreign artists Miss Welitsch, Yugoslav dramatic soprano, has sung at Salzburg and at Edinburgh and Covent Garden in Great Britain; Mr. Tajo, Italian basso, has sung abroad and in San Francisco, and Mr. Vichegonov, Bulgarian basso, has sung for the last ten years in Zurich.

ADDITIONS TO THE ROSTER OF THE METROPOLITAN OPERA COMPANY

Tibor Kozma, conductor

Marilyn Cotlow, soprano, and Frank Guarrera, baritone

Associated Press

Fritz Reiner, conductor

Gertrude Ribla, soprano

Jean Browning Madeira, contralto

Anne Bollinger, soprano

The Last Baton

Historic as is the 67-year-old Boston Symphony Orchestra, this new season of 1948-49 started yesterda marks one of the most important milestones ever. Fo during this season Serge Koussevitzky, greatest of the orchestra's conductors, will lift his baton for the last time i his present post. It was way back in September, 1924 that he arrived to fulfill a trial engagement. In many Boston eyes, he was untested and unproved despite his brillian reputation abroad. It did not take long for those eyes t be opened to the fact that a stellar leader had come int our musical fold.

Through the years, Serge Koussevitzky has become a Boston institution symbolic of our culture and contributing mightily to it. He never was content to be chief of the podium alone. He conceived very early his duty as an inspirer of youth, a patron of composers, a creator of the ways to promote better music, newer music in America even while interpreting magnificently the classics. A disciplinarian, he yet had and still has a warm human touch under the austere facade. He has been, it goes withou saying, a tremendous influence upon creative effort in thi country and in the world. He has made not only Boston but Tanglewood in the Berkshires cultural influences o boundless import.

So we hail Dr. Koussevitzky, a true Russian who ha become a true American, for his contributions to our country and a great art. We wish him the most successful o all his seasons. We know that he will continue to inspir his worthy successor, Dr. Charles Muench, and countless musicians and music lovers.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
EVENING UNION

OCT 20 1948

Music, Orchestra, Conductor, All French, Heard at Smith

Charles Muench Conducts Orchestre National de France in Goodwill Tour of America

By WILLARD M. CLARK

Northampton, Oct. 19—It was a memorable listening experience tonight to hear a French orchestra and French conductor interpret a program of French music. We were able to do this because the Orchestre National de France, conducted by Charles Muench, came to Smith College as a part of its goodwill tour of the United States. This concert opened the Smith College Concert Series and Smith is the only college in the East where this orchestra will be heard.

Muench Will Please Hub

Mr. Muench will take over the conductorship of the Boston Symphony Orchestra next season. For the record, let it be known that he is a man of fine stature, has a shock of white hair and a profile which should be the delight of every "proper Bostonian." He conducts easy, yet every cue is direct and his regard for the composer's rhythms and nuances is always just.

The French orchestra may be likened to our own NBC orchestra as it plays primarily for the Paris radio. The American listener, accustomed to the lush tones of our permiere orchestras, may find the tone of the French orchestra a bit on the cold side. The extreme purity of the choirs apparently does not permit the myriad tonal effects evoked by, let us say, the Boston or Philadelphia orchestras. However, within its framework this French orchestra has everything. There are virtuoso players; the brasses are gorgeous; the woodwinds almost sexless in their purity and the strings can be brilliant. Never have we heard finer percussionists than tonight, and in the "Symphonie Fantastique" of Berlioz and the final "L'Apprenti Sorcier" of Dukas, they performed magnificently.

During the past few months we have heard no less than four performances of the Berlioz symphony. Some have been more colorful, but none had the intensity, the stark awfulness of the reading tonight. The March to the Scaffold was hair-raising; the final Walpurgisnight's Dream was terrifying. On the other hand, the lovely pastorale portraying a Scene in the Fields was exquisite in its tenderness and tonal beauty. All this was accomplished by Mr. Muench with a minimum of effort. He let the music speak for itself. He brought forth an amazingly flexible range of dynamics and showed an artist's respect for rhythms.

Special Composition

Compliment was paid the American composer. Walter Piston's "Toccata" was composed for this tour at the request of Mr. Muench. It provided opportunity for vituoso display but its exterior brilliance was greater than its inner illumination. Mr. Muench provided a difinitive reading and the orchestra a thrilling performance.

Debussy's lovely tone poem "La Mer" has had some magnificent performances hereabouts, notably those given by Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The performance tonight was as remarkable as it was different from any we have herd. Instead of evoking a great variety of color from his orchestra, Mr. Muench provided a straight-forward reading, relying on strict rhythms for his effects. Particularly impressive was the episode of the "Dialogue of the wind and sea" and the "Play of the waves." The flowing grace of the musical line and the pulsating rise and fall of the music were further proof of the musical stature of Charles Muench.

The concert closed with a splendid, rollicking performance of "The Sorcerer's Apprentice." It brought forth a real ovation, one that was fully deserved. Smith College is to be congratulated and thanked for bringing this fine orchestra to us.

The next concert on the series will be given November 19 when the Negro soprano, Ellabelle Davis, will be heard.

OCTOBER 21, 1948

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
NEWS

Best Seats for Boston Symphony To Be Allocated

Holders of Season Tickets for Local Programs to Be Favored

Mrs. Douglas V. Wallace, vice-president and ticket chairman of the Springfield Orchestra Association, said today that persons who are season ticket subscribers for the Springfield Symphony will have advantages in the choice of seat locations and in the ticket prices when the Boston Symphony visits Springfield ~~on Tuesday~~ evening, Jan. 11, at 8.30 in the Municipal Auditorium.

The appearance of the Boston Symphony in Springfield will be a part of Dr. Serge Koussevitsky's farewell tour. Dr. Koussevitsky is celebrating his 25th year with the Boston Symphony this season and will retire as music director of the Boston Symphony at the close of the current season. This will be his only and final appearance in Western Massachusetts.

SERGE KOUSSEVITSKY

The occasion, too, will mark the first time that the Springfield Symphony has been associated with the presentation of music other than its own. The association has been accorded the honor of sponsoring Dr. Koussevitsky's final appearance in this area because of the close relationship between the two orchestras. Alexander Leslie started his conducting career in the first Tanglewood school sessions held for this purpose. Since that time Dr. Koussevitsky and George E. Judd, manager of the Boston Symphony, have shown considerable interest in Mr. Leslie's career, as well as the career of the local symphony and have always been ready to assist when possible. One evidence of their interest in our conductor was indicated by the invitation Mr. Leslie received to guest conduct the Boston Pops two seasons ago.

Mrs. Wallace pointed out that the first concert of the Springfield Symphony will be held on the 25th in the Municipal Auditorium at 8.30 p. m. and that the guest artist that evening will be Richard Burgin, concert master and associate conductor of the Boston Symphony.

Season tickets to the Springfield Symphony series may be purchased at the Symphony Office, 49 Chestnut St.; at Steinert's or at the Auditorium box-office on the night of the first concert, on the 25th.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

OCT 23 1948

KOUSSEVITZKY LAUDS WORK

Harvard Music Teacher's Composition Termed "Little Masterpiece"

Boston, Oct. 22.—(AP)—A young Harvard music teacher today heard his first symphonic work applauded by Boston Symphony Orchestra Conductor Serge Koussevitzky as "a little masterpiece."

Composer Irving Fine's "Toccata Concertante" received a hearty ovation from the musicians and a capacity audience of 2700 at an afternoon concert.

Fine, 34, is a Boston native and assistant professor of music at Harvard.

Orchestre National

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

The concert given at Symphony Hall last evening by the Orchestre National of France under Boston's conductor-elect, Charles Munch, was in many respects an enjoyable experience. Even more was it an instructive one.

We of this country are conditioned to a certain type of orchestra, the international orchestra, of which the prime example is the Boston Symphony, though the New York Philharmonic or the Philadelphia Orchestra would serve quite as well for purposes of illustration. A national orchestra is something else again, whether it is French, German, English or what you will. The glory of French orchestras is and long has been the woodwind section. It is not for nothing that so many Frenchmen occupy woodwind first desks in America, but to one habituated to the American orchestra, the strings of the Orchestre National last evening sounded thin, the brass tinny.

The most disappointing number from my point of view was the "Fantastic" Symphony of Berlioz. And not only because I am used to hearing it from Dr. Koussevitzky and the B. S. O. I heard Mr. Munch himself do it with the Philharmonic in New York last season and was tremendously impressed. But the Orchestre National is not the Philharmonic. In Ravel's "The Tomb of Couperin" and Debussy's "The Sea," there were many admirable moments. Yet they were chiefly when the woodwinds were to the fore. No wonder Debussy made them the core of his orchestra. He knew what he had to deal with.

In matters of precision, phrasing, etc., the Orchestre National is an admirable body. We have long known that French musicians are excellent musicians. This matter of tone is something else again. Nor is it necessarily a question of right or wrong, good or bad. It is merely a matter of standards, of taste.

To continue on the personal tack, the hit of the evening, so far as I was concerned, was no one of these French pieces, but the Toccata of our own Walter Piston, which Mr. Munch commissioned last spring and is being extensively played on this tour. This Toccata is music of great vigor and vitality, with an ingeniously contrasted middle section, in which the woodwinds (those woodwinds again) were prominent. Mr. Piston should have been brought to the stage. Instead, he modestly bowed his acknowledgements from his seat on the floor. Mr. Munch said the other day that when he took over in Boston he would see that the American composer had his due. If he does as well by the others as he did by Mr. Piston last evening, there is nothing to fear in that respect. As for French music, we learned immediately that he is generally dependable in it. Last night's concert, under the local sponsorship of the French Center of New England, attracted an audience that did not quite fill the hall. But its enthusiasm knew no bounds.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Blessings brighten as they take their flight. Dr. Koussevitzky is beginning this, his last season, at a point above what we had come to regard as the peak of his powers. Or so it seemed on Friday of last week and again yesterday afternoon. The opening program found him and his responsive orchestra glorifying the already familiar. Yesterday they were engaged in disclosing to us an exacting work not a measure of which had been heard before, the 40-year-old Seventh Symphony of Mahler. Also on the program was Ravel's arrangement of Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibiti n." Regarding the performance of that particular Koussevitzian war horse, I am in no position to speak, though I can well imagine its excellence. The Mahler was all that I could take in, in one afternoon.

If the Seventh Symphony were a flawless masterpiece we would not have had to wait so long to hear it. On the other hand, did it not possess some qualities it would have continued to remain undisturbed. Actually, its virtues far outweigh its faults. By a curious coincidence Dimitri Mitropoulos has announced for next month the first New York performance of it in 25 years. With yesterday's audience it made a pronounced hit, and it is easy to prophesy that now that we have made its acquaintance we are not going to let it out of our sight for very long.

It has been the practice of conductors in other cities to play not the entire work but the second and fourth of the five movements, each of which has been given the title of Night music. They are of the utmost charm and attractiveness, even if the first of them is overlong, considering the relatively slender quality of its material. In the other Mahler adds to the orchestra a guitar and a mandolin, and with ravishing effect. Either of them could stand alone, and that in all these years they have managed to escape local performance is something of a mystery.

Between these Serenades comes a Scherzo, marked Shadowlike, hardly less delightful than they are, and played yesterday with a miraculous deftness. But what of the rest? In the first place, the work as a whole scarcely adds up to an organic symphony, in the classical sense. And whereas in the opening movement we find Mahler at his most intense, his most powerful: pregnant themes handled in masterly fashion, a sweeping eloquence, a passionate lyricism; in the Rondo finale his melodic inspiration deserts him. Though he starts off promisingly, it is not long before he is merely marking time; and he ends (to change the metaphor) by pulling himself up by his own bootstraps. There is a brave sound, but the substance is hollow. That still did not discourage yesterday's audience. Koussevitzky received an ovation and he deserved it.

Music, Orchestra, Conductor, All French, Heard at Smith

Charles Muench Conducts Orchestre National de France in Goodwill Tour of America

By WILLARD M. CLARK

Northampton, Oct. 19—It was a memorable listening experience tonight to hear a French orchestra and French conductor interpret a program of French music. We were able to do this because the Orchestre National de France, conducted by Charles Muench, came to Smith College as a part of its goodwill tour of the United States. This concert opened the Smith College Concert Series and Smith is the only college in the East where this orchestra will be heard.

Muench Will Please Hub

Mr. Muench will take over the conductorship of the Boston Symphony Orchestra next season. For the record, let it be known that he is a man of fine stature, has a shock of white hair and a profile which should be the delight of every "proper Bostonian." He conducts easy, yet every cue is direct and his regard for the composer's rhythms and nuances is always just.

The French orchestra may be likened to our own NBC orchestra as it plays primarily for the Paris radio. The American listener, accustomed to the lush tones of our permiere orchestras, may find the tone of the French orchestra a bit on the cold side. The extreme purity of the choirs apparently does not permit the myriad tonal effects evoked by, let us say, the Boston or Philadelphia orchestras. However, within its framework this French orchestra has everything. There are virtuoso players; the brasses are gorgeous; the woodwinds almost sexless in their purity and the strings can be brilliant. Never have we heard finer percussionists than tonight and in the "Symphoniw Fantastique" of Berlioz and the final "L'Apprenti Sorcier" of Dukas, they performed magnificently.

During the past few months we have heard no less than four performances of the Berlioz symphony. Some have been more colorful, but none had the intensity, the stark awfulness of the reading tonight. The March to the Scaffold was hair-raising; the final Walpurgisnight's Dream was terrifying. On the other hand, the lovely pastorale portraying a Scene in the Fields was exquisite in its tenderness and tonal beauty. All this was accomplished by Mr. Muench with a minimum of effort. He let the music speak for itself. He brought forth an amazingly flexible range of dynamics and showed an artist's respect for rhythms.

Special Composition

Compliment was paid the American composer. Walter Piston's "Toccata" was composed for this tour at the request of Mr. Muench. It provided opportunity for vituoso display but its exterior brilliance was greater than its inner illumination. Mr. Muench provided a difinitive reading and the orchestra a thrilling performance.

Debussy's lovely tone poem "La Mer" has had some magnificent performances hereabouts, notably those given by Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The performance tonight was as remarkable as it was different from any we have herd. Instead of evoking a great variety of color from his orchestra, Mr. Muench provided a straight-forward reading, relying on strict rhythms for his effects. Particularly impressive was the episode of the "Dialogue of the wind and sea" and the "Play of the waves." The flowing grace of the musical line and the pulsating rise and fall of the music were further proof of the musical stature of Charles Muench.

The concert closed with a splendid, rollicking performance of "The Sorcerer's Apprentice." It brought forth a real ovation, one that was fully deserved. Smith College is to be congratulated and thanked for bringing this fine orchestra to us.

The next concert on the series will be given November 19 when the Negro soprano, Ellabelle Davis, will be heard.

MUSIC

New Fine Toccata and Vaughan Williams' Sixth by the Boston Symphony

By CYRUS DURGIN

Three-quarters of the mu[illegible] at the Boston Symph[illegible] concerts this week [illegible] and the other [illegible] Strauss's "T[illegible] young in spirit [illegible] and in the magically [illegible] noon, makes a [illegible] able program.

The youngest [illegible] the Toccata Concertante [illegible] 1947 [illegible] 33-year-old I[illegible] Fine of the Harvard music faculty. The performance was the first an[illegible] Next in chronology [illegible] Sixth Symphony by 76-year-old Vaughan Williams, given its American premiere at last Summer's Berkshire Festival and introduced to Boston yesterday. As for the Piano Concerto [illegible] late Maurice Ravel, that dates from 1931. The soloist this week is the same able and gifted pianist who introduced it here in 1932, Boston's own Jesus Maria Sanroma.

All over the lobby at intermission, they were punning on Fine's name and his piece. The Fine music is fine music, indeed; no piddling little curtain-raiser, but a well-proportioned toccata in a concertante style, fully but deftly orchestrated, logically constructed and sparkling.

Knowing Fine's great admiration for Stravinsky, I had half-expected the Toccata to be deeply influenced by that composer. But the work actually is distinctive and original, with only a few Stravinskyan touches. The ideas are salient, the texture alive but by no means a mass of dissonance. You might call the style impersonal, in its bustling way, yet at the same time it is music of both color and feeling.

This Toccata looks like a [illegible] addition to the repertory [illegible] all means it should be repeated [illegible] season. The composer appeared on the stage and was [illegible] received.

Age is no barrier [illegible] tion, as the late [illegible] Wagner, Verdi and others [illegible] proved. Though [illegible] Vaughan Williams [illegible] stirring and turbulent pages [illegible] Sixth Symphony. Though probably too long, the score sings, dances and roars its robust course up to the finale, which is an [illegible] slow time and a most [illegible] tranquil species of music. I gathered some cuts had been made; perhaps a few more would do no harm.

The nature of this modern English work suggests an emotional basis as well as purely music construction. But Mr. Williams has said nothing on that point so we'll have to accept the symphony just as "pure" music. But is that sudden burst of melody in the third movement a phrase of [illegible]

Ravel's bizarre [illegible] at times droll Piano C[illegible] soloist of [illegible] Sanroma [illegible] faded. [illegible] of slick [illegible] speed. [illegible] yesterday [illegible] play [illegible] All [illegible] told [illegible]

Mr. K[illegible] with "T[illegible] the work [illegible] time it was a miracle of [illegible] wit.

Previe

Fine of the music
Harvard, whose Toc
nte will have its nce at this week's
the Boston Symph

Preview of Symphony Program—Münch With French Orchestra

Irving Fine of the music faculty at Harvard, whose Toccata Concertante will have its first performance at this week's concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Vaughan Williams' Sixth; Irving Fine's New Toccata

Ralph Vaughan Williams' Sixth Symphony, composed in 1947, will be given its second American performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Friday afternoon and Saturday evening concerts this week end in Symphony Hall. The work was first produced in this country by the Boston Symphony at the Berkshire Festival last summer. Dr. Serge Koussevitsky will direct.

The program will open with the première of "Toccata Concertante" by Irving Fine, his first orchestral work. Mr. Fine is a native of Boston and is now Assistant Professor of Music at Harvard. Also to be heard are the Ravel Piano Concerto with Jesús Maria Sanromá at the keyboard, and "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks" by Richard Strauss.

Miles Kastendieck, reviewing the Williams Sixth at its Tanglewood performance, has this to say of its character:

"Born in the years of World War II, the symphony reflects its influence on a poetic mind which holds to its belief despite its travail. It opens in conflict and closes in pronouncement. The violence and the anguish which clash periodically through three movements merge into a serenity beneficent in aspect and profound in meaning. The faith that was challenged triumphs, even reaching out for newer horizons."

* * *

W. H. Haddon Squire, writing from London after the première, said that "in the Sixth Symphony we seem to hear the personal merge into the national and the national into the universal."

There are four distinct movements — Allegro, Moderato, Scherzo, and Epilogue — but they are played without break. Williams uses the conventional symphonic instrumentation. His idom is modern, but his underlying harmonies are distinctly modal in character.

In Mr. Williams' own analysis of his new symphony for the program of the Royal Philharmonic Society, he completely eliminates anything of a programmatic nature and writes in a technical vein.

He describes the Scherzo as being "fugal in texture but not in structure," and his sense of humor crops out as he goes on to speak of this movement.

"The woodwind experiment as to how the fugue subject will sound upside down," he says, "but the brass are angry and insist on playing it the right way up, so for a bit the two go on together and to the delight of everyone, including the composer, the two versions fit, so there is nothing to do now but to continue, getting more excited . . ."

* * *

Mr. Williams writes that it is difficult to describe the last movement analytically. "It is directed to be played very soft throughout," he explains. "The music drifts about contrapuntally with occasional whiffs of theme. . . . At the very end the strings cannot make up their minds whether to finish in E-flat major or E minor. They finally decide on E minor which is, after all, the home key."

Irving Fine, whose first work for orchestra will open this program, is identified with the younger group of Boston composers. He took his Master's degree in music at Harvard University, where he studied theory and composition under Walter Piston, Edward Burlingame Hill, and A. Tillman Merritt. He continued his studies under Nadia Boulanger in Cambridge and in France.

Mr. Fine composed his "Toccata Concertante" in the summer of 1947 and scored it for two flutes and piccolo, two oboes and English horn, two clarinets and bass clarinet, two bassoons and contra-bassoon, four horns, three trumpets, three trombones, and tuba, tympani, side drum, bass drum, cymbals, piano and strings.

The word toccata, Mr. Fine explains, has been used in connection with concerted music of a fanfare-like character, and it is in this sense that he uses the term. He describes his composition as follows:

* * *

"The piece is roughly in sonata form. There is a short, fanfare-like introduction containing two motives which generate most of the subsequent thematic material. The following exposition . . . makes prominent use of an ostinato and is rather indeterminate in tonality."

Several themes, lyrical in character, are introduced and entrusted chiefly to solo wind instruments supported by string accompaniment. These are developed into a climax which moves at once into a recapitulation of earlier material. The whole piece is then rounded off by an extended coda.

Mr. Fine admits to having been influenced by Stravinsky. His work reflects Stravinsky in the latter's classical vein, but his themes are less distorted than Stravinsky's, and he maintains a sense of tonality, though at times not too well defined. The work takes slightly more than 10 minutes to perform.

H. R.

Ellsworth Ford

Jesús María Sanromá, soloist at this week's symphony concerts in Ravel's Piano Concerto, which he introduced to Boston in

Conductor Concentrates On Music of Native Land

By L. A. Sloper

Charles Münch, conductor-elect of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, brought the Orchestre National of France to Symphony Hall last night in the course of a tour of America. The program consisted of Berlioz's "Symphonie Fantastique," Walter Piston's Toccata, Ravel's "Le Tombeau de Couperin," and Debussy's "La Mer." The concert was under the local sponsorship of the French Center in New England. The hall was not filled, but the enthusiasm was unbounded.

The concert was of great value in introducing to Bostonians the French style of playing: French music by a French orchestra under a French conductor. There are marked differences between this French style and that of American orchestras, and these differences are expressive of the French genius itself. The most characteristic of them are precision, balance and clarity. In these qualities the Orchestre National would be hard to beat.

* * *

The fundamental of all French art is an Apollonian restraint: nothing too much. And this is most apparent in the tone of the orchestra, which is less lush, more cool, more chaste than that of American orchestras. It has feeling, but no Schmalz. In turn, it is this quality which brings out the precision, balance and clarity of the playing.

The woodwinds of course are most conspicuously benefited by this classical attribute. (The French set the standard everywhere for this department.) Their phrasing is exquisite, and it is not covered up by the ensemble.

The strings have been called dry. An unfortunate word. It would be better to say that they reflect the thin, erect calm of an ancient civilization.

The brass is powerful enough, but it has not that piercing quality of the American brass. It is easier on the ear, and it does not dominate the rest of the orchestra.

And the amazing bells—in the Berlioz symphony we were introduced to them. They are real bells, and their tone makes one realize what the expression "clear as a bell" means; it has none of the off-key overtones of the cylindrical, vertical so-called bells that we are accustomed to endure.

* * *

The program served also to bring out Mr. Münch's best qualities. It is natural that he should be at his best in French music. He gave the French version of violent emotion in the "Fantastique." It was less exciting than the accounts of leaders with more heart-on-the-sleeve antecedents, but more believable. The fine flower of the French tradition, delicate, sufficiently sincere but older and slightly ironical, was given us in the refined delicacies of Ravel.

The Toccata of Piston seemed out of place on this program, possibly because it has just been written, but also because it has little of the French style. It sounds as if it had been commissioned, and indeed it was, and by Mr. Münch, who has a great admiration for Mr. Piston's work. Somehow I feel that this composition will not add much to the composer's reputation, which is already high.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

The current Symphony program begins with a work, new to Boston, of a young composer who has not yet found himself, the Toccata Concertante of Irving Fine. It continues with one by a composer who found himself long ago but seems in recent years to have forgotten how he got there, and who, in point of age, has exceeded the life span allotted by the Psalmist. This work, also new here is the Sixth Symphony of Vaughan Williams. Composed between 1944 and '47, it is a war symphony and according to Dyneley Hussey, states "with that downright forcefulness which has always been a characteristic of Vaughan William's utterance what he feels about the war, and then turns at the end to a meditation upon an ideal and other wordly peace."

The meditation is one of the most curious movements to be found in any symphony, old or new. The composer calls it an Epilogue; it proceeds from first to last in an unbroken pianissimo, and its musical construction is so vague that it might well have gone on forever. Fortunately, it did not.

In the three preceding movements we receive abundant evidence that England's foremost composer can still manipulate musical material, though he seems to have lost the knack of inventing it significantly. There is also the plain suggestion of war psychology already mentioned. Dr. Koussevitzky, who gave this work its American premiere at Tanglewood last summer, evidently believes in it and conducted it yesterday with care, devotion and enthusiasm. The piece's reception by the audience was at least cordial, as was that accorded Mr. Fine's Toccata, the first music by this assistant professor of music at Harvard to be played by our orchestra.

Almost anything can be called a toccata and this piece of Mr. Fine's has some of the energy and brilliance primarily associated with the term, as well as the lyrical section proper to the sonata form, in which the piece is cast. Mr. Fine here displays technical skill and agreeable powers of invention. As yet no clear individuality is present.

The only familiar music yesterday was the concluding number, Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel." Conductor and orchestra became letter perfect in this genial tone poem long since, but their peformance of it has never become perfunctory. The remaining item, the charming, if rather slight, Piano Concerto of Ravel, was played for the second time at the regular concerts, and, as at the Boston premiere in 1932, the pianist was Jesus Maria Sanroma. This is the music in which Mr. Sanroma excells. He responds naturally to the pronouncedly jazzy elements in the first and third movements and he handled beautifully the lyric flow of the Adagio. It was good to have Mr. Sanroma with us again, and there were many recalls for him and for Dr. Koussevitzky, in whose hands the orchestral part had also received its due, and a little more besides.

BOSTON HERALD, SATURDAY, OCTOBER 23, 1

MUSIC

Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, gave the third concert of its 68th season in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. Jesus Maria Sanroma, pianist, was the soloist. The program:

Toccata Concertante .... Irving Fine
Symphony No. 6 ...... Vaughan Williams
Concerto for Piano and Orchestra
Ravel
Till Eulenspiegel .... Strauss

By RUDOLPH ELIE

After nearly five years (and it's five years too long), Jesus Maria Sanroma returned to his old place at the keyboard in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon and, with Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra in fine fettle behind him, stole the show in a brilliant performance of Ravel's piano concerto.

We shouldn't, I suppose, begrudge Mr. Sanroma those five years away from us, for he has been using them to achieve a reputation in South and Central America that far exceeds his reputation here and that, heaven knows, is impressive enough. But it was a pleasure to hear again his strong, clean-cut playing, to marvel at his extraordinary technic (who can do glissandi as perfectly as he?), and to wonder at his absolute command of rhythm whether it be the intricate cross rhythms and percussive beats of the finale or the gentle flow of the slow movement.

The Concerto itself is a gem. Although finished in 1932, two years too late to be performed during the 50th anniversary season of the Boston orchestra as Ravel intended it to be, few if any concertos written for piano and orchestra since have equalled it either as music or as entertainment. The first movement, liberally scattered with "blue" intervals, seems to lend credence to the oft-told story about Ravel and Gershwin.

It seems that Gershwin wrote to Ravel and asked if he'd consent to give him instruction in composition, inquiring what his fee would be. Ravel, so the story goes, replied with a query. "How much money do you make a year?" he asked. Gershwin wrote that he made about $100,000 a year. "In that case," replied Ravel, "I had better take lessons from you." However that may be, the fact is the first movement of Ravel's Concerto has a strong Gershwin flavor though, without being in the least cavalier to that talented composer, it is on a higher and more artistic level. The slow movement, with its serene opening for piano solo and its equally beautiful close for solo English horn (exquisitely played by Mr. Speyer, by the way), is marvelous, while the finale with its contrasting rhythms and capricious melody, is altogether captivating. Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra have seldom done a better job of accompanying a soloist, and all concerned got a hearty reception from the audience.

The concert opened with a brief but highly competent orchestral essay by Irving Fine, an assistant professor of music at Harvard, whose smaller works, heard hereabouts from time to time, are exceptionally graceful. The Toccata Concertante, on a more ambitious scale though still not quite sustained enough to prove much of anything, displayed a fine economy of style, a sure orchestral sense and an attractive though slightly dry melodic invention. Offhand I would say it is one of the better short pieces for orchestras, but it would be interesting to hear a longer work by Mr. Fine in a less academic vein.

I may as well confess to an appalling disinterest in the music of Vaughan Williams. The Fifth, or London, Symphony, I like very much. The Sixth, though it has some beautiful moments and some gifted writing for orchestra, as witness the closing of the first movement against the accompaniment of the harp just doesn't get to me. So, rather than prejudice the reader against it, I can only say that I recognize the artist at work and admire both his craftsmanship and his integrity, and that the flaw must be in me somewhere. It was, in any case, given a devoted reading by Dr. Koussevitzky, and it was very well received by the audience.

Richard Burgin conducts the orchestra next week, the program offering Brahms' Third Symphony, Poulenc's Concerto for Organ and Strings (E. Power Biggs, soloist) and Hindemith's Metamorphosis of Themes by Weber.

THE WORLD OF MUSIC

The Competition in Conductors Grows As NCAC Builds List to Twenty-six

By ROSS PARMENTER

HAVING more than sixty conductors under its management, Columbia Artists still dominates the field. But the handling of conductors is no longer as much a one-management affair as it used to be. National Concert and Artists Corporation, which had only seven conductors under its wings a year and a half ago, now has twenty-six. Among the eminent newcomers to the fold are Hans Knappertsbusch of the Vienna Opera and the Vienna Philharmonic, Victor de Sabata of Italy, who is coming to be a guest conductor of the Pittsburgh Symphony, and Fritz Reiner, who is managed jointly with S. Hurok.

NCAC manages most of the conductors of the Metropolitan Opera. In addition to Mr. Reiner, it has Fritz Busch, Fritz Stiedry and Emil Cooper, and recently it acquired Giuseppe Antonicelli and Thomas Mayer. Other additions in the last year include Frieder Weissmann, conductor of the Scranton Philharmonic; José Echaniz, who is starting his first season as director of the Grand Rapids Symphony; Issay Dobrowen, who has been conducting in Sweden, and the young composer-pianist Lukas Foss, who is planning a career as a conductor.

SPLIT: The four musicians who began playing together in 1942 as the Guilet Quartet have come to a parting of the ways. An ensemble with the same name, however, will continue in existence, for Daniel Guilet, the leader, has assembled three other musicians to join him. The new second violinist is Joseph Rabushka, the violist Rolf Persinger, the son of Louis Persinger, and the 'cellist Ralph Oxman. Two members of the old quartet, Frank Brieff, viola, and Lucien Laporte, 'cello, are forming a new quartet of their own. Jac Gorodetzky, the second violinist of the original ensemble, has been playing with the CBS Symphony APPRECIATION: Aaron Copland feels that John Kirkpatrick William Kapell, Leo Smit and Andor Foldes are the four pianists who have done most for his music. As a gesture of appreciation he has dedicated a Blues to each of them. The four pieces are being published simultaneously. In order not to play favorites, the composer plans to put a copy for each pianist in the same mail the day the Blues appear. The pianists will have to work it out themselves as to who will give the first performance.

PROVINCIAL: Bostonians did not turn out in any great numbers when the New York Philharmonic-Symphony, under Leopold Stokowski, recently visited their city. Symphony Hall was less than three-quarters full. Indeed, Boston music lovers have proved so consistently cold to visiting orchestras that Critic Rudolph Elie Jr. of the Boston Sunday Herald, afraid they might prove similarly chilly to the Orchestre National of France, felt called upon to berate them.

"It is a rewarding experience to hear other orchestras," he wrote, "and it is a provincial attitude in the least to fancy that our orchestra is so musically unapproachable that no other could possibly equal it."

SYMPHONY CONCERT

Another series of Sunday [illegible] by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the [illegible] year of Dr. Koussevitzky's directorship, was begun yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall with the capacity audience [illegible] applause. [illegible]

Two other [illegible] heard here previously [illegible] season, were Vivaldi's Concerto in D Minor for orchestra with organ, and the Beethoven Seventh Symphony. Since each of these works was critically reviewed earlier in the month any detailed analysis of yesterday's performance would be superfluous. In general it should be noted that the orchestra, as well as the director, was in exceptional fine form, as both have been all season.

After recently listening to the thinner and less sensuous tone of the strings and brass of the Orchestre Nationale in the same hall, the tonal effects yesterday seemed unusually opulent. In fact any visiting orchestra, foreign or domestic, brings home the realization that the string tone of the Bostonians is unsurpassed.

This was [illegible] Vivaldi Concerto [illegible] work which Dr. Koussevitzky used to open both his first and [illegible] seasons in Symphony Hall. [illegible] ingratiating sound of all the strings, enhanced by [illegible] support from the organ made this work an [illegible]

The brass [illegible] share of glory [illegible] At An Exhibition [illegible] ing success [illegible] de force [illegible] amazing [illegible] and good taste [illegible] equalled Koussevitzky [illegible] tion.

His reading of the Beethoven Symphony was [illegible] brilliantly persuasive. The theatrical effect of the speed of the final movement is open to debate, but there is no question that it provides an exciting finish, and that the audience reacted as if it were nothing short of electric.

ARD BURG
r and Associat
Boston Sympho
day's concert i nd the Friday
day evening co
Hall.

---

nd Saturday

SYMPHONY

BY WARREN

You can't exa current Sympho ducted by Rich gresses from th ridiculous. In hi
Brahms falls sh which he didn't frivolous would for the remaining Concerto for org
chestra, with ti mith's Symphonic themes by Webe
Both the Hinde done here a litt years ago under

WASHINGTON, PA.
OBSERVER
OCT 22 1948

Monday Music Club Hears Report Of Music Festival

Mrs. G. Herschel Fetherlin entertained the members of the Monday Music Club at her North avenue home Monday night. A large number of members and guests were present.

President Mrs. C. Clyde Stone was in charge.

The evening's program was devoted to the consideration of the work done at the Berkshire Music Festival held annually in Tanglewood at Lenox, Mass. under the direction of Dr. Serge Koussevitsky with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The [illegible] of the program was a paper prepared by Mrs. Margaretta D. Stewart who attended the Festival. She gave a vivid account of the many musical activities which are contained in this very important phase of American musical life.

The paper first described the beautiful mountain scenery which forms the setting for the event and the historical background of the locality. She continued by [illegible] of the great families of the [illegible] era and of the literary colony whose member, Nathaniel Hawthorn wrote "Tanglewood Tales".

Then following were brief sketches of the important musical personages who had feature roles in the past season's events. The programs this year ranged from the pure classics of Bach and Mazart to the ultra-modern compositions of Walter Piston, Darius Mil Laud, Stravinsky, Hindemith, and Aaron Copland. Dr. Koussevitsky has done a great deal to encourage the new composers and by [illegible]ng this he has given the musicians the opportunity of judging between the old and the new.

In the absence of Mrs. Stewart the paper was read by Miss Eva MacGinnis, program chairman.

Recordings of the First, Third and Fourth Brandenburg concerts by Bach were played after which Mrs. Lucius McK. Crumrine served as moderator for a discussion period.

During the brief business session the members voted to make a contribution to the Community Chest.

Oct 25

MUSIC

Herald

Sunday Symphony

The first concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Sunday afternoon series was given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall, Serge Koussevitzky conducting the following program:

Concerto in D minor for orchestra and organ .... Vivaldi
"Pictures at an Exhibition" .. Moussorgsky
Symphony No. 7 .... Beethoven

The capacity audience which had made its way through the rain yesterday afternoon to hear Serge Koussevitzky conduct the opening concert of the Sunday series was rewarded with a performance of the three choice and familiar works on the program that was nothing short of thrilling.

As at the first of the Friday concerts this year, the opening number was the classic Vivaldi concerto with which Koussevitzky began his first concert as leader of the Boston Symphony 24 years ago. The strict form of this work, the classic texture of the accompaniment and the strength and craft of the composer sprang to life yesterday in a beauty that seemed extraordinarily fresh and invigorating for a piece that is over two centuries old.

The "Pictures at an Exhibition," which was played at the second of the Friday concerts this year, also commemorates an anniversary. It had been orchestrated by Maurice Ravel only the year before Koussevitzky played it in his first season in Boston. The breadth and stature of the descriptive power of this music was yet more vivid in yesterday's performance than ten days ago.

The Beethoven Seventh Symphony made a brilliant second half for the concert. Every choir of the orchestra was at its best, and the splendor of the symphony shone in its heroic proportions from the first note to the last. The audience responded to the outstanding performance with warm applause.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
~~PM~~
STAR
OCT 26 1948

Music . . . by Robert A. Hague

Howard Shanet to Conduct Queens Symphony Orchestra

When it opens its annual series of five concerts on Thursday, the Queens Symphony will have young Howard Shanet as conductor. Shanet is the Brooklyn-born lad who went to Tanglewood three summers ago to get a chance to conduct, won a smile from Koussevitzky with his performance of the first movement of Dvorak's New World Symphony, and an invitation from Leonard Bernstein to become his assistant at the NYC Symphony last fall. Earlier this year Shanet conducted the Broadway revival of Marc Blitzstein's opera, The Cradle Will Rock.

Howard Shanet

Equipped with a thorough musical education from Columbia University, where he was a Pultizer Scholar, he served as bandleader of the Iwo Jima Army Garrison during four and a half years in the Army; was apprentice to Fritz Stiedry, conductor of the Metropolitan Opera Company; has studied with Brohuslav Martinu, Aaron Copland and Arthur Honegger; and was once invited to Cleveland to be the only private pupil of Dr. George Szell, conductor of the orchestra there.

Shanet will open the seventh season of the Queens Symphony, an all-amateur, non-profit orchestra which was founded by a group of local residents to provide the opportunity of orchestral experience for nonprofessional instrumentalists and to offer the benefits of a musical scholarship to a talented student from Queens, who will be able thereby to continue his musical education.

* * *

A radical departure for a standard symphony orchestra is evident in the plans of the Louisville Philharmonic to build its season around the composer. For each of the six pairs of subscription concerts the orchestra, under Robert Whitney, has commissioned a composer to write a ten-minute work to be given its world premiere in Louisville. The six who have accepted commissions are Roy Harris; Darius Milhaud, French composer now living and teaching in the U. S.; Joaquin Rodrigo, the blind Spanish composer; Virgil Thomson, N. Y. Herald Tribune music critic and composer; Dr. Claude Almand, young teacher-composer of the University of Louisville School of Music; and Gian Francesco Malipiero, Italian composer. The Messrs. Thomson, Milhaud, Almand and Harris are scheduled to conduct the premieres of their compositions.

Vol Oct 23

SYMPHONY CONCERT

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

The current Symphony program begins with a work, new to Boston, of a young composer who has not yet found himself, the Toccata Concertante of Irving Fine. It continues with one by a composer who found himself long ago but seems in recent years to have forgotten how he got there, and who, in point of age, has exceeded the life span allotted by the Psalmist. This work, also new here is the Sixth Symphony of Vaughan Williams. Composed between 1944 and '47, it is a war symphony and according to Dyneley Hussey, states "with that downright forcefulness which has always been a characteristic of Vaughan William's utterance what he feels about the war, and then turns at the end to a meditation upon an ideal and other wordly peace."

The meditation is one of the most curious movements to be found in any symphony, old or new. The composer calls it an Epilogue; it proceeds from first to last in an unbroken pianissimo, and its musical construction is so vague that it might well have gone on forever. Fortunately, it did not.

In the three preceding movements we receive abundant evidence that England's foremost composer can still manipulate musical material, though he seems to have lost the knack of inventing it significantly. There is also the plain suggestion of war psychology already mentioned. Dr. Koussevitzky, who gave this work its American premiere at Tanglewood last summer, evidently believes in it and conducted it yesterday with care, devotion and enthusiasm. The piece's reception by the audience was at least cordial, as was that accorded Mr. Fine's Toccata, the first music by this assistant professor of music at Harvard to be played by our orchestra.

Almost anything can be called a toccata and this piece of Mr. Fine's has some of the energy and brilliance primarily associated with the term, as well as the lyrical section proper to the sonata form, in which the piece is cast. Mr. Fine here displays technical skill and agreeable powers of invention. As yet no clear individuality is present.

The only familiar music yesterday was the concluding number, Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel." Conductor and orchestra became letter perfect in this genial tone poem long since, but their peformance of it has never become perfunctory. The remaining item, the charming, if rather slight, Piano Concerto of Ravel, was played for the second time at the regular concerts, and, as at the Boston premiere in 1932, the pianist was Jesus Maria Sanroma. This is the music in which Mr. Sanroma excells. He responds naturally to the pronouncedly jazzy elements in the first and third movements and he handled beautifully the lyric flow of the Adagio. It was good to have Mr. Sanroma with us again, and there were many recalls for him and for Dr. Koussevitzky, in whose hands the orchestral part had also received its due, and a little more besides.

BOSTON HERALD, SATURDAY, OCTOBER 23, 1

MUSIC

Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, gave the third concert of its 68th season in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. Jesus Maria Sanroma, pianist, was the soloist. The program:

Toccata Concertante .... Irving Fine
Symphony No. 6 .... Vaughan Williams
Concerto for Piano and Orchestra
Ravel
Till Eulenspiegel .... Strauss

By RUDOLPH ELIE

After nearly five years (and it's five years too long), Jesus Maria Sanroma returned to his old place at the keyboard in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon and, with Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra in fine fettle behind him, stole the show in a brilliant performance of Ravel's piano concerto.

We shouldn't, I suppose, begrudge Mr. Sanroma those five years away from us, for he has been using them to achieve a reputation in South and Central America that far exceeds his reputation here and that, heaven knows, is impressive enough. But it was a pleasure to hear again his strong, clean-cut playing, to marvel at his extraordinary technic (who can do glissandi as perfectly as he?), and to wonder at his absolute command of rhythm whether it be the intricate cross rhythms and percussive beats of the finale or the gentle flow of the slow movement.

The Concerto itself is a gem. Although finished in 1932, two years too late to be performed during the 50th anniversary season of the Boston orchestra as Ravel intended it to be, few if any concertos written for piano and orchestra since have equalled it either as music or as entertainment. The first movement, liberally scattered with "blue" intervals, seems to lend credence to the oft-told story about Ravel and Gershwin.

It seems that Gershwin wrote to Ravel and asked if he'd consent to give him instruction in composition, inquiring what his fee would be. Ravel, so the story goes, replied with a query. "How much money do you make a year?" he asked. Gershwin wrote that he made about $100,000 a year. "In that case," replied Ravel, "I had better take lessons from you." However that may be, the fact is the first movement of Ravel's Concerto has a strong Gershwin flavor though, without being in the least cavalier to that talented composer, it is on a higher and more artistic level. The slow movement, with its serene opening for piano solo and its equally beautiful close for solo English horn (exquisitely played by Mr. Speyer, by the way), is marvelous, while the finale with its contrasting rhythms and capricious melody, is altogether captivating. Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra have seldom done a better job of accompanying a soloist, and all concerned got a hearty reception from the audience.

The concert opened with a brief but highly competent orchestral essay by Irving Fine, an assistant professor of music at Harvard, whose smaller works, heard hereabouts from time to time, are exceptionally graceful. The Toccata Concertante, on a more ambitious scale though still not quite sustained enough to prove much of anything, displayed a fine economy of style, a sure orchestral sense and an attractive though slightly dry melodic invention. Offhand I would say it is one of the better short pieces for orchestras, but it would be interesting to hear a longer work by Mr. Fine in a less academic vein.

I may as well confess to an appalling disinterest in the music of Vaughan Williams. The Fifth, or London, Symphony, I like very much. The Sixth, though it has some beautiful moments and some gifted writing for orchestra, as witness the closing of the first movement against the accompaniment of the harp just doesn't get to me. So, rather than prejudice the reader against it, I can only say that I recognize the artist at work and admire both his craftsmanship and his integrity, and that the flaw must be in me somewhere. It was, in any case, given a devoted reading by Dr. Koussevitzky, and it was very well received by the audience.

Richard Burgin conducts the orchestra next week, the program offering Brahms' Third Symphony, Poulenc's Concerto for Organ and Strings (E. Power Biggs, soloist) and Hindemith's Metamorphosis of Themes by Weber.

THE WORLD OF MUSIC

The Competition in Conductors Grows As NCAC Builds List to Twenty-six

By ROSS PARMENTER

HAVING more than sixty conductors under its management, Columbia Artists still dominates the field. But the handling of conductors is no longer as much a one-management affair as it used to be. National Concert and Artists Corporation, which had only seven conductors under its wings a year and a half ago, now has twenty-six. Among the eminent newcomers to the fold are Hans Knappertsbusch of the Vienna Opera and the Vienna Philharmonic, Victor de Sabata of Italy, who is coming to be a guest conductor of the Pittsburgh Symphony, and Fritz Reiner, who is managed jointly with S. Hurok.

NCAC manages most of the conductors of the Metropolitan Opera. In addition to Mr. Reiner, it has Fritz Busch, Fritz Stiedry and Emil Cooper, and recently it acquired Giuseppe Antonicelli and Thomas Mayer. Other additions in the last year include Frieder Weissmann, conductor of the Scranton Philharmonic; José Echaniz, who is starting his first season as director of the Grand Rapids Symphony; Issay Dobrowen, who has been conducting in Sweden, and the young composer-pianist Lukas Foss, who is planning a career as a conductor.

SPLIT: The four musicians who began playing together in 1942 as the Guilet Quartet have come to a parting of the ways. An ensemble with the same name, however, will continue in existence, for Daniel Guilet, the leader, has assembled three other musicians to join him. The new second violinist is Joseph Rabushka, the violist Rolf Persinger, the son of Louis Persinger, and the 'cellist Ralph Oxman. Two members of the old quartet, Frank Brieff, viola, and Lucien Laporte, 'cello, are forming a new quartet of their own. Jac Gorodetzky, the second violinist of the original ensemble, has been playing with the CBS Symphony APPRECIATION: Aaron Copland feels that John Kirkpatrick William Kapell, Leo Smit and Andor Foldes are the four pianists who have done most for his music. As a gesture of appreciation he has dedicated a Blues to each of them. The four pieces are being published simultaneously. In order not to play favorites, the composer plans to put a copy for each pianist in the same mail the day the Blues appear. The pianists will have to work it out themselves as to who will give the first performance.

PROVINCIAL: Bostonians did not turn out in any great numbers when the New York Philharmonic-Symphony, under Leopold Stokowski, recently visited their city. Symphony Hall was less than three-quarters full. Indeed, Boston music lovers have proved so consistently cold to visiting orchestras that Critic Rudolph Elie Jr. of the Boston Sunday Herald, afraid they might prove similarly chilly to the Orchestre National of France, felt called upon to berate them.

"It is a rewarding experience to hear other orchestras," he wrote, "and it is a provincial attitude in the least to fancy that our orchestra is so musically unapproachable that no other could possibly equal it."

SYMPHONY CONCERT

Another series of Sunday concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in the final year of Dr Koussevitsky's directorship, was begun yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall, with the capacity audience rising at both the beginning and end of the program to give the well beloved conductor enthusiastic and extended applause. The tribute was more than deserved for the performance of the Ravel transcription of Moussorgsky's "Pictures At An Exhibition" was probably the most vital and stirring that a Boston audience will hear for many a day.

Two other familiar works, both heard here previously in the season, were Vivaldi's Concerto in D Minor for orchestra with organ, and the Beethoven Seventh Symphony. Since each of these works was critically reviewed earlier in the month any detailed analysis of yesterday's performance would be superfluous. In general it should be noted that the orchestra, as well as the director, was in exceptional fine form, as both have been all season.

After recently listening to the thinner and less sensuous tone of the strings and brass of the Orchester Nationale in the same hall, the tonal effects yesterday seemed unusually opulent. In fact, any visiting orchestra, foreign or domestic, brings home the realization that the string tone of the Bostonians is unsurpassed.

This was most noticeable in the Vivaldi Concerto, the memorable work which Dr. Koussevitsky used to open both his first and 25th seasons in Symphony Hall. The ingratiating sound of all the strings, enhanced by the judiciously balanced support from the organ, made this work an aural delight.

The brass choir came in for its share of glory throughout "Pictures At An Exhibition." But the glowing success of this orchestral tour de force rested squarely on the amazing vitality, imagination and good taste which made up the unequalled Koussevitskian interpretation.

His reading of the Beethoven Symphony was once more brilliantly persuasive. The theatrical effect of the speed of the final movement is open to debate, but there is no question that it provides an exciting finish, and that the audience reacted as if it were nothing short of electric.

WASHINGTON, PA.
OBSERVER
OCT 22 1948

Monday Music Club Hears Report Of Music Festival

Mrs. G. Herschel Fetherlin entertained the members of the Monday Music Club at her North avenue home Monday night. A large number of members and guests were present.

President Mrs. C. Clyde Stone was in charge.

The evening's program was devoted to the consideration of the work done at the Berkshire Music Festival held annually in Tanglewood at Lenox, Mass. under the direction of Dr. Serge Koussevitsky with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The [illegible] of the program was a paper prepared by Mrs. Margaretta D. Stewart who attended the Festival. She gave a vivid account of the many musical activities which are contained in this very important phase of American musical life.

The paper first described the beautiful mountain scenery which forms the setting for the event and the historical background of the locality. She continued by telling of the great families of the early era and of the literary colony whose member, Nathaniel Hawthorn wrote "Tanglewood Tales".

Then following were brief sketches of the important musical personages who had feature roles in the past season's events. The programs this year ranged from the pure classics of Bach and Mazart to the ultra-modern compositions of Walter Piston, Darius Mil Laud, Stravinsky, Hindemith, and Aaron Copland. Dr. Koussevitsky has done a great deal to encourage the new composers and by [illegible]ng this he has given the musicians the opportunity of judging between the old and the new.

In the absence of Mrs. Stewart the paper was read by Miss Eva MacGinnis, program chairman.

Recordings of the First, Third and Fourth Brandenburg concerts by Bach were played after which Mrs. Lucius McK. Crumrine served as moderator for a discussion period.

During the brief business session the members voted to make a contribution to the Community Chest.

Oct 25 Herald

MUSIC

Sunday Symphony

The first concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Sunday afternoon series was given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall, Serge Koussevitzky conducting the following program:

Concerto in D minor for orchestra and organ .... Vivaldi
"Pictures at an Exhibition" .. Moussorgsky
Symphony No. 7 .... Beethoven

The capacity audience which had made its way through the rain yesterday afternoon to hear Serge Koussevitzky conduct the opening concert of the Sunday series was rewarded with a performance of the three choice and familiar works on the program that was nothing short of thrilling.

As at the first of the Friday concerts this year, the opening number was the classic Vivaldi concerto with which Koussevitzky began his first concert as leader of the Boston Symphony 24 years ago. The strict form of this work, the classic texture of the accompaniment and the strength and craft of the composer sprang to life yesterday in a beauty that seemed extraordinarily fresh and invigorating for a piece that is over two centuries old.

The "Pictures at an Exhibition," which was played at the second of the Friday concerts this year, also commemorates an anniversary. It had been orchestrated by Maurice Ravel only the year before Koussevitzky played it in his first season in Boston. The breadth and stature of the descriptive power of this music was yet more vivid in yesterday's performance than ten days ago.

The Beethoven Seventh Symphony made a brilliant second half for the concert. Every choir of the orchestra was at its best, and the splendor of the symphony shone in its heroic proportions from the first note to the last. The audience responded to the outstanding performance with warm applause.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
STAR
OCT 26 1948

Music . . . by Robert A. Hague

Howard Shanet to Conduct Queens Symphony Orchestra

When it opens its annual series of five concerts on Thursday, the Queens Symphony will have young Howard Shanet as conductor. Shanet is the Brooklyn-born lad who went to Tanglewood three summers ago to get a chance to conduct, with a smile from Koussevitzky with his performance of the first movement of Dvorak's New World Symphony, and an invitation from Leonard Bernstein to become his assistant at the NYC Symphony last fall. Earlier this year Shanet conducted the Broadway revival of Marc Blitzstein's opera, The Cradle Will Rock.

Howard Shanet

Equipped with a thorough musical education from Columbia University, where he was a Pultizer Scholar, he served as bandleader of the Iwo Jima Army Garrison during four and a half years in the Army; was apprentice to Fritz Stiedry, conductor of the Metropolitan Opera Company; has studied with Brohuslav Martinu, Aaron Copland and Arthur Honegger; and was once invited to Cleveland to be the only private pupil of Dr. George Szell, conductor of the orchestra there.

Shanet will open the seventh season of the Queens Symphony, an all-amateur, non-profit orchestra which was founded by a group of local residents to provide the opportunity of orchestral experience for nonprofessional instrumentalists and to offer the benefits of a musical scholarship to a talented student from Queens, who will be able thereby to continue his musical education.

* * *

A radical departure for a standard symphony orchestra is evident in the plans of the Louisville Philharmonic to build its season around the composer. For each of the six pairs of subscription concerts the orchestra, under Robert Whitney, has commissioned a composer to write a ten-minute work to be given its world premiere in Louisville. The six who have accepted commissions are Roy Harris; Darius Milhaud, French composer now living and teaching in the U. S.; Joaquin Rodrigo, the blind Spanish composer; Virgil Thomson, N. Y. Herald Tribune music critic and composer; Dr. Claude Almand, young teacher-composer of the University of Louisville School of Music; and Gian Francesco Malipiero, Italian composer. The Messrs. Thomson, Milhaud, Almand and Harris are scheduled to conduct the premieres of their compositions.

[181]

CONCERT

Sunday concerts
nony Orchestra,
Dr. Koussevitas begun yesmphony Hall, audience rising ng and end of the he well beloved
stic and extended ibute was more the performance cription of Mous-
s At An Exhibi-
y the most vital a Boston audience
y a day.

iliar works, both ously in the seai's Concerto in D ra with organ, and eventh Symphony.
se works was criti-arlier in the month lysis of yesterday's uld be superfluous.
ould be noted that s well as the direc-
ceptional fine form,
een all season.

y listening to the ss sensuous tone of brass of the Orchesn the same hall, the esterday seemed un-
. In fact, any visit-foreign or domestic,
the realization that e of the Bostonians is ost noticeable in the erto, the memorable

Dr. Koussevitsky used his first and 25th seaphony Hall. The in-nd of all the strings, the judiciously bal-from the organ, made aural delight.
choir came in for its throughout "Pictures ition." But the glow-of this orchestral tour
sted squarely on the ality, imagination and which made up the unusseviskian interpreta-ng of the Beethoven was once more brilliantly

The theatrical effect of the final movement debate, but there is no at it provides an excit-and that the audience
if it were nothing short

THE BOSTON SUNDAY GLOBE—OCTOBER 24, 1948

CHARD BURGIN, Concert-master and Associate Conductor of Boston Symphony, will direct sday's concert in Sanders Theatre and the Friday afternoon and Saturday evening concerts in Symphony Hall.

How the "National" Orchestra Differs From "International"

By CYRUS DURGIN

Last Wednesday's concert by the Orchestre National of Paris at Symphony Hall was a most interesting and unusual experience. In the first place it gave Bostonians an opportunity to hear French music performed by a French orchestra and interpreted by a French conductor. But more importantly it brought to mind how international we Americans are in our musical tastes and traditions.

Because we are a young country, music has been an importation with us. Our tastes have been founded on European art, and such traditions as we have were developed out of foreign sources. Now we are in the process of producing a native music, and we have made considerable progress. But in the meantime we have absorbed a good deal from practically all parts of Europe.

This is really an enviable position, because we have come upon the musical art of widely differing European cultures. Up to now the national lines of culture as well as politics in Europe have been closely drawn. Germans liked German music and not much French; the Italians were jealous of theirs, and France had her zealously fostered tastes in her own art.

Broader American Taste

I am told that even today Sibelius is never heard in Vienna, nor Mahler in Paris. This all reflects an exclusive national spirit. But with us the process has been entirely different. We have been offered German, Italian, Finnish, Austrian, French, Czech, Hungarian, Russian, English, Irish, Scottish and Swiss music. As a result the contemporary American probably has a wider acquaintance and a broader taste.

The internationalizing process has been just as true in the establishment of our symphony orchestras. First we imported musicians from Europe, and then we sent our own talent over there to be trained. Now we are training our own in this country. We have absorbed the French finesse with woodwinds, the round mellowness of German brass, and the French, Italian and German techniques and styles in the strings.

All this selection, together with manufacture of wind and percussion instruments in this country, has led to the evolution of what my friend and colleague, Warren Storey Smith, so aptly calls "the international orchestra." It has influenced the style of playing and the tone of our orchestras, which contain musicians of native birth and those of European origin.

The strictly "national" orchestra is unknown to us, except when a foreign organization comes on a visit. Thus it is a rare, enlightening experience to hear one such as the Orchestre National. It gives us a different slant on the ideal quality of orchestral sounds, on matters of interpretation and overall characteristics.

Differences in Tone

I can't say I'd like to hear that light and clear but dry French tone all the time, even in French music, but certainly it does put French music in a new light. A conductor's personality is more or less fixed and is not subject to change between one orchestra and another. Accordingly, the differences noted between Mr. Munch's appearances with the Boston and the Paris orchestras are a matter of performance rather than interpretation.

What will be most interesting, after he takes over at Symphony Hall, is whether gradually he will change the Boston Symphony tone. Some argue that he may be expected to shift it in the direction of that French quality. I don't think it will work out that way, because a conductor is limited in this respect by the racial background of the musicians before him, and also by the makes of modern instruments used. The French winds are constructed to give a lighter, shriller and brighter tone than German or American winds.

The Boston Symphony can benefit by the example of the Orchestre National in the matter of bells. At Symphony Hall they use tubular gongs which buzz and roar with jangling, tinny overtones so that you can barely hear the fundamental sound the composer wanted. The Paris orchestra used for Berlioz' "Fantastic" Symphony actual bells, with a beautiful fundamental note and practically no discordant overtones.

---

nd Saturday

Oct 30

SYMPHONY CONCERT

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

You can't exactly say that the current Symphony program, conducted by Richard Burgin, progresses from the sublime to the ridiculous. In his Third Symphony Brahms falls short of sublimity—which he didn't even attempt—and frivolous would be a better word for the remaining items, Poulenc's Concerto for organ and string orchestra, with timpani and Hindemith's Symphonic Metamorphosis of themes by Weber.

Both the Hindemith, which was done here a little less than four years ago under George Szell, and the Poulenc which was new to Symphony Hall, are good fun. Either would enliven and lighten up the ordinary symphonic program. The trouble is that they are so similar in mood and in their general approach that, as the expression goes, they kill each other. Mr. Burgin generally plans his programs more shrewdly.

These two works from contemporary hands are alike in their avoidance of the cryptic and dissonant, the dry abstractions that characterize so much modern music. Both the Frenchman and the Americanized German have aimed to please and have accomplished that purpose admirably. The respect in which the two works differ is that Poulenc's themes, though vaguely reminiscent, are his own, while Hindemith is manipulating the musical material of another, and with enormous cleverness and esprit. Those who expect to recognize the Weber themes will be disappointed. Except in the second movement they come from obscure compositions for piano duet, while this scherzo, which bears the title "Turandot," is based on the music for Schiller's play of that name (after

---

MUSIC

Oct 30

Burgin Conducts Boston Symphony in Pieces by Hindemith and Poulenc

By CYRUS DURGIN

Richard Burgin, the Boston Symphony Orchestra's able concertmaster and associate conductor, yesterday afternoon made the first of his appearances this season on the stand at Symphony Hall. He offered a program that included Brahms' Third Symphony and two virtual novelties: the Concerto for Organ, Strings and Tympani, by Francis Poulenc, and Hindemith's Symphonic Metamorphosis of Themes by Carl Maria von Weber.

The oldsters in the audience probably got more out of Brahms' F major Symphony, which came first on the program and was given a neat and musicianly but hardly exciting performance. Poulenc and Hindemith probably appealed more to the younger listeners, and to those who have begun to find that Brahms is getting a little like a comfortable hat or a pair of worn slippers.

Poulenc's Concerto, whose solo part was played by the estimable E. Power Biggs, is a thoroughly delightful and skillfully wrought piece. Unheard here, apart from a Cambridge performance some years ago, it has a solid but not a coarse texture in which the combination of organ and strings sounds better than usual and is given added zest by the timbre of the kettledrums.

It is full of tunes, as tunes are construed in the modern sense, with places in the slow section that remind you of Saint-Saens. It is very French music, which means a solid structure, logic in the ideas and clarity in their setting-forth and rhythmic vivacity. On the whole, it is inclined to be frivolous, which is welcome when done with such cleverness and good taste.

The performance seemed to go admirably, and Mr. Biggs, Mr. Burgin and the orchestra were thoroughly applauded. Poulenc himself was not present but he is expected to be on hand for the concert tonight, because he has just arrived in this country for a tour which will include a Jordan Hall appearance here Nov. 9.

The Symphonic Metamorphosis on three tunes from Weber's piano-four-hands pieces and one from his "Turandot" music, is the work of a modern orchestral wizard. It sounded well when introduced here by George Szell in 1945, and yesterday seemed even more engaging. You could say that here is an example of what a first-rate mind can do with utterly undistinguished themes, working them up into a nice fabric of sound, very tricky rhythmically in spots, syncopated to the point of jazz in others, and all the way full of motion and bustle.

Not by any stretch of the imagination is the Symphonic Metamorphosis important or profound, but it does have tension and excitement and is thoroughly interesting. Like Poulenc, Hindemith seemed bent on having a good time and giving one to his musicians and his listeners.

Mr. Burgin is to be thanked for presenting both these scores. The orchestra sounded very well the afternoon through.

MUSIC

Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Richard Burgin conducting, gave the fourth program of the 68th season in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. E. Power Biggs, organist, was the soloist. The program.

Symphony No 3 in F major, Op. 90.. Brahms
Concerto for Organ, Strings and Timpani Poulenc
Symphonic Metamorphosis of Themes.... by C. M. von Weber...........Hindemith

Hu Oct 30

By RUDOLPH

Taking it by and large this week's lively program is on the gay side. Certainly, after the Brahms, which opens the concert, there are few serious notes to be heard, either in Poulenc's Concerto for Organ, Strings and Timpani or in Hindemith's frequently comical Symphonic Metamorphosis of themes by Weber. It all turns out to be an enjoyable change of pace, and it certainly gives Richard Burgin an opportunity to demonstrate anew his executive authority as a conductor.

The Poulenc Concerto, given its first performance in town, is a curious piece of work no matter how you look at it. It has a little of everything in it, yet it doesn't sound too much like anything else or like anyone else. Once in a while you think of Saint-Saens (though fleetingly), but the composer keeps you so busy listening you don't have too much time to think about anything but that you like it.

For the fact is, it is Poulenc being Poulenc, which is to say it is filled with enough musical ideas to keep the average contemporary composer in thematic material for a decade, that it is witty, self-assured, unexpected, urbane, forceful and reposed . . . a peculiar assortment of contrary terms to apply granted, but somehow they seem to fit. Above all, the Concerto has momentum. Once begun, it pushes forward relentlessly, even the frequent passages of lyric repose having a driving force of their own.

The contrast of the static organ tone with the live sound of the strings and timpani is exceptionally interesting in this piece. As someone remarked, the opposition of the organ and orchestra is like a battle between two kings. Both reign supreme in their field, and when they meet head-on, as they do in this, it is a lively event.

Needless to say, E. Power Biggs, who ranks with the finest organists of the day, gave a magnificent and spirited performance while the orchestra, under Mr. Burgin's meticulous beat, sounded fine. There were also notable solo moments contributed by Samuel Mayes, the new first cellist, and Joseph de Pasquale, first violist. Mr. Poulenc, by the way, arrives from France by plane this afternoon and will be present at the performance tonight. Thus it is a happy coincidence this delightful work was scheduled for performance at this time, and it is to be hoped tonight's audience enjoys the Concerto as much as the Friday afternoon audience did.

Hindemith's Metamorphosis of themes by Carl Maria von Weber is nothing but a protracted musical joke. I find that I reviewed this piece on its first performance here, and I'm a little bit astonished to see that I gave it a very severe tongue-lashing. My general idea at that time was that its humor seemed to me cruel and unnecessary. I still think so, and I still feel that it is a conceit, a sophistication and an arrogance to deliberately pluck out a dead composer's corniest tunes and "hoke" them up as Hindemith does merely to show us that he is a very clever and a very droll fellow.

But it appears I have mellowed in the intervening years. For I see now that the joke is, after all, really on Hindemith and not on Weber at all, since Hindemith, no tunesmith, obviously has to resurrect somebody else's. So they might as well be Weber's and, to give Hindemith his due, he has unquestionably used them in an exceedingly comic way.

The concert opened with a remarkably unfussy (and so beautiful) performance of Brahms' strong but very tender Third Symphony. Every time I hear it I decided it is the best of the four . . . until I hear the others again. Mr. Burgin conducted it with a new feeling of spaciousness; he, like the Symphony, gets better and more accomplished with every performance.

Vladimir Horowitz returns next week to perform Rachmaninoff's Piano Concerto No. 3, the program (under Dr. Koussevitzky's direction) beginning with Prokofieff's Fifth Symphony.

[182]

ARTIFEX MAXIMUS

People who live by the sea grow to love the stark horizon line. In our world of time it speaks of eternity, it brings the infinite into our finite lives. For sixty-eight years we in Boston have dwelt beside an ever-sounding sea of music, and not we alone for the Boston Symphony Orchestra has become a possession for all our people and even in distant lands they hear that mighty ocean rolling evermore.

If it be asked what single institution has most sustained and enhanced the good name of Boston during this first half of the 20th century, the answer can only be our Orchestra. Its public numbers into the millions: they listen in the Hall, at Tanglewood, on the Esplanade, by radio, and to recordings; this Orchestra is the best there is, the greatest musical instrument that exists or ever did exist; it bears our city's name into the waste places and pours its golden floods of sound into thirsty ears, and minds, and hearts.

For the past quarter century this instrument has been wielded by Serge Koussevitzky. Like a Stradivarius violin which goes on improving under the hands of a virtuoso, the Orchestra has as steadily surpassed itself,

.. Till those who knew it best did marvel most ..

A hundred years ago, literature was the preeminent art-form in New England and in the United States, and New England led; a century later, the preeminent art-form of our epoch is music, and in its performance the preeminent instrument is the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Despite this city's private griefs and this century's public calamities,—two wars, a depression, an inflation, and spattered blots on the civic 'scutcheon,—how could the achievement of this institution go on calmly rising through change and through storm?

By those great Twin Brethern, to whom the Dorians pray, by those two deities who fight for us mortals and without whom no life is, by Faith and by Courage. They have reigned, and reign, in the foreground of podium and platform; they have wrought, and work, equally in the background with the management and from head to foot of the laboring staffs. In depression, in wartime, in postwar reaction, no one has doubted, no one has faltered, and the Orchestra has gone on sounding.

"Like a cresset true, that darts its beamy length
Of fiery splendor from a tower of strength."

In face of evil, affirm the good. Many things have failed us in these past thirty years, but not the Orchestra, not music. They abide; and to have in a community at one's elbow, accessible at will, a steady and living standard of the highest excellence, pouring to us the vision of greatness on its Niagaras of harmony and rhythm, makes possible a quality of work in other kinds which could not otherwise be done.

When all the evil of these years shall have gone down to dusty death, when all the vulgarity, filth, knavery, falsehood, injustice, treachery, crime, and bloodshed shall have wreaked their worst and joined the vague bruit of all our yesterdays, one good thing that will abide and outlast them all will be the indestructible eternities of beauty and joy created for us by these men of talent working with humble instruments of wood, catgut, horsehair, brass, and percussion—humble instruments, it is true, but, serving in the sanctuary where the spirit hovers upon the sightless couriers of the air, they are intermediaries between mortals and immortality. "How say you, then, would the heart of man once think it?—" No, for the Olympians ever move among us disguised as mortals; but those on whom their glances fall are moved to awe and wonder and they wist not that their faces shine.

Success Story: Goldovsky Begins Third Opera Season

By RUDOLPH ELIE, Jr.

Boris Goldovsky, a heavy red muffler wrapped around his neck in anticipation of December, stood on Huntington avenue across from the Conservatory the other day viewing in dismay his parked car. "You park right and look what happens!" he said, shrugging expressively at the double parkers who had hemmed him in. "Oh, well, they can rehearse by themselves for awhile," he added wryly. "I'll never be missed."

BORIS GOLDOVSKY, director of the New England Opera Theater, which opens its season at the Opera House this afternoon with a performance of Puccini's "La Boheme."

This happens to be one of the more gigantic understatements of the times, for the fact of the matter is that nobody would be missed more in our musical circles than Mr. Goldovsky if any other city did manage to lure him away from us. For, on the eve of the beginning of his new season of opera-theater (it begins this afternoon, for that matter, with a performance in English of Puccini's "La Boheme"), it is becoming more certain all the time that we have in our midst the one man who can give opera—a new direction—and make it stick.

A large statement, true, but opera as we know it today is doomed unless our government makes an improbable about-face and subsidizes opera, either in direct or in tax grants. (The Boston Symphony for instance, last year had a deficit of 30,000, but paid the government about $150,000 in taxes). The Metropolitan Opera Company's troubles this spring were no bluff; it meant what it said. Nor are its troubles by any means over. Maybe it can hold on another two or three years, but sooner or later it will close its doors for good. Opera, today, is an economic impossibility.

Labor of Love

It would be impossible for Boris Goldovsky, too, but for several important reasons. The first is that he is not dependent upon it to make his living, nor are the singing artists who work with him. He teaches, gives concerts, broadcasts, lectures, and carries out a daily schedule aside from his opera activities that would stagger most people. His singers also teach, give recitals, hold church positions or work as salesmen, clerks or secretaries. To them, in consequence, opera (which is to say the Goldovsky kind of opera), is a labor of love, but it must not be thought they are any the less professional for that.

The second reason is that in the three years the New England Opera Theater has been in existence it has won an enormous following of people who have been astonished to discover that opera does not have to be the vocally resplendent (sometimes!), but dramatically preposterous and scenically shoddy monstrosity that it has, in recent times, become. A lot of people have been lost to opera forever after having become interested through recordings, then ventured six or eight dollars a ticket on an operatic performance, only to be bowled over by the incredible theatrical nonsense on stage.

Living Narrative

Yet those who have seen Mr. Goldovsky's staging of Mozart's "Idomeneo" or Rossini's "Turk in Italy," have come away astonished. "The Turk," for example, attracted something like 55 newspaper and magazine critics from all over the country, in addition to capacity audiences—and for perhaps the first time in history not a single one of the critics had a nasty word to say. According to Mr. Goldovsky, he had a terrible time trying to pick out the best "quotes" for his advertising. How could anyone find fault when it had been so conclusively demonstrated that a century-old opera could prove itself as entertaining as a Broadway musical comedy and many times more rewarding musically?

Yet it is in this that Mr. Goldovsky's talents come so much to the fore. Had "The Turk in Italy" or "Idomeneo" been staged as they stood in their authors' original versions, they would have most certainly been monumental flops. What he did was tidy up their impossibly complicated librettos, rearrange their plot lines, omit some of the more obscure sub-plots. As they would say in the musical comedy field, he re-routined the shows—yet he retained the composers' music in every particular ave for a few transitional bars erhaps, in "The Turk," he has ever added a single note of music nor tampered with the musical scores in any way. The result has been opera that is a living narrative; opera in which music, story, acting, scenery and lighting combine in a musico-dramatic experience.

More than that, Mr. Goldovsky has given his singing artists and stage assistants an entirely new conception of operatic performance. He—and they—have found hundreds of 'boners' in the hoary old operatic tradition. In "Carmen" they found a whole passage that didn't mean anything at all (the incident it referred to had been cut and forgotten years ago and nobody had ever noticed—or cared—that it didn't mean anything); in "La Boheme" they found Mimi's traditional bonnet was foolish (she has previously said she keeps it under her pillow); and so on, ad infinitum.

Unheard of

But the new look in opera singing is best told in one of Mr. Goldovsky's star's experiences in a guest appearance with a "traditional" opera company. She had been so thoroughly trained in the role both from a musical and a dramatic point of view, and so thoroughly steeped in Mr. Goldovsky's unique rule that she should never look at the conductor, she nearly drove the other conductor mad. During the rehearsal of sextet in "Figaro" she was so busy acting the role the conductor couldn't get her attention despite the nudges and whispers of the other singers. Finally, he stopped them. "I really have to talk to you like a father," he said, "you must look at the conductor, my dear girl." "But I can't look at you," she said, "I'm singing to him, not you." "My God!" said the conductor, clapping his head, "it is unheard of in opera to look at the one you're singing to!"

It is unheard of, as a matter of fact, save in the New England Opera Theater, just as it is unheard of that opera can make sense as a dramatic event. Having come this far, and having attracted in the process a large and enthusiastic audience, there is no end to what our Mr. Goldovsky can do. So while it may be true that his artists can rehearse by themselves for a while without him, for him to say he'll never be missed is going a good deal too far. We need him here and we intend to keep him here, come hell or high water.

ENTERS HIS 25TH AND LAST YEAR

Koussevitzky Given Warm Greeting at Symphony

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Twenty-four years ago tomorrow there was an exciting Friday afternoon concert at Symphony Hall, the American debut, no less, of the Symphony Orchestra's new conductor, Serge Koussevitzky. Yesterday afternoon this great leader, now a beloved figure in Boston, entered upon his 25th and, sad to say, his final season. There is one consolation: we shall have him occasionally as guest.

HEARTY GREETING

At the first concert of the year it is customary for the audience to stand in greeting. The only difference yesterday was that this rite was of longer duration and that the handclapping was considerably heartier. Finally, Dr. Koussevitzky signified that enough was enough and turned to the first piece on the program, which was also the first piece on his initial program, Vivaldi's Concerto in D minor.

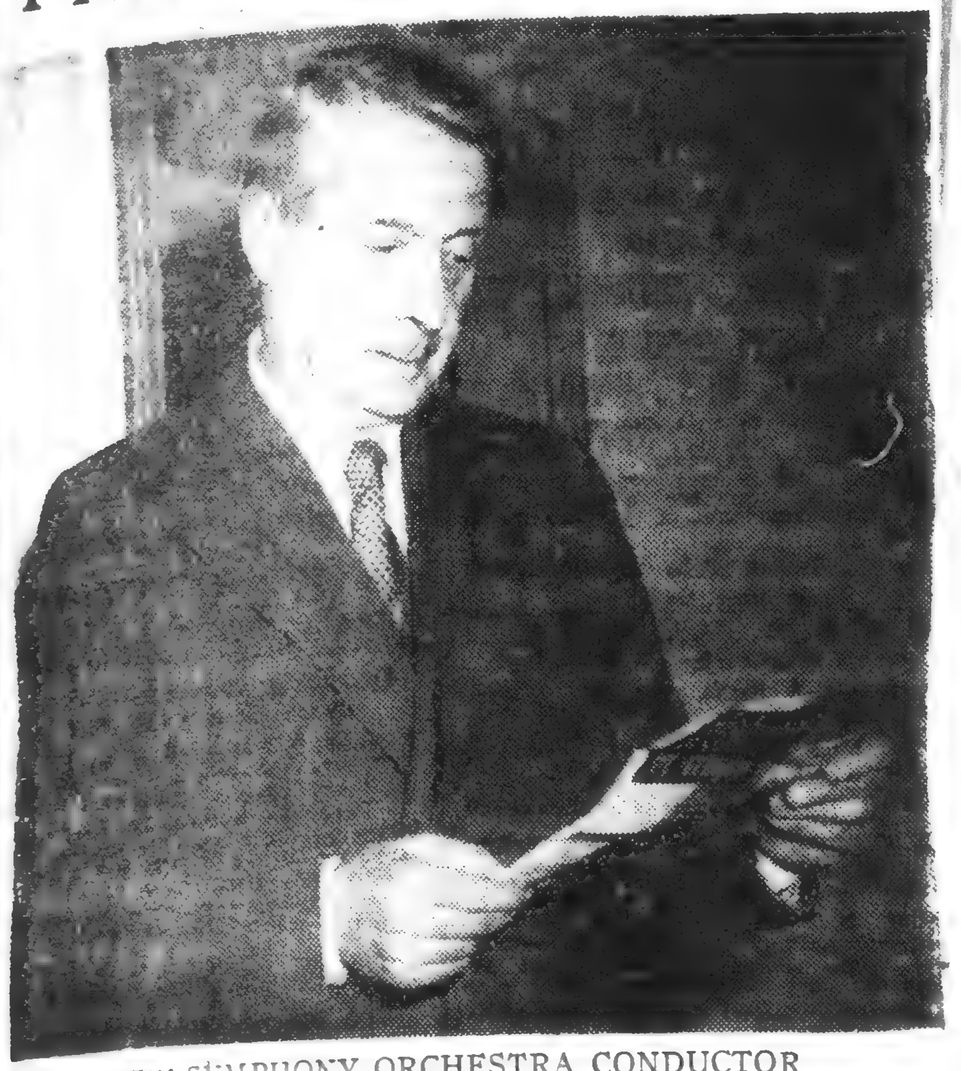
The next number on the original list, Berlioz' "Roman Carnival" Overture, was dropped, but the third item, Brahms' Variations on a Theme of Haydn, was retained. From here on sentiment lost out. No longer does Dr. Koussevitzky feel that Honegger's locomotive piece, "Pacific 231," is suitable material, and he replaced it with that composer's relatively recent symphony for Strings, heard in each of the past two seasons. Nor could he bring himself to perform Scriabin's "Poem of Ecstasy"; there must be something more substantial, and Beethoven's Seventh Symphony took its place. That first list was unquestionably on the junky side, but it did serve to show what the new director could do with an orchestra. You could sum it up as five pieces, and the one that was heard yesterday, and will be heard again this evening, as three pieces and a masterpiece, meaning, of course, the Symphony of Beethoven.

Vivacious Tempo

No doubt the Vivaldi and Brahms numbers sounded very much as they had 24 years before. However, the one is definitely period music, and the other is 24 years older than it was then. It begins to sound academic, and all Koussevitzky's magic could not redeem it from this taint of scholasticism, the beautiful seventh variation, and one or two others, aside. The Honegger Symphony is a fine work, the first two movements of which bespeak the sadness of Occupied France, in which it was composed, while the chorale at the end in which a trumpet (Dr. Koussevitzky uses three) may double the first violin, voices the hope of deliverance. It is an obvious trick and sure-fire. Yesterday's audience, like its predecessors, rose to it.

Although it was not to be predicted, the joyous seventh was the climax of the afternoon. Neither the Koussevitzky nor the Boston Symphony of 24 years ago could have duplicated precisely this inspired performance. The only flaw, if you wish to consider it so, was the conductor's tempo in the finale. As one of the younger listeners put it, if the orchestra had played any faster, it would have played itself right off the stage. Yet the excitement was undeniable, with the frenzies of music and performance reflected in the enthusiasm of the audience.

Charles Munch Leads French Orchestra Here



NEW SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA CONDUCTOR

Charles Munch, conductor of the Orchestre National of France, who will give a concert here tomorrow night. He will replace Serge Koussevitzky as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra next year.

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Charles Munch, who takes over the Boston Symphony a year from now, will not be guest conductor of that organization this season, as he was last season and the one before. That would hardly be a tactful arrangement. However, we have another and most welcome chance to take his measure (the first since his appointment was announced) when he appears at Symphony Hall tomorrow evening at the head of France's Orchestre National, now on its first visit to this country.

This orchestra, by the way, is relatively new, having been founded in 1934 at the instigation of the minister of mails, telephone and telegraph, but has rapidly risen to the first rank. Like England's BBC, it is primarily a radio orchestra, though during the season it gives two concerts a week before live audiences in the Theatre de Champs Elysees. Not since 1915, when the orchestra of the Paris Conservatory came here, have we heard a French orchestra. It will be an interesting experience, quite aside from Mr. Munch's participation in the concert.

Musically Alive

Mr. Munch and his 96 players, 15 of whom, including the first viola, are women, appeared last evening in Providence and they will play tonight in Northampton—their schedule calls for 41 concerts in six weeks.

Yesterday afternoon Mr. Munch flew over from New York and allowed himself to be interviewed at the Hotel Lenox by a group of newspapermen. He still has trouble with English, in which he took some lessons during his 10 free days last summer, and since the French of his combined questioners could hardly be taken for granted, Louis Speyer, the Boston Symphony's English horn player, acted for the most part as interpreter.

Mr. Munch has nothing of Dr. Koussevitzky's volubility. He does not yearn to express himself and, when prodded, does so briefly. In the course of the interview he recounted his activities of last summer, which took him to several European countries. He reported that music in France was rapidly getting back to the prewar basis. He explained that the Orchestre National was not coming here to show off, graciously adding that American orchestras are the best in the world, but that its visit was intended to convey France's gratitude for what the American people have done and are doing for the French and to demonstrate that the latter country is musically alive.

Promising Composers

Mr. Munch mentioned some promising French composers of the younger generation, Henri Baraud, Serge Nigg, one Martinez (whose first name I didn't get) and Olivier Messaien. Nevertheless, he will not play their music, nor that of any of their living elders tomorrow evening, but will feature instead a Toccata by the American Walter Piston, which he commissioned last spring. Otherwise, the program consists of Berlioz' "Fantastic" Symphony, Ravel's "The Tomb of Couperin" and Debussy's "La Mer." Tomorrow afternoon he has lunch with Dr. Koussevitzky who will, of course, attend the concert.

ON THE AISLE

Munch and French Orchestra Introduce Honegger Symphony in Distinguished Concert

By Claudia Cassidy

PERHAPS, WHEN HE COMES TO CONDUCT THE CHICAGO SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA next spring, Charles Munch will bring us that long delayed performance of Honegger's "Jeanne d'Arc." For he has a way of making his compatriot's music speak in the name of France, and how else should Joan be heard? Two seasons ago, as a guest in our midst, Mr. Munch made Honegger's Symphony for Strings so eloquently the voice of intransigeant France during the occupation it seemed to me "Antigone" in music. Yet when Ernest Ansermet repeated it a season later it was a symphony in strings, nothing more.

Concert by the Orchestre National of France, Charles Munch, conductor. Presented in Orchestra hall Saturday evening, Oct. 30, 1948. The program:

Overture, "The Corsair"........Berlioz
Symphonie Liturgique..........Honegger
(First performance in Chicago)
Toccata..............................Piston
(First performance in Chicago)
"Le Tombeau de Couperin"......Ravel
Suite No. 2, from the ballet,
"Bacchus et Ariane"...Roussel

What other conductors would make of Honegger's Symphonie Liturgique I have no way of knowing, but when Mr. Munch played it with the brilliant Orchestre National of France Saturday evening in Orchestra hall it was a heartbreaking piece of music, and you were not necessarily wool gathering if you suddenly found yourself remembering the glories of France.

—o—

As Honegger wrote the symphony in 1946 with Munch in mind as its conductor, and Munch considers it "man's revolt against the Higher Will and a final, voluntary, submission to it," perhaps his can be considered the definitive interpretation. Undeniably it is effective. The "Dies Irae" of the opening is a fearful day of wrath, the "De Profundis Clamavi" of the slow movement a personal liturgy, the "Dona Nobis Pacem" of the finale a militant prayer for peace—while the muted aftermath with the quiet song of the cello and the wraith of solo violin is acutely intimate, almost piercingly poignant.

—o—

That so complex and distinguished a score could be so revealed in one hearing was no less a tribute to the orchestra than to the conductor. Mr. Munch, who will follow the magnificent Koussevitzky next year in Boston, already has a wide American following for his eloquent musicianship and his undeniable charm.

The Orchestre National will find us waiting when it cares to return. This is a superb orchestra with exceptional freshness of tone, purity of intonation, and clarity of workmanship. Of its 96 players, 17 are women, and all, apparently, are artists. So remarkable is their work you are quite free to concentrate on the music.

—o—

This was by far the best concert of the young season and it will not be easy to displace. Walter Piston's brilliant Toccata, written for Munch, was beautifully played, and Ravel's suite in the manner of Couperin was perfection, with a special bow for the oboe.

None of this surprised a capacity audience given notice of a happy evening with Berlioz' "The Corsair," and disinclined depart even when that evening with the kaleidoscopic music from "Bacchus et Ariane" played for us by Mr. Munch two seasons ago.

Notes

"The Silver Whistle" has cut its Blackstone engagement to the three weeks of Theater Guild subscription and will spend that fourth week in Detroit..."Finian's Rainbow" sends wistful word it would like to come to see us, but so far has no theater lined up... What's this about London getting "Life With Mother" before Chicago? Lillian Gish, Percy Waram, and the Blackstone could turn the trick again in duplicating what is happening at New York's Empire with Dorothy Stickney and Howard Lindsay.

[184]

OUR FOOTLOOSE CORRESPONDENTS

KOUSSEVITZKY AT TANGLEWOOD

STOCKBRIDGE, MASS.

AT a time when American writing has come to be seriously menaced by the demands of the book clubs and the publishers for popular biographies and novels, and when noncommercial American painting depends mainly on a few New York galleries and the gamble of foundation patronage, it is surprising and reassuring to find, in the Berkshire Music Festival and the music school connected with it, a center of creative activity that is not merely surviving with difficulty but flourishing with conspicuous vigor.

The Berkshires have a cultural tradition, but it has been a sporadic one. In the middle of the last century, a number of writers came here, mostly from around Boston. Holmes spent several summers on a family estate near Pittsfield, and Longfellow came to board for the summer in a house that had belonged to Herman Melville's uncle. Hawthorne, in the early summer of 1850, rented, near Lenox, a little house on the estate of a rich family named Tappan. He wrote "The House of the Seven Gables" there; but he was annoyed by the variable weather, and his wife did not much like the "Red Cottage." He stayed only through the autumn of the following year, but he pinned on the Tappan estate the name Tanglewood, which he had invented for it in describing it as the background for his "Wonder-Book" and "Tanglewood Tales," those frigid retellings of the Greek myths assigned to an intolerable tutor named Eustace. Herman Melville came, also in 1850, to live in a farmhouse near Pittsfield, which he bought and called Arrowhead. He already knew the country, where as a boy he had visited the Melville house, in which Longfellow had stayed. He lived here for over thirteen years, and wrote "Moby Dick," "Pierre," and "The Piazza Tales," dedicating the second of these to Greylock, a mountain whose remote summit, rising above its nearer neighbors, he could see from the porch where he worked. Here he first met Hawthorne, at a picnic, and occasionally used to call on him. But, in spite of Melville's admiration for the writings of the older man, it cannot be said that their association had anything of Coleridge and Wordsworth. Both were solitaries; and Melville, returned from the sea, does not seem even much to have rejoiced in his family life. He eventually left, as had Hawthorne.

Other celebrities came and went; but Berkshire County, unlike Concord, which did have its organic intellectual life, remained fundamentally a place to which well-to-do people from Boston, ranging to the far end of their state, came to sit through serene summers. Later on, in the Big Money period, Lenox became a nesting place for millionaires. The mansion of Anson Phelps Stokes, which had a hundred rooms, was said, at the time it was built, to be the largest private house in the United States. Andrew Carnegie eventually bought it and died there. Not long after 1900, Edith Wharton moved to Lenox with her husband, in order to get away from the social routine of Newport and find better conditions for writing. She built a big, half châteaulike house, with Italian gardens and terraces, where, like Melville, she lasted hardly more than a decade, entertaining Clyde Fitch and Henry James, and paying visits to Charles Eliot Norton, who lived not far away at Ashfield. Of the impoverished natives in the hills, she brought away the grim impressions that she dramatized in "Summer" and "Ethan Frome." She says in her memoirs that she was happy here, but her great villa, with its high, white, stuccoed ceilings and its dark painted panels of flowers and fruit, though it today houses the senior class of the Foxhollow girls' school, has a desolate emptiness which one cannot help connecting with the lives of the very rich in the American early nineteen-hundreds that she describes in her novels of the period, as the cedars and the marble fountains have a bleakness that make one feel they could never have recalled Italy. In general, that whole gross era of extravagant expense and display seems to have barged into the Berkshire Hills only to founder there without leaving any permanent effects. The old, low, white New England houses of the Holmeses and of Melville's uncle (the last house now the Pittsfield Country Club) are still practicable as human dwellings; they have lived on, with their shrubbery and towering trees, from the post-Revolutionary past. But the millionaires' civilization seems as distant and dead as Pompeii. Already a number of its palaces have been demolished to escape paying taxes, and their great cellars, still strewn with debris, yawn spookily among decayed outbuildings, lawns reverting to meadows, and huge masses of hemlock and spruce. The Stokes place is now a Jesuit school. The residence of Mrs. Henry White, a gingerbread Tudor cottage on the scale of a summer hotel, has lately,

Calvert
LIFEBUOY
B.O.
GEM BLADES
BURMA SHAVE
BALLANTINE ALE and BEER
PHILIP MORRIS

as a matter of fact, been turned into a super-inn, which charges twenty-five dollars a day for one of the former masters' rooms, fifteen for one of the servants'.

AMONG these shells of both phases of Berkshire life, a new organism has taken root. Under the patronage of a Pittsfield lady, Mrs. Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge, there had been held in the summers, since 1918, a series of small chamber-music festivals in a hall built for the purpose at South Mountain. In the summers of 1934 and 1935, the composer Henry Hadley conducted three-concert festivals in a horse-show ring at Stockbridge. The next summer the three concerts were given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Serge Koussevitzky, and that autumn the inheritor of the Tappan estate, a music-loving lady, Mrs. Andrew H. Hepburn, had the idea of giving Tanglewood to the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to be used for a festival on a bigger scale. Koussevitzky, to whom the offer was made, received it with gracious thanks, but did not have any notion as to what it was proposed to give him. He had to go to Mr. George E. Judd, the manager of the orchestra. "Tanglewood?" cried Mr. Judd. "Every child knows what Tanglewood is!" The present was accepted with alacrity. A tent was put up for the concerts in 1937, but one of the evenings was ruined by a thunderstorm, which came on during a Wagner program and reached a climax with the "Ride of the Valkyries," with the result of rendering it inaudible, and Koussevitzky declared that thereafter he would have to have something more substantial. The funds were rapidly raised—twenty thousand dollars was promised by the audience that night—and a steel auditorium was built, which was ready the following summer. Koussevitzky then got a grant of money from the Rockefeller Foundation and added a theatre for opera and a chamber-music hall, and he established a music school to teach composing and conducting, orchestral playing, and choral and operatic singing. The old gray house on the place, built in the sixties, steep-gabled and narrow-porched, was used for the offices and studios of what was now called the Music Center; and Hawthorne's little red cottage, which in the meantime had been burned down, was reconstructed as a studio for Koussevitzky. The old-fashioned landscape gardening, with its dark, dominating trees, its huge, bushy hemlock hedges, its alleys roofed over with grape arbors, and its fine views of lake and mountain—the whole place is a kind of plateau—that sometimes give the impression of mid-nineteenth-century paintings, made a marvellous setting for music. The older and more natural grandeurs were perfectly adapted to the art to which their owner had desired to devote them.

The difference between the Music Center at Tanglewood and the earlier cultural activities of the region is significant of the changed role in which America has found herself figuring since the end of the last war. The old Lenox and Stockbridge and Pittsfield were New England and well-to-do: their writers and artists were people of leisure. But Tanglewood is international, seriously professional, and completely democratic. Among four hundred and sixty-two students this season, there are men and women from fifteen countries and from forty-two states, about a hundred and forty of whom have scholarships and about a hundred and twenty of whom are war veterans taking advantage of the G.I. Bill of Rights. No student of evident ability is refused because he cannot pay: if necessary, lodging and food are provided free of charge. The music that is played and sung is derived from a great variety of nationalities and schools and periods: European and North and South American. The teaching of composition is conducted by the American Aaron Copland, with whom is associated every year some other distinguished composer. The visiting instructors have included Hindemith, Samuel Barber, Honegger, and Milhaud. The audience comes from all over—one hears every sort of native and foreign accent—and represents a wide range of income levels, from the subscribers who pay fifteen dollars for a box seat at a series of three concerts to boys and girls who make pilgrimages with rucksacks from Boston and New York and pay a two-dollar admission fee to sit outside on the grass, where the music can be clearly heard. I met this summer a middle-aged businessman who had been flying on from Cleveland every weekend for the purpose of hearing the concerts, and I saw a party of young people, camped on the lawn on a blanket, who displayed a small sign on a pole reading, "Wanted: A Hitch to N.Y.C."

OVER the whole Tanglewood undertaking has presided the Russian-born Koussevitzky, whose artistic and human range makes possible for it the broadest scope. It has always been Koussevitzky's distinction that his genius is creative and educative, and that he has aimed to be something more than a brilliant and applauded conductor; and it has been his good fortune that private means have enabled him to act as a patron as well as an influential musician. In Russia, he backed Scriabin, when the latter was an avant-garde composer not yet well known, not only putting his music over by playing it at concerts but advancing him the money he needed to finish one of his more ambitious pieces; and, having acquired a publishing company, he brought out Stravinsky's "Petrouchka" and "Le Sacre du Printemps." In 1908, he set up a fund for the assistance of young composers. And from 1910 to 1914 he took an orchestra by boat down the Volga on a series of summer tours, giving concerts in all the provincial towns before audiences of which the members had sometimes never seen an orchestra. At his "Concerts Koussevitzky" in Paris, from 1921 to 1924, he played an immense amount of new French and Russian music: Ravel and the composers of "Les Six," Prokofiev and Stravinsky. Since he has been with the Boston Symphony, he has presented, in the course of his twenty-four years, more new music by American composers than any other conductor in America and has contributed at least as much to creating the reputations of Aaron Copland, Walter Piston, and Roy Harris, both by performing their music and by commissioning compositions by them, as he did in promoting those of the Russians. During Koussevitzky's first years in the United States, he does not seem to have taken much interest in the country: he delayed learning English and spent all his vacations abroad. But he applied for American citizenship in 1936, and the next summer made his first appearance at the Berkshire Festival. He had in the meantime come to think more highly of American musical training than he appears to have done at first, and he had been filling up the vacancies in his orchestra with American-born musicians in place of the foreign

This is the neu

FABULOUS and exciting...open-heai the new Greenbrier offers you ingr the easy informality of the sports cro chandelier blazes down on bare sho the background echoes the contrast.. historic Virginia wing against the cri
Draper decoration. You'll want to pla

Superb golf (3 courses)—Sam S
—5 Har-Tru Courts • Trail Rid heated pool • Meyer Davis Music

WHITE SULPHUR SPRIN

Edward T. Lawless, Vice President and General Man call in New York, BR 9-6347: in Chicago, I

as a matter of fact, been turned into a super-inn, which charges twenty-five dollars a day for one of the former masters' rooms, fifteen for one of the servants'.

AMONG these shells of both phases of Berkshire life, a new organism has taken root. Under the patronage of a Pittsfield lady, Mrs. Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge, there had been held in the summers, since 1918, a series of small chamber-music festivals in a hall built for the purpose at South Mountain. In the summers of 1934 and 1935, the composer Henry Hadley conducted three-concert festivals in a horse-show ring at Stockbridge. The next summer the three concerts were given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Serge Koussevitzky, and that autumn the inheritor of the Tappan estate, a music-loving lady, Mrs. Andrew H. Hepburn, had the idea of giving Tanglewood to the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to be used for a festival on a bigger scale. Koussevitzky, to whom the offer was made, received it with gracious thanks, but did not have any notion as to what it was proposed to give him. He had to go to Mr. George E. Judd, the manager of the orchestra. "Tanglewood?" cried Mr. Judd. "Every child knows what Tanglewood is!" The present was accepted with alacrity. A tent was put up for the concerts in 1937, but one of the evenings was ruined by a thunderstorm, which came on during a Wagner program and reached a climax with the "Ride of the Valkyries," with the result of rendering it inaudible, and Koussevitzky declared that thereafter he would have to have something more substantial. The funds were rapidly raised—twenty thousand dollars was promised by the audience that night—and a steel auditorium was built, which was ready the following summer. Koussevitzky then got a grant of money from the Rockefeller Foundation and added a theatre for opera and a chamber-music hall, and he established a music school to teach composing and conducting, orchestral playing, and choral and operatic singing. The old gray house on the place, built in the sixties, steep-gabled and narrow-porched, was used for the offices and studios of what was now called the Music Center; and Hawthorne's little red cottage, which in the meantime had been burned down, was reconstructed as a studio for Koussevitzky. The old-fashioned landscape gardening, with its dark, dominating trees, its huge, bushy hemlock hedges, its alleys roofed over with grape arbors, and its fine views of lake and mountain—the whole place is a kind of plateau—that sometimes give the impression of mid-nineteenth-century paintings, made a marvellous setting for music. The older and more natural grandeurs were perfectly adapted to the art to which their owner had desired to devote them.

The difference between the Music Center at Tanglewood and the earlier cultural activities of the region is significant of the changed role in which America has found herself figuring since the end of the last war. The old Lenox and Stockbridge and Pittsfield were New England and well-to-do: their writers and artists were people of leisure. But Tanglewood is international, seriously professional, and completely democratic. Among four hundred and sixty-two students this season, there are men and women from fifteen countries and from forty-two states, about a hundred and forty of whom have scholarships and about a hundred and twenty of whom are war veterans taking advantage of the G.I. Bill of Rights. No student of evident ability is refused because he cannot pay: if necessary, lodging and food are provided free of charge. The music that is played and sung is derived from a great variety of nationalities and schools and periods: European and North and South American. The teaching of composition is conducted by the American Aaron Copland, with whom is associated every year some other distinguished composer. The visiting instructors have included Hindemith, Samuel Barber, Honegger, and Milhaud. The audience comes from all over—one hears every sort of native and foreign accent—and represents a wide range of income levels, from the subscribers who pay fifteen dollars for a box seat at a series of three concerts to boys and girls who make pilgrimages with rucksacks from Boston and New York and pay a two-dollar admission fee to sit outside on the grass, where the music can be clearly heard. I met this summer a middle-aged businessman ones of whom it had been mainly composed. When he applied for his final naturalization papers in 1941, he told reporters that the United States was the land "where I have carved out my career in life. . . . This is where I want to spend the rest of my days, in an atmosphere of freedom and achievement. The old country is a thing of the past. The United States is the only country in the world today in which artistic and musical ability can find free expression." He added that the Bolsheviks had confiscated his property in 1918 and that the Nazis had now taken over his house in Paris.

This action of Koussevitzky's and the founding and success of Tanglewood have thus, to some extent, been brought about by the closing of the doors of music in other parts of the world. But the artistic self-confidence of the United States had, of course, been growing stronger ever since the early twenties, and the American musical groups that had been studying modern composers and cultivating native talent had long been preparing the way for the original work of the school; so that the fusion of Koussevitzky and the native movement in music has resulted in the vigorous growth, since 1940, of an American musical center of national and international importance. It is not merely that the various departments of the student activity at Tanglewood have been kept up, like the Boston Symphony, to a high standard of discipline and quality, that conducting is taught by Koussevitzky and the instruments by the men in his orchestra (with Gregor Piatigorsky giving instruction in chamber music this summer), that composing is taught by Copland, that the choruses are trained by Robert Shaw, and that the opera is directed by Boris Goldovsky, the director of the New England Opera Theatre, in Boston. But one feels, on the part of these teachers as well as on that of the students, pervading the whole place, a spirit of excited enthusiasm and a sense of satisfactory accomplishment.

A CONTRIBUTION of any sum, however little, to the organization known as the Friends of the Berkshire Festival admits you to all the student concerts, which take place almost every day and are hardly inferior in interest to the advertised professional concerts, for the students play their own compositions, which are sometimes quite remarkable, as well as a variety of classics, and the student chamber orchestra affords an opportunity to hear chamber music from Mozart to Schoenberg always competently, often admirably, played. For a visitor on a holiday, the Festival thus provides entertainment that seems inexhaustible. He can go to a concert every day, often twice a day; and the conditions for listening to music are, except in the event of rain, perfect. He does not have to storm the abrupt steps, to battle the glass doors and the evening clothes, as he does at Carnegie Hall, or to navigate funereal streets from which the snow, ice, and slush are never removed, as he does to get to Symphony Hall, in Boston—shutting out, in either case, with an effort the city whose buildings and traffic press like the sea on a diver's bell. Here on top of the Tanglewood hill, you can sit serene and unhurried, mind clear and nerves relaxed. The big "shed" in which the orchestra plays is open at the sides, and you can look out at great walls of trees—motionless except when an aspen glistens in a wind—that rise out of sight so that they seem to hang like tapestries of leaves and needles. The grounds are so extensive that, even at the best-attended concert, you are never uncomfortably crowded.

As for the programs, the present writer is not a music critic but a member of what one of the speakers at a Tanglewood benefit this summer called "the lay but indispensable public." Mindful of the stern admonition given me by Aaron Copland that "out of every two words about music written by a literary man, at least one will be the very last word that a musician would have chosen to apply," I can only give my layman's impressions, whose only possible value will be that of conveying to another layman the kind of thing he may expect.

On the more difficult modern side, then, this year, you had a cello sonata by Hindemith, written for Piatigorsky and played for the first time, which seemed to me mostly rather shadowy or crumbling away into holes like something in a painting by Dali. A chamber concerto, with solo violin, by Lourié traced a wavering outline, fragile and faint, like the thin thread of a twilight reverie. On the other hand, a Kammersymphonie by Schoenberg was last season one of the most striking events, unrolling and convoluting its sharp, dark sounds like shavings of steel in the morning air till they seemed to become more tangible than the instruments that were making the music. I am sorry that

I came too late this summer to hear the whole series of Bartók quartets played by the Juilliard String Quartet. I was told by an authority on modern music that the effect of these quartets was rather enhanced by a tendency on the part of the American musicians to swing the rhythms more markedly than the traditional strings would do.

At the opposite pole from all this are the resounding popular programs with which Koussevitzky seems to aim to please as many people as possible and the last of which drew this year, on a Sunday afternoon, a record audience of fourteen thousand seven hundred people. I did not much look forward last year to hearing Ravel's "Bolero," and did not much look forward this year to an all-Tchaikovsky evening, which consisted of the "Pathétique" Symphony, the First Piano Concerto, and the "1812" Overture; but when Koussevitzky brought them to life, rescuing them from banality, with all his resourceful musicianship and his dramatic imagination, I was probably as much thrilled by them as anybody. Leonard Bernstein, Koussevitzky's pupil, has also his enthusiastic following. It seemed to me that this young man had very much improved since last year. There were only a few moments this season when, conducting as he does without baton, he gave the impression a little of doing an interpretative dance to the music rather than of guiding the orchestra. He took on the Second Symphony of Mahler, of which I hope it is not vulgar to say that it has everything in it but the kitchen stove, with its vast orchestra and fancy percussion, its chorus and its female soloists, and its offstage passages for which groups of brass have continually to be going out to contribute little semi-detached episodes, one of which gives rise to the illusion that there is a cabaret next door. This symphony takes most of the afternoon: it makes one feel that one has lived it like a lifetime. But Bernstein had studied it with care, and he put the whole thing through with delicacy, variety, and energy. He made it more interesting than I ever remember to have heard a Mahler symphony made before. And though in Strauss's "Don Quixote" the sheep and the wind machine and all the literary paraphernalia of the tone poems of the turn of the century seem irrelevant today and a bore, the Don Quixote voice of the cello, in the hands of Piatigorsky, spun out finely the slow residue of sweetness that always made the real enchantment of the Bavarian brewer's grandson. The effect of the blitz on Vaughan Williams was Trovatore" this summer, and last summer copious excerpts from "Don Carlos" and "Traviata"—came out particularly well, partly, I suppose, because Verdi cannot fail to be dramatic and lively, but also because the young singers are able to bring to these old pieces a freshness that makes one forget the trappings of the traditional opera house, of which they have come to be almost as much the furniture as plush curtains and gold prosceniums, and even make one hear the music with new ears.

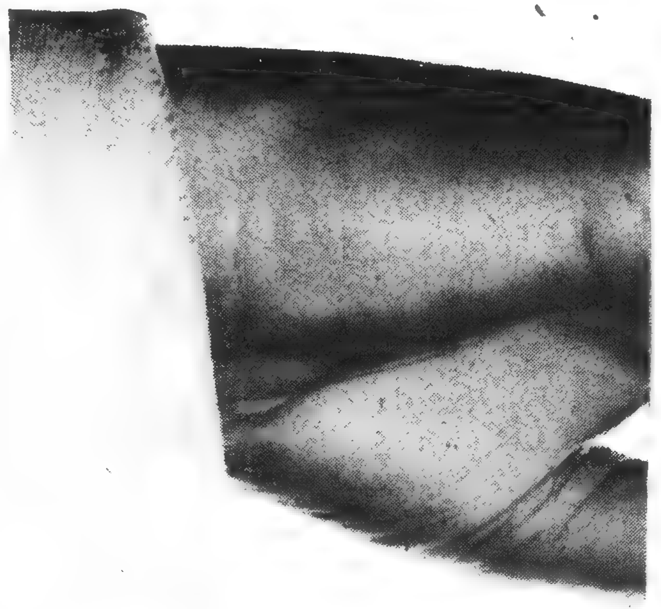
Mr. Goldovsky deserves so much credit for his work with these students and their operas that I feel a little ungrateful in complaining of what I feel to be the only detail that may be considered out of place at Tanglewood. It has been Mr. Goldovsky's custom to appear at one side of the stage and deliver a little speech before every raising of the curtain. Now, these speeches are sometimes informative, but they occasionally defeat their purpose, when Mr. Goldovsky, whose knowledge of opera plots is evidently encyclopedic, tells a good deal more than is necessary and ends by confusing his hearers. What is worse, he gives somewhat the effect, partly intentional, but partly, because of his imperfect accent, probably unintentional, of appearing as a comic monologuist. He is invariably applauded with laughter by a certain proportion of the audience, who seem to think they are witnessing a revue; but his effect on some of the rest is to set their teeth on edge. His jokes are by no means on a level with his admirable staging of opera, and we could dispense with his improvised pleasantries, especially when repeated the third or fourth time, on triangular situations, apropos of the fountain scene from "Pelléas et Mélisande," in which Mélisande drops her wedding ring into the water. I do not know how a worse introduction could have been made to this dialogue of thin beaten gold, which was plausibly impersonated and charmingly sung by Mr. Robert Rounseville and Miss Janet Hayes. (Miss Hayes, who sang three of the "Fêtes Galantes" at another of the student concerts, has the sense and the tone of Debussy.) One would also be glad to dispense with Mr. Goldovsky's politics. The plot of "Idomeneo" is concerned with a king of Crete who, caught by a bad storm on his way home from the Trojan War, invokes the intervention of Neptune at what turns out to be a disastrous price. Mr. Goldovsky, if I understood him, attempted last summer to connect this legend with the

this Mary



Brewed in MARYLAN
In limited quantities...
Aged in MARYLAND,
Slowly and leisurely...
With the magic of MARYLAN
In every golden sip—
For lovers of good living
Wherever they may be!

"Maryland's Master

High-spots on KL
Royal

★ You know them c
★ Can you name

Leave New York, via KLM's Royal Route . . . next day see one of Europe's most famous landmarks!

Out where "the dawn comes up like thunder" . . . Batavia bound KLM passengers glimpse this giant Buddha!

KLM's Royal Route is a skyway l sands of miles than twice the dist globe! Each day, above the grea continents, KLM passengers loo such famous landmarks as these.
ride to half a hundred different des all enjoy the same, superb Royal Ro all fly with the confidence inspired Oldest Airline!

FROM NEW YORK: Daily Flights to ALL EU
FAR EAST, SOUTH AFRIC
FROM MIAMI: Daily Flights to JAMAIC
WEST INDIES, AND VENE

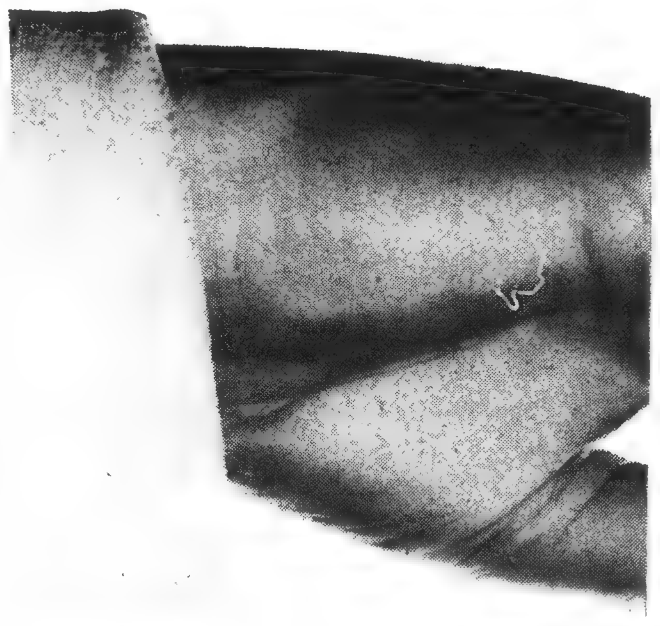
K·
ROYAL DU

See your local travel agent or KLM Royal Dutch
2-4000. Other KLM offices in Washington, D. C., Mia

I came too late this summer to hear the whole series of Bartók quartets played by the Juilliard String Quartet. I was told by an authority on modern music that the effect of these quartets was rather enhanced by a tendency on the part of the American musicians to swing the rhythms more markedly than the traditional strings would do.

At the opposite pole from all this are the resounding popular programs with which Koussevitzky seems to aim to please as many people as possible and the last of which drew this year, on a Sunday afternoon, a record audience of fourteen thousand seven hundred people. I did not much look forward last year to hearing Ravel's "Bolero," and did not much look forward this year to an all-Tchaikovsky evening, which consisted of the "Pathétique" Symphony, the First Piano Concerto, and the "1812" Overture; but when Koussevitzky brought them to life, rescuing them from banality, with all his resourceful musicianship and his dramatic imagination, I was probably as much thrilled by them as anybody. Leonard Bernstein, Koussevitzky's pupil, has also his enthusiastic following. It seemed to me that this young man had very much improved since last year. There were only a few moments this season when, conducting as he does without baton, he gave the impression a little of doing an interpretative dance to the music rather than of guiding the orchestra. He took on the Second Symphony of Mahler, of which I hope it is not vulgar to say that it has everything in it but the kitchen stove, with its vast orchestra and fancy percussion, its chorus and its female soloists, and its offstage passages for which groups of brass have continually to be going out to contribute little semi-detached episodes, one of which gives rise to the illusion that there is a cabaret next door. This symphony takes most of the afternoon: it makes one feel that one has lived it like a lifetime. But Bernstein had studied it with care, and he [illegible] the whole thing through with delicacy, variety, and energy. He made it more interesting than I ever remember to have heard a Mahler symphony made before. And though in Strauss's "Don Quixote" the sheep and the wind machine and all the literary paraphernalia of the tone poems of the turn of the century seem irrelevant today and a bore, the Don Quixote voice of the cello, in the hands of Piatigorsky, spun out finely the slow residue of sweetness that always made the real enchantment of the Bavarian brewer's grandson. The effect of the blitz on Vaughan Williams was

this Mary



Brewed in MARYLAN
In limited quantities...
Aged in MARYLAND,
Slowly and leisurely...
With the magic of MARYLAN
In every golden sip—
For lovers of good living
Wherever they may be!

"Maryland's Master

possible use of the atomic bomb against the Soviet Union.

One of the features of the performances of the opera department this year was the third act of a new opera by the Russian Grechaninov, based on a comedy by Gogol. I did not find it very exhilarating, but Grechaninov, an old-fashioned composer, once popular in czarist Russia, is eighty-four years old, and it is typical of the hospitality of Tanglewood to all vintages and brands of distinction that it should give his latest work a hearing. Grechaninov was present in person, much more youthful-looking than one might have expected, and it was pleasant to see him sitting jauntily outside an antique store on the main street of Lenox, on an old white wrought-iron bench, with an old white iron dog crouching on either side, and to think of his having written at eighty a comic opera on a classical Russian theme. If you wanted to compare czarist music with the development of talent under the Soviets, you could hear, a few nights later, Prokofiev's recent suite for "Romeo and Juliet" (by no means the worst, however, of the jobs he has knocked off since his return to Russia), and one could compare this to his First Violin Concerto, composed in 1913, which had been played a few days before.

In enumerating the attractions of the Berkshire Festival, one ought not to fail to mention that there is also an annual Dance Festival at Jacob's Pillow, only a few miles away. There was so much going on at Tanglewood that I was able to see only one performance, which consisted of a revival of some of his old numbers by the veteran Ted Shawn, director of the summer dance school in connection with which the festival is held, episodes of classical ballet danced by Nikita Talin and Natalie Krassovska of the Ballet Russe de Monte Carlo, and some brilliant pantomime skits and parodies of ballet by a young woman named Iva Kitchell, who perhaps has possibilities as a pantomimist beyond the material she is now exploiting. These performances are on a more modest scale than those of the Music Festival, but this one was well worth seeing and, like everything done in the Berkshires, seemed to gain a telling clarity from the quiet and leisure in which one enjoyed it.

THE invasion of Lenox and Stockbridge by this flooding of musical life has in some quarters been welcomed by the inhabitants, but in general one gets the impression that the natives as well as the summer residents are rather put out by the appearance of so many strange people, so much busier about what they are doing than rural New Englanders usually are, and evidently enjoying the stimulus of some source of inspiration which the townspeople do not understand. The rapacity with which the hotelkeepers and others attempt to exploit these outsiders is amusingly combined with an instinct to make things uncomfortable for them and to give them their less-than-money's-worth in as grudging a way as possible. But this, too, is characteristic of the present situation of the United States confronted with its new responsibilities as an international power. One could wish that these responsibilities were elsewhere as adequately met as they have been at Tanglewood. That both talent and the general public will appreciate a top-notch leadership has been strikingly demonstrated here. As you walk back to Lenox from Tanglewood after one of the big concerts, you are reminded by the hiss and crash of departing cars and buses that this, as the voice of their era, is what Koussevitzky has to compete with, with his few concentrated moments of sweet and subtle sound. But the occupants of these vehicles have come here to listen to his orchestra—the old ladies from the obsolete mansions, the youngsters who have no cars getting rides with the young married couples who have and who have come here on their vacations; and tonight these mechanical horsepowers have had to hush their huffings and puffings while their owners sat quiet in the Tanglewood shed and heard what the orchestra had to say.

—EDMUND WILSON

•

GENT, 39, honest & sincere, wishes meet lady, 30 to 42, arthritis, diabetes, infantile paralysis no drawback.—Adv. in the Los Angeles Examiner.

How do you know?

•

SAWDUST BURNER, $10; gas range, $15; washing machine, $25; bird cage, $4; tea table, $5; baby cart, $4; baby, $15; radio cabinet, $45. 519 SE 36th av.—Portland (Ore.) Shopping News.

Very attractive list, we call it.

•

WORDS OF ONE SYLLABLE DEPT.

[Adv. in the Friends' Intelligencer, a Quaker weekly]

FRIENDS' ACADEMY
Locust Valley, Long Island
Coeducational, with special opportunities for boys.

Poulenc Music for Week-End Symphony—Art News

Preview of Organ Concerto, With Strings and Timpani

Francis Poulenc's Concerto in G minor for Organ, Strings, and Kettledrums, will be heard for the first time in Symphony Hall when the Boston Symphony Orchestra gives its [illegible] concert of the present season tomorrow afternoon and Saturday evening. E. Power Biggs will be the organist; Richard Burgin will direct the program.

Poulenc is one of "Les Six" of France — the group of musical and esthetic rebels who recoiled from Debussy's impressionism and Franck's romanticism. They exploited fresh idiomatic material, including jazz. This "Société des nouveaux jeunes" considered custom and convention anathema. Besides Poulenc, the group was made up of Milhaud, Honegger, Taillefère, Durey, and Auric.

Poulenc completed this concerto in 1938. It was first performed in 1941 at the Société des Concerts of the Paris Conservatory. Charles Münch conducted, with Maurice Durufle at the organ.

* * *

Later that year E. Power Biggs (who will play it this week end) was the soloist for the American Première of the score at the Germanic Museum of Cambridge. He also played two subsequent performances at the museum, one on July 25, 1943, conducted by Arthur Fiedler, and the other on Oct. 17, 1945, led by Bernard Hermann. Both performances were broadcast by CBS.

Cherles Münch directed the New York Philharmonic in a performance of Poulenc's Concerto on Jan. 25, 1947. Louis Biancolli, in his program notes written for this occasion, describes the character of the work as follows:

"Though in one movement, the Concerto easily falls into four divisions. The first section is an Allegro giocoso (sportively), introduced by a brief Andante; the second, an Andante moderato; the third, an Allegro molto agitato. A short passage, marked Trés Calme, serves as a bridge to the fourth section, which returns to the Allegro giocoso of the opening section and then ends slowly in the mood and manner of the introduction.

* * *

"All four sections are built from a germanic four-note idea curiously echoing a common figure of eighteenth-century music. In fact, the opening phrases contain what seem to be deliberate allusions to Bach's G minor Fantasy, as if Poulenc, writing for the organ, felt impelled to pay homage to the master.

"The four-note pattern passes through many keys and alters frequently in ascending and descending sequences, giving the concerto a kind of cyclic unity. The voice of the organ is interwoven with that of the orchestra, though it frequently plays a marked role as solo instrument.

"The kettledrums function rhythmically and thematically, often emphasizing and crystallizing the recurring four-note groups and adding vibrant accents to the brasses. The closing phrases, with their hints of sad and mystical introspection, suggest that Poulenc, in 1938, felt a premonition of the tragic days ahead for France."

Poulenc and his compatriot, Pierre Bernac, baritone, will be in Boston for a joint recital on Tuesday evening, Nov. 9, in Jordan Hall. In addition to some of Poulenc's works, their program also includes Schubert Lieder and compositions of Roussel, Chausson, Satie, Debussy, Milhaud, Chabrier, Fauré, Lully, and Monsigny.

Francis Poulenc, pianist and composer, and Pierre Bernac, baritone, who are giving a joint recital in Jordan Hall on Tuesday evening, Nov. 9. Mr. Poulenc's Concerto for Organ and String Orchestra, with Timpani, will be played at this week's Boston Symphony concerts.

E. Power Biggs, soloist at this week's Boston Symphony concerts in Poulenc's Concerto for Organ and String Orchestra, with Timpani.

Pictures at Symphony Hall

On view at Symphony Hall until Nov. 27 is a loan exhibition from the Springfield Museum of Fine Arts. The pictures may be seen during concert times, and on Saturdays from 10 until 1 o'clock.

The display consists of a selection of contemporary American paintings from the permanent collection of the museum. Some of the pictures represent the choice of the public, through the casting of ballots; others have been acquired through the careful consideration of the museum staff. It is a good representation.

The paintings range from the twentieth-century brand of classic to the multiple types of romantic. Among the pictures we find some good sound naturalistic portraiture, some satirical portrayals, a good deal of landscape, and variations of surrealistic fantasy.

Two canvases show the American orientation toward abstraction: "Lilacs," by Karl Knaths, and "Western Sea," by Lyonel Feininger. Both these artists are men with an understanding of the function of abstract design. However, Mr. Feininger has reduced the imagery of ships, sky, and sea to a subtle succession of intersections of carefully placed lines. Mr. Knaths has built up a structural pattern from the natural contours of the blossoms. In both artists we perceive the geometric preference of the abstract artist who resolves everything he sees into angles, rectangles, cubical or spherical shapes.

A composition by Charles Sheeler shows another manner of handling clear and sharply delineated geometrical surfaces. An artist like Robert Gwathmey operates toward abstraction in a freer, more fanciful way.

Other pictures in the exhibition reveal American artists working in a studied primitivistic manner. It is interesting to see a conscious provincialism, for example, of a Margit Varga compared with a sophisticated simplicity such as that of Philip Pieck. The landscapes range from shadowy atmospheric characterizations to a neat and sharply defined realism. The portraits include the brooding "Man with Fruit," by Julien Binford; muscular "Japanese Wrestler," by Henry Lee McFee, and woeful "The Weary," by Henry Koerner.

Other pictures are by Giglio Dante, Carl Hall, John Koch, Georgia O'Keeffe, Walter Stuempfig. One of the most interesting canvases is "Church Supper," by Paul Sample, in the category of the Grant Wood satires of American rural life.

D. A.

PORTLAND, ME.
EXPRESS

NOV 4 - 1948

Koussevitzky Fund

Boston, Nov. 4. (UP)—A $250,000 Koussevitzky anniversary fund will be established in honor of Serge Koussevitzky, who is retiring this season after 25 years as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

LAWRENCE, MASS.
TRIBUNE

NOV 4 - 1948

WILL ESTABLISH ANNIVERSARY FUND

BOSTON, Nov. 4 (UP) — A $250,000 Koussevitzky anniversary fund will be established in honor of Serge Koussevitzky, who is retiring this season after 25 years as conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra.

The orchestra's trustees announced yesterday the fund will be used "without restrictions for cultural and educational development by the orchestra and as a cushion against emergencies."

FALL RIVER, MASS.
HERALD-NEWS

NOV 4 - 1948

KOUSSEVITZKY FUND

BOSTON, Nov. 4. (UP) -- A $250,000 Koussevitzky anniversary fund will be established in honor of Serge Koussevitzky, who is retiring this season after 25 years as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The orchestra's trustees announced yesterday the fund will be used "without restrictions for cultural and educational development by the orchestra and as a cushion against emergencies."

Symphony Trustees Set Up $250,000 Koussevitzky Fund

In tribute to Serge Koussevitsky's distinguished leadership of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for 25 consecutive seasons, a Koussevitsky Anniversary Fun of a quarter of a million dollars is to be established. The details have been announced by the orchestra's trustees. The sum asked is for use, without restrictions, for cultural and educational development by the orchestra, and as a cushion against emergencies. It is to be a revolving fund in the sense that any withdrawals in any one year are to be restored as soon as practicable. The trustees consider the Anniversary Fund as a prudent step in "long term planning."

Henry B. Cabot, president of the trustees, has stated in a communication to the Friends of the orchestra: "For 25 years our orchestra has ben under the inspired directorship of Serge Koussevitsky. It is proper that we who enjoy the concerts of our orchestra and take pride in its continuing success should seize this occasion to record in tangible form our appreciation of Dr. Koussevitzky's magnificent contribution to the fame of our historic institution. It is hoped many others will care to join us in paying tribute to a worthy conductor who has served us so long and with such integrity and devotion. It is his desire that any such expression should take the form of a gift to the orchestra."

"In a letter to Mr. Taft, as chairman, Dr. Kouussevitzky, whose present season is his last as the orchestra's conductor, has warmly endorsed this plan: "I would consider it the finest of all personal tributes if my friends should take this occasion to give convincing proof this splendid orchestra, to which I have devoted my best efforts for nearly a quarter of a century, shall never flounder or fall through lack of adequate financial support."

The headquarters of the Koussevitzky Fund will be located at Symphony Hall, Boston, and it is suggested all communications con-

---

HANOVER, PA.
SUN

NOV 6 - 1948

In tribute to Serge Koussevitzky's distinguished leadership of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for twenty-five consecutive seasons, a Koussevitzky Anniversary Fund of a quarter of a million is to be established. The details have been announced by the orchestra's trustees. The sum asked is for use without restrictions for cultural and educational development by the orchestra, and as a cushion against emergencies. It is to be a revolving fund in the sense that any withdrawals in any one year are to be restored as soon as practicable. The trustees consider the Anniversary Fund as a prudent step in "long term planning."

Henry B. Cabot, president of the trustees, has stated in a communication to the Friends of the Orchestra: "For twenty-five years our orchestra has been under the inspired directorship of Serge Koussevitzky. . . . It is proper that we who enjoy the concerts of our orchestra and take prize in its continuing success should seize this occasion to record in tangible form our appreciation of Dr. Koussevitzky's magnificent contribution to the fame of our historic institution. It is hoped that many others will care to join up in paying tribute to a worthy conductor who has served us so long and with such integrity and devotion. It is his desire that any such expression should take the form of a gift to the orchestra."

In a letter to Mr. Taft, as chairman, Dr. Koussevitzky, whose present season is his last as the orchestra's conductor, has warmly endorsed this plan: "I would consider it the finest of all personal tributes if my friends should take this occasion to give convincing proof that this splendid orchestra to which I have devoted my best efforts for nearly a quarter of a century shall never flounder or fall through lack of adequate financial support."

* * *

SYMPHONY CONCERT

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

The current Symphony program is one of those all-Russian affairs to which we have become so accustomed during Dr. Koussevitzky's tenure of office. At the outset of the season the conductor declared that in this, his final year, he would revive works, or performances of them at the hands of certain soloists, that have proved particularly successful. Thus this week he is repeating the important Fifth Symphony of Prokofieff, which had its American premiere in Symphony Hall three years ago and was heard again five weeks later. The other item, the Third Concerto of Rachmaninoff, with Vladimir Horowitz as the pianist, is there to recall the fact that Mr. Horowitz made his Boston debut in this same work 20 years ago.

The Prokofieff Fifth is indeed a fine symphony. It is well made; it moves on a dignified plane; its themes are both strong and agreeable; it has its moments of real beauty, of charm and of excitement. Yet you cannot help wondering whether Prokofieff could have written an even better symphony if he had left Russia, as Stravinsky did, and allowed his great native talent to develop naturally. There is in this symphony a notable lack of adventurousness, which must be directly attributed to the fact that Soviet composers are not supposed to write anything beyond the comprehension of the average listener.

It has even been suggested that the real arbiter is Stalin himself and that Uncle Joe has a tin ear, or, to put it more politely, an ultra-conservative taste in music. Apparently, Prokofieff's Sixth Symphony, as yet unheard in this country, is one of the things that got him into trouble with the central committee of the Communist party. That, as far as the rest of the world is concerned, should be something in its favor. When are we going to get it?

The combination of Mr. Horowitz and the Rachmaninoff Third is unbeatable. Yet Mr. Horowitz can make a success without it, while the Concerto badly needs him, as was proven no less than a year ago when the excellent Mr. Malcuzynski conspicuously failed with it. At the time you were chiefly conscious of the poor quality of much of the music, an impression by no means absent yesterday afternoon. But with his extraordinary technical ability and with Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra to help, the amazing Horowitz once more put it over. The audience's enthusiasm at the end can be better imagined than described.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 6,

MUSIC

Vladimir Horowitz Is Symphony Soloist and Wins Terrific Ovation

By CYRUS DURGIN

Vladimir Horowitz received one of the most terrific ovations in memory when he had finished playing the Rachaminoff Third Piano Concerto with the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon. He was summoned back to the stage time and again as the audience stood in Symphony Hall, applauding, stamping, even cheering and whistling. The ovation was thoroughly deserved, for the Russian-born pianist had just given an electrifying performance of one of the most effective show pieces in modern repertory.

Actually that is all the Rachmaninoff D minor Concerto amounts to. As music it is episodic and spreading and, like Stephen Leacock's horseman, gallops off in all directions. But for sheer virtuosity, for miracles of keyboard thunder and technic, for romantic warmth, big orchestration and even a little tonal corn, you could hardly find a more rewarding vehicle. And no matter what your mind tells you about the piece itself, your emotions quickly respond to such wizardry as Mr. Horowitz' playing. Nor was it just virtuosity, by any means. With all the flashing chords, rippling arpeggios, the thunders of the finale and the caressing softness of the adagio, this was very musical playing.

Indeed, as Serge Koussevitzky explained to the audience before the work begun, it is revived this week just for Mr. Horowitz. The pianist played the same Concerto when he made his Boston debut, as Symphony soloist, 20 years ago last March. Then, as now, the occasion was exciting, and in the words of the Globe reviewer of that time, "no soloist making a Boston debut at the Symphony concerts within the past 15 years has created anything like the sensation made yesterday."

Rachmaninoff and Horowitz somewhat overshadowed Mr. Koussevitzky's revival of a fine modern Symphony, the Fifth by Prokofieff, which had last been done in 1945, the year of its introduction. This is truly a "big" symphony, full of tension all the way. It is also turbulent and keeps most of the orchestra going consistently. The idiom runs to dissonance, but the Prokofieff sense of melody is just as evident. As for the orchestration, that is notably imaginative and resourceful.

After three years there are pages which still remind me of Shostakovich, but since neither composer, in the fullness of maturity, would "influence" the other, I think you can explain such a suggestion on the grounds that the material and the style have sprung out of the period in which the two are working. Having been composed in 1944, before the war was over, the Symphony is fair game for those who must attach some outside "inspiration" or program to music. Perhaps it is war music, but repeated hearings convince me that there is no other basis than purely musical ideas and Procedures. Furthermore, I shall not be surprised if the Prokofieff Fifth proves to be a modern classic.

Mr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra were at the top of their brilliant form all the afternoon through. They shared in the pandemonium of approval.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

NOV 9 - 1948

Concerts Not Broadcast

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NEW YORK TIMES:

There are no broadcasts of the Boston and the Philadelphia Orchestra concerts this season. This is a lamentable loss for all music lovers. These broadcasts offer the only opportunity for millions of people to hear the two world-famous orchestras.

It is inconceivable that in this big country of ours there should be no sponsors ready and willing to support the finest music, to their own advantage.

ERNST WARSCHAUER.

New York, Nov. 5, 1948.

TURDAY, NOVEMBER 6, 1948

MUSIC

Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, gave the fifth program of the 68th season in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. Vladimir Horowitz, pianist, was the soloist. The program:

Symphony No. 5, Op. 100 . . . . . Prokofieff
Concerto in D minor, No. 3, Op. 30 . . . . Rachmaninoff

By RUDOLPH ELIE

When Vladimir Horowitz comes to town as soloist with the orchestra it is always an event. The Hall sells out completely days before; wistful hopefuls gather at the box office to pounce on every ticket turned in like panthers on unwary fawns, and the air of expectancy, as the slim pianist (who looks for all the world like a successful business man) takes his seat at the piano bench, is charged and tense.

In the balconies standees suddenly appear, having deserted their chairs to watch the pianist at the keyboard. The quiet that falls before the conductor, soloist and orchestra are ready to begin is almost startling in its completeness. Meanwhile Mr. Horowitz, who manages to adjust his piano bench with rather less fuss than most, grins boyishly, wrings his hands, mops his face nervously with the handkerchief he seems to keep in his left cuff and, as the orchestra begins, leans forward, his head down. The second his fingers touch the keyboard his authority, his security, his utter command of himself and the music is evident, and for the ensuing 30-odd minutes he holds his audience so spellbound it almost dies rather than cough. It is a sort of hypnosis not easily explained, for there are other pianists and there is better music. It is just Horowitz, and it is sheer magic.

So it was yesterday, differing in detail only in the rare (but always delightful) pre-performance speech of Dr. Koussevitzky who, beaming like a proud father, told us in his engaging accent that Mr. Horowitz was playing Rachmaninoff's Third Concerto again in the observance of his debut appearance with the Boston Symphony 20 years ago, at which he also played this enormously pianistic work. The Concerto itself, which doesn't occupy too much eminence as music, is nonetheless the perfect vehicle for the pianist's unbelievable technic, and he makes the most of it backed up by a superlatively impassioned accompaniment by conductor and orchestra. Needless to say the performance brought the usual Horowitz applause and foot stamping, which lingered long enough to call him back to the stage four times.

The concert opened with perhaps the ultimate realization of Prokofieff's Fifth Symphony, a composition that Dr. Koussevitzky brought out in November, 1945, and which he has since (to our good for[illegible]) made singularly his own. [illegible] I find I reviewed [illegible] mance of [illegible] symphony [illegible] time I seem [illegible] "This is probably [illegible] (Prokofieff[illegible] think it may in time [illegible] to ours." The [illegible] than I [illegible] reception [illegible] temporary work [illegible] deal warmer [illegible]

The [illegible] gins with [illegible] against [illegible] soon emerge[illegible] groping [illegible] said [illegible] hope that [illegible] traordinary [illegible] follows a [illegible] veins [illegible] further [illegible] quick[illegible] optimism [illegible] comes an [illegible] back to the [illegible] oven [illegible] brooding [illegible] solace.

After [illegible] little more [illegible] sical po[illegible] while [illegible] things [illegible] some [illegible] work [illegible] especial[illegible] and [illegible] Dr. K[illegible] of it [illegible] never in [illegible] In fa[illegible] him, and [illegible] it is ha[illegible]

[illegible]

ATLANTIC CITY, N. J.
PRESS

NOV 7 1948

Books And The Arts

Conductor Munch Gentleman of Old School

By W. G. ROGERS
Associated Press Arts Reporter

NEW YORK, Nov. 6 (AP)—Three of us waited for the elevator in the hotel lobby: Charles Munch, who next year becomes the Boston Symphony conductor, one of the most exalted posts in the western world; Henri Barraud, composer and director of the current U. S. tour of the French Orchestre National, of which Munch is guest conductor for about 40 concerts, and this reporter.

The elevator door opened. Bowing and motioning to us to go ahead, Munch said: "Après vous." "Après vous," said Barraud, bowing to Munch and me. "Après vous," said I, bowing to them, and the elevator operator, used to being crushed in the rush, dropped his jaw in amazement.

At floor 14 it was repeated: "après vous" three times and three more bows. It was repeated at the room door, and with only slight modifications eight times: twice at the room door, four times at the elevator and twice at the street entrance, as we went downstairs and out into daylight to take a picture and then returned to the conductor's quarters. Barraud and I usually but not always maneuvered the distinguished visitor into preceding us.

For he wasn't just being polite, nor making a gesture to a composer and a newsman who were all dying to be in a position to do him favors. He meant it.

He is what used to be called condescendingly a gentleman of the old school. With his fine, silver hair, his sensitive and ascetic features, his unobtrusive manner, and the little red legion of honor ribbon in his buttonhole, he looks the part. His politeness is of course typically French, but by no means typical of the music world. The valet or batman of most conductors of my acquaintance would unhesitatingly crowd ahead of a mere composer and a mere newsman. Perhaps even more than any other creative artist, the musician is me-first; he has the best voice, best tongue for a horn, best fingers for a fiddle, and so the best right to enter ahead of everyone else.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE

NOV 7 - 1948

MUSIC ON THE RADIO

By B. H. HAGGIN

AS TRANSMITTER of the cultural heritage of Carnegie Hall to the American radio public the New York Philharmonic-Symphony has, in the first weeks of the season, been performing its duty very badly. The programs it has broadcast on Sunday afternoons have been almost unbelievable. The last time I heard Charpentier's "Impressions d'Italie" in Carnegie Hall was around 1920, when Bodansky played it with the National Symphony; and it was something I expected never to hear there at a symphony concert again; but there it was on Oct. 17, making with Tchaikovsky's Fourth Symphony what the Philharmonic considered a program in this year 1948. On each of the other three October programs the major work was Brahms—Brahms's First Symphony, Brahms's Violin Concerto, Brahms's Piano Concerto No. 2, each a labored Brahmian inflation of nothing into large-scale bombast. The rest was Schumann's "Rhenish" Symphony, Strauss's "Don Juan," Borodin's Second Symphony; and on the four programs the only brief contact with a first-rate mind was provided by the Minuet of the Will-o'-the-Wisps and Rakoczy March from Berlioz's "Damnation of Faust."

It is true these were substantially the programs which the Philharmonic was giving the supposedly sophisticated New York concert public in Carnegie Hall on Thursdays and Fridays. But one Thursday-Friday pair did, after the twenty years since Walter Damrosch's three-fifths of a performance, give this public a hearing of the famous Five Orchestral Pieces of Schoenberg; and the radio public on Sunday should have been given the same opportunity, which it did not get. Similarly Bloch's Viola Suite was performed on a Saturday night, but was not broadcast on a Sunday. And last night Isaac Stern was to play Mozart's delightful and seldom-heard G major Violin Concerto, but today he was to broadcast Lalo's Symphonie espagnole (just as Schnabel, a few years ago, broadcast on Sunday the familiar D minor Concerto of Mozart instead of the unfamiliar K.503 that he had played on Thursday and Friday). Radio listeners have been justified in protesting against this policy; but the Philharmonic evidently intends to continue it.

American broadcasting companies are supposed to be more responsive to the public's expressions of opinion; but apparently they don't care much about the opinions of the public that is interested in music. ABC's Chamber Music Hour on Tuesday nights was not first-class, as a program at such a time ought to be; nevertheless it got a response from listeners all over the country that was far greater and warmer than ABC had anticipated. Yet in spite of this expression of approval ABC has dropped the program and put in the Detroit Symphony. ABC is no longer broadcasting the Boston Symphony which used to be heard on Tuesday nights; but I would not call the Detroit Symphony an adequate substitute; and where there are the New York Philharmonic, the NBC Symphony, and later the Philadelphia Orchestra on the air, I would think even a second-rate chamber music program was better use of the time than a third-rate orchestral program. But ABC thinks differently.

ABC's Coffee Concerts continue on Sunday mornings at 8:30 with recordings. And the NBC String Quartet's live broadcasts at the same time can now be heard in New York except on the first Sunday of each month. On the two occasions when I turned it on, it too was engaged in a Brahms festival; but I listened long enough to note that the playing was excellent; and there should be enjoyable occasions when the group shifts to Haydn, Mozart, Beethoven and Schubert.

And finally the New Friends of Music concerts are being broadcast in their entirety on Sunday afternoons at 5:30 by WABF (FM).

PORTLAND, ME.
SUNDAY TELEGRAM

NOV 7 - 1948

Music World

By Helen Havener

New York, Nov. 6—It has been lo these many years since the general public has been able to buy a ticket for a Boston Symphony Orchestra concert ~~in this city~~—if one excepts the mammoth benefit which was given for the Rachmaninoff Fund three years ago. Therefore, it is impossible to say that attendance at the Bostonians' New York series will be appreciably enhanced when the famous ensemble opens its local subscription season Wednesday. After all, Carnegie Hall will hold only so many people.

However, it can be safely predicted that because Dr. Koussevitzky is such a favorite with the New York public, and because it is his last season as conductor, there will be a greater scramble than ever before to secure a ticket which some subscriber unable to attend may have generously turned in or even to purchase standing room in the limited portion of the auditorium where that is allowed.

When Dr. Kousevitzky makes his first appearance of the curent concert season the program he will offer will be a blend of the classic and the modern, involving such contrasting works as Beethoven's Seventh Symphony and Honegger's Symphony for Strings; Vivaldi's Concerto in D minor for orchestra and Brahm's Variations on a Theme by Haydn. So great is the devotion to Dr. Koussevitzky, however, that in all probability the most arrant classicists will have a warm word for the Honegger. Of such stuff are orchestral audiences composed exclusively of season subscribers made up.

A Televised Falstaff

Big words in the music world here—big news also for the possessors of television sets even though they may not live in the immediate metropolitan area—is the announcement that NBC has in preparation a televised version of Verdi's Falstaff under the baton of Arturo Toscanini. Just what singers will have the privilege of appearing under the magic of the maestro's baton in this epoch-making event is yet a matter of speculation, but hearts both masculine and feminine are fluttering and hopes are high. When the opera is presented this will be no opera in concert form with the musicians of the NBC Symphony Orchestra in the background. It will be bonafide opera with costumes and scenery, the latter especially devised to fit NBC's mammoth studio 8-H where so many thousands of visitors to New York have seen as well as heard the Toscanini broadcasts. The date of presentation is yet to be announced.

SCHENECTADY, N. Y.
GAZETTE

NOV 9 - 1948

A Koussevitzky Anniversary Fund of a quarter of a million is to be established in Boston. It follows Serge Koussevitzky's suggestion and is for use without restrictions for cultural and educational development of the orchestra. Dr. Koussevitzky is completing his 25th year as conductor with the Boston Orchestra.

When asked by members of the board and friends how they could express their "appreciation and gratitude" for his years of work his reply was "by a gift to the Orchestra, a big gift."

"World conditions are so uncertain and conditions here are so unsettled that even such an institution as the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with all its maturity, fine traditions and high ideals, is vulnerable. I would consider it the finest of all personal tributes if my friends should take this occasion to give convincing proof that this splendid orchestra to which I have devoted my best efforts for nearly a quarter of a century shall never flounder or fall through lack of adequate financial support.'

NEW ORLEANS, LA.
ITEM

NOV 1 1 1948

DR. SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, now in his 25th and last year as conductor of the Boston Symphony, took his Bostonians to New York for a concert yesterday. Kussevitzky, the Associated Press commented, has known how to conduct for a long, long time. Which is supposed to explain why the concert was so well received.

DALLAS, TEX.
NEWS

Boston Establishes Koussevitsky Fund

Special to The News

BOSTON, Mass., Nov. 9.—In tribute to Serge Koussevitsky's distinguished leadership of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for twenty-five consecutive seasons, a Koussevitzky anniversary fund of $250,000 has been established and announced by the orchestra's trustees. The sum will be used without restrictions for cultural and educational development by the orchestra and as a cushion against emergencies. It will be a revolving fund in the sense that any withdrawals in any one year will be restored as soon as practicable.

The anniversary fund is a prudent step toward long-term planning and its headquarters will be Symphony Hall in Boston.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
SUN
NOV 11 1948

The Music Makers

By IRVING KOLODIN

A Second Recital by Schiotz—Koussevitzky Begins.

Koussevitzky Opens Twenty-fifth Season

The wheel was brought almost to full turn last night when Serge Koussevitzky stepped on the podium in Carnegie Hall to conduct the Boston Symphony in the Vivaldi-Siloti Concerto in D minor. This piece was the opening number on Koussevitzky's first program in America, on October 11, 1924, and it marked the opening of the conductor's last season in New York, for in the fall of 1949 the orchestra will be conducted by Charles Muench.

Last night the orchestra played with its customary sheen. Its strings never sounded mellower, its ensemble never more perfect. The Brahms "Variations on a Theme by Haydn" was given a super-refined reading of the sort that makes a piece of music sound as though it had been raised gleaming from a chromium bath and polished by an electric buffer. Such faultless playing (also evidenced in the Vivaldi) is a complete answer to any possible criticism: It turns the mind completely away from vexatious questions of interpretation, focusing it instead on beauty of sound.

Honegger's Symphony for Strings, introduced last season, is a moody work, expressive despite its lack of sustained lyrisism. It may be objected that the slow movement is one long cantilena; but while Honegger strove for soaring melody, his themes remain too calculated and labored to be very spontaneous. The more one hears this work, incidentally, the more one realizes the influence of the Shostakovich-type adagio writing with which the Symphony for Strings is permeated. Beethoven's Seventh Symphony concluded the evening. Koussevitzky provided a flexible clear-cut reading distinguished for the lightness of the orchestral texture—a lightness, though, that never understated the strength of the music.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE
NOV 11 1948

Koussevitzky

Boston Symphony Conductor Starts Final Concerts

By Francis D. Perkins

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, first New York concert of the season last night at Carnegie Hall. The program:

Concerto for Orchestra in D minor (arr Siloti) .... Vivaldi
Variations on a Theme by Haydn, Op. 56a .... Brahms
Symphony for String Orchestra..... Honegger
Symphony No. 7, in A major, Op. 92..Beethoven

The sixty-third season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concerats here, which began last night in Carnegie Hall, is this notable organization's twenty-fifth and last under Serge Koussevitzky's conductorship, and the program had its retrospective elements. Vivaldi's concerto for orchestra in D minor, as arranged by Alexander Siloti, had opened the program with which Dr. Koussevitzky had introduced himself to Boston on Oct. 10, 1924, and to New York on that year's Thanksgiving Day, Nov. 27. Brahms's Variations on a Theme by Haydn had also figured in the first Boston concerts, and the eminent conductor had given representation to Arthur Honegger in his first appearance in Symphony and Carnegie Hall. Then, however, it was "Pacific 231" last night brought the Symphony for Strings.

One of Dr. Koussevitzky's many assets is his eagerness, when he has a high opinion of a contemporary work, to make it well known, even if it has been played before. Last night's was the sixth New York performance of the Honegger Symphony for Strings, which was offered last season by the Philharmonic and the Philadelphians. It is well worth repetition, even if rehearing calls attention to a drawback or two as well as to its merits. Much of the work is persuasive; a dignified pathos pervades much of the first two movements; certain thematic ideas are memorable and insistent and the scoring tells of expert craftsmanship. In contrast to the tragedy implied rather than openly stated in these sections, the finals, in this performance, gave a sense of high spirit, and the trumpet at the close brought an effective climax. At times, however, in the first two movements, the working out of the music seemed to outrun the realization of the composer's ideas, with motion rather than advancement.

The orchestra played according to its familiar and noteworthy standards. One could note, indeed, a certain emphasis on muscularity in the spirit and momentum of the Vivaldi concerto, and slightly overemphasized tympani in the first part of the Beethoven symphony. The violins played with memorable lyricism in the largo of the Vivaldi work and frequently elsewhere, and the reading of what the reviewers had time to hear in the Beethoven symphony was straightforward and expressive, in the style and atmosphere of the work.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
NOV 11 1948

BOSTON SYMPHONY OPENS SEASON HERE

Koussevitzky Conducts Group in Moving Performance—Honegger Work Played

By OLIN DOWNES

There is no use to claim infallibility. It may be unconscious favoritism toward an orchestra with which we grew up. But it is the inescapable conclusion, and to the best of this deponent's knowledge and belief, after hearing brilliant performances in preceding weeks by other symphonic ensembles, that there is no other orchestra in the country which for finish, glow of tone and distinction of style equals the Boston Symphony.

This orchestra gave its first New York concert of the season last night in Carnegie Hall. Dr. Koussevitzky started his program with the first score that he interpreted when he came to America at his opening concert Oct. 10-11, 1924, in Boston's Symphony Hall. The orchestra, as all know, was then a body of historic distinction. No doubt it played Vivaldi's D minor Concerto Grosso beautifully at the time. But one does not believe it could have played as beautifully as it did last night. Dr. Koussevitzky has been at work upon it for twenty-four years. There is no string tone like it for vibrancy, transparency and lustre.

Some think that Dr. Koussevitzky pitches his strings too high and thereby gains a spurious brilliancy. It is too bad, but we fear that if this is the reason other conductors will have to adopt a similar pitch, and we are far from certain that this device would in itself secure the Boston Symphony standard of true-quality. From the first sound onward the performance of Vivaldi's music was a feast to the ear and the understanding.

Koussevitzky Is Masterful

It is not improbable that Dr. Koussevitzky, with memories crowding him close, and at the beginning of his last season with the orchestra to which he has contributed so much, put his last ounce of effort into securing maximum results on this particular occasion. But he has never spared the last effort to gain his artistic end. Whatever the conditions and motivations, he set forth the noble simplicities of Vivaldi music with a mastery and a beauty that will long be remembered.

The program was of familiar music, as too many programs seem to be today, with the single exception of the recently composed "Symphony for String Orchestra," with trumpet obligato, by Arthur Honegger. This was played here last season and met with a generally cold reception. One might recall in this connection Beethoven's growl when it was remarked that the "Eroica" symphony was a hard nut to crack—or words to that effect, "because it is so much better than the others." Mr. Honegger's symphony for strings is the greatest and the most intense music that he has produced. It seeks no exterior effect, as most of his scores do. It is very dark and very tragic in the first two movements.

Composed in Paris during the period of the German occupation, it has all the emotional connotations of that place and time. The dolorous "ostinato" figure for the strings heard soon after the beginning haunts the whole of the opening movement, as a thought, an agony, that persists and cannot be laid aside. The slow movement is yet more somber, mounting, in a dramatic crescendo, to an extraordinary climax of grief. The triumph of the finale, music of wild rejoicing, with the trumpet sounding the chorale in the final pages, appears to complete the unmistakable emotional scheme of the work.

Score Is Sincere

Coupled with all this is the drastic simplicity, starkness, concentration of the writing; the power and logic of the counterpoint, linear and harmonic; the drama of the tonal forces involved. The antagonists are invisible; the crisis is that of Armaggedon. A most masterful score; one that will make its way slowly because of the writing; one that bites deep and that will long endure because of its emotion and sincerity.

A performance of exemplary finish was that of the Brahms Variations on the Theme of Haydn Variations. For our own part we have preferred a more rugged reading, and in places a more muscular tone. In the introduction of Beethoven's Seventh Symphony, which ended the concert, there was a corresponding wish that the swinging figure given various wind instruments and set against the ascending strings, had been more clearly articulated. The passage is none too well balanced in the score. Aside from such detail, the performance of one of the best known of all symphonies was the climax of the occasion. An interpreter does or does not comprehend, is or is not caught up and fired by the greatness of Beethoven. 8his reading comprehended and companioned him. The grandeur of the form was ever present. The pulse of life throbbed in every measure. The beauty of the world was there.

The program annotator tells the delicious story of the Leipzigers who on hearing the Seventh Symphony for the first time concluded that only a drunkard could have written the first and last movements! Is it perhaps the highest tribute we can pay Dr. Koussevitzky, whose repertory traverses the whole of orchestral literature from the seventeenth century to today, who has headed every new movement in composition that has manifested itself in his life-time—that at the climax of his experience as a man and artist he finds the headiest of draughts to be Beethoven's Dionysiac brew?

NEW YORK, N. Y.
JOURNAL AMERICAN
NOV 11 1948

Koussevitzky Wins Ovation

By MILES KASTENDIECK

Serge Koussevitzky began his final season with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall last night. His appearance prompted an ovation. The Vivaldi Concerto Opus 3, No. 11 opening the program recalled his debut 25 years ago. It was definitely an occasion and the house was packed.

Starting off with the work that launched him on a notable career, Koussevitzky saw to it that a contemporary composer was represented in the evening's music.

Though Honegger's Symphony for Strings was flanked by Brahms' Variations on a Theme by Haydn and Beethoven's Seventh Symphony, it held its own in this company.

Repeated hearings do not alter the first impression that this is a substantial and a communicative work. Honegger's locomotive style and squirrel-in-the-cage episodes may sound dry sometimes. The drive of the former, however, is stimulating; the meaning of the latter is quite forceful.

Stroke of Genius

The stroke of genius that inspired Honegger to add the trumpet solo in the final movement sets aside what reservations might otherwise persist. This crystalizes the whole work. It is the ray of hope that pierces the bleakness of what has gone before. The symphony definitely has something to say.

Performances during the evening were characteristic. The Vivaldi and the Brahms sounded a bit overdriven. The playing was more rugged than it has sometimes been. Honegger and Beethoven basked in the homage paid them by the conductor. It is obvious that the Bostonians keep the faith.

BRISTOL, VA.
NEWS BULLETIN

Rising Ovation Greets Conductor Boston Symphony

By W. G. Rogers
Associated Press Arts Reporter

NEW YORK, Nov. 11. (AP)—Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, in his 25th and last year as conductor of the Boston Symphony, received a warm welcome last night in Carnegie Hall when he brought his Bostonians here for the first time this season.

Greeted by a rising ovation from the capacity audience—practically the same devoted crowd which year after year hears his Wednesday concerts here—he opened with the Vivaldi Concerto in D Minor, for orchestra with organ, the very number with which he began his first Boston concert in 1924.

He was called back to the platform by the persistent applause after the Vivaldi, and also after Brahms' variations on a theme by Haydn, Honegger's Symphony for string orchestra, and the Beethoven Seventh.

Superb musician and showman, he exhorted his orchestra, stamped, shook his fists, wagged his head, cajoled, threatened and pleaded, and turned out an evening of music on which the audience reported variously, at intermission: "How wonderful . . . it was perfect . . . just when a man learns to conduct, he resigns . . . Well, except for the Honegger . . ."

But Koussevitzky has known how to conduct for a long, long time, and even the Honegger, which had been heard here before, was favorably received, and given, like all the rest of the program, a stirring interpretation.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
SUN

NOV 11 1948

The Music Makers

By IRVING KOLODIN

A Second Recital by Schiotz—Koussevitzky Begins.

Koussevitzky Opens Twenty-fifth Season

The wheel was brought almost to full turn last night when Serge Koussevitzky stepped on the podium in Carnegie Hall to conduct the Boston Symphony in the Vivaldi-Siloti Concerto in D minor. This piece was the opening number on Koussevitzky's first program in America, on October 11, 1924, and it marked the opening of the conductor's last season in New York, for in the fall of 1949 the orchestra will be conducted by Charles Muench.

Last night the orchestra played with its customary sheen. Its strings never sounded mellower, its ensemble never more perfect. The Brahms "Variations on a Theme by Haydn" was given a super-refined reading of the sort that makes a piece of music sound as though it had been raised gleaming from a chromium bath and polished by an electric buffer. Such faultless playing (also evidenced in the Vivaldi) is a complete answer to any possible criticism: It turns the mind completely away from vexatious questions of interpretation, focusing it instead on beauty of sound.

Honegger's Symphony for Strings, introduced last season, is a moody work, expressive despite its lack of sustained lyrisism. It may be objected that the slow movement is one long cantilena; but while Honegger strove for soaring melody, his themes remain too calculated and labored to be very spontaneous. The more one hears this work, incidentally, the more one realizes the influence of the Shostakovich-type adagio writing with which the Symphony for Strings is permeated. Beethoven's Seventh Symphony concluded the evening. Koussevitzky provided a flexible clear-cut reading distinguished for the lightness of the orchestral texture—a lightness, though, that never understated the strength of the music.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE

NOV 11 1948

Koussevitzky

Boston Symphony Conductor Starts Final Concerts

By Francis D. Perkins

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, first New York concert of the season last night at Carnegie Hall. The program:

Concerto for Orchestra in D minor (arr. Siloti) .... Vivaldi
Variations on a Theme by Haydn, Op. 56a. .... Brahms
Symphony for String Orchestra...... Honegger
Symphony No. 7, in A major, Op. 92..Beethoven

The sixty-third season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concerats here, which began last night in Carnegie Hall, is this notable organization's twenty-fifth and last under Serge Koussevitzky's conductorship, and the program had its retrospective elements. Vivaldi's concerto for orchestra in D minor, as arranged by Alexander Siloti, had opened the program with which Dr. Koussevitzky had introduced himself to Boston on Oct. 10, 1924, and to New York on that year's Thanksgiving Day, Nov. 27. Brahms's Variations on a Theme by Haydn had also figured in the first Boston concerts, and the eminent conductor had given representation to Arthur Honegger in his first appearance in Symphony and Carnegie Hall. Then, however, it was "Pacific 231" last night brought the Symphony for Strings.

One of Dr. Koussevitzky's many assets is his eagerness, when he has a high opinion of a contemporary work, to make it well known, even if it has been played before. Last night's was the sixth New York performance of the Honegger Symphony for Strings, which was offered last season by the Philharmonic and the Philadelphians. It is well worth repetition, even if rehearing calls attention to a drawback or two as well as to its merits. Much of the work is persuasive; a dignified pathos pervades much of the first two movements; certain thematic ideas are memorable and insistent and the scoring tells of expert craftsmanship. In contrast to the tragedy implied rather than openly stated in these sections, the finals, in this performance, gave a sense of high spirit, and the trumpet at the close brought an effective climax. At times, however, in the first two movements, the working out of the music seemed to outrun the realization of the composer's ideas, with motion rather than advancement.

The orchestra played according to its familiar and noteworthy standards. One could note, indeed, a certain emphasis on muscularity in the spirit and momentum of the Vivaldi concerto, and slightly overemphasized tympani in the first part of the Beethoven symphony. The violins played with memorable lyricism in the largo of the Vivaldi work and frequently elsewhere, and the reading of what the reviewers had time to hear in the Beethoven symphony was straightforward and expressive, in the style and atmosphere of the work.

BRISTOL, VA.
NEWS BULLETIN

Rising Ovation Greets Conductor Boston Symphony

By W. G. Rogers
Associated Press Arts Reporter

NEW YORK, Nov. 11. (AP)—Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, in his 25th and last year as conductor of the Boston Symphony, received a warm welcome last night in Carnegie Hall when he brought his Bostonians here for the first time this season.

Greeted by a rising ovation from the capacity audience—practically the same devoted crowd which year after year hears his Wednesday concerts here—he opened with the Vivaldi Concerto in D Minor, for orchestra with organ, the very number with which he began his first Boston concert in 1924.

He was called back to the platform by the persistent applause after the Vivaldi, and also after Brahms' variations on a theme by Haydn, Honegger's Symphony for string orchestra, and the Beethoven Seventh.

Superb musician and showman, he exhorted his orchestra, stamped, shook his fists, wagged his head, cajoled, threatened and pleaded, and turned out an evening of music on which the audience reported variously, at intermission: "How wonderful . . . it was perfect . . . just when a man learns to conduct, he resigns . . . Well, except for the Honegger . . ."

But Koussevitzky has known how to conduct for a long, long time, and even the Honegger, which had been heard here before, was favorably received, and given, like all the rest of the program, a stirring interpretation.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
JOURNAL AMERICAN

NOV 11 1948

Koussevitsky Wins Ovation

By MILES KASTENDIECK

Serge Koussevitzky began his final season with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall last night. His appearance prompted an ovation. The Vivaldi Concerto Opus 3, No. 11 opening the program recalled his debut 25 years ago. It was definitely an occasion and the house was packed.

Starting off with the work that launched him on a notable career, Koussevitzky saw to it that a contemporary composer was represented in the evening's music.

Though Honegger's Symphony for Strings was flanked by Brahms' Variations on a Theme by Haydn and Beethoven's Seventh Symphony, it held its own in this company.

Repeated hearings do not alter the first impression that this is a substantial and a communicative work. Honegger's locomotive style and squirrel-in-the-cage episodes may sound dry sometimes. The drive of the former, however, is stimulating; the meaning of the latter is quite forceful.

Stroke of Genius

The stroke of genius that inspired Honegger to add the trumpet solo in the final movement sets aside what reservations might otherwise persist. This crystalizes the whole work. It is the ray of hope that pierces the bleakness of what has gone before. The symphony definitely has something to say.

Performances during the evening were characteristic. The Vivaldi and the Brahms sounded a bit overdriven. The playing was more rugged than it has sometimes been. Honegger and Beethoven basked in the homage paid them by the conductor. It is obvious that the Bostonians keep the faith.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

NOV 11 1948

BOSTON SYMPHONY OPENS SEASON HERE

Koussevitzky Conducts Group in Moving Performance—Honegger Work Played

By OLIN DOWNES

There is no use to claim infallibility. It may be unconscious favoritism toward an orchestra with which we grew up. But it is the inescapable conclusion, and to the best of this deponent's knowledge and belief, after hearing brilliant performances in preceding weeks by other symphonic ensembles, that there is no other orchestra in the country which for finish, glow of tone and distinction of style equals the Boston Symphony.

This orchestra gave its first New York concert of the season last night in Carnegie Hall. Dr. Koussevitzky started his program with the first score that he interpreted when he came to America at his opening concert Oct. 10-11, 1924, in Boston's Symphony Hall. The orchestra, as all know, was then a body of historic distinction. No doubt it played Vivaldi's D minor Concerto Grosso beautifully at the time. But one does not believe it could have played as beautifully as it did last night. Dr. Koussevitzky has been at work upon it for twenty-four years. There is no string tone like it for vibrancy, transparency and lustre.

Some think that Dr. Koussevitzky pitches his strings too high and thereby gains a spurious brilliancy. It is too bad, but we fear that if this is the reason other conductors will have to adopt a similar pitch, and we are far from certain that this device would in itself secure the Boston Symphony standard of true-quality. From the first sound onward the performance of Vivaldi's music was a feast to the ear and the understanding.

Koussevitzky Is Masterful

It is not improbable that Dr. Koussevitzky, with memories crowding him close, and at the beginning of his last season with the orchestra to which he has contributed so much, put his last ounce of effort into securing maximum results on this particular occasion. But he has never spared the last effort to gain his artistic end. Whatever the conditions and motivations, he set forth the noble simplicities of Vivaldi music with a mastery and a beauty that will long be remembered.

The program was of familiar music, as too many programs seem to be today, with the single exception of the recently composed "Symphony for String Orchestra," with trumpet obligato, by Arthur Honegger. This was played here last season and met with a generally cold reception. One might recall in this connection Beethoven's growl when it was remarked that the "Eroica" symphony was a hard nut to crack—or words to that effect, "because it is so much better than the others." Mr. Honegger's symphony for strings is the greatest and the most intense music that he has produced. It seeks no exterior effect, as most of his scores do. It is very dark and very tragic in the first two movements.

Composed in Paris during the period of the German occupation, it has all the emotional connotations of that place and time. The dolorous "ostinato" figure for the strings heard soon after the beginning haunts the whole of the opening movement, as a thought, an agony, that persists and cannot be laid aside. The slow movement is yet more somber, mounting, in a dramatic crescendo, to an extraordinary climax of grief. The triumph of the finale, music of wild rejoicing, with the trumpet sounding the chorale in the final pages, appears to complete the unmistakable emotional scheme of the work.

Score Is Sincere

Coupled with all this is the drastic simplicity, starkness, concentration of the writing; the power and logic of the counterpoint, linear and harmonic; the drama of the tonal forces involved. The antagonists are invisible; the crisis is that of Armaggedon. A most masterful score; one that will make its way slowly because of the writing; one that bites deep and that will long endure because of its emotion and sincerity.

A performance of exemplary finish was that of the Brahms Variations on the Theme of Haydn Variations. For our own part we have preferred a more rugged reading, and in places a more muscular tone. In the introduction of Beethoven's Seventh Symphony, which ended the concert, there was a corresponding wish that the swinging figure given various wind instruments and set against the ascending strings, had been more clearly articulated. The passage is none too well balanced in the score. Aside from such detail, the performance of one of the best known of all symphonies was the climax of the occasion. An interpreter does or does not comprehend, is or is not caught up and fired by the greatness of Beethoven. 8his reading comprehended and companioned him. The grandeur of the form was ever present. The pulse of life throbbed in every measure. The beauty of the world was there.

The program annotator tells the delicious story of the Leipzigers who on hearing the Seventh Symphony for the first time concluded that only a drunkard could have written the first and last movements! Is it perhaps the highest tribute we can pay Dr. Koussevitzky, whose repertory traverses the whole of orchestral literature from the seventeenth century to today, who has headed every new movement in composition that has manifested itself in his life-time—that at the climax of his experience as a man and artist he finds the headiest of draughts to be Beethoven's Dionysiac brew?

FORT WORTH, TEX.
EVENING STAR TELEGRAM

Warm Welcome Given to 'Koussy' by N. Y. Audience

BY W. G. ROGERS.
Associated Press Arts Editor.

NEW YORK, Nov. 11. — Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, in his 25th and last year as conductor of the Boston Symphony, received a [illegible] welcome Wednesday night in Carnegie Hall when he brought his Bostonians here for the first time this season.

Greeted by a rising ovation from the capacity audience--practically the same devoted crowd which [illegible] year hears his Wednesday concerts here --he opened with the Vivaldi Concerto in D Minor, for orchestra with organ, the very [illegible] with which he began his Boston concert in 1924.

He was called back to the platform by the persistent applause after the Vivaldi, and also after Brahms' Variations on a theme by Haydn, Honegger's symphony for string orchestra, and the Beethoven Seventh.

[illegible] musician and showman [illegible] exhorted his orchestra, stamped, shook his fists, wagged his [illegible], cajoled, threatened and pleaded, and turned out an evening of music on which the audience reported variously, at intermission: "How wonderful . . . [illegible] was perfect . . . just when a man learns to conduct, he resigns . . . well, except for the Honegger . . ."

But Koussevitvky has know how to conduct for a long, long time, and even the Honegger, which had been heard here before, was favorably received, and given, like all the rest of the program, a stirring interpretation.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
WORLD-TELEGRAM

NOV 11 1948

Music

Koussevitzky Starts 25th, Last Season

By ROBERT BAGAR.

Attending the Boston Symphony's opening concert of the New York season was a large audience in Carnegie Hall last night, all of whose membership were aware, I'm sure, of the sentiments of the occasion. This is Serge Koussevitzky's last season as conductor of the celebrated organization. He is to be replaced next year by Charles Muench.

Starting out on his 25th year of service to music in this country, Dr. Koussevitzky has brought before American listeners the latest and greatest works of all time. He has also turned the light upon new ones which have subsequently become great.

He can look back, when he retires upon the monument he has built for himself, the Berkshire Music Festival, at his beloved Tanglewood, in Lenox, Mass., where his name is synonymous with the highest in music.

Plays Beethoven Seventh.

Dr. Koussevitzky last evening helped to observe the beginning of his quarter century with the Bach-Siloti Concerto in D minor, following that with the Brahms-Haydn Variations, both of which had been scheduled in his first programs. Also figuring in his early efforts was a work by Arthur Honegger, "Pacific 231," although last night the same composer was represented by his Symphony for Strings. To conclude this anniversary program there was the Beethoven Seventh Symphony.

It is no news that the Boston Symphony can play like anything, given virtually no incentive at all. With last night's concomitant matters to spur it on, it played over its head, you might say. And the BSO musicians playing over their heads is setting too high a standard even for themselves.

No Exaggerated Effects.

However, even at this feast one could exercise one's privilege of choice, and the selection I make is the performance of the Beethoven for its simplicity and directness without accompaniment of mannered or exaggerated effects.

A close second was the Bach-Vivaldi, which glistened in the two end movements, and provided a proper contrast of reflectiveness in the middle one. And not far behind that, going down the line a bit, was the Honegger.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
POST
[illegible] NEWS

NOV 11 1948

Music...

Koussevitzky Conducts Boston Series Opener

By JOHN BRIGGS

Last night, when Serge Koussevitzky stepped on the stage of Carnegie Hall for the opening New York concert of his final season as leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the large audience paid him the uncommon tribute of a standing ovation.

Mr. Koussevitzky, who last year announced his decision to retire at the conclusion of the 1948-49 season, had selected a program reminiscent of that with which he began his first season with the famous Boston organization. In one case it was the same composer, but a more recent work — Honegger's Symphony for Strings, written in 1941.

The program also listed Vivaldi's orchestral concerto in D Minor, the Brahms "Haydn" Variations, and Beethoven's Seventh Symphony.

The Honegger symphony, for all Mr. Koussevitzky's devoted efforts, last night seemed a remarkably uncommunicative work. Not that it is disagreeable; strings are strings ,after all, and it needs brass and the upper registers of the woodwinds for those [illegible] orchestral effects that suggest an IRT train rounding the big curve below Grand Central. The work merely seemed to have little to say. With a conciseness Sibelius might envy, the work stated and re-stated brief mottos much as if a writer were to cover page after page with "the quick brown fox jumped over the lazy dog," and offer the result as narrative. The second movement was rather like a long succession of appogiaturas. The work closed with an authentic-sounding chorale, in reality Mr. Honegger's own, which appeared to support a contention of Virgil Thomson's in "The State of Music" that composers have never lost the secret of writing melody. One wishes they would let themselves go more often.

Vivaldi, plus Brahms, plus Honegger, made for a rather unvaried up-to-intermission program, with a grave, thoughtful mood and the splendor of the Boston strings prevailing throughout. Mr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra worked their familiar magic in the Seventh Symphony, to the obvious satisfaction of the audience.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE

NOV 12 1948

Koussevitzky

Boston Symphony Conductor Starts Final Concerts

By Francis D. Perkins

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, first New York concert of the season Wednesday night at Carnegie Hall. The program:

Concerto for Orchestra in D minor (arr. Siloti) .... Vivaldi
Variations on a Theme by Haydn, Op. 56a. .... Brahms
Symphony for String Orchestra...... Honegger
Symphony No. 7, in A major, Op. 92.. Beethoven

The sixty-third season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concerts here, which began Wednesday night in Carnegie Hall, is this notable organization's twenty-fifth and last under Serge Koussevitzky's conductorship, and the program had its retrospective elements. Vivaldi's concerto for orchestra in D minor, as arranged by Alexander Siloti, had opened the program with which Dr. Koussevitzky had introduced himself to Boston on Oct. 10, 1924, and to New York on that year's Thanksgiving Day, Nov. 27. Brahms's Variations on a Theme by Haydn had also figured in the first Boston concerts, and the eminent conductor had given representation to Arthur Honegger in his first appearance in Symphony and Carnegie Hall. Then, however, it was "Pacific 231"; Wednesday night brought the Symphony for Strings.

One of Dr. Koussevitzky's many assets is his eagerness, when he has a high opinion of a contemporary work, to make it well known, even if it has been played before. Wednesday night's was the sixth New York performance of the Honegger Symphony for Strings, which was offered last season by the Philharmonic and the Philadelphians. It is well worth repetition, even if rehearing calls attention to a drawback or two as well as to its merits. Much of the work is persuasive; a dignified pathos pervades much of the first two movements; certain thematic ideas are memorable and insistent and the scoring tells of expert craftsmanship. In contrast to the tragedy implied rather than openly stated in these sections, the finale, in this performance, gave a sense of high spirit, and the trumpet at the close brought an effective climax. At times, however, in the first two movements, the working out of the music seemed to outrun the realization of the composer's ideas, with motion rather than advancement.

The orchestra played according to its familiar and noteworthy standards. One could note, indeed, a certain emphasis on muscularity in the spirit and momentum with which Dr. Koussevitzky's musicians presented the first movement of the Vivaldi concerto, and slightly overemphasized tympani in the first part of the Beethoven symphony. The violins played with memorable lyricism in the largo of the Vivaldi work and frequently elsewhere, and the reading of what the reviewers had time to hear in the Beethoven symphony was straight forward and expressive, in the style and atmosphere of the work.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
NEWS

NOV 11 1948

Looking & Listening

with Ben Gross

Richard Kollmar

Radio Regulars Safe. . . . "The radio actors are done for! When television really arrives, they'll be crowded out by Broadway and Hollywood glamour boys and gals!" Such is the doleful prediction of many airwave Jeremiahs; but Richard Kollmar, star of WOR's Wednesday night "Boston Blackie" series, disagrees. "These sour prophets are dead wrong," Dick tells me. "Gradually, most of the principal radio players are infiltrating into video and are showing up pretty well in the new medium. There is also the matter of salaries. For a long time television sponsors will not be able to meet the financial demands of Hollywood and of Broadway stars. Therefore, the reliable radio performers, demanding less, will be able to get in on the video ground floor. Most of the latter, as a matter of fact, will not be sacrificing any income; for the major portion of our dramatic programs on television will be seen during the evening hours. During the daytime, there will still be radio serials. So these players will also be able to appear in these and collect from both media."

* * *

It's the News . . . Rehearsals of the famous Boston Symphony Orchestra will be broadcast by NBC Mondays at 1 P. M. starting Nov. 22, with record rebroadcasts over WNBC at a time to be announced later. . . . Al Cernik who appeared on Arthur Godfrey's "Talent Scouts" over CBS—and won—is getting screen tests from both MGM and 20th Century-Fox and also auditions at the Raleigh Room and Cafe Society. . . . Speaking of the Raleigh Room, it is now featuring the Irving Fields radio trio, the greatest ensemble of its type I've ever heard. Irving is a brilliant pianist, whose music is like a torrent rushing down a mountainside. . . . CBS repeats its "football roundup" Saturday afternoon from 2:30 to 5:30, covering the Northwestern-Notre Dame, North Carolina-Maryland and Minnesota-Iowa games, among others. . . . Jackie Robinson's sports commentaries get under way on WMCA Monday night at 7:15. . . . The man with the red face, Dr. George Gallup, will attempt to explain why his election poll went wrong, on NBC's television version of "Meet the Press," Sunday night at 8:30.

Tele Topics . . . CBS yesterday signed WGN-TV, The Chicago Tribune video station, as a primary affiliate of its television network, making it the 16th outlet to join the CBS pictorial chain. "Video Recordings," a new development resulting in improved pictures and sound on 16 mm film for television programs was demonstrated by ABC yesterday. It will be first applied to the Thanksgiving Day

NEW YORK, N. Y.
~~PM~~
STAR

NOV 12 1948

Music . . . by Robert A. Hague

The Boston Subscribers Give Koussevitzky a Discreet Hand

Koussevitzky

When Serge Koussevitzky walked out on the stage of Carnegie Hall Wednesday evening to conduct the opening concert of his 25th and final season as music director of the Boston Symphony, there was a wave of well-bred applause with many of the audience rising. This, coming as it did from the discriminating and elderly Boston clientele, amounts to a tremendous ovation. For these sedate subscribers know no enthusiasm greater than the rustle made by the patting together of gloved hands. Yet their devotion to the orchestra is so enduring that they occupy the same seats year after year, willing them, the story goes, to their relatives when they die, lest some rank young outsider buy his way into the fold.

But if youth was in the minority in the auditorium, there was plenty of it on the stage. In its 68th season, the Boston Symphony remains a youthful and vital orchestra, and Dr. Koussevitsky, despite his decision to retire, an enormously youthful and vital conductor. It is hardly necessary to add that the orchestra still makes the most accurate and beautiful sounds to be heard in the land. And Wednesday evening, its tone seemed to have an extra brightness and brilliance—an effect contributed to perhaps by recent changes in the hall, which have heightened its acoustical properties.

The Star Reviews

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, Serge Koussevitzky conducting; Wednesday evening at Carnegie Hall. The program:

Concerto in D minor	Vivaldi-Siloti
Variations on a Theme by Haydn	Brahms
Symphony for Strings	Honegger
Symphony No. 7 in A major	Beethoven

The music, too, was full of youth, immortally so—with the exception of Brahms' by now rather wilted Variations. How fresh and graceful is Vivaldi's D-minor Concerto, with its lovely Largo and buoyant end movements—the same work, incidentally, with which Dr. Koussevitzky opened his first Boston program in 1924. And what can surpass the blazing vitality of Beethoven's Seventh, that masterpiece of symphonic masterpieces. Under the conductor's knowing baton, its propulsive rhythms bore it gloriously onward If the good doctor took the Allegretto a little faster than Beethoven may have intended, it did not matter. In a lustrously executed performance, this listener remembers especially the beautiful sound of the Boston horns in the trio of the third movement and a Finale which sent his heart singing and dancing, like the music, con brio.

* *

Honegger's Symphony for Strings, composed in 1941, still has the impact of novelty, though it has been heard here several times. It is a vastly skilful, thoughtful and affecting work which, if it sags a bit in its troubled, gray-hued second movement, returns to taut interest in its last, where the lively and complex rhythmic activity of the strings is suddenly punctuated by the chorale-like utterances of triumphant trumpets.

CINCINNATI, OHIO
POST

NOV 13 1948

Koussevitzky Reveals Plans

Serge Koussevitzky, making his farewell tour as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has announced program plans for the orchestra's concert here Dec. 2 in Music Hall.

The program will include Honegger's String Symphony (first performance in Cincinnati); the Scythian Suite by Prokofieff and the Symphony No. 7 by Beethoven.

Dr. Koussevitzky will retire at the end of this season after 25 years as musical director of the Boston orchestra. Tickets for the concert are on sale at Baldwin's, 142 W. Fourth street. J. H. Thuman is local manager.

FORT WORTH, TEX.
EVENING STAR TELEGRAM

1948

A Woman's New York

Make Music Tax-Free, Band Leaders Plea to President

BY ALICE HUGHES.

NEW YORK, Nov. 12. — Musicians are waiting until President Truman jells comfortably into his newly-elected post to appeal to him as one musician to another. (He does play the "Missouri Waltz" on the piano and his daughter sings). They want him to consider lifting the federal amusement tax from performances by symphony orchestras, operas and concerts.

KOUSSE-VITZKY.

They maintain music should be subsidized by the U. S. government, the same way it subsidizes museums, schools, etc. Pointing to the big deficits of even the most successful symphony orchestras as the Boston, Philadelphia and New York Philharmonic, as well as the impecunious Metropolitan Opera House and similar organizations throughout the country, they plan to ask the president to prove his love for music by making it tax-free.

Speaking of symphonies, I wish I'd been in Albuquerque, N. M., recently at concert time to hear the local civic symphony orchestra play Arnold Schoenberg's newest work, "Survivor From Warsaw." This great musical composition is drama set to music. It has a narrator who describes life in a concentration camp; also a men's chorus. The narration is in English, but the orders spit forth with Nazi ferocity, are in German. At the end of the symphony a Hebrew prayer is read. It must have been a thrilling performance.

But Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony, was disgruntled over ~~this musical~~ plum. He had commissioned Schoenberg to write the work and he certainly expected to have its first performance by his Boston bandsmen. But it seems Schoenberg's friend, Kurt Frederick, conductor of the Albuquerque Symphony, simply asked for and got permission to introduce it and that was that. Koussy, as much a showman as musician, is burned up, although—and because—he has a record for many brilliant "firsts" of works by Sibelius, Ravel, Prokofieff, Stravinsky, Britten, Bernstein and Shostakovitch.

JOURNALIST FROM EUROPE.

Solomon Wolff, European journalist, is here on a working holiday which sent him all over the U. S. A. to see what impact the Marshall Plan has on American economic life. He found factories humming in Michigan, Texas, California, Iowa and others states. Now in New York, before sailing for Paris, he is impressed with the open-arm welcome that greeted him everywhere. No red tape; no careful checking as to who he is; all cards placed on the table. He was showered with pamphlets; cordially shown about; permitted to ask any questions he liked and got answers.

"Nothing like it anywhere in Europe," says multi-lingual Wolff, who for the past 13 years has been Paris correspondent on economic topics for Switzerland's largest newspaper in Zurich. All over the U. S. A. he was served with tasty sandwiches. His one complaint They place a lettuce leaf in every sandwich.

CO-OP BEAUTY.

Down near Washington Square in one big apartment house there reside nine women who are liberated from the beauty parlor. Sylvia Porter, newspaper woman, is one; June Elliott, wife of the war news analyst, is another. Too busy to wait their turn in beauty shops that are always overcrowded in New York, they and seven others have hired a beautician for themselves alone. She circulates among their apartments, doing their hair, nails or face whenever they want her. The nine chipped in; bought a drying machine, a facial chair and manicure supplies.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE
NOV 1 3 1948

MUSIC

By Paul Affelder

Dr. Koussevitzky Launches Concert Of Boston Symphony at Academy of Music

[illegible] ...portant events of the Brooklyn music season [illegible] concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, pre[illegible] year at the Academy of Music under the joint auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, the Phil[illegible] of Brooklyn [illegible] Committee [illegible] Symphony Orchestra[illegible]. If there is [illegible] these three groups [illegible] it to scare [illegible] for the hall [illegible] when the [illegible] come to town.

[illegible] the orchestra made [illegible] appearance of the [illegible] and last under [illegible] guidance of Serge [illegible], who is retiring in [illegible] turning the [illegible] over to Charles [illegible]. Unquestionably Dr. Koussevitzky will offer us pro[illegible] up, for the most [illegible] for whose inter[illegible] has become fa[illegible].

[illegible] the case last evening [illegible] he conducted Prokofieff's [illegible] Symphony and two [illegible] Ravel, the Piano Concerto [illegible] Jesus Maria Sanroma [illegible] soloist, and the second [illegible] "Daphnis et Chloe."

Popularized Symphony

Dr. Koussevitzky is responsible for spreading the popularity of the Prokofieff Symphony. He declares it to be one of the finest symphonic works written during the last 25 years, and it is hard to disagree with him. It has cohesion, clearcut outlines—melodic, harmonic and formal—and, above all, it has originality, but an originality that is at once appealing. No wonder this delightful symphony has become a part of the standard repertoire of most of our major orchestras.

At last night's performance the conductor gave the symphony a warm-hearted reading, marred only by a first movement in which the brasses sounded blatant and, at times, out of tune. The Scherzo was light and clear, with the strings showing off their precision in an admirable fashion. And we have never heard the lovely Adagio played with such breadth and lyrical warmth, so that it sounded like a movement out of a romantic symphony. The Finale had spirit and, again, much of the precision for which this orchestra is famous.

Win Hearty Ovation

The Ravel Concerto, which Sonroma and Koussevitzky introduced in 1932, woes much to its predecessor by seven years, George Gershwin's popular Concerto in F. This is particularly noticeable in the first and third movements, where the jazz element makes itself strongly felt. The work is, nevertheless, strongly French in its over-all spirit. Mr. Sanroma's interpretation was a model of clarity. For us, the high point was the quiet, impressionistic slow movement, where he played the long solo passage with beautiful expressiveness, later weaving a lacy counterpoint over the soft orchestral fabric. His playing in the brief but difficult Finale was full of dash and dazzling virtuosity. Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra accompanied him sensitively, and all concerned won a hearty oveation at the end.

Fine Flute Solo

Simply to state that the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky played Ravel's second "Daphnis et Chloe" Suite is to say that this brilliant work, one of the most colorful creations in the realm of modern music, received an ideal performance. Everyone was in particularly fine form last night, so that this tour de force came off with an added amount of splendor. Special mention must be given however, to the exquisite flute solo by Georges Laurent.

During the past year or so the Boston orchestra has not always been up to its best playing standards. But if it continues along the lines of last night's performance, we can look forward to an outstanding season.

WORCESTER, MASS.
TELEGRAM
NOV 14 1948

Music

$250,000 Koussevitzky Fund Proposed

By RAYMOND MORIN

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is taking an important step to safeguard its financial future.

In tribute to Serge Koussevitzky's distinguished leadership for twenty-five consecutive seasons, a Koussevitzky Anniversary Fund of a quarter of a million is to be established.

The sum asked is for use without restrictions for cultural and educational development by the orchestra, and a cushion against emergencies. It is to be a revolving fund in the sense that withdrawals in any one year are to be restored as soon as practicable.

Henry B. Cabot, president of the trustees, has stated in a communication to the Friends of the Orchestra: "For twenty-five years our orchestra has been under the inspired directorship of Serge Koussevitzky. . . . It is proper that we who enjoy the concerts of our orchestra and take pride in its continuing success should seize this occasion to record in tangible form our appreciation of Dr. Koussevitzky's magnificent contribution to the fame of our historic institution."

In a letter to Edward A. Taft, as chairman, Dr. Koussevitzky, whose present season is his last as the orchestra's conductor, has warmly endorsed this plan: "I would consider it the finest of all personal tributes if my friends should take this occasion to give convincing proof that this splendid orchestra to which I have devoted my best efforts for nearly a quarter of a century shall never flounder or fall through lack of adequate financial support."

CONDUCTOR

Serge Koussevitzky, who has conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra for 25 years. A Koussevitzky Anniversary Fund of a quarter of a million dollars is to be established.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
[illegible] 14 1948

GARNERED FROM THE STUDIOS

By SIDNEY LOHMAN

WITH Dr. Serge Koussevitzky on the podium, the National Broadcasting Company will broadcast rehearsals of the Boston Symphony Orchestra starting Monday, Nov. 22. The program will be heard over the NBC network from 1 to 1:30 in the afternoon with WNBC carrying the music locally from 11:30 P. M. to midnight.

The broadcast series represents a novelty in music programs in that it is said to be the first time that a rehearsal session of a major symphony organization will be carried on a nation-wide network.

The broadcasts will be entirely unrehearsed with Mr. Koussevitzky rehearsing as he always does. The listener will hear him stop the orchestra, repeat passages, correct [illegible] and give explanations, as the group practices on the stage of Boston's Symphony Hall.

NBC also will broadcast the concerts from the Berkshire festival at Tanglewood, Mass., next summer, as well as the Boston Pops Orchestra, during its season. Previously the Boston group's activities had been features on the ABC

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE
NOV 14 1948

Boston Symphony

Sanroma Is Piano Soloist in Ravel Concerto

Prokofieff's Fifth Symphony, which opened yesterday afternoon's Boston Symphony Orchestra concert in Carnegie Hall, is by now a familiar member of the repertory, though it is not more than four years old. It was, rather, Ravel's Concerto for piano and orchestra, a work of the early thirties, that provided, curiously enough, the greater degree of novelty yesterday.

This concerto is not a favorite with pianists, which is rather a pity. For it is a work of distinction and subtlety and deserves more than the occasional performances it gets. Its long passages of an almost Satiesque simplicity and reserve give it unusual intimacy for a concerto. There is, too, no dearth of brilliant writing, of technically exacting passages, that were expertly handled by yesterday's soloist, Jesus Maria Sanroma.

Mr. Sanroma appeared here in the Ravel with the same orchestra and conductor early in 1938, when he was official pianist of the ensemble. Yesterday, audience, orchestra and conductor all greeted him as an old, familiar friend. The rapport between soloist and orchestra, so important in the performance of this work, was undoubtedly one of the surviving fruits of the years of collaboration between Messrs. Koussevitzy and Sanroma.

The second movement was especially effective in yesterday's performance. Mr. Sanroma expounded the main subject tenderly and imparted delicacy to the subsequent arabesques that serve as underpinning for the long English horn solo. The solo, too, was excellently played by Louis Speyer, who was, accordingly, invited by the conductor to take a well earned bow at the end of the concerto.

A. V. B.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

NOV 14 1948

BOSTON ORCHESTRA PLAYS PROKOFIEFF

Koussevitzky Conducts Fifth Symphony—Sanroma Heard in Ravel Piano Concerto

By OLIN DOWNES

We listened yesterday afternoon, at the Boston Symphony concert in Carnegie Hall, to one great work and three magnificent performances. For the Fifth symphony of Prokofieff looms the larger in the literature of contemporaneous music as one becomes familiar with it, and the reading of yesterday further clarified its significance. On the other hand, the piano concerto of Ravel, played by Jesus Sanroma as soloist, comes as near as may be to a charming way of saying nothing. It was heard as a vehicle for dazzling virtuosity on the part not only of the pianist but also the conductor and orchestra. And everybody who attends symphony concerts in this city knows what happens when Koussevitzky and the B. S. O. play Ravel's "Daphnis et Chloe." It was the final fillip of yesterday's concert.

The Prokofieff symphony is in no respect more striking than in the fundamental serenity and joyousness of the music. The writing, beginning in exceptionally tranquil spirit, becomes vigorous and full of strength and purpose. The themes are treated with broad free brushstrokes, and always in a vein of health and energy. The scherzo is swift, exultant, and jocular. Perhaps the richest movement is the third, a kind of passacaglia treatment of a central idea, and this in an exceptionally lofty vein. The finale is victorious affirmation.

Secure in Techniques

The performance was of the kind that can only occur after an orchestra has completely absorbed the music and become so secure in its techniques that conductor and players think only of most expressive interpretation. One does not like to read after hearing such a work, so eloquently set forth, of bureaucratic disparagement of Prokofieff's Sixth symphony in Russia, to be coupled no doubt with the withholding of the score from this country.

Ravel's concerto was memorable as a performance. We cannot think of more beautiful, brilliant and sensitive playing than that which Mr. Sanroma bestowed upon the piano part. He had all and more than the brilliancy required, but his feats of legerdemain were unimportant by the side of the beauty and nuance of his tone in the movement known as the "larghetto maestro," pontifically designated by certain of Ravel's proponents as having its suggestion in Bach. Bach your grandmother! This is a kind of parlor waltz, with due Ravelian sophistications, wholly trivial and quite empty of anything but borrowed jazz effects and unconvincing mannerisms.

But—Mr. Sanroma, as well as electrical octaves, glissandi, and what not, had a forte and mezzoforte, a pianissimo and pianisissimo, as if he were playing with three pairs of velvet gloves and his hands floating rather than pressing on the keys. Let him play any old thing with that singing tone and all those evanescent colors in it. In the finale his rhythm, syncopations and virtuoso shenanigans in the interplay with the orchestra inevitably evoked wild applause.

Remarkable Performance

He was not alone in his feat. Dr. Koussevitzky was doing as remarkable things with the orchestra, which was all nuance and electricity too. This pair, veteran master of the baton, and his younger colleague whom in a former time he almost hatched from under his wing, were at it like two race horses, doing a quite incredible feat of grace and speed and witticism. The older man was as swift as the younger one, and the younger one performed with a mastery that was matched by maturity and cunning.

Piano and orchestra were as one instrument of a thousand coruscations. No wonder that the audience applauded madly. And the excitement did not terminate there. The Ravel suite acted as it always does upon the gathering. It too, represents a performance rather than music of importance. It is a unique product of Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony. So that one thought again, how little is known of the true nature of music which is not superlatively interpreted!

NEW YORK, N. Y.
~~PM~~
STAR

NOV 15 1948

MUSICAL MISCELLANY

By Robert A. Hague

Prokofiev & Ravel

In Carnegie Hall Saturday afternoon, Serge Koussevitzky directed the Boston Symphony in repetitions of two distinguished modern works, both of which he has introduced to American concertgoers during his quarter-century as leader of the Boston orchestra — Prokofiev's Fifth Symphony, first heard three seasons ago, and Ravel's Concerto for Piano and Orchestra, which had its Boston premier in 1932 with Jesus Maria Sanroma as soloist, a spot he again filled on the present occasion. The third number on the program was Ravel's Daphnis et Chloe Suite No. 2, a work played so many times by this orchestra that it must indeed be a personal favorite by Dr. Koussevitzky's.

Hague

Already familiar through frequent hearings, the Prokofiev Fifth again impressed as an enormously skilful and telling work. That the current performance found director and orchestra not quite in top form may be excused on the grounds that they were giving their fourth concert in the Metropolitan area in four days without a break. Dr. Koussevitzky seemed to be striving against a certain inertia on the part of the players, and matters of balance and precision were sometimes less than impeccable. But perhaps one is accustomed to such perfection from this ensemble that one has become overcritical.

• • •

This listener found the performance of the Ravel Concerto, too. not quite up to expectation. A work of extraordinary brilliance it has been brought off with greater effectiveness on other occasions. Here, the fault seemed to rest with the soloist, Mr. Sanroma, or rather with the peculiarly infelicitous quality of tone of the instrument he chose to play on. For, although the pianist showed he has the requisite technical virtuosity and interpretive understanding for the work, the tone he produced was tinny, where it should have been singing, in the long cantilena of the slow movement; and dead and percussive, where it should have been ringing and brilliant, in the fast movements.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
JOURNAL AMERICAN

NOV 15 1948

• • •

Boston Matinee

Koussevitzky played only modern music at the Boston Symphony's Saturday matinee in Carnegie Hall.

Prokofieff's Fifth Symphony emerged stronger than ever as an outstanding contemporary work. Ravel's Piano Concerto sounded emptier than ever as a show piece. His "Daphnis and Chloe" suite undoubtedly held its own, overworked as it is.

The pianist Jesus Maria Sanroma played the Ravel in the brilliant, brittle, bouyant style it must have to amount to anything. Koussevitzky and the Bostonians almost matched his performance. They played the Prokofieff most convincingly.

• • •

Five Novelties

Five first performances gave a new slant to the two-piano concert of Gold and Fitzdale in Town Hall last night. Instead of the usual transcriptions, there were novelties. Only a Mozart Sonata was standard brand.

Entertainment evidently motivated the composers Manziarly, Rieti, Bowles, Tailleferre and Milhaud who wrote the new music for duo pianists. Bowles' urbane writing fitted best into the picture. His four-movement concerto needed winds, percussion, and a conductor (Lucas Foss) to pull it off. It was good fun: the audience had a good time, too.

Gold and Fitzdale belong to the effective and efficient school of pianists. They dispatch their music in a strangely colorless manner. It's all polish without much punch. Last night they appeared chiefly as entertainers.

CHICAGO, ILL.
SUN & TIMES

NOV 16 1948

Listening In

Rehearsals aired

with Don Foster

If an NBC announcer next Monday says, "We now bring you a rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra," he won't be mis-reading his script. It will be a rehearsal - the first time that a major symphony organization and a radio network have joined in broadcasting rehearsals.

NBC is trying the rehearsal broadcasts, under the direction of the orchestra's conductor, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, as an experiment in musical education programming. The conductor will serve as the instructor through directions he gives the musicians.

By this means, it is felt, listeners will be able to appreciate the finer points of a composition and at the same time get an idea of how a big musical organization goes about preparing for a concert. Dr. Koussevitzky will rehearse as he always does - stopping the orchestra, correcting and explaining.

At least this will be one program which can boast, without contradiction, that it is entirely unrehearsed.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE

NOV 16 1948

Boston Symphony to Put Its Rehearsals on the Air

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will broadcast a half hour of its Monday afternoon rehearsals under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky and guest conductors each week, beginning next Monday at 1 o'clock, over the National Broadcasting Company's network. In New York, owing to a previous Monday afternoon commitment for Station WNBC, these rehearsals will be heard through rebroadcasts on Tuesday nights from 11:30 to midnight. Other N. B. C. stations will broadcast the rehearsals directly from Boston's Symphony Hall. This is believed to be the first time that a major American symphony orchestra and a radio network are co-operating in broadcasting rehearsals. Listeners are assured that they will hear Dr. Koussevitzky rehearsing as he always does, stopping the orchestra when necessary, repeating, correcting and explaining.

The National Broadcasting Company will also broadcast programs of the Boston "Pop" season next spring and next summer's Berkshire Festival concerts. It is also planning for television of future Boston Symphony events.

MANCHESTER, N. H.
LEADER

NOV 17 1948

Mike Talk

By the Dialer

BOSTON SYMPHONY orchestra rehearsals, under the direction of its renowned conductor, Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, will be broadcast over the NBC net and aired by WBZ, starting Monday, November 22.

This will be the first time that a major symphony orchestra and a radio network have joined in broadcasting rehearsals. Dr. Koussevitsky's rehearsals have always been held behind closed doors; but in this, his 25th anniversary and final year as conductor of Boston's famed orchestra, he has agreed to open rehearsals to the largest possible public.

The rehearsal airing will be broadcast nationally from 1 to 1:30 p. m., but will be heard in New England through WBZ by delayed broadcast from 1:30 to 2 p. m.

The program marks the beginning of an association of NBC and the Boston Symphony orchestra which also will extend to broadcasts from the Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood next summer and to broadcasts of the Boston Pops orchestra.

The rehearsal broadcasts will be entirely unprepared, with Dr. Koussevitzky stopping the orchestra to correct and explain.

PEOPLE'S WORLD
SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.
NOV 17 1948

Tuning in . . .

FOR MIDDAY LISTENING PLEASURE . .

By STEVE CHARTER

SAN FRANCISCO — For many years the Boston Symphony broadcasts were a feature of the ABC network, and were [illegible] a fairly good time slot— [illegible] 7:30 on Tuesday evenings.

[illegible] ause of the web's inability to find a sponsor for the program, the orchestra was dropped.

NBC stepped right in, signed a contract with the Boston's management and promptly [illegible] concerts into a morning half-hour open period. The [illegible] that totally inadequate [illegible] be heard Monday between 11:00 a.m. and 11:30 a.m.

AN EASY OUT

If you wonder what a major orchestra, one of the best in the world, can acomplish in 30 minutes, you simply show a lack of confidence in the brain power of network brass-heads.

Instead of letting you hear a concert, NBC will carry you behind the scenes and bring you a regular rehearsal of the orchestra. And, continues the release, "Koussevitzky will rehearse exactly as he always does, stopping the orchestra, repeating, correcting and explaining."

In order to make some sense out of depriving listeners of a regular concert, NBC points out that the broadcasts are "designed to give music lovers and students an opportunity to listen to a great symphony orchestra and conductor at work."

That is unquestionably true. Rehearsal programs of that sort should have been aired a long time ago. But to use that as a substitute to an hour's finished performance is stretching it too far.

REAL CONTRIBUTION

This year also marks the twenty-fifth anniversary of Dr. Koussevitzky's association with the Boston Symphony.

During that time he has been one of the least publicized conductors, yet one whose contributions to music and musicians continues to be really important.

Just one little story to point up that fact:

Several years ago one of the financial backers of the orchestra came in to a rehearsal and stated acting the big shot all over the place. He jumped some of the members of the Symphony, told them how he was paying their salaries, and made himself generally obnoxious.

Koussevitzky walked in, sized up the situation very quickly, and told the blowhard to leave the auditorium immediately. He also made it clear that if a thing like that was repeated, even once more, and if the members of the Symphony were ever again interrupted by the money backers, he, Koussevitzky, would resign immediately.

HANOVER, PA.
SUN
NOV 18 1948

Dial Twists

Rehearsals of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be broadcast once a week by NBC starting next Mondty. The actual rehearsal will be heard from 1 to 1.30 p. m. on the NBC network, with WNBC, New York City outlet of the chain, carrying the program from 11.30 p. m. to midnight. This is believed to be the first time that a rehearsal session of a major symphony organization will be carried on a nationwide network. The broadcasts will be entirely unprepared, with Dr. Serge Koussevitzky rehearsing as he always does. The audience may hear him stop the orchestra, repeat passages, correct musicians and give explanations as the group practices on the stage in Boston's Symphony Hall. NBC also will broadcast the Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood, Mass., next summer as well as the Boston Pops Orchestra during its season. The Boston musicians' efforts in the past have been aired by the ABC network.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
1948

Rehearsals Broadcast

Here's something that ought to be good. Beginning next Monday at one o'clock the National Broadcasting Co. will broadcast half hour rehearsals of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Dr. Koussevitzky or guest conductors each week.

These rehearsals will, says the announcement, be the real thing—no rehearsed rehearsals. The conductor will stop the orchestra when necessary, make it go over passages that don't suit him, correct, explain and do everything else a conductor does—even, we hope, to threatening to extinguish errant musicians—in order to get the effect. This sounds promising.

When it comes to being curious about how things are done, no people on earth can beat us Americans, with the possible exception of the Chinese who don't do anything about it after they've found out. We buy books and flock to lectures on how to appreciate painting and music, how to cure ham, curl hair, make machines, give furniture an antique look, enjoy great books, trim hats—anything. Just put the announcement in the paper and we'll be there. We're much more interested in how than why. That's probably because we're more practical than philosophical.

Anyway, hearing how a great conductor gets his effects ought to be an illuminating experience, especially after television reveals the peril in his eye, the encouragement in his smile and the sense in the agonized gestures which now mar so many of the very effects they elicit.

HOUSTON, TEX.
CHRONICLE

Koussevitzky To Broadcast His Rehearsals

Boston, Mass.—Serge Koussevitzky, veteran conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is about to toss another tradition on the scrap heap.

For years many distinguished persons have found that access to one of Koussevitzky's rehearsals was about as easy to negotiate as getting into the chief temple of Tibet. But now Koussevitzky is to give the music lovers of the whole country the opportunity to eavesdrop on his rehearsals over the air channels of the NBC network. This may be done each Monday from 1 to 1:30 p.m., Eastern standard time, starting November 22.

A Koussevitzky rehearsal is as exciting for the privileged observer as it is a period of concentrated work and mental tenseness for conductor and orchestra. The stage of Symphony Hall becomes a laboratory in which a hundred and ten alchemists under Chief Necromancer Koussevitzky transmute printed pages into golden sound and enduring memories. Visitors, if admitted, could unwittingly have a disrupting influence on successful magic making. Hence, the exclusion rule. But knowledge of Mr. Koussevitzky's working methods has been a matter of widespread curiosity among music lovers. Now is their chance. Koussevitzky, who at the end of this season retires after a quarter century of conducting as head of the Boston Symphony, has decided to reveal his laboratory secrets over the air.

RENSSELAER, N.Y
REVIEW
11/19/48

Serious music lovers will be delighted to hear of a new program that takes the listener "back stage," musically speaking. Starting next Tuesday, over NBC each week at 11:30 p.m., rehearsals of the Boston Symphony under Dr. Serge Koussevitsky will be broadcast.

Prior to this time Dr. Koussevitsky's rehearsals have been heard behind closed doors. But this is his final year as conductor of the Boston Symphony and he has decided to open rehearsals to a vast nationwide audience.

According to the official announcement, "Dr. Koussevitsky will rehearse exactly as he always does, stopping the orchestra, repeating, correcting and explaining."

HOLLYWOOD, CAL.
CITIZEN NEWS
NOV 20 1948

Twenty-five years apparently have mellowed Serge Koussevitzky, who has just tossed a cherished tradition onto the scrap-heap. For years even Very Important Persons have found that access to one of Koussevitzky's rehearsals was about as easy to negotiate as getting into the chief temple of Tibet.

In a grand Koussevitzkian gesture, the veteran conductor has not only swung wide the rehearsal gates, but he is taking to the radio so 'the whole country can eavesdrop" on his practice period with the Bostonians. "Some unknown future geniuses of the art of orchestral interpretation may get some good ideas," said the famous conductor, who really is not as smug as his press agent makes him out to be. Future geniuses living in Hollywood, however, will have to struggle along without any ideas from the master. NBC, which is scheduled to broadcast the Koussevitzky rehearsals, starting Monday, has announced it will not bring the program west.

Oriental dancers, highl

CINCINNATI OHIO
ENQUIRER
NOV 20 1948

Student Auditions

When the Boston Symphony Orchestra plays at Music Hall Thursday, December 2, its members will hear auditions of local students interested in membership in the Berkshire Music Center student orchestra next summer. The auditions will be held at the Baldwin Piano Co., 142 W. Fourth St., at 10 and 11 a. m., and backstage at Music Hall at 7 p. m., December 2. Strings and woodwinds will be heard at 10 o'clock; brass and piano at 11. The night auditions are for harp and tympani. Application for Music Center admission may be made at audition time. Inquiries should be addressed to Thomas D. Perry Jr., Berkshire Music Center, Symphony Hall, Boston 15, Mass.

BATON ROUGE, LA.
STATE TIMES
NOV 1948

New Boston Symphony Rehearsal Show Set

Serge Koussevitzky will conduct a rehearsal of the Boston Symphony orchestra on NBC's new program, "Dress Rehearsal," for the first time, Tuesday at 1:30 p. m. over WJBO. Selections which are scheduled to be rehearsed on that day include Liszt's "Faust Symphony" and the Corelli "Suite for Strings."

This broadcast will mark the breaking of another precedent by Dr. Koussevitzky, whose rehearsals in Boston's Symphony hall always have been closed to the public. Now, however, a microphone will make it possible for the entire nation to "attend" the rehearsal.

Koussevitzky is in his 25th and final year as permanent conductor of the famed Boston Symphony. Through the presentation of many new contemporary works by European composers and the championing of music by Americans he has earned a reputation for enterprise and bold initiative.

BILLBOARD
CINCINNATI, OHIO
NOV 20 1948

Check-Up

NEW YORK, Nov. 13.—Personnel of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, before agreeing to participate in broadcasts of rehearsals on Monday afternoons at 1 p.m. over National Broadcasting Company, starting November 22, insisted first on hearing a waxed sample of the first show. The reason is said to be they feared their dignity might be lowered if listeners heard some of the abuse leveled at musickers by conductors at rehearsal. Serge Koussevitsky, who batons the Boston outfit, is said to vent his spleen at members by singling them out by name and calling them "toilet-face."

CLEVELAND, OHIO
PRESS
NOV 20 1948

The Boston Symphony Orchestra (appearing in Severance Hall, Dec. 1), is starting a $250,000 fund in tribute to Serge Koussevitzky's 25th anniversary. The conductor retires from his distinguished post at the end of this season. . . . Three Cleveland artists are included in the annual show of water colors and prints of the Pennsylvania Academy of Fine Arts, Philadelphia. They are Dorothy Rutka Kennon (wife of Jack, News political writer), Leon G. Miller*, and* Jerome Land*.*

BOSTON HERALD, SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 20,

MUSIC

Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Richard Burgin conducting, gave the sixth program of the 68th season in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. The program: Symphony in E flat, No. 99.......Haydn Symphony No. 5 in C sharp minor Mahler

By RUDOLPH ELIE

Mahler again, this time the Fifth Symphony and a harder nut to crack than the Seventh of recent memorable performance, but a great work nonetheless and a most welcome revival by Richard Burgin.

It is harder to crack because here Mahler was trying his hand at absolute music, music without programmatic significance, and this, in Mahler, is entirely out of character. Mahler could not write "pure" music; it had to be motivated by something of a pictorial or emotional nature, the more personal, the more intimate, the more vivid the better. The classical, the abstract, was completely foreign to him; he was an exposed ganglion writing of death, of child-like visions, of remembered military bands, of summer days, of the Resurrection, of fearful dreams, of inner terrors and fears.

With the Fifth, sometimes (and certainly with aptitude) called the Giant, although it may be perfectly true he had no specific program in mind, a program is unquestionably presented throughout this massive 65-minute work. It keeps getting in the way of the ostensibly absolute fabric of the work; you can hear it in the melancholy horn calls, the anguished intervals of the trumpets, the downward sighs of the cellos. A moment or two of "straight" music, a moment or two of technic or of exploration of instrumental contrasts and textures, and the program returns at a feverish level only to subside again into the composer's idea of absolute music.

This is, to me, the weakness of this work. It tries to look two ways at once and, despite the tremendous effectiveness of much of it, we are never quite sure which way Mahler is really looking. When he takes us by the hand through the meadows to tell us what the flowers say (as he does in the Third) or through the valley of the shadow (as he does in the Second), we follow in astonishment and wonder. When he tries to lead us by the hand to a funeral procession but chats during it of problems of instrumentation, we are not so readily led but we are, nonetheless, fascinated by both at once.

This, then, as nearly as I can put a finger on it, is the reason the Fifth fails to hold the audience and speak to it as the others do. Another reason is its structure. It begins with a marvelously affecting funeral march followed wihout pause, by an extended and frantic second movement which is virtually a long development of the funeral march. There follows a scherzo that begins with the wryest of waltz-like themes only to develop into an immense and tortured exploration of the orchestra's tonal resources. Then comes the adagietto, an incredibly reposed mood for strings and harp leading directly into a fugal rondo that projects the material of the adagietto on a brilliant and turbulent canvas. All in all, they prove too much of a muchness.

Yet there are moments in this work of sheerest beauty, there is no denying that, and despite its length, it is an exceedingly worthwhile musical experience that yields up its beauties in a direct ratio to the listener's willingness to listen with his head as much as his heart. And it was given a most splendid performance yesterday afternoon by the orchestra under Richard Burgin, whose feeling for Mahler is as intense as his command of the orchestra. Both the first trumpet and the first horn dominate this work throughout, and Roger Voison and James Stagliano gave brilliant performances on their instruments.

The concert opened with a seldom-heard Haydn Symphony, No. 99 in E flat, a lovely work that got a fine if not exactly inspired performance by the reduced orchestra suited to the occasion. This program will be repeated tonight and Sunday afternoon. Next week Dr. Koussevitzky returns to perform Corelli's Sarabande, Gigue and Badinerie, Boccherini's Cello Concerto in B flat with Samuel Mayes, the orchestra's new first cellist as soloist, and Liszt's "Faust" Symphony assisted by the Boston University Male Chorus and David Lloyd, tenor.

MEMPHIS, TENN.
COMMERCIAL APPEAL

NOV 21 1948

CONDUCTOR HONORED

Boston Symphony Plans Koussevitzky Fund

BOSTON, Nov. 20.—(UP)—The Boston Symphony Orchestra has announced the proposed establishment of a Koussevitzky Anniversary Fund of $250,000.

The money, to be contributed by friends of the orchestra, is to be used without restriction "for cultural and educational development by the orchestra and as a cushion against emergencies." It is to be a revolving fund, in the sense that any withdrawals in any one year are to be restored as soon as practicable.

The fund is intended as a tribute to Serge Koussevitzky, who is retiring after 25 years as conductor of the orchestra.

DAVENPORT, IOWA
DEMOCRAT & LEADER

A REHEARSAL

. . . of the Boston Symphony under Dr. Koussevitsky is as exciting for the observer as it is a period of concentrated work for the orchestra and conductor. The conductor has felt heretofore that visitors might unwittingly have a disrupting influence on successful music making, hence the exclusion. But knowledge of Dr. Koussevitsky's working methods have been a matter of widespread curiosity among music lovers and they will now have the chance to hear the rehearsals for the conductor has said, "Some unknown future geniuses of the art of orchestral interpretation may get some good ideas." The National Broadcasting company will extend its association with the Boston Symphony during the summer by presenting the Pop concerts and the annual music festival at Tanglewood, Mass.

BLACKWELL, OKLA.
JOURNAL-TRIBUNE

Music World

NEW YORK, Nov. 20 — (U.P.) — A four-day festival of contemporary French music will be presented by the Juillard School of Music in New York on Nov. 30 and Dec. 1-2-3.

A wide range will be presented, with 15 composers represented on programs including orchestra, opera, chamber music, film, choral and organ music and songs.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has announced the proposed establishment of a Koussevitzky Anniversary Fund of $250,000.

The money, to be contributed by friends of the orchestra, is to be used without restriction "for cultural and educational development by the orchestra and as a cushion against emergencies." It is to be a revolving fund in the sense that any withdrawals in any one year are to be restored as soon as practicable.

The fund is intended as a tribute to Serge Koussevitzky, who is retiring after 25 years as conductor of the orchestra.

SALT LAKE CITY, UTAH
TRIBUNE

NOV 21 19[illegible]

Boston Symphony

THE Boston Symphony orchestra has announced the proposed establishment of a Koussevitzky anniversary fund of $250,000.

The fund is intended as a tribute to Serge Koussevitzky, who is retiring after 25 years as conductor of the orchestra.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
NOV 21 1948

PRACTICE TIME

NBC will broadcast rehearsal sessions of the Boston Symphony, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky conducting, beginning tomorrow at 1 P. M. WNBC will carry the program, recorded, on Tuesday at 11:30 P. M.

ERIE, PA.
DISPATCH-HERALD-SUN

New Feature

Boston Symphony Rehearsals To Be Broadcast on Mondays

BOSTON—Rehearsals [illegible] Boston Symphony Orchestra under direction of its renowned [illegible]ctor, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, will be broadcast over the coast-t[illegible] NBC network starting Monday, Nov. 22, it was announced today by [illegible]BC and the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

This will be the first time that a major symphony organization and a radio network have joined in broadcasting rehearsals.

Dr. Koussevitzky's rehearsals have always been held behind closed doors, but in this, his 25th anniversary and final year as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, he has agreed to open the rehearsals to a nationwide radio audience.

The new program will be heard [illegible]n Mondays (NBC network, 1:00 [illegible]o 1:30 p. m., EST).

DR. KOUSSEVITZKY
Conductor

The Boston Symphony rehearsal broadcasts will be entirely unprepared. Koussevitzky will rehearse exactly as he always does, stopping the orchestra, repeating, correcting and explaining. The broadcasts are designed to give music lovers and students an opportunity to listen to a great symphony and conductor at work.

The programs will originate each week from the stage of Boston's Symphony Hall. The season's guest conductors also will be heard in the series.

COLUMBUS, OHIO
DISPATCH

NOV 21 1948

NBC to Broadcast Boston Rehearsals

Rehearsals of the Boston Symphony Orchestra under direction of its renowned conductor, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, will be broadcast over the NBC network starting Monday at 1 p. m.

This will be the first time that a major symphony organization and a radio network have joined in broadcasting rehearsals. Dr. Koussevitzky's rehearsals have always been held behind closed doors, but in this, his 25th anniversary and final year as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, he has agreed to open the rehearsals to a nationwide radio audience.

The network will also present the Boston Pops and next summer will offer concerts from Tanglewood. The Boston Orchestra was formerly associated with the American Broadcasting Co.

JOLIET, ILL.
HERALD-NEWS

NOV 21 1948

COMING THIS WEEK:

Monday — Serge Koussevitzky will conduct a rehearsal of the Boston Symphony orchestra on WMAQ's new program, Dress Rehearsal, for the first time at noon. Selections which are scheduled to be rehearsed include Liszt's "Faust Symphony" and the Corelli "Suite for Strings." This broadcast will mark the breaking of another precedent by Dr. Koussevitzky, whose rehearsals always have been closed to the public . . . "Should Wire-Tapping Be Prohibited?" will be the issue of On Trial, the ABC public interest series, which returns to the air Monday. It will be aired at 9:30 p.m. over WENR . . . Marian Anderson, famed contralto, assisted by the Telephone orchestra, will present a program in the spirit of the Thanksgiving season when she appears as guest soloist on the Telephone Hour at 8 p.m. over WMAQ. Major number will be "Aria of the Archangel" from Oscar Franck's symphonic poem, "Redemption."

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in it's concert at Music Hall, Thursday night, December 2, under auspices of J. H. Thuman.

NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
STANDARD-TIMES

HERE AND THE[illegible]—Jen[illegible] Jones is to star [illegible] Guild production [illegible] Juliet" next Fa[illegible] [illegible]

To mark the 100[illegible] of Chopin's death next yea[illegible] [illegible]

[illegible]

WASHINGTON, D. C.
STAR

NBC, while [illegible] Serge K[illegible] [illegible] with Dr. K[illegible] [illegible] ahead of the NBC [illegible]

SALT LAKE CITY, UTAH
DESERET NEWS

Lovers of Serious Music in for Rare Radio Treats

SOME OF THE BEST news to reach radio's serious music listener in this territory came through Saturday with KDYL's announcement that it would carry the Boston Symphony Orchestra rehearsal broadcasts opening on NBC Monday.

Officials of the local station said the program would be carried each Monday at 11:15 a.m. on a delayed broadcast arrangement.

This marks the first time a major symphony organization and a radio network have joined in broadcasting rehearsals. Serge Koussevitzky's rehearsals with the Boston have always been held behind closed doors, but in this, his 25th anniversary and final year as conductor at Boston, he has agreed to open the rehearsals to a nation-wide radio audience.

Meanwhile ABC is preparing to present the first of its series of Saturday afternoon broadcasts from the Metropolitan Opera Company in New York Dec. 4 (KUTA, noon), completing an interesting list of serious music programs carried locally. It looks something like this (note KSL's two programs featuring a pair of the world's greatest organists, E. Power Biggs and Alexander Schreiner):

NEW HAVEN, CONN.
REGISTER

NOV 21 1948

Rehearsal On Air

Tomorrow Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony, will break a long established precedent in regard to permitting visitors at his orchestral rehearsals. Though actual attendance at a rehearsal will still be forbidden, music lovers will be able to "listen in" on Monday rehearsals via radio, from 1 to 1:30. While the report does not give the reason for this momentous change in a 25-year rule which barred even important personages from rehearsals of the Boston Orchestra, one suspects that the great conductor has made the innovation in the interests of the Koussevitzky Fund which is being established to insure the perpetuation of the orchestra under any and whatever circumstances.

Visitors at any orchestra rehearsal would unwittingly have a disrupting influence and so the practice is generally frowned upon by conductors, though few have been as strict in the matter as the good doctor. Naturally, knowledge of his working methods has been a matter of widespread curiosity among music lovers, so this unprecedented action will be enthusiastically acclaimed and taken advantage of by many. In reply to a query about the matter, the eminent conductor replied with a smile, "Some unknown future [illegible] of the art of orchestral interpretation may get some good [illegible]." And he might have added, "And it won't do many of our present wielders of the baton any harm to listen, either."

SALT LAKE CITY, UTAH
TRIBUNE

Boston Symphony

THE Boston Symphony orchestra has announced the proposed establishment of a Koussevitzky anniversary fund of $250,000.

The fund is intended as a tribute to Serge Koussevitzky, who is retiring after 25 years as conductor of the orchestra.

NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
STANDARD-TIMES

NOV 21 1948

* * *

A New Radio Program

A new kind of radio program (and, what is rarer, an intelligent one) will begin tomorrow from 1 to 1:30 p. m. over NBC. This program will carry rehearsals of the Boston Symphony, the first time in radio history that the practice sessions of a major symphony orchestra have been broadcast over a nationwide network.

The chief interest of the program will be that it is entirely unprepared; the audience will hear Dr. Koussevitsky stop the orchestra, correct musicians, repeat passages, and give explanations as the group rehearses on the stage of Symphony Hall. Incidentally, NBC also has announced it will broadcast the concerts from Tanglewood next Summer, as well as the Boston Pops Concerts during the Pops season.

Once in our own lifetime we have attended a Boston Symphony rehearsal. This was back in our high school days when we were in Boston for a week rehearsing for a Symphony Hall concert by a group of young musicians selected from New England's secondary schools. In that concert, Dr. Koussevitsky himself conducted our teen-age group in the Tschaikovsky "Marche Slav," a tremendous thrill for this adolescent, at least, as he sawed away industriously on his violin.

Although we have missed hearing the regular concerts of the Boston Symphony on the air this season (last year's sponsor did not renew the contract), these rehearsal sessions will be valuable as a novel substitute and as a means of hearing the world's greatest symphony orchestra.

* * *

Most Popular Opera

A young man who writes from Middleboro has communicated with us to ask if we will help settle an argument. He and a friend are in disagreement about what is the world's most popular opera. The young man favors "Carmen;" his friend supports "The Marriage of Figaro."

While both these operas are regarded by us with affection, we are afraid that actual statistics support neither the claims of our young Middleboro music lover nor those of his friend. Cold figures show that since its premiere in January 1871, at the Cairo Opera House. Verdi's "Aida" has been the world's favorite opera.

That premiere, incidentally, was one of the most spectacular in history, and its staging probably never since has been equalled in lavishness and gaudy splendor. Amneris' diadem was of pure gold; Radames' helmet and shield were of solid silver. There were native Arab trumpeters, a military band from Cairo, and 300 persons for the triumphal march. Dignitaries from all over the world attended this performance, which was a sort of belated celebration of the opening of the Suez Canal.

Since its American premiere in 1873, "Aida" has been given more than 300 times at the Metropolitan alone. Perhaps the most colorful Met performance was that which opened the seasons of 1908. That production marked the debut of Arturo Toscanini as a Metropolitan Opera conductor, and also saw Emmy Destinn make her debut as Aida. Louise Homer sang Amneris; Caruso, Radames, and Scotti, Amonasro—a dream cast if ever we heard of one!

In addition to its American popularity, "Aida," according to the best authorities, also is the favorite opera in England and France. If it is not quite the most popular opera in Germany, it is nearly so.

The reasons for "Aida's" success are obvious. It contains so much—a show-off aria, heroic declamations, stirring marches, magnificient choral effects, a tender and melodious soliloquy, music of rage and remorse, and an incomparable farewell duet. As Ernest Newman has written, "It is the culminating point of the older Italian opera," raising all its ingredients to the "highest possible point of expression."

If our friends from Middleboro [illegible] we advise them [illegible] their money on "Aida."

* * *

FORT WORTH, TEXAS
MORNING STAR-TELEGRAM

NOV 21 1948

'Koussy's' Rehearsals Will Be Broadcast

BOSTON, Nov. 20 (Spl.)—Serge Koussevitsky will direct a rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on NBC's new program "Dress Rehearsal" for the first time Monday (NBC), 12 to 1 p. m., EST, WNBC rebroadcast Tuesdays, 11:30 p. m., EST. Selections which are scheduled to be rehearsed on that day include Liszt's "Faust Symphony" and the Corelli "Suite for Strings."

This broadcast will mark the breaking of another precedent by Dr. Koussevitzky, whose rehearsals in Boston's Symphony Hall always have been closed to the public. Now, however, a microphone will make it possible for the entire nation to "attend" the rehearsal.

Koussevitzky is in his 25th and final year as permanent conductor of the famed Boston Symphony.

PORTLAND, ORE.
JOURNAL

WHAT'S ON THE AIR

Veepee Recalls Sports Days

KGW is transcribing NBC's pickups from the regular Monday dress rehearsals of the Boston symphony for broadcast the next day beginning at 10 a. m. Tuesday. Koussevitzky conducts, instructs the orchestra; repeats, corrects and explains, just as he always does. In other words, the rehearsal broadcast is entirely unrehearsed.

Kay Starr, who heads her own show on ABC at 7:30 p. m. Mondays, is returning to the Indian reservation in Dougherty, Okla., where she was born, to spend the Christmas holidays. The vocalist is three quarters Iroquois, Cherokee and Choctaw and one quarter German and Irish. She has a 2-year-old daughter who has been living on the reservation with Kay's parents and who now will accompany the singer back to Hollywood.

CBS begins a five-broadcast series on "You and the Harvest" over KOIN at 10:15 tonight. Sherman Washburn interviews Milton L. Smith, national educational director for CARE, during the second quarter hour of Sunny Side Up on KEX at 4:15 p. m. Tuesday.

CINCINNATI, OHIO
POST

NOV 22 1948

Local Auditions For Tanglewood

Auditions for the student orchestras of the Berkshire Music Center, held at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass., each summer, will be held in Cincinnati by members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Dec. 2.

The Boston orchestra will give a concert in Music Hall Dec. 2, Dr. Sarge Koussevitzky conducting. Members of the orchestra who are on the faculty of the Music Center will conduct the auditions at the Baldwin Piano Co., 142 W. Fourth street.

Strings and woodwinds will be heard at 10 a. m.; Brass and piano at 11 a. m. Harp and tympani auditions will be held on the stage of Music Hall at 7 p. m. Formal application for admission to the Music Center may be made at the time of the auditions.

ST. LOUIS, MO.
~~STAR-TIMES~~
Post-Dispatch
NOV 21 1948

Boston Symphony Rehearsal Program on KSD at 10:30 Monday

AN innovation is planned for tomorrow when for the first time the radio audience will be able to hear one of the world's great orchestras rehearsing for a concert. At 10:30 tomorrow night, KSD will carry by delayed broadcast from the NBC network half an hour of a dress rehearsal by the Boston Symphony Orchestra during which Serge Koussevitzky the conductor, will direct the orchestra, stop its performance whenever he feels that the interpretation is inadequate, tell the players to repeat passages, correct and explain his reasons as he always does when preparing for a concert. Music rehearsed in the broadcast tomorrow will be Liszt's "Faust" Symphony and Corelli's Suite for Strings. NBC also plans to broadcast the Boston Symphony's Berkshire Festival concerts and its "pop" concerts next summer.

WASHINGTON D.C.
POST
NOV 21 1948

STARTING Monday from 1 to 1:30 p. m. the NBC network will broadcast a rehearsal period of the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Serge Koussevitzky. The great conductor says of the new venture, "Some unknown future geniuses of the art of orchestral interpretation may get some good ideas."

Rudolf Serkin is doing a lot of playing in Washington these days. Heard last Wednesday and Thursday nights in the Library of Congress, he will return to Constitution Hall for his second solo recital there on Monday, the 29th.

Paul Callaway, organist and choirmaster of Washington Cathedral, is keeping himself as busy as Serkin. Last Monday he conducted his choral society in a broad program including Mozart's C Minor Mass. Next Thursday he directs a large string orchestra and organ in a remarkable program of old and new music. Next Sunday he will conduct the Faure Requiem in the Cathedral at 4, and a small, choral ensemble in the Phillips Gallery at 5:15.

AUDITIONS for boys between the ages of 8 and 13 are now being held by Russell Hinds, jr., organist and choirmaster of new St. Paul's Episcopal Church, K st. between 24th and 25th sts. nw. Prospective members may see Hinds after each Sunday services, or by calling Warfield 1970.

The Prince Georges Symphony Orchestra rehearses Sundays from 4 to 6 p. m., in the Greenbelt Center School. Interested players are asked to call David Burchuk, Greenbelt 4896 or 4826.

The University of Maryland Orchestra under Frank Sykora, plays a concert, free to the public, Tuesday at 8 p. m. In Central Auditorium on the College Park campus, the music includes a Bach Fugue in G Minor, Mozart's 40th symphony in the same key, Weber's clarinet concertino, and ballet music from Gounod's Faust.

PEORIA, ILL.
JOURNAL TRANSCRIPT
NOV 22 1948

RADIO DAY BY DAY

Rehearsals Of Boston Symphony To Be Aired

By R. M. SHEPHERDSON
Radio Editor, The Peoria Journal

Rehearsals of the famed Boston Symphony orchestra under Serge Koussevitzky will be aired each week starting (WEEK) at 9 tonight. This could be a most unusual series in affording the public a chance to hear what goes on behind the scenes when a "long hair" orchestra really lets its hair down.

The broadcasts are precedent-breaking as Dr. Koussevitzky's rehearsals in Boston's Symphony Hall always have been closed to the public. The noted conductor is in his 25th and final year as permanent leader of the Boston. Selections scheduled to be rehearsed tonight include Liszt's "Faust Symphony" and the Corelli "Suite for Strings."

PEORIA, ILL.
STAR
NOV 22 1948

Radio Today

Editor's note: This program schedule is subject to change without notice.

FOR HOAGY CARMICHAEL, the Fred Waring Pennsylvanians will present some of the composer's best known tunes, on the broadcast from Kansas City, Mo. at 9 a.m. today, WEEK, WMAQ. The occasion is Carmichael's birthday.

GEN. CARLOS P. ROMULO, Philippine delegate to the United Nations General Assembly, will be interviewed by Mrs. Eleanor Roosevelt, U. S. representative, on the Eleanor and Anna Roosevelt broadcast series at 9:45 a.m. today, WIRL. Romulo is author of two best-sellers on the war, "I Saw the Fall of the Philippines" and "My Brother Americans."

"DRESS REHEARSAL" FOR THE BOSTON SYMPHONY orchestra, the first time that a major symphony organization and a radio network have ever joined in broadcasting rehearsals, will be heard for the first time at 12 noon today, NBC (9 p.m., WEEK, and 11:30 p.m. over WMAQ). Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, in his 25th and final year as conductor of the Boston Symphony, has agreed to open the rehearsals to a nation-wide radio audience. He will conduct rehearsals as usual, stopping the orchestra, correcting and explaining. Scheduled for today are Liszt's "Faust Symphony," and Corelli's "Suite for Strings."

VARIETY
NEW YORK, N. Y.
NOV 24 1948

Koussevitzky's Symph Guesting Unprecedented

Boston, Nov. 23.

For the first time in his long career, Serge Koussevitzky will be offered to various symphony orchestras as a guest conductor next season. Maestro, who is finishing his 25th year as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this season and then retiring, has never appeared with any other U. S. band except for a brief stint with the N. Y. Philharmonic as a tribute to its 100th birthday six years ago.

Judson, O'Neill & Judd, Inc., division of Columbia Artists Mgt., will handle Koussevitzky for guest dates. Maestro will conduct the Berkshire Festival this summer, when he also celebrates his 75th birthday. Charles Munch takes over the Boston Symph reins next fall.

BRISTOL, CONN.
PRESS
NOV 23 1948

Koussevitsky Lifts Ban On Watching How He Works

Serge Koussevitzky, veteran conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is about to toss another tradition on the scrapheap.

For years, many distinguished persons have found that access to one of Koussevitzky's rehearsals was about as easy to negotiate as getting into the chief temple of Tibet. But now Koussevitzky is to give the music-lovers of the whole country the opportunity to eavesdrop on his rehearsals over the air channels of the NBC network. This may be done each Monday from 1 to 1:30 p. m., EST.

A Koussevitzky rehearsal is as exciting for the privileged observer as it is a period of concentrated work and mental tenseness for conductor and orchestra. The stage of Symphony Hall becomes a laboratory in which a hundred and ten alchemists under chief necromancer Koussevitzky, transmute printed pages into golden sound and enduring memories. Visitors, if admitted, could unwittingly have a disrupting influence on successful magic-making. Hence, the exclusion rule. But knowledge of Koussevitzky's working methods has been a matter of widespread curiosity among music-lovers. Now is their chance. Koussevitzky, who at the end of this season retires after a quarter-century of conducting as head of the Boston Symphony, has decided to reveal his laboratory secrets over the air.

"Some unknown future geniuses of the art of orchestral itnerpretatich may get some good ideas," said the famous leader with a smile.

[illegible] T. OHIO
[illegible] INER

RADIO NEWS AND COMMENT

FM Growing Fast As Radio Prodigy; Big Sums Invested

BY MAGEE ADAMS.

Because its reception range is limited, FM is far more localized than AM. For that reason it's been hard to get a clear idea of what goes on elsewhere in FM broadcasting. The FM Association has filled in that blank spot with a batch of statistics that tell a significant story.

They show, for instance, that, from October, 1946, to October of this year the total investment in FM stations jumped from $10,000,000 to $360,000,000. In the same period the number of FM stations rose from a total of 68 to 688, in 417 cities. In that two-year period, too, the national total of FM receiving sets soared from 89,459 to 2,880,000.

As comparative figures go, those represent a gratifying, not to say startling, progress report.

For more than a year it's been the fashion to brush off FM as a prodigy of the radio family that turned out to be a case of arrested development. There have been grounds for that dim view. All of them have not been banished by the FMA's progress report. But it clearly calls for a substantial revision of glib conclusions about the future of FM.

At the least, the FMA's report on the last two years shows that counting FM out of the radio picture is premature. An industry with an investment of close to $1,000,000,000 isn't likely to throw in the towel without a scrap. In fact, when the stakes run to 10 figures it's a pretty safe bet that FM barely has begun to fight.

The FMA's report is timed admirably to suggest the line future skirmishing may take. This is the season when the fearful overloading of the AM band takes a heavy toll of night time reception. Although that is not its only advantage, FM has much to offer as an alternative to AM, riddled with interference.

Of course, the most impressive national statistics cannot tell the story of FM for any given dialer. FM still is, and probably always will be, what it is in any particular community. But, taking the country as a whole, it seems reasonably clear that FM is far from a dead duck.

If the next two years can show just as substantial a gain in programming, FM yet may put nourishing meat on the sturdy frame of its progress report.

Just in case you have the urge, sweeping the AM band at 1 p. m. today may turn up something decidedly unusual. ~~At that time NBC is to begin a feature called "Dress Rehearsal."~~ The rehearsal is nothing less than the Boston Symphony orchestra's, with Dr. Serge Koussevitsky conducting.

~~The half hour~~ will not be aired locally.

You may not be able to find it on any out-of-town station. But the chance is worth a try.

A workout of the Boston Symphony is a far cry from soap opera and audience participation shows. But, as daytime fare, it's not completely revolutionary. Back in the days before sobs and interviews, the networks actually aired symphonic programs in daytime. Could it be that the pendulum has begun to waver, just a little?

TELEVISION

WLWT: Channel 4.

4:15—Curtain Time.
4:30—Kitchen Club.
5:00—Junior Jamboree.
6:00—(Test Pattern).
7:30—News, Howard Chamberlain.
7:30—Video Varieties.
7:50—Newsreel (NBC).
8:00—Pointers On Pets.
8:15—Looking Ahead.
8:25—Barnyard Bunk (film).
8:30—Nothing For Granted.
8:45—Hermits of the Sky (film).
9:00—NBC Newsreel.
9:11—Rivela.

...n future
...t of orchestral
...y get some
... the famous
...e.

ST. LOUIS, MO.
~~STAR-TIMES~~
Post-DISPATCH
NOV 27 1948

Money and Music

A permanent endowment fund to support the varied activities of the Boston Symphony is being created in honor of the orchestra's retiring conductor, Serge Koussevitsky. An effort of such magnitude should be an example to St. Louisans who just now are being asked to raise $150,000 for their orchestra's annual maintenance fund.

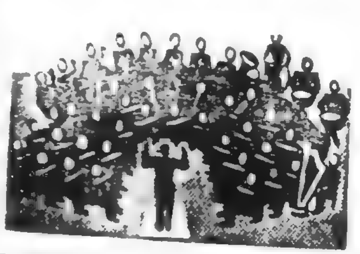
The virtues of the St. Louis Symphony have been recited frequently enough. Even when it plays old war-horses instead of breaking into new ground, it is one of the great orchestral organizations of the United States, the second oldest in fact. Especially when on tour, it speaks most effectively for St. Louis as a cultural center.

One would rather not mention art and money at the same time. The fact, however, remains that it is money which enables the fiddler to play. St. Louisans, we are sure, will keep this in mind as they enjoy their orchestra.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TELEGRAPH
NOV 27 1948

Dumont Television re-opening their auditions for new talent after a layoff during the Summer ...Daily News, hot under the collar, vehemently denying reports WPIX is for sale, as reported last week...Gautier's Canine Bricklayers, famous vaudeville dog act, on the Ed Sullivan "Toast of the Town" video show via CBS Sunday night...Olin Downes signed as narrator for the Boston Symphony rehearsal broadcasts over NBC...Los Angeles newspapers finally breaking down 10-year ban against radio and television news, in face of competition from the new Daily Mirror, not a party to the deal..."Voice of Firestone" marking its 20th anniversary next Monday night on NBC, with Niles Trammell, prexy of the network, scheduled as guest speaker ..Gene Autry named honorary member of the 4-H Clubs of America ...Tyrone Power preparing his own radio and television show?...Hooperating phone caller rocked back on her heels last week. "Is your radio turned on?" she asked. And from the other end of the wire came a small voice. "No it isn't. My mommy is punishing me, and I'm not allowed to listen."

[illegible] IIS, N.Y.



Sharps & Flats

By Longhaired Lassie

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has announced the proposed [illegible]ment of a Koussevitzky Anniversary Fund of $250,000. The money, to be ~~contributed by~~ friends of the orchestra, is to [illegible] without restriction "for cultural and educational development [illegible] orchestra and as a cushion against emergencies." It is to be a [illegible] fund in the sense that any withdrawals in any one year [illegible] be restored as soon as practicable.

[illegible] fund is intended as a tribute [illegible] Koussevitzky, who is retiring [illegible] 25 years as conductor of the [illegible]

CHICAGO, ILL.
NEWS
NOV 27 [illegible]

Maestro's Farewell

Friday evening Serge Koussevitzky makes what ~~probably will~~ be his last visit to Chicago with the Boston Symphony, as he will retire next season.

The program (at Orchestra Hall) will include the first performance here of Vaughan Williams' 6th Symphony, a Concerto in D by K.P.E. Bach (arr. Steinberg) and Beethoven's 7th Symphony.

In answer to inquiries: Handel's 'Messiah' is scheduled for two downtown performances this Christmastide: The Swedish Choral Club will sing it Sunday afternoon, Dec. 19; the Apollo Musical Club Tuesday evening, Dec. 28. Both will be at Orchestra Hall.

[206]

n future of orchestral some the famous

CINCINNATI OHIO
ENQUIRER
NOV 22 1948

RADIO NEWS AND COMMENT

FM Growing Fast As Radio Prodigy; Big Sums Invested

BY MAGEE ADAMS.

Because its reception range is limited, FM is far more localized than AM. For that reason it's been hard to get a clear idea of what goes on elsewhere in FM broadcasting. The FM Association has filled in that blank spot with a batch of statistics that tell a significant story.

They show, for instance, that, from October, 1946, to October of this year, the total investment in FM stations jumped from $10,000,000 tot $960,000,000. In the same period the number of FM stations rose from a total of 68 to 688, in 417 cities. In that two-year period, too, the national total of FM receiving sets soared from 89,459 to 2,880,000.

As comparative figures go, those represent a gratifying, not to say startling, progress report.

For more than a year it's been the fashion to brush off FM as a prodigy of the radio family that turned out to be a case of arrested development. There have been grounds for that dim view. All of them have not been banished by the FMA's progress report. But it clearly calls for a substantial revision of glib conclusions about the future of FM.

At the least, the FMA's report on the last two years shows that counting FM out of the radio picture is premature. An industry with an investment of close to $1,000,000,000 isn't likely to throw in the towel without a scrap. In fact, when the stakes run to 10 figures it's a pretty safe bet that FM barely has begun to fight.

The FMA's report is timed admirably to suggest the line future skirmishing may take. This is the season when the fearful overloading of the AM band takes a heavy toll of night time reception. Although that is not its only advantage, FM has much to offer as an alternative to AM, riddled with interference.

TELEVISION

WLWT: Channel 4.

4:15—Curtain Time.
4:30—Kitchen Club.
5:00—Junior Jamboree.
6:00—(Test Pattern).
7:30—News, Howard Chamberlain.
7:30—Video Varieties.
7:50—Newsreel (NBC).
8:00—Pointers On Pets.
8:15—Looking Ahead.
8:25—Barnyard Bunk (film).
8:30—Nothing For Granted.
8:45—Hermits of the Sky (film).
9:00—NBC Newsreel.
9:11—Rivela.

Of course, the most impressive national statistics cannot tell the story of FM for any given dialer. FM still is, and probably always will be, what it is in any particular community. But, taking the country as a whole, it seems reasonably clear that FM is far from a dead duck.

If the next two years can show just as substantial a gain in programming, FM yet may put nourishing meat on the sturdy frame of its progress report.

Just in case you have the urge, sweeping the AM band at 1 p. m. today may turn up something decidedly unusual. ~~At that time NBC is to begin a feature called "Dress Rehearsal."~~ The rehearsal is nothing less than the Boston Symphony orchestra's, with Dr. Serge Koussevitsky conducting.

The half hour will not be aired locally.

You may not be able to find it on any out-of-town station. But the chance is worth a try.

A workout of the Boston Symphony is a far cry from soap opera and audience participation shows. But, as daytime fare, it's not completely revolutionary. Back in the days before [illegible] and interviews, the networks actually aired symphonic programs in daytime. Could it be that the pendulum has begun [illegible], just a [illegible]?

ST. LOUIS, MO.
~~STAR-TIMES~~
Post-DISPATCH
NOV 27 1948

Money and Music

A permanent endowment fund to support the varied activities of the Boston Symphony is being created in honor of the orchestra's retiring conductor, Serge Koussevitsky. An effort of such magnitude should be an example to St. Louisans who just now are being asked to raise $150,000 for their orchestra's annual maintenance fund.

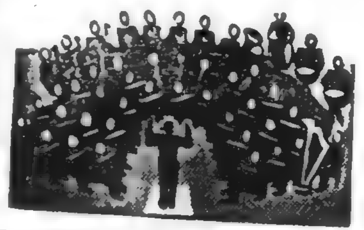
The virtues of the St. Louis Symphony have been recited frequently enough. Even when it plays old war-horses instead of breaking into new ground, it is one of the great orchestral organizations of the United States, the second oldest in fact. Especially when on tour, it speaks most effectively for St. Louis as a cultural center.

One would rather not mention art and money at the same time. The fact, however, remains that it is money which enables the fiddler to play. St. Louisans, we are sure, will keep this in mind as they enjoy their orchestra.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TELEGRAPH
1948

Dumont Television re-opening their auditions for new talent, after a layoff during the Summer ...Daily News, hot under the collar, vehemently denying reports WPIX is for sale, as reported last week...Gautier's Canine Bricklayers, famous vaudeville dog act, on the Ed Sullivan "Toast of the Town" video show via CBS Sunday night...Olin Downes signed as narrator for the Boston Symphony rehearsal broadcasts over NBC...Los Angeles newspapers finally breaking down 10-year ban against radio and television news, in face of competition from the new Daily Mirror, not a party to the deal..."Voice of Firestone" marking its 20th anniversary next Monday night on NBC, with Niles Trammell, prexy of the network, scheduled as guest speaker... Gene Autry named honorary member of the 4-H Clubs of America ...Tyrone Power preparing his own radio and television show?... Hooperating phone caller rocked back on her heels last week. "Is your radio turned on?" she asked. And from the other end of the wire came a small voice, "No it isn't. My mommy is punishing me, and I'm not allowed to listen."

[illegible] PLAINS, N.Y
[illegible]
11/26/48



Sharps & Flats

By Longhaired Lassie

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has announced the proposed establishment of a Koussevitzky Anniversary Fund of $250,000.

The money, to be contributed by friends of the orchestra, is to be used without restriction "for cultural and educational development by the orchestra and as a cushion against emergencies." It is to be a revolving fund in the sense that any withdrawals in any one year are to be restored as soon as practicable.

The fund is intended as a tribute to Serge Koussevitzky, who is retiring after 25 years as conductor of the orchestra.

CHICAGO, ILL.
NEWS
NOV 27 1948

Maestro's Farewell

Friday evening Serge Koussevitzky makes what probably will be his last visit to Chicago with the Boston Symphony, as he will retire next season.

The program (at Orchestra Hall) will include the first performance here of Vaughan Williams' 6th Symphony, a Concerto in D by K.P.E. Bach (arr. Steinberg) and Beethoven's 7th Symphony.

In answer to inquiries: Handel's 'Messiah' is scheduled for two downtown performances this Christmastide: The Swedish Choral Club will sing it Sunday afternoon, Dec. 19; the Apollo Musical Club Tuesday evening, Dec. 28. Both will be at Orchestra Hall.

BOSTON HERALD, SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 27,

MUSIC

Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, gave the seventh program of its 68th season in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. The Boston University Male Chorus (James R. Houghton, conductor) and David Lloyd, tenor, were the assisting artists. The program:

Sarabande, Gigue and Badinerie . . . Corelli
Concerto for Cello in B flat, Op. 34 . . . Boccherini
Faust Symphony . . . . Liszt

By RUDOLPH ELIE

When you find 106 men of the Boston Symphony orchestra on the stage at once flanked on one side by an organ, on the other by cymbals and backed up at the rear by another 100 or so members of a chorus gowned in bright red cassocks, you have every reason to expect that sooner or later you are going to hear musical sounds of a volume sufficient to arouse the marble statues in their distant niches.

In the case of Liszt's "Faust" Symphony it is nearly a 70-minute wait before this enormous apparatus is called fully into play, and those 70 minutes do not always slip by as fast as they might. Liszt, with the Faust story setting fire to his imagination, is in no hurry to quench the flames. The result is a very hot time for the conductor, orchestra, chorus and soloist, but the heat, as through a fireplace screen, does not always prove incandescent to the audience.

This is not that the "Faust" Symphony is inferior music or that it is the combination of bombast, ostentation and sentimentality it is frequently held to be. Traces of all these things are in its three long movements; Liszt was far too much a man of the world at 35 to be unaware of his earthy motives. Yet there is no doubt—certainly in the extended and ineffably tender portrait of Gretchen—that Liszt was sincere in his artistic aim to convey some of the impact of the Faust story, nor is there any doubt that there are many moments in this work of the noblest inspiration.

Where Liszt went wrong was in the choice of so large a canvas in time. Unlike Mahler, who was to exceed him by far in this respect, Liszt lived in the age of the da capo, the repeat. He does not use formal repeats in "Faust," but he does, in fact, repeat himself again and again. He once said that "Faust" could quietly await the understanding that is its due. It did wait, and it is understood as much as any great musical effort is ever understood. Liszt erred only in failing to grasp that the ears of the future would not need verbatim repeats; that they'd be sharp enough to get the idea once around. Could this work be compressed by as little as 20 minutes, I think we'd all be quicker to recognize it for what it really is, a great and noble work.

Ever since the season began it has been clear that the orchestra's new first cellist is an artist of the first rank. Yesterday, however, the real extent of his artistry became evident when 31-year-old Samuel Houston Mayes, who came to the orchestra from the Philadelphia Symphony (where he became first cellist at the age of 22), played Boccherini's lightweight but nonetheless most attractive B flat major Concerto.

What Mr. Mayes has, besides a most formidable technic and an impassioned but well controlled musical temperament, is tone, a tone that glows like an ember; a tone that is full and rich but never cloying, that is expressive but never over-emotional. The cadenzas of the first and last movements were somewhat over-tense, it seemed to me, and there were a couple of imperfect meetings of soloist and orchestra, but it is safe to say that Mr. Mayes is a very advanced musician and artist, and it is certainly a pleasure to have him with us.

The concert began with one of those magic spells of performance created so inimitably by Dr. Koussevitzky in the Sarabande, Gigue and Badinerie of Corelli, while the performance of the "Faust" Symphony by conductor, orchestra, the Boston University Male Chorus (which sounded quite as splendid as it looked) and David Lloyd, a fine tenor, was often electrifying. For his part Dr. Koussevitzky never looked better or gave a more ardent reading of the music before him.

* * *

The orchestra goes on its western tour next week returning December 10 and 11 under Leonard Bernstein, who will conduct Beethoven's C major Piano Concerto at the piano, and offer Schumann's Manfred Overture, Sat's two "Gymnopedies" and the Stravinsky' "Firebird" Suite.

ROCHESTER, N. Y.
DEMOCRAT-CHRONICLE
NOV 28 1948

* * *

Koussevitzky Admirers Plan Big Fund

IN TRIBUTE to Serge Koussevitzky's distinguished leadership of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for 25 consecutive seasons, a Koussevitzky Anniversary Fund of $250,000 is to be established. Koussevitzky, who retires at the end of the current season, turning over his baton to Charles Munch, will bring the Bostonians to the Eastman on Dec. 8.

Trustees of the orchestra announce that the fund will be used without restrictions for cultural and educational develop- by the orchestra and as a cushion against emergencies.

* * *

Globe

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 27,

MUSIC

Mayes Cello Soloist at Symphony; Liszt's "Faust" Score Revived

By CYRUS DURGIN

There are two very special aspects to this week's concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra: the debut as soloist of Samuel Mayes, the new first cellist, and a revival of the "Faust" Symphony by Liszt. Serge Koussevitzky's program begins with the Sarabande, Gigue and Badinerie of Corelli, arranged for massed strings by Ettore Pinelli.

Mr. Mayes is heard in the B-flat Concerto, Op. 34, of Boccherini, a score not played at these concerts since 1937. Certain important passages in various works, earlier this season, had given us a notion that Mr. Mayes is a fine cellist. But it took his magnificent performance yesterday to reveal how superb a musician he is. Every phrase was articulated with the greatest dexterity, the finest style and pervading charm. He has a virtuoso technic that makes his playing all music.

His tone—and in this description, the adjectives must seem mixed—is slender but clear, luminous, never dry and never lush, and it carries beautifully even in the softest pianissimo. Always it is a sonority, for it never growls, rasps or wheezes. His sense of dynamic range is unusually broad. But best of all, Mr. Mayes makes every note sing, even in the acrobatic cadenzas—which presumably were those added by Gruetzmacher. The result was a performance wonderfully supple and gracious. When it was over Mayes received a full-sized ovation.

The "Faust" Symphony remains a vast and remarkable work, a strange combination of sensuousness and spirituality, just as Liszt himself was a complex organism of the same qualities. Its complete romanticism and its length may try the patience of modern listeners, but nevertheless it is music of color and imagination, by turn complex and naive, yet always interesting and frequently imposing.

The same four brief cuts—three in the first movement and one in the second—made by Mr. Koussevitzky at the last performances in 1941 were observed again yesterday. But why not make a sizable cut in the "Gretchen" movement which, lovely though it is, rambles on for 130 or so pages of score?

There are two ways of looking at the chorale finale on Goethe's text. Listening to the up-surging, glorious sound of orchestra, organ and male voices, one can feel very exalted and pious, indeed. But the words are another matter, and the two final lines: "Das Ewig-Veibliche Zieht uns hinan" are nonsense, even if by Goethe. "The Eternal Feminine draws us up"! Bosh! Rot! Bah! Humbug! Today, when the psyche of the male and the female are understood in the cold light of psychology, all that is known to be romantic vaporing. But perhaps Goethe and Liszt themselves didn't really believe it!

The chorus was the Boston University Male Chorus, prepared by Dr. James R. Houghton, and the soloist that admirable tenor, David Lloyd. The chorus sang quite well, and Mr. Lloyd, with a voice that soared easily over the mass of tone, distinguished himself both by the accuracy and the warmth of his performance. As for the orchestra and Mr. Koussevitzky, they wrought a miracle of poetic eloquence.

MUSIC

Richard Burgin Gives Superb Performance of the Mahler Fifth

By CYRUS DURGIN

[illegible]

[illegible] sympathetic interpreter. The string tone [illegible] lovely, and the balance between strings and woodwind of the [illegible] delicacy. In retrospect this [illegible] to rank among the [illegible] of the season.

Nov 27

Art—Music—Theater

Koussevitzky with

Mayes Heard In Concerto By Boccherini

By L. A. Sloper

For his seventh program of the season (Nov. 26-27) Serge Koussevitzky chose Corelli's Sarabande, Gigue and Badinerie, arranged for string orchestra by Ettore Pinelli; Boccherini's Cello Concerto in B-flat major, and Liszt's "Faust-Symphony." Samuel Mayes was the cello soloist. The Boston University Male Chorus, trained by James R. Houghton, assisted in the Liszt, along with David Lloyd for tenor soloist.

Mr. Mayes, who came to Boston from Philadelphia this year to occupy the first chair in the cello section, made his first appearance here as soloist. He left an excellent impression. He has a broad, singing tone, and a technique that proved fully equal to Boccherini's demands.

His virtues were most apparent in the Adagio, where lyrical utterance has free expression. This movement was exquisitely played. In some of the rapid runs of the first movement his rhythm was somewhat inflexible, and his articulation not quite clear. In the cadenza of the last movement his tone sometimes tended to be a little sharp. But his performance was at all times musicianly in concept and no doubt his minor flaws will disappear with experience. Soloist, conductor and orchestra received an ovation.

Liszt's Three Character Pictures were painted in the usual style, the only style that would suit them — with sentimentality and with bombast. They represent the acme of the Sturm und Drang manner. This mad passion, this demonic fury and more demonic laughter, are experienced only in the theater, or in the lives of fictional heroes of the period. The Gretchen movement has many melodic and harmonic beauties, but they are too much insisted upon. The final chorus of translation is a forecast of the Wagnerian sensuous religiosity.

Ezio Pinza, who will give a recital in Symphony Hall on Sunday afternoon, Dec. 5.

The Boston University Chorus appeared in bright red gowns that suggested the Boy Cardinal of Miss Enters. Or were they designed in honor of Mephistopheles? No; that would not comport with the choir's celestial tones. I give it up; but they distracted attention throughout the concert. As singers, the young men were faithful to the score and the director. Mr. Lloyd, after overcoming a bad tremolo, soared easily above the triumphant hosts. An ovation for all followed.

Post ~~Nov 27~~

SYMPHONY CONCERT

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

One by one the Boston Symphony Orchestra's first chairs are being filled by American players. We now have John Holmes as first oboe, Manuel Valerio as first clarinet and Samuel Mayes as first cellist. Mr. Mayes, who joined the orchestra this season, made his debut as soloist yesterday afternoon in the B-flat major Concerto of Boccherini. This worthy successor to Jean Bedetti came to us from the Philadelphia Orchestra and is only 31. His grandfather was a full-blooded Cherokee Indian and his father's first cousin was none other than Will Rogers.

The concerto in question, sounding like lesser Mozart, is not of great musical import. Nor, outside the cadenzas, did it greatly tax Mr. Mayes' virtuosity. It did serve to call attention to his beautiful tone and sensitive phrasing. Sharing the first part of the current program with the concerto is an even earlier Italian work, the three movements from violin sonatas of Corelli as arranged for string orchestra by Ettore Pinelli. Again Dr. Koussevitzky tended to drag the Sarabande and to take the little Badinerie so fast that the men could just about manage it.

And speaking of dragging, though there were compensations in the way of beautiful tone and poetic insight, Dr. Koussevitzky surely took his time with Liszt's "Faust" Symphony, which brought the program to a close 15 minutes later than the program book specified. Those who attend this evening's concert are hereby warned.

By most people Liszt is accepted today with strong reservations and a conductor minded to sell the "Faust" Symphony, admittedly his greatest work, to the doubting ones would be well advised not to linger over it quite so lovingly as Dr. Koussevitzky did yesterday. The [illegible] Symphony players could handle it all right and, as has just been said, the listeners were permitted to revel in beautiful sounds. It was not so easy for the tenor soloist, David Lloyd, to share Liszt's long phrases at Dr. Koussevitzky's tempo. Consequently, the voice we have admired so much in Goldovsky opera and at a previous Boston Symphony appearance, was not heard to the best advantage. In the final chorus Dr. Koussevitzky turned this time not to the Harvard Glee Club, but the Boston University Male Chorus, as trained by James R. Houghton. The young men acquitted themselves well.

Personally, I am all for Liszt in general and for the "Faust" Symphony in particular. In listening to it, it is well to bear in mind the number of works that Wagner had not written by 1854, and the fact that Mahler, Strauss and Debussy were not yet born; also that the Russian Five and Tchaikovsky were boys in, or not yet in, their teens. Berlioz, to be sure, was around, but he didn't write that well.

YAKIMA, WASH.
MORNING HERALD
2 8 1948

Boston Symphony Establishes Fund

The Boston Symphony orchestra has announced the proposed establishment of a Koussevitzky anniversary fund of $250,000.

The money, to be contributed by friends of the orchestra, is to be used without restriction "for cultural and educational development by the orchestra and as a cushion against emergencies." It is to be a revolving fund in the sense that any withdrawals in any one year are to be restored as soon as practicable.

The fund is intended as a tribute to Serge Koussevitzky, who is retiring after 25 years as conductor of the orchestra.

USIC

Burgin Gives Performance Mahler Fifth

YRUS DURGIN

rgin, again conducting of the Boston Symstra this week, covered glory yesterday after-ing a superb perform-
Fifth Symhpony by ler.

concert, quite appropris awarded the Kilenyi nor of the Bruckner Somerica, an organization furthering the music of nd Mahler. The press made in the tists' tage by Warren orey honorary director the Fifth had not been done

1940, and it was high other hearing. It is an nd powerful work, char-y Mahler in the vast of its orchestral writ-the warmth, the emoh, the occasional grotes-that composer. It also hat sub-surface demoniac culiar to Mahler.
fault of the score is its wards of an hour is a c for a listener to absorb:
who bring patience and the hearing of this piece end, well rewarded.
ds "inspired performance"
er's corn, but there are n no other terse phrase
This was truly an inspired ce, one of tremendous e and eloquence. The or-ng the adagietto beauti-the storminess of the vement was the ultimate onic drama. The other ements fared as well.
all was over, Symphony ed with applause and some in which Mr. Burgin di-at all hands share. And deserved it.
ogram began with a com-
y rare Haydn Symphony,
No. 99, and 10th in the aydn composed for the concerts in London. This to be first-class Haydn, too.
of extreme grace, with a lmost Mozartean, and one fleeting finales that pause y just before the coda. Why ot been done at these con-ce 1937, let him who knows answer.
Haydn as with Mahler, Mr.
was an expert and sympaterpreter. The string tone ely, and the balance be-rings and woodwind of the delicacy. In retrospect this ought to rank among the f the season.

trained by James he young men aces well.
am all for Liszt in the "Faust" Sym-ular. In listening
o bear in mind the s that Wagner had 1854, and the fact rauss and Debussy
orn; also that the d Tchaikovsky were yet in, their teens.
re, was around, but that well.

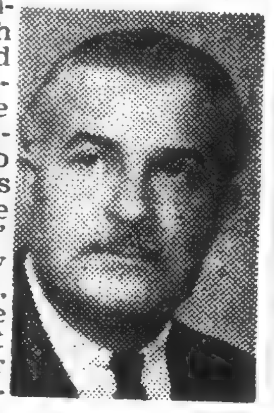
NORFOLK, VA.
VIRGINIAN-PILOT

Fiedler to Bring 'Boston Pops' To New Air Show December 12

Exponents of Exciting Programs To Be Aided By Robert Merrill

Authur Fiedler will bring his nationally known "Boston Pops Orchestra" to a revamped afternoon concert show starting Sunday, December 12 (NBC, 5:30 p. m.). Robert Merrill, who has been star of the present program for two years, will be the spotlighted vocal soloist on the new show.

Fiedler and the "Boston Pops" have become synonymous with good music and exciting programs on the lighter side. Music from Bach to boogie-woogie is the range of the "Boston Pops" repertoire. Now over 60 years old, they have become an institution not only in their home city, Boston, but throughout the country by means of their broadcasts, recordings and concert tours.



Arthur Fiedler

Fiedler comes of a musical family. His father was a violinist in the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and his grandfather was a musician in Europe. His three sisters all are musicians. Fiedler left Boston at the age of 16 and went to Europe with his family. It was there he first became a conductor. He returned to this country before World War I, and joined the Boston Symphony as a violinist. He remained in that orchestra until several years after he had become regular conductor of the "Pops" in 1930.

Baritone Robert Merrill, who "grew up" on the radio, is a popular concert favorite and a leading singer at the Metropolitan Opera. He has received many honors, including invitations to sing before Congress and in the White House. Like Fiedler, Merrill is well known through his recordings, as well as concert and opera appearances.

The new program will present these artists in the "music America loves best," music which the public has expressed approval of as performed by these musicians. The programs will originate in Boston from the stage of Symphony Hall.

CLEVELAND, OHIO
NEWS

Rehearses Bach

[illegible] rehearsal Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony [illegible] last Monday was unusually interesting. Even those unfamiliar [illegible] symphonic music and symphony orchestras were attracted to [illegible] Crap dropped in our office the next day after the broadcast and [illegible] paid little attention to symphonic programs in the past, but [illegible] would listen to this one. "I heard Koussevitzky singing and talking and really found something human about this symphony business," he explained.

So tonight, WTAM at 7:30, we hear a half hour rehearsal of the C. P. E. Bach Concerto for Orchestra in D.

MADISON, WIS.
CAPITAL TIMES

[illegible] 3 0 1948

By JEANNE REMUS

THE LIFE story of a World War I veteran will be unfolded from an elevator located in a building in a large American city during This Is Your Life tonight at 7:30 on WIBA and WIBA-FM.

The subject, whose identity will not be revealed before the broadcast, will have his past paraded before him, will relive events long past and will be reunited with friends and relatives he hasn't seen for over 20 years.

◆ ◆ ◆

Olin Downes, noted author, lecturer, and chief music critic of the New York Times, is commentator on Dress Rehearsal, the Boston Symphony orchestra rehearsal program heard tonight at 10:30 on WIBA and WIBA-FM.

For the second broadcast of Dress Rehearsal, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony, will work with the orchestra on C.P.E. Bach's "Concerto for Orchestra in D."

◆ ◆ ◆

MADISON, WIS.
STATE JOURNAL

NOV 3 0 1948

DR. SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY

[illegible] 10:30

Boston Symphony Rehearsals to Be Broadcast by NBC

Rehearsals of the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of its conductor, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, will be broadcast over the coast to coast NBC network and aired locally by Stations WBZ and WBZA starting Nov. 22, it was announced yesterday.

Dr. Koussevitzky's rehearsals have always been behind closed doors, but during his 25th anniversary and final year as conductor of the orchestra, he has agreed to open rehearsals to the public.

The rehearsals will be broadcast from 1 to 1:30 P. M. but will be heard in New England through WBZ and WBZA by delayed broadcast from 1:30 [illegible]

SYMPHONY CONCERT

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

In furthering the cause of Mahler, Richard Burgin has added to his own stature. At this week's Symphony Concerts the associate conductor is presenting the Austrian's Fifth Symphony, last heard here in 1940, and never before in Boston has he conducted with such authority, with such communicative eloquence. On previous occasions in the music of Mahler, and of others, Mr. Burgin has no doubt had a complete grasp of the score, but to understand music is one thing, to transmit that understanding to others is something else. And to do it in such a way that not only the orchestra, but the listeners are fired with the conductor's enthusiasm is something else again.

That is exactly what happened yesterday. The Mahler Fifth is a long work, and Mr. Burgin saw fit to restore cuts which Dr. Koussevitzky had made. Yet there was every sign that the audience was absorbed, while at the end it was genuinely excited, rewarding the deserving Burgin with shouts of "bravo," with cheers and stamping.

For these three performances (the symphony will be played again tomorrow afternoon) Mr. Burgin has received the Mahler medal, presented by the Bruckner Society of America. But not for them alone. He has given us the Mahler First, our only hearing of the first movement of the Third, while he introduced to us the Fourth, first through two movements and then as a whole. On another occasion, pinch-hitting for Dr. Koussevitzky, he conducted "The Song of the Earth." This medal bears a head of the composer and his prophetic words, "My time will come." Long neglected and generally misunderstood, he is triumphantly coming into his own.

The Fifth Symphony is a mighty work designed on a grand scale. The opening funeral march and the stormy movement that follows are thematically related, as are the heavenly Adagietto, for strings and harp, and the glorious Rondo Finale, in the form of a triple fugue, that would alone serve to mark Mahler a master among masters. Between comes one of the most elaborate of orchestral scherzi, its mood and manner typically that of the Austrian dance. It is too much to say that the symphony as a whole is pure gold. There are brief lapses into commonplace in the first three divisions, but in the last two Mahler redeems himself. A beautiful performance of Haydn's delightful Symphony in E-flat, No. 99, unheard here for 11 years, began the concert. Mr. Burgin was as felicitous with Haydn as he was compelling with Mahler.

BOSTON SYMPH REHEARSAL
Producer, Jack Wright
30 Mins.; Mon. 1 [illegible]
Sustaining
NBC, from Boston

First designed as a prestige show for FM a year ago, this airing of a rehearsal of the Boston Symphony orchestra under Serge Koussevitzky adds up to one of the top instructive musical packages on the air.

Show takes the listener behind the scenes as the conductor rehearses the orch for its weekly concert series. Mike setups include one on the conductor's music desk, others placed before the ceiling-to-floor rehearsal curtain swung 20 feet away from the stage. A brief talk-in by Olin Downes, who planed up for the first assignment, leads directly to the desk mike of the conductor, long famous hereabouts for his rehearsal technique.

Koussevitzky, whose Russian accent is still fairly thick after 24 years in the U. S., nonetheless has a natural approach and a distinguished speaking voice. Part of his radio charm springs from his way with English sentences; often he gets them just a little mixed but they are usually very much to the point. Nor is he the speech-making type of conductor; he never gives inflated lectures on the music. His approach is severely technical yet warmed with occasional flashes of musical insight for the audience.

First broadcast found him rehearsing Liszt's Faust Symphony. "Don't scratch, gentlemen," he would say, "or de music must sing, gentlemen." For the first 20 minutes he stopped the orch every few bars, finishing up with a full reading of what he had gone over. Impression was he stopped them too much. In the end he played far beyond what he'd rehearsed and the musicians, who hadn't seen the music before, sounded just as good. Downes, now pretty secure on the air, broke in with comment from time to time, but the show was about 100% Koussevitzky.

Elie.

MEDFORD, ORE.
MAIL TRIBUNE

Boston Symphony Rehearsals Dated Weekly On KMED

Starting tonight KMED will broadcast a half-hour of the rehearsal of the Boston symphony orchestra, under direction of Dr Serge Koussevitzky. This will be entirely unrehearsed, with Dr. Kousssevitzky stopping the orchestra when necessary, explaining how a certain passage should be played, then having them play that passage, or others, over and over until they have it right.

Olin Downes, chief music critic of the New York Times, will explain to the radio audience what is going on.

For the broadcast tonight, Dr Koussevitzky will work with the orchestra on Bach's "Concerto for Orchestra in D." The new series of broadcasts will be heard every Tuesday at 10 p.m.

What Happens Here Is Only Part of the Story

Symphony Rehearsal "Program Notes . . ."

By JOHN WM. RILEY

The orchestra played softly while the announcer "got the show on the air" and the commentator had his brief say. Then at a signal from the producer, the orchestra stopped and the conductor in deliberate accents said, "We will now rehearse the first movement."

Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony, breaking another precedent, were on the air in rehearsal. For many years bona fide music reviewers have been the only outsiders permitted at Boston Symphony rehearsals. Obviously, visitors would be a disturbing element at rehearsals, where intense concentration is necessary, because it is here that the real work is done.

Now the Boston Symphony and ning a series of half-hour rehearsals over the air, to be broadcast by NBC—WBZ in New England from 1:30 to 2 o'clock Monday afternoons. This is an actual rehearsal for which there is no preparation except by the radio engineers, and the library staff of the orchestra which must get the score and parts ready. Here's how the rehearsal went for the first few minutes of last Monday's broadcast:

Serge Koussevitzky raised raised his baton, and the orchestra launched into the quiet opening passages of Liszt's "Faust" Symphony, to be played at the concerts of tomorrow afternoon and Saturday evening.

"Tutti," Mr. Koussevitzky called, after a measure or so, which is the Italian for "together." He stopped the orchestra and said, "Will you please . . . again . . . the beginning" in syllables clear enough to the ear, but not reproduceable in print. Although his meaning is always clear, Dr. Koussevitzky's picturesque pronunciation and idiom are a law unto themselves. By now, the radio audience is thoroughly familiar with them and the quotations here are only an approximation.

"No," he called, after a few measures again, "it is not good. On the second beat you are not together." They tried again, and in a songful passage he called "dolce." Then, "No. No. It is piano (soft). Forte-piano. No more crescendo." As the orchestra continued Mr. Koussevitzky sang along with them in a voice which, if not exactly musical, certainly conveyed his feeling about music.

Speaks Warmly, Then Is Hurt

Already, after a few minutes of rehearsal, the listening audience could have gotten a pretty good idea of how things ordinarily went. When the passage finally came to Mr. Koussevitzky's satisfaction, he spoke warmly as the orchestra played, "dot is splendid." Later he quieted the first clarinet, saying "you are too much."

And again he called over the orchestra, "You are not together. My dear friends you are not together," which may sound like a sharp criticism of a great orchestra, but the band was playing for a conductor's phenomenal ear. "Please begin without any acCENTS" he continued.

After a few pages, the conductor suddenly slapped his stick down on his score, looked about with a rather hurt expression, as though a mistake had grieved him. He patiently explained what he wanted and said, "will you please, at B begin." The orchestra began to play again.

The letter B Dr. Koussevitzky indicated, needs a bit of explanation. His conductor's score, and all the parts, are numbered or lettered at regular intervals—at every five, 10, or perhaps 20 bars. Hence the conductor can stop the orchestra at any poin,t and then direct the band to begin again, at B, at five before B, or whatever seems most convenient.

So the rehearsal went on. Conductor and men worked over the first movement, almost phrase by phrase, until the details came to the leader's satisfaction. But before the half-hour of the broadcast was over, the movement was played through without a stop. Hence, listeners had the opportunity of hearing the details worked out and then the finished product.

A newspaper radio editor who attended said it was a "wonderful luxury" to see what was going on. And a broadcasting expert thought the orchestra and Dr. Koussevitzky, "with those wonderful facial expressions, ought to be on television."

The concert goer, or radio listener, seldom realizes how many hours of work are necessary to make a single hour of pleasureable music. The rehearsal of Monday afternoon was three hours long, with a short break, although the broadcast lasted only half an hour. At 5 o'clock that afternoon, a second practice session was held. Ordinarily, the Boston Symphony rehearses four times a week, so that from early October, when the new season begins, until mid-August, when the Berkshire Festival ends, most of the men are playing in public or rehearsing (or both) about six days a week. A pretty heavy schedule. But musical New Yorkers say that is why Bostonians have the finest orchestra in the country.

Other Long Hours Required

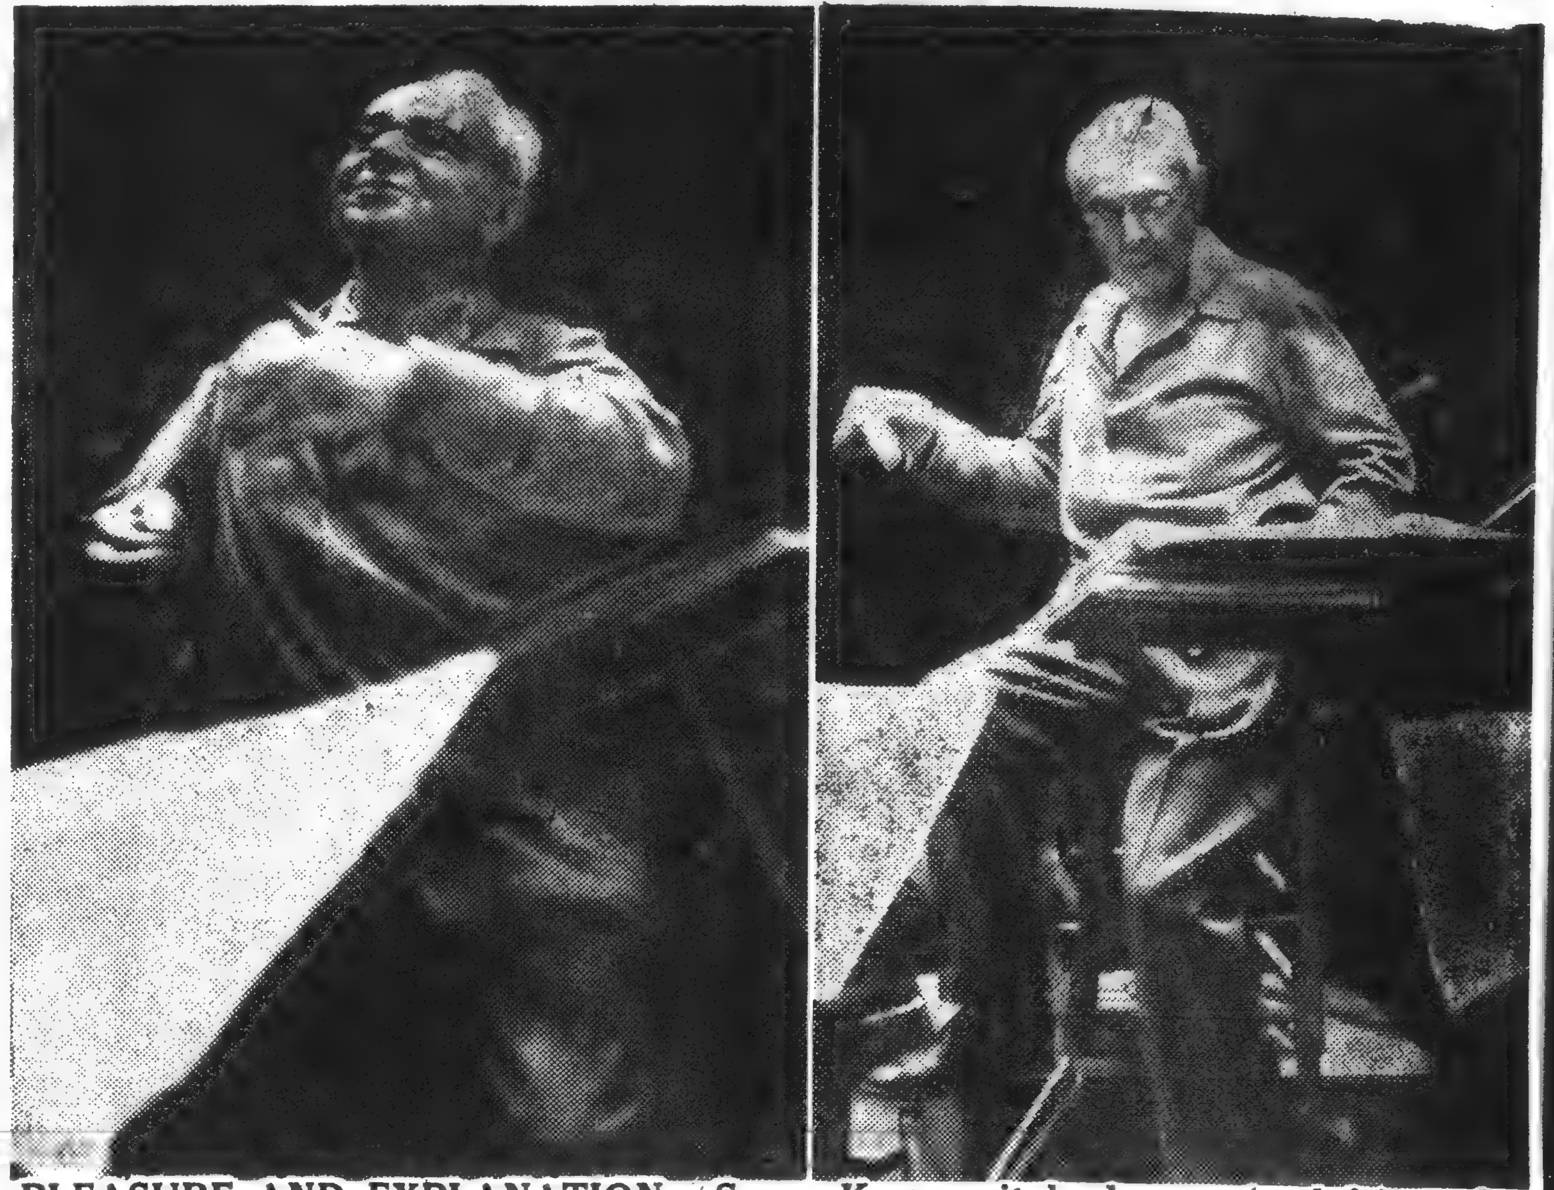
But what happens at rehearsal is only part of the story. The music must be prepared well in advance. The scores often must be amended, the parts checked, and then put out on the days of rehearsal and performance.

Leslie Rogers, librarian of the Boston Symphony, says that he begins lining up a season's music early in October. "If we're going play a Copeland Symphony in December, I put our bid in early with the publishers." Most contemporary music, and some old music, is rented from the publishers. Because a piece may have been played by another orchestra since the Boston Symphony last performed it, the score and parts may be marked up with new directions, with cuts and changes.

"For instance," said Mr. Rogers, "the Prokofieff 'Scythian' Suite, which we are playing this week. Since we last had it, Rodzinski has played it, and changed a lot of things. It was played in Dallas and they made changes. But their orchestra is smaller than ours, so they didn't change all the violin parts—only the noes they needed. So we had to go over every single bar. It took us two weeks to put it in shape."

A worse problem was the Mahler Fifth Symphony which Richard Burgin conducted last week. He was using Mahler's revised version of the score in which whole pages had been re-orchestrated. Messrs. Burgin and Rogers and three other men put in 10 to 12 hours a day for two solid weeks preparing the parts to conform with the revised version of the symphony.

Even this is not the beginning of the story. For Mr. Koussevitzky has put perhaps months of study into a score before he considers performing it. There follows the paper work in the library, the hours of rehearsal and finally the performance. The results of this devoted labor are the technically polished and emotionally rewarding performances by the Boston Symphony which we, and even some out-of-towners, are inclined to take for granted.



PLEASURE AND EXPLANATION—Serge Koussevitzky beams (at left) as he turns to the viola section of the orchestra. They must be playing well. At right, Dr. Koussevitzky, dressed in a loose fitting jacket, his favorite rehearsal togs, stops to explain a passage.

Sellout Crowd a Tribute to Maestro

Free Press Photo

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY MRS. KOUSSEVITZKY

Conductor pays final visit to Detroit before retiring as head of Boston Symphony

Koussevitsky Farewell Draws Doting Throng

Detroit Free Press XII-8-48

BY J. DORSEY CALLAGHAN

Free Press Music Critic

There is a large-sized conspiracy among the members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to protect Serge Koussevitzky from trouble on his tour, but not so the maestro can notice it.

The erect old aristocrat is still absolute boss of his own affairs, despite his 74 years. Not even a newspaper photographer could shake his determination to run his own show.

* * *

CORDIAL AS always to the press, he nevertheless indicated limits beyond which there was no advancing.

The photog backstage at Masonic Temple posed Koussevitzky with his wife for what he hoped would be an informal shot.

"Let's have Mrs. Koussevitzky arranging your tie before the concert," the cameraman suggested.

"I've tied my own tie all my life," was the sturdy reply. "I'm not starting any of that nonsense now." And that was that.

This independence of manner and thought, which some irreverent soul has compared to that of "a bear on a tote-road," is what has made his 25 years at the head of the Boston Symphony Orchestra a golden era in music.

* * *

IT WAS communicated ~~to~~ the audience ~~which~~ jammed the big auditorium to the last seat permitted by law. For Koussevitzky presented a program so daringly modern in its major portion as to seem a final challenge to his listeners before bidding farewell to Detroit.

Long before the doors closed at the Temple, the last whisp of standing room was gone, and hopefuls by the hundreds were being turned away.

* * *

THE THINGS musical that the orchestra did were evidence of equal regard behind the footlights.

Their leader demanded, and was given, the veriest whisper of sound from cymbals, and a miracle of trumpet pianissimo playing without mutes in the two "Gymnopedies" of Eric Satie.

In Honegger's Symphony for Strings, in which a trumpet trio is included by way of surprise, the way was prepared for the entrance of the brasses by violas as impressively mellow as French horns.

The power and depth of the strings throughout the evening was amazing, even for the famed Boston strings. With the spirit of a youthful enthusiast for modernism, Koussevitzky took his listeners on an adventure in counterpoint in the final movement of the Honegger that was like nothing ever heard before in Detroit music halls.

* * *

THE EXCURSION into modernism went further as the first half of the evening developed. The blazing fury of Prokofieff's "Scythian" Suite built through crescendo on crescendo. It ended in a long-sustained blare of dissonance that brought an echo of protest from the chandeliers.

Koussevitzky made his bow to conservatism in the period after intermission with the Brahms First Symphony.

The Brahms was exemplary in its presentation, even though the pace may have offended the most sedate. The play of horns and trombones was rewarding, even for those who do not cherish Brahms especially.

* * *

AT THE END of the concert the audience stood and paid its tribute for at least five minutes. Koussevitzky returned to the stage almost a dozen times before the audience began reluctantly to leave.

It was more like the launching of a great career than one of its final events.

Detroit Free Press Dec 8 '48

Sellout Crowd a Tribute to Maestro

Free Press Photo

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY MRS. KOUSSEVITZKY

Conductor pays final visit to Detroit before retiring as head of Boston Symphony

Koussevitsky Farewell Draws Doting Throng

Detroit Free Press XII-8-48

BY J. DORSEY CALLAGHAN
Free Press Music Critic

There is a large-sized conspiracy among the members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to protect Serge Koussevitzky from trouble on his tour, but not so the maestro can notice it.

The erect old aristocrat is still absolute boss of his own affairs, despite his 74 years. Not even a newspaper photographer could shake his determination to run his own show.

* * *

CORDIAL AS always to the press, he nevertheless indicated limits beyond which there was no advancing.

The photog backstage at Masonic Temple posed Koussevitzky with his wife for what he hoped would be an informal shot.

"Let's have Mrs. Koussevitzky arranging your tie before the concert," the cameraman suggested.

"I've tied my own tie all my life," was the sturdy reply. "I'm not starting any of that nonsense now." And that was that.

This independence of manner and thought, which some irreverent soul has compared to that of "a bear on a tote-road," is what has made his 25 years at the head of the Boston Symphony Orchestra a golden era in music.

* * *

~~IT WAS communicated to~~ the audience ~~which~~ jammed the big auditorium to the last seat permitted by law. For Koussevitzky presented a program so daringly modern in its major portion as to seem a final challenge to his listeners before bidding farewell to Detroit.

Long before the doors closed at the Temple, the last whisp of standing room was gone, and hopefuls by the hundreds were being turned away.

* * *

THE THINGS musical that the orchestra did were evidence of equal regard behind the footlights.

Their leader demanded, and was given, the veriest whisper of sound from cymbals, and a miracle of trumpet pianissimo playing without mutes in the two "Gymnopedies" of Eric Satie.

In Honegger's Symphony for Strings, in which a trumpet trio is included by way of surprise, the way was prepared for the entrance of the brasses by violas as impressively mellow as French horns.

The power and depth of the strings throughout the evening was amazing, even for the famed Boston strings. With the spirit of a youthful enthusiast for modernism, Koussevitzky took his listeners on an adventure in counterpoint in the final movement of the Honegger that was like nothing ever heard before in Detroit music halls.

* * *

THE EXCURSION into modernism went further as the first half of the evening developed. The blazing fury of Prokofieff's "Scythian" Suite built through crescendo on crescendo. It ended in a long-sustained blare of dissonance that brought an echo of protest from the chandeliers.

Koussevitzky made his bow to conservatism in the period after intermission with the Brahms First Symphony.

The Brahms was exemplary in its presentation, even though the pace may have offended the most sedate. The play of horns and trombones was rewarding, even for those who do not cherish Brahms especially.

* * *

AT THE END of the concert the audience stood and paid its tribute for at least five minutes. Koussevitzky returned to the stage almost a dozen times before the audience began reluctantly to leave.

It was more like the launching of a great career than one of its final events.

Detroit Free
Press

Dec 8 '48

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE

DEC 1 - 1948

Koussevitzky Plans Tour

Michael Kachouk, New York concert manager, announced yesterday that Serge Koussevitzky, with whom he was associated in Russia, has authorized him to arrange a series of engagements as guest conductor in Europe, Australia and South America, beginning next September. Dr. Koussevitzky will retire from the conductorship of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, after twenty-five years, at the end of next summer.

PHILADELPHIA, PA.
INQUIRER

DEC 1 1948

Koussevitzky Still Powerful, Miss Heidt 'A Great Carmen'

BY IRVING SABLOSKY

Both the Opera House and Orchestra Hall were well-filled yesterday evening. One full house was for Chicago's first viewing of the New York City Opera Co.'s 'Carmen,' the other for what probably was our last meeting with Serge Koussevitzky as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The distinguished conductor retires after this 25th season in Boston. The vigor of his musical thinking and his command of his unsurpassed orchestra have not diminished. Last evening he introduced to Chicago a recent symphony by a composer also in his '70s, similarly in full command of his faculties for expression.

This was the 6th Symphony f Ralph Vaughan Williams, egun as the last war ended, e're told, and finished arly this year. Its four ninterrupted movements are eeply perturbed. And if its beginning is aggressive and embattled, its ending is desolate and dissatisfied--quiet, but without peace.

Dramatic Work

It is a dramatic work, and it needs a virtuoso orchestra for the complexities of texture and rhythm that mark its opening section and the fierce scherzo with its sardonic and un-Williams-like references to jazz. Last night's performance had more than virtuosity, it had unanimous understanding as well.

There was an unwonted heaviness in the orchestra's sound in the Concerto for strings of Phillip Emmanuel Bach (arr. Steinberg) that began the evening. But the Beethoven 7th Symphony (the concert's finale) was performed with glowing clarity and vitality. A vociferous ovation for Dr. Koussevitsky lasted many minutes.

Lesner at 'Carmen'

Our colleague at the Opera House was Sam Lesner, and the rest of the column belongs to him:

'Winifred Heidt's ravishing voice, her superbly balanced characterization and her personality make her a distinguished--even great--Carmen. Her French is impeccable.

'Ramon Vinay's Don Jose fell short in dramatic finesse, but his robust tenor was still ringing at the passion-charged finale. James Pease, a handsome Escamillo, lacked carrying power to make his well-schooled voice effective in the Toreador Song. Ann Ayars' Micaela was richly endowed with beautiful, sensitive singing.

A Bit Too 'Super'

'The entire company responded to Joseph Rosenstock's firm baton with splendid singing. However, production-wise, the company suffered from the 'superitis' that afflicts traveling troupes: The youthful picadors and the four black horses never would have been missed.'

PITTSBURGH, PA.
SUN TELEGRAPH

DEC 1 1948

Koussevitsky Acclaimed In Boston Concert Here

By J. FRED LISSFELT

Serge Koussevitsky led his Boston Symphony Orchestra last night in Syria Mosque for a capacity audience, possibly his last appearance in this city with that renowned organization. We should like to believe that no one is indispensable, but we can be grateful for the many visits of this great artist and for the standards he has eternally set for our community.

I have purposely listened to these players from every location in our auditorium, and while various listening posts give always new impressions, these impressions are invariably favorable.

Nowhere else has one such refinement of tone with grand volume as in the Boston strings; these woodwinds have no superiors; if there is better brass, then their leader can do no more than Mr. Koussevitsky. It goes without saying that the ensemble is as fine as human talent can produce.

Last night's program was ideal for the temperaments of both leader and players. A rejuvenated suite of Carl Philip Emanuel Bach, John Sebastian's most gifted son, demonstrated the powers of the string choir and Mr. Koussevitsky's flair for the long singing line which could be the envy of any other orchestra.

His superb emotional restraint in this classic is commendable, and the freedom he allots his solo players avoids whatever academic effects such music might easily produce.

Beethoven's Seventh Symphony showed once again what a sympathetic tempo can do to revive the real spirit of Beethoven. Its first movement has rarely been heard in such simplicity, totally lacking in the usual sinful overplaying. Never a tiresome phrase in the reposeful allegretto, never a smudge in the brilliant scherzo, and the finale full of kaleidoscopic contrasts.

Vaughan Williams' Symphony No. 6, played for the first time in Pittsburgh, and having its initial performance in Boston earlier this season, is a strikingly modern score. On first hearing, one could easily create a colorful pageant of England's history during the last decade.

Aside from the emotional content and as contemporary music we may accept it as the last word in England's musical renaissance. One recognizes thoughts of the day in free treatment of subject matter and in harmonic and structural details. Thematic motifs are not always strikingly original, but their development shows consistent and unified thought.

The long and calm final movement, though in a depressing mood, is a stunning climax to the stormy episodes which the listener encounters throughout the pages of this score. It is healthier music than most contemporaries are writing and fortunately leans towards feeling rather than mathematics.

VARIETY
NEW YORK, N. Y.

DEC 1-

BOSTON SYMPH REHEARSAL
Producer: Jack Wright
30 Mins.; Mon. 1 p.m.
Sustaining
NBC, from Boston

First designed as a prestige show for FM a year ago, this airing of a rehearsal of the Boston Symphony orchestra under Serge Koussevitzky adds up to one of the top instructive musical packages on the air.

Show takes the listener behind the scenes as the conductor rehearses the orch for its weekly concert series. Mike setups include one on the conductor's music desk, others placed before the ceiling-to-floor rehearsal curtain swung 20 feet away from the stage. A brief talk-in by Olin Downes, who planed up for the first assignment, leads directly to the desk mike of the conductor, long famous hereabouts for his rehearsal technique.

Koussevitzky, whose Russian accent is still fairly thick after 24 years in the U. S., nonetheless has a natural approach and a distinguished speaking voice. Part of his radio charm springs from his way with English sentences; often he gets them just a little mixed but they are usually very much to the point. Nor is he the speechmaking type of conductor; he never gives inflated lectures on the music. His approach is severely technical yet warmed with occasional flashes of musical insight for the audience.

First broadcast found him rehearsing Liszt's Faust Symphony. "Don't scratch, gentlemen," he would say, "or de music must sing, gentlemen." For the first 20 minutes he stopped the orch every few bars, finishing up with a full reading of what he had gone over. Impression was he stopped them too much. In the end he played far beyond what he'd rehearsed and the musicians, who hadn't seen the music before, sounded just as good. Downes, now pretty secure on the air, broke in with comment from time to time, but the show was about 100% Koussevitzky. Elie.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
WORLD-TELEGRAM

DEC

adio and Television

Stop the 'Bi erations

By HARRIET

Borrowing a leaf from the dear-ly beloved and now defunct "Candid Microphone," NBC now listens in each week on the rehearsals of the Boston Symphony. I tuned in uesday evening and found my-elf fascinated by the comments f Dr. Serge Koussevitzky.

When the orchestra failed to eet Dr. Koussevitzky's expecta-ons at one point, he rapped for ence and moaned—in an accent at wore Russian boots—"You ake such ordinary sound. Any-dy can make that sound. Now t me hear a real Boston sound!"

CHICAGO, ILL.
SUN & TIMES

DEC 1 1948

Listening In

'Stop it! Stop it!'

with Don Foster

"Gentlemen, I would like to have it more profound."

The music starts again and it sounds as profound as any reasonable person should want it.

"Stop! Stop! I would like it to have more crescendo."

Again the music starts and the crescendo is perfect, but that is just one man's opinion. The man is NOT Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

"Stop! Stop!" And the orchestra stops for the umpteenth time. How perfect can you get?

"La, de de de da da da." This time Dr. Koussevitzky sings to his musicians to illustrate a musical point.

"Don't take off the bows from the strings," he tells the violins. So goes a Boston Symphony rehearsal, as broadcast for the first time last Thursday (11:30 p.m.-WMAQ) by NBC. The network describes the rehearsal series as an "experiment in musical education programming."

Seven a.m.'s much too early to try being funny, even for a country girl like Judy Canova. Miss Canova, screen and radio comedienne, was in Chicago Monday to appear at a 4-H Club program at the Stevens Hotel. She was asked to be on hand at 7 a.m., but the best she could do was 9. "Why, I haven't even got my eyes open at seven," said Miss C. in wide-eyed astonishment at the thought of early

PITTSBURGH, PA.
SUN TELEGRAPH

DEC 1 1948

Sun-Telegraph Photos by Ed Romano.

Among the guests at the reception at the Twentieth Century Club, which followed the glorious concert of Serge Koussevitsky and his Boston Symphony Orchestra last night were Mrs. Koussevitsky, Mrs. Frederic Schaefer and John G. Frazer Jr. The party was sponsored by the board of the Pittsburgh Orchestra Assn., with Mrs. Horace Forbes Baker chairman. The group also arranged the Maestro's farewell performance here at Syria Mosque, as part of its concert series for the season.

Among the guests who congratulated Dr. Koussevitsky (left) at the Pittsburgh Orchestra Association's reception were Gen. and Mrs. Eric Fisher Wood and Mrs. Nat Spear. Gen. and Mrs. Wood, who are living in Bedford, are guests of Mr. and Mrs. J. Fred Lissfelt, Shady Ave.

PITTSBURGH, PA.
PRESS

DEC 1 1948

Boston Symphony Masterful

British Work Impressive

By RALPH LEWANDO,
Press Music Critic

A capacity audience came to listen to the Boston Symphony Orchestra led by Serge Koussevitzky last night in Syria Mosque.

The event ushered in the Pittsburgh Orchestra Assn.'s 33rd season of sponsoring visiting major orchestras. It also marked the last time Dr. Koussevitzky would be here with this organization as he is retiring as its musical director at the end of the current season after 25 years of notable artistic service.

Mr. Lewando

During this long period Dr. Koussevitzky has become a cherished personal institution in Boston and the idol of the musical public wherever he has appeared with his orchestra. And he has brought the Boston Symphony to the foremost place in the orchestral world.

We know of no conductor who has done so much as he for music and for composers in the United States. Where he led, other conductors followed. He possesses the great quality of selflessness in service to his art and to artists.

Specialist in Humanity

He is not a specialist, unless he be a specialist in humanity and all it connotes in musical art. He has no penchant for a particular type of music. To him all music worth its salt is his fond interest. And regardless of its national origin Dr. Koussevitzky has been its champion and has given it utterance through the marvelous expressive power of the Boston Symphony musicians.

One of the most recent works in this category was played last night with eminent success, and was heartily acclaimed. It was Ralph Vaughn-Williams' stirring Symphony No. 6, completed last spring and premiered by the London Royal Philharmonic Orchestra led by Sir Adrian Boult on April 21 of this year.

Dr. Vaughn-Williams, 76, is England's greatest living composer. Time has not stayed his incredible creative powers which today are in their zenith.

Lack of available space here prevents a thorough evaluation of the symphony. That will have to wait for another time. But it can be stated that its presentation was an enlightening experience even for laymen.

Played Without Pause

The four movements are played without pause. It opens with turmoil and closes in a mood of tranquillity. Throughout the playing of this work one senses the folk-spirit, a deep religious vitality of faith and hope that has animated the composer's progress in the ardor of creation.

The very heart of English folksong is evident all through the work, although there is no direct quote of them in the tonal expression. The entire symphony is a meditation upon the past—with special emphasis on the anguish of the past few years, and the hope for a better tomorrow. But the music is, fundamentally more absolute than programmatic.

Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra revealed its intensity and poetry with fervor. At the end of the performance the audience bestowed an ovation. The program opened with a thrilling evocative unfoldment of P. E. Bach's D-major Concerto for strings in the Maximilian arrangement for orchestra, and closed with Beethoven's compelling 7th symphony.

INDIANAPOLIS, IND.
STAR

DEC 2 1948

AIRS MUSIC

Half Hour Of Boston Warmups

BY SAM LESNER

Music hath charms to soothe the savage breasts of insomniacs, we hope. NBC is airing a half hour of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's rehearsals in a series of transcribed broadcasts Thursdays at 11:30 p.m., Dr. Serge Koussevitzky conducting.

The broadcasts originate on Mondays, at noon, and if they were heard locally at such a time it would change the complexion of the series since Mrs. Housewife, instead of Mr. Nightowl, would benefit musically from the broadcasts.

Real Rehearsal

The rehearsals are entirely unprepared. That is, Dr. Koussevitsky stops the orchestra, repeats passages, corrects and explains the effect he wants just as he would do at any rehearsal. Olin Downes, author, lecturer and music critic, acts as the program's interpolator.

The series recalls the story of the Chinese lad at a symphony concert. He said he enjoyed best the 'first number,' the one before the regular (printed) program. It turned out he meant the orchestra's tune-up.

Musical biographers tell us that symphony rehearsals generally bring out the worst in the conductor, a quality that would blast the tubes were it loosed over the air waves.

However, Dr. Koussevitsky knows how to employ tact and patience.

CINCINNATI, O.
ENQUIRER
DEC 2 1948

MAESTRO HERE. Serge Koussevitsky will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in concert tonight at 8:30 at Music Hall. Cincinnati is one of the engagements on Koussevitsky's final tour with the orchestra.

Music Hall Throng Bids Good-By to Koussevitzky as Conductor

By ARTHUR LOESSER
Music Critic

Musical Cleveland, in full strength, crammed Music Hall last night for the farewell performance of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky in his capacity as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Surging elation, tinged with sadness, swept over the audience as the concert developed: Elation because of the magnificent performance and sadness at the idea that this particular constellation of musical excellence will not be heard by us again.

Dr. Koussevitzk selected Brahms' First Symphony for his final gesture. Truly its glorious, clangorous peroration, coming as it did at the close of a stirring rendition of this noble work, was the most fitting last word that a great musical leader could have given us.

The earlier half of the program was devoted to more or less modern works. Most noteworthy among these was the "Scythian Suite," subtitled "Ala and Lolli," by Prokofiev. Written more than 30 years ago, when the composer was but 23, it has not been played much in this country. To those hearing it for the first time it was quite startling, if not overpowering, experience, revealing a hitherto unfamiliar side of Prokofiev's talent.

Like Stravinsky's "Sacre de Printemps," whose influence it appears to reflect to some extent, the "Scythian Suite" was likewise planned for a Diaghilev ballet, which, however, never materialized, and the music appears to have languished like a jilted bride ever since.

Like its Stravinsky prototype, it deals with the mythology of pre-Christian Russia, abounds in barbaric rhythms and strident colors. In many ways it seems the strongest, most imaginative thing the composer has ever done.

The program opened with Honegger's Symphony for String Orchestra, a work which some of us still remember from its performance by the Cleveland Orchestra under Charles Muench last year. The fine Boston string sections achieved considerable intensity of expression in some of the passages of this sombre, disturbed composition.

After the Honegger Symphony, Dr. Koussevitzky permitted us to hear the sound of his speaking voice. He announced the performance of a short work which had not been listed on the program: a "Gymnopedie" by Erik Satie, a Parisian character whose musical clownings once received an undeserved superfluity of attention from some smart-aspiring critics.

CLEVELAND, OHIO
PRESS
DEC 2 1948

CLEVELAND, OHIO
NEWS

DEC 3 1948

Adieu, Koussevitzky, But Come Back Next Year

It was a generous and thoughtful gesture on the part of the Cleveland Orchestra and its management to bring Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and his Boston Symphony Orchestra here for a concert at Music Hall Wednesday. The near-capacity audience that attended to pay tribute to the distinguished Boston conductor who retires at the close of this twenty-fifth season with the orchestra, partook of a fine musical feast.

We join the Cleveland Orchestra and all music devotees in wishing Dr. Koussevitzky success and happiness in his Tanglewood, Berkshire, and other musical affairs. But we will not say goodbye, merely adieu, as we hope that next season he may return at least once as guest conductor of another great orchestra at its home—Severance Hall.

CLEVELAND PLAIN DEALER, THURSDAY, DECEMBER 2

RISING CHEER GOES TO KOUSSEVITZKY

Master Leaves Something to Remember Him By

BY HERBERT ELWELL

Many were the persons in the large audience at Public Music Hall last night who jumped to their feet to cheer Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Orchestra at the close of the thrilling program which they presented under auspices of our Cleveland Orchestra.

It was an occasion, if there ever was one, for spontaneous tribute to a great conductor and great orchestra, for since Koussevitzy will retire at the end of this season, this was the last opportunity given us to hear him in the role which has endeared him to milions of music lovers.

It must be said that he gave us something to remember him by, a program replete with the glories of the dynamic interpretive genius for which he is justly renowned. And as one listened to the triumphant finale of Brahms' C minor Symphony, which seemed never to have sounded more proudly jubilant, one could not help wondering in what ways this conductor will be most missed, for missed he will certainly be, regardless of how gifted his successor may be.

A Masterpiece Recreated

Of his great service to the classic masters we were forcefully reminded throughout the Brahms Symphony, which mounted to such a stunning climax. The largeness of the conception, the effulgence of the flowing line, the constantly increasing momentum that carried one to exalted heights, were exciting reminders, indeed, of what this conductor can do to recreate a masterpiece in all its emotional and architectural splendor.

Yet for all this illumination of the past, it is in his devotion to the music of our time that Koussevitzky probably has made his greatest contribution, and it was gratifying to find in the first part of the program such significant modern works as Honegger's Suite for Strings and Prokofieff's "Scythian Suite," as well as the two slight but charming "Gymnopedies" of Eric Satie, which were beautifully orchestrated by Debussy.

No other conductor has given us so complete an insight into the meanings and intentions of contemporary music. The complex inner rhythms, the multicolored palette and enigmatic rumbling of Prokofieff magically acquired an overwhelming logic, and even the Honegger Suite, which seemed not too convincing on its first hearing here, clarified wonderfully as to its form and purpose.

Such projection as this is the gift of one whose mind and heart are attuned to current creative feelings, a leader who, working through one of the finest instrumental vehicles ever developed, lovingly has explored the new and found it good. His ability as a translator of the spirit of modernism in music will not soon be equaled, and his departure will be regretted particularly by those who think of music as an expression of the living present.

CINCINNATI, OHIO
POST
DEC 3 1948

Music: Boston Quality

BY ELEANOR BELL

The time has come for all good music critics to write a love letter to Dr. Serge Koussevitzky. On the platform in Music Hall last night the good doctor did two things for which he is renowned throughout the world: He conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra and he devoted a large portion of his allotted time to the performance of works of our own century.

It is because this is Dr. Koussevitzky's 25th and final season as head of the orchestra acknowledged by many to be the world's greatest, that last night's concert was a memorable one, for he is a master of rhythm and phraseology and he has polished his orchestra until its sound, the great big wonderful sound of it, has a positive glow.

The great big wonderful audience, by the way, stood on its feet and cheered, and that must be a stimulating sound to one whose business it is to make stimulating sounds, even if it is an old, old story. (Dr. Koussevitzky was cheered, of course, as the world champion bass viol player long before he laid aside his bow for the baton.)

Honegger's Symphony for Strings, Two "Gymnopedies" by Satie and Prokofieff's Scythian Suite were last night's contemporary entries and of these I should say the Honegger was most impressive. This was dignified and sonorous and immensely effective writing, full of color in spite of the absence of wind instruments, an absence to which the brief brass statement near the close was a startling exception.

The Satie pieces, dressed up for orchestra by Debussy, seemed to me to have no place to go, although they went very gracefully while the Scythian Suite, dressed by Prokofieff, had places to go and went. The orchestra filled the hall with good loud noises and worked itself into a fine pagan frenzy, always with the precise and indisputable rhythmic sense of Dr. Koussevitzky to keep things from getting out of hand. And loud or soft, this is an orchestra that can be heard.

For many in the audience, however, the program began after the intermission. This latter half was given over to Beethoven's Seventh Symphony, a task which the orchestra fulfilled cleanly and handsomely, but with less spontaneity, I felt, than was present in the pre-intermission seance.

Nevertheless, there was much to be grateful for in both halves of the program, and that's just what I am. Grateful.

NATI, OHIO
POST

3 194

ic:
on ality

ANOR BELL

has come for all critics to write a Dr. Serge Kousse- the [illegible] last night the good wo things for which ned throughout the onducted the Boston Orchestra and he de- ge portion of his al- to the performance our own century. use this is Dr. Kous- 25th and final season f the orchestra ac- l by many to be the atest, that last night's as a memorable one, a master of rhythm seology and he has is orchestra until its great big wonderful t, has a positive glow. eat big wonderful au- the way, stood on its cheered, and that must nulating sound to one siness it is to make ng sounds, even if it is d story. (Dr. Kousse- as cheered, of course, orld champion bass viol ng before he laid aside for the baton.)

ger's Symphony for Two "Gymnopedies" and Prokofieff's Scyth- e were last night's con- ry entries and of these say the Honegger was pressive. This was dig- and sonorous and im- effective writing, full in spite of the absence instruments, an absence ch the brief brass state- ear the close was a start- ception.

Satie pieces, dressed up rchestra by Debussy, to me to have no place although they went very ully while the Scythian dressed by Prokofieff, aces to go and went. The tra filled the hall with oud noises and worked it- nto a fine pagan frenzy, s with the precise and in- table rhythmic sense of Koussevitzky to keep things getting out of hand. And or soft, this is an orchestra can be heard.

many in the audience, ver, the program began the intermission. This lat- alf was given over to Beet- n's Seventh Symphony, a which the orchestra ful- d cleanly and handsomely, with less spontaneity, I felt, was present in the pre- rmission seance.

evertheless, there was much be grateful for in both ves of the program, and t's just what I am. Grate-

---

HAVERHILL, MASS.
GAZETTE

DEC 3 - 1948

Music For You

When Dr. Serge Koussevitzky energetically makes his way to the center front of the stage at Symphony Hall, a hush falls over the audience—a hush that is characteristic of any concert given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

In this, his 25th and final year with the Boston Symphony, the conductor has lost none of his dynamic spirit and vigorous interpretation. To know Dr. Koussevitsky, to follow and imbibe the vapors of his musical moods, is to know a pioneer, an organizer and a man with rare feeling. In this, his last season with the Boston Orchestra, each performance witnesses a capacity audience, intent on viewing for the last time the man who brought the Boston Symphony Orchestra to its present place of eminent standing.

Characteristic of him is a powerfully livid face which introduces a forte, forcible passage, and tapering, flowing hands which wave in a pianissimo or slow movement. He is ever prepared to turn over to his orchestral members and soloists the thunderous applause which closes each performance.

* * * *

A NEW violoncellist, Samuel Mayes, is with the orchestra this year. He replaces Jean Bedetti. On last week's seventh program of the current season, Mr. Mayes gave evidence of his ability as a cellist. His selection "Concerto for Violoncello in B Flat Major, Op. 34," by Boccherini.

Mr. Mayes is only 31 years old, an outstanding young musician, with Indian blood flowing through his veins. His grandfather, for whom he was named, was a Cherokee Indian. He first touched a 'cello when he was but four years old and in the course of his still youthful life he has appeared with the St. Louis orchestra, the Philadelphia Orchestra and several others.

* * * *

"A FAUST SYMPHONY in Three Character Sketches" by Liszt provided interesting listening of a symphonic poem. The three outstanding figures of the Faust story are logically the character himself, Gretchen and Mephistopheles.

In this orchestral presentation of the theme, the Boston University Male Chorus with David Lloyd as soloist, made its appearance. This group, directed by James R. Houghton, is certainly a credit to the school which it represents. The Boston University School of Music is, without a doubt, one of the finest schools of music existing today. I attach no limitations when I make this statement.

A shining example of this quality of attainment is evidenced in the magnificent rendition of the "Battle Hymn of the Republic," which has been arranged for the combined male and female choruses of the school. In the past, it has been the custom to have the Harvard Glee club make its appearance with the Boston Symphony—this presentation of the BU group was something different and appealing.

* * * *

IF YOU ARE fortunate enough to have seats for the eighth performance, the knowledge of the following program may interest you.

Overture to Byron's Manfred	Schumann
Piano Concerto No. 1 in C Major	Beethoven
Two "Gymnopedies"	Satie
Suite from "L'Oiseau de Feu"	Stravinsky

In the absence of Dr. Koussevitsky, Leonard Bernstein will be conductor and soloist.

* * * *

TO REMIND YOU that Ezio Pinza, basso, will give his final concert stage performance at Symphony Hall, Dec. 5.

M.C.G.

CINCINNATI, OHIO
TIMES-STAR

Koussevitzky Conducts—

Superb Concert By Boston Symphony

By LOUIS JOHN JOHNEN

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY will probably long remember the moving ovation accorded him and the men of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the conclusion of their concert Thursday evening, just as Cincinnatians, who filled Music Hall, will certainly recall for years a musical event such as is experienced all too seldom.

The program itself was a flattering comment on Cincinnati's capacity for musical appreciation. It opened with the "Symphony for Strings," by Honegger, which has heretofore not been heard here. Embodying the mood of occupied Paris, as explained in the program notes, its predominant feeling is a long drawn out plaint, as of a dungeon prisoner cringing under the conqueror's heel. When the mournful sonorities of the justly famous string section of the Boston Orchestra are interrupted by the triumphant trumpet shout of final liberation, the effect is deeply stirring.

* * *

Dr. Koussevitsky's conducting technique is interesting to watch. With a minimum of extravagant gesture, sometimes beating his feet in unison with the short, rhythmic accent of his right hand, his left, meanwhile, caresses the phases called forth by an inner impulsion from his orchestral instrument.

The "Scythian Suite," an example of early Prokofieff, from its ferocious opening phrases to the frenzied white heat of the concluding exaltation of the Sungod, left many listeners overwhelmed and limp. Between these two numbers were inserted the gem-like orchestrations of two "Gymnopedies" of Satie. Since my erudition of Greek derivations is faulty, I can't translate the title. But these delicate bits of orchestral color did serve one purpose. The faulty reed of the English horn gave forth unmistakable and unintentionable burbles. Accidents that happen to the best of orchestra ensembles are a gratifying proof of humanity in the midst of so much perfection. I really should hate myself when I get such thoughts. For the smooth contouras of the Boston Orchestra's tone, its transparent soft passages, it's cresendi that are upon you before you are aware of them, have given this organization a superiority scarcely equalled throughout the world.

* * *

Beethoven's "Symphony No. 7 in A-Major" took up the remainder of the program. Constructing its rhythms along more statuesque lines than those suggested by Wagner's term, "The Apotheosis of the Dance," or that of D'Indy, who called it a "Pastoral Symphony," Dr. Koussevitzky gave the work massive and even grandiose proportions. At the close of the unreserved, almost boisterous rowdyism of the final movement, the audience rose in tumultuous personal tribute to a distinguished conductor, whose Cincinnati appearance was in the nature of a farewell. He will retire at the end of this season, which marks his silver anniversary as musical director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

INDIANAPOLIS, IND.
NEWS

DEC 4 1948

It's a Long Way From Koussevitzky to Waring

By WALTER WHITWORTH

This listener, in Cincinnati Thursday night and here Friday night, heard the Boston Symphony and Fred Waring's Orchestra in two programs as antithetical as possible in every way, yet programs that were of the top rank in their particular fields.

A hypnotic spell was cast by the Boston orchestra, which, under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, played in Music Hall at Cincinnati before a vast audience which was so enthralled that it rose to its feet at the end of the concert and applauded for 5 minutes during which Dr. Koussevitzky returned to the podium again and again.

The praise had a double import, for it was meant for both conductor and players. Perhaps, too, it contained appreciation of his 25 years of magnificent music-making. Certainly, the music-making Thursday was magnificent and overwhelming in the imaginative power that lay behind it.

Some of this was music that potently suggested those fine human conceptions that can never be expressed in words. Beethoven's Seventh Symphony, for instance, and Honegger's Symphony for Strings, whose chorale finale, played with added trumpets accenting the melody amidst a torrent of polyphony, is as deeply exciting as anything in contemporary music.

Even when the music was quiet, as in Dubussy's transcription of two Eric Satie "Gymnopedies," there was an underlying hint of power beneath the surface charm and shimmering color. When the music was almost sterile, too, as in Prokofiev's "Scythian Suite," there was something there to arouse the listener.

It is not news to say that the Boston Orchestra is one of the great symphonic bodies, and it is not news to say that Dr. Koussevitzky is one of the great conductors. One does not always agree with him, but his perceptions are always logical, always persuasive. He certainly has the will and the force and the tension to make music thrilling—a springboard for the imagination.

The second concert, an example of high-wrought craftsmanship rather than an example of high-wrought art, was played in the Murat, where Mr. Waring and his orchestra were assisted by the chorus and a good many soloists.

To say that Mr. Waring is an expert craftsman is not by any means to say that he hasn't a kind of genius of his own. He has an enormous talent for entertaining an audience, and, if you think it doesn't require unusual gifts to entertain an audience for more than 2 hours, uninterrupted by an intermission, you have little conception of the qualities entertainers must have.

These were 2 hours of rollicking fun, of popular music beautifully played by an expert orchestra and admirably sung by an equally expert chorus, as well as by a parade of skilled soloists. You cannot call Mr. Waring a master of ceremonies, for that phrase has dreadful connotations of deadly dullness and cheap publicity. Mr. Waring is neither dreadful nor cheap. He is humorous and often witty. His comments are graceful and gracious as well as pointed. He is a true comedian.

His informality is engaging, and he has managed to instill this same engaging air into all the musicians on the stage. They play and they sing and they cut capers with seeming freshness and spontaneity; so they make an audience chuckle and howl with laughter. They also make an audience aware of the excellence of their special kind of diversion. The reason for Mr. Waring's long popularity is too obvious to need further comment. Given his personality and his flair for building a show with talented folk, he could scarcely help being popular. The world needs him, his humor and his genial manner. It has a large place for his music too.

[208]

NOTE WORTHY

by John P. Rhodes

Koussevjtzky In A Titanic Mood.

THE PROGRAM which Serge Koussevitzky chose for his farewell concert here as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night was one calculated to emblazon the orchestra's every possible talent. Music Hall was virtually filled for the occasion, and the enthusiastic audience recalled the conductor for innumerable bows. It was a memorable ovation, the like of which Cincinnati has seldom seen and heard.

Such a concert, programmed by any other conductor, with the possible exception of Toscanini, would never have drawn such an admiring public. The first half of the evening was devoted to unfamiliar music, the sort that usually discourages patrons of the Cincinnati Orchestra. Virtually none of Honegger's music has been performed here. Satie's "Gymnopedies" and Prokofieff's Scythian Suite have been played but once. It is another story, of course, with Beethoven's Seventh Symphony, which has been heard during 17 seasons.

Koussevitzky's auditors paid respectful and undivided attention to the Honegger and Satie music, though one sensed a confused attitude toward them both. The lively Scythian Suite, however, awed, amazed and delighted its listeners by its sheer volume and brilliance.

* * *

ONLY AN ORCHESTRA with a virtuoso conductor and a virtuoso string section of such ample size as Boston's could cope with Honegger's three-movement Symphony for Strings. It was not what one might call agreeable, even pleasant, music at first hearing. There were far too many dissonances for that. Though there was much interesting workmanship in the first movement, it seemed far less cohesive and less dramatic than the others.

It is not music one would care to hear often, but last night it served to show the excellent balance and contrasts possible among the strings. At times it seemed as if there were only a single viola, a single cello playing with great sonority, and one extraordinary effect achieved at the close of the Adagio, when the orchestra, from its treble to its bass sections, was reduced to almost the shadow of a sound.

* * *

SATIE'S "Gymnopedies," which originally startled French audiences by their titles have been variously translated as "Children's Games" and "Barefoot Dances," depending on Greek or Latin derivation. From the quality of the music, one inclines to the latter interpretation—and so, also, did Koussevitzky last night. The feeling was one of chaste and yet sensuous and pagan beauty. They were an incontestable marvel of lucidity.

Much more pagan, of course, was Prokofieff's spectacular tone painting of the Scythian heroes, Ala and Lolli—a work which exploited a six-man percussion section, which drew tenuous and difficult tonal lines between the woodwinds and brass, which demanded almost every sort of playing from the strings, including an ingenious "col legno" effect. Koussevitzky's interpretation was one of barbaric color, of crescendos and decrescendos that rose and fell majestically, with each step an almost imperceptible change from the preceding one. It was gaudy and it was lush—wonderfully so.

* * *

BEETHOVEN'S Seventh Symphony was recreated with massive contours of sound. It demonstrated as much, but in different way from the Scythian Suite, the conductor's skill at energizing his players. His baton, wielded with grateful restraint, nevertheless drove the music and musicians onward with impelling force. There were times, in my opinion, when there could have been a few less decibles of sound—in the second and closing movements—to allow for tempered phrasing. But, on the whole, one has seldom heard more resonant, vividly eloquent or titanically impressive Beethoven.

◆

Prince Among Pianists.

CLIFFORD CURZON, the English pianist, yesterday morning presented what may well be considered one of the finest recitals ever heard in Cincinnati. The musician, one of the most talented of living Britons, made his debut here in the Hall of Mirrors, as guest of the Matinee Musicale Club.

It was obvious from his first selection, Haydn's Andante and Variations in F Minor, that he could do something which many artists cannot—he knew how to make piano music exciting. Moreover he kept up the excitement to the very conclusion of a program which was drawn almost entirely from the German repertoire.

Curzon's fondness for leaning over the keyboard, his tendency to direct his own playing with nodding motions of the head, proved momentarily disturbing. This behavior, however, soon grew to be a part of the hypnotic spell which he cast over the hall.

* * *

much warmth came from an Englishman, though members of the audience were assured privately after the concert that the pianist was born and has passed most of his life within sound of the Bow Bells.

If the pianist exercised any detachment, it was before the concert, during a period when he must have subjected the pieces he played to very severe scrutiny—with the object of extracting every possible bit of melody and emotion. He seemed to follow a predetermined and well laid course, with nothing left to chance, nothing that might sound tentative.

Everything was under control The romantic charm of his Schumann (Sonata in G Minor) was never gushing. The sweetness of his Chopin (Nocturne in C-sharp Minor) was never saccharine. The tempest of his Beethoven ("Rage over a Lost Penny, Stormed out in a Caprice") was unleashed but not demoralized with fury. The pianissimos of his Liszt (Consolation in D-flat) were gentle but not inaudible.

* * *

IT WOULD be difficult to choose any one selection as more satisfactory than the rest—or any that was less satisfactory. Each composition had its individual merits and was an entity in itself, without relation to any of the others. Personally, we were grateful for the attention paid to Liszt, who is often overlooked as the patron saint of modern pianism.

Contemporary composers were represented only by one of Poulenc's "Mouvements Perpetuels," included as an attractive encore. Questioned why no others were included, Curzon explaining laughingly, without possibility of rebuttal, that the majority of present-day keyboard music is too percussive to display a pianists's real talent.

CHICAGO, ILL.
TRIBUNE
DEC 5 1948

KOUSSEVITZKY FAREWELL HERE THRILLS CRITIC

Orchestra Great Under His Baton

BY CLAUDIA CASSIDY

Five seasons ago, when Serge Koussevitzky and the glorious Boston orchestra returned after long absence to a city that knows their worth, I found myself saying—what an orchestra, what a conductor, and what a concert! I was my own echo after Friday night's farewell in Orchestra hall. It was an occasion never to be forgotten. The performance made it so.

That Koussevitzky should be giving up the Boston orchestra at the end of his 25th season, seems unthinkable in the face of such music. He will have his men at Tanglewood, of course, and there will be clamoring for him as guest. But the Boston orchestra is his instrument and without him, whatever it may be, it will not be the same.

One Of Wonders Of World

He has forged it into one of the wonders of the world, an orchestra unmatched, at least in my experience, in glory of tone, eloquence of expression, and that surging vitality that makes music a living thing.

We live in a twilight of the gods and to see a titan step down is to know irreparable loss. When a great man has passed high noon and moved thru the afterglow, such quiet acceptance of the inevitable is wise, however sad. But Koussevitzky's conducting was the vital spark at Tanglewood last summer, and Tanglewood is dedicated to youth. At Orchestra hall—well, let me tell you what may not be a secret. Hardening of the musical arteries has nothing to do with age.

So the Boston orchestra, being the best, was out on the stage tuning up half an hour before concert time, and when Koussevitzky entered it was all polished silk—with a slingshot for thunderbolts. He began with Karl Philipp Emanuel Bach's lovely Concerto in D major.

Music of Our Time

It was typical of Koussevitzky that he brought us Vaughan Williams' Symphony No. 6, which he introduced to America last summer. This is a vital and stirring, urgently contemporary, work by a composer who happens to be 76 years old, tho the music would give you that clue only in the musing meditation of the epilog. Hearing the symphony for the third time, it seemed more universal, less personal. Witty allusions cropped up more vividly, slumbrous Stravinskian stirrings were more marked. Nothing changed the conviction that this is music of our time, a testament and a document we understand, an experience we relive in powerful performance.

But not until Beethoven's Symphony No. 7, was the full fury of the thunderbolts hurled. If you never quite knew before what Wagner meant by calling the symphony "the dance in its highest condition," you knew it then. It was immensity in headlong, driving momentum, in fingertip control. It was the whirling splendor of space and time and tone, so pervasive even the bows of the cellist arched in the magnetic rhythm of its monumental design. If Chicago and such music are to part at such a crest, what are we to say but hail—and farewell.

CINCINNATI, O.
ENQUIRER
DEC 3 1948

NOTE WORTHY

by John P. Rhodes

Koussevitzky In A Titanic Mood.

THE PROGRAM which Serge Koussevitzky chose for his farewell concert here as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night was one calculated to emblazon the orchestra's every possible talent. Music Hall was virtually filled for the occasion, and the enthusiastic audience recalled the conductor for innumerable bows. It was a memorable ovation, the like of which Cincinnati has seldom seen and heard.

Such a concert, programmed by any other conductor, with the possible exception of Toscanini, would never have drawn such an admiring public. The first half of the evening was devoted to unfamiliar music, the sort that usually discourages patrons of the Cincinnati Orchestra. Virtually none of Honegger's music has been performed here. Satie's "Gymnopedies" and Prokofieff's Scythian Suite have been played but once. It is another story, of course, with Beethoven's Seventh Symphony, which has been heard during 17 seasons.

Koussevitzky's auditors paid respectful and undivided attention to the Honegger and Satie music, though one sensed a confused attitude toward them both. The lively Scythian Suite, however, awed, amazed and delighted its listeners by its sheer volume and brilliance.

* * *

ONLY AN ORCHESTRA with a virtuoso conductor and a virtuoso string section of such ample size as Boston's could cope with Honegger's three-movement Symphony for Strings. It was not what one might call agreeable, even pleasant, music at first hearing. There were far too many dissonances for that. Though there was much interesting workmanship in the first movement, it seemed far less cohesive and less dramatic than the others.

It is not music one would care to hear often, but last night it served to show the excellent balance and contrasts possible among the strings. At times it seemed as if there were only a single viola, a single cello playing with great sonority, and one extraordinary effect achieved at the close of the Adagio, when the orchestra, from its treble to its bass sections, was reduced to almost the shadow of a sound.

* * *

SATIE'S "Gymnopedies," which originally startled French audiences by their titles have been variously translated as "Children's Games" and "Barefoot Dances," depending on Greek or Latin derivation. From the quality of the music, one inclines to the latter interpretation—and so, also, did Koussevitzky last night. The feeling was one of chaste and yet sensuous and pagan beauty. They were an incontestable marvel of lucidity.

Much more pagan, of course, was Prokofieff's spectacular tone painting of the Scythian heroes, Ala and Lolli—a work which exploited a six-man percussion section, which drew tenuous and difficult tonal lines between the woodwinds and brass, which demanded almost every sort of playing from the strings, including an ingenious "col legno" effect. Koussevitzky's interpretation was one of barbaric color, of crescendos and decrescendos that rose and fell majestically, with each step an almost imperceptible change from the preceding one. It was gaudy and it was lush—wonderfully so.

* * *

BEETHOVEN'S Seventh Symphony was recreated with massive contours of sound. It demonstrated as much, but in different way from the Scythian Suite, the conductor's skill at energizing his players. His baton, wielded with grateful restraint, nevertheless drove the music and musicians onward with impelling force. There were times, in my opinion, when there could have been a few less decibles of sound—in the second and closing movements—to allow for tempered phrasing. But, on the whole, one has seldom heard more resonant, vividly eloquent or titanically impressive Beethoven.

se for his farewell ny Orchestra last tra's every possible occasion, and the numerable bows. It

ALLENTOWN, PA.
CALL CHRONICLE
DEC 5 - 1948

PROFESSIONAL WELCOME—Charles Muench (right), who will become conductor of the Boston symphony orchestra in the near future, received a professional greeting from Eugene Ormandy, director of the Philadelphia orchestra, Friday when Muench's Orchestre National of France gave a concert in the AHS auditorium for the Allentown forum. "Tremendous" was the way in which Ormandy complimented the French orchestra and its director. (Call-Chronicle Photo).

DETROIT, MICH.
NEWS
1948

* * *

THE BOSTON Symphony Dress Rehearsal will not be on WWJ at 11:30 tomorrow night. It's on tour, and there's no way for NBC to pick it up . . . Christopher Lynch will sing at Windsor's Palace Theater Dec. 12, at 8:30 as a feature of Assumption College's Christian Culture Series . . . Right after his broadcast tomorrow night, Bob Hawk will leave N. Y. for Miami Beach, to participate in the 22nd Winter Session of the National Contract Bridge Championship . . . The Fred Waring show tomorrow morning will salute Walt Disney's birthday . . . Guy Lombardo plans to drive a boat built by Henry J. Kaiser in next summer's Harmsworth Race. Guy plans to take the new boat to Florida for tryouts in late February and early March . . . Fran Harris interviews Marian Anderson at noon Monday.

CHICAGO, ILL.
JOURNAL OF COMMERCE
DEC 6 1948

Koussevitzky Parting Sweet Sorrow At Boston Symphony Concert

By WILLIAM LEONARD

The best orchestra in the land paid its annual visit to Orchestra Hall, Friday night, and its concert gave Chicagoans, familiar with the vicissitudes of conductorial changes, a chance to sympathize with Bostonians over an impending shift of leadership.

For this was Serge Koussevitzky's last appearance here at the helm of the Boston Symphony Orchestra he has directed for a quarter of a century; he's retiring at the close of this season, to be succeeded by Charles Münch. And his music was of such perfection that, rarely as we in Cook County near the Bostonians, his impending loss was keenly noticeable. This is a great orchestra; it is impossible to believe a new conductor can improve it.

Like many of the thoughtfully built programs he has presented in these parts, Mr. Koussevitzky's concert included one brand new item—the Vaughan Williams Symphony No. 6 he had introduced at Tanglewood last August. It's an expression of the composer's thoughts about war, with two violent movements sandwiched between serene end sections. The opening is undistinguished, but after the repetitiously staccato horn blasts of the moderato and scherzo, and the loudest kettledrums since the Shostakovich Seventh, one drifts into the melodious finale with the realization that the whole work has been a deftly constructed bit of plotting. The material is overdeveloped, but the vigor of the piece, played with brilliance by the Bostonians, is eloquent.

There was a relentless tautness, too, about the Beethoven Seventh, an almost frenetic outpouring of argumentative sound which did not, however, permit of any blurring of detail. The Boston orchestra has a brass and woodwind section Chicagoans well may envy, and they shone in this classic which does not prosper at treatment less than first-rate.

The C. P. E. Bach concerto in D major, at the beginning of the program, was the only item unequipped with high pressure. It was confident, cool and symmetrical—a perfect scene setter for Mr. Koussevitzky's fine farewell.

HANDY MAN. James Whitmore is the efficient tech/sergeant in "Command Decision" at the Studebaker until Dec. 25.

MILWAUKEE, WIS.
JOURNAL
1948

Rare Triumph for Orchestra

Koussevitzky Acclaimed

By RICHARD S. DAVIS

SO FAR as Milwaukee is concerned, the world's finest orchestra is the Boston symphony. In this town, also, the greatest of all conductors is Serge Koussevitzky. Both were here Sunday afternoon—together in the Auditorium for the last time.

More than a little sadness lies in that fact, but for the purposes of this report there is nothing but gratitude for the final program under the magnificent Russian. If ever an afternoon of music demonstrated the power of a conductor to lift an orchestra into almost supernatural achievement, it was this glorious program at the Auditorium.

Repeatedly the present reporter has wailed about the vagaries of the big hall, but for some reason even that mischievous chamber was responsive to the music from the hooded stage. Never before has there been such a feeling of stillness and awed respect. When even the Auditorium itself is eager to listen, something close to a miracle is in the making.

* * *

It was the Brahms symphony, No. 1 in C minor, that brought out the orchestra's superlative best. This was the second half of the program and its all but indescribable beauty sent 4,500 people away with a feeling close to reverence. Never has the orchestra failed in Milwaukee, but the Brahms was a triumph to be recorded as the greatest ever scored.

After the concert, the reporter is informed, Koussevitzky himself remarked to friends that his orchestra had never played the symphony so well. It is easy to believe that he said it, for certainly there could not have been a finer buoyancy, a richer flow of tone, a more truly soaring spirit than the men from Boston exhibited in their sensitive reading of the immortal poem.

Ordinarily the strings of the Boston orchestra are the section to draw ecstatic praise, and indeed they earned it in the Brahms, but this time all sections played as if inspired and their work was flawless. Every division of the noble symphony was set forth eloquently—the andante was notably beautiful—but it was the final movement that almost lifted the audience out of its chairs. Never, from any orchestra in any hall, has this reporter heard music to equal it.

* * *

It was somewhat surprising to find that Koussevitzky had chosen to repeat the "Till Eulenspiegel" of Richard Strauss -- the orchestra played it last time in Milwaukee — but surely there could be no complaint. The music was alive and twinkling. Its mischief skipped and bounced. The brightest of individual turns gave sparkle to the diversion and the exercise as a whole was amazingly lightfooted.

The prelude of "Lohengrin" was so familiar to the audience that it, too, seemed a dubious choice—this, of course, before it was played. Actually it was a major part of the day's triumph, a masterpiece of climaxes built from sensuous murmurs.

Vivaldi's concerto in D minor was the opening. This was an opportunity for the strings to dig into their unequalled resources and come up with tone of breathtaking richness, tang and bite. The pattern for the day was set.

—o—

CHRISTMAS GIFT: Every year Victor reaches into the archives and sends record reviewers something special for the holidays. This year it is a jewel. It is Serge Koussevitzky's performance of the slow movement of his Concerto in F minor for double bass, with Pierre Luboshutz at the piano. A reissue, of course, on ruby vinylite, and you should hear that playing. Tho perhaps you know what the string bass can be like when you hear the Boston orchestra.

THE MUSICAL SCENE

Koussevitzky Anniversary Dinner To Have Varied Musical Program

By ARTHUR V. BERGER

THE program following the dinner in honor of Serge Koussevitzky at the Waldorf-Astoria Tuesday evening will include, according to our latest information, the Fantasia for Strings by Peter Mennin, which has been enlarged to embrace the birthday piece he was invited to write for this celebration of the Boston Symphony conductor's twenty-fifth anniversary with that orchestra. It will be played by a string ensemble of Tanglewood alumni under the direction of Eleazar de Carvalho. The ensemble will also be heard in two movements from David Diamond's Rounds under Leonard Bernstein's direction and Handel's Concerto Grosso, No. 10, under Mr. Koussevitzky.

Hugh Ross will conduct choral music by Samuel Barber and Randall Thompson, and Marc Blitzstein will accompany excerpts from from opera, "The Little Foxes." Since Mr. Koussevitzky was a double bass player by profession before he became a conductor, it was considered appropriate to have a solo for this instrument on the program. Harold Gramatges is its composer. William Schuman and the retiring conductor will speak, and Adolph Green will present a skit. Aaron Copland will be master of ceremonies, as president of the League of Composers, which is sponsoring the dinner.

* * *

Another Music Period, the eighth annual one, will be held at Yaddo in Saratoga Springs this summer, from Sept. 6 to 18. There will be a chamber orchestra in residence, and composers are also invited to submit works for voice with piano or instrumental accompaniment. Scores should be sent to this year's chairman of the music committee, John R. Barrows, 117 Macdougal Street, New York 12.

The wave of revivalism of the avant garde American composers of the 'twenties has touched the nineteenth annual festival of the Eastman School of Music in Rochester which included works of Ruggles, Ives and Varese on Friday's little symphony program led by Frederick Fennell. The climax of the festival is expected to be the premiere of an opera bouffa, "Don't We All," by Burrill Phillips tomorrow night under the direction of Carl Fuerstner.

The League of Composers has received a contribution from Mrs. Frederick S. Crofts which will be used to start a fellowship fund enabling composers to devote themselves to work and study for a period of from six months to a year. . . . Roger Sessions, who will be visiting instructor in composition at the Juilliard Summer School during the forthcoming session, will, in addition, give weekly lectures, open to the public without charge, on "The Aesthetics of Music." . . . John Cage has written music for two experimental films, "Horror Dream" and "Introspection," which will be shown by Cinema 16 on Wednesday evening, May 18, in the Central Needle Trades Auditorium on a program that will also include the Pare Lorentz documentary, "The River," with Virgil Thomson's music.

* * *

Thomas K. Scherman's Little Orchestra Society has commissioned Arthur Kreutz to write a concerto for Dixieland band and orchestra. . . . Herman Neuman, music director of the Municipal Broadcasting System, will begin a tour of Scandinavian radio stations in Copenhagen May 18. He will conduct an American program, including works of Chadwick, Dello Joio, Foss and others. . . . Hilda Ohlin, soprano, has brought from Paris for the Library of Congress archives a set of recordings of the concert that inaugurated the little American Embassy Theater on the Rue du Faubourg Saint-Honoré, Dec. 10.

[210]

CINCINNATI, OHIO
POST

DEC 7 1948

Mr. Foss Drops In To Visit

BY ELEANOR BELL

The day the Boston Symphony Orchestra rolled into town, young Lukas Foss bounded up to the College of Music to speak to the students there. Mr. Foss, an energetic type, to put it mildly, is a composer of some standing and happens to play the piano well enough to be pianist with the Boston orchestra.

In the Green Room at the college Mr. Foss went through one of his latest scores, "Song of Songs," an impassioned work full of amarous anguish for soprano and orchestra. Mr. Foss was playing the orchestra parts on the piano and singing the soprano with great relish when I happened in, although, of course, he is no soprano.

"Song of Songs" was commissioned by the League of Composers for Ellabelle Davis and Mr. Foss obligingly made the soprano a very fat singing part, since in a sense, she is footing the bill. He knows just how he wants it sung. In fact, Mr. Foss has definite ideas on how most things should be sung and he thinks current singing standards are deplorable.

"Everything is sung in the same style these days," he complained to the assembled students. "All you hear today is big, wide vibrato, whether that fits the style of the music or not." Mr. Foss said instrumentalists do the same thing.

"Violinists play all their strings with this heavy, G-string wobble," he said. "It has become a musical cliche."

The 26-year-old pianist-composer ("The Prairie" is his most famous work) has appeared as composer, pianist and conductor with some of the major symphony orchestras. In Pittsburgh he was asked why he conducted a Beethoven symphony from memory and used a score for his own composition.

"That's easy," was his reply "I've known the Beethoven so much longer."

Mr. Foss is small and informal, has bright blue eyes and a shock of black hair that rises rather suddenly out of his forehead. His father is a professor of philosophy at Haverford College. His brother is an artist Lukas is the only musician in the Foss family.

ANN ARBOR, MICH.
NEWS
DEC 7 1948

Koussevitzky Leads Boston Orchestra In Fine Concert

By Carl Gehring

With the final appearance in Ann Arbor of Serge Koussevitzky as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, a musical epoch has come to an end. Year after year since 1931, this organization has brought the note of epic grandeur to the Choral Union Concert Series. While we feel certain that the distinction with which the Boston Orchestra has played under Koussevitzky will be maintained by Charles Muench, who succeeds Koussevitzky at the close of the current season, it will not be the same, at least for awhile, not to have Koussevitzky giving us his characteristic interpretations of all kinds of music.

Last evening's concert at Hill Auditorium, the sixth of the Choral Union Series, was a kind of condensation within the space of two hours of what we have been hearing over a long span of years. A finely varied program, composed of a Symphony for Strings, by Arthur Honegger; orchestrations by Claude Debussy of two "Gymnopedies," by Erik Satie; Serge Prokofieff's Scythian Suite, "Ala and Lolli," Op. 20, and Johannes Brahms' First Symphony in C Minor, Op. 68, were gorgeously directed by a master whose impeccable taste and breadth of outlook have added their own particular kind of enrichment to the many works Koussevitzky has conducted in the past.

Welcome Adjuncts On Program

Of especial interest was the presence on the program of the works by Honegger, Satie and Prokofieff. Honegger's score, dated 1941, was fascinating in its conception, rather more explosive than otherwise in what it had to say, and fully exploited the potentialities of the strings. The Satie pieces, brought out in 1888, had a dreamlike beauty the ephemeral qualities of which were much enhanced by Debussy's exquisite orchestrations. Prokofieff's work, completed in 1914, was typical of its composer's earlier style of rather aggressive modernity and boisterousness. That he has come a long way in his development was revealed in 1945 when Koussevitzky played his titanic Fifth Symphony.

With these pieces, Koussevitzky once again showed himself to be most adept with the modern idiom. The neurotic restlessness of the opening movement of the Honegger was brought out with the most extraordinary turbulence. The germination of the movement-proper from the opening figure in the violas, so sinister in its implications, was well evolved. Contrasted with such details were the fine atmosphere of the second movement of the Symphony, and the utterly pagan quality of the two Satie excerpts in which the accompanying harmonies implied quite as much as the statements of the themes expressed. Here was the very essence of subtlety.

Orchestra At Its Best

Responding as a man to the conductor's wishes were the members of an orchestra which was at its customary best. With a string section which was perfect in all of the requirements of Honegger's demanding score, woodwinds which pointed up the effect of Satie with such god-like effect, and a brass choir and battery which made parts of the Prokofieff so electrifying, the orchestra was magnificent throughout the length of the concert. In the Prokofieff Suite, so rich in orchestral acrobatics, the various instrumental ensembles and balances were of the last word, with not the slightest hint of stridency to mar several mighty passages for full orchestra.

The last half of the program, given over to Brahms' Symphony, entailed a fitting conclusion to such a concert and such an occasion. The nobility of the work found its counterpart in a performance of such stature as to sum up in appropriate fashion our last impression of Koussevitzky at the helm of this orchestra. Noteworthy were a second movement which represented perfection in the matter of plan and design; a third movement that was a gem of intonation, although taken surprisingly fast; a finale, and particularly the coda, wherein the climax was prodigious in its realization. Here a subsequent rallentando set off well this majestic high point, and statements in the trombones, which send the violins scurrying upward near the end, were masterfully intoned.

Koussevitzky was recalled four times at the close, and the audience arose, in honor of the artist, as it had done at the beginning of the concert. He is revered here, as elsewhere, and we all wish him well.

DETROIT, MICH.
NEWS

DEC 8 1948

Detroit Says Its Farewell to Conductor

By RUSSELL McLAUCHLIN

FIVE THOUSAND Detroiters, filling every cranny of the Masonic Auditorium, came to salute at the close of the Boston Symphony's concert, Tuesday evening, and made such reverent and affectionate din that the conductor appeared and bowed acknowledgement no less than seven times.

It was, of course, Serge Koussevitzky, the acknowledged doyen of orchestral musicians in this republic, who has been conductor of the Bostonians since 1924 and is now making his final tour in that high capacity.

So the demonstration—there is no other word for it — was a city's message of farwell; and in it were both Auld Lang Syne and Auf Wiedersehen. For Koussevitzky is in no mood for retirement. He hangs up the trophies of one career and goes on to another, like any brisk young fellow of 74 should do.

* * *

BUT IT WAS certainly our last sight and sound of him as permanent captain of this great orchestra; and that was a major reason for the evening's emotional conclusion. There was, actually, a mounting ardor in the audience, beginning with the downbeat at half-past-eight. The crowd was huge and spirits were high.

So that precious union of stage and seats, the indispensable of great performance, was evident the moment the program began And as it progressed one mused on the fortunate inhabitants of a New England metropolis, who can hear this kind of music whenever they have the price of a ticket. It is stylish to smile at Boston's surviving pretensions nowadays. You'll notice that none of the satirists pokes fun at the Boston Symphony.

For consider that Koussevitzky's Detroit farewell program included these items: Honneger's Symphony for Strings, about five years old; Dbeussy's orchestration of two "Gymnopedies" by Erik Satie, a highly advanced document on Greek festivities; Prokofieff's so-called Sythian Suite which, in the mood of an early modernist and with extreme vigor, celebrates pagan lore; and, finally, the First Symphony of Brahms, the kind of classicism which endureth forever.

* * *

THE PROGRAM, in short, had scope. It needed a conductor of alert and hospitable mind; an orchestra whose integrity is such that brass can speak eloquently and strings pronounce emphatically, which provides a smooth channel for the passage of every tiny ripple of a composer's thought.

And that is what it had, Tuesday evening; whether for shocking color that cast tonality to the winds or for the solemn, orthodox splendors of a classic master.

The music season probably touched its peak, on the evening of Dec. 7. It was not merely emotion over Koussevitzky. It was also America's top orchestra, at the top of its bent.

DETROIT, MICH.
FREE PRESS
DEC 8 1948

Sellout Crowd a Tribute to Maestro

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY MRS. KOUSSEVITZKY

Free Press Photo

Conductor pays final visit to Detroit before retiring as head of Boston Symphony

Koussevitsky Farewell Draws Doting Throng

BY J. DORSEY CALLAGHAN

Free Press Music Critic

There is a large-sized conspiracy among the members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to protect Serge Koussevitzky from trouble on his tour, but not so the maestro can notice it.

The erect old aristocrat is still absolute boss of his own affairs, despite his 74 years. Not even a newspaper photographer could shake his determination to run his own show.

* * *

CORDIAL AS always to the press, he nevertheless indicated limits beyond which there was no advancing.

The photog backstage at Masonic Temple posed Koussevitzky with his wife for what he hoped would be an informal shot.

"Let's have Mrs. Koussevitzky arranging your tie before the concert," the cameraman suggested.

"I've tied my own tie all my life," was the sturdy reply. "I'm not starting any of that nonsense now." And that was that.

This independence of manner and thought, which some irreverent soul has compared to that of "a bear on a tote-road," is what has made his 25 years at the head of the Boston Symphony Orchestra a golden era in music.

* * *

IT WAS communicated to the audience which jammed the big auditorium to the last seat permitted by law. For Koussevitzky presented a program so daringly modern in its major portion as to seem a final challenge to his listeners before bidding farewell to Detroit.

Long before the doors closed at the Temple, the last whisp of standing room was gone, and hopefuls by the hundreds were being turned away.

* * *

THE THINGS musical that the orchestra did were evidence of equal regard behind the footlights.

Their leader demanded, and was given, the veriest whisper of sound from cymbals, and a miracle of trumpet pianissimo playing without mutes in the two "Gymnopedies" of Eric Satie.

In Honegger's Symphony for Strings, in which a trumpet trio is included by way of surprise, the way was prepared for the entrance of the brasses by violas as impressively mellow as French horns.

The power and depth of the strings throughout the evening was amazing, even for the famed Boston strings. With the spirit of a youthful enthusiast for modernism, Koussevitzky took his listeners on an adventure in counterpoint in the final movement of the Honegger that was like nothing ever heard before in Detroit music halls.

* * *

THE EXCURSION into modernism went further as the first half of the evening developed. The blazing fury of Prokofieff's "Scythian" Suite built through crescendo on crescendo. It ended in a long-sustained blare of dissonance that brought an echo of protest from the chandeliers.

Koussevitzky made his bow to conservatism in the period after intermission with the Brahms First Symphony.

The Brahms was exemplary in its presentation, even though the pace may have offended the most sedate. The play of horns and trombones was rewarding, even for those who do not cherish Brahms especially.

* * *

AT THE END of the concert the audience stood and paid its tribute for at least five minutes. Koussevitzky returned to the stage almost a dozen times before the audience began reluctantly to leave.

It was more like the launching of a great career than one of its final events.

CONCERT

ROCHESTER, N. Y.
TIMES-UNION
C 8 - 1948

Famed Conductor Arrives

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky is greeted by Miss Mary A. Varlan of the Civic Music Association as he arrives at Municipal Airport.

High Praise of Leinsdorf Expressed by Koussevitzky

By HOWARD C. HOSMER

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, who parlayed a bass fiddle into one of the world's most respected batons, flew into town today to conduct his eighth symphony concert in nine days.

The conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, making its annual Rochester appearance tonight at the Eastman, showed few effects of a wearying plane trip from Detroit.

At 74, the slim little man whose stature in music is gigantic admitted he got up at 6 a. m., was hungry, would like an early lunch and an afternoon nap.

Grounded a Year Ago

His trip, he confided, was much better than his journey to Rochester last year, when his airliner was grounded by snow in Detroit. At that time, he chartered a private plane, "about the size of a taxi," he said, and bounced into town in time for his concert.

Tweed-suited, black-shoed and wearing his famed fur-collared overcoat, black homburg and creamy gloves, Dr. Koussevitzky expressed amazement that Rochester had no snow at this time of year. But he anxiously scanned the skies and wondered if the weather would keep him from getting plane reservations for Boston after his Eastman appearance.

Has Praise for Leinsdorf

He expressed regret that he would not be able to see Dr. Alan Valentine, now in The Netherlands, where the University of Rochester president is administrator for the European Recovery Administration.

He had glowing words of praise for Erich Leinsdorf, conductor of the Rochester Philharmonic Orchestra, and expressed pleasure in hearing that the orchestra is now in Southbridge, Mass. "It is good to bring good music to the smaller places," he said.

Of Leinsdorf and the Philharmonic, the Boston conductor said, "He will progress and the orchestra will progress under him. He is a good conductor. He has ambition and the gift. He does not mind working."

DETROIT, MICH.
TIMES
DEC 8 1948

Serge Koussevitzky, great conductor of the Boston Symphony, with his wife, Olga, just before he walked onstage for his final Detroit concert. He's retiring.

An Unwelcome Assignment:

Koussevitzky's Farewell Concert

By HARVEY TAYLOR

NEARLY ALL the 5,000 people who were in Masonic Auditorium last night solved the problem of saying farewell to Serge Koussevitzky by standing up in tribute at their seats. The handclapping lasted nearly five minutes.

We felt like just going home, playing old Koussevitzky records, and thinking a little about what Koussevitzky has done for music—European and American.

Faced with the unwelcome task of writing a review of what may well be our last hearing of Koussevitzky, we feel hopelessly inadequate to the task and regret that we ever got involved in this sort of thing.

"Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony."

For as long as we can remember—which is quite long—we've never thought of one without thinking of the other. Who has? Koussevitzky took over a demoralized orchestra 25 years ago. In 10 years it was the best in the world. It still is.

Word-tributes to such a man are useless. Everything's been said. How best to pay homage to Koussevitzky?

Perhaps by helping see to it that the things he stands for are maintained. There are a few men equal to the task of succeeding him as a conductor. The orchestra will probably sound wonderful under his immediate follower, Charles Muench.

Has Always Looked Forward

But Koussevitzky is the complete conductor. Not only a peerless custodian of the great classics, but the strong, fighting, visionary espouser of new music—not only of his generation but of the generations which followed his.

Every generation has had one conductor who was known for his devotion to the task of helping young composers. Hans van Bulow did it for Wagner, for example.

Koussevitzky is wise enough to realize that concertgoers today are—in hearing Beethoven, Brahms, Chopin, Wagner — enjoying the fruits of visionary musicians of the last century who heard beauty in this new music before the public did, or could.

There are many such young composers nowadays, but there are too few Koussevitzkys.

His philosophy that music must grow or perish was discernible in last night's program. There were Arthur Honegger's "Symphony for Strings" and Prokofieff's "Scythian Suite."

This is the same Honegger who, in the early 1920s was struggling for a hearing in Paris. French conductors wouldn't play his "Pacific 231." But Koussevitzky did.

This is also the same Prokofieff who—long before young Koussevitzky left Russia—was hearing and writing new sounds. Koussevitzky played his works and those of Stravinsky. Both are now almost "classic" composers.

The Last Glimpse

The debt which young American composers owe to Koussevitzky is immeasurable and unpayable. The only way audiences can repay him for what he's done is to encourage conductors to play new works—and give them a fair hearing.

For the final glimpse Detroiters may have of him, Koussevitzky gave them the unforgettable picture and the all too quickly forgotten sounds of greatness merging with greatness.

A wiry, nervous little man of 74—face flushed scarlet and neck veins distended—standing surrounded by the enormous chords which end the great Brahms first symphony—chords played as only the great Boston Symphony can play them.

While seeming to claw and hammer them out of the orchestra, he also seemed to be tearing them somehow out of himself.

To some of the men who have played under him, he is a god. To others he's a "that little ———."

He has inspired the love, respect, the hatred and the jealousy which come to every man who imposes an iron will on other men. But no one will ever say that his rages and his autocratic dominance of the symphony have not paid off.

The orchestra has made the greatest music in the world for years. We hope this will not be the FINAL farewell appearance of Serge Koussevitzky.

[21a]

ROCHESTER, N. Y.
TIMES-UNION
DEC 9 - 1948

Koussevitzky Conducts Magnificent Concert

By A. J. WARNER

Last night marked the end of a great chapter in Rochester's musical life—for Serge Koussevitzky paid his final visit to the Eastman Theater as conductor of the matchless Boston Symphony Orchestra, which, under his distinguished direction, has scaled new heights of achievement, success, and prestige.

For a quarter of a century he has given it brilliant and constructive leadership, and has put the world of music immeasurably in his debt. Now, at the end of this season, he is retiring from a post to which he has brought such luster.

Audience Rises in Honor

A huge audience, with standing-room at a premium, assembled to do Dr. Koussevitzky and his musicians homage, and to hear a concert of extraordinary interest and beauty. At the end of the program the house rose in his honor and stood applauding and shouting its tribute to a master conductor who has endowed his orchestra with a golden tonal glow, a finish and an elegance of style that are unequalled today in this country of fine orchestras.

It was in October, 1924, that Dr. Koussevitzky led his opening American concert in Boston's Symphony Hall. The organization over which he presided was then of historic reputation, although it had gone through some difficult times. But it is hard to believe that it could have played as superbly as it did last night, its performance resting like a cloud of glory upon the head of the man who has worked with it for more than 24 years and has made the Boston Symphony his own.

Honegger Work Opens

The evening began with the Symphony for Strings, with trumpet obbligato, by Arthur Honegger, gifted representative of the contemporary French school. This is an intense and powerful score, its first two movements tragic and dark in mood, with its finale triumphant and joyous as the trumpet proclaims victory over the enemy. Written in Paris during the German occupation, it is full of the emotional spirit of that black period in the history of France. It was easy to respond to the heroic accent of the music, which makes no attempt at descriptive composition. Rather does it strike a symbolic note in the starkness of its expression, which is couched wholly in the modern musical idiom, and it was played with electric effect. Honegger's Symphony for Strings may be slow in becoming popular—indeed, it may never be a favorite in the orchestral repertoire — but its strength and intrepidity are unmistakable.

Prokofieff Colorful

Next came two "Gymnopedies" by Eric Satie, a French composer who ranks as one of the most original characters in modern music. These pieces, dating from 1889, introduce the harmonic style which assumed its legitimate place in the impressionism of Debussy, who orchestrated the Satie works heard last night. They offered Dr. Koussevitzky and his men an opportunity for the kind of tonal light and shade of which they are magical exponents.

Prokofieff's Scythian Suite, "Ala and Lolli," the final number on the first half of the program, was shot with color and was given a shining performance that served magnificently to illustrate the caliber of this significant work, which has been a show piece of the Boston Symphony for many years. It is, perhaps, more notable for its picturesque sonorities than for its "melodies," and it may lay itself open to the charge of artifice, but it is a dazzling example of the creative imagination of a great Russian composer, and its final passage, wherein is portrayed the pagan sunrise, was breath-taking, as the orchestra played it last evening.

Following the intermission Dr. Koussevitzky gave an incandescent and searching reading of Brahms' mighty Symphony No. 1, in C minor, which became a towering mountain peak of tonal glory. Every instrument in the wonderful orchestra sang, as the melodies, "which spring from the parent stem, throwing out tendrils and buds of new melodies," to quote Mrs. Winthrop Chanler's striking reference to Brahms in her book, "Memory Makes Music," sounded forth from choir to choir in the very transparency of perfection. Thus ended a concert the like of which we may not hear again.

Dec. 10 '48

Symphony Broadcasts

To the Editor — Music lovers who have been patiently awaiting the resumption of the Symphony broadcasts Tuesday nights now learn that the orchestra has been unable to find a sponsor. This has cut off the one bright spot we could look for between Sundays.

It does seem that if all kinds of sports, not to mention the general run of drivel put on the air, can find advertisers to finance them, an outstanding musical organization like the Boston Symphony could.

Anyone scanning the programs for good music between 6 and 10 p. m. on weekdays is doomed to disappointment. An occasional highly advertised name on a half-hour program, which is generally keyed to the Chautauqua standard of 30 years ago, is the sole reward.

Would it be unreasonable to ask the many stations in Boston to provide an hour apiece, once a week on different nights, to grade A music? A full symphony orchestra is not at all necessary. Boston has many competent musicians and it would be a simple matter to provide a pianist, a duo, quartet or ensemble from local talent. In fact, a string quartet would be a rare treat.

JAMES E. BAILEY.
Lowell.

ROCHESTER, N. Y.
DEMOCRAT-CHRONICLE
DEC 9 - 1948

Koussevitzky Wins Long Ovation With Boston Symphony

By NORMAN NAIRN

WHEN the Boston Symphony Orchestra played last night at the Eastman, it was no ordinary concert. It was an unusually fervent demonstrative tribute to Serge Koussevitzky, a farewell appearance of the man who has guided the destinies of the incomparable orchestra for 25 years, and who relinquishes his baton to Charles Muench at the season's end.

There were cheers, shouts of "Bravo," and quite a few filled eyes, too, as the audience stood at the end of a glorious interpretation of the Brahms Symphony No. 1, the concluding number.

For this final season under Koussevitzky marks the passing of an era. It will be many a day before any other conductor of the new generation can command the respect, the admiration, the love that is showered upon this man.

And, incidentally, what a pity it is that through the ban on recordings the world has been deprived of the efforts in permanent form of such as Koussevitsky and Toscanini. The lost time is gone, never to be replaced.

As one listened again to the ravishing tones of the Boston aggregation last night, the Koussevitzky spell was more hypnotic than ever. Nowhere in the program was this evidenced more than in the Honegger Symphony for Strings, the opening number.

Whether or not the music held interest, and to most of the audience it did not for this was taut stuff, cerebral without emotional appeal, the fact remains that Koussevitzky's portrayal was whole-souled and devoted. To this reviewer at least, the only expressive part of the entire work was toward the end of the last movement, where the string sonorities were joined by the trumpets in the introduction of a chorale.

Rarely beautiful were two "Gymnopedies" by Erik Satie, the Numbers 1 and 3, as orchestrated by Debussy. These short items were gems, like delicate pastels, and they served to let us hear, for one thing, how beautifully John Holmes, formerly of Rochester and an Eastman School product, can play the oboe.

Composed in 1888, these originally were piano pieces, and were his first in an advanced idiom which some feel anticipated Debussy and Ravel.

Came next the Scythian Suite "Ala and Lolli," by the contemporary Russian Prokofieff. In four movements, the work is a musical treatment of an ancient Russian legend. Its pagan evocations are "The Adoration of Veles and Ala," "The Enemy God and the Dance of the Black Spirits," "Night" and "The Glorious Departure of Lolli and the Procession of the Sun."

Written in 1914, it is one of Prokofieff's most vigorous creations, primarily coloristic and rhythmical. It glittered, it shone under the Koussevitzky magic, its violent episodes were almost diabolical in their terrific impact. And the scintillating fourth part, with its stunning blare of trumpets was almost overpowering. And what astonishingly barbaric effects were there!

Stirred by the picturesque music and the flawless performance of its exacting score, the audience burst into wave after wave of applause.

Again Koussevitzky's magic cast its spell in a moving presentation of the Brahms Symphony No. 1 in C minor, in an evening blending the new and the old. Here was the characteristic sound of the Boston orchestra, flaming intensity, sumptuous strings with their transparency of tone, grandeur of climaxes.

With his patrician taste in dynamic values, the orchestra responded again to Koussevitzky's desires, with the customary care for beauty and precision, the sort of performance that uplifts.

Brahms waited until he was more than 40 years old before completing his first symphony. When it was heard first in 1876, critical reception was anything but encouraging; but today it is one of the most triumphant symphonies in all music literature, and the way it was played last night made for an unforgettable evening.

In addition to John Holmes, first oboe of the Bostonians, other former Rochester players in the ensemble are Willard Page and Henry Freeman, string basses, and Harold Meek, fourth horn.

[213]

[illegible]MPHONY CONCERT

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Time was when an appearance of Leonard Bernstein as guest conductor of our orchestra was something to be regarded with polite tolerance. A pupil and protege of Dr. Koussevitzky, a promising talent, a young man of great gifts. But the Boston Symphony? ? ?

Now it is very different. A Bernstein appearance is a guarantee of a sensation. Last winter he was raising the emotional temperature of two audiences with the long-overdue revival of the Mahler Second. There was nothing so stupendous as that on yesterday afternoon's program. Yet everybody got excited, and everybody had a wonderful time. Including, I believe, Mr. Bernstein.

It was reported in these columns yesterday that the concert could not be rehearsed until the evening before. It would almost look as though that were a recipe for success. Certainly the Orchestra was on its toes. Nor was there any lack of finish and precision. After all, this was the Boston Symphony, while Mr. Bernstein has become a conductor, not only of fire and imagination but of poise and authority.

Of course, the music was for the most part familiar. However, Schumann's "Manfred" Overture had not been played here for 14 years. This is Schumann at his very best, the music is wildly romantic, and here, at least, the orchestration is superb. Would it not be worth while to present the "Manfred" music in toto?

Dec 11 1948

For most of yesterday's audience the high spot was probably Mr. Bernstein's playing and conducting of the First Piano Concerto of Beethoven, never before heard at a Friday-Saturday pair—only at Cambridge concerts and at a Monday concert in '32. It also shows up occasionally at the Pops. This business of the player being the conductor as well was the regular procedure in the 18th century, and it is to that century that this concerto, standing midway between Mozart and the true Beethoven, belongs. But if that was a common procedure then, it is a rare one now, and yesterday's audience was plainly all agog over it. Moreover, Mr. Bernstein played the solo part to perfection and the entire performance was delightful.

Followed Debussy's "Faun," a little less sensuously, a little less languorously than we get it from Dr. Koussevitzky, though beautifully articulated, and the "Fire Bird" Suite of Stravinsky. Mr. Bernstein has now given us the Russian composer's three major ballets, "The Rite of Spring," "Petrouchka" and the "Fire Bird," all in superlative performances. If ballet is Stravinsky's metier, it is also Mr Bernstein's.

Bernstein, Here for 2 Concerts, Talks of War and Music in Israel

By CYRUS DURGIN

If Leonard Bernstein is not quite sure where he is today, blame it on the wonders of modern travel.

"Eight days ago I conducted my farewell concert in Jerusalem," said the young man who returns as guest conductor of the Boston Symphony this week, at dinner last night in a restaurant behind Symphony Hall. "Four days after that I conducted in Rome. And now, four days still later, here I am. It's almost impossible to believe that I'm home in Boston.

"We were in the air 42 hours on the way from Rome. Weather troubles. I got into LaGuardia Wednesday night, and just had time to get to my apartment, unpack from three months of traveling, pack up again to come to Boston, and then start driving here. But I slept late today, and now I feel all right."

The dark-haired, dynamic Mr. Bernstein was taking time for a quick dinner before embarking upon the one rehearsal he will have had for the Symphony concerts this week. His program will include Schumann's "Manfred" Overture, Beethoven's First Piano Concerto, Debussy's Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun, and the suite Stravinsky drew from his ballet score "The Fire Bird."

The Schumann piece Mr. Bernstein last conducted on a historic occasion a little more than five years ago. That was on a Sunday afternoon in Carnegie Hall. Young Lenny was then new to the post of assistant conductor of the New York Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra, and Bruno Walter had just been taken ill. It was up to Mr. Bernstein to take over. He did, and the success he had started him on his present brilliant road to fame.

The performance of Beethoven's C major Piano Concerto will also be a milestone for Mr. Bernstein, at least locally. For the first time [illegible] he will both conduct and play a solo part simultaneously.

In Palestine 2½ Months

[illegible] two months and a half, Mr. Bernstein has been directing the Israel Philharmonic in Pales[illegible]

"[illegible] times become better so [illegible] means can be found, the [illegible] orchestra ought to become [illegible] best in the world. Even [illegible] the strings are fantastic. But, [illegible] money troubles occasioned by the war, the personnel is only 74 players. When the orchestra can be enlarged, some replacements made and the whole thing put on a sound footing, then it will really be [illegible].

"I have never seen a more musical or democratic country than Israel. When I was at Shannon, Ireland, on my way there, we got the news of the Bernadotte murder. For three days we were detained in Paris, because the borders were closed. [illegible] we ultimately got to Israel [illegible] found a country practically in a state of mourning. Everyone seemed both stunned and horrified at the senseless brutality of the assassination and everyone seemed to feel 'What can we do to blot out this hideous misfortune?'

"Israel surely will win, if it has held out this long. It cannot help but win. Now it has a wonderful army, very efficient but very democratic. I know, because I saw whole brigades of Israel troops. The officers are known only by their first names, which has an effect of democratic thinking and behavior.

"After the victory of Galilee, not a single Israel soldier, so far as I could find out, got drunk. They are fighting for survival and they know it. The Arabs, on the other hand, do not seem to know what they are fighting for, and they have a way of running when really attacked.

LEONARD BERNSTEIN

"One Israel village was attacked by a column of Arab tanks. In this village there was just one gun. The Israelites got busy, gathered all the pop bottles they could find, and filled the bottles with explosive. These they handed to the young boys of the village, who climbed into trees, and threw the loaded bottles down on the tanks as they went by. In this manner, the entire Arab column was routed."

Traveling up and down Palestine, at least as far south as Beersheba if not so far north as Dan, Mr. Bernstein came close to the fighting. Luckily, he missed bombings, although several times air raid warnings were sounded while he was giving concerts. In Jerusalem he went into Notre Dame and to the farthest outposts of the Israeli lines in the city. Less than 20 feet away he saw the barrels of the Arab rifles.

At Beersheba he gave a concert with the Israeli Philharmonic for about 3000 soldiers. The concert hall was a natural excavation over which towered rocky cliffs. He played the Piano Concerto of Beethoven there, and his stool was placed on a heap of shale rock. Every so often, the shale would slip, Mr. Bernstein and the stool with it. it.

"I'd have to keep on playing in a sort of half-crouch while someone got behind me and jacked up the stool again."

"Israel is a terrifically musical country. I found more kids—most of them 'wunderkinder' practicing piano and violin—than I have seen anywhere else. I tried to discourage most of them, because in that country there is not a big enough outlet for their talents.

"The public, too, are very musical. They are quiet, and listen avidly. Music is a daily need for them. In 60 days I conducted 40 concerts—in Tel Aviv, where the orchestra was founded by the late Bronislaw Huberman in 1936; Jerusalem, and many other places.

"I got a big kick out of the census which was taken while I was there. A general order was sent out by the government that on a certain evening census-takers, men and women from the army, would call at every place of residence in Israel and collect vital statistics upon every person, native or visiting foreigner. No one was allowed to go out, during the period.

"Without a murmur of protest and with the greatest efficiency, those young men and women dressed in khaki went from house to house. In only five hours they had finished the job! That's really going some!"

MUSIC

Dec 11 '48

Leonard Bernstein Is Guest Conductor of the Boston Symphony

By CYRUS DURGIN

O. East is East and West is West and Symphony Hall is a half-way point. That is to say that Leonard Bernstein, returning from his Near-Eastern travels, and the Boston Symphony Orchestra, back from their mid-Western tour, met at Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon and the result was in the nature of a musical miracle.

A miracle because all hands must have been tired, and there was time for only one rehearsal. But unless you knew this, you wouldn't have guessed it, for the afternoon's music-making was characterized by remarkable euphony and precision. This was obviously an example of what can be done when 110 men and a guest conductor have to rise to an occasion.

The program began with Schumann's "Manfred" Overture, which Bernstein had last conducted five years ago, and included the First Piano Concert of Beethoven; Debussy's Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun, and Stravinsky's "Fire-Bird" Suite in the revised orchestration.

For the first time here, Bernstein tackled the feat of conducting and playing the piano solo part in a concerto simultaneously. The feat is like walking a tight-wire over Niagara Falls: Not recommended as a general practise, but there are some who can get away with it. Bernstein managed beautifully, and although it probably is true that division of attention is bound to scamp a solo part, at least interpretively, the performance of Beethoven's C major Concerto was neat and it sparkled. (Incidentally this was the first time that the score had been put on a Friday-Saturday program.)

Bernstein's great wealth of talent was reflected as much in his piano playing as in his conducting. How he finds time to keep his hands in shape is a question that only he can answer. But his part rippled and sang, and it was light and fleet and very clear except when the main theme of the rondo got a little scrambled.

Schumann's "Manfred" Overture is an extreme rarity these days, for reasons hard to tell since it presents him as a better-than-usual orchestrator. To be sure, the music is old-fashioned in its portentous, romantic way, but then so is many another score in the current repertory. Bernstein may take a bow for reviving it.

The rich colors, muscular rhythms and story-telling qualities of "The Fire-Bird" brought the concert to an exciting conclusion. Here as elsewhere the performance was on a high level, indeed. After it, as had been the case after the Concerto, Bernstein reaped a bumper harvest of handclapping and cheers, which he was quick to share with the orchestra. It may be pointed out, too, that in the achievement of this miracle, Bernstein knew his orchestra and they knew their man.

BRIDGEPORT, CONN.
HERALD
DEC 12 1948

KOUSSY IN THE RAW; AIR ORK REHEARSAL

The dress rehearsal of the Boston Symphony, one of the ne[illegible] treats for musicians, carries on over WNBC Tuesday. Listeners can eavesdrop on all the [illegible] hums, tempers and pleased gargles by the conductor, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky. It's Tuesday at 1 P. M. and rebroadcast 11:30 P. M., with Olin Downes commentator.

Y, DECEMBER 10,

ISRAEL A NATION OF MUSICIANS

Bernstein Tells of Conducting Tour Despite War

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

I am probably divulging State secrets, but the Boston Symphony did not rehearse for this afternoon's concert until 7 o'clock last evening. The men had just got back from the orchestra's Western trip and Leonard Bernstein, who is conducting this pair of concerts, has just arrived here from Israel, where he spent two months and a half, via Rome and New York.

ROME LAST SUNDAY

"I can't realize," said Mr. Bernstein, shortly before the rehearsal, "that I was conducting in Rome only last Sunday. And now I can't believe that I am here, or really anywhere." Nevertheless he was very much "here," in the course of a few moments he was to put the orchestra through this afternoon's program, consisting of the "Manfred" Overture of Schumann, which it hadn't played in 14 years. Debussy's Prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun," Stravinsky's "Fire Bird" Suite and the First Piano Concerto of Beethoven, never before heard at a Friday-Saturday pair. Moreover, in the Concerto Mr. Bernstein is functioning as both soloist and conductor, a difficult assignment, even when you have all the time in the world to prepare for it.

Regarding the new state of Israel, which he had previously visited when it was still Palestine, Mr. Bernstein is filled with enthusiasm. When he speaks of it his eyes glow and his tongue waxes eloquent. He admires first of all the country's truly democratic spirit. In the new army, which came in for special words of praise, the officers, "a fine lot of men," are all called by their first names. "After the victory at Galilee," said Mr. Bernstein, "no one got drunk and they all calmly sat around drinking orange juice."

Musical Country

It is the most musical country that the gifted young American conductor has yet encountered. Or so it strikes him. It abounds in talented young children, most of them applying themselves to the piano, and as you walk up and down the streets of Tel Aviv, you hear nothing but concertos. "When they play for me," he said with a smile, "I tell them to give it all up and go into the shoe business."

The army is musical, too. With Jerusalem under fire from Arab guns Mr. Bernstein one morning conducted the Israel Philharmonic in a motion picture theatre, and 2500 soldiers were given leave of absence to attend. They packed themselves into the auditorium, virtually hanging from the chandeliers, to hear the Fourth Symphony of Brahms and Gershwin's "Rhapsody in Blue," in which Mr. Bernstein was the pianist. He also took the Rhapsody, and other pieces, with a considerable portion of the orchestra to play them, into the desert near Beer-Sheba. Three thousand troops made the audience, and Mr. Bernstein's piano chair was placed on a pile of stones which kept slipping out from underneath it, and some of the time he had to play standing up.

The Israel Philharmonic, as it is now called, was founded in 1936, by the violinist Bronislaw Hubermann. Its members have been recruited from practically every country in Europe, and it is Mr. Bernstein's belief that it is potentially one of the great orchestras of the world, though it numbers only 74, and badly needs a permanent conductor.

The players are paid by the government for 52 weeks in the year but are allowed six weeks' vacation. When they are on the job they work hard. While Mr. Bernstein was leading them this last time they gave 40 concerts in 60 days. Since the concert hall in Tel Aviv seats only 1000, each program has to be repeated several times.

Mr. Bernstein had much to say about the courage of the people in the present crisis and their confidence that they will ultimately win out. He cited a case where one Arab army was dispersed by a group of children perched in trees, who hurled pop bottles filled with explosives, and another where the frightened Arabs were scattered by a papier mache tank. As an example of the country's efficiency as well as the ready compliance of the citizenry, he told of the recent census, the first to be taken, that was [illegible]

[214]

TOLEDO, OHIO
TIMES

DEC 14 1948

Koussevitzky Concert Lives Up To Tradition

Boston Symphony's Ann Arbor Program Wins Acclaim for Purity of Rendition

By FREDERICK KOUNTZ

During the past week the annual tour of the Boston Symphony Orchestra brought Dr. Koussevitzky and his players to our part of the country. Since our own city unhappily is no longer a point of call for the orchestra, your reporter set out for the concert in Ann Arbor with a high degree of anticipation that was, however, considerably tinged with sadness. For this, so far as we know at present, will have been the last tour that this conductor and this orchestra will make together.

I recall that the first time I saw the good Dr. Koussevitzky at close range was 20-odd years ago at a private school recital in Cambridge, Mass. He was the recitalist. His instrument was the bass viol. It was a prophetic introduction. For in his hands the big, bumbling bull fiddle took on a certain grace and ease of manner. It did not groan nor was it ever dull. In fact in a voice that very few of the assembly could have known it possessed, it sang serenely and beautifully.

The introduction was prophetic because from that day to this I have never heard from Dr. Koussevitzky and his orchestra, even a single performance, that so much as approached dullness; never a single performance that has been less than completely prepared with an impeccable kind of tailoring.

Always the orchestra has sung, sometimes with an ineffably delicate tracing of lines, sometimes with gloriously vigorous voice, sometimes with even a shattering eruption of sounds. But inevitably its production has been transparent so that every voice was observable in itself and as a part of the magnificent structural unity that all the voices created.

There have been differences of opinion about some of Dr. Koussevitzky's interpretation but they have been differences upon which there could always be intelligent discussion. For in effect the conductor always said—"I know that there are other perfectly valid interpretations. But listen a little to ours to see if you do not discover that it too has its points of validity."

In the Ann Arbor concert the orchestra played Honegger's Symphony for Strings, two of Satie's "Gymnopedies" orchestrated by Debussey, Prokofieff's "Scythian Suite," and the Brahms Symphony No. 1. Everything was in place. Everything was possessed of a tranquility of order to which no other orchestra in our country has ever attained.

Henry Lee Higginson, who founded the orchestra, planned for his city a "permanent orchestra under a permanent conductor." There has never, I believe, been any question that Dr. Koussevitzky and his orchestra have fulfilled that specification. Conductor and orchestra have been an integral part of the cultural life of their city, not simply an appendage to it.

None of us can consider happily the prospect of a Boston Symphony without its Koussevitzky. But he has welded it thoroughly and enduringly. I doubt that it will recede from the standards by which it has guided itself for a quarter century.

For me it has been an incomparable pleasure to hear what this conductor has produced. And it has been a rare privilege to know the man.

MUSICAL COURIER
NEW YORK, N. Y.

DEC 15 1948

Kachouk to Organize Koussevitzky Tour

Michel Kachouk, former manager from Russia of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, announces that he has been authorized to organize a tour for the eminent conductor as podium guest in Europe, Australia and South America, beginning September, 1949. Dr. Koussevitzky retires at the end of this season as musical director of the Boston Symphony.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
POST
HOME NEWS

DEC 14 1948

RADIO and TELEVISION

The Conductor Does More Than Just Wave a Stick; Rehearsal Airing Is Proof

By Paul Denis

When I attended my first concert, I wondered why the conductor got the ovation when the musicians appeared to be doing all the work.

Any illusions I may have had about conducting music have been dispelled by listening to a new, fascinating program: rehearsals of the Boston Symphony under Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, who is in his 25th and final year with the symphony.

This program takes you behind the scenes and, for a half hour, you can eavesdrop on Kousevitsky's struggle to induce the musicians to give him the interpretation he desires.

Koussevitzky

Olin Downes, as annotator, helps you understand the conductor's problems. On the first broadcast, Downes explained that Koussevitsky was "putting the finishing touches on the music" prior to a concert. The orchestra started to play Liszt's Faust Symphony, and Koussevitzky could be heard interrupting: "No, my friends . . . You are not together!"

The music started again. "A little more piano!" More music. "It isn't good! On the second beat, you are not together." Music again. Then, "Dulce . . . dulcissimo!" Music. Then: "No gentlemen! It is piano, forte piano! And no more crescendi, if you please. It's a diminuendo."

The music resumed. Koussevitzky's exasperated gasps were audible. Finally, after many interruptions and harangues, he admitted, "That is splendid."

This procedure was repeated for each passage. Koussevitzky would hum to indicate how he wanted the music played. "It's diga-diga-di ga-dum . . . and not diga-diga-diga-da!" "First violins!" he would order, "don't play ta-ta-ta-ta . . . Don't take the bows off the strings."

On the second broadcast, when the orchestra was rehearsing the Karl Philip Emmanuel Bach concerto, Koussevitzky halted the music to complain, "No! No! Too heavy! Not like Sabastian Bach. A little sharper!"

Downes explained, at this point: "A friend of mine asked if Dr. Koussevitzky could tell things like that to the Boston Symphony. He certainly could. The Boston Symphony could probably play the concerto at sight. But Koussevitzky is after perfection . . ."

At another point, Koussevitzky stopped a slow passage to say, gravely: No! No! It is cold, my friends, and ordinary . . . A few days ago, I opened to a chapter of St. Paul . . . It read, 'I will sing with the spirit and I will sing with the understanding, also.' Such words, so simple, should guide every artist. Now, let us play with the spirit and with the understanding, also."

Downes concluded: "Dr. Koussevitzky still isn't satisfied . . . Paderewski once said, great musicians are those who try to get the last 10 per cent . . ."

It is this tenacious pursuit of perfection that is dramatized so effectively, in these recorded excerpts from Koussevitzky rehearsals. Listen tonight (WNBC, Tuesdays, 11:30 p.m.).

* * *

Irma's Love Hints: Irma, played by Marie Wilson, was advising her friend Jane last night (WCBS, 10 p.m.) to go back to her boyfriend. "Swallow your pride," she urged. "Then if he turns you down, you won't go away with an empty stomach." Then she com[illegible] her land[illegible] man some day. After all, they say the first [illegible] hardest. After that they can't run so fast."

Today's radio-television programs and highlights are on page 56.

Documentary Does It: CARE, which seeks funds for European needy, has never been able to attract contributions from the South. But last week, it finally drew several big contributions immediately following a vivid CBS documentary, Saga of a Sawbuck

---

ROCHESTER, N. Y.
TIMES-UNION

DEC 15 1948

What's the Score?

By LARRY WELD

SOME people are hard to convince.

Last week we reported that a good number of Rochesterians are—in the words of a shrewd businessman—"being took" when they engage certain music teachers for their talented progeny.

We described incompetence in the grossest sort where it involves some local teachers, and we have since heard that our findings are "far-fetched," "all wet" and that such musical malpractice "can't be done."

"If a teacher," one correspondent asks us, "can't read a note of music, how can he possibly deceive even a child?" The writer asserted that children in many respects are far sharper than their elders.

Such deception is possible and is very commonplace.

Consider that there are dozens of musical textbooks for all instruments and the voice that could or would develop the technics of any child, assuming that he has any inherent talent, and providing that that child has any burning desire to master the art.

Then consider the fact that most children will absorb all they can from a Czerny, Hannon, Williams or Goetschius, text and soak up that knowledge with amazing ease and speed.

• • •

ALL the "teacher" has to do, and we've seen it done, is slap a gold star (which you can purchase by the dozens for a dime in any stationary store) on Page "X" and advise the pupil to go on to Lesson "Z."

In other words, if a child comes out of any such class with any ability in his chosen musical art, he is a self-taught artist and would be farther ahead if he were not hampered by the limitations of his so-called teacher.

• • •

MRS. Josephine DiCrasto, director of the Rochester Grand Opera Company apparently is unique in America's musical world.

We have it on good authority that she is the only woman impressario of large-scale opera in the country. If this turns out to be fact, and, so far, a leading weekly publication is so convinced, she will soon be hailed throughout the country for her work.

Regardless of that possibility, Mrs. DiCrasto is doing much for the enrichment of Rochester's musical program.

Already she has brought us the great tenor Tagliavini in at least two performances.

Now, we learn, she is going to line up a cast for her next production on Feb. 27, which would rival the best that the "Met" might offer here.

For a Verdi opera, which we are pledged not to name (and it is not "La Traviata," "Il Trovatore" or "Aida"), she will present none less than Patrice Munsel, Giuseppe Di Stefano and Robert Weede, all from the top ranks of the "Met."

• • •

MRS. DiCrasto, incidentally, was born in the same town of Italy, Soggia, where Umberto Giordano spent his life in composition. Giordano died Nov. 12 of this year.

• • •

SERGE Koussevitzky made his final appearance with the Boston Symphony [illegible] week and not all [illegible] particularly happy [illegible] that farewell concert.

Koussevitzky [illegible] might have offered a [illegible] of more popular [illegible] that which included [illegible] heard and not particularly [illegible].

With the exception of the Brahms' First C minor Symphony, Koussevitzky's nothing [illegible] common program [illegible] orcharm [illegible] they [illegible] orchestra [illegible] have director [illegible] sent home [illegible] some listeners had [illegible] war of the [illegible] horses."

We [illegible] the Symphony programs [illegible] here [illegible] ny's [illegible] and we [illegible] of grams [illegible] common [illegible].

Outstanding [illegible] Symphony were Bee[illegible] Symphony Tschaikowsky's [illegible] Symphony Sibelius' [illegible] Symphony and Brahms [illegible].

There [illegible] which [illegible] musical quarters [illegible] believe, circles [illegible] orchestra represent[illegible] most [illegible].

• • •

WELL, the Boston Symphony will [illegible] of course and [illegible] the span of another [illegible] would like to more [illegible] hear.

Furthermore [illegible] to speculate, [illegible] Koussevitzky has not [illegible] the last time. Eastman Theater [illegible] We'd like to think and are inclined to believe that he, too, will be back in Gibbs Street again.

A 25-year career, unique in the history of American music, is not so abruptly ended.

At least, we [illegible]

TOLEDO, OHIO
TIMES

DEC 14 1948

Koussevitzky Concert Lives Up To Tradition

Boston Symphony's Ann Arbor Program Wins Acclaim for Purity of Rendition

By FREDERICK KOUNTZ

During the past week the annual tour of the Boston Symphony Orchestra brought Dr. Koussevitzky and his players to our part of the country. Since our own city unhappily is no longer a point of call for the orchestra, your reporter set out for the concert in Ann Arbor with a high degree of anticipation that was, however, considerably tinged with sadness. For this, so far as we know at present, will have been the last tour that this conductor and this orchestra will make together.

I recall that the first time I saw the good Dr. Koussevitzky at close range was 20-odd years ago at a private school recital in Cambridge, Mass. He was the recitalist. His instrument was the bass viol. It was a prophetic introduction. For in his hands the big, bumbling bull fiddle took on a certain grace and ease of manner. It did not groan nor was it ever dull. In fact in a voice that very few of the assembly could have known it possessed, it sang serenely and beautifully.

The introduction was prophetic because from that day to this I have never heard from Dr. Koussevitzky and his orchestra, even a single performance, that so much as approached dullness; never a single performance that has been less than completely prepared with an impeccable kind of tailoring.

Always the orchestra has sung, sometimes with an ineffably delicate tracing of lines, sometimes with gloriously vigorous voice, sometimes with even a shattering eruption of sounds. But inevitably its production has been transparent so that every voice was observable in itself and as a part of the magnificent structural unity that all the voices created.

There have been differences of opinion about some of Dr. Koussevitzky's interpretation but they have been differences upon which there could always be intelligent discussion. For in effect the conductor always said—"I know that there are other perfectly valid interpretations. But listen a little to ours to see if you do not discover that it too has its points of validity."

In the Ann Arbor concert the orchestra played Honegger's Symphony for Strings, two of Satie's "Gymnopedies" orchestrated by Debussey, Prokofieff's "Scythian Suite," and the Brahms Symphony No. 1. Everything was in place. Everything was possessed of a tranquility of order to which no other orchestra in our country has ever attained.

Henry Lee Higginson, who founded the orchestra, planned for his city a "permanent orchestra under a permanent conductor." There has never, I believe, been any question that Dr. Koussevitzky and his orchestra have fulfilled that specification. Conductor and orchestra have been an integral part of the cultural life of their city, not simply an appendage to it.

None of us can consider happily the prospect of a Boston Symphony without its Koussevitzky. But he has welded it thoroughly and enduringly. I doubt that it will recede from the standards by which it has guided itself for a quarter century.

For me it has been an incomparable pleasure to hear what this conductor has produced. And it has been a rare privilege to know the man.

MUSICAL COURIER
NEW YORK, N. Y.

DEC 15 1948

Kachouk to Organize Koussevitzky Tour

Michel Kachouk, former manager from Russia of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, announces that he has been authorized to organize a tour for the eminent conductor as podium guest in Europe, Australia and South America, beginning September, 1949. Dr. Koussevitzky retires at the end of this season as musical director of the Boston Symphony.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
POST
HOME NEWS

DEC 14 1948

RADIO and TELEVISION

The Conductor Does More Than Just Wave a Stick; Rehearsal Airing Is Proof

By Paul Denis

When I attended my first concert, I wondered why the conductor got the ovation when the musicians appeared to be doing all the work.

Any illusions I may have had about conducting music have been dispelled by listening to a new, fascinating program: rehearsals of the Boston Symphony under Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, who is in his 25th and final year with the symphony.

This program takes you behind the scenes and, for a half hour, you can eavesdrop on Koussevitsky's struggle to induce the musicians to give him the interpretation he desires.

Koussevitzky

Olin Downes, as annotator, helps you understand the conductor's problems. On the first broadcast, Downes explained that Koussevitsky was "putting the finishing touches on the music" prior to a concert. The orchestra started to play Liszt's Faust Symphony, and Koussevitzky could be heard interrupting: "No, my friends . . . You are not together!"

The music started again. "A little more piano!" More music. "It isn't good! On the second beat, you are not together." Music again. Then, "Dulce . . . dulcissimo!" Music. Then: "No gentlemen! It is piano, forte piano! And no more crescendi, if you please. It's a diminuendo."

The music resumed. Koussevitzky's exasperated gasps were audible. Finally, after many interruptions and harangues, he admitted, "That is splendid."

This procedure was repeated for each passage. Koussevitzky would hum to indicate how he wanted the music played. "It's diga-diga-di ga-dum . . . and not diga-diga-diga-da!" "First violins!" he would order, "don't play ta-ta-ta-ta . . . Don't take the bows off the strings."

On the second broadcast, when the orchestra was rehearsing the Karl Philip Emmanuel Bach concerto, Koussevitzky halted the music to complain, "No! No! Too heavy! Not like Sabastian Bach. A little sharper!"

Downes explained, at this point: "A friend of mine asked if Dr. Koussevitzky could tell things like that to the Boston Symphony. He certainly could. The Boston Symphony could probably play the concerto at sight. But Koussevitzky is after perfection . . ."

At another point, Koussevitzky stopped a slow passage to say, gravely: No! No! It is cold, my friends, and ordinary . . . A few days ago, I opened to a chapter of St. Paul . . . It read, 'I will sing with the spirit and I will sing with the understanding, also.' Such words, so simple, should guide every artist. Now, let us play with the spirit and with the understanding, also."

Downes concluded: "Dr. Koussevitzky still isn't satisfied . . . Paderewski once said, great musicians are those who try to get the last 10 per cent . . ."

It is this tenacious pursuit of perfection that is dramatized so effectively, in these recorded excerpts from Koussevitzky rehearsals. Listen tonight (WNBC, Tuesdays, 11:30 p.m.).

* * *

Irma's Love Hints: Irma, played by Marie Wilson, was advising her friend Jane last night (WCBS, 10 p.m.) to go back to her boyfriend. "Swallow your pride," she [illegible] "Then if he turns you do[illegible] away with an em[illegible] she com[illegible] land [illegible] some [illegible] first [illegible]

Today's radio-television programs and highlights are on page 56.

After that they can't run so fast."

Documentary Does It: CARE, which seeks funds for European needy, has never been able to attract contributions from the South. But last week, it finally drew several big contributions immediately following a vivid CBS documentary, Saga of a Sawbuck

---

ROCHESTER, N. Y.
TIMES-UNION

DEC 15 1948

What's the Score?

By LARRY WELD

SOME people are hard to convince.

Last week we reported that a good number of Rochesterians are—in the words of a shrewd businessman—"being took" when they engage certain music teachers for their talented progeny.

We described incompetence in the grossest sort where it involves some local teachers, and we have since heard that our findings are "far-fetched," "all wet" and that such musical malpractice "can't be done."

"If a teacher," one correspondent asks us, "can't read a note of music, how can he possibly deceive even a child?" The writer asserted that children in many respects are far sharper than their elders.

Such deception is possible and is very commonplace.

Consider that there are dozens of musical textbooks for all instruments and the voice that could or would develop the technics of any child, assuming that he has any inherent talent, and providing that that child has any burning desire to master the art.

Then consider the fact that most children will absorb all they can from a Czerny, Hannon, Williams or Goetschius, text and soak up that knowledge with amazing ease and speed.

• • •

ALL the "teacher" has to do, and we've seen it done, is slap a gold star (which you can purchase by the dozens for a dime in any stationary store) on Page "X" and advise the pupil to go on to Lesson "Z."

In other words, if a child comes out of any such class with any ability in his chosen musical art, he is a self-taught artist and would be farther ahead if he were not hampered by the limitations of his so-called teacher.

• • •

MRS. Josephine DiCrasto, director of the Rochester Grand Opera Company apparently is unique in America's musical world.

We have it on good authority that she is the only woman impressario of large-scale opera in the country. If this turns out to be fact, and, so far, a leading weekly publication is so convinced, she will soon be hailed throughout the country for her work.

Regardless of that possibility, Mrs. DiCrasto is doing much for the enrichment of Rochester's musical program.

Already she has brought us the great tenor Tagliavini in at least two performances.

Now, we learn, she is going to line up a cast for her next production on Feb. 27, which would rival the best that the "Met" might offer here.

For a Verdi opera, which we are pledged not to name (and it is not "La Traviata," "Il Trovatore" or "Aida"), she will present none less than Patrice Munsell, Guiseppe Di-Stefano and Robert Weede, all from the top ranks of the "Met."

• • •

MRS. DiCrasto, incidentally, was born in the same town of Italy, Soggia, where Umberto Giordano spent his life in composition. Giordano died Nov. 12 of this year.

• • •

SERGE Koussevitzky made his final appearance with the Boston Symphony here last week, and not all local music lovers are particularly happy about that farewell concert.

Koussevitzky, they complain, might have offered a program of more popular appeal than that which included works rarely heard and not particularly popular.

With the exception of the Brahms' First C minor Symphony, nothing else on Koussevitzky's program was of any common charm, they argue. That great orchestra, under its incomparable director, we agree, might have sent home many more happy listeners had it fallen back on some of the tried and true musical "war horses."

We checked back through the programs of the Boston Symphony's last dozen or so concerts here and we found Koussevitzky's programs have not generally been of common appeal.

Outstanding in our recollection were Beethoven's Fifth Symphony, Tschaikowsky's Fifth Symphony, Sibelius' Second, D Minor Symphony and Brahms' Third Symphony.

There were others, of course, which were of interest to some quarters of Rochester's musical circles, but the above, we believe, represented that great orchestra most appealingly.

• • •

WELL, the Boston Symphony will come back again, of course, and maybe over the span of another dozen years, we'll hear more of the works we'd like to hear.

Furthermore, we'd like to speculate, the great Koussevitzky has not mounted the podium of the Eastman Theater for the last time. We'd like to think, and are inclined to believe, that he, too, will be back in Gibbs St. again.

A 25-year career, unique in the history of American music, is not so abruptly ended.

At least, we hope not.

CINCINNATI, OHIO
TIMES-STAR

Erratum

By LOUIS JOHN JOHNEN

Louis Speyer, English horn player with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is in somewhat of a tizzy, because in the review of the recent remarkable concert of that organization mention was made of "unintentional, but unmistakable burbles of the English horn with a faulty reed," and he requests a correction from this hinterland. Erik Satie's "Les Gymnopedies" is scored for flutes, oboe, horns and strings—no English horn. Hence, the blame for the crackles falls elsewhere.

Since the compass of both instruments is the same and their tone similar, the error, while inexcusable from the Boston point of view, is I hope, understandable. And Mr. Speyer's professional record remains unsullied. The point I wanted to make was that even the most perfect organizations are not immune from accidents.

Incidentally, the program notes which Mr. Speyer enclosed for his vindication shed light on the meaning of the Satie title. "Les Gymnopedies" are slow dances, processional in tone, classical in spirit, named after a ritual of ancient Sparta.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

Serge Koussevitzky, after Mr. [illegible] week with the orchestra [illegible] to Symphony Hall [illegible] afternoon to conduct the [illegible] Symphony in a program [illegible] delved into many moods. [illegible] afternoon started off with [illegible] Bach's pleasant, somewhat [illegible] Concerto in D for strings [illegible] orchestra by Maxi[illegible]. The light-hearted [illegible] work was followed by [illegible] Sibelius Seventh [illegible], although intensely [illegible] on the bleak side. [illegible] intermission came four [illegible] from Wagnerian operas [illegible] prelude and Love-[illegible] Prelude and Love-[illegible] from Gotterdam[illegible] the warm-hued Prelude [illegible] Die Meistersinger as well as [illegible] introduction to the third act of [illegible].

[illegible] Sibelius Symphony in one [illegible] wears better than the [illegible] hearings promised. Dr. Koussevitzky's discourse yesterday was [illegible] with each of the [illegible] climaxes achieving an [illegible] of elevation. The [illegible] required in the work [illegible] unusual concentration, [illegible] its narrow limits and [illegible] deceptively simple diaphonies, is expressed a for[illegible]tional buildup. It lacks the [illegible] heroics of the earlier [illegible] and for all of its re[illegible] remains, for the most [illegible] and turbulent. It [illegible] that the more ani[illegible] sections were faster than [illegible] today, and, if they were, [illegible] effect was more co[illegible] in other years.

[illegible] Wagner numbers the [illegible] were able to sit back and [illegible] without undue concentration [illegible] seemed to be completely [illegible] in the mood of each ex[illegible] Tristan Prelude and [illegible] were truly rapturous [illegible] sensuously beautiful tone [illegible] adding to the ecstatic [illegible].

[illegible] Siegfried funeral music was [illegible] cogent with all of the [illegible] being performed [illegible]. Finally, Dr. Koussevitzky [illegible] out the program [illegible] exhilarating reading of the [illegible] Die Meistersinger Prelude [illegible] rhythmically incisive, [illegible] and marvellously col[illegible] the ending was blown up [illegible] bordering an apotheosis, [illegible] not in the opera, it still [illegible] rousing and nerve-tingling. The audience expressed its [illegible] of this symphonic holi[illegible] by prolonged applause.

HARRY LAWTON.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

NOV 17 1948

MUSIC

Boston Symphony Offers ~~2nd Concert of Season~~ at Metropolitan

By RUTH TRIPP

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Richard Burgin, the associate conductor, presented the second concert of the season at the Metropolitan Theater last evening.

The program provided delightful and easy listening and the concert had the special quality which prevails when Mr. Burgin, its concertmaster, is on the podium. There is no spectacular virtuosity but in its place a sense of perfect ensemble akin to that displayed by a string quartet. The program:

Weber ....Overture to "Euryanthe"
Brahms..Symphony No. 3 in F major, Op. 90
I. Allegro con brio
II. Andante
III. Poco allegretto
IV. Allegro
Intermission
Bruckner ..Adagio from the String Quintet
Rimsky-Korsakov ..Suite from the Opera, "The Fairy Tale of Tsar Saltan" (After Pushkin)
I. Allegretto alla marcia
II. Introduction to Act II
IV. The Three Wonders (Introduction to last scene)

It was restful for once not to have to struggle with modern dissonance, sound and fury. All the composers represented died before the turn of the century except Rimsky-Korsakov who died in 1908. Their music is no longer complex to the present day listener.

The Weber Overture had great vitality in its lively parts and extreme delicacy in the quiet section for strings. The orchestra offered the gracious themes in a gracious manner and set the mood for an enjoyable evening.

Strong, Rhythmic Appeal

The Brahms Symphony No. 3 has a strong rhythmic appeal. The themes are easily traced and as they were played to us last evening it seemed difficult to realize that this music could ever have been thought hard to understand. The warm tone quality of the strings in the first movement was delightful. The reeds excelled in the second movement. The third was marked by a plaintive quality in the horn passage and a full, powerful tone from the fine 'cello section. The brass choir built a full climax in the final movement and the entire work was marked by sincerity.

The Bruckner "Adagio from the String Quintet" was given devoted attention. Its full beautiful phrases fell like a benediction of sound and one could only be grateful for ears to hear such rich music. Too frequently hearing might possibly cause one to become surfeited with its peculiar opulence, but on occasion, it is good to hear this kind of music.

The gay note of the evening was sounded in the colorful music from "The Fairy Tale of Tsar Saltan." The march with its incisive trumpets and busy percussion was fitted together like a mosaic. The motion of the boat was apparent in the second section and the snarling of the strings might well have been the ugly thoughts of the envious sisters of the folk tale.

The third section was picturesque throughout and the trumpets did their best to announce each important occasion. This score is delightfully imaginative and the orchestra seemed to enjoy its task as much as the audience enjoyed hearing them as they finished the concert of pleasant music.

BOSTON HERALD, SATURDAY, DECEMBER 18, 1948

MUSIC

Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, gave the 10th program of the 68th season in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. The program:
Concerto for Orchestra in D major, arr. by Steinberg........C. P. E. Bach
Symphony No. 7..............Sibelius
Prelude and Love Death from "Tristan," Death of Siegfried from "Goetterdaemmerung;" Introduction to the Third Act, and Prelude to "Die Meistersinger"..Wagner

By RUDOLPH ELIE

Ever since the season began in October we have had one matchless concert after another, nine of them in a row. Yesterday, for the first time, there was a letdown. Not on the part of Dr. Koussevitzky, who was in fine form, or of the orchestra, which played and sounded, as always, magnificently. The program was the culprit; it just did not add up.

And this is, in a way, a curious thing. For actually there was nothing wrong with the program at all. I can say without a touch of snobbery that we might encounter the same sort of thing in other cities fairly regularly. Yesterday's program was, perhaps, something of a review of Dr. Koussevitzky's earlier years when he often devoted much time to Wagnerian excerpts. Later he came to the probably correct view that, good though they are, they do not quite belong outside the theater or the popular concert. Just how completely he has weaned us from Wagner probably even he wasn't aware until yesterday, when it was greeted with politeness but little more. This, then, left the burden of carrying the concert on the Sibelius.

So now the question before the house is, what are we to make of Sibelius in general and the Seventh Symphony in particular? Although Sibelius has composed much since this work, which dates from 1924, the fact remains this is his last major work; the Eighth Symphony, commissioned by Dr. Koussevitzky many years ago, will probably never appear though Sibelius, in a recent interview (of which more detail tomorrow), stated he was still busy at his work table.

It is generally felt by the musical arbiters, whoever they may be, that Sibelius has been largely left behind. Having enjoyed, for many years, an immense vogue in this country and in England (and nowhere else) as a master symphonist, his position in music has now settled back to the second rank. It is currently held that Sibelius is a tone post speaking of fields and forests and rivers and rocks; a landscapist, in short, sometimes taking fire from the heroic legends of ancient Finland but, on the whole, a romantic whose language quite transcends the national limitations.

In all this I more or less agree, rather less than more. It may be quite true that 100 years from now Sibelius will be largely unknown. But with his First, Second and Fifth Symphonies still firmly lodged in the American and British repertoire and providing, as they do, much joy to uncounted listeners, it seems a little early to bury Sibelius.

Yet the Seventh, for all its dignity, its tense, impassioned opening 10 minutes for the massed strings, its intricate, fragment-like themes that weave in and out of the sombre texture, is not exactly up to the burden of carrying a concert, let alone projecting the name of Sibelius on a still distant horizon. Thus the brightest note on the program, and I am of course speaking for myself, was the C.P.E. Bach D major orchestral concerto as arranged by Steinberg. It deserves a good deal more discussion than possible this far down the page, particularly its slow movement, a cantilena of extraordinary power and breadth. Here we were able to hear and admire again the great artistry of Louis Speyer on the English horn who, in some mysterious fashion astounding to me, is actually capable of taking a breath without breaking a phrase.

* * *

A word or two on the situation next week. The Saturday evening concert will be given Wednesday night, the Friday afternoon concert on Thursday afternoon; all very complicated but then, Christmas complicates everything. Leonard Bernstein returns on both occasions to conduct Haydn's Clock Symphony and Shostakovitch's Seventh.

JOHNSON CITY, TENN.
PRESS-CHRONICLE

DEC 19 1948

News About Performers

On November 22, a nationwide radio audience heard the first in a series of weekly broadcasts of Boston Symphony Orchestra "Dress Rehearsals" directed by its renowned conductor, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky. Originating from the stage of Boston's Symphony Hall, as will all of the weekly programs, the broadcast marked the first time that a major symphony organization and a radio network, NBC, have joined in broadcasting orchestra rehearsals as a regular music program. Music educators and music lovers have hailed the series as a rare opportunity to listen to a great symphony orchestra and conductor at work.

As an aid to the radio audience's complete enjoyment and understanding of these entirely unprepared "Dress Rehearsals," Olin Downes, chief critic of the New York Times, will act as interpolator, commenting on various aspects of Dr. Koussevitzhy's work with the orchestra. The programs will be broadcast over the NBC network at 1 p. m., EST, Mondays but may be rebroadcast by affiliated stations at other times in order to reach both adult and student audiences.

These truly historic broadcasts are a fitting tribute to the 25th anniversary of Dr. Koussevitzhy's leadership of the Boston Symphony. In opening his hitherto closed rehearsals to radio broadcast, Dr. Koussevitzhy has taken another pioneering step toward his goal of making fine music a democratic art.

Saturday Review of Literature
NEW YORK, N. Y.

DEC 18 1948

The New Recordings

COMPOSITION, PERFORMER, ALBUM NUMBER, NUMBER OF RECORDS	ENGINEERING Recording Technique, Surface	PERFORMANCE AND CONTENT
MENDELSSOHN, "ITALIAN" SYMPHONY. Boston Symphony, Koussevitzky. RCA Victor DM 1259 (3)	Replacing old BSO job. This is best Boston recording yet. Nice steely wide-range strings.	Ever-gracious, easy listening. The felicitous music is played a bit fast, but it still sings. A safe-and-sound Xmas present.
PROKOFIEFF, "CLASSICAL" SYMPHONY; CHOUT; DANSE FINALE. Boston Symph. Koussevitzky. RCA Victor DM 1241 (2) Comparison: (SAME) Phila. Orch. Ormandy. Columbia MX 287 (2)	Same good recording—but not so suitable for this chamber-style piece: too live, distant, big-hall. The accentuated (?), somewhat drier Columbia version is better to my ear. Sharper highs, closer solos, especially 2nd mvt.	Thorny problem—3 sides (Kouss.) is too short, 4 sides (Ormandy) too long! Boston version faster than I can take, tho "Chout" is a valuable brassy, barbaric novelty. I'd pick Ormandy's leisurely, gracious "Classical" any day. One of his best recordings.

—EDWARD TATNALL CANBY.

DECEMBER 18, 1948

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

DEC 23 1948

AMERICAN MUSIC FETE

Koussevitsky to Give Programs Here and in Boston

Special to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

BOSTON, Dec. 22—As one of the events of his final season as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky has planned a two-concert "American Festival," reviewing the country's musical history of the last twenty-five years.

The festival will be presented here on the next two week-ends, and at Carnegie Hall, New York, Jan. 12 and 15. The names of some of the composers whose works will be played either were first introduced under Dr. Koussevitsky's direction in past seasons, or will be during the festival.

The list extends from Edward Burlingame Hall, who was an established composer when Dr. Koussevitsky came here twenty-five years ago, to Lukas Foss, who is considered a junior even among his contemporaries.

[216]

---

e?

er of Roch-sinessman—sic teachers which we are (and it is not Trovatore" or esent none less l, Guiseppe Di rt Weede, all of the "Met."

●

incidentally,
he same town here Umberto
s life in com-died Nov. 12

●

tzky made his e with the Bos-last week, and lovers are par-bout that fare-hey complain, a program of peal than that rks rarely heard

y popular.
eption of the ninor Symphony,
Koussevitzky's
any common
That great or-ts incomparable ee, might have more happy lisn back on some ue musical "war

ck through the Boston Sympho-
so concerts here oussevitzky's pro-enerally been of our recollection

Fifth Symphony,
Fifth Symphony,
D Minor Sympho-
Third Symphony.
hers, of course,
interest to some chester's musical bove, we believe,
great orchestra

●

oston Symphony back again, of be over the span years, we'll hear rks we'd like to e'd like to specu-Koussevitzky has e podium of the

for the last time.
ink, and are in-that he, too, will

r, unique in the can music, is not

CINCINNATI, OHIO
TIMES-STAR
DEC 17 1948

Erratum

By LOUIS JOHN JOHNEN

Louis Speyer, English horn player with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is in somewhat of a tizzy, because in the review of the recent remarkable concert of that organization mention was made of "unintentional, but unmistakable burbles of the English horn with a faulty reed," and requests a correction from the hinterland. Erik Satie's "Les Gymnopedies" is scored for flutes, oboe, horns and strings—no English horn. Hence, the blame for the crackles falls on the oboe.

Since the compass of both instruments is the same and their color similar, the error, while inexcusable from the Boston point of view, is I hope, understandable. And Mr. Speyer's professional record remains unsullied. The point I wanted to make was that even the most perfect organizations are not immune from accidents.

Incidentally, the program notes which Mr. Speyer enclosed for his vindication shed light on the meaning of the Satie title. "Les Gymnopedies" are slow dances, processional in tone, classical in spirit, named after a ritual of ancient Sparta.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, after Mr. Bernstein's week with the orchestra, returned to Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon to conduct the Boston Symphony in a program which delved into many moods. The afternoon started off with C. P. E. Bach's pleasant, somewhat pastoral Concerto in D for strings arranged for orchestra by Maximilian Steinberg. The light-hearted finale of this work was followed by the rather stark Sibelius Seventh Symphony which, although intensive, remains on the bleak side. After the intermission came four excerpts from Wagnerian operas —the fervid prelude and Love- —the fervid Prelude and Love-death music from Gotterdammerung, the warm-hued Prelude to Die Meistersinger as well as the introduction to the third act of that opera.

The Sibelius Symphony in one movement wears better than the early hearings promised. Dr. Koussevitzky's discourse yesterday was most perceptive with each of the three main climaxes achieving an opposite sense of elevation. The 25 minutes required in the work demanded unusual concentration, for, within its narrow limits and through its deceptively simple diatonic harmonies, is expressed a forcible emotional buildup. It lacks the color and the heroics of the earlier symphonies and for all of its resourcefulness remains, for the most part, turbid and turbulent. It seemed to me that the more animated sections were faster than usual yesterday, and, if they were, the complete effect was more cohesive than in other years.

With the Wagner numbers the listeners were able to sit back and relax without undue concentration and they seemed to be completely caught up in the mood of each excerpt. The Tristan Prelude and Liebestod were truly rapturous with the sensuously beautiful tone of the strings adding to the ecstatic interpretation.

The Siegfried funeral music was dramatically cogent with all of the brass passages being performed magnificently. Finally, Dr. Koussevitzky rounded out the program with an exhilarating reading of the mellifluent Die Meistersinger Prelude. It was rhythmically incisive, finely paced and marvellously colored. If the ending was blown up to a state bordering an apotheosis, which it is not in the opera, it still made a rousing and nerve-tingling ending. The audience expressed its appreciation of this symphonic holiday package by prolonged applause.

HARRY LAWTON.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
NOV 17 1948

MUSIC

Boston Symphony Offers 2nd Concert of Season at Metropolitan

By RUTH TRIPP

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Richard Burgin, the associate conductor, presented the second concert of the season at the Metropolitan Theater last evening.

The program provided delightful and easy listening and the concert had the special quality which prevails when Mr. Burgin, its concertmaster, is on the podium. There is no spectacular virtuosity but in its place a sense of perfect ensemble akin to that displayed by a string quartet. The program:

Weber ....Overture to "Euryanthe"
Brahms..Symphony No. 3 in F major, Op. 90
I. Allegro con brio
II. Andante
III. Poco allegretto
IV. Allegro
Intermission
Bruckner ..Adagio from the String Quintet
Rimsky-Korsakov ..Suite from the Opera, "The Fairy Tale of Tsar Saltan" (After Pushkin)
I. Allegretto alla marcia
II. Introduction to Act II
IV. The Three Wonders (Introduction to last scene)

It was restful for once not to have to struggle with modern dissonance, sound and fury. All the composers represented died before the turn of the century except Rimsky-Korsakov who died in 1908. Their music is no longer complex to the present day listener.

The Weber Overture had great vitality in its lively parts and extreme delicacy in the quiet section for strings. The orchestra offered the gracious themes in a gracious manner and set the mood for an enjoyable evening.

Strong, Rhythmic Appeal

The Brahms Symphony No. 3 has a strong rhythmic appeal. The themes are easily traced and as they were played to us last evening it seemed difficult to realize that this music could ever have been thought hard to understand. The warm tone quality of the strings in the first movement was delightful. The reeds excelled in the second movement. The third was marked by a plaintive quality in the horn passage and a full, powerful tone from the fine 'cello section. The brass choir built a full climax in the final movement and the entire work was marked by sincerity.

The Bruckner "Adagio from the String Quintet" was given devoted attention. Its full beautiful phrases fell like a benediction of sound and one could only be grateful for ears to hear such rich music. Too frequently hearing might possibly cause one to become surfeited with its peculiar opulence, but on occasion, it is good to hear this kind of music.

The gay note of the evening was sounded in the colorful music from "The Fairy Tale of Tsar Saltan." The march with its incisive trumpets and busy percussion was fitted together like a mosaic. The motion of the boat was apparent in the second section and the snarling of the strings might well have been the ugly thoughts of the envious sisters of the folk tale.

The third section was picturesque throughout and the trumpets did their best to announce each important occasion. This score is delightfully imaginative and the orchestra seemed to enjoy its task as much as the audience enjoyed hearing them as they finished the concert of pleasant music.

BOSTON HERALD, SATURDAY, DECEMBER 18, 1948

MUSIC

Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, gave the 10th program of the 68th season in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. The program:
Concerto for Orchestra in D major, arr. by Steinberg........C. P. E. Bach
Symphony No. 7................Sibelius
Prelude and Love Death from "Tristan," Death of Siegried from "Goetterdaemmerung;" Introduction to the Third Act, and Prelude to "Die Meistersinger"..Wagner

By RUDOLPH ELIE

Ever since the season began in October we have had one matchless concert after another, nine of them in a row. Yesterday, for the first time, there was a letdown. Not on the part of Dr. Koussevitzky, who was in fine form, or of the orchestra, which played and sounded, as always, magnificently. The program was the culprit; it just did not add up.

And this is, in a way, a curious thing. For actually there was nothing wrong with the program at all. I can say without a touch of snobbery that we might encounter the same sort of thing in other cities fairly regularly. Yesterday's program was, perhaps, something of a review of Dr. Koussevitzky's earlier years when he often devoted much time to Wagnerian excerpts. Later he came to the probably correct view that, good though they are, they do not quite belong outside the theater or the popular concert. Just how completely he has weaned us from Wagner probably even he wasn't aware until yesterday, when it was greeted with politeness but little more. This, then, left the burden of carrying the concert on the Sibelius.

So now the question before the house is, what are we to make of Sibelius in general and the Seventh Symphony in particular? Although Sibelius has composed much since this work, which dates from 1924, the fact remains this is his last major work; the Eighth Symphony, commissioned by Dr. Koussevitzky many years ago, will probably never appear though Sibelius, in a recent interview (of which more detail tomorrow), stated he was still busy at his work table.

It is generally felt by the musical arbiters, whoever they may be, that Sibelius has been largely left behind. Having enjoyed, for many years, an immense vogue in this country and in England (and nowhere else) as a master symphonist, his position in music has now settled back to the second rank. It is currently held that Sibelius is a tone post speaking of fields and forests and rivers and rocks; a landscapist, in short, sometimes taking fire from the heroic legends of ancient Finland but, on the whole, a romantic whose language quite transcends the national limitations.

In all this I more or less agree, rather less than more. It may be quite true that 100 years from now Sibelius will be largely unknown. But with his First, Second and Fifth Symphonies still firmly lodged in the American and British repertoire and providing, as they do, much joy to uncounted listeners, it seems a little early to bury Sibelius.

Yet the Seventh, for all its dignity, its tense, impassioned opening 10 minutes for the massed strings, its intricate, fragment-like themes that weave in and out of the sombre texture, is not exactly up to the burden of carrying a concert, let alone projecting the name of Sibelius on a still distant horizon. Thus the brightest note on the program, and I am of course speaking for myself, was the C.P.E. Bach D major orchestral concerto as arranged by Steinberg. It deserves a good deal more discussion than possible this far down the page, particularly its slow movement, a cantilena of extraordinary power and breadth. Here we were able to hear and admire again the great artistry of Louis Speyer on the English horn who, in some mysterious fashion astounding to me, is actually capable of taking a breath without breaking a phrase.

* * *

A word or two on the situation next week. The Saturday evening concert will be given Wednesday night, the Friday afternoon concert on Thursday afternoon; all very complicated but then, Christmas complicates everything. Leonard Bernstein returns on both occasions to conduct Haydn's Clock Symphony and Shostakovitch's Seventh.

JOHNSON CITY, TENN.
PRESS-CHRONICLE
DEC 19 1948

News About Performers

On November 22, a nationwide radio audience heard the first in a series of weekly broadcasts of Boston Symphony Orchestra "Dress Rehearsals" directed by its renowned conductor, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky. Originating from the stage of Boston's Symphony Hall, as will all of the weekly programs, the broadcast marked the first time that a major symphony organization and a radio network, NBC, have joined in broadcasting orchestra rehearsals as a regular music program. Music educators and music lovers have hailed the series as a rare opportunity to listen to a great symphony orchestra and conductor at work.

As an aid to the radio audience's complete enjoyment and understanding of these entirely unprepared "Dress Rehearsals," Olin Downes, chief critic of the New York Times, will act as interpolator, commenting on various aspects of Dr. Koussevitzhy's work with the orchestra. The programs will be broadcast over the NBC network at 1 p. m., EST, Mondays but may be rebroadcast by affiliated stations at other times in order to reach both adult and student audiences.

These truly historic broadcasts are a fitting tribute to the 25th anniversary of Dr. Koussevitzhy's leadership of the Boston Symphony. In opening his hitherto closed rehearsals to radio broadcast, Dr. Koussevitzhy has taken another pioneering step toward his goal of making fine music a democratic art.

Saturday Review of Literature
NEW YORK, N. Y.
DEC 18 1948

The New Recordings

CHRISTMAS LIST . . .

opera themes.

COMPOSITION, PERFORMER, ALBUM NUMBER, NUMBER OF RECORDS	ENGINEERING Recording Technique, Surface	PERFORMANCE AND CONTENT
MENDELSSOHN, "ITALIAN" SYMPHONY. Boston Symphony, Koussevitzky. RCA Victor DM 1259 (3)	Replacing old BSO job. This is best Boston recording yet. Nice steely wide-range strings.	Ever-gracious, easy listening. The felicitous music is played a bit fast, but it still sings. A safe-and-sound Xmas present.
PROKOFIEFF, "CLASSICAL" SYMPHONY: CHOUT; DANSE FINALE. Boston Symph. Koussevitzky. RCA Victor DM 1241 (2) Comparison: (SAME) Phila. Orch. Ormandy. Columbia MX 287 (2)	Same good recording—but not so suitable for this chamber-style piece: too live, distant, big-hall. The accentuated (?), somewhat drier Columbia version is better to my ear. Sharper highs, closer solos, especially 2nd mvt.	Thorny problem—3 sides (Kouss.) is too short, 4 sides (Ormandy) too long! Boston version faster than I can take, tho "Chout" is a valuable brassy, barbaric novelty. I'd pick Ormandy's leisurely, gracious "Classical" any day. One of his best recordings.

—EDWARD TATNALL CANBY.

DECEMBER 18, 1948

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
DEC 23 1948

AMERICAN MUSIC FETE

Koussevitzky to Give Programs Here and in Boston

Special to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

BOSTON, Dec. 22—As one of the events of his final season as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky has planned a two-concert "American Festival," reviewing the country's musical history of the last twenty-five years.

The festival will be presented here on the next two week-ends, and at Carnegie Hall, New York, Jan. 12 and 15. The names of some of the composers whose works will be played either were first introduced under Dr. Koussevitsky's direction in past seasons, or will be during the festival.

The list extends from Edward Burlingame Hall, who was an established composer when Dr. Koussevitsky came here twenty-five years ago, to Lukas Foss, who is considered a junior even among his contemporaries.

[216]

MUSIC

THE BOSTON HERALD, FRIDAY, DECEMBER 24

Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Leonard Bernstein conducting, gave the 11th program of the 68th season in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. The program:

Symphony No. 101 in D ("Clock")...Haydn
Symphony No. 7, Op. 60....Shostakovitch

By RUDOLPH ELIE

Shostakovitch's Seventh Symphony, revived Wednesday night and yesterday afternoon by Leonard Bernstein six years after its first performance here in the blackest days of the war, is so completely and so passionately a war symphony it can only be appreciated in a direct ratio to the listener's personal contact with or remembrance of war.

To those who haven't forgotten, this work is a shattering experience. To those who have—and it must be borne in mind that uncounted numbers of Americans had no contact with war whatever and, in fact, closed their eyes to the newsreels and their ears to the terrors reported on the radio—this symphony is merely two shattering sequences of noise separated by protracted and melancholy musical probings, the whole consuming nearly 75 minutes.

However, if this symphony, addressed to the Russian people in their darkest hour, did succeed even in a small measure yesterday in stirring the feeling of those who have forgotten or never knew or, worse, lacked the imagination to conceive what war means without having it happen to them in their own homes, it was well worth the enormous effort put into it by Mr. Bernstein and the orchestra. Those untouched by the music might have felt his performance (like the music) was theatrical, hysterically calculated. Those to whom the music—and the basic concept of the music—speaks with all the terrible personalness of a sniper shot or the whoosh of a flame thrower or the snarl of a dive bomber, feel otherwise, and can look upon the unhearing only with a feeling of sadness, futility, and dread.

All of which doubtless seems like emotional reporting and entirely out of key with music criticism; I must confess then that I cannot listen to this music objectively and proceed to discuss its technical or artistic aspects. Assuming we all survive another century or so it will be time enough to find this work, like Beethoven's "Wellington's Victory," quaint. Until that time, however, what happens in the Leningrad Symphony seems none too remotely scheduled for the future, only the next time it could be Boston.

Nor do I see that the political situation affects the impact of this work. It is true enough that in 1942 we loved the Russians as brothers and that in 1948 we have drawn so seriously apart that the rest of the world is merely is waiting for us to square off and fight it out. Naturally, we blame the Russians for this, for it does seem to most of us we've gone a good deal more than half way. But Shostakovitch wasn't writing about politics, but about war, about love of country, about "blood, sweat and tears," and about final victory. And he does it in the universal language of music; I think we'd all recognize this even had he not so specifically detailed the program of the work.

The performance by Mr. Bernstein and the augmented orchestra (whose two brass choirs were placed at right angles to each other to produce an overwhelming effect) was not short of tremendous. Among the many leading roles by first desk men, the [illegible] by Raymond Allard, whose bassoon in the high register is of astonishing quality, and Rosario Mazzedo, whose bass clarinet in the low register is equally affecting, seemed especially noteworthy, but the whole orchestra responded magnificently throughout.

Why Haydn's "Clock" Symphony, a work of the sheerest beauty throughout, hasn't appeared on these programs in 53 years is one of the great mysteries. Most of us know it well through many radio and recorded performances" yet it never sounded quite so transparent and so poised as yesterday. The work gets its name from the metronome-like accompaniment to the andante, which is a wondrous melody. The minuet, with its comical trio for the flute, is another of its delights, but the whole is exceptionally fine, and it was finely played.

Dr. Koussevitzky's two-week festival of American music begins next week, the first program offering Cowell's Hymn and Fuguing Tune, Shuman's American Festival Overture, Hanson's G major

---

—FRIDAY, DECEMBER 24,

MUSIC

Leonard Bernstein Conducts Haydn 'Clock' and Shostakovich 7th

By CYRUS DURGIN

The Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts this week were moved ahead to avoid Christmas and the day before; the Saturday concert was given Wednesday night and the Friday afternoon one yesterday. Leonard Bernstein, again guest conductor, presented two completely different symphonies, the "Clock" (D major, No. 101) of Haydn, and the Seventh by the contemporary Soviet, Dmitri Shostakovich.

Haydn's suave and graceful work, performed by a somewhat reduced orchestra, has been done by the Boston Symphony here but once before—back in 1895 when Emil Paur was conductor. Of course the work has no significance as a time-piece. Someone, noting the ticktocky pizzicato accompaniment to the main theme in the andante, thought it sounded like a clock; thus the nickname.

This is among Haydn's most charming and inventive symphonies, a delight from first bar to last. It was superbly played, too, with a fine breath of style and an aristocratically poised tone.

Mr. Bernstein got down to Shostakovich's war-born monstrosity after intermission. Why he chose to make sort of a Christmas present of it, only he can tell. It's a pretty grim piece for a festive week. I call it "monstrosity" because it is so overwritten and so long. Anyone in these days who writes a work taking an hour and 10 minutes must have a large, if not economy size, ego.

Neither July, 1942, when the Seventh Symphony had its American premiere, nor today, when Soviet-American relations are strained, is the right time to assay music purely as music. Extraneous circumstances are bound to affect opinion. But one does what one can, and that is to point out the truly expert handling of the orchestra, the great pages of the first movement, and the elegiac slow movement.

The finale, one of those whoop-'er-up celebrations that Shostakovich is so fond of writing, now seems downright cheap, tawdry and meretricious, lacking as much in good taste as in solid ideas. But Shostakovich is like that: superb ideas lie side by side with trivialities. No one, however, can challenge the vitality, the color and musicianly organization, technically speaking, of his scores. Nor can one doubt his sincerity.

The orchestra labored valiantly for Mr Bernstein, who gave his interpretive all to the Symphony. So far as pure sound went, it was magnificent.

OSTON, THURSDAY, DECEMBER 30, 1948 Art—Music—Theater 5

rks for Week-End Symphony Concerts

Hanson and Foss to Conduct Own Compositions

Two new works by American composers will be heard for the first time this week end at the Boston Symphony Orchestra's eleventh pair of concerts in the regular series. They are Howard Hanson's first Concerto for Pianoforte and Orchestra, with Rudolf Firkusny as soloist, and Lukas Foss's "Recordare." These two composers will conduct their own compositions.

The balance of this all-American contemporary program will be conducted by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, and will include Henry Cowell's Hymn and Fuguing Tune, William Schuman's "American Festival" Overture, and Walter Piston's Symphony No. 3.

Commissioned by the Koussevitzky Music Foundation, Hanson's score calls for two flutes and piccolo, two oboes, two clarinets, two bassoons, four horns, three trumpets, three trombones and tuba, timpani, xylophone, snare drum and strings.

* * *

The concerto is short, though in four movements. Mr. Hanson treats the piano as a lyrical instrument, rather than as a percussive one. At times it emerges from the tonal tapestry in brilliant hues and again retires modestly into more subdued shades.

The composer makes a great deal of the orchestra. His writing is lyrical and yet stringently dynamic. Horizontally conceived, the parts move with dexterity and balance. He heightens some of his climaxes with gorgeous splashes of brass. In the coda that concludes the fourth movement, he reintroduces material from the first movement.

The title of Lukas Foss's new work, "Recordare," is found in a section of the traditional Requiem mass. He chose this word for its meaning "to record" or "number," and not for any ritual significance.

In one movement, the composition is tragic in character, owing to the fact that Foss began it on Jan. 30, 1948, the day of Mohandas K. Gandhi's assassination. Although it does not reflect any definite events in Gandhi's life, an expression of mourning prevails throughout.

Foss's instrumentation calls for two flutes and piccolo, two oboes, English horn, two clarinets, E-flat clarinet and bass clarinet, two bassoons and contrabassoon, four horns, three trumpets, three trombones, two tubas, timpani, percussion, harp, piano, celesta, and strings.

* * *

The whole work is somber in mood, with the exception of the second theme, which is more serene. The middle section expresses desperate agitation. The main theme, introduced first by the clarinet, undergoes several changes as it is woven through the composition. At first it is slow, then fast, and again slow.

Conceived contrapuntally, the work has moods that are light, singing, and plaintive. The rhythm proceeds like "fateful footsteps," to use the composer's description to the musicians during rehearsal.

Without listing his early compositions, the number of works by Lukas Foss now totals 35. A native of Berlin (1922), Foss studied at the Paris Conservatoire from the age of 11 to 15, at which time he came to the United States. Here he studied at the Curtis Institute of Music in Philadelphia and was graduated after three years with honors. He has studied composition with Rosario Scalero, Randall Thompson, and Paul Hindemith, conducting with Fritz Reiner and Serge Koussevitzky. Although he has been the official pianist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra since 1944, he considers himself primarily a composer, and an American one. H. R.

Bruno

Rudolf Firkusny, appearing as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Friday and Saturday in the première of Howard Hanson's Piano Concerto.

FUND TO HONOR KOUSSEVITZKY

A $250,000 Koussevitzky Anniversary Fund will be established as a permanent tribute to Serge Koussevitzky's leadership of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for 25 consecutive seasons, the orchestra's trustees announced yesterday.

The fund will be used "without restrictions for cultural and educational development by the orchestra, and as a cushion against emergencies," the trustees' announcement stated. It is planned as a revolving fund, with any withdrawals in any one year to be restored as soon as practicable.

Dr. Koussevitzky, in a letter to Edward A. Taft, who will be chairman of the fund, replied with the following statement to Taft's request as to how the Friends of the Orchestra could best express their appreciation and gratitude on his 25th anniversary as conductor:

"Truly there is only one way in which I would wish you to do this—by a gift to the orchestra, a big gift."

The conductor, who is retiring at the end of the current season, added, "I would consider it the finest of all personal tributes if my friends should take this occasion to give convincing proof that this splendid orchestra to which I have devoted my best efforts for nearly a quarter of a century shall never flounder or fall through lack of adequate financial support."

In a statement to the Friends of the Orchestra, Henry B. Cabot, president of the trustees, wrote: "It is proper that we who enjoy the concerts of our orchestra and take pride in its continuing success should seize this occasion to record in tangible form our appreciation of Dr. Koussevitzky's magnificent contribution to the fame of our historic institution.

"It is hoped that many others will care to join us in paying tribute to a worthy conductor who has served us so long and with such integrity and devotion."

Headquarters of the fund will be in Symphony Hall.

MIAMI, FLA.
HERALD

DEC 24 1948

Koussevitzky Fund Planned

In tribute to Serge Koussevitzky's distinguished leadership of the Boston Symphony orchestra for 25 consecutive seasons, a Koussevitzky Anniversary fund of a quarter of a million dollars is to be established.

The sum is to be used for cultural and educational development by the orchestra and as a cushion against emergencies.

It is to be a revolving fund in the sense that any withdrawals in any one year are to be restored as soon as practicable.

Headquarters of the fund will be located at Symphony Hall, Boston, and Edward A. Taft will be chairman.

ER 24, 19

and Orchestra soloist), Foss' iston's Pulitzer- d Symphony.

5

certs

kusny, appearing as the Boston Sym- estra on Friday and the première of nson's Piano Con-

---

BOSTON SUNDAY POST, OCTOBER 31, 1948

MUSIC

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Assuming that it was not just an example of the proverbial French politeness, the most encouraging thing about Charles Munch's recent visit to Boston, as conductor of the Orchestre National, was his comment in the course of an interview two days before, that American orchestras are the best in the world. If the Orchestre National really represents his ideal of tone and performance, the prospect for next season and the two following doesn't look too bright. But I don't believe for a moment that it does. Mr. Munch is a conductor of wide experience with, I am sure, anything but a provincial outlook.

To many of us the tone of this French orchestra seemed thin and dry, the admirable woodwinds excepted. Even the orchestra's proponents admitted that its tone lacked the richness and body to which we are accustomed, but preferred to speak of the absence of "lushness" and "animal warmth," an implied rebuke to those of a grosser musical nature who prize such fleshly delights.

Has Clarity of Tone

Clarity the Orchestre National certainly has; its performance of everything was beautifully transparent. And many made a point of praising its pianissimo. Well, a thin tone can easily be made thinner. And so what? I encountered during the intermission a musical friend who asked me quite seriously if I intended to tell the truth about the orchestra. Before I had a chance to mumble something about the usual amenities he went on to say that it was, of course, much better than the Boston Symphony. Rendered nearly speechless by that one, I made a feeble attempt to explain my position, but we parted with neither of us having persuaded the other to his point of view. Such things are matters of taste and they cannot be rationalized. The next day I heard from the lips of a music student an expression of regret that she had missed the concert, since she had been assured that the Orchestre National was the greatest in the world!

Outside some fine recordings and a performance of "Tannhaeuser" at the Paris Opera many years ago, my acquaintance with French orchestras is limited. I can, or could, speak with more authority regarding those in central Europe. I still had a feeling that the Orchestre National could hardly be the best of which even present day France was capable. In this conviction I was greatly strengthened by a conversation the day following the concert with a French-born musician, a man of no mean importance locally. He said flatly that the National was not its country's best. To my charitable suggestion that the meager string tone might be due to the fact that the players were using inferior instruments, he made reply that the trouble was with the players: they just didn't apply the bow to the strings with sufficient determination. French orchestral musicians, he explained, are prone to take it easy and he went on to speak of his dismay in discovering the night before that most of the members of the Orchestra did not arrive at Symphony Hall in time for what is considered in these parts a proper warming up.

As to the unresonant brass, he told me—something I already knew—that the French players use instruments of smaller bore. Having graciously endorsed my comments on the concert, he said there was one thing that I had omitted to mention, namely the prevailingly fast tempi in Berlioz's "Fantastic" Symphony. "Will we ever," he asked, "hear a true largo when Mr. Munch takes over?" I could only reply that Mr. Munch, himself, had told me that he couldn't abide any music that didn't "move right along." He is certainly one of the least reposeful of conductors; yet I am still hoping that somehow the Boston job will have a calming and restraining effect upon him. It is far easier to subtract energy than to supply it when it is not naturally present.

Extraordinary Bells

If the French woodwinds excited general admiration, so did those extraordinary bells in the "Fantastic." Berlioz's requirements in this respect are usually satisfied (?) with the familiar tubular chimes. These tend to be clangorous and indefinite as to pitch, and in this case, at least, Dr. Koussevitzky has been known to reinforce them with a grand piano, which has also been used, incidentally, for those four deep-toned bells in the first act of "Parsifal." Anyway, in Berlioz's finale, in which the composer would present a dreadful travesty of the service for the dead, the Orchestre National offered two actual bells, beautifully clear and true, a vast improvement over the chimes.

MUSIC

Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Leonard Bernstein conductin, gave the ninth program of the 68th season in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon, performing the following program:

Overture to Manfred, Op 115...Schumann
Concerto No. 1 in C, Op. 15...Beethoven
Afternoon of a Faun..........Debussy
Suite from "The Firebird".....Stravinsky

By RUDOLPH ELIE

After first establishing the fact that yesterday's concert was in every way memorable and that it proved anew what we've all known for a long time, that Leonard Bernstein is one of our very greatest musical personalities, I'd like to tell you of the events leading up to yesterday's concert. They make a story that will do your heart good.

It was nearly midnight on Wednesday this week when an overseas plane landed in New York. One of its passengers was Leonard Bernstein, returning from a series of 40 guest appearances with European orchestras, the last of which was in Rome on Monday. After a few hours' sleep he arose early Thursday and drove to Boston in his own car, arriving about noon

In the meantime, also about midday Thursday, the members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, after two weeks of the most gruelling sort of travel involving one concert after another in the mid-west, began to arrive, fatigued from so strenuous a schedule. Both conductor and orchestra had only the afternoon to rest; at seven o'clock Thursday night they gathered for their one rehearsal together. The program offered one work the orchestra hadn't done for 14 years, another it had never done at this series, two others it hadn't played in four or more years. The one it hadn't done at all was particularly trying, not because it is especially difficult but because the conductor was to lead it from the piano while playing the solo part. The rehearsal lasted until quarter to 12.

This was the situation as the audience gathered yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. That it heard one of the real marvels of performance under these circumstances strikes me as being one of the most astonishing miracles of discipline, of esprit de corps and of true artistic stature in every member of the orchestra I have ever encountered. It was, in a large sense, an immense tribute to Dr. Koussevitzky in having developed, over the years, so loyal and so closely-knit an organization; the men of the orchestra, who must have been half dead in their chairs, never had a finer hour. Nor, for that matter, did Leonard Bernstein, who must have been equally burdened with fatigue and, more devastating, responsibility.

If there is one thing that I, for one, can't get enough of, it is listening to a pianist and conductor of Mr. Bernstein's stature simultaneously conduct and play a piano concerto. It is not a stunt; on the contrary, it is one of the most perfect realizations there is and, in the case of the piano concertos of Bach, Haydn, Mozart and Beethoven the only proper one.

Yesterday, indeed, it was easy to imagine Beethoven himself on the piano bench, playing and conducting his first piano concerto exactly as Mr. Bernstein did. The only difference would be that Beethoven would have been three years Mr. Bernstein's junior—and that his piano and orchestra could not have matched the sound of ours. Be that as it may, few of us have had the opportunity until yesterday to realize how great a pianist Mr. Bernstein might have been had he put his mind to it. Even with the distractions of composing and conducting he is of the first rank, and his performance of this one of Beethoven's most delightful works, was not short of incredibly beautiful. So far as I am concerned he can start on all the concertos of Bach, Haydn, Mozart and Beethoven tomorrow and keep right on going for evermore.

It seems hardly necessary to add that the Debussy and the Stravinsky notably finished off a notable afternoon, save to mention that the solo flute of Georges Laurent in the Debussy was of the sheerest beauty as were the brief first desk solos throughout, I don't know how they did it under the circumstances, but then I could never figure it out anyway.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 1, 1

MUSIC

Koussevitzky Begins American Music Festival at Symphony Concerts

By CYRUS DURGIN

The concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Symphony Hall this week and next will constitute a festival of American music. Serge Koussevitzky and two composers conducted the first such program yesterday afternoon and will repeat it tonight. It begins with Henry Cowell's Hymn and Fuguing Tune No. 2, and includes the "American Festival" Overture by William Schuman; Howard Hanson's Piano Concerto in G major, with Rudolf Firkusny as soloist; Lukas Foss' new Recordare, and the Third Symphony by Walter Piston.

Mr. Koussevitzky conducts the first two and the final number, all of which have become familiar here, thanks to the conductor's brisk and sustained interest in the American composer. Cowell's evocation of the musical past is smooth and rich string writing, while the Schuman Overture is a bright and clangorous piece with a first-rate fugue. As for the Piston Symphony, that in less than a year has proved its worth as one of the finest American symphonies ever written. Mr. Piston bowed from the stage to applause of the most cordial variety when the performance was over.

Howard Hanson conducted this first performance of the only piano concerto he has written. I'm frank to say I could make little of it on first hearing. The orchestra seems to take most of the musical responsibility, with the piano part playing an integral but not spectacular role. Perhaps, as happens so often when composers conduct their own music, the work might sound better from a musician who makes conducting the major activity of his career. Mr. Firkusny seemed to play it well, and the slow movement sounded very nice. At least this is not a hammer-and-tongs percussive concerto.

Mr. Foss was at the helm for the first performance of his Recordare, which is mostly a mournful piece influenced by the violent death of Mohandas Ghandi, but in no sense liturgical music derived from the Roman Catholic mass. This music, like Hanson's Piano Concerto, cannot be absorbed fully at once. Some of it is mechanistic, some expressive but peculiarly constrained.

A whole program of modern American music must have made a varied appeal. To musicians, scholars and some of the press, it was an opportunity to note the contrast in style and approach between gifted contemporary composers. To others of the audience it meant a whole afternoon of dissonant sounds: of horseradish, pepper and vinegar. I must admit that it did make for a longish and somewhat monotonous concert. But all the same, it was interesting.

Clipping - Cleveland Plain Dealer Dr. Perry thought this might interest you

THURSDAY, DECEMBER

RISING CHEER GOES TO KOUSSEVITZKY

Master Leaves Something to Remember Him By

BY HERBERT ELWELL

Many were the persons in the large audience at Public Music Hall last night who jumped to their feet to cheer Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Orchestra at the close of the thrilling program which they presented under auspices of our Cleveland Orchestra.

It was an occasion, if there ever was one, for spontaneous tribute to a great conductor and great orchestra, for since Koussevitzy will retire at the end of this season, this was the last opportunity given us to hear him in the role which has endeared him to milions of music lovers.

It must be said that he gave us something to remember him by, a program replete with the glories of the dynamic interpretive genius for which he is justly renowned. And as one listened to the triumphant finale of Brahms' C minor Symphony, which seemed never to have sounded more proudly jubilant, one could not help wondering in what ways this conductor will be most missed, for missed he will certainly be, regardless of how gifted his successor may be.

A Masterpiece Recreated

Of his great service to the classic masters we were forcefully reminded throughout the Brahms Symphony, which mounted to such a stunning climax. The largeness of the conception, the effulgence of the flowing line, the constantly increasing momentum that carried one to exalted heights, were exciting reminders, indeed, of what this conductor can do to recreate a masterpiece in all its emotional and architectural splendor.

Yet for all this illumination of the past, it is in his devotion to the music of our time that Koussevitzky probably has made his greatest contribution, and it was gratifying to find in the first part of the program such significant modern works as Honegger's Suite for Strings and Prokofieff's "Scythian Suite," as well as the two slight but charming "Gymnopedies" of Eric Satie, which were beautifully orchestrated by Debussy.

No other conductor has given us so complete an insight into the meanings and intentions of contemporary music. The complex inner rhythms, the multicolored palette and enigmatic rumbling of Prokofieff magically acquired an overwhelming logic, and even the Honegger Suite, which seemed not too convincing on its first hearing here, clarified wonderfully as to its form and purpose.

Such proje[illegible] this is the gift of one whose mind and heart are attuned to current creative feelings, a leader who, working through one of the finest instrumental vehicles ever developed, lovingly has explored the new and found it good. His ability as a translator of the spirit of modernism in music will not soon be equaled, and his departure will be regretted particularly by those who think of music as an expression of the living present.

[218]

ABOUT MAHLER

Thoughts on the Great Composer Inspired by Book Just Published

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

When Bruno Walter was guesting at Symphony Hall a couple of seasons ago, conducting, among other things, the Ninth Symphony of Bruckner and the Fourth of Mahler, I took the liberty of asking him why it was that, in the case of those two still debated composers, he chose to be selective rather than broadly inclusive, playing the very works cultivated by his less partisan confreres. In particular, I asked about the Bruckner Sixth, highly praised in certain quarters but rarely heard anywhere, and the Mahler Seventh, which Koussevitzky finally (and just lately) introduced to us in a performance that must be set down as one of the most striking achievements of his career.

A "Propagandist"

Mr. Walter's answer to this query was that he considered himself a propagandist for these two composers and was not going to play into the hands of hostile critics by presenting their less satisfactory creations. Specifically, he averred that the Bruckner Sixth was marred by a weak finale, a verdict that I am in no position to dispute. All I know of the symphony is the beautiful adagio, which I once heard on the air. As for the Mahler Seventh, its Achilles heel, according to Mr. Walter, is a steal from "Die Meistersinger" in the last movement. This I was unable to detect either in a cursory examination of the score or in the recent performance at Symphony Hall. However, such chance resemblances are common, and no one worries very much about them.

I suspect that Mr. Walter finds this finale also to be weak but did not wish to say so. The concensus of opinion here in Boston was that the movement was labored, uninspired and distinctly anticlimactic. In this "radiant Rondo," as Mr. Walter has called it in his book on Mahler, the composer evidently aimed to duplicate the mighty finale of the Fifth and it just wouldn't come. The latter moves irresistibly from first bar to last; the closing movement of the Seventh bogs down. But the other four are in their various ways superb or enchanting, and the lame finale can well be overlooked. Nor do I find myself in agreement with my colleague who suggested that the Symphony could be played without it. Entrancing as it is, the fourth movement could hardly serve as a conclusion to all that has gone before. Something to complement the tremendous first movement is plainly needed.

We should have heard this Symphony long ago, or at least the second and fourth divisions, the two delightful Nocturnes that are often played separately. This, however, in no way lessens our debt to Dr. Koussevitzky. And when he did get around to the Symphony he did it up brown. The result was something to make you rub your ears in astonishment.

To get back to Walter, I think he has the wrong idea and Koussevitzky the right one. So has Dimitri Mitropoulos, who will do the Mahler Seventh in New York next month and who, last season brought to pass there the American premiere of the tragic Sixth, an event duly recorded in these columns. Bruckner and Mahler are important composers. We should know their entire output and be in a position to judge for ourselves what is good and what is not so good. Plainly, past criticisms are of little value. This music no longer sounds the way it used to.

With Bruckner the difficulty is structural, with Mahler stylistic. The former lets us down when we look for the continuity of the classical symphony, the latter when we expect its consistency. Also in Mahler, the very last works excepted, there is the disparity between the reactionary thematic material and the strikingly prophetic treatment of it. What intrigued the atonal Schoenberg and his disciples, whose own music is outwardly so different, was the linear character of Mahler's counterpoint, something far removed from the animated harmony of Strauss, and his trick of individualizing the instruments so that their timbres are contrasted, sometimes violently.

Those who wish a fuller discussion of these problems will find much that is both stimulating and informative in Dika Newlin's "Bruckner, Mahler, Schoenberg" (King's Crown Press), even though the author, a Schoenberg pupil, does not quite establish him as the third link in this Viennese chain. Nor do I follow her when she says that Mahler was paving the way for atonality when he began a symphony, or a movement, in one key and ended it in another. Rather was he emphasizing the importance of the key concept. I received one of the shocks of my life, by the way, when I met the learned Miss Newlin in New York last winter. A teacher at Western Maryland College, she could easily pass for one of her own students. I had expected the feminine equivalent of a graybeard.

Richard Burgin will conduct this week's Symphony Concerts, offering the Third Symphony of Brahms, Poulenc's Concerto for Organ, Strings and Timpani, and Hindemith's Metamorphosis of Themes by Weber. This afternoon brings the first concert of the Sunday series. Dr. Koussevitzky will conduct Vivaldi's Concerto in D minor, the Moussorgsky-Ravel "Pictures at an Exhibition" and Beethoven's Seventh Symphony.

Symphony Concert

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Holidays and Holy Days sometimes alter the dates of Symphony Concerts but they no longer have much bearing on the programs. Because of Christmas this afternoon's Symphony Concert took place yesterday, preceded on Wednesday evening by that which should rightfully occur tomorrow night. While for tonal Christmas cheer these two audiences were given the opportunity to endure the war-born Seventh Symphony of Shostakovitch, with its graphic description of the siege of Leningrad. By the time this musical monstrosity had run its course one had almost forgotten that the afternoon began on a pleasanter note, to-wit, the "Clock" Symphony of Haydn, last played at the Symphony Concerts in 1895.

There probably should be a rule that no one of the London Symphonies of Haydn should be repeated until each of the other 11 had been heard. Yet room should also be found for the "Oxford," for No. 88, and for the discoveries that are still to be made among the symphonies that we know little or nothing about. Aside from the fact that its revival was so long overdue, this delicious No. 101 was very much to the point yesterday.

The tick-tocking second movement, from which the work gets its name, somehow brings the suggestion of innocent and happy childhood, so proper to this season. Actually, this particular movement was played not so long ago at one of Wheeler Beckett's Youth Concerts. But I assure you, there is nothing childish about old Haydn's musical craftsmanship. His mastery becomes more and more apparent as the years roll by.

Now that the smoke of battle has cleared away and the Shostakovitch Seventh can no longer, even indirectly, excite patriotic emotions, its emptiness and bombast, its prolixity and loose construction become oppressively evident. The great crescendo in the first movement is the most striking thing about the piece, and the idea for this came straight from Ravel's Bolero. The difference is that the latter stays within the bounds of tonal decency, while in the end the crescendo in the Shostakovitch becomes a laceration of the ear, an exacerbation of the nerves. In so long a work there are bound to be pleasant spots. Occasionally in these cold ashes an ember glows. But the price paid for these transient delights is all too high. Leonard Bernstein, who conducted, and the orchestra worked hard. The Haydn was charmingly set forth.

Koussevitzky Magnetic In His Finale Here

Boston Symphony Draws Capacity Audience To Mosque and Thrills With Program

By Donald Steinfirst

The Boston Symphony Orchestra and its distinguished conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, paid their annual visit to Pittsburgh Tuesday night and before a capacity audience in Syria Mosque gave what was advertised to be its final concert under Dr. Koussevitzky's direction.

If, after over a quarter of a century as the head of America's finest orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky has finally found it necessary to relinquish his post, the loss will be felt farther than the area immediately surrounding Boston.

By his tours, his broadcasts and his recordings, Dr. Koussevitzky and his superb orchestra have come to stand for the highest standards in American orchestral perfection. It is no over-statement to say that if American orchestral tastes are at their peak level now, Dr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra are directly responsible.

No Evidence of Fatigue

If Dr. Koussevitsky is retiring because of fatigue there was no evidence of it in Tuesday night's performance. On the contrary, the conductor directed with youthful spirit and boundless energy. His face lit up when the orchestra turned a beautiful phrase or when a soloist delivered a passage faultlessly.

His fast movements were played with elan and his slow sections had the response and quietude that come with an inward understanding and complete rapport between orchestra and conductor.

Further proof of Dr. Koussevitsky's tireless searching for the new and interesting in music was found in Tuesday's program. Directing a concert that embraced music from three centuries, Dr. Koussevitsky had the satisfaction of introducing to Pittsburgh on his final appearance here, two works that, I believe, had never been heard here before, one of which, the contemporary Vaughan-Williams Sixth Symphony, is prolix and possibly controversial.

The eighteenth century work was C. P. E. Bach's Concerto For Stringed Instruments arranged for full orchestra by Maxmilian Steinberg. And to close the program, the Boston Symphony [illegible] Symphony [illegible] its [illegible] delivery.

The [illegible] of the Bach work [illegible] only enhanced by the orchestral arrangement. It is a [illegible] work [illegible] from [illegible] opening movement through [illegible] bitter-sweet andante with [illegible] English [illegible] to a [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] music [illegible] itself.

The Vaughan-Williams Symphony is at first hearing disappointing. Undoubtedly it needs repetition for complete understanding and satisfaction. For Vaughan-Williams, never an eclectic has written a work that is by turn interesting and dull.

Uses Full Knowledge

In the opening movement the symphony is abstract [illegible] full use of his enormous knowledge of the orchestra. [illegible] rather closely [illegible]

The moderato section is important but in the Scherzo there are frenetic pages that contrast sharply with the Epilogue which seemed to me to contain the best writing of the entire Symphony.

Here, there is ethereal music that in the hands of the Boston strings and woodwinds sounds divinely and the section closes softly and gently.

There is little to add to what has already been written of Dr. Koussevitzky's reading of such a staple as the Beethoven Seventh Symphony. With full respect for the composer who takes precedence always in Dr Koussevitzky's hands, the conductor led the orchestra through a performance of incandescence. The opening movement was life itself and the Presto moved bouncingly and bubbling along with a lilt and a happy-go-lucky air.

The audience was enthusiastic and greeted Dr. Koussevitzky with an ovation that was matched at the conclusion of the concert.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Dr. Koussevitzky has decided to dispose of the American pieces of the year (or most of them) in two consecutive programs, calling the whole an American music festival. In it 10 living composers are represented by as many works, each of which is either having its first performance in the course of the festival or was given its first public performance by Dr. Koussevitzky in some previous season.

The first of these programs was heard yesterday afternoon. Proceedings began with Henry Cowell's Hymn and Fuguing Tune No. 2, and continued with William Schuman's American Festival Overture. The next number, Howard Hanson's Piano Concerto in G major, had its first performance yesterday, with the composer conducting and Rudolf Firkusny as soloist. After intermission came another premiere, that of Lukas Foss' Recordare, also with the composer at the helm, and the Third Symphony of Walter Piston brought the end.

The music of Mr. Cowell made a pleasant and appropriate beginning. It is scored for strings alone and there is a conscious suggestion of Colonial music in general and of Boston's William Billings in particular. Mr. Schuman's Overture is brash and breezy. The suggestion here is of the bustling, and urban present.

Not before had Mr. Hanson attempted a piano concerto and he didn't seem to get the feel of either the form or the medium. This is more a work for orchestra with a prominent piano part than a concerto in the modern acceptance of the term. The music has agreeable moments and is also reminiscent. Mr. Hanson has never striven to be strictly contemporaneous, and so he reminds you of this or that master of the late 19th or early 20th century. Mr. Firkusny acquitted himself well of a none too grateful task. I suspect that other pianists will not try too hard to get this piece away from him.

It might have been easier to get the hang of Mr. Foss' Recordare if it had come after so much that was new or comparatively unfamiliar. The general mood is tragic, with a stormy (and at times slightly jazzy) middle section. Its composition was begun on the day that Gandhi died, though the composer disavows any attempt to base the music on the Indian leader's career. When Mr. Piston's Symphony was brought out here a year ago I found little to praise but the workmanship and am pleased to report that it impressed me far more favorably on a second hearing. The first movement still seems on the dry side, and in the main, Mr. Piston's treatment of his ideas is more arresting than the ideas themselves. It was, nevertheless, the piece of the afternoon, and at the end the composer was warmly applauded.

MUSIC

Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, gave the 12th program of the 68th season in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. Rudolf Kirkusny, pianist, was soloist, and guest conductors were Howard Hanson and Lukas Foss. The program:

Hymn and Fuguing Tune No. 2 ..Cowell
American Festival Overture.....Shuman
Concerto in G major, Op. 36.....Hanson
Recordare.......................Foss
Symphony No. 3..................Piston

By RUDOLPH ELIE

I was on my way out of Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon when an acquaintance appeared out of the crowd, a puzzled, beaten sort of an expression on his face. "Excuse me for asking," he began, "but am I supposed to like this music? Is it supposed to be good?"

He was referring to the first of two programs of American music which began yesterday and he was expressing, I suspect, the questions that must have crosed the minds of ence. As to whether this music is a very large majority of the audi- good or not, I hesitate to say, not because I hold no opinion on the subject but because it is impossible to defend opinions in so small a space—and every single one of yesterday's works needs extended criticism.

As to whether we are supposed to like it, the answer is clearly "no." For the evidence is nearly overwhelming that composers today don't give a hoot about their audiences. They are interested merely in achieving recognition from the other composers in their union, and would sooner be dead than caught by other composers in the act of in the act of deliberately setting out to court the public with music of a sustained melodic content.

I would like to make it clear at this point that I have always been an ardent champion of contemporary music; I thoroughly enjoy a lot of it and think I have a pretty good idea what they are getting at. But yesterday, with five American works bunched on one program, all the tricks of the American idiom so-called were laid bare for all to hear. The corney rhythmic figures (to signify American vigor), the clanking of xylophones (to signify the common touch), the jagged intervals (to signify the wide open spaces), the fugues in dance rhythms (to imply scholarly jollity), the sustained adagios on four or five levels in conventional cadences (to inform you the melodies are there if only you have the ears to them), the violent tensions of the brasses (to signify the restless soul of the nation), the tremendous climaxes of percussion (to indicate the terrific creative drive of America). Tricks, all tricks.

Taken one at a time, you forget or overlook the idiomatic tricks; any one of these pieces without its fellows has value. The Piston, for example, which is clearly head and shoulders above the rest, can make its own way so long as there is nothing else like it on the program to compare it with. The Foss Recordare, too, is probably a better piece than it seemed yesterday for Mr. Foss, alone of the composers represented, has a great melodic gift. But, to be fashionable or, rather, American, he separates an elevated melodic inspiration at beginning and end with a typically disjointed rhythmic groping (to signify groping.) Meanwhile the Cowell is a mild essay in counterpoint based on undistinguished themes effective only so long as they are played by such magnificent strings as Dr. Koussevitzky has, the Shuman Overture is most offensively boisterous, and the Hanson Concerto is so murkily scored you can hear neither piano nor orchestra.

Yesterday's concert, in short, offered a critic's holiday if there ever was one, the complaints ranging from challenging the wisdom of playing all this music during a school holiday with the hall filled with young people to playing it in a bunch at all (for surely there was never anything more inimical to the cause), and from challenging the sound of the piano (which was, as usual, a good eighth of a tone below the orchestra's) to wasting Rudolf Firkusny on a so-so concerto.

It may be added that Mr. Hanson and Mr. Foss conducted their own works and that Mr. Piston was in the audience. It may also be added that Dr. Koussevitzky's sincerity in offering us all this music is not to be questioned; he will certainly be enshrined in the hearts of American composers forever. Next week the Festival continues with works of Sowerby, Barber, Harris, Hill and Copland.

BOSTON SUNDAY POST, OCTOBER 31, 1948

MUSIC

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Assuming that it was not just an example of the proverbial French politeness, the most encouraging thing about Charles Munch's recent visit to Boston, as conductor of the Orchestre National, was his comment in the course of an interview two days before, that American orchestras are the best in the world. If the Orchestre National really represents his ideal of tone and performance, the prospect for next season and the two following doesn't look too bright. But I don't believe for a moment that it does. Mr. Munch is a conductor of wide experience with, I am sure, anything but a provincial outlook.

To many of us the tone of this French orchestra seemed thin and dry, the admirable woodwinds excepted. Even the orchestra's proponents admitted that its tone lacked the richness and body to which we are accustomed, but preferred to speak of the absence of "lushness" and "animal warmth," an implied rebuke to those of a grosser musical nature who prize such fleshly delights.

Has Clarity of Tone

Clarity the Orchestre National certainly has; its performance of everything was beautifully transparent. And many made a point of praising its pianissimo. Well, a thin tone can easily be made thinner. And so what? I encountered during the intermission a musical friend who asked me quite seriously if I intended to tell the truth about the orchestra. Before I had a chance to mumble something about the usual amenities he went on to say that it was, of course, much better than the Boston Symphony. Rendered nearly speechless by that one, I made a feeble attempt to explain my position, but we parted with neither of us having persuaded the other to his point of view. Such things are matters of taste and they cannot be rationalized. The next day I heard from the lips of a music student an expression of regret that she had missed the concert, since she had been assured that the Orchestre National was the greatest in the world!

Outside some fine recordings and a performance of "Tannhaeuser" at the Paris Opera many years ago, my acquaintance with French orchestras is limited. I can, or could, speak with more authority regarding those in central Europe. I still had a feeling that the Orchestre National could hardly be the best of which even present day France was capable. In this conviction I was greatly strengthened by a conversation the day following the concert with a French-born musician, a man of no mean importance locally. He said flatly that the National was not its country's best. To my charitable suggestion that the meager string tone might be due to the fact that the players were using inferior instruments, he made reply that the trouble was with the players: they just didn't apply the bow to the strings with sufficient determination. French orchestral musicians, he explained, are prone to take it easy and he went on to speak of his dismay in discovering the night before that most of the members of the Orchestra did not arrive at Symphony Hall in time for what is considered in these parts a proper warming up.

As to the unresonant brass, he told me—something I already knew—that the French players use instruments of smaller bore. Having graciously endorsed my comments on the concert, he said there was one thing that I had omitted to mention, namely the prevailingly fast tempi in Berlioz's "Fantastic" Symphony. "Will we ever," he asked, "hear a true largo when Mr. Munch takes over?" I could only reply that Mr. Munch, himself, had told me that he couldn't abide any music that didn't "move right along." He is certainly one of the least reposeful of conductors; yet I am still hoping that somehow the Boston job will have a calming and restraining effect upon him. It is far easier to subtract energy than to supply it when it is not naturally present.

Extraordinary Bells

If the French woodwinds excited general admiration, so did those extraordinary bells in the "Fantastic." Berlioz's requirements in this respect are usually satisfied (?) with the familiar tubular chimes. These tend to be clangorous and indefinite as to pitch, and in this case, at least, Dr. Koussevitzky has been known to reinforce them with a grand piano, which has also been used, incidentally, for those four deep-toned bells in the first act of "Parsifal." Anyway, in Berlioz's finale, in which the composer would present a dreadful travesty of the service for the dead, the Orchestre National offered two actual bells, beautifully clear and true, a vast improvement over the chimes.

-SATURDAY, JANUARY 1, 1

MUSIC

Koussevitzky Begins American Music Festival at Symphony Concerts

By CYRUS DURGIN

The concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Symphony Hall this week and next will constitute a festival of American music. Serge Koussevitzky and two composers conducted the first such program yesterday afternoon and will repeat it tonight. It begins with Henry Cowell's Hymn and Fuguing Tune No. 2, and includes the "American Festival" Overture by William Schuman; Howard Hanson's Piano Concerto in G major, with Rudolf Firkusny as soloist; Lukas Foss' new Recordare, and the Third Symphony by Walter Piston.

Mr. Koussevitzky conducts the first two and the final number, all of which have become familiar here, thanks to the conductor's brisk and sustained interest in the American composer. Cowell's evocation of the musical past is smooth and rich string writing, while the Schuman Overture is a bright and clangorous piece with a first-rate fugue. As for the Piston Symphony, that in less than a year has proved its worth as one of the finest American symphonies ever written. Mr. Piston bowed from the stage to applause of the most cordial variety when the performance was over.

Howard Hanson conducted this first performance of the only piano concerto he has written. I'm frank to say I could make little of it on first hearing. The orchestra seems to take most of the musical responsibility, with the piano part playing an integral but not spectacular role. Perhaps, as happens so often when composers conduct their own music, the work might sound better from a musician who makes conducting the major activity of his career. Mr. Firkusny seemed to play it well, and the slow movement sounded very nice. At least this is not a hammer-and-tongs percussive concerto.

Mr. Foss was at the helm for the first performance of his Recordare, which is mostly a mournful piece influenced by the violent death of Mohandas Ghandi, but in no sense liturgical music derived from the Roman Catholic mass. This music, like Hanson's Piano Concerto, cannot be absorbed fully at once. Some of it is mechanistic, some expressive but peculiarly constrained.

A whole program of modern American music must have made a varied appeal. To musicians, scholars and some of the press, it was an opportunity to note the contrast in style and approach between gifted contemporary composers. To others of the audience it meant a whole afternoon of dissonant sounds: of horseradish, pepper and vinegar. I must admit that it did make for a longish and somewhat monotonous concert. But all the same, it was interesting.

Clipping - Cleveland Plain Dealer Dr. Perry thought this might interest you

, THURSDAY, DECEMBER

RISING CHEER GOES TO KOUSSEVITZKY

Master Leaves Something to Remember Him By

BY HERBERT ELWELL

Many were the persons in the large audience at Public Music Hall last night who jumped to their feet to cheer Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Orchestra at the close of the thrilling program which they presented under auspices of our Cleveland Orchestra.

It was an occasion, if there ever was one, for spontaneous tribute to a great conductor and great orchestra, for since Koussevitzky will retire at the end of this season, this was the last opportunity given us to hear him in the role which has endeared him to milions of music lovers.

It must be said that he gave us something to remember him by, a program replete with the glories of the dynamic interpretive genius for which he is justly renowned. And as one listened to the triumphant finale of Brahms' C minor Symphony, which seemed never to have sounded more proudly jubilant, one could not help wondering in what ways this conductor will be most missed, for missed he will certainly be, regardless of how gifted his successor may be.

A Masterpiece Recreated

Of his great service to the classic masters we were forcefully reminded throughout the Brahms Symphony, which mounted to such a stunning climax. The largeness of the conception, the effulgence of the flowing line, the constantly increasing momentum that carried one to exalted heights, were exciting reminders, indeed, of what this conductor can do to recreate a masterpiece in all its emotional and architectural splendor.

Yet for all this illumination of the past, it is in his devotion to the music of our time that Koussevitzky probably has made his greatest contribution, and it was gratifying to find in the first part of the program such significant modern works as Honegger's Suite for Strings and Prokofieff's "Scythian Suite," as well as the two slight but charming "Gymnopedies" of Eric Satie, which were beautifully orchestrated by Debussy.

No other conductor has given us so complete an insight into the meanings and intentions of contemporary music. The complex inner rhythms, the multicolored palette and enigmatic rumbling of Prokofieff magically acquired an overwhelming logic, and even the Honegger Suite, which seemed not too convincing on its first hearing here, clarified wonderfully as to its form and purpose.

Such proje[illegible] this is the gift of one whose mind and heart are attuned to current creative feelings, a leader who, working through one of the finest instrumental vehicles ever developed, lovingly has explored the new and found it good. His ability as a translator of the spirit of modernism in music will not soon be equaled, and his departure will be regretted particularly by those who think of music as an expression of the living present.

MUSIC

Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Leonard Bernstein conductin, gave the ninth program of the 68th season in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon, performing the following program:

Overture to Manfred, Op. 115...Schumann
Concerto No. 1 in C, Op. 15...Beethoven
Afternoon of a Faun..........Debussy
Suite from "The Firebird"....Stravinsky

By RUDOLPH ELIE

After first establishing the fact that yesterday's concert was in every way memorable and that it proved anew what we've all known for a long time, that Leonard Bernstein is one of our very greatest musical personalities, I'd like to tell you of the events leading up to yesterday's concert. They make a story that will do your heart good.

It was nearly midnight on Wednesday this week when an overseas plane landed in New York. One of its passengers was Leonard Bernstein, returning from a series of 40 guest appearances with European orchestras, the last of which was in Rome on Monday. After a few hours' sleep he arose early Thursday and drove to Boston in his own car, arriving about noon

In the meantime, also about midday Thursday, the members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, after two weeks of the most gruelling sort of travel involving one concert after another in the mid-west, began to arrive, fatigued from so strenuous a schedule. Both conductor and orchestra had only the afternoon to rest; at seven o'clock Thursday night they gathered for their one rehearsal together. The program offered one work the orchestra hadn't done for 14 years, another it had never done at this series, two others it hadn't played in four or more years. The one it hadn't done at all was particularly trying, not because it is especially difficult but because the conductor was to lead it from the piano while playing the solo part. The rehearsal lasted until quarter to 12.

This was the situation as the audience gathered yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. That it heard one of the real marvels of performance under these circumstances strikes me as being one of the most astonishing miracles of discipline, of esprit de corps and of true artistic stature in every member of the orchestra I have ever encountered. It was, in a large sense, an immense tribute to Dr. Koussevitzky in having developed, over the years, so loyal and so closely-knit an organization; the men of the orchestra, who must have been half dead in their chairs, never had a finer hour. Nor, for that matter, did Leonard Bernstein, who must have been equally burdened with fatigue and, more devastating, responsibility.

If there is one thing that I, for one, can't get enough of, it is listening to a pianist and conductor of Mr. Bernstein's stature simultaneously conduct and play a piano concerto. It is not a stunt; on the contrary, it is one of the most perfect realizations there is and, in the case of the piano concertos of Bach, Haydn, Mozart and Beethoven the only proper one.

Yesterday, indeed, it was easy to imagine Beethoven himself on the piano bench, playing and conducting his first piano concerto exactly as Mr. Bernstein did. The only difference would be that Beethoven would have been three years Mr. Bernstein's junior—and that his piano and orchestra could not have matched the sound of ours. Be that as it may, few of us have had the opportunity until yesterday to realize how great a pianist Mr. Bernstein might have been had he put his mind to it. Even with the distractions of composing and conducting he is of the first rank, and his performance of this one of Beethoven's most delightful works, was not short of incredibly beautiful. So far as I am concerned he can start on all the concertos of Bach, Haydn, Mozart and Beethoven tomorrow and keep right on going for evermore.

It seems hardly necessary to add that the Debussy and the Stravinsky notably finished off a notable afternoon, save to mention that the solo flute of Georges Laurent in the Debussy was of the sheerest beauty as were the brief first desk solos throughout, I don't know how they did it under the circumstances, but then I could never figure it out anyway.

[218]

ABOUT MAHLER

Thoughts on the Great Composer Inspired by Book Just Published

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

When Bruno Walter was guesting at Symphony Hall a couple of seasons ago, conducting, among other things, the Ninth Symphony of Bruckner and the Fourth of Mahler, I took the liberty of asking him why it was that, in the case of those two still debated composers, he chose to be selective rather than broadly inclusive, playing the very works cultivated by his less partisan confreres. In particular, I asked about the Bruckner Sixth, highly praised in certain quarters but rarely heard anywhere, and the Mahler Seventh, which Koussevitzky finally (and just lately) introduced to us in a performance that must be set down as one of the most striking achievements of his career.

A "Propagandist"

Mr. Walter's answer to this query was that he considered himself a propagandist for these two composers and was not going to play into the hands of hostile critics by presenting their less satisfactory creations. Specifically, he averred that the Bruckner Sixth was marred by a weak finale, a verdict that I am in no position to dispute. All I know of the symphony is the beautiful adagio, which I once heard on the air. As for the Mahler Seventh, its Achilles heel, according to Mr. Walter, is a steal from "Die Meistersinger" in the last movement. This I was unable to detect either in a cursory examination of the score or in the recent performance at Symphony Hall. However, such chance resemblances are common, and no one worries very much about them.

I suspect that Mr. Walter finds this finale also to be weak but did not wish to say so. The concensus of opinion here in Boston was that the movement was labored, uninspired and distinctly anticlimactic. In this "radiant Rondo," as Mr. Walter has called it in his book on Mahler, the composer evidently aimed to duplicate the mighty finale of the Fifth and it just wouldn't come. The latter moves irresistibly from first bar to last; the closing movement of the Seventh bogs down. But the other four are in their various ways superb or enchanting, and the lame finale can well be overlooked. Nor do I find myself in agreement with my colleague who suggested that the Symphony could be played without it. Entrancing as it is, the fourth movement could hardly serve as a conclusion to all that has gone before. Something to complement the tremendous first movement is plainly needed.

We should have heard this Symphony long ago, or at least the second and fourth divisions, the two delightful Nocturnes that are often played separately. This, however, in no way lessens our debt to Dr. Koussevitzky. And when he did get around to the Symphony he did it up brown. The result was something to make you rub your ears in astonishment.

To get back to Walter, I think he has the wrong idea and Koussevitzky the right one. So has Dimitri Mitropoulos, who will do the Mahler Seventh in New York next month and who, last season brought to pass there the American premiere of the tragic Sixth, an event duly recorded in these columns. Bruckner and Mahler are important composers. We should know their entire output and be in a position to judge for ourselves what is good and what is not so good. Plainly, past criticisms are of little value. This music no longer sounds the way it used to.

With Bruckner the difficulty is structural, with Mahler stylistic. The former lets us down when we look for the continuity of the classical symphony, the latter when we expect its consistency. Also in Mahler, the very last works excepted, there is the disparity between the reactionary thematic material and the strikingly prophetic treatment of it. What intrigued the atonal Schoenberg and his disciples, whose own music is outwardly so different, was the linear character of Mahler's counterpoint, something far removed from the animated harmony of Strauss, and his trick of individualizing the instruments so that their timbres are contrasted, sometimes violently.

Those who wish a fuller discussion of these problems will find much that is both stimulating and informative in Dika Newlin's "Bruckner, Mahler, Schoenberg" (King's Crown Press), even though the author, a Schoenberg pupil, does not quite establish him as the third link in this Viennese chain. Nor do I follow her when she says that Mahler was paving the way for atonality when he began a symphony, or a movement, in one key and ended it in another. Rather was he emphasizing the importance of the key concept. I received one of the shocks of my life, by the way, when I met the learned Miss Newlin in New York last winter. A teacher at Western Maryland College, she could easily pass for one of her own students. I had expected the feminine equivalent of a graybeard.

Richard Burgin will conduct this week's Symphony Concerts, offering the Third Symphony of Brahms, Poulenc's Concerto for Organ, Strings and Timpani, and Hindemith's Metamorphosis of Themes by Weber. This afternoon brings the first concert of the Sunday series. Dr. Koussevitzky will conduct Vivaldi's Concerto in D minor, the Moussorgsky-Ravel "Pictures at an Exhibition" and Beethoven's Seventh Symphony.

Symphony Concert

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Holidays and Holy Days sometimes alter the dates of Symphony Concerts but they no longer have much bearing on the programs. Because of Christmas this afternoon's Symphony Concert took place yesterday, preceded on Wednesday evening by that which should rightfully occur tomorrow night. While for tonal Christmas cheer these two audiences were given the opportunity to endure the war-born Seventh Symphony of Shostakovitch, with its graphic description of the siege of Leningrad. By the time this musical monstrosity had run its course one had almost forgotten that the afternoon began on a pleasanter note, to-wit, the "Clock" Symphony of Haydn, last played at the Symphony Concerts in 1895.

There probably should be a rule that no one of the London Symphonies of Haydn should be repeated until each of the other 11 had been heard. Yet room should also be found for the "Oxford," for No. 88, and for the discoveries that are still to be made among the symphonies that we know little or nothing about. Aside from the fact that its revival was so long overdue, this delicious No. 101 was very much to the point yesterday.

The tick-tocking second movement, from which the work gets its name, somehow brings the suggestion of innocent and happy childhood, so proper to this season. Actually, this particular movement was played not so long ago at one of Wheeler Beckett's Youth Concerts. But I assure you, there is nothing childish about old Haydn's musical craftsmanship. His mastery becomes more and more apparent as the years roll by.

Now that the smoke of battle has cleared away and the Shostakovitch Seventh can no longer, even indirectly, excite patriotic emotions, its emptiness and bombast, its prolixity and loose construction become oppressively evident. The great crescendo in the first movement is the most striking thing about the piece, and the idea for this came straight from Ravel's Bolero. The difference is that the latter stays within the bounds of tonal decency, while in the end the crescendo in the Shostakovitch becomes a laceration of the ear, an exacerbation of the nerves. In so long a work there are bound to be pleasant spots. Occasionally in these cold ashes an ember glows. But the price paid for these transient delights is all too high. Leonard Bernstein, who conducted, and the orchestra worked hard. The Haydn was charmingly set forth.

Koussevitzky Magnetic In His Finale Here

Boston Symphony Draws Capacity Audience To Mosque and Thrills With Program

By Donald Steinfirst

The Boston Symphony Orchestra and its distinguished conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, paid their annual visit to Pittsburgh Tuesday night and before a capacity audience in Syria Mosque gave what was advertised to be its final concert under Dr. Koussevitzky's direction.

If, after over a quarter of a century as the head of America's finest orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky has finally found it necessary to relinquish his post, the loss will be felt farther than the area immediately surrounding Boston.

By his tours, his broadcasts and his recordings, Dr. Koussevitzky and his superb orchestra have come to stand for the highest standards in American orchestral perfection. It is no over-statement to say that if American orchestral tastes are at their peak level now, Dr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra are directly responsible.

No Evidence of Fatigue

If Dr. Koussevitsky is retiring because of fatigue there was no evidence of it in Tuesday night's performance. On the contrary, the conductor directed with youthful spirit and boundless energy. His face lit up when the orchestra turned a beautiful phrase or when a soloist delivered a passage faultlessly.

His fast movements were played with elan and his slow sections had the response and quietude that come with an inward understanding and complete rapport between orchestra and conductor.

Further proof of Dr. Koussevitsky's tireless searching for the new and interesting in music was found in Tuesday's program. Directing a concert that embraced music from three centuries, Dr. Koussevitsky had the satisfaction of introducing to Pittsburgh on his final appearance here, two works that, I believe, had never been heard here before, one of which, the contemporary Vaughan-Williams Sixth Symphony, is prolix and possibly controversial.

The eighteenth century work was C. P. E. Bach's Concerto For Stringed Instruments arranged for full orchestra by Maxmilian Steinberg. And to close the program the Beethoven Seventh Symphony made its seasonal debut.

The purity of the Bach [illegible] only enhanced by the orchestral arrangement. It is a handsome work, ranging from [illegible] opening movement through a bitter-sweet andante [illegible] superb English horn solo by [illegible] to a four-square triumphant finale. There were no fussy [illegible] or contretemps at effects [illegible] clean music in the [illegible]. Dr. Koussevitzky and [illegible] music speak for itself.

The Vaughan-Williams Symphony is, at first hearing, disappointing. Undoubtedly it needs repetition for complete understanding and satisfaction. For Vaughan-Williams, never an eclectic has written a work that is by turn interesting and dull.

Uses Full Knowledge

In the opening movement the symphony is abstract; he makes full use of his enormous knowledge of the orchestra [illegible]. His sonorities are clamorous [illegible] being cacophonous. [illegible] syncopation a great [illegible] the Symphony skirts the jazz [illegible] rather closely at several points.

The moderato section is unimportant but in the Scherzo there are frenetic pages that contrast sharply with the Epilogue which seemed to me to contain the best writing of the entire Symphony.

Here, there is ethereal music that in the hands of the Boston strings and woodwinds sounds divinely and the section closes softly and gently.

There is little to add to what has already been written of Dr. Koussevitzky's reading of such a staple as the Beethoven Seventh Symphony. With full respect for the composer who takes precedence always in Dr Koussevitzky's hands, the conductor led the orchestra through a performance of incandescence. The opening movement was life itself and the Presto moved bouncingly and bubbling along with a lilt and a happy-go-lucky air.

The audience was enthusiastic and greeted Dr. Koussevitzky with an ovation that was matched at the conclusion of the concert.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Dr. Koussevitzky has decided to dispose of the American pieces of the year (or most of them) in two consecutive programs, calling the whole an American music festival. In it 10 living composers are represented by as many works, each of which is either having its first performance in the course of the festival or was given its first public performance by Dr. Koussevitzky in some previous season.

The first of these programs was heard yesterday afternoon. Proceedings began with Henry Cowell's Hymn and Fuguing Tune No. 2, and continued with William Schuman's American Festival Overture. The next number, Howard Hanson's Piano Concerto in G major, had its first performance yesterday, with the composer conducting and Rudolf Firkusny as soloist. After intermission came another premiere, that of Lukas Foss' Recordare, also with the composer at the helm, and the Third Symphony of Walter Piston brought the end.

The music of Mr. Cowell made a pleasant and appropriate beginning. It is scored for strings alone and there is a conscious suggestion of Colonial music in general and of Boston's William Billings in particular. Mr. Schuman's Overture is brash and breezy. The suggestion here is of the bustling, and urban present.

Not before had Mr. Hanson attempted a piano concerto and he didn't seem to get the feel of either the form or the medium. This is more a work for orchestra with a prominent piano part than a concerto in the modern acceptance of the term. The music has agreeable moments and is also reminiscent. Mr. Hanson has never striven to be strictly contemporaneous, and so he reminds you of this or that master of the late 19th or early 20th century. Mr. Firkusny acquitted himself well of a none too grateful task. I suspect that other pianists will not try too hard to get this piece away from him.

It might have been easier to get the hang of Mr. Foss' Recordare if it had come after so much that was new or comparatively unfamiliar. The general mood is tragic, with a stormy (and at times slightly jazzy) middle section. Its composition was begun on the day that Gandhi died, though the composer disavows any attempt to base the music on the Indian leader's career. When Mr. Piston's Symphony was brought out here a year ago I found little to praise but the workmanship and am pleased to report that it impressed me far more favorably on a second hearing. The first movement still seems on the dry side, and in the main, Mr. Piston's treatment of his ideas is more arresting than the ideas themselves. It was, nevertheless, the piece of the afternoon, and at the end the composer was warmly applauded.

MUSIC

Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, gave the 12th program of the 68th season in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. Rudolf Kirkusny, pianist, was soloist, and guest conductors were Howard Hanson and Lukas Foss. The program:

Hymn and Fuguing Tune No. 2 ..Cowell
American Festival Overture.....Shuman
Concerto in G major, Op. 36.....Hanson
Recordare..........................Foss
Symphony No. 3..................Piston

By RUDOLPH ELIE

I was on my way out of Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon when an acquaintance appeared out of the crowd, a puzzled, beaten sort of an expression on his face. "Excuse me for asking," he began, "but am I supposed to like this music? Is it supposed to be good?"

He was referring to the first of two programs of American music which began yesterday and he was expressing, I suspect, the questions that must have crosed the minds of ence. As to whether this music is a very large majority of the audigood or not, I hesitate to say, not because I hold no opinion on the subject but because it is impossible to defend opinions in so small a space—and every single one of yesterday's works needs extended criticism.

As to whether we are supposed to like it, the answer is clearly "no." For the evidence is nearly overwhelming that composers today don't give a hoot about their audiences. They are interested merely in achieving recognition from the other composers in their union, and would sooner be dead than caught by other composers in the act of in the act of deliberately setting out to court the public with music of a sustained melodic content.

I would like to make it clear at this point that I have always been an ardent champion of contemporary music; I thoroughly enjoy a lot of it and think I have a pretty good idea what they are getting at. But yesterday, with five American works bunched on one program, all the tricks of the American idiom so-called were laid bare for all to hear. The corney rhythmic figures (to signify American vigor), the clanking of xylophones (to signify the common touch), the jagged intervals (to signify the wide open spaces), the fugues in dance rhythms (to imply scholarly jollity), the sustained adagios on four or five levels in conventional cadences (to inform you the melodies are there if only you have the ears to them), the violent tensions of the brasses (to signify the restless soul of the nation), the tremendous climaxes of percussion (to indicate the terrific creative drive of America). Tricks, all tricks.

Taken one at a time, you forget or overlook the idiomatic tricks; any one of these pieces without its fellows has value. The Piston, for example, which is clearly head and shoulders above the rest, can make its own way so long as there is nothing else like it on the program to compare it with. The Foss Recordare, too, is probably a better piece than it seemed yesterday for Mr. Foss, alone of the composers represented, has a great melodic gift. But, to be fashionable or, rather, American, he separates an elevated melodic inspiration at beginning and end with a typically disjointed rhythmic groping (to signify groping.) Meanwhile the Cowell is a mild essay in counterpoint based on undistinguished themes effective only so long as they are played by such magnificent strings as Dr. Koussevitzky has, the Shuman Overture is most offensively boisterous, and the Hanson Concerto is so murkily scored you can hear neither piano nor orchestra.

Yesterday's concert, in short, offered a critic's holiday if there ever was one, the complaints ranging from challenging the wisdom of playing all this music during a school holiday with the hall filled with young people to playing it in a bunch at all (for surely there was never anything more inimical to the cause), and from challenging the sound of the piano (which was, as usual, a good eighth of a tone below the orchestra's) to wasting Rudolf Firkusny on a so-so concerto.

It may be added that Mr. Hanson and Mr. Foss conducted their own works and that Mr. Piston was in the audience. It may also be added that Dr. Koussevitzky's sincerity in offering us all this music is not to be questioned; he will certainly be enshrined in the hearts of American composers forever. Next week the Festival continues with works of Sowerby, Barber, Harris, Hill and Copland.

MUSIC

Koussevitzky Conducts K. P. E. Bach, Sibelius and Wagner at Symphony

By CYRUS DURGIN

18

Serge Koussevitzky returned to the conductor's stand of the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday, following the annual mid-Western tour and a week's rest. His program begins with the D major Concerto of Karl Philipp Emanuel Bach in the modern orchestration of Maximilian Steinberg: continues with the Seventh Symphony of Jean Sibelius, and ends with four excerpts from the music-dramas of Richard Wagner: The Prelude and Liebestod from "Tristan and Isolde," Siegfried's Funeral Music from "Goetterdaemmerung," and the Prelude and Introduction to Act 3 of "Die Meistersinger von Nuernberg."

All of this is music familiar to Symphony concert-goers of at least a few years experience. The Concerto, by that son of Johann Sebastian Bach who amounted to most in life, is a skilled and ingratiating 18th Century work, somewhere between the concerto grosso and the modern concerto. The arrangement of Steinberg adds the color of woodwinds and horn without blowing the composition up too much beyond its original dimensions or damaging its character as music.

Inclusion of the Silebius Seventh Symphony was doubtless in honor of the 83d birthday of the Finnish composer, which occurred Dec. 8. It was good to hear this compact and distintive one-movement Symphony again. The materials are of the simplest: variations on themes derived from the naked scale of A minor, which is heard at the outset, plus a few simple chords, but all worked up into a sonorous fabric, with many pages of string and brass writing which have the effect of alternately lyrical and dissonant counterpoint. In addition, the Seventh Symphony has a curious mood of finality though it was written nearly 25 years ago.

Not so many years past we were hearing a great deal of Sibelius, and perhaps in the heat of admiration, exaggerated words of praise were written about him. Today we hear much less of him, and beyond a doubt he is under-rated. No matter, for that Great Rectifier, Time, will have the last word. My guess is that Sibelius will be regarded as a remarkable composer with a unique style: perhaps not of the universal greatest who have directly affected the main currents of musical history, but as a northern voice compelling and poetic and absolutely unmistakable.

Mr. Koussevitzky has performed Wagner from time to time but, for the most part sparingly in recent years at least. To devote half a program to King Richard I is unusual for the conductor. There are those still, who object to Wagner excerpts in the concert hall. But in this country the opportunity to hear Wagner in full splendor of a great orchestra is possible only at symphonic concerts in three or four cities, and in this life it is wise to accept what is offered while accepting is good.

The music from the three great music-dramas, yesterday, was richly colored and superbly intense, but for my taste Mr. Koussevitzky plays the "Tristan" and "Siegfried" excerpts too slow, and the same can be said of the beginning of the third act of "Meistersinger."

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REPUBLICAN
DEC 26 1948

COMING MUSICAL HIGHLIGHT

Boston's famous Symphony Orchestra will present a concert at the Municipal Auditorium on Tuesday evening, January 11, 1949, with Dr Serge Kousevitski conducting. This will be the last opportunity the people in Springfield will have to see thet illustrious maestro conducting th... chestra, as Dr. Kousevitski retires at the end of the current season. Tickets have gone on sale for this memorable event. Get yours early!

LOUISIANA MUSICIAN
RUSTON, LA
DEC. 1948

BOSTON SYMPHONY REHEARSALS ARE BROADCAST

According to an announcement by Mr. Ralph Sims of Radio Station WJBO in Baton Rouge, rehearsals of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under its renowned conductor, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, are being broadcast as of Tuesday, November 23, over the coast-to-coast NBC network.

This will be the first time that a major symphony organization and a radio network have joined in broadcasting rehearsals. Dr. Koussevitzky's rehearsals have always been held behind closed doors; but, in this his 25th anniversary and final year as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, he has agreed to open the rehearsals to a nation-wide radio audience.

The new program, which will be heard on Tuesdays at 1:30 to 2:00 p. m. over WJBO, marks a new association of the National Broadcasting Company and the Boston Symphony, which also will extend to broadcasts from the Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood, Mass., next summer. Broadcasts of the Boston Pops Orchestra will also be presented.

The Boston Symphony rehearsal broadcasts will be entirely unprepared. Koussevitzky will rehearse exactly as he always does, stopping the orchestra, repeating, correcting, and explaining.

The broadcasts are designed to give music lovers and students an opportunity to listen to a great symphony orchestra and conductor at work.

The programs will originate each week from the stage of Boston's Symphony Hall. The season's guest conductors also will be heard in the series.

Dr. Koussevitzky to Conduct Festival of American Music

DEC 2 1948

In his final season as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky will present a festival of American music, reviewing 25 years of interest in contemporary American music.

Two programs will be given in Boston's Symphony Hall: Dec. 31 and Jan. 1 and Jan. 7 and 8. They will be repeated in Carnegie Hall, New York, Jan. 12 and 15. With a single exception, all the music on the programs had its first performance under Koussevitzky's baton in seasons past, or will receive its first performance.

The first program will present two premieres. Rudolf Firkusny will be piano soloist in the first performance of Howard Hanson's Piano Concerto. The orchestra will present the premiere of Lukas Foss' "Recordare." Other works on the program are Henry Dixon Cowell's "Hymn and Fuguing Tune," William Schuman's "American Festival Overture," and Walter Piston's Third Symphony.

At the second week's concerts Dr. Koussevitzky will present the premiere of Leo Sowerby's Symphony. Ruth Posselt, violinist, will be the soloist in Samuel Barber's Violin Concerto, and Wesley Addy, baritone, in Aaron Copeland's "A Lincoln Portrait." The orchestra will play Roy Harris' Third Symphony and Edward Burlingame Hill's "Piece for English Horn."

MUSIC

Kousseyitzky Conducts K. P. E. Bach, Sibelius and Wagner at Symphony

Dec 18

By CYRUS DURGIN

Serge Koussevitzky returned to the conductor's stand of the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday, following the annual mid-Western tour and a week's rest. His program begins with the D major Concerto of Karl Philipp Emanuel Bach in the modern orchestration of Maximilian Steinberg; continues with the Seventh Symphony of Jean Sibelius, and ends with four excerpts from the music-dramas of Richard Wagner: The Prelude and Liebestod from "Tristan and Isolde," Siegfried's Funeral Music from "Goetterdaemmerung," and the Prelude and Introduction to Act 3 of "Die Meistersinger von Nuernberg."

All of this is music familiar to Symphony concert-goers of at least a few years experience. The Concerto, by that son of Johann Sebastian Bach who amounted to most in life, is a skilled and ingratiating 18th Century work, somewhere between the concerto grosso and the modern concerto. The arrangement of Steinberg adds the color of woodwinds and horn without blowing the composition up too much beyond its original dimensions or damaging its character as music.

Inclusion of the Silebius Seventh Symphony was doubtless in honor of the 83d birthday of the Finnish composer, which occurred Dec. 8. It was good to hear this compact and distintive one-movement Symphony again. The materials are of the simplest: variations on themes derived from the naked scale of A minor, which is heard at the outset, plus a few simple chords, but all worked up into a sonorous fabric, with many pages of string and brass writing which have the effect of alternately lyrical and dissonant counterpoint. In addition, the Seventh Symphony has a curious mood of finality though it was written nearly 25 years ago.

Not so many years past we were hearing a great deal of Sibelius, and perhaps in the heat of admiration, exaggerated words of praise were written about him. Today we hear much less of him, and beyond a doubt he is under-rated. No matter, for that Great Rectifier, Time, will have the last word. My guess is that Sibelius will be regarded as a remarkable composer with a unique style; perhaps not of the universal greatest who have directly affected the main currents of musical history, but as a northern voice compelling and poetic and absolutely unmistakable.

Mr. Koussevitzky has performed Wagner from time to time but, for the most part sparingly in recent years at least. To devote half a program to King Richard I is unusual for the conductor. There are those still, who object to Wagner excerpts in the concert hall. But in this country the opportunity to hear Wagner in full splendor of a great orchestra is possible only at symphonic concerts in three or four cities, and in this life it is wise to accept what is offered while accepting is good.

The music from the three great music-dramas, yesterday, was richly colored and superbly intense, but for my taste Mr. Koussevitzky plays the "Tristan" and "Siegfried" excerpts too slow, and the same can be said of the beginning of the third act of "Meistersinger."

MASS.
REPUBLICAN
DEC 26 1948

COMING MUSICAL HIGHLIGHT

[illegible] MUSICIAN
RUSTON, LA
DEC. 1948

BOSTON SYMPHONY REHEARSALS ARE BROADCAST

According to an announcement by Mr. Ralph Sims of Radio Station WJBO in Baton Rouge, rehearsals of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under its renowned conductor, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, are being broadcast as of Tuesday, November 23, over the coast-to-coast NBC network.

This will be the first time that a major symphony organization and a radio network have joined in broadcasting rehearsals. Dr. Koussevitzky's rehearsals have always been held behind closed doors; but, in this his 25th anniversary and final year as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, he has agreed to open the rehearsals to a nation-wide radio audience.

The new program, which will be heard on Tuesdays at 1:30 to 2:00 p. m. over WJBO, marks a new association of the National Broadcasting Company and the Boston Symphony, which also will extend to broadcasts from the Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood, Mass., next summer. Broadcasts of the Boston Pops Orchestra will also be presented.

The Boston Symphony rehearsal broadcasts will be entirely unprepared. Koussevitzky will rehearse exactly as he always does, stopping the orchestra, repeating, correcting, and explaining.

The broadcasts are designed to give music lovers and students an opportunity to listen to a great symphony orchestra and conductor at work.

The programs will originate each week from the stage of Boston's Symphony Hall. The season's guest conductors also will be heard in the series.

Boston's famous Symphony Orchestra will present a concert at the Municipal Auditorium on Tuesday evening, January 11, 1949, with Dr Serge Koussevitski conducting. This will be the last opportunity the people in Springfield will have to see the illustrious maestro conducting the orchestra, as Dr. Koussevitski retires at the end of the current season. Tickets have gone on sale for this memorable event. Get yours early!

Dr. Koussevitzky to Conduct Festival of American Music

DEC 24 1948

In his final season as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky will present a festival of American music, reviewing 25 years of interest in contemporary American music.

Two programs will be given in Boston's Symphony Hall: Dec. 31 and Jan. 1 and Jan. 7 and 8. They will be repeated in Carnegie Hall, New York, Jan. 12 and 15. With a single exception all the music on the programs had its first performance under Koussevitzky's baton in seasons past, or will receive its first performance.

The first program will present two premieres. Rudolf Firkusny will be piano soloist in the first performance of Howard Hanson's Piano Concerto. The orchestra will present the premiere of Lukas Foss' "Recordare." Other works on the program are Henry Dixon Cowell's "Hymn and Fuguing Tune," William Schuman's "American Festival Overture," and Walter Piston's Third Symphony.

At the second week's concerts Dr. Koussevitzky will present the premiere of Leo Sowerby's Symphony. Ruth Posselt, violinist, will be the soloist in Samuel Barber's Violin Concerto, and Wesley Addy, baritone, in Aaron Copeland's "A Lincoln Portrait." The orchestra will play Roy Harris' Third Symphony and Edward Burlingame Hill's "Piece for English Horn."

220

MISSING
PAGE(S)

Interpreting Music

by SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY

In all ages, artists were prophets of either the rise or downfall of a culture. In the prewar period, leading artists introduced decadence into art before it manifested itself in the social and political life of the postwar period. Decadence in musical interpretation in some countries grew to such proportions that not only were the lights and shadings distorted, but the form itself was lost. At the same time, artists in other countries, also instinctively foreseeing the decline, attempted to straighten the distorted line of classical art.

We have a great deal of evidence, however, that musical performers have a right to interpret compositions freely. They hold that right from the composer. Take Bach, for example. In his works we very often find no nuances. Does it mean that Bach intended to have his compositions played without nuances? Positively no. The great Bach leaves that freedom to the performer. Take the classical concertos by Mozart and Beethoven: we find that cadenzas are very rarely written by the composer, who leaves the freedom of improvisation to the performer. In Wagner's scores, after Tannhäuser and Lohengrin, we find no exact indication of tempi. Wagner omitted it intentionally, and says in his book on the art of conducting that it is unnecessary to mark the exact tempo, because a talented conductor will find the right tempo anyway and the untalented conductor will never grasp the tempo even if it is printed in the score. For that reason, Wagner marks his tempi in a general way, such as: Bewegt, Mässig bewegt, slower, faster, and so on. . . .

Personally, I believe that a composer, when creating a work, transfuses it not only with his musical power, but also with the entire meaning of his life—the essence of his being. That is why we can and we must find a "central line" in the creation of every composer. What is the central line of a composer? It is the meaning of his life and ideals, which he brings to us through the medium of his music.

With Bach, the central line is religion. Bach came to glorify God. And we find in his entire life his praise of God, exaltation of heaven and divinity. Haydn's line is joyfulness, humor, which he wants to share with others. We feel it in every symphony, in every minuetto and allegro. Mozart gives us pure tonal harmony, absolute purity of musical form. If we analyze his creative work, we will find how free Mozart was of any outward influence: he believed in music for the sake of music, sound for sound, beauty for beauty. Let us take Beethoven. His central line is transcendentality: he reflects universal emotion in music. When Beethoven grieves, he grieves with the world; when Beethoven is joyful, it is universal joy; when he feels a tragedy, it is a world tragedy. We can well say that the central line of Beethoven's art is the unifying element of universality. I shall not overburden you by enumerating other composers. But I cannot go by an outstanding figure in musical art—Wagner. The central line of Wagner's art is love and devotion, which we can trace in all his creative work: the love and devotion of Senta in The Flying Dutchman, of Elizabeth in Tannhäuser, of King Marke to Isolde; of Isolde and Kurwenal to Tristan. And so, we can find in the work of each master a central line expressed in sound.

Here emerges the truth of interpretative art. When the artist-interpreter is able to perceive the inner meaning, the central line, of a composition, he will find in himself the right and illuminating emotion to perform it. It may not be difficult to trace externally the central line, because there exists a vast literature of the life

CONCERTS AT THE INSTITUTE

(continued from page 8)

James Abresch

Dean Dixon

wrote: "A virtuoso conductor—a musician who feels deeply his mission, who interprets with flaming temperament and communicative power." And one prescient reviewer inquired, "Is it rash to predict that the season of 1924-1925 will be a brilliant one?"

Last month, at the age of seventy-five, Dr. Koussevitzky gave every evidence that his musical genius remains undiminished. In this "one concert he achieved," according to the Boston Herald, the "apothesis of all the triumphs he has ever attained."

America's foremost conducter, whose record has never been equalled in "time or quality," tendered his resignation last spring, to take effect at the end of the current season. There is, however, some consolation in knowing that he will appear with the Orchestra from time to time as special guest conductor. He will also continue, as director of the Berkshire Music Center, to "serve the great educational and cultural cause radiating from Tanglewood. . . ." Dr. Koussevitzky will be succeeded in his post by Charles Münch, who comes from the Paris Conservatory Orchestra with an illustrious career to commend him

Brooklyn audiences are proud to share in the Silver Jubilee Year of the great and beloved leader. They look forward with eagerness to the five concerts scheduled for the season, though their happiness is tinctured by the awareness that they are officially his final ones on the podium of the Academy of Music. On Friday evening, November 12, the Orchestra returns for its annual series in Brooklyn.

Little Orchestra Scores Again

In a blaze of critical acclaim, the Little Orchestra presents its third and fourth concerts of the season. On Tuesday evening, November 16, Richard Tucker will be the featured guest artist. Leading tenor of the Metropolitan Opera, the Brooklyn born singer has a rich, vibrant voice which in dramatic impact, power, and brilliance of texture has been likened to that of Caruso. His debut as Enzo in La Giaconda in 1945 won him national fame.

The tenor will sing arias from Haydn's mellifluous The Seasons and the martial and triumphant "Sound and Alarm" from Handel's Judas Maccabeus. Included in the delightful program of instrumental rarities will be Kaplan's Violin Concerto in G major, the first public performance of the new work by a young American whose music has been familiar, if largely anonymous, through motion pictures. Philip Frank, gifted violinist of the Orchestra, will be the soloist.

Marian Anderson, famous contralto and beloved artist, will lend her great voice to the "fine program-making" of Tuesday evening, November 30. Bach's intricate and delicate "Schlage Doch" and the enchantingly tinted "Ombra Felice" of Mozart will be interpreted anew by a singer who continues to reveal new beauties of voice and musicianship.

A pleasing note of novelty will be introduced by the premiere of Jacob Avshalomoff's Sinfonietta, while D'Indy's infrequently heard Triple Concerto for Piano, Flute, and 'Cello, Liszt's "Jeanne d'Arc au Bücher" and Ravel's "Tombeau de Couperin" will complete the evening's offerings.

Youth Orchestra Offers Tubby the Tuba

On Saturday afternoon, November 27, the young people of the city return to share the first of another series of novel musical adventures with the American Youth Orchestra. Under the direction of Dean Dixon, the gifted ensemble will offer four imaginative concerts,

---

Boston Symphony Takes to the Road

[redacted]—Moving a symphony orchestra around the countryside turns out to be one of the more complicated operations if the events of this afternoon and evening are any criterion, and I gather they are.

We—which is to say the 110 men of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, their baggage master, librarian, managers, assistant managers and I—took off from South Station this afternoon on the first leg of what they call the orchestra's "short circuit." This consists of concerts in Springfield, New York, Washington, Brooklyn and New York again; short, but due to the fact there is travel between each engagement, save the last two, it is considered one of the hard tours.

~~Never Missed Yet~~

On its longer trips the orchestra travels in five sleepers with a dining and baggage car attached, the latter to handle the nearly 200 pieces of baggage the orchestra must carry along with it. Each man in the orchestra has a trunk containing his wardrobe and personal effects; some of them, indeed, have special trunks into which they also cram their instruments as well as their clothing. The bass players' instrument cases are vast wooden boxes so large the men can hang up their evening clothes inside them, to the considerable envy of the others. The envy diminishes rapidly, however, when, as has happened, the concert hall stairways have proved too narrow to allow passage of the crates.

Actually, this is no concern to the bass players, for they have, in the person of Harvey Genereux, the combination baggage master and stage manager, a perfect one on whom to place the responsibility. For Mr. Genereux, who devotes his limited spare time to making conductor's batons for Dr. Koussevitzky (they're only 11 inches long so it doesn't take much time in any case), shoulders the entire burden of seeing to it that the instruments, music, clothes, trunks, stands and other accoutrements of a symphony orchestra on tour arrive on time for a concert.

He's never missed yet and, wonder of wonders, still has to suffer a nervous breakdown. "But there have been plenty of close calls," he added, tapping on a wooden trunk to emphasize his precarious position.

~~Can't Allow Heat~~

"One night," he went on, "our baggage car got lost somewhere between Boston and Providence. It got to be an hour before concert time and I was calling everywhere, but no car. It had left Boston, and wasn't anywhere in between. I kept telling the trainmen it must be in the Providence yards but they insisted it wasn't. So at last I went into the yards myself. It was almost zero and the snow was up to my knees, but I found it, all snowed in."

They managed to get the instruments and clothes to the auditorium 15 minutes before concert time, and the men leaped into their clothes. But when they picked up their instruments to warm them up they were so cold one of the trombonist's lips stuck to the mouthpiece. The concert began on time, but the changing pitch as the instruments warmed up proved a source of amazement to the conductor.

"We can't allow the baggage cars to be warmed," said Mr. Genereux, "as sudden variations in temperature ruin the stringed instruments." More than once he has followed along with his precious baggage car to insure correct and prompt delivery. Once, between Boston and Pittsburgh, he trailed his car through the yards at Springfield, Albany, Syracuse and Buffalo to get it on the right line, only to discover a sudden shift had started it back to Syracuse. He realized it in time to re-route it correctly.

F~~orgot Trousers~~

But the baggage car isn't his only worry. Despite the alertness of the musicians on tour, they frequently forget their keys, so he has both a master key and a claw hammer, in case the master doesn't work. He knows the clothes size of all the musicians so that if one forgets a coat, he knows who has an extra the same size. Even Conductor Muench forgot his vest one night. One of the musicians sacrificed his and sneaked in to cover him up. Sir Thomas Beecham one night, forgot his trousers. Being on the portly side this created a terrible predicament, but slicing a few pleats on one of the musician's trousers did the trick.

While Mr. Genereux wrestles with trainmen, baggage men, express men and lumpers, the men of the orchestra ride serene in their five sleepers with more important matters on their mind. A poker game that has been going on for nearly 68 years occupies the attention of some; a bridge game that has found Concertmaster Richard Burgin the champion for many years occupies others, while naps, conversations, and a singular French game known as "pelot" occupies still others.

"Look at them," said Mr. Genereux, "You'd think I didn't have a [illegible] on my mind."

(Continued)

MUSIC

Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Igor Stravinsky conducting, gave the 17th program of the 68th season in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. The all-Stravinsky program included:

Ode in Three Parts
Capriccio for Piano and Orchestra
Concerto in D for String Orchestra
Orpheus

By RUDOLPH ELIE

There is no greater privilege for a musical audience than being present at a concert of the music of Igor Stravinsky conducted by Igor Stravinsky. It is an event to be treasured in the mind for all days to come, to be recalled with increasing valuation, to be handed down to the younger generations with devotion.

For Igor Stravinsky is one of the two greatest living composers, perhaps one of the greatest of all time and without question the dominating musical figure of the first half of the 20th century. Of all the composers who have lived and worked and made their careers in these years of collapsing values in every field, only he and Serge Prokofieff have followed through. Only he and Serge Prokofieff have had the creative force to survive, to grow, to achieve with each new work a greater stature.

There was little on yesterday's program that proved difficult. On the contrary, save for some obscure passages in the Ode and some seemingly tedious passages in Orpheus (tedious, at least, without the ballet), it was music of marvelous immediacy, and it held the attention of the appreciative audience throughout. Of all the works the Concerto for String Orchestra seemed to me the most thoroughly enjoyable. The first movement has a spontaneity and a tang that proves irresistible as it surges forward, pausing only to register some astounding rhythmical effects. The slow movement seems to me the most beautiful melody Mr. Stravinsky has ever composed and the very substance and model of contemporary melodic thinking. And the work comes to a close with a volatile rondo that calls upon every resource of string coloration. Predictions are hardly discreet in this particular field, but this work, it is safe to say, smacks of immortality.

In the performance of the familiar Capriccio for piano and orchestra, Soulima Stravinsky, son of the composer, made his first appearance here. Almost a dead ringer for his father, the 33-year-old pianist made a very [illegible] impression and it would be interesting to hear him in another work. For while his must be considered the authoritative performance, it was indeed a good deal less exciting than we have often heard before. As a matter of fact, since Mr. Stravinsky has a horror of the emotional in performance, the entire program in the hands of another conductor might have been more telling. Yet it could not have been neater or more informed with rhythmic definition. Bent [illegible] his music stand, his incredibly long arms in shoulder-high extension, he carved the most illustrative beats in the air, underlining them with expressive cues to the various orchestral choirs and graceful movements of his diminutive body. He captivated everyone with his manner of half running onto and off the stage, too, but it was his music rather than his conducting that spoke for him. And it is to be doubted if anyone in the hall wasn't aware that that voice is for all time.

Interpreting Music

by SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY

IN ALL AGES, ARTISTS WERE PROPHETS OF either the rise or downfall of a culture. In the prewar period, leading artists introduced decadence into art before it manifested itself in the social and political life of the postwar period. Decadence in musical interpretation in some countries grew to such proportions that not only were the lights and shadings distorted, but the form itself was lost. At the same time, artists in other countries, also instinctively foreseeing the decline, attempted to straighten the distorted line of classical art.

We have a great deal of evidence, however, that musical performers have a right to interpret compositions freely. They hold that right from the composer. Take Bach, for example. In his works we very often find no nuances. Does it mean that Bach intended to have his compositions played without nuances? Positively no. The great Bach leaves that freedom to the performer. Take the classical concertos by Mozart and Beethoven: we find that cadenzas are very rarely written by the composer, who leaves the freedom of improvisation to the performer. In Wagner's scores, after Tannhäuser and Lohengrin, we find no exact indication of tempi. Wagner omitted it intentionally, and says in his book on the art of conducting that it is unnecessary to mark the exact tempo, because a talented conductor will find the right tempo anyway and the untalented conductor will never grasp the tempo even if it is printed in the score. For that reason, Wagner marks his tempi in a general way, such as: [illegible] Massig bewegt, slower, faster, and so on. . . .

Personally, I believe that a composer, when creating a work, transfuses it not only with his musical power, but also with the entire meaning of his life—the essence of his being. That is why we can and we must find a "central line" in the creation of every composer. What is the central line of a composer? It is the meaning of his life and ideals, which he brings to us through the medium of his music.

With Bach, the central line is religion. Bach came to glorify God. And we find in his entire life his praise of God, exaltation of heaven and divinity. Haydn's line is joyfulness, humor, which he wants to share with others. We feel it in every symphony, in every minuetto and allegro. Mozart gives us pure tonal harmony, absolute purity of musical form. If we analyze his creative work, we will find how free Mozart was of any outward influence: he believed in music for the sake of music, sound for sound, beauty for beauty. Let us take Beethoven. His central line is transcendentality: he reflects universal emotion in music. When Beethoven grieves, he grieves with the world; when Beethoven is joyful, it is universal joy; when he feels a tragedy, it is a world tragedy. We can well say that the central line of Beethoven's art is the unifying element of universality. I shall not overburden you by enumerating other composers. But I cannot go by an outstanding figure in musical art—Wagner. The central line of Wagner's art is love and devotion, which we can trace in all his creative work: the love and devotion of Senta in The Flying Dutchman, of Elizabeth in Tannhäuser, of King Marke to Isolde; of Isolde and Kurwenal to Tristan. And so, we can find in the work of each master a central line expressed in sound.

Here emerges the truth of interpretative art. When the artist-interpreter is able to perceive the inner meaning, the central line, of a composition, he will find in himself the right and illuminating emotion to perform it. It may not be difficult to trace externally the central line, because there exists a vast literature of the life

---

CONCERTS AT THE INSTITUTE

(continued from page 8)

James Abresch

Dean Dixon

wrote: "A virtuoso conductor—a musician who feels deeply his mission, who interprets with flaming temperament and communicative power." And one prescient reviewer inquired, "Is it rash to predict that the season of 1924-1925 will be a brilliant one?"

Last month, at the age of seventy-five, Dr. Koussevitzky gave every evidence that his musical genius remains undiminished. In this "one concert he achieved," according to the Boston Herald, the "apothesis of all the triumphs he has ever attained."

America's foremost conducter, whose record has never been equalled in "time or quality," tendered his resignation last spring, to take effect at the end of the current season. There is, however, some consolation in knowing that he will appear with the Orchestra from time to time as special guest conductor. He will also continue, as director of the Berkshire Music Center, to "serve the great educational and cultural cause radiating from Tanglewood. . . ." Dr. Koussevitzky will be succeeded in his post by Charles Münch, who comes from the Paris Conservatory Orchestra with an illustrious career to commend him.

Brooklyn audiences are proud to share in the Silver Jubilee Year of the great and beloved leader. They look forward with eagerness to the five concerts scheduled for the season, though their happiness is tinctured by the awareness that they are officially his final ones on the podium of the Academy of Music. On Friday evening, November 12, the Orchestra returns for its annual series in Brooklyn.

Little Orchestra Scores Again

In a blaze of critical acclaim, the Little Orchestra presents its third and fourth concerts of the season. On Tuesday evening, November 16, Richard Tucker will be the featured guest artist. Leading tenor of the Metropolitan Opera, the Brooklyn born singer has a rich, vibrant voice which in dramatic impact, power, and brilliance of texture has been likened to that of Caruso. His debut as Enzo in La Giaconda in 1945 won him national fame.

The tenor will sing arias from Haydn's mellifluous The Seasons and the martial and triumphant "Sound and Alarm" from Handel's Judas Maccabeus. Included in the delightful program of instrumental rarities will be Kaplan's Violin Concerto in G major, the first public performance of the new work by a young American whose music has been familiar, if largely anonymous, through motion pictures. Philip Frank, gifted violinist of the Orchestra, will be the soloist.

Marian Anderson, famous contralto and beloved artist, will lend her great voice to the "fine program-making" of Tuesday evening, November 30. Bach's intricate and delicate "Schlage Doch" and the enchantingly tinted "Ombra Felice" of Mozart will be interpreted anew by a singer who continues to reveal new beauties of voice and musicianship.

A pleasing note of novelty will be introduced by the premiere of Jacob Avshalomoff's Sinfonietta, while D'Indy's infrequently heard Triple Concerto for Piano, Flute, and 'Cello, Liszt's "Jeanne d'Arc au Bûcher" and Ravel's "Tombeau de Couperin" will complete the evening's offerings.

Youth Orchestra Offers Tubby the Tuba

On Saturday afternoon, November 27, the young people of the city return to share the first of another series of novel musical adventures with the American Youth Orchestra. Under the direction of Dean Dixon, the gifted ensemble will offer four imaginative concerts,

---

Boston Symphony Takes to the Road

~~[illegible]~~—Moving a symphony orchestra around the countryside turns out to be one of the more complicated operations if the events of this afternoon and evening are any criterion, and I gather they are.

We—which is to say the 110 men of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, their baggage master, librarian, managers, assistant managers and I—took off from South Station this afternoon on the first leg of what they call the orchestra's "short circuit." This consists of concerts in Springfield, New York, Washington, Brooklyn and New York again; short, but due to the fact there is travel between each engagement, save the last two, it is considered one of the hard tours.

~~Never Missed Yet~~

On its longer trips the orchestra travels in five sleepers with a dining and baggage car attached, the latter to handle the nearly 200 pieces of baggage the orchestra must carry along with it. Each man in the orchestra has a trunk containing his wardrobe and personal effects; some of them, indeed, have special trunks into which they also cram their instruments as well as their clothing. The bass players' instrument cases are vast wooden boxes so large the men can hang up their evening clothes inside them, to the considerable envy of the others. The envy diminishes rapidly, however, when, as has happened, the concert hall stairways have proved too narrow to allow passage of the crates.

Actually, this is no concern to the bass players, for they have, in the person of Harvey Genereux, the combination baggage master and stage manager, a perfect one on whom to place the responsibility. For Mr. Genereux, who devotes his limited spare time to making conductor's batons for Dr. Koussevitzky (they're only 11 inches long so it doesn't take much time in any case), shoulders the entire burden of seeing to it that the instruments, music, clothes, trunks, stands and other accoutrements of a symphony orchestra on tour arrive on time for a concert.

He's never missed yet and, wonder of wonders, still has to suffer a nervous breakdown. "But there have been plenty of close calls," he added, tapping on a wooden trunk to emphasize his precarious position.

~~Can't Allow Heat~~

"One night," he went on, "our baggage car got lost somewhere between Boston and Providence. It got to be an hour before concert time and I was calling everywhere, but no car. It had left Boston, and wasn't anywhere in between. I kept telling the trainmen it must be in the Providence yards but they insisted it wasn't. So at last I went into the yards myself. It was almost zero and the snow was up to my knees, but I found it, all snowed in."

They managed to get the instruments and clothes to the auditorium 15 minutes before concert time, and the men leaped into their clothes. But when they picked up their instruments to warm them up they were so cold one of the trombonist's lips stuck to the mouthpiece. The concert began on time, but the changing pitch as the instruments warmed up proved a source of amazement to the conductor.

"We can't allow the baggage cars to be warmed," said Mr. Genereux, "as sudden variations in temperature ruin the stringed instruments." More than once he has followed along with his precious baggage car to insure correct and prompt delivery. Once, between Boston and Pittsburgh, he trailed his car through the yards at Springfield, Albany, Syracuse and Buffalo to get it on the right line, only to discover a sudden shift had started it back to Syracuse. He realized it in time to re-route it correctly.

~~Forgot Trousers~~

But the baggage car isn't his only worry. Despite the alertness of the musicians on tour, they frequently forget their keys, so he has both a master key and a claw hammer, in case the master doesn't work. He knows the clothes size of all the musicians so that if one forgets a coat, he knows who has an extra the same size. Even Conductor Muench forgot his vest one night. One of the musicians sacrificed his and sneaked in to cover him up. Sir Thomas Beecham one night, forgot his trousers. Being on the portly side this created a terrible predicament, but slicing a few pleats on one of the musician's trousers did the trick.

While Mr. Genereux wrestles with trainmen, baggage men, express men and lumpers, the men of the orchestra ride serene in their five sleepers with more important matters on their mind. A poker game that has been going on for nearly 68 years occupies the attention of some; a bridge game that has found Concertmaster Richard Burgin the champion for many years occupies others, while naps, conversations, and a singular French game known as [illegible] occupies still others.

"Look at them," said Mr. G[illegible] "You'd think I didn't have a [illegible] my mind."

(Continued)

MUSIC

Symphony Concert.

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Igor Stravinsky conducting, gave the 17th program of the 68th season in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. The all-Stravinsky program included:

Ode in Three Parts
Capriccio for Piano and Orchestra
Concerto in D for String Orchestra
Orpheus

By RUDOLPH ELIE

There is no greater privilege for a musical audience than being present at a concert of the music of Igor Stravinsky conducted by Igor Stravinsky. It is an event to be treasured in the mind for the days to come, to be recalled with increasing valuation, to be handed down to the younger generations with devotion.

For Igor Stravinsky is one of the two greatest living composers, perhaps one of the greatest of all time, and without question the dominating musical figure of the first half of the 20th century. Of all the composers who have lived and worked and made their careers in these years of collapsing values in every field, only he and Serge Prokofieff have followed through. Only he and Serge Prokofieff have had the creative force to survive, to grow, to achieve with each new work a greater stature.

There was little on yesterday's program that proved difficult. On the contrary, save for some obscure passages in the Ode and some seemingly tedious passages in Orpheus (tedious, at least, without the ballet), it was music of marvelous immediacy, and it held the attention of the appreciative audience throughout. Of all the works the Concerto for String Orchestra seemed to me the most thoroughly enjoyable. The first movement has a spontaneity and a tang that proves irresistible as it surges forward, pausing only to register some astounding rhythmical effects. The slow movement seems to me the most beautiful melody Mr. Stravinsky has ever composed and the very substance and model of contemporary melodic thinking. And the work comes to a close with a volatile rondo that calls upon every resource of string coloration. Predictions are hardly discreet in this particular field, but this work, it is safe to say, smacks of immortality.

In the performance of the familiar Capriccio for piano and orchestra, Soulima Stravinsky, son of the composer, made his first appearance here. Almost a dead ringer for his father, the 38-year-old pianist made a very favorable impression and it would be interesting to hear him in another work. For while his must be considered the authoritative performance, it was indeed a good deal less exciting than we have often heard before. As a matter of fact, since Mr. Stravinsky has a horror of the emotional in performance, the entire program in the hands of another conductor might have been more telling. Yet it could not have been neater or more informed with rhythmic definition. Bent low over his music stand, his incredibly long arms in shoulder-high extension, he carved the most illustrative beats in the air, underlining them with expressive cues to the various orchestral choirs and graceful movements of his diminutive body. He captivated everyone with his manner of half running onto and off the stage, too, but it was his music rather than his conducting that spoke for him. And it is to be doubted if anyone in the hall was unaware that that voice is for all time.

PITTSBURGH, PA.

and activity of every composer, especially those belonging to history. It is not difficult for a musician to analyze a score externally, to determine its form, its melodic and harmonic plan, and entire structure. But this only takes us halfway; this is only the surface part of the central line, which will give us no true understanding of the depth and emotion of this or the other work or composer. The most important part is that which can neither be read nor learned; it rests in the interpreter himself, in his own emotions, depth, and feeling.

Today we often hear "musical authorities" declare, when discussing a performance, "Let music speak for itself." That up-to-date motto is dangerous, because it paves the way for mediocre performers to come and accurately play over a composition from beginning to end, claiming that they "let the music speak for itself." That argument is also not correct because a talented artist, no matter how accurately he follows the markings in the score, renders the composition through his own prism, his own perception of the score, his own temperament and emotion. And the deeper the emotion of the interpreter, the greater and more vivid the performance.

A perfect interpretation may have two different aspects, equally faithful to the score of the composer. One may be called mechanically perfect, the other organically perfect. The first gives the beauty of mathematical balance, symmetry, and clarity; the second is the indivisible, living, pulsating élan vital of the composition. One aims to present beautified surface or reflection of the composition. In the other, the composition—its central idea—lives as a reality. One may be compared to a perfectly symmetrical building; the other to a great Gothic cathedral, with its partly asymmetrical yet organic order of unity. One is always enjoyable, pleasant and delightful, but remains, like a beautiful scene, external to the listener. The other takes and carries him with the élan vital of the work, merges him with the reality of the central meaning, makes him co-live and co-experience the élan vital of the composition. Like a mystic experience, the organic interpretation puts the listener in direct touch with the absolute reality hidden in the great work.

(Reprinted with permission from the August 1948 issue of the Atlantic Monthly.)

Concerts
AT THE INSTITUTE

Mariemma

Major Concerts

Isaac Stern is a violinist of unassuming manner and formidable technical prowess. But he is more than a wizard of the bow. He is a superb artist whose remarkable virtuosity is a vehicle for his mature musical expression. "A virtuoso but a musician," is how one critic described that rare combination, while Virgil Thomson pronounced him "one of the world's master fiddle players."

At twenty-eight the brilliant young American is a major musical figure. The only top-flight violinist to be trained exclusively in this country, he has performed with every important symphony orchestra, touring the land for many seasons and playing a leading part in the Berkshire Symphonic Festivals at Tanglewood. Last year, reversing a time-honored tradition, Stern crossed the Atlantic to conquer Europe, where he received overwhelming ovations in every country.

Brought up in San Francisco, he showed little musical genius in his early childhood. Like many another boy, he reluctantly took piano lessons but preferred baseball. Nevertheless

---

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REPUBLICAN

JAN 2 - 1949

BOSTON SYMPHONY TICKETS FORMERLY BOUGHT AT AUCTION

Over 800,000 Patrons Heard Famed Organization In Last Year

It has not always been as easy to purchase tickets to a concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, let alone one conducted by Serge Koussevitzky, as it is for their Springfield appearance Tuesday evening, January 11. For a time in Boston such tickets were auctioned off to the highest bidder. Even today, few eventualities might give an "outsider" access to a seat.

Overflow Concert

Nor is this situation true in Boston alone. In New York last season, the orchestra was forced to stage an "overflow" concert to accommodate a few of the many disappointed ticket applicants. Even in Providence, where the orchestra performs in the Metropolitan movie theater (acoustically said to be inferior to the Springfield Auditorium), concerts are sold out several weeks in advance.

In the early days, subscription tickets were sold at auction from the stage at Symphony Hall, where an oversized seating plan was displayed. Boston's socialtes, and more avid music lovers would contend hotly for some favored location, and sometimes run up the bids to a fantastic figure in their frantic efforts to keep certain seats in the family.

Eventually the auctions were abandoned, and subscribers were afforded the privilege of renewing their same seats from year to year. The result of this is that certain locations are kept in one family and handed down from generation to generation. Some patrons have heard the Boston Symphony Orchestra under each of its conductors. However, since the first conductor, Sir George Henschel, led the orchestra in 1884, that list has dwindled down to a very select few.

To give some idea of the magnitude of its collective audience, figures compiled recently show that during the last year the Boston Symphony was heard by more than 800,000 people. Of that number, 300,000 attended its 109 winter concerts, the balance being proportioned among six youth concerts, 58 Pop concerts, 21 Esplanade concerts and 14 Berkshire Festival concerts. Boston Symphony fans really take their orchestra seriously, so much so that even the Boston subway system includes a stop called "Symphony Station."

MUSIC
Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Eleazar de Carvalho conducting, gave the 16th program of the 68th season in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. Oscar Borgerth, violinist, was the soloist. The program:

Symphony No. 4, Op. 48 ... Glazounoff
Fantasia de movimentos mixtos ... Villa-Lobos
Iberia Suite (orch. Arbos) ... Albeniz

By RUDOLPH ELIE

Eleazar de Carvalho, who yesterday began the first of two nonconsecutive guest appearances with the orchestra is a very welcome addition to our stable of guest conductors. He brings with him a warmhearted, glowing, devoted sort of a personality combined with a most accomplished (though easy-looking) technique, and I find him a great pleasure both to watch and to listen to.

He seems to me one of the most natural conductors at work today, conducting as if it were the most uncomplicated profession in the world. He never seems to be caught off base either in a cue or in the pattern of his beat, nor does he ever seem to be riding the orchestra's momentum though whether he actually does or not only the musicians under him could tell.

In any case there are few conductors with Mr. Carvalho's almost feline grace of movement. He doesn't use a stick (or a score either, for that matter though how he ever commits to memory so devilish a piece as the Villa Lobos is beyond me) and is in consequence entirely liberated to choreograph, so to speak, the phrases and the nuances with his hands. Like the music itself, his hands are never at rest save in the more strongly rhythmed passages. Then he keeps his hands close in front of his vest, a device that adds vitality and movement to the rhythms. For the rest his hands are in constant motion, now serenely graceful, again tense and impassioned.

Occasionally he seems to err just a little in matters of taste. He correctly sized up the Glazounoff Symphony as a pretty minor piece of work and so devoted most of his interpretative attention to underlining its charm and bringing out the trivial elegances of its textures, but in the closing moment, with a natural desire to finish with a bang, he whipped it up a little untowardly. He is, however, neither a French schoolmaster nor a Prussian drill master nor even a German classicist but hot-blooded Latin from Brazil, and his point of view is interesting and refreshing and good.

There is some talk in the program to the effect that Villa Lobos lost the last movement of his Fantasy for Violin and Orchestra in Paris and had to write another. It is very much to be regretted that he did not lose the first as well. For here we have some of the most ungrateful music ever composed for the violin. It is subtitled "torment." and torment it certainly is. But with the second movement the situation radically changes for in this portrait of serenity and in the following picture of contentment we have music of great strength and often of great beauty. It is at once exotic and evocative, moving and impassioned. It is never exactly easy listening, but I found it well worth the extra attention required.

To perform this difficult work we were priviledged to hear one of Mr. de Carvalho's compatriots, a mild, scholarly looking violinist named Oscar Borgerth whose playing was anything but mild or scholarly. It is nearly impossible to appraise an artist being heard for the first time here with the orchestra, especially in so fierce a piece as Villa Lobos'. Yet I would unhesitatingly say that Mr. Borgerth is clearly an extremely advanced musician possessed of a transcendent technique and a most musical approach. It would be interesting to hear him either in solo or in a more familiar concerto.

The concert came to an end on a lighter note with Albeniz' "Iberia" Suite as arranged for orchestra. It is a good deal more earthy than Debussy's Iberia of recent hearing but it is colorful and sensuous and good fun. And, of course, it found Mr. de Carvalho and the orchestra in the vein. Next week Igor Stravinsky returns, this time with his son Soulima as piano soloist in an all-Stravinsky program.

HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

[illegible] - 1949

Boston Symphony Plays Hanson Work in Festival

Special to The Hartford Times

Boston—It is an ambitious and interesting but not altogether satisfying series of works that has been chosen for the first of two programs in the American Musical Festival being performed by the Boston Symphony this week and next.

The major pieces selected by Mr. Koussevitzky include Howard Hanson's Concerto in G major for pianoforte and orchestra, and Walter Piston's Symphony No. 3.

Mr. Hanson's concerto, performed last night for the first time and conducted by the composer, was, despite its four movements, fairly short and limited in material. It contained, however, a coherence and restraint refreshing in modern music.

Mr. Hanson has told us that in this piece he would present an effort towards lyricism in contrast to the popular percussive affectations of the day. In this direction he is quite successful. The second movement is energetic, though not noisy, and the first ends in a delicate, careful series of piano notes that to us were intensely moving, spoiled only by the fidgeting of the audience.

* * *

RUDOLPH FIRKUSNY, the soloist, played with understanding and feeling for the score, the only possible criticism of his performance being one or two slightly uneven chords. The audience reacted well to him, though they did not perhaps give the concerto itself the applause it deserves.

Mr. Piston's Third Symphony is the other ambitious work on the program and it runs a rather distant second in attractiveness to Mr. Hanson's concerto. The greatest loss here occurs when the delightful, almost pastoral, melody of the second movement is suddenly lost in a storm of trumpets, kettledrums, and xylophones.

The third and fourth movements, ambitious and noisy, stand out only for their ingenuity which is at times remarkable enough to stimulate some interest.

The minor works on the program include Henry Cowell's Hymn and Fuguing Tune Number 2 for string orchestra. It gives an impression close to that of vocal works of early American tune writers.

* * *

WILLIAM SCHUMAN'S American Festival Overture seems a fairly commonplace work, though its heterogeneous clamor, suggesting in an eerie way the life and noise of the city, was undoubtedly less hackneyed when it was written in 1939 than now. Its tone reminded us somehow of Gershwin gone a little pretentious.

Recordare by Lukas Foss was again unmoving and too broken to produce any coherent effects. Although it was well enough conducted by its composer on this, the first of its performances.

Though the idea of the series of concerts of modern American music appears at first laudable enough, one wonders after hearing the first of them whether the ordinary listener, steeped in the more modern classics, will be able to take the bluntness and cold, mechanised ingenuity which seems to be their mark. Be it a weakness or otherwise, the average concert-goer is used to a little more warmth than he can find in these contrivances.—W.B.Jr.

PORTLAND, ME.
SUNDAY TELEGRAM

JAN 2 - 1949

The other is a real collector's item, a 12-inch recording of Serge Koussevitzky's Concerto in F Minor, Op. 3, with the composer himself playing the double bass to the piano accompaniment of Pierre Luboshutz of the piano team of Luboshutz and Nemenoff. The recording was made in 1929 and is not currently available to the public. Victor selected it as a tribute to Doctor Koussevitzky whose 25th year with the Boston Symphony is being observed.

Victor's new recordings in the popular field include one album which I'm afraid I don't enjoy and I shan't pretend to be sorry, either. It is Be-bop and contains four 10-inchers by Dizzy Gillespie, Coleman Hawkins, Kenny Clarke and Lucky Thompson, and their respective crews. It may be good, bad or indifferent, I wouldn't know. If you're interested, try it, but I think I'll get Uncle Hezzie to try and swap my album for a pound of butter.

More to universal liking however is Dennis Day singing Ave Maria and Bless This House, well done and timely, with the latter even better than the first. The Six Fat Dutchmen have a nice platter in Linda Polka and The Owl Waltz. These feature the accordion

---

ROCHESTER, N. Y.
DEMOCRAT-CHRONICLE
JAN 2 - 1949

Koussevitzky Continues American Festival

Serge Koussevitzky's Boston Symphony Orchestra programs of Friday and last night in Boston, at which Dr. Howard Hanson was guest conductor in the premiere of his Concerto for Piano and Orchestra, with Rudolf Firnusky as soloist, were in the nature of an American Festival, which continues with two concerts for the next weekend, and two concerts in Carnegie Hall, New York, Jan. 12 and 15.

From his first season in the United States Kousevitzky has devoted himself to the discovery and performance of significant American music, in some cases by composers then unknown in symphony concerts. He also has commissioned works through the Koussevitzky Music Foundation, established in 1942, the Hanson Concerto being one of these.

In his current Festival Koussevitzky includes works by composers, most of them familiar to Rochester audiences also by reason of the Eastman School's own Festivals of American music, including Henry Cowell, William Schuman, Lukas Foss, Walter Piston, Leo Sowerby, Samuel Barber, Roy Harris, Edward Burlingame Hill and Aaron Copland.

and activity of every composer, especially those belonging to history. It is not difficult for a musician to analyze a score externally, to determine its form, its melodic and harmonic plan, and entire structure. But this only takes us halfway; this is only the surface part of the central line, which will give us no true understanding of the depth and emotion of this or the other work or composer. The most important part is that which can neither be read nor learned; it rests in the interpreter himself, in his own emotions, depth, and feeling.

Today we often hear "musical authorities" declare, when discussing a performance, "Let music speak for itself." That up-to-date motto is dangerous, because it paves the way for mediocre performers to come and accurately play over a composition from beginning to end, claiming that they "let the music speak for itself." That argument is also not correct because a talented artist, no matter how accurately he follows the markings in the score, renders the composition through his own prism, his own perception of the score, his own temperament and emotion. And the deeper the emotion of the interpreter, the greater and more vivid the performance.

A perfect interpretation may have two different aspects, equally faithful to the score of the composer. One may be called mechanically perfect, the other organically perfect. The first gives the beauty of mathematical balance, symmetry, and clarity; the second is the indivisible, living, pulsating élan vital of the composition. One aims to present beautified surface or reflection of the composition. In the other, the composition—its central idea—lives as a reality. One may be compared to a perfectly symmetrical building; the other to a great Gothic cathedral, with its partly asymmetrical yet organic order of unity. One is always enjoyable, pleasant and delightful, but remains, like a beautiful scene, external to the listener. The other takes and carries him with the élan vital of the work, merges him with the reality of the central meaning, makes him co-live and co-experience the élan vital of the composition. Like a mystic experience, the organic interpretation puts the listener in direct touch with the absolute reality hidden in the great work.

(Reprinted with permission from the August 1948 issue of the Atlantic Monthly.)

Concerts
AT THE INSTITUTE

Mariemma

Major Concerts

Isaac Stern is a violinist of unassuming manner and formidable technical prowess. But he is more than a wizard of the bow. He is a superb artist whose remarkable virtuosity is a vehicle for his mature musical expression. "A virtuoso but a musician," is how one critic described that rare combination, while Virgil Thomson pronounced him "one of the world's master fiddle players."

At twenty-eight the brilliant young American is a major musical figure. The only top-flight violinist to be trained exclusively in this country, he has performed with every important symphony orchestra, touring the land for many seasons and playing a leading part in the Berkshire Symphonic Festivals at Tanglewood. Last year, reversing a time-honored tradition, Stern crossed the Atlantic to conquer Europe, where he received overwhelming ovations in every country.

Brought up in San Francisco, he showed little musical genius in his early childhood. Like many another boy, he reluctantly took piano lessons but preferred baseball. Nevertheless

---

[illegible] MASS.

JAN 2 [illegible]

BOSTON SYMPHONY TICKETS FORMERLY BOUGHT AT AUCTION

Over 800,000 Patrons Heard Famed Organization In Last Year

It has not always been as easy to purchase tickets to a concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, let alone one conducted by Serge Koussevitzky, as it is for their Springfield appearance Tuesday evening, January 11. For a time in Boston such tickets were auctioned off to the highest bidder. Even today, few eventualities might give an "outsider" access to a seat.

Overflow Concert

Nor is this situation true in Boston alone. In New York last season, the orchestra was forced to stage an "overflow" concert to accommodate a few of the many disappointed ticket applicants. Even in Providence, where the orchestra performs in the Metropolitan movie theater (acoustically said to be inferior to the Springfield Auditorium), concerts are sold out several weeks in advance.

In the early days, subscription tickets were sold at auction from the stage at Symphony Hall, where an oversized seating plan was displayed. Boston's socialites, and more avid music lovers would contend hotly for some favored location, and sometimes run up the bids to a fantastic figure in their frantic efforts to keep certain seats in the family.

Eventually the auctions were abandoned, and subscribers were afforded the privilege of renewing their same seats from year to year. The result of this is that certain locations are kept in one family and handed down from generation to generation. Some patrons have heard the Boston Symphony Orchestra under each of its conductors. However, since the first conductor, Sir George Henschel, led the orchestra in 1884, that list has dwindled down to a very select few.

To give some idea of the magnitude of its collective audience, figures compiled recently show that during the last year the Boston Symphony was heard by more than 800,000 people. Of that number, 200,000 attended its 109 winter concerts, the balance being proportioned among six youth concerts, 58 Pop concerts, 21 Esplanade concerts and 14 Berkshire Festival concerts. Boston Symphony fans really take their orchestra seriously, so much so that even the Boston subway system includes a stop called "Symphony Station."

MUSIC
Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Eleazar de Carvalho conducting, gave the 16th program of the 68th season in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. Oscar Borgerth, violinist, was the soloist. The programme: [illegible] Symphony No. 6, C [illegible] Glazounoff Fantasia de [illegible] Villa-Lobos [illegible] Suite (orch. Arbos) ... Albeniz

By RUDOLPH ELIE

Eleazar de Carvalho, who yesterday began the first of two nonconsecutive guest appearances with the orchestra is a very welcome addition to our stable of guest conductors. He brings with him a warmhearted, glowing, devoted sort of a personality combined with a most accomplished (though easy-looking) technique, and I find him a great pleasure both to watch and to listen to.

He seems to me one of the most natural conductors at work today, conducting as if it were the most uncomplicated profession in the world. He never seems to be caught off base either in a cue or in the pattern of his beat, nor does he ever seem to be riding the orchestra's momentum though whether he actually does or not only the musicians under him could tell.

In any case there are few conductors with Mr. Carvalho's almost feline grace of movement. He doesn't use a stick (or a score either, for that matter though how he ever commits to memory so devilish a piece as the Villa Lobos is beyond me) and is in consequence entirely liberated to choreograph, so to speak, the phrases and the nuances with his hands. Like the music itself, his hands are never at rest save in the more strongly rhythmed passages. Then he keeps his hands close in front of his vest, a device that adds vitality and movement to the rhythms. For the rest his hands are in constant motion, now serenely graceful, again tense and impassioned.

Occasionally he seems to err just a little in matters of taste. He correctly sized up the Glazounoff Symphony as a pretty minor piece of work and so devoted most of his interpretative attention to underlining its charm and bringing out the trivial elegances of its textures, but in the closing moment, with a natural desire to finish with a bang, he whipped it up a little untowardly. He is, however, neither a French schoolmaster nor a Prussian drill master nor even a German classicist but hot-blooded Latin from Brazil, and his point of view is interesting and refreshing and good.

There is some talk in the program to the effect that Villa Lobos lost the last movement of his Fantasy for Violin and Orchestra in Paris and had to write another. It is very much to be regretted that he did not lose the first as well. For here we have some of the most ungrateful music ever composed for the violin. It is subtitled "torment," and torment it certainly is. But with the second movement the situation radically changes for in this portrait of serenity and in the following picture of contentment we have music of great strength and often of great beauty. It is at once exotic and evocative, moving and impassioned. It is never exactly easy listening, but I found it well worth the extra attention required.

To perform this difficult work we were priviledged to hear one of Mr. de Carvalho's compatriots, a mild, scholarly looking violinist named Oscar Borgerth whose playing was anything but mild or scholarly. It is nearly impossible to appraise an artist being heard for the first time here with the orchestra, especially in so fierce a piece as Villa Lobos'. Yet I would unhesitatingly say that Mr. Borgerth is clearly an extremely advanced musician possessed of a transcendent technique and a most musical approach. It would be interesting to hear him either in solo or in a more familiar concerto.

The concert came to an end on a lighter note with Albeniz' "Iberia" Suite as arranged for orchestra. It is a good deal more earthy than Debussy's Iberia of recent hearing but it is colorful and sensuous and good fun. [illegible] of course, it found Mr. de Car[illegible] and the orchestra in the vein [illegible] Igor Stravinsky returns, [illegible] time with his son Soulima as piano soloist in an all-[illegible] program.

HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

[illegible] 1949

Boston Symphony Plays Hanson Work in Festival

Special to The Hartford Times

Boston—It is an ambitious and interesting but not altogether satisfying series of works that has been chosen for the first of two programs in the American Musical Festival being performed by the Boston Symphony this week and next.

The major pieces selected by Mr. Koussevitzky include Howard Hanson's Concerto in G major for pianoforte and orchestra, and Walter Piston's Symphony No. 3.

Mr. Hanson's concerto, performed last night for the first time and conducted by the composer, was, despite its four movements, fairly short and limited in material. It contained, however, a coherence and restraint refreshing in modern music.

Mr. Hanson has told us that in this piece he would present an effort towards lyricism in contrast to the popular percussive affectations of the day. In this direction he is quite successful. The second movement is energetic, though not noisy, and the first ends in a delicate, careful series of piano notes that to us were intensely moving, spoiled only by the fidgeting of the audience.

* * *

RUDOLPH FIRKUSNY, the soloist, played with understanding and feeling for the score, the only possible criticism of his performance being one or two slightly uneven chords. The audience reacted well to him, though they did not perhaps give the concerto itself the applause it de[illegible]

Mr. Piston's [illegible] Symphony is the other [illegible] and it runs [illegible] distant second in attractiveness to Mr. [illegible]'s concerto. The greatest loss here occurs when the delightful, almost pastoral, melody of the second movement is suddenly lost in a storm of trumpets, kettledrums, and xylophones.

The third and fourth movements, ambitious and noisy, stand out only for their ingenuity which is at times remarkable enough to stimulate some interest.

The minor works on the program include Henry Cowell's Hymn and Fuguing Tune Number 2 for string orchestra. It gives an impression close to that of vocal works of early American tune writers.

* * *

WILLIAM SCHUMAN'S American Festival Overture seems a fairly commonplace work, though its heterogeneous clamor, suggesting in an eerie way the life and noise of the city, was undoubtedly less hackneyed when it was written in 1939 than now. Its tone reminded us somehow of Gershwin gone a little pretentious.

Recordare by Lukas Foss was again unmoving and too broken to produce any coherent effect. Although it was well enough conducted by its composer on this, the first of its performances.

Though the idea of the series of concerts of modern American music appears at first laudable enough, one wonders after hearing the first program whether the ordinary [illegible] steeped in the more [illegible] will be able to [illegible] and cold, [illegible] which seems [illegible] be it a weakness [illegible] average concert-[illegible] a little more warmth than he can find in these contrivances.—W. B. Jr.

[illegible] ME.
SUNDAY TELEGRAM

JAN 2 - 1949

The other is a real collector's item, a 12-inch recording of Serge Koussevitzky's Concerto in F Minor, Op. 3, with the composer himself playing the double bass to the piano accompaniment of Pierre Luboshutz of the piano team of Luboshutz and Nemenoff. The recording was made in 1929 and is not currently available to the public. Victor selected it as a tribute to Doctor Koussevitzky whose 25th year with the Boston Symphony is being observed.

Victor's new recordings in the popular field include one album which I'm afraid I don't enjoy and I shan't pretend to be sorry, either. It is Be-bop and contains four 10-inchers by Dizzy Gillespie, Coleman Hawkins, Kenny Clarke and Lucky Thompson, and their respective crews. It may be good, bad or indifferent, I wouldn't know. If you're interested, try it, but I think I'll get Uncle Hezzie to try and swap my album for a pound of butter.

More to universal liking however is Dennis Day singing Ave Maria and Bless This House, well done and timely, with the latter even better than the first. The Six Fat Dutchmen have a nice platter in Linda Polka and The Owl Waltz.

[illegible]
DEMOCRAT [illegible]NICLE
JAN 2- [illegible]

Kousseyitzky Continues American Festival

Serge Koussevitzky's Boston Symphony Orchestra programs of Friday and last night in Boston, at which Dr. Howard Hanson was guest conductor in the premiere of his Concerto for Piano and Orchestra, with Rudolf Firnusky as soloist, were in the nature of an American Festival, which continues with two concerts for the next weekend, and two concerts in Carnegie Hall, New York, Jan. 12 and 15.

From his first season in the United States Kousevitzky has devoted himself to the discovery and performance of significant American music, in some cases by composers then unknown in symphony concerts. He also has commissioned works through the Koussevitzky Music Foundation, established in 1942, the Hanson Concerto being one of these.

In his current Festival Kousevitzky includes works by composers, most of them familiar to Rochester audiences also by reason of the Eastman School's own Festivals of American music, including Henry Cowell, William Schuman, Lukas Foss, Walter Piston, Leo Sowerby, Samuel Barber, Roy Harris, Edward Burlingame Hill and Aaron Copland.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REPUBLICAN

JAN 2 - 1949

Dr. Koussevitzky as Patron ~~Of New Mu~~sic in America

Founder of Berkshire Music Center Has Commissioned Many Modern Works, Encouraged Conductors Like Leonard Bernstein and Alexander Leslie

By VICTOR PRAHL

The concert by the Boston Symphony on Tuesday, the 11th, to be given under the auspices of our own orchestra, will be the musical event of the season not only because of the appearance of this famous organization here, all too rarely in recent seasons, but because it will mark the farewell appearance in this community of its distinguished conductor, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky.

During his 24 years as conductor of the Boston orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky's many musical virtues have long since became familiar to devotees of symphonic music. This is an age of great conductors. With Toscanini, Bruno Walter, Mitropoulos, Szell, Stokowski and Ormandy still wielding the baton, it is only natural that many should have their own preferences. But for catholicity of musical taste and understanding, as a forceful influence in the progress of American music, as an educator, and as the conductor of certain symphonic works, Koussevitzky is unsurpassed by any of these men. His interpretations of the Russian school, particularly those of Tchaikowsky, and of the French school, especially those of Debussy and Ravel, are incomparable. Fortunately, there are recordings of all these scores.

Progress in America

The visionary, the practical idealist, and the educator in Dr. Koussevitzky, were evident in his early pioneering Russian days when he chartered a large boat and took an orchestra of his own on a thousand mile trip down the Volga river to the Caspian sea, stopping along the way to give concerts and bring music to people who had never heard a symphony orchestra. The culmination of this side of his nature was, of course, the founding of the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood with its festival of summer concerts.

When the achievement of American music during this decade is recorded, it will be Dr. Koussevitzky more than any other one person who will be found responsible for its progress. Some native composers who have received commissions from him are Aaron Copland, Samuel Barber, Walter Piston, David Diamond, Roy Harris, Howard Hanson, Randall Thompson and William Schumann.

His patronage has not been confined to American composers, but Bartok, Milhaud, Honegger, Prokofieff and Stravinsky are but a few of the others who have benefited by his patronage in the matter of commissions and performances. And as for the champions of Shostakovich in this country, none have been more ardent and perservering than Dr. Koussevitzky.

Some 80 new American compositions have been heard under his conductorship, not to mention his numerous performances of works previously written by American composers. Dr. Koussevitzky is the last to acclaim all of these new works masterpieces, but well aware of the fact that creative music does not flourish in isolation, he has fanned the flame where he saw fit, by performances and with the encouragement of actual aid to those he considered most talented.

New Compostions

An enthusiastic public greeted the substantial new symphony by Walter Piston at Tanglewood last summer. as well as the more fragile but equally beautiful work by Darius Milhaud. And still a larger public will be grateful for the arresting "Concerto for Orchestra" by Bela Bartok. Masterpieces or not, they will enrich considerably the symphonic repertoire, and all three are certainly of more than passing interest. But for Dr. Koussevitzky, they might have gone unwritten.

Tanglewood is nearby, and its success as an educational experiment of far-reaching influence is recognized. The crop of young conductors who had the chance to try their wings for the first time and demonstrate their talents with a full orchestra are too numerous to mention. It is doubtful that Leonard Bernstein's rise to fame would have been so rapid without the encouragement and opportunities afforded by Dr. Koussevitzky.

Another gifted conductor more familiar to local audiences who benefited by his schooling at Tanglewood and has continued to be grateful for wise counsel and helpful advice in shaping the course of our own orchestra, is Alexander Leslie. What he has acomplished with the Springfield Symphony in a few years is nothing short of miraculous, the best example we know of the Koussevitzky influence.

The program in which Dr. Koussevitzky will conduct the Boston Orchestra on the 11th, is as follows:—

Concerto for Orchestra........Karl Philipp Emanuel Bach (Arranged by Steinberg)
Rounds for String Orchestra..David Diamond
Scythian Suite .... Prokofieff
Intermission
Seventh Symphony .... Beethoven

SALT LAKE CITY, UTAH
DESERET NEWS

JAN 3 - 1949

Second 'Missa' Concert Advised

By Conrad B. Harrison
(Deseret News Music Editor)

SPEAKING OF radio, the symphony friends who are not listening to the Boston Symphony Orchestra rehearsals over KDYL at 11:15 p.m. Mondays because of the late hour are missing a liberal education in symphonic production.

The only drawback to the program itself is that its half-hour is all too short.

Biggest asset is that the program sheds light on "moderns" and less familiar standard works.

DURING THE past two programs Leonard Bernstein has rehearsed the orchestra in a section of the Shostakovich Seventh Symphony and Dr. Serge Koussevitzky rehearsed the Third Symphony of Walter Piston.

To the interest of many local listeners will be Monday's rehearsal of the Roy Harris Third Symphony under Koussevitzky. This work was given an authoritative performance by the Utah Symphony Orchestra under the direction of the composer recently, and folks who found it a bit difficult to understand might do well to listen to the rehearsal broadcast

---

Boston Symphony Plays Hanson Work in Festival

JAN 1 1949

Special to The Hartford Times

Boston—It is an ambitious and interesting but not altogether satisfying series of works that has been chosen for the first of two programs in the American Musical Festival being performed by the Boston Symphony this week and next.

The major pieces selected by Mr. Koussevitzky include Howard Hanson's Concerto in G major for pianoforte and orchestra, and Walter Piston's Symphony No. 3.

Mr. Hanson's concerto, performed last night for the first time and conducted by the composer, was, despite its four movements, fairly short and limited in material. It contained, however, a coherence and restraint refreshing in modern music.

Mr. Hanson has told us that in this piece he would present an effort towards lyricism in contrast to the popular percussive affectations of the day. In this direction he is quite successful. The second movement is energetic, though not noisy, and the first ends in a delicate, careful series of piano notes that to us were intensely moving, spoiled only by the fidgeting of the audience.

* * *

RUDOLPH FIRKUSNY, the soloist, played with understanding and feeling for the score, the only possible criticism of his performance being one or two slightly uneven chords. The audience reacted well to him, though they did not perhaps give the concerto itself the applause it deserves.

Mr. Piston's Third Symphony is the other ambitious work on the program and it runs a rather distant second in attractiveness to Mr. Hanson's concerto. The greatest loss here occurs when the delightful, almost pastoral, melody of the second movement is suddenly lost in a storm of trumpets, kettledrums, and xylophones.

The third and fourth movements, ambitious and noisy, stand out only for their ingenuity which is at times remarkable enough to stimulate some interest.

The minor works on the program include Henry Cowell's Hymn and Fuguing Tune Number 2 for string orchestra. It gives an impression close to that of vocal works of early American tune writers.

* * *

WILLIAM SCHUMAN'S American Festival Overture seems a fairly commonplace work, though its heterogeneous clamor, suggesting in an eerie way the life and noises of the city, was undoubtedly less hackneyed when it was written in 1939 than now. Its tone reminded us somehow of Gershwin gone a little pretentious.

Recordare by Lukas Foss was again unmoving and too broken to produce any coherent effects. Although it was well enough conducted by its composer on this, the first of its performances.

Though the idea of the series of concerts of modern American music appears at first laudable enough, one wonders after hearing the first of them whether the ordinary listener, steeped in the more modern classics, will be able to take the bluntness and cold, mechanized ingenuity which seems to be their mark. Be it a weakness or otherwise, the average concert-goer is used to a little more warmth than he can find in these contrivances.—W.B.Jr.

PAWTUCKET, R. I.
TIMES

JAN 7 - 1949

Koussevitsky Made Harvard Club Member

BOSTON (UP)—Conductor Serge Koussevitsky of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has been named the first honorary member in the history of Boston's Harvard Club.

The famed conductor, who is retiring as the orchestra's head this season, was presented a scroll at a dinner given last night for him and the orchestra's 110 members.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

JAN 7- 1949

SCROLL TO ~~KOUSSEVITZKY~~

Guest at Boston Harvard Club —Made Honorary Member

Special to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

BOSTON, Jan. 6—Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, received tonight a scroll designating him an honorary member of the Harvard Club of Boston. He already holds an honorary degree from the university.

The conductor and his entire orchestra were guests of the club at a private dinner marking Dr. Koussevitzky's final and twenty-fifth year on the podium in Boston.

The presentation was made by Charles Watkins of the Harvard Club. Other speakers were John Kieran of New York, Henry B. Cabot, president of the orchestra; Boris Goldovsky of the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood and Irwin Hoffman, a former student at Tanglewood.

WOMAN DIES AT SYMPHONY

Alice Stackpole, 82, Is Stricken at Concert

Cal. Jan 8

Stricken with a heart attack as she sat listening to a symphony concert in Symphony Hall, on Huntington ave., Back Bay, Miss Alice Stackpole, 82, of 393 Beacon st., Back Bay, died before she could be taken into City Hospital for treatment yesterday.

For years Miss Stackpole was one of the most prominent members of Boston's exclusive society circles. Her sudden death came as a shock to social registerites.

She was born in Boston, the daughter of the late J. Lewis Stackpole and Martha Parsons Stackpole. She was a golfing enthusiast and took active interest in yachting affairs. For years she sailed her own boat in the waters of Buzzards Bay. She was a skilled artist, specializing in landscape and portrait painting.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

As heard yesterday afternoon, Dr. Koussevitzky's second program of American music made a better impression than its predecessor. There was nothing on this second list as inept as the Hanson Piano Concerto or as tentative as the Recordare of young Mr. Foss. The composers here assembled, Leo Sowerby, Samuel Barber, Roy Harris, Edward Burlingame Hill and Aaron Copland, all know their business, and, in the instances represented went about that business with efficency and despatch.

It is well that Mr. Sowerby's Fourth Symphony, the only premiere of the afternoon, came first. For despite its outward effectiveness, the piece is derivative and generally undistinguished. The temptation is to sum it up as: "Mr. MacDowell, meet Mr. Gershwin and Mr. Stravinsky." The Barber Violin Concerto, brilliantly played by Ruth Posselt, who introduced it to us seven years ago, shone by comparison. Mr. Barber writes not only with competence but with distinction, and his Concerto presents a succession of fresh and attractive ideas. Sooner or later, violinists are bound to be drawn to this work, though it gives them plenty to worry about. Miss Posselt surmounted its formidable difficulties with seeming ease.

The Third Symphony of Roy Harris, which had its first performance in Symphony Hall a decade ago is, and justifiably, the most famous piece in this particular group. Wholly individual, this is one of the outstandng compositions, not only of our country but of our day. To be sure, yesterday's audience gave it the cold shoulder. But unlike Messrs. Sowerby and Barber, Mr. Harris did not grace the occasion with his presence; and audiences sometimes get more excited over personalities than over pieces.

Mr. Hill's Music for English Horn and Orchestra, brought out by Dr. Koussevitzky in March, 1945, is utterly charming. The solo part was again beautifully set forth by that admirable virtuoso, Louis Speyer. After the trenchant music of Harris, these soothing pages were welcome.

The concert came to a stirring conclusion with Copland's "A Lincoln Portrait," in which Wesley Addy was the narrator, roundly declaiming above an orchestral accompaniment that at times threatened to drown him out, the selected excerpts from Lincoln's writings. In the first two movements Mr. Copland has given us pleasant bits of Americana that plausibly suggest Lincoln's background and provide a hint or two of his personality. In the third, however, the martyred President takes charge, and the composer, you might say, rides to the inevitable applause on the coattails of the Great Emancipator.

NEW YORK, N.Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE

JAN 9 - 1949

Koussevitzky Rehearsing

He will conduct the Boston Symphony in American programs on Wednesday night and Saturday afternoon in Carnegie Hall

PITTSBURGH PA

BOSTON, SATURDAY, JANUARY 8, 1949 Art—Music—Theater *11

ers—Festival of American Music

Second of Two Programs by Dr. Koussevitzky

By L. A. Sloper

Serge Koussevitzky on Jan. 7, in Symphony Hall, conducted the second of two programs which constituted an American Music Festival. Altogether 10 works by 10 composers were played. There were three symphonies, two concertos, and various pieces in other forms. There were three first performances, and most of the other works had been introduced by Dr. Koussevitzky in the last 25 years. The program listed 196 American compositions performed during Koussevitzky's directorate, and 13 recorded.

* * *

The brand new works offered were among the least interesting of the festival: Hanson's Piano Concerto in G major and Foss's "Recordare" (Dec. 31) and Sowerby's Symphony No. 4 (Jan. 7). The repetition of Cowell's Hymn and Fuguing Tune, Schuman's "American Festival" Overture, Piston's Symphony No. 3, Barber's Violin Concerto, Harris's Symphony No. 3, Hill's Music for English Horn and Orchestra and Copland's "A Lincoln Portrait" served to confirm the strongly favorable impressions made by them previously.

Barber's Violin Concerto was played by Ruth Posselt, who had taken the solo part here at a performance in 1942. Miss Posselt displayed the same broad, warm tone, technical proficiency and musical taste she had brought to the piece earlier. The concerto is notable in two movements for its melodic style and its romantic flavor and in the third for its lively, modern rhythms. It was raptuously received by the Friday afternoon audience.

Louis Speyer again served as soloist in Edward Burlingame Hill's piece, which is a characteristically charming work in the French manner, utilizing the woodwind to good advantage and exhibiting the Gallic virtues of clarity and restraint. Mr. Speyer played with his usual lyrical beauty and sense of style.

Wesley Addy was the speaker this time in "A Lincoln Portrait." In contrast to the Lincolnian appearance and drawl of Will Geer, his predecessor. Mr. Addy brought to his role a good voice and a strong dramatic feeling. His articulation was perfectly clear and his delivery showed that he understood the significance of the lines.

* * *

Leo Sowerby's Symphony No. 4 is not so much a symphony as a tone poem of affection for the city of Chicago. He begins with a fanfare of brass which presumably depicts the noisy brashness of a young and rapidly grown-up city, but presently lapses into a rather sprawling indulgence in commonplace nostalgia, and ends with an agitated movement which brings back toward the end the first turbulent opening strains. The work was well received and the composer was present to take a bow.

J. Abresch

Thor Johnson, conducting the Boston Symphony concerts of Jan. 18, 21, and 22.

BOSTON DAILY GLOBE—SATURDAY, JANUARY 8, 1949

MUSIC

Second American Music Program by Symphony Better Than the First

By CYRUS DURGIN

The second program in the American Music Festival, conducted by Serge Koussevitzky and performed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is better than the first. Even some who had found the first program, a week ago, almost unbearable, were chirruping about the Symphony Hall lobby, at intermission yesterday, that they were having a much better time.

To those of somewhat more sober reflection, this list is indeed an improvement. It contains the Fourth Symphony, in B, by Leo Sowerby; Samuel Barber's Violin Concerto, with Ruth Posselt as soloist; the Third Symphony of Roy Harris; Edward Burlingame Hill's Music for English Horn and Orchestra, with Louis Speyer as soloist, and a "A Lincoln Portrait" by Aaron Copland, Wesley Addy as Speaker.

The news of this program is the Sowerby Fourth Symphony, which was performed for the first time. It is a big, though not long piece, in three movements; tense, often loud and loosely bound up, expressively, with the spirit of a big city. Call it, if you wish, the "City Symphony." As someone observed, most of the orchestra is kept working all the time, perhaps due to Mr. Sowerby's pre-occupation with the organ. I was reminded of Henry F. B. Gilbert's waggish remark, years ago, that he had just improved a piece of his by taking out "a couple of barrels of notes."

The Sowerby work might benefit by the same trimming, for the texture is heavy and thick, and sounds pretty conventional. All the same, it is an interesting score that deserves re-hearing, for it is bold and vigorous, honest and direct. I think there are tunes, too, which probably would sound better with some of the tonal trees out of the forest. Mr. Sowerby bowed from the stage, and was well received.

The Barber Concerto is a truly delightful score, perhaps looking back toward the Romantic age a little, but music of high distinction and most effecteive for violin. The orchestral color is rich, and the whole work has an ingratiating lyrical quality that seems relaxed and simple, though probably it is very difficult. A more tender and musicianly performance than the gifted Miss Posselt achieved, is hardly imaginable. She, Mr. Koussevitzky and Mr. Barber collectively were awarded the biggest applause of the afternoon.

Roy Harris' Third Symphony, in one long and varied movement wears well. Here you have unusual construction and originality, a sense of ambitious creative ideas and a truly personal idiom. Mr Hill's dainty piece, setting off the English horn against an iridescent orchestra, is decorative and charming, not big or important. Once again Mr. Speyer proved his right to be regarded as one of the great masters of his instrument.

"A Lincoln Portrait" is not to be taken too literally. Music is comparatively abstract, and hymn-like measures, a snatch of square-cut dance rhythm and piled-up sonorities, topped off with a terrific final chord, are not necessarily a "portrait" of anyone. When those great words of Lincoln, still ringing down the years, are begun by the Speaker, the music becomes insignificant. But don't mistake me, the work is well done and attractive. I do not think it Copland's best, however; "Quiet City," "Appalachian Spring" and his Third Symphony beat it a mile. Mr. Addy delivered a superb voicing of the text, blemished a little, twice, when Mr. Koussevitzky hurried the orchestra into loud chords that almost drowned the Speaker.

All in all, this American Music Festival has proved absorbing. In the case of Piston, Schuman, Barber and Harris, it has brought some of the finest American music yet written.

SUNDAY, JANUARY 9, 1949

Hartt School's Modern Series Opens Jan. 12

Six American Composers Appear in Institute's Programs at Hartford

Six American composers will take part in the Institute of Contemporary American Music series, to be held in Hartford, Conn., under the auspices of the Julius Hartt School of Music, 187 Broad Street. There will be six public concerts, each devoted to the works of one composer, which will be performed by students and faculty members of the Hartt School. The composer will address the audience and take part in a forum session.

Otto Luening, of Columbia University, will be represented at the first concert next Wednesday night at 8:30, and will speak on "The Composer and the Community." The other composers to be represented and the subjects of their talks are Virgil Thomson, music critic of the Herald Tribune, "Performing Modern Music"; Walter Piston, of Harvard Uni-

---

PAGE FOUR B

Mutual Admiration Society--- The American Composers

By RUDOLPH ELIE

After the recent festival of American music given us by Dr. Koussevitzky, I have come reluctantly to the conclusion that the trouble with American music is that American composers do not hate one another as composers used to in the good old days. Indeed, according to my theory there will never be any really good and lasting music by Americans until the honeymoon is over, so to speak, and the Harrises no longer speak to the Barbers, the Schumans no longer have truck with the Copelands and the Pistons cut the Porters dead.

As it is today they are not only the ones who most admire American music, but the ones who most admire each other. For their union or guild or league or whatever they call it is not merely to enforce better royalties, better working conditions and other honest benefits as ASCAP does, it is really a lodge of mutual admiration which operates, so far as I can make out from their journal, as follows:

I MAY BE WRONG, BUT I THINK YOU'RE WONDERFUL

(a play in one act)

(The scene is the club room of the Amalgamated Brotherhood of American Composers, Inc.)

Jones: Well, Smith old fellow, I see Koussevitzky did your "Chorale and Fugue on the Bill of Rights" the other day. Admirable piece.

Smith: It's kind of you to say so. Got bad notices in the press.

Jones: Don't tell me YOU read critics!

Smith: No, no, just heard somebody talking. But you really like the piece?

Jones: Marvelous. What a stretto in the Fugue! Now in my own Passacaglia on "Lincoln's Letter to Mrs. Bixby——"

Smith (interrupting): You probably didn't notice it, but that stretto contains a quadruple inversion on the fourth subject in augmented diminution.

Jones: Of course I noticed it! But what I liked best was the combination of piccolo and bass drum in the Chorale. Beautiful, beautiful!

Smith: Ah, but your own pedal point in the "Ricercare on the Concordance to Carl Sandburg's Poetry With a Preface by Stephen Vincent Benet and a Foreword by Carl Carmer" in which you used all the notes of the C major scale with basses divisi—ah, that was in inspiration!

Jones: It was nothing, really. Not half so good as the Scherzo of your Symphony for Percussion and Piano Trio on a Theme Suggested by the 13th Amendment, in which you used all the major and minor keys in 11 bars.

Smith: The audience and critics didn't understand it.

Jones: They will, mark my word. Our time is coming in, roughly, 2094. Take my own "Overture to an Article in Harper's by Walt Whitman on the Marine Band of New York city——"

Smith: Ah, what clarity of thought, what nobility of mood, what grandeur of linear dissonant counterpoint, what——

Jones: Don't you think Koussevitzky took it too fast? Don't you think it would have sounded better if he'd taken it largo e mesto rather than larghetto dolore?

Smith: Sorry, old boy, but I didn't hear it. I only saw the score.

No, we'll never get much of anywhere until American composers come out of their lodge rooms and begin to write music for all of us, not for themselves. The impulse for creating music is a profoundly complex thing, and certainly one of the most important—and admirable—motivations is the seeking of recognition. Yet that recognition must come from without to be healthy; it cannot be drained off in gratuitous compliments, springing from those in the same competitive field.

As it is today, however, the composer finds his reward not in the popularity of his music but in what he considers the expert opinion of composers of equal technical attainment. Only these, he feels, are really competent to understand his work, admire it, and comment on it. He suffers real mortification only if his brother composers withhold their praise. Since they all belong to the same lodge, and since none of them know when they will be seeking similar recognition, this praise is always forthcoming.

The public? Well, the public be hanged. What does it know about music? Look at what happened to Beethoven, they say, or all the others. (It didn't happen to them, as a matter of fact; with few exceptions they were famous and repeatedly played and enormously admired in their own lifetime, even by critics.)

This, I am convinced, is a fatal attitude, and I can see no hope for American music until American composers meet on the street—and reach for their shootin' irons.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REPUBLICAN

JAN 2 - 1949

Dr. Koussevitzky as Patron Of New Music in America

Founder of Berkshire Music Center Has Commissioned Many Modern Works, Encouraged Conductors Like Leonard Bernstein and Alexander Leslie

By VICTOR PRAHL

The concert by the Boston Symphony on Tuesday, the 11th, to be given under the auspices of our own orchestra, will be the musical event of the season not only because of the appearance of this famous organization here, all too rarely in recent seasons, but because it will mark the farewell appearance in this community of its distinguished conductor, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky.

During his 24 years as conductor of the Boston orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky's many musical virtues have long since became familiar to devotees of symphonic music. This is an age of great conductors. With Toscanini, Bruno Walter, Mitropoulos, Szell, Stokowski and Ormandy still wielding the baton, it is only natural that many should have their own preferences. But for catholicity of musical taste and understanding, as a forceful influence in the progress of American music, as an educator, and as the conductor of certain symphonic works, Koussevitzky is unsurpassed by any of these men. His interpretations of the Russian school, particularly those of Tchaikowsky, and of the French school, especially those of Debussy and Ravel, are incomparable. Fortunately, there are recordings of all these scores.

Progress in America

The visionary, the practical idealist, and the educator in Dr. Koussevitzky, were evident in his early pioneering Russian days when he chartered a large boat and took an orchestra of his own on a thousand mile trip down the Volga river to the Caspian sea, stopping along the way to give concerts and bring music to people who had never heard a symphony orchestra. The culmination of this side of his nature was, of course, the founding of the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood with its festival of summer concerts.

When the achievement of American music during this decade is recorded, it will be Dr. Koussevitzky more than any other one person who will be found responsible for its progress. Some native composers who have received commissions from him are Aaron Copland, Samuel Barber, Walter Piston, David Diamond, Roy Harris, Howard Hanson, Randall Thompson and William Schumann.

His patronage has not been confined to American composers, but Bartok, Milhaud, Honegger, Prokofieff and Stravinsky are but a few of the others who have benefited by his patronage in the matter of commissions and performances. And as for the champions of Shostakovich in this country, none have been more ardent and perservering than Dr. Koussevitzky.

Some 80 new American compositions have been heard under his conductorship, not to mention his numerous performances of works previously written by American composers. Dr. Koussevitzky is the last to acclaim all of these new works masterpieces, but well aware of the fact that creative music does not flourish in isolation, he has fanned the flame where he saw fit, by performances and with the encouragement of actual aid to those he considered most talented.

New Compostions

An enthusiastic public greeted the substantial new symphony by Walter Piston at Tanglewood last summer, as well as the more fragile but equally beautiful work by Darius Milhaud. And still a larger public will be grateful for the arresting "Concerto for Orchestra" by Bela Bartok. Masterpieces or not, they will enrich considerably the symphonic repertoire, and all three are certainly of more than passing interest. But for Dr. Koussevitzky, they might have gone unwritten.

Tanglewood is nearby, and its success as an educational experiment of far-reaching influence is recognized. The crop of young conductors who had the chance to try their wings for the first time and demonstrate their talents with a full orchestra are too numerous to mention. It is doubtful that Leonard Bernstein's rise to fame would have been so rapid without the encouragement and opportunities afforded by Dr. Koussevitzky.

Another gifted conductor more familiar to local audiences who benefited by his schooling at Tanglewood and has continued to be grateful for wise counsel and helpful advice in shaping the course of our own orchestra, is Alexander Leslie. What he has acomplished with the Springfield Symphony in a few years is nothing short of miraculous, the best example we know of the Koussevitzky influence.

The program in which Dr. Koussevitzky will conduct the Boston Orchestra on the 11th, is as follows:—

Concerto for Orchestra........Karl Philipp Emanuel Bach (Arranged by Steinberg)
Rounds for String Orchestra. David Diamond
Scythian Suite .... Prokofieff
Intermission
Seventh Symphony ....Beethoven

SALT LAKE CITY, UTAH
DESERET NEWS

1949

Second 'Missa' Concert Advised

By Conrad B. Harrison
(Deseret News Music Editor)

SPEAKING OF radio, the symphony friends who are not listening to the Boston Symphony Orchestra rehearsals over KDYL at 11:15 p.m. Mondays because of the late hour are missing a liberal education in symphonic production.

The only drawback to the program itself is that its half-hour is all too short.

Biggest asset is that the program sheds light on "moderns" and less familiar standard works.

DURING THE past two programs Leonard Bernstein has rehearsed the orchestra in a section of the Shostakovich Seventh Symphony and Dr. Serge Koussevitzky rehearsed the Third Symphony of Walter Piston.

To the interest of many local listeners will be Monday's rehearsal of the Roy Harris Third Symphony under Koussevitzky. This work was given an authoritative performance by the Utah Symphony Orchestra under the direction of the composer recently, and folks who found it a bit difficult to understand might do well to listen to the rehearsal broadcast

---

Boston Symphony Plays Hanson Work in Festival

JAN 1 1949

Special to The Hartford Times

Boston—It is an ambitious and interesting but not altogether satisfying series of works that has been chosen for the first of two programs in the American Musical Festival being performed by the Boston Symphony this week and next.

The major pieces selected by Mr. Koussevitzky include Howard Hanson's Concerto in G major for pianoforte and orchestra, and Walter Piston's Symphony No. 3.

Mr. Hanson's concerto, performed last night for the first time and conducted by the composer, was, despite its four movements, fairly short and limited in material. It contained, however, a coherence and restraint refreshing in modern music.

Mr. Hanson has told us that in this piece he would present an effort towards lyricism in contrast to the popular percussive affectations of the day. In this direction he is quite successful. The second movement is energetic, though not noisy, and the first ends in a delicate, careful series of piano notes that to us were intensely moving, spoiled only by the fidgeting of the audience.

* * *

RUDOLPH FIRKUSNY, the soloist, played with understanding and feeling for the score, the only possible criticism of his performance being one or two slightly uneven chords. The audience reacted well to him, though they did not perhaps give the concerto itself the applause it deserves.

Mr. Piston's Third Symphony is the other ambitious work on the program and it runs a rather distant second in attractiveness to Mr. Hanson's concerto. The greatest loss here occurs when the delightful, almost pastoral, melody of the second movement is suddenly lost in a storm of trumpets, kettledrums, and xylophones.

The third and fourth movements, ambitious and noisy, stand out only for their ingenuity which is at times remarkable enough to stimulate some interest.

The minor works on the program include Henry Cowell's Hymn and Fuguing Tune Number 2 for string orchestra. It gives an impression close to that of vocal works of early American tune writers.

* * *

WILLIAM SCHUMAN'S American Festival Overture seems a fairly commonplace work, though its heterogeneous clamor, suggesting in an eerie way the life and noises of the city, was undoubtedly less hackneyed when it was written in 1939 than now. Its tone reminded us somehow of Gershwin gone a little pretentious.

Recordare by Lukas Foss was again unmoving and too broken to produce any coherent effects. Although it was well enough conducted by its composer on this, the first of its performances.

Though the idea of the series of concerts of modern American music appears at first laudable enough, one wonders after hearing the first of them whether the ordinary listener, steeped in the more modern classics, will be able to take the bluntness and cold, mechanized ingenuity which seems to be their mark. Be it a weakness or otherwise, the average concertgoer is used to a little more warmth than he can find in these contrivances.—W.B.Jr.

PAWTUCKET, R. I.
TIMES

JAN 7 - 1949

Koussevitsky Made Harvard Club Member

BOSTON (UP)—Conductor Serge Koussevitsky of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has been named the first honorary member in the history of Boston's Harvard Club.

The famed conductor, who is retiring as the orchestra's head this season, was presented a scroll at a dinner given last night for him and the orchestra's 110 members.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

JAN 7 - 1949

SCROLL TO KOUSSEVITZKY

Guest at Boston Harvard Club —Made Honorary Member

Special to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

BOSTON, Jan. 6—Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, received tonight a scroll designating him an honorary member of the Harvard Club of Boston. He already holds an honorary degree from the university.

The conductor and his entire orchestra were guests of the club at a private dinner marking Dr. Koussevitzky's final and twenty-fifth year on the podium in Boston.

The presentation was made by Charles Watkins of the Harvard Club. Other speakers were John Kieran of New York, Henry B. Cabot, president of the orchestra; Boris Goldovsky of the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood and Irwin Hoffman, a former student at Tanglewood.

WOMAN DIES AT SYMPHONY

Alice Stackpole, 82, Is Stricken at Concert

Stricken with a heart attack as she sat listening to a symphony concert in Symphony Hall, on Huntington ave., Back Bay, Miss Alice Stackpole, 82, of 393 Beacon st., Back Bay, died before she could be taken into City Hospital for treatment yesterday.

For years Miss Stackpole was one of the most prominent members of Boston's exclusive society circles. Her sudden death came as a shock to social registerites.

She was born in Boston, the daughter of the late J. Lewis Stackpole and Martha Parsons Stackpole. She was a golfing enthusiast and took active interest in yachting affairs. For years she sailed her own boat in the waters of Buzzards Bay. She was a skilled artist, specializing in landscape and portrait painting.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE

JAN 9 - 1949

Koussevitzky Rehearsing

He will conduct the Boston Symphony in American programs on Wednesday night and Saturday afternoon in Carnegie Hall

---

SYMPHONY CONCERT

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

As heard yesterday afternoon, Dr. Koussevitzky's second program of American music made a better impression than its predecessor. There was nothing on this second list as inept as the Hanson Piano Concerto or as tentative as the Recordare of young Mr. Foss. The composers here assembled, Leo Sowerby, Samuel Barber, Roy Harris, Edward Burlingame Hill and Aaron Copland, all know their business, and, in the instances represented went about that business with efficency and despatch.

It is well that Mr. Sowerby's Fourth Symphony, the only premiere of the afternoon, came first. For despite its outward effectiveness, the piece is derivative and generally undistinguished. The temptation is to sum it up as: "Mr. MacDowell, meet Mr. Gershwin and Mr. Stravinsky." The Barber Violin Concerto, brilliantly played by Ruth Posselt, who introduced it to us seven years ago, shone by comparison. Mr. Barber writes not only with competence but with distinction, and his Concerto presents a succession of fresh and attractive ideas. Sooner or later, violinists are bound to be drawn to this work, though it gives them plenty to worry about. Miss Posselt surmounted its formidable difficulties with seeming ease.

The Third Symphony of Roy Harris, which had its first performance in Symphony Hall a decade ago is, and justifiably, the most famous piece in this particular group. Wholly individual, this is one of the outstandng compositions, not only of our country but of our day. To be sure, yesterday's audience gave it the cold shoulder. But unlike Messrs. Sowerby and Barber, Mr. Harris did not grace the occasion with his presence; and audiences sometimes get more excited over personalities than over pieces.

Mr. Hill's Music for English Horn and Orchestra, brought out by Dr. Koussevitzky in March, 1945, is utterly charming. The solo part was again beautifully set forth by that admirable virtuoso, Louis Speyer. After the trenchant music of Harris, these soothing pages were welcome.

The concert came to a stirring conclusion with Copland's "A Lincoln Portrait," in which Wesley Addy was the narrator, roundly declaiming above an orchestral accompaniment that at times threatened to drown him out, the selected excerpts from Lincoln's writings. In the first two movements Mr. Copland has given us pleasant bits of Americana that plausibly suggest Lincoln's background and provide a hint or two of his personality. In the third, however, the martyred President takes charge and the composer, you might say, rides to the inevitable applause on the coattails of the Great Emancipator.

PITTSBURGH, PA

BOSTON, SATURDAY, JANUARY 8, 1949 Art—Music—Theater *11

ers—Festival of American Music

Second of Two Programs by Dr. Koussevitzky

By L. A. Sloper

Serge Koussevitzky on Jan. 7, in Symphony Hall, conducted the second of two programs which constituted an American Music Festival. Altogether 10 works by 10 composers were played. There were three symphonies, two concertos, and various pieces in other forms. There were three first performances, and most of the other works had been introduced by Dr. Koussevitzky in the last 25 years. The program listed 196 American compositions performed during Koussevitzky's directorate, and 13 recorded.

* * *

The brand new works offered were among the least interesting of the festival: Hanson's Piano Concerto in G major and Foss's "Recordare" (Dec. 31) and Sowerby's Symphony No. 4 (Jan. 7). The repetition of Cowell's Hymn and Fuguing Tune, Schuman's "American Festival" Overture, Piston's Symphony No. 3, Barber's Violin Concerto, Harris's Symphony No. 3, Hill's Music for English Horn and Orchestra and Copland's "A Lincoln Portrait" served to confirm the strongly favorable impressions made by them previously.

Barber's Violin Concerto was played by Ruth Posselt, who had taken the solo part here at a performance in 1942. Miss Posselt displayed the same broad, warm tone, technical proficiency and musical taste she had brought to the piece earlier. The concerto is notable in two movements for its melodic style and its romantic flavor and in the third for its lively, modern rhythms. It was raptuously received by the Friday afternoon audience.

Louis Speyer again served as soloist in Edward Burlingame Hill's piece, which is a characteristically charming work in the French manner, utilizing the woodwind to good advantage and exhibiting the Gallic virtues of clarity and restraint. Mr. Speyer played with his usual lyrical beauty and sense of style.

Wesley Addy was the speaker this time in "A Lincoln Portrait." In contrast to the Lincolnian appearance and drawl of Will Geer, his predecessor, Mr. Addy brought to his role a good voice and a strong dramatic feeling. His articulation was perfectly clear and his delivery showed that he understood the significance of the lines.

* * *

Leo Sowerby's Symphony No. 4 is not so much a symphony as a tone poem of affection for the city of Chicago. He begins with a fanfare of brass which presumably depicts the noisy brashness of a young and rapidly grown-up city, but presently lapses into a rather sprawling indulgence in commonplace nostalgia, and ends with an agitated movement which brings back toward the end the first turbulent opening strains. The work was well received and the composer was present to take a

J. Abresch

Thor Johnson, conducting the Boston Symphony concerts of Jan. 18, 21, and 22.

E BOSTON DAILY GLOBE—SATURDAY, JANUARY 8, 1949

MUSIC

Second American Music Program by Symphony Better Than the First

By CYRUS DURGIN

The second program in the American Music Festival, conducted by Serge Koussevitzky and performed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is better than the first. Even some who had found the first program, a week ago, almost unbearable, were chirruping about the Symphony Hall lobby, at intermission yesterday, that they were having a much better time.

To those of somewhat more sober reflection, this list is indeed an improvement. It contains the Fourth Symphony, in B, by Leo Sowerby; Samuel Barber's Violin Concerto, with Ruth Posselt as soloist; the Third Symphony of Roy Harris; Edward Burlingame Hill's Music for English Horn and Orchestra, with Louis Speyer as soloist, and a "A Lincoln Portrait" by Aaron Copland, Wesley Addy as Speaker.

The news of this program is the Sowerby Fourth Symphony, which was performed for the first time. It is a big, though not long piece, in three movements; tense, often loud and loosely bound up, expressively, with the spirit of a big city. Call it, if you wish, the "City Symphony." As someone observed, most of the orchestra is kept working all the time, perhaps due to Mr. Sowerby's pre-occupation with the organ. I was reminded of Henry F. B. Gilbert's waggish remark, years ago, that he had just improved a piece of his by taking out "a couple of barrels of notes."

The Sowerby work might benefit by the same trimming, for the texture is heavy and thick, and sounds pretty conventional. All the same, it is an interesting score that deserves re-hearing, for it is bold and vigorous, honest and direct. I think there are tunes, too, which probably would sound better with some of the tonal trees out of the forest. Mr. Sowerby bowed from the stage, and was well received.

The Barber Concerto is a truly delightful score, perhaps looking back toward the Romantic age a little, but music of high distinction and most effecteive for violin. The orchestral color is rich, and the whole work has an ingratiating, lyrical quality that seems relaxed and simple, though probably it is very difficult. A more tender and musicianly performance than the gifted Miss Posselt achieved, is hardly imaginable. She, Mr. Koussevitzky and Mr. Barber collectively were awarded the biggest applause of the afternoon.

Roy Harris' Third Symphony, in one long and varied movement wears well. Here you have unusual construction and originality, a sense of ambitious creative ideas and a truly personal idiom. Mr Hill's dainty piece, setting off the English horn against an iridescent orchestra, is decorative and charming, not big or important. Once again Mr. Speyer proved his right to be regarded as one of the great masters of his instrument.

"A Lincoln Portrait" is not to be taken too literally. Music is comparatively abstract, and hymn-like measures, a snatch of square-cut dance rhythm and piled-up sonorities, topped off with a terrific final chord, are not necessarily a "portrait" of anyone. When those great words of Lincoln, still ringing down the years, are begun by the Speaker, the music becomes insignificant. But don't mistake me, the work is well done and attractive. I do not think it Copland's best, however; "Quiet City," "Appalachian Spring" and his Third Symphony beat it a mile. Mr. Addy delivered a superb voicing of the text, blemished a little, twice, when Mr. Koussevitzky hurried the orchestra into loud chords that almost drowned the Speaker.

All in all, this American Music Festival has proved absorbing. In the case of Piston, Schuman, Barber and Harris, it has brought some of the finest American music yet written.

SUNDAY, JANUARY 9, 1949

Hartt School's Modern Series Opens Jan. 12

Six American Composers Appear in Institute's Programs at Hartford

Six American composers will take part in the Institute of Contemporary American Music series, to be held in Hartford, Conn., under the auspices of the Julius Hartt School of Music, 187 Broad Street. There will be six public concerts, each devoted to the works of one composer, which will be performed by students and faculty members of the Hartt School. The composer will address the audience and take part in a forum session.

Otto Luening, of Columbia University, will be represented at the first concert next Wednesday night at 8:30, and will speak on "The Composer and the Community." The other composers to be represented and the subjects of their talks are Virgil Thomson, music critic of the Herald Tribune, "Performing Modern Music"; Walter Piston, of Harvard Uni-

---

PAGE FOUR B

Mutual Admiration Society--- The American Composers

By RUDOLPH ELIE

After the recent festival of American music given us by Dr. Koussevitzky, I have come reluctantly to the conclusion that the trouble with American music is that American composers do not hate one another as composers used to in the good old days. Indeed, according to my theory there will never be any really good and lasting music by Americans until the honeymoon is over, so to speak, and the Harrises no longer speak to the Barbers, the Schumans no longer have truck with the Copelands and the Pistons cut the Porters dead.

As it is today they are not only the ones who most admire American music, but the ones who most admire each other. For their union or guild or league or whatever they call it is not merely to enforce better royalties, better working conditions and other honest benefits as ASCAP does, it is really a lodge of mutual admiration which operates, so far as I can make out from their journal, as follows:

I MAY BE WRONG, BUT I THINK YOU'RE WONDERFUL

(a play in one act)

(The scene is the club room of the Amalgamated Brotherhood of American Composers, Inc.)

Jones: Well, Smith old fellow, I see Koussevitzky did your "Chorale and Fugue on the Bill of Rights" the other day. Admirable piece.

Smith: It's kind of you to say so. Got bad notices in the press.

Jones: Don't tell me YOU read critics!

Smith: No, no, just heard somebody talking. But you really like the piece?

Jones: Marvelous. What a stretto in the Fugue! Now in my own Passacaglia on "Lincoln's Letter to Mrs. Bixby——"

Smith (interrupting): You probably didn't notice it, but that stretto contains a quadruple inversion on the fourth subject in augmented diminution.

Jones: Of course I noticed it! But what I liked best was the combination of piccolo and bass drum in the Chorale. Beautiful, beautiful!

Smith: Ah, but your own pedal point in the "Ricercare on the Concordance to Carl Sandburg's Poetry With a Preface by Stephen Vincent Benet and a Foreword by Carl Carmer" in which you used all the notes of the C major scale with basses divisi—ah, that was in inspiration!

Jones: It was nothing, really. Not half so good as the Scherzo of your Symphony for Percussion and Piano Trio on a Theme Suggested by the 13th Amendment, in which you used all the major and minor keys in 11 bars.

Smith: The audience and critics didn't understand it.

Jones: They will, mark my word. Our time is coming in, roughly, 2094. Take my own "Overture to an Article in Harper's by Walt Whitman on the Marine Band of New York city——"

Smith: Ah, what clarity of thought, what nobility of mood, what grandeur of linear dissonant counterpoint, what——

Jones: Don't you think Koussevitzky took it too fast? Don't you think it would have sounded better if he'd taken it largo e mesto rather than larghetto dolore?

Smith: Sorry, old boy, but I didn't hear it. I only saw the score.

No, we'll never get much of anywhere until American composers come out of their lodge rooms and begin to write music for all of us, not for themselves. The impulse for creating music is a profoundly complex thing, and certainly one of the most important—and admirable —motivations is the seeking of recognition. Yet that recognition must come from without to be healthy; it cannot be drained off in gratuitous compliments, springing from those in the same competitive field.

As it is today, however, the composer finds his reward not in the popularity of his music but in what he considers the expert opinion of composers of equal technical attainment. Only these, he feels, are really competent to understand his work, admire it, and comment on it. He suffers real mortification only if his brother composers withhold their praise. Since they all belong to the same lodge, and since none of them know when they will be seeking similar recognition, this praise is always forthcoming.

The public? Well, the public be hanged. What does it know about music? Look at what happened to Beethoven, they say, or all the others. (It didn't happen to them, as a matter of fact; with few exceptions they were famous and repeatedly played and enormously admired in their own lifetime, even by critics.)

This, I am convinced, is a fatal attitude, and I can see no hope for American music until American composers meet on the street—and reach for their shootin' irons.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
JAN 9 - 1949

CONDUCTOR AND AMERICAN COMPOSERS IN FESTIVAL PROGRAMS THIS WEEK

David Nilsson

Lukas Foss

Robert McAfee

David Diamond

David Nilsson

Walter Piston

John B. Sanroma

Serge Koussevitzky will conduct Boston Symphony in U. S. scores.

Howard Hanson

William Schuman

Samuel Barber

HEMIDEMISEMIQUAVERS: Howard Hanson will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra here on Wednesday for its performance of his Piano Concerto No. 1 with Rudolf Firkusny as the soloist. . . . Thor Johnson has been engaged to conduct three of the orchestra's concerts next week in Boston and Cambridge. The manuscripts of Brahms' Violin Concerto and Chausson's "Poéme," presented to the Library of Congress by Fritz Kreisler, have already been put on exhibit there. . . . Dorothy Merriam, Kansas violinist, was given the $300 Naftzger award as the finest young artist from her native state entered in the auditions held by the Wichita Symphony.

Houston Tex.
Chronicle
1/9./49

* * *

Koussevitzky, Concerto in F Minor, Victor:

The distinguished conductor Serge Koussevitzky, who will step down from his Boston Symphony podium at the end of this season, is a string bass soloist of fine technique and sensibility. It is seldom that he is heard playing his instrument and even rarer is a recording of Koussevitzky playing one of his own compositions on the bass. As a Christmas present to reviewers Victor dispatched a collector's item in the Concerto in F Mino, Op. 3 by Koussevitzky, with the composer-conductor handling the bass and Pierre Luboshutz, of Luboshutz and Nemenoff piano team fame, playing the piano.

It is surgingly romantic, at one moment plumbing sonorous deeps and at another singing along in a light lyrical line. This is the work written especially for bass of course, and the piano only occasionally is allowed to assert itself. the recording, not yet available to the public, is truly a collector's item.

KOUSSEVITZKY

NEW YORK, N. Y.
POST
HOME NEWS
JAN 9 - 1949

Boston Symphony Offers American Music Festival

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitsky conducting, makes its second appearance of the season in Carnegie Hall on Wednesday evening and Saturday afternoon, playing an "American Music Festival," with eleven composers represented in two concerts.

The Wednesday program lists William Schuman's "American Festival Overture," Lukas Foss' "Recordare," with the composer conducting, Samuel Barber's Violin Concerto, with Ruth Posselt as soloist, Henry Cowell's "Hymn" and Walter Piston's Third Symphony.

The Saturday program offers David Diamond's Rounds for String Orchestra, Irving Fine's Toccata Concertante, Howard Hanson's Piano Concerto in G Major, with Rudolf Firkusny as soloist, Roy Harris' Third Symphony, Edward Burlinghame Hill's Music for English Horn and Orchestra, with Louis Speyer as soloist, and Aaron Copland's "Lincoln Portrait," with Wesley Addy as speaker.

On Friday evening, Mr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra will appear at the Academy of Music in Brooklyn, offering Corelli's Suite for Strings, Diamond's Rounds for String Orchestra, the Hanson Piano Concerto and Brahms' First Symphony.

MONTREAL, CANADA
GAZETTE
JAN 8 - 1949

Downes Commenting

Boston, Jan. 7.—Olin Downes, author, lecturer and chief music critic of The New York Times, is commentator on Dress Rehearsal, the Boston Symphony Orchestra rehearsal programs originating here each Monday.

Anniversary Album Issued With Conductor as Virtuoso

Only three outstanding virtuosi on the doublebass have appeared in the last 150 years—Domenico Dragonetti, Giovanni Bottesini, and Serge Koussevitzky. According to the notes provided with the new RCA Victor album of Koussevitzky's doublebass recordings, these three men "appeared on the musical horizon in approximately 50-year periods and, in modern times, only Koussevitzky has shown to what heights the instrument can be raised for solo purposes."

It is true that Dr. Koussevitzky raised the bulky, awkward instrument to awe-inspiring heights. One has only to listen to these recordings—made in 1929 shortly before he gave up playing the instrument—to be aware of the accomplishment involved. But it is also apparent that the heights of a doublebass seldom exceed the depths of a cello. The novelty of a doublebass in a solo role has more value than the music thus produced.

This special limited edition of three 12-inch records, six sides, pressed on red Vinylite, was recently issued in honor of Ko[illegible]vitzky's twenty-[illegible] anniversary as conductor of the B[illegible] Symphony Orchestra. [illegible] from the album notes [illegible] he felt that they did not [illegible] what he had been a[illegible] plish on the double[illegible] today their historic val[illegible] him to approve [illegible]

The first two [illegible] to the second [illegible] Andante, from [illegible] own Concerto in F [illegible] He employs con[illegible] odies and diaton[illegible] the Romantic tra[illegible] greatest import [illegible] in the demonstration [illegible] be done on [illegible] through the use [illegible] and harmonics. [illegible] passage at the end, [illegible] treble clef, has a wei[illegible] ing beauty.

Side three is the Va[illegible] ture, another of Kou[illegible] works. It is light and fac[illegible] played in the high register. His Chanson Triste, Opus 2, [illegible] fourth side. In [illegible] are given a [illegible] lower, riche[illegible] tire set is [illegible] plays cello range. [illegible] his Chanson [illegible] ing tone, a [illegible] part of a [illegible] fiddle. Legato phrasing a[illegible] the instrument's wide [illegible] would combine to produce this effect.

The last two sides are given to Gustav Laska's Wiegenlied, a typical lullaby, and to the Largo movement from Henry Eccles' Sonata, of Handelian character. This Largo and the Chanson Triste have been released previously, but the other four sides are appearing for the first time. Dr. Koussevitzky is assisted at the piano by Pierre Luboshutz.

The proceeds from this album will benefit the Koussevitzky Twenty-Fifth Anniversary Fund of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

H. R.

[227]

PITTSBURGH, PA.
PRESS
1949

Charles Muench Both Conductor and Player Of Musical Instrument

Alsatian Artist Began Violin Study Before World War I with His Father

THE WEEK'S MUSIC CALENDAR

TODAY: Pittsburgh Symphony, Paul Paray conducting; Erica Morini, violin soloist. Syria Mosque, 3 p. m.
Fine Arts String Quartet; Harry Franklin, piano; Sidney Cohen, viola. Kaufmann Settlement, 8:30 p. m. Free.

TUESDAY: All-Senior High School Choruses, Carnegie Music Hall, 8 p. m.

THURSDAY: Stephen Collins Foster memorial program, Dr. John W. Oliver presiding. Foster Memorial, 8:30 p. m.
Vladimir Bakaleinikoff "Symphony Preview" lecture. YM-WHA, 8:15 p. m.

FRIDAY: Pittsburgh Symphony, Charles Muench conducting; Robert Casadesus, piano soloist. Syria Mosque, 8:30 p. m.
Pittsburgh 27 Community Concert. General Platoff Don Cossacks, Nicholas Kostrukoff conducting. Baldwin High School, 8:15 p. m.
Wilkinsburg Civic Symphony, Eugene Reichenfeld conducting. Wilkinsburg High School, 8:15 p. m.

SATURDAY: Don Cossack Male Chorus, Serge Jaroff conducting. Syria Mosque, 8:30 p. m.
Music Educators' Club, Wilkinsburg Symphony; North Boroughs Musicanters, L. Herbert Ostrander directing. Foster Memorial, 8 p. m.

By RALPH LEWANDO, Press Music Editor

The Pittsburgh Symphony's policy this season of bringing noted guest conductors is giving opportunity to patrons to learn more about the conducting art.

Already, the audiences have come to understand that artistic results can be brought about by different procedures of baton technique when employed by authorities.

This week end another highly praised conductor will lead our orchestra. He is Charles Muench, first brought to America by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky to conduct the Boston Symphony in 1946. At that time it already was in the cards that Mr. Muench would succeed Dr. Koussevitsky as musical director of the Boston Symphony.

Mr. Lewando

However, when Mr. Muench was engaged by Manager Edward Specter to come to Pittsburgh as guest conductor this season, announcement of Mr. Muench's appointment to the Boston post had not yet been made.

Mr. Muench will be Pittsburgh's guest for the coming two weeks and again for a week for the March 18-20 concerts following the Pittsburgh Symphony's return from its tour under Leonard Bernstein.

Mr. Muench, unlike some of the conductors familiar to Pittsburghers, was an orchestra player. The violin is his instrument.

Born in Strasbourg, Alsace, Sept. 26, 1891, Mr. Muench comes from a musical family. His father, a professional musician, founded the St. Guillaume Chorus in Strasbourg.

Studied Under Father

At home under his father's instruction Mr. Muench studied violin, harmony and singing. Before World War I the son was sent to further his violin studies with Lucien Capet.

In 1919 Mr. Muench was appointed professor at Strasbourg Conservatory and later conductor of the orchestra. Subsequently he gained experience in what was to be his career when he served under Wilhelm Furtwaengler at the Gewand-haus Concerts in Leipzig.

Returning to Paris, Mr. Muench founded the Orchestre de la Societe Philharmonique de Paris. In 1937 he became conductor of the Societe des Concerts du Conservatoire, succeeding Philippe Gaubert.

Mr. Muench visited America again in 1947 to lead the Boston Symphony and other important orchestras.

For his first concerts this week with the Pittsburgh Symphony Mr. Muench has chosen for performance the original version of Vivaldi's D-minor Concerto Grosso, opus 3, No. 11; Mozart's "Haffner" symphony; Liszt's A-major piano concerto with Robert Casadesus as soloist, and D'Indy's Symphony, opus 25, on a French mountain air, for orchestra and piano with Mr. Casadesus at the keyboard.

For the Jan. 21-23 concerts Mr. Muench's program includes Handel's "Water Music" suite; Mendelssohn's "Reformation" Symphony in D. No. 5; Debussy's "La Mer" and Berlioz' overture "Le Corsair."

Free Concerts

The 5th annual series of free chamber music concerts sponsored by the Irene Kaufmann Settlement Music School starts tonight at the IKS auditorium, 1845 Center Ave.

Performing the all-Beethoven program will be the Fine Arts String Quartet—Lorin Maazel and Max Mandel, violins; Vladimir Bakaleinikoff, viola, and Aldo Parisot, cello, assisted by Harry Franklin, piano, and Sidney Cohen, viola. The list includes the C-major quartet, opus 59, No. 3; cello-piano sonata in A, opus 69; and the C-major string quintet, opus 29.

Trust Funds of $600,000 Left Institutions

Trust funds totaling more than $600,000 and benefiting a number of charitable, cultural, religious and educational institutions are provided in the will of the late Arthur W. Moors, filed in Suffolk Probate Court yesterday. Moors, a retired banker, who lived at 171 Beacon st., died Jan. 8.

The estate is valued at between one and two million dollars. Moors also left personal bequests of more than $250,000. The Second National Bank of Boston is named trustee of these trusts:

$100,000 to Harvard College, in memory of his father, Joseph B. Moors, for scholarships for students of Latin or ancient Greek; $5000 to the Harvard Musical Association.

$160,000 for the First Church in Boston, with the expressed hope it "will go far towards enabling it for many generations to continue its furtherance of liberal religion in its present building;" $50,000 each for annual appeals of the Greater Boston Community Fund and for the support of the Summer camp of the Hale House Association.

$40,000 to the First Parish of Cohasset; $25,000 each to the Benevolent Fraternity of Unitarian Churches, to the Boston Museum of Fine Arts, and to the Hale House Association for its permanent fund. $20,000 to the Massachusetts General Hospital. $10,000 each to the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to the Mass. Congregational Charitable Society and to Peter Bent Brigham Hospital, and $5000 to the Massachusetts General Hospital for a "free bed."

The Boston Safe Deposit & Trust Company is named as trustee for $15,000 left to the Permanent Charity Fund.

After the specific personal bequests, the remainder of the estate is split into 100 parts, of which 25 parts goes to Harvard College for the permanent fund; 10 parts each to the Boston Museum of Fine Arts, to the trustee for the First Church in Boston, to the Community Fund and to the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Five parts each to the trustee for the Permanent Charity Fund, to the Children's Hospital and to the Massachusetts General Hospital. Five parts to a niece, Adelaide M. Pratt, and the remaining 15 parts to nine grandchildren of Mr. Moors' sister, Maria M. Cabot.

Outright personal bequests of $50,000 each are made to the testator's sister, Adelaide M. Brown of 304 Beacon st., and to Catherine C. Fyffe, for many years the attendant of his late wife, and later his own attendant; $30,000 to the niece, Adelaide M. Pratt; $20,000 each to Mary P. Bradstreet of Middleton, widow of the testator's long-time employee, Harry H. Bradstreet and to Frances N. Cochrane of Lexington, in his employ.

$10,000 each to his brother, John F. Moors, to a niece, Eleanor Cabot Bradley of 242 Beacon st., to two nephews, John M. Cabot of Shanghai, China, and Thomas D. Cabot of 31 Farm road, Weston, and to Virginia M. Bell.

$5000 each to Lucy K. Keene of Lynn; Rev. Charles E. Park of Boston; Jane Cabot Reid of Ankara, Turkey; Catherine R. Cabot; Leila M. Johnson of Milton; Delinda I. Harding of Milton and Ada F. Iselin of Milton; $3000 to an employee, Andrew Crawford of Cohasset.

$2000 each to Elizabeth Johnson of Cambridge; M. Eloise Talbot of Brookline; Bertha Langmaid of Boston and to Helen W. Stearns of Quincy; $2500 to William F. Fyffe of New Bedford; $1000 each to the Employees' Pension Fund of the Union Club, and to Edith Lindblom of Cambridge, and $500 to Patrick Muldoon of Boston, an employee.

$50,000 is left in trust to Edith B. Fisher, sister of Mr. Moors' late wife. On her death, the income goes to the Greater Boston Community Fund.

All real estate in Cohasset is left to his brother, John F. Moors of 150 Fisher av., Brookline.

The will was [illegible] 2[illegible], 1948. Named executors are the Second National Bank and [illegible] E. Smith of Winchester. [illegible] Elliott B. Church of 84 State st. filed the will.

RCA-Victor Unveils New Disks, Denying It Is in a 'Trade War'

Manie Sacks, vice president of Columbia Records, compares the conventional twelve-inch disk with one of the company's seven-inchers which revolve 33 1/3 times a minute.

RCA/ Victor's seven-inch disks, which revolve forty-five times per minute, with new record changer. The New York Times

A new system of reproducing music from records was announced yesterday by RCA-Victor Records, together with a denial that it was engaged in any "trade war" with its chief competitor in the record field, Columbia Records, Inc.

A day after Columbia made public details of its new 7-inch "microgroove" record—a development of its long-playing disks—the RCA-Victor management demonstrated its new system, involving new-type records, record-changers and turntables.

Although there are many similarities between the records of the two companies—they are the same size, made of unbreakable vinylite, and have hundreds of grooves an inch—they differ in one important respect: they play at different turn-table speeds.

The new Victor records, which will go on sale about April 1, revolve 45 times a minute; the new Columbia records, which will reach stores before the end of the month, turn 33 1/3 times a minute; and conventional shellac records, used at present by 16,000,000 owners of record-playing machines, revolve 78 times a minute.

As a result, neither of the two new-type records can be used on competing phonographs and neither can be played on conventional phonographs without adding additional mechanism. Considerable confusion has developed among record-buyers, according to trade circles. One retailer described the public as "just disgusted."

In presenting their new systems at a press demonstration yesterday, RCA-Victor officials said it was based on a "revolutionary" automatic record-changer mechanism. Up to eight records can be placed on a 1½ inch center spindle that houses the drop mechanism. The period of silence during which the record change was timed at less than three seconds.

Because of this speed, RCA officials said, listeners could enjoy up to forty-two minutes of relatively unbroken, distortion-free music.

Continued on Page 36, Column 6

RCA-VICTOR SHOWS NEW DISK PROCESS

Continued From Page 29

For this reason, they added, the company would manufacture only 7-inch records of the new type, in both classical albums and popular music.

This contrasts with the Columbia records, which were introduced in the LP category last June. Columbia puts its classical albums on one LP record of 10 or 12 inches and will press shorter classical pieces and popular music on the new 7-inch record.

The RCA-Victor announcement said the new system provided "completely distortion-free music of unprecedented brilliance and clarity of tone."

Frank M. Folsom, president of the Radio Corporation of America, parent body of RCA-Victor Records, said stories of a "trade war" btaween his company and Columbia were "not quite accurate."

"I think it's a normal commercial competitive job that people do every day in business," he added.

Saw the Columbia Disks

He reported that Columbia had shown him its new records in late April, about forty-five or sixty days before they were released. He added that at a second meeting with the Columbia officials he told them that he was "not sure" that the 33 1/3-rpm. system was best.

"I do not regard this as any warfare with Columbia," he said.

His assistants insisted that the 45-rpm. machine gave "the highest fidelity we know of."

"This is the best phonograph record ever made," said J. G. Wilson, executive vice president of RCA. "It was developed jointly with its own unique record player. The combination of these two makes available to the American home recorded music of a quality and fidelity never before possible at low cost."

Questioned about the cost of the new records, the RCA officials would say only that they would be "competitively priced." Columbia has announced that its 7-inch record would cost 90 cents in the classical field and 60 cents for popular disks.

Available Without Cost

As Columbia did on the previous day, RCA announced that its new system would be available to other manufacturers without cost. Joseph B. Elliott, a vice president of RCA-Victor, said blueprints and specifications already were in the hands of changer and set manufacturers.

Later in the day Edward Wallerstein, chairman of the board of Columbia Records, said, "We are unable to fathom the purpose of the records revolving at 45-rpm, which we understand are to be released sometime in the spring."

He described the Columbia "microgroove" system as containing maximum flexibility for both classical and popular recordings and added:

"We do not see what additional advantages a 45-rpm record can offer to compensate for the unfortunate conflict it appears to be creating in the minds of both public and industry."

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
NEWS

JAN 11 1949

CITY EXTENDS KOUSSEVITZKY WARM GREETING

Delegation Meets Noted Conductor at Station as He Arrives Today

The City of Springfield figuratively laid out the red carpet this afternoon to welcome one of the world's most famous musicians, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, on what will prove his farewell appearance in Springfield with the Boston Symphony Orchestra this evening.

High city officials, headed by Mayor Daniel Brunton, executives of the Springfield Orchestra Association, and a crowd of curious onlookers were on hand, when the train pulled into Union Station about 1.30 p. m.

Mayor Brunton extended the greetings of the city to the distinguished visitor, who this year is completing 25 years as director of the Boston Symphony, and who plans to go into retirement after the conclusion of the summer series at Tanglewood.

The Boston Symphony director is known not only for his purely musicially qualities, but even more for his pioneer work in the promotion of modern music, and particularly modern American music. He has probably been responsible, more than any other living conductor, for his encouragement of modern composition, and his programs, such as the one he will conduct at the Auditorium tonight, have always been sprinkled with what have become known as "modern classics."

Also on hand to meet Dr. Kouseevitzky were Alexander Nathanson, president of the Springfield Orchestra Association; Mrs. Douglas Wallace, vice-president; Frederick B. Robinson and Wallace Dibble of the association's executive board. Dr. Koussevitzky was welcomed at the foot of the station steps and was then whisked to the Sheraton Hotel with a motorcycle escort provided by Chief of Police Raymond P. Gallagher. He was accompanied by George E. Judd, business manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

At the hotel, he was met by Alexander H. Leslie, conductor of the Springfield Symphony Orchestra, which is sponsoring this concert by the Boston Symphony.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
MORNING UNION

JAN 12 1949

Dr. Koussevitzky Here In Farewell Concert

Famed Director of Boston Symphony Orchestra Has Taken Unusual Interest in Local Organization

By WILLARD M. CLARK

There was a very special and nostalgic interest last night in the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concert here directed by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, and sponsored by the Springfield Symphony Orchestra Association. For it marked Dr. Koussevitzky's last appearance here as director of the orchestra. It was on Jan. 4, 1925, that Dr. Koussevitzky first came here as conductor of the B.S.O. He has appeared here at the head of the famous organization 13 times, the last being on Jan. 4, 1944. During the interim, Richard Burgin conducted twice, and Sir Adrian Boult, once.

Dr. Koussevitzky, ever ready to help a new orchestra, to assist an American conductor, has been generous with his time and knowledge in assisting our own Springfield Symphony orchestra and its founder and conductor, Alexander Leslie. Just as he has been a champion of the American composer, so has he lent his prestige and priceless fund of wisdom to the American orchestra and the American conductor. Serge Koussevitzky will be remembered as the friend of the Springfield Symphony.

The part that the Boston Symphony has played in the musical life of Springfield is greater than the majority of people realizes. The orchestra has made a real and vital contribution from its first concert on April 7, 1886 to the concert given last night, Jan. 11, 1949. During this period the Boston Symphony Orchestra has appeared here 43 times.

His program last night again revealed the catholicity of his tastes. From the "Concerto in D Major" for stringed instruments, by C. P. E. Bach, it ranged to "Rounds for String Orchestra" by David Diamond, to the "Scythian Suite" by Prokofieff and back to the ever-monumental symphony No. 7 of Beethoven.

There was definitely "something in the air" last night. It seemed as though every member of the orchestra was determined to make this concert a gala event. One heard magnificent, flawless playing. One felt for the last time, the unhurried, searching interpretation of one of our outstanding contributors to the music of the world.

PITTSFIELD, MASS.
BERKSHIRE EAGLE

JAN 12 1949

Koussevitzky, on Last Tour, Paid Homage in Springfield

By JAY C. ROSENFELD

The city of Springfield paid Serge Koussevitzky official homage yesterday but the huge audience which filled its municipal auditorium accorded him a more spontaneous tribute of veneration which was even more touching to the peerless conductor. Appearing as leader of the Boston Symphony orchestra, with which he is completing 25 years of matchless service, Koussevitzky demonstrated all the attributes which have won him the enviable position he holds in American and international music.

In a program half novelty and half of dignified classics, he piloted his famous band of musicians through spaces in which mere earthbound progress would have been too limited and hampering. He virtually took off in "Rounds for string orchestra" of David Diamond and Prokofieff's Scythian suite, "Ala and Lolli," this latter the composer's very early effort in the days of the Diaghileff epoch.

Leader's Pace Taxes Orchestra

Diamond's music is furiously vigorous. Koussevitzky was relentless on the strings in his demands for frenzied speed. On a rather thin framework the composer has written an exercise which is impressive by sheer cumulative weight. The conductor went forward headlong and breakneck at a pace which taxed even the formidable Boston string section. Heroically, they supplied nearly all he demanded. The Prokofieff is fantastically barbaric. At this point, after the opening Emanuel Bach D major concerto for stringed instruments and the Diamond, the brass of the orchestra made its initial appearance of the evening. Prokofieff, and Koussevitzky, had them giving all they can possibly blow for weird, pagan and unrestrained noisy effects. The music is as inciting as it is exciting. Under the sensational delirium of the marvelously contrived orchestration, the audience was raised to a pitch ready for mob action rather than for deeds of thoughts of more noble spirit.

These two bold-colored exhibits were contained within a program starting with the Bach and ending with a Beethoven symphony, wherein the orchestra and its leader could show another side of their capabilities. In the very first notes of the Bach allegro, the Boston strings made evident the quality which is the criterion of orchestral playing the world over.

A firm tone, produced with ease and relaxation, and responding to the last degree of Koussevitzky's sensitive imagination, gave this introductory statement a high stature. The conductor squeezed the very last drop from the searchingly tender lento.

The orchestra is swinging around the circuit of a short tour starting with this concert. They will play a variety of programs which will include two of the standard symphonies. Koussevitzky gave himself a mild jolt, we were surreptitiously informed, when he came out after intermission. He stepped up onto the podium expecting to play the Brahms first, he thought, but found that the librarian had (correctly) placed there the Beethoven seventh. This caused only the slightest inward shock, however, for he forthwith proceeded to draw on that marvelous insight and experience he has accumulated with this orchestra as well as all the dowry he brought to them a quarter century ago. Such a performance is the result of years of polishing and adjusting and tempering, not the mere replaying of an old record, each time faintly the worse for wear. On the contrary, with each succeeding repetition, it becomes a little more exalted, more spacious and genuine, more the zenith of musical expression as we know it here in the middle of the 20th century. After half a dozen recalls, which he shared with the members of the orchestra, and after the audience had also risen to better express their enthusiasm, Koussevitzky finally tugged Richard Burgin, his concertmaster, by the elbow to take him and his fellow-musicians offstage for the completion of the evening.

Wednesday Jan. 11

ky, on Last Tour, mage in Springfield

ROSENFELD

pringfield paid Serge official homage yeshe huge audience which unicipal auditorium acim a more spontaneous of veneration which was more touching to the peerless nductor. Appearing as leader of the Boston Symphony orchestra, with which he is completing 25 years of matchless service, Koussevitzky demonstrated all the attributes which have won him the enviable position he holds in American and international music.

In a program half novelty and half of dignified classics, he piloted his famous band of musicians through spaces in which mere earthbound progress would have been too limited and hampering. He virtually took off in "Rounds for string orchestra" of David Diamond and Prokofieff's Scythian suite, "Ala and Lolli," this latter the composer's very early effort in the days of the Diaghileff epoch.

Leader's Pace Taxes Orchestra

A firm tone, produced with and relaxation, and responding the last degree of Koussevitz sensitive imagination, gave introductory statement a h stature. The conductor squee the very last drop from the sear ingly tender lento.

The orchestra is swinging aro the circuit of a short tour start with this concert. They will a variety of programs which include two of the standard s phonies. Koussevitzky gave h self a mild jolt, we were surre tiously informed, when he c out after intermission. He step up onto the podium expecting play the Brahms first, he thou but found that the librarian (correctly) placed there the thoven seventh. This caused the slightest inward shock, h ever, for he forthwith procee to draw on that marvelous ins and experience he has accumul with this orchestra as well as all the dowry he brought to t a quarter century ago. Suc performance is the result of y of polishing and adjusting

---

N. ADAMS, MASS.
TRANSCRIPT

JAN 12 1949

Music Festival To be Expanded

Haydn and Schubert to be Added to Bach and Mozart Programs.

The annual music festival at Tanglewood this summer will be on a wider scale than ever before, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky declared yesterday at Springfield.

The famed conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, who is retiring from that position this season, but will continue as director of the Berkshire Music Center, said Maydn and Schubert festivals will be added to the customary Bach and Mozart programs. In addition, he said, the chamber music department will be expanded.

PITTSFIELD, MASS.
BERKSHIRE EAGLE

JAN 13 1949

In Brief . . .

The revelation, made at the Berkshire Hills Conference dinner, that Boston people don't come to the Berkshires, should come as no shock. We had long suspected that the Hub doesn't know we're here . . . John E. Donegan, the new Conference president, is the first professional hotel man to hold the job since L. G. Treadway in 1941. If he is as successful in promoting the Berkshires as he has been Pittsfield's Hotel Sheraton, the Conference can look forward to two feet of snow by the week end . . . Good fishing—not to mention hunting—to Henry Bower, elected president of Wild Acres Sanctuary, which he helped to found 20 years ago . . .

Judging from Jay Rosenfeld's report from Springfield, Serge Koussevitzky's last tour as conductor of the Boston Symphony will be a procession of triumphs. It looks as if the 1949 Festival at Tanglewood will be little short of riotous . . . With the news that the Electrics are to train at Marianna, Fla., former air base, many Pittsfield boys will reflect that spring in Marianna is likely to be a lot more pleasant in 1949 than in 1944 . . .

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
NEWS

JAN 11 1949

CITY EXTENDS KOUSSEVITZKY WARM GREETING

Delegation Meets Noted Conductor at Station as He Arrives Today

The City of Springfield figuratively laid out the red carpet this afternoon to welcome one of the world's most famous musicians, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, on what will prove his farewell appearance in Springfield with the Boston Symphony Orchestra this evening.

High city officials, headed by Mayor Daniel Brunton, executives of the Springfield Orchestra Association, and a crowd of curious onlookers were on hand, when the train pulled into Union Station about 1.30 p. m.

Mayor Brunton extended the greetings of the city to the distinguished visitor, who this year is completing 25 years as director of the Boston Symphony, and who plans to go into retirement after the conclusion of the summer series at Tanglewood.

The Boston Symphony director is known not only for his purely musically qualities, but even more for his pioneer work in the promotion of modern music, and particularly modern American music. He has probably been responsible, more than any other living conductor, for his encouragement of modern composition, and his programs, such as the one he will conduct at the Auditorium tonight, have always been sprinkled with what have become known as "modern classics."

Also on hand to meet Dr. Kousevitzky were Alexander Nathanson, president of the Springfield Orchestra Association: Mrs. Douglas Wallace, vice-president; Frederick B. Robinson and Wallace Dibble of the association's executive board. Dr. Koussevitzky was welcomed at the foot of the station steps and was then whisked to the Sheraton Hotel with a motorcycle escort provided by Chief of Police Raymond P. Gallagher. He was accompanied by George E. Judd, business manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

At the hotel, he was met by Alexander H. Leslie, conductor of the Springfield Symphony Orchestra, which is sponsoring this concert by the Boston Symphony.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
MORNING UNION

JAN 12 1949

Dr. Koussevitzky Here In Farewell Concert

Famed Director of Boston Symphony Orchestra Has Taken Unusual Interest in Local Organization

By WILLARD M. CLARK

There was a very special and nostalgic interest last night in the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concert here directed by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, and sponsored by the Springfield Symphony Orchestra Association. For it marked Dr. Koussevitzky's last appearance here as director of the orchestra. It was on Jan. 4, 1925, that Dr. Koussevitzky first came here as conductor of the B.S.O. He has appeared here at the head of the famous organization 13 times, the last being on Jan. 4, 1944. During the interim, Richard Burgin conducted twice, and Sir Adrian Boult, once.

Dr. Koussevitzky, ever ready to help a new orchestra, to assist an American conductor, has been generous with his time and knowledge in assisting our own Springfield Symphony orchestra and its founder and conductor, Alexander Leslie. Just as he has been a champion of the American composer, so has he lent his prestige and priceless fund of wisdom to the American orchestra and the American conductor. Serge Koussevitzky will be remembered as the friend of the Springfield Symphony.

The part that the Boston Symphony has played in the musical life of Springfield is greater than the majority of people realizes. The orchestra has made a real and vital contribution from its first concert on April 7, 1886 to the concert given last night, Jan. 11, 1949. During this period the Boston Symphony Orchestra has appeared here 43 times.

His program last night again revealed the catholicity of his tastes. From the "Concerto in D Major" for stringed instruments, by C. P. E. Bach, it ranged to "Rounds for String Orchestra" by David Diamond, to the "Scythian Suite" by Prokofieff and back to the ever-monumental symphony No. 7 of Beethoven.

There was definitely "something in the air" last night. It seemed as though every member of the orchestra was determined to make this concert a gala event. One heard magnificent, flawless playing. One felt for the last time, the unhurried, searching interpretation of one of our outstanding contributors to the music of the world.

PITTSFIELD, MASS.
BERKSHIRE EAGLE

JAN 12 1949

Koussevitzky, on Last Tour, Paid Homage in Springfield

By JAY C. ROSENFELD

The city of Springfield paid Serge Koussevitzky official homage yesterday but the huge audience which filled its municipal auditorium accorded him a more spontaneous tribute of veneration which was even more touching to the peerless conductor. Appearing as leader of the Boston Symphony orchestra, with which he is completing 25 years of matchless service, Koussevitzky demonstrated all the attributes which have won him the enviable position he holds in American and international music.

In a program half novelty and half of dignified classics, he piloted his famous band of musicians through spaces in which mere earthbound progress would have been too limited and hampering. He virtually took off in "Rounds for string orchestra" of David Diamond and Prokofieff's Scythian suite, "Ala and Lolli," this latter the composer's very early effort in the days of the Diaghileff epoch.

Leader's Pace Taxes Orchestra

Diamond's music is furiously vigorous. Koussevitzky was relentless on the strings in his demands for frenzied speed. On a rather thin framework the composer has written an exercise which is impressive by sheer cumulative weight. The conductor went forward headlong and breakneck at a pace which taxed even the formidable Boston string section. Heroically, they supplied nearly all he demanded. The Prokofieff is fantastically barbaric. At this point, after the opening Emanuel Bach D major concerto for stringed instruments and the Diamond, the brass of the orchestra made its initial appearance of the evening. Prokofieff, and Koussevitzky, had them giving all they can possibly blow for weird, pagan and unrestrained noisy effects. The music is as inciting as it is exciting. Under the sensational delirium of the marvelously contrived orchestration, the audience was raised to a pitch ready for mob action rather than for deeds of thoughts of more noble spirit.

These two bold-colored exhibits were contained within a program starting with the Bach and ending with a Beethoven symphony, wherein the orchestra and its leader could show another side of their capabilities. In the very first notes of the Bach allegro, the Boston strings made evident the quality which is the criterion of orchestral playing the world over.

A firm tone, produced with ease and relaxation, and responding to the last degree of Koussevitzky's sensitive imagination, gave this introductory statement a huge stature. The conductor squeezed the very last drop from the searchingly tender lento.

The orchestra is swinging around the circuit of a short tour starting with this concert. They will play a variety of programs which will include two of the standard symphonies. Koussevitzky gave himself a mild jolt, we were surreptitiously informed, when he came out after intermission. He stepped up onto the podium expecting to play the Brahms first, he thought, but found that the librarian had (correctly) placed there the Beethoven seventh. This caused only the slightest inward shock, however, for he forthwith proceeded to draw on that marvelous insight and experience he has accumulated with this orchestra as well as on all the dowry he brought to them a quarter century ago. Such a performance is the result of years of polishing and adjusting and tempering, not the mere replaying of an old record, each time faintly the worse for wear. On the contrary, with each succeeding repetition, it becomes a little more exalted, more spacious and genuine, more the zenith of musical expression as we know it here in the middle of the 20th century. After half a dozen recalls, which he shared with the members of the orchestra, and after the audience had also risen to better express their enthusiasm, Koussevitzky finally tugged Richard Burgin, his concertmaster, by the elbow to take him and his fellow-musicians offstage for the completion of the evening.

Wednesday Jan. 11

kky, on Last Tour, mage in Springfield

ROSENFELD

pringfield paid Serge official homage yes- ne huge audience which municipal auditorium ac- him a more spontaneous of veneration which was more touching to the peerless nductor. Appearing as leader of the Boston Symphony orchestra, with which he is completing 25 years of matchless service, Koussevitzky demonstrated all the attributes which have won him the enviable position he holds in American and international music.

In a program half novelty and half of dignified classics, he piloted his famous band of musicians through spaces in which mere earthbound progress would have been too limited and hampering. He virtually took off in "Rounds for string orchestra" of David Diamond and Prokofieff's Scythian suite, "Ala and Lolli," this latter the composer's very early effort in the days of the Diaghileff epoch.

Leader's Pace Taxes Orchestra

A firm tone, produced with e and relaxation, and responding the last degree of Koussevitzk sensitive imagination, gave introductory statement a h stature. The conductor squee the very last drop from the sear ingly tender lento.

The orchestra is swinging aro the circuit of a short tour start with this concert. They will p a variety of programs which include two of the standard sy phonies. Koussevitzky gave h self a mild jolt, we were surre tiously informed, when he ca out after intermission. He step up onto the podium expecting play the Brahms first, he thou but found that the librarian (correctly) placed there the B thoven seventh. This caused c the slightest inward shock, h ever, for he forthwith procee to draw on that marvelous ins and experience he has accumula with this orchestra as well as all the dowry he brought to th a quarter century ago. Suc performance is the result of y of polishing and adjusting

---

N. ADAMS, MASS.
TRANSCRIPT

JAN 12 1949

Music Festival To be Expanded

Haydn and Schubert to be Added to Bach and Mozart Programs.

The annual music festival at Tanglewood this summer will be on a wider scale than ever before, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky declared yesterday at Springfield.

The famed conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, who is retiring from that position this season, but will continue as director of the Berkshire Music Center, said Maydn and Schubert festivals will be added to the customary Bach and Mozart programs. In addition, he said, the chamber music department will be expanded.

PITTSFIELD, MASS.
BERKSHIRE EAGLE

JAN 13 1949

In Brief . . .

The revelation, made at the Berkshire Hills Conference dinner, that Boston people don't come to the Berkshires, should come as no shock. We had long suspected that the Hub doesn't know we're here . . . John E. Donegan, the new Conference president, is the first professional hotel man to hold the job since L. G. Treadway in 1941. If he is as successful in promoting the Berkshires as he has been Pittsfield's Hotel Sheraton, the Conference can look forward to two feet of snow by the week end . . . Good fishing—not to mention hunting—to Henry Bower, elected president of Wild Acres Sanctuary, which he helped to found 20 years ago . . .

Judging from Jay Rosenfeld's report from Springfield, Serge Koussevitzky's last tour as conductor of the Boston Symphony will be a procession of triumphs. It looks as if the 1949 Festival at Tanglewood will be little short of riotous . . . With the news that the Electrics are to train at Marianna, Fla., former air base, many Pittsfield boys will reflect that spring in Marianna is likely to be a lot more pleasant in 1949 than in 1944 . . .

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
MORNING UNION

JAN 12 1949

ACCLAIM KOUSSEVITZKY—Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, veteran conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was given a warm welcome upon his arrival here yesterday afternoon by Mayor Daniel B. Brunton, Chief of Police Raymond P. Gallagher and officials of the Springfield Symphony Orchestra. Left to right are Wallace E. Dibble, Mayor Brunton, Dr. Koussevitzky, Alexander Nathanson, president of the Springfield Symphony, and Frederick B. Robinson.

KOUSSEVITZKY SEES MUSIC AID AT TANGLEWOOD

Orchestra Conductor Notes Expanding Studies in Berkshires

The music festivals at Tanglewood in Lenox are making "a vast contribution" to musical interest in America, the magnitude of which is "impossible to estimate," it was emphasized by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, world-famous conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a brief interview he gave The Morning Union [illegible] after his arrival from Boston [illegible] the Sheraton yesterday afternoon.

Although he is relinquishing his work in Boston, Dr. Koussevitzky said [illegible] would continue as director of the Berkshire Music Center "as long as strength will permit."

More Chamber Music

"We shall go forward at Tanglewood again this coming season," he said. "We are expanding the chamber music department because of the great [illegible] of so many to study chamber music and we are planning to hold Handel and Schubert festivals in addition to the Mozart and Bach festival programs. We are always expanding at Tanglewood."

Dr. Koussevitzky, who is a man of medium build with gray hair and [illegible] complexion, wore a gray mixed [illegible] upon his arrival here yesterday and after having lunch in the dining-room of the Sheraton with George E. [illegible], business manager of the Boston Symphony, read and rested until [illegible] time last night. He expressed appreciation of the warm welcome [illegible] him at the Union Station by Mayor Brunton and officials of the Springfield Symphony Orchestra.

"I am delighted that Springfield has [illegible] symphony orchestra," he said. "It [illegible] wonderful thing for the city."

Musical Interest Growing

Dr. Koussevitzky said that the orchestra which he has formed among [illegible] alumni group at Tanglewood [illegible] be ready to give concerts. [illegible] with pride of the group and [illegible] accomplishments.

He said that he finds that interest [illegible] is growing throughout the [illegible] and he attributes at least [illegible] of this interest to the stimulation [illegible] music by the Tanglewood programs.

Dr. Koussevitzky and members of [illegible] orchestra will leave here this [illegible] for New York where the orchestra is to play at Carnegie Hall.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
POST
HOME NEWS
JAN 13 1949

Bostonians Play All-American Concert

By HARRIETT JOHNSON

Serge Koussevitzky, long a staunch protagonist of the contemporary composer, is devoting his two concerts with the Boston Symphony this week in Carnegie Hall to works by Americans. Last night's program included a first New York performance of "Recordare," by Lukas Foss, the Samuel Barber Violin Concerto played by Ruth Posselt, the Walter Piston Third Symphony, the Schuman "American Festival Overture," and the Hymn and the Fuguing Tune No. 2 by Henry Cowell.

Whatever the ultimate merit of each work performed, considered as a whole, the quality of the music was high. Every composition may not have been a masterpiece but each had an individuality of style. Together the works represented a cumulative creative force which has been gathering rapid momentum over the past 20 years. It was encouraging to see the conservative audience take in the concert with interest and equanimity. Only after two movements of the final work was there a noticeable exodus. And as the program was long, this was about the usual time that the few early birds start marching to taxis and busses ahead of the remaining thousands.

Mr. Foss, the youngest composer on the list, began writing his "Recordare" on the day that Gandhi was killed. This helps to explain, says the composer, its "tragic" character. To this listener, however, the music does not have this quality. An agitated middle section is bounded by an extended serene beginning, and the piece ends in much the same vein. Obviously written by a young man of big gifts, it is an interesting work, but not one of continuous emotional power. In his instrumental writing, Mr. Foss is still finding himself.

Mr. Barber in his concerto has written music which wears extremely well. The first two movements sustain a reflective melodic beauty through and the final "presto" is effectively brilliant. The whole has an inspirational mood and is compelling. Miss Posselt performed the piece with emotional power, richness of tone and profound musical understanding.

In spite of the formal atmosphere, the concert manifested something of the pleasant American-homecoming spirit.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
SUN

JAN 13 1949

The Music Makers

By IRVING KOLODIN

Lo! The Poor American Composer Has an Evening.

This being Serge Koussevitzky's valedictory season with the Boston Symphony, it is fitting he should devote one series of visits to the good works done on behalf of the American composer in his time. Three of the five scores heard last night in Carnegie Hall were products of Koussevitzky's own initiative; that he included a pair otherwise sponsored, is a heartening reminder that Boston still values talent more than personal kudos.

IRVING KOLODIN.

What seemed rather impressive about the evening as a whole was that one could listen to it as music, rather than American music. If William Schuman's "American Festival Overture" (the only one, incidentally, in which the nasty adjective appears) didn't appeal to me, it didn't appeal on other grounds than that it was American. I find it a hard, juiceless and mechanistic score, executed with brilliance.

For a dazzling contrast, consider the violin concerto of Samuel Barber. Both men were born in 1910, both pieces were written as each turned thirty. But it is scarcely believable they grew up in the same world, let alone the same country. I hesitate to fasten such a tag as the American Delius on Barber, but it may give an intimation of the refinement, poise and sensitivity of this score. Alone among all our composers, Barber studied to be a singer, as well as pianist and composer; which may be why he works so consistently in terms of melodic line, design and feeling. Ruth Posselt's superb performance was wholly in the mood of the score, save for some passages of the andante which she slurred in heavy "G string" fashion. Barber's finale is relatively weak, but it is—in this respect at least—among excellent company in masterpieces of the genre.

American composers are born not only in New York (Schuman) and West Chester, Pa. (Barber), but also in Berlin, from whence, at an early age, came Lukas Foss, whose "Recordare" had a first performance under the composer's direction. A brief orchestral work, which borrows its title from the section of liturgy meaning "to record" or "remember," it has no program, though the composer notes that it was written last year just after the death of Gandhi. The grim thought of a man of peace done to death by violence lingers somewhat in it, but I found the musical diffusion and structural vagueness more conspicuous.

The other composers to benefit from Koussevitzky's retrospection were Henry Cowell ("Hymn and Fuguing Tune No. 2") and Walter Piston ("Symphony No. 3"). The Cowell work treats the vernacular of early Americana with sober scholarship, evoking, as the expression goes, an atmosphere without doing much with it. Piston's symphony is a work to command infinite respect, if no great affection. It is, like the figures put into an adding machine, the exact sum of its musical parts, no more, no less. There is immense ease and neatness in the tangibles, but few of the intangibles—spirit, mood, emotion—that make music consequential. It was a gala night for Koussevitzky, as well as the composers, all of whom were present in a stage box that somehow managed to survive the precious burden. Six more will be honored on Saturday.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

It is a treat to hear Stravinsky conduct a program of his own music, even if he is not always its most persuasive interpreter; and fortunately it is not a rare one. What is unusual about the current pair of Symphony Concerts is that they offer not one Stravinsky but two: Igor the father and Soulima the son, the latter making his Boston debut as pianist in the Capriccio for piano and orchestra, which we have hitherto heard from Mr. Sanroma.

This auspicious debut of the younger Stravinsky was one notable feature of yesterday's concert. The others were the first Boston performance of two recent works, the Concerto in D for string orchestra and the ballet, "Orpheus," which was also receiving its first performance in concert form.

In the highly-colored scores of his earlier and more reckless days Mr. Stravinsky is less sensational than some other conductors. Perhaps it is just as well that we have lately heard the "Fire Bird" from Mr. Bernstein and "The Song of the Nightingale" from Mr. Ansermet. But everything yesterday was served up not only as the composer wishes us to hear it, but in a fashion to do it full justice. If I were to make any reservation it would be in regard to the third part of the Ode, with which the concert began. This epitaph moved me more when Dr. Koussevitzky first conducted it than it did yesterday. On the other hand, the other divisions, Eulogy and Eclogue, were as satisfactorily presented as everything else on the program, and no more could be asked.

This program began and ended gravely, all the gay and joyous music, and there was plenty of it, coming in the middle. Of the charms of the Capriccio we have twice been made aware. The Concerto was a pleasant surprise, as it has not been too favorably commented upon. Stravinsky has written in many styles. He can be spare and acidulous, but this Concerto is delightful from beginning to end. The corner movements are lively and frankly entertaining, the all-too short Arioso is of great melodic beauty. Who says Stravinsky can't write a tune?

The "Orpheus," on the other hand, was rather hard going. Heard in connection with the ballet, this somber music is no doubt deeply impressive. In the concert hall one must needs follow from the printed page the outline of the action and endeavor to visualize it. Yet he would be deaf who cannot discern in this music a grave beauty, a true nobility of utterance. Admittedly it is restrained, and lacking in contrast. The one moment of excitement is short, and the composer might have let himself go a bit more in the final apotheosis of Orpheus. Yet in music, as in writing, there can still be the emphasis of understatement.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
MORNING UNION

JAN 12 1949

ACCLAIM KOUSSEVITZKY—Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, veteran conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was given a warm welcome upon his arrival here yesterday afternoon by Mayor Daniel B. Brunton, Chief of Police Raymond P. Gallagher and officials of the Springfield Symphony Orchestra. Left to right are Wallace E. Dibble, Mayor Brunton, Dr. Koussevitzky, Alexander Nathanson, president of the Springfield Symphony, and Frederick B. Robinson.

KOUSSEVITZKY SEES MUSIC AID AT TANGLEWOOD

Orchestra Conductor Notes Expanding Studies in Berkshires

The music festivals at Tanglewood in Lenox are making "a vast contribution" to musical interest in America, the magnitude of which is "impossible to estimate," it was emphasized by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, world-famous conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a brief interview he gave The Morning Union shortly after his arrival from Boston at the Sheraton yesterday afternoon.

Although he is relinquishing his work in Boston, Dr. Koussevitzky said he would continue as director of the Berkshire Music Center "as long as strength will permit."

More Chamber Music

"We shall go forward at Tanglewood again this coming season," he said. "We are expanding the chamber music department because of the great desire of so many to study chamber music and we are planning to hold Haydn and Schubert festivals in addition to the Mozart and Bach festival programs. We are always expanding at Tanglewood."

Dr. Koussevitzky, who is a man of medium build with gray hair and ruddy complexion, wore a gray mixed suit upon his arrival here yesterday and after having lunch in the dining-room of the Sheraton with George E. Judd, business manager of the Boston Symphony, read and rested until dinner time last night. He expressed appreciation of the warm welcome given him at the Union Station by Mayor Brunton and officials of the Springfield Symphony Orchestra.

"I am delighted that Springfield has a symphony orchestra," he said. "It is a wonderful thing for the city."

Musical Interest Growing

Dr. Koussevitzky said that the orchestra which he has formed among the "alumni group at Tanglewood," will soon be ready to give concerts. He spoke with pride of the group and its fine accomplishments.

He said that he finds that interest in music is growing throughout the country and he attributes at least part of this interest to the stimulation given music by the Tanglewood programs.

Dr. Koussevitzky and members of the orchestra will leave here this morning for New York where the orchestra is to play at Carnegie Hall.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
POST
HOME NEWS
JAN 13 1949

Bostonians Play All-American Concert

By HARRIETT JOHNSON

Serge Koussevitzky, long a staunch protagonist of the contemporary composer, is devoting his two concerts with the Boston Symphony this week in Carnegie Hall to works by Americans. Last night's program included a first New York performance of "Recordare," by Lukas Foss, the Samuel Barber Violin Concerto played by Ruth Posselt, the Walter Piston Third Symphony, the Schuman "American Festival Overture," and the Hymn and the Fuguing Tune No. 2 by Henry Cowell.

Whatever the ultimate merit of each work performed, considered as a whole, the quality of the music was high. Every composition may not have been a masterpiece but each had an individuality of style. Together the works represented a cumulative creative force which has been gathering rapid momentum over the past 20 years. It was encouraging to see the conservative audience take in the concert with interest and equanimity. Only after two movements of the final work was there a noticeable exodus. And as the program was long, this was about the usual time that the few early birds start marching to taxis and busses ahead of the remaining thousands.

Mr. Foss, the youngest composer on the list, began writing his "Recordare" on the day that Gandhi was killed. This helps to explain, says the composer, its "tragic" character. To this listener, however, the music does not have this quality. An agitated middle section is bounded by an extended serene beginning, and the piece ends in much the same vein. Obviously written by a young man of big gifts, it is an interesting work, but not one of continuous emotional power. In his instrumental writing, Mr. Foss is still finding himself.

Mr. Barber in his concerto has written music which wears extremely well. The first two movements sustain a reflective melodic beauty through and the final "presto" is effectively brilliant. The whole has an inspirational mood and is compelling. Miss Posselt performed the piece with emotional power, richness of tone and profound musical understanding.

In spite of the formal atmosphere, the concert manifested something of the pleasant American-homecoming spirit.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
SUN
JAN 13 1949

The Music Makers

By IRVING KOLODIN

Lo! The Poor American Composer Has an Evening.

This being Serge Koussevitzky's valedictory season with the Boston Symphony, it is fitting he should devote one series of visits to the good works done on behalf of the American composer in his time. Three of the five scores heard last night in Carnegie Hall were products of Koussevitzky's own initiative; that he included a pair otherwise sponsored, is a heartening reminder that Boston still values talent more than personal kudos.

IRVING KOLODIN.

What seemed rather impressive about the evening as a whole was that one could listen to it as music, rather than American music. If William Schuman's "American Festival Overture" (the only one, incidentally, in which the nasty adjective appears) didn't appeal to me, it didn't appeal on other grounds than that it was American. I find it a hard, juiceless and mechanistic score, executed with brilliance.

For a dazzling contrast, consider the violin concerto of Samuel Barber. Both men were born in 1910, both pieces were written as each turned thirty. But it is scarcely believable they grew up in the same world, let alone the same country. I hesitate to fasten such a tag as the American Delius on Barber, but it may give an intimation of the refinement, poise and sensitivity of this score. Alone among all our composers, Barber studied to be a singer, as well as pianist and composer; which may be why he works so consistently in terms of melodic line, design and feeling. Ruth Posselt's superb performance was wholly in the mood of the score, save for some passages of the andante which she slurred in heavy "G string" fashion. Barber's finale is relatively weak, but it is—in this respect at least—among excellent company in masterpieces of the genre.

American composers are born not only in New York (Schuman) and West Chester, Pa. (Barber), but also in Berlin, from whence, at an early age, came Lukas Foss, whose "Recordare" had a first performance under the composer's direction. A brief orchestral work, which borrows its title from the section of liturgy meaning "to record" or "remember," it has no program, though the composer notes that it was written last year just after the death of Gandhi. The grim thought of a man of peace done to death by violence lingers somewhat in it, but I found the musical diffusion and structural vagueness more conspicuous.

The other composers to benefit from Koussevitzky's retrospection were Henry Cowell ("Hymn and Fuguing Tune No. 2") and Walter Piston ("Symphony No. 3"). The Cowell work treats the vernacular of early Americana with sober scholarship, evoking, as the expression goes, an atmosphere without doing much with it. Piston's symphony is a work to command infinite respect, if no great affection. It is, like the figures put into an adding machine, the exact sum of its musical parts, no more, no less. There is immense ease and neatness in the tangibles, but few of the intangibles—spirit, mood, emotion—that make music consequential. It was a gala night for Koussevitzky, as well as the composers, all of whom were present in a stage box that somehow managed to survive the precious burden. Six more will be honored on Saturday.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

It is a treat to hear Stravinsky conduct a program of his own music, even if he is not always its most persuasive interpreter; and fortunately it is not a rare one. What is unusual about the current pair of Symphony Concerts is that they offer not one Stravinsky but two: Igor the father and Soulima the son, the latter making his Boston debut as pianist in the Capriccio for piano and orchestra, which we have hitherto heard from Mr. Sanroma.

This auspicious debut of the younger Stravinsky was one notable feature of yesterday's concert. The others were the first Boston performance of two recent works, the Concerto in D for string orchestra and the ballet, "Orpheus," which was also receiving its first performance in concert form.

In the highly-colored scores of his earlier and more reckless days Mr. Stravinsky is less sensational than some other conductors. Perhaps it is just as well that we have lately heard the "Fire Bird" from Mr. Bernstein and "The Song of the Nightingale" from Mr. Ansermet. But everything yesterday was served up not only as the composer wishes us to hear it, but in a fashion to do it full justice. If I were to make any reservation it would be in regard to the third part of the Ode, with which the concert began. This epitaph moved me more when Dr. Koussevitzky first conducted it than it did yesterday. On the other hand, the other divisions, Eulogy and Eclogue, were as satisfactorily presented as everything else on the program, and no more could be asked.

This program began and ended gravely, all the gay and joyous music, and there was plenty of it, coming in the middle. Of the charms of the Capriccio we have twice been made aware. The Concerto was a pleasant surprise, as it has not been too favorably commented upon. Stravinsky has written in many styles. He can be spare and acidulous, but this Concerto is delightful from beginning to end. The corner movements are lively and frankly entertaining, the all-too short Arioso is of great melodic beauty. Who says Stravinsky can't write a tune?

The "Orpheus," on the other hand, was rather hard going. Heard in connection with the ballet, this somber music is no doubt deeply impressive. In the concert hall one must needs follow from the printed page the outline of the action and endeavor to visualize it. Yet he would be deaf who cannot discern in this music a grave beauty, a true nobility of utterance. Admittedly it is restrained, and lacking in contrast. The one moment of excitement is short, and the composer might have let himself go a bit more in the final apotheosis of Orpheus. Yet in music, as in writing, there can still be the emphasis of understatement.

TIMES
JAN 13 1949

U. S. MUSIC OFFERED BY KOUSSEVITZKY

Contemporary Works by Five Composers Are Presented at Carnegie Hall Concert

By OLIN DOWNES

Dr. Koussevitzky, leading the Boston Symphony Orchestra, gave last night at Carnegie Hall the first of two programs of an "American Music Festival" to be heard here this week. The program offered five compositions by as many contemporaneous Americans. All five composers were present in a box at the right of the stage. In turn they bowed after the performance of their works to acknowledge cordial applause.

The thought of this festival was not only to promote further the works of American musicians whose creations Dr. Koussevitsky has advanced, but also to mark the development which he believes has taken place in American compositions since two earlier programs of native music which he presented in this city and in Boston ten years ago.

The compositions performed were William Schumann's "American Festival Overture"; Lukas Foss' "Recordare," which Mr. Foss conducted; Samuel Barber's Violin Concerto, with Ruth Posselt as soloist; Henry Cowell's "Hymn and Fuguing tune No. 2," and Walter Piston's Third symphony.

Schumann Symphony Stands Out

We were most impressed by the compositions which began and ended the occasion, and above all by Mr. Schumann's Symphony. He writes with drive and gusto which are exhilarating. There is a little stammering, but the piece as a whole moves with a fine energy, conviction and escape from the conventional. A street cry he often heard as a boy gives the conductor his starting point. He develops it with resource and without fear, as it were, of the consequences! The introduction of a contrasting theme is a beautiful color and a lyrical movement.

In developing the ideas Mr. Schuman avoids not by deliberate planning, but rather because of a healthy pulse and impetuosity, conventional phase-lengths and stodgy rhythms. His fugal writing is vigorous and assured. His climax comes logically with the final exordium of the brass, and that too is good strong writing; dissonance which proceeds convincingly from the voice leading. It is the expression of a gifted young musician feeling his oats and not worrying about that either.

The one completely mature and individual work, which gains greatly upon this writer with repeated hearing, is Mr. Piston's Third Symphony. It came at the end of a program that was too long, but it held absorbed attention. It is an outstanding score, and so far as our knowledge goes, the most important work Mr. Piston has produced. The method is not merely contrapuntal and melodic, but harmonic, too. Subtle coloring, as well as significant line, is there. The scoring, when one looks at the printed pages, raises question as to how various passages will sound. When the instrumental timbres combine they do so with the result of tone-tints as well as the confluence of melodic voices.

Music That Attains Beauty

One would need to know as much as Mr. Piston knows of the technique of composition competently to analyze everything that he has done in this score. But that is not as necessity for the reader, and in any event that would not be the test of the music. This is music which seeks and remarkably attains, in page after page, a beauty which is higher and purer than that of the merely sensuous. And it is sustained musical thinking, especially in the slow movement, which is not only impressive, but intense in feeling.

The slow movement is not to be separated from the rest of the symphony, which lays the ground for what followed in the initial pages, but it would in itself mark an exceptional creative figure. Mr. Piston has been accused, not without reason, of a cerebral tendency. Here is the place where the cerebration, if such it is to be called, generates a tension which is both lofty as it is moving to contemplate. Beauty glaws at a certain white heat in many pages to excellence of others. What the ultimate valuation of this score will be it is as impossible as it is unnecessary to attempt to prophecy, but every movement is strong, close-knit, and with clearly established centers of tonality and construction. Salute to the composer and craftsman of such noble and impressively demonstrated purpose!

Mr. Foss' "Recordare" is for us a youthful indiscretion. There are some pretty ideas, but it is immature in scoring and in thought. The orchestration is unskillful, the form not vertebrate. Nor does Mr. Barber's Concerto convice us. It is much too long for its slight [illegible] good lyrical passages, and there is much padding. Melodies that have a short but pleasant character give place to passage work and to cadenzas that sound like exercises. Miss Posselt played the concerto very capably and in a way which must have gratified it [illegible]

NEW YORK, N. Y.
JOURNAL AMERICAN
JAN 13 1949

Koussevitzky Salutes U. S.

By MILES KASTENDIECK

Koussevitzky honored the American composer in Carnegie Hall last night. The gesture was a gracious one in his farewell season with the Boston Symphony. It is more than our resident orchestra has ever done in the interests of native music.

The program was the first of two comprising an "American Music Festival," the second of which will be heard on Saturday. Included in the line-up of composers were Schuman, Foss, Barber, Cowell, and Piston.

Foss conducted the first New York performance of his "Recordare." The American violinist, Ruth Posselt, was soloist in Barber's violin concerto.

Of the five works performed, the Barber brought the most satisfaction. It was the richest music, filled with lyric beauty and genuine feeling in two movements and a dash of brilliance in the third. Miss Posselt revealed these qualities in a performance notable for its communicativeness and its virtuosity.

Foss has created a mood of remembrance in his newest work. An expression of mourning sustains it. Without this unifying influence the fragmentary character of his ideas tends to separate it into sections.

His fertile imagination and his delicate handling of the instrumentation still need a finer sense of integration to bring compactness of impression. The music says something even though not altogether coherently.

Schuman's robust "American Festival Overture" supplied an appropriate opening. Cowell's Hymn and Fuging Tune, No. 2 and Piston's Third Symphony filled out the evening. These latter works suggested more of an academic approach to music than the other more refreshing numbers. Undoubtedly set forth in their best light, they sounded thoroughly respectable and a little dull.

Other Theatre News on Page 12.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
WORLD-TELEGRAM
JAN 13 1949

Music

Boston Symphony Serves a U.S. Dish

By LOUIS BIANCOLLI.

American music came of repertorial age last night when Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony opened an all-American festival in Carnegie Hall.

Scores by American composers have long figured on symphonic programs, and the all-American bill has cropped up occasionally. Festivals of American music aren't exactly new, either.

What is new this week is that a visiting orchestral unit of major standing is regaling its local subscribers with two programs devoted exclusively to modern American music. A few years ago the customers would have walked out in droves.

Last night's audience seemed to like everything it heard—from William Schuman's rock-ribbed American Festival Overture to the freshly confected Third Symphony of Walter Piston—from Lukas Foss's new "Recordare" to Samuel Barber's Violin Concerto.

Like all good things American, there was plenty of variety in last night's assortment—and of course every last item listed came wrapped in the glistening package that is Mr. Koussevitzky's specialty.

There was the festive frolic of Mr. Schuman, with its piercing "Wee-awk-ee" street cry of the local gamins. The rhythms of this tonic little score hold up sturdily in the passing years.

Young Schuman has moved far since first penning the overture a decade ago—moved towards wider symphonic vistas and calmer idioms—but the American Festival Overture remains his most rousing manifesto.

Twenty-six-year old Lukas Foss was on hand last night to conduct the local premiere of his new score, "Recordare,"—meaning remembrance—the title of which derives from the traditional Requiem Mass without retaining the ritual import.

Mr. Foss is as skillful as ever in maneuvering orchestral colors and just as imaginative in finding new ways of saying old things. At first hearing, the score seemed episodic and jaggedly held together, but there was no doubting the inventive power behind it.

Another dominant phase of the American scene—what might be called the ruggedly spiritual—was eloquently imaged in Henry Cowell's "Hymn and Fugue-Tune," a deft web of smooth and shining polyphony for strings.

Ruth Posselt's warm rendering of Mr. Barber's score was a reminder of three known facts—that she is one of the country's three best fiddlers on the distaff side; that the violin concerto is the best yet by an American composer, and that Mr. Barber ought to do nothing but write music.

Last night's symphony is probably the sturdiest and best knit score to date by the Maine composer. Its abiding warmth of speech and ringing fervor won Mr. Piston the Pulitzer award for 1948.

Mr. Koussevitzky's orchestra played all numbers last night as if they were repertory classics deserving the highest consideration, which they no doubt did—at any rate till a better batch of American overtures, concertos and symphonies comes along.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE
JAN 13 1949

MUSIC

By VIRGIL THOMSON

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, Serge Koussevitzky, [illegible] concert of American music last night at Carnegie Hall. Soloist: Ruth Posselt, violinist. The program:

American Festival Overture...William Schuman
Recordare ....Lukas Foss
(First New York performance, composer conducting)
Concerto for Violin and Orchestra ....Samuel Barber
Hymn and Fuguing Tune No. 2....Henry Cowell
Symphony No. 3..................Walter Piston

Serge Koussevitzky

Who conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night at Carnegie Hall

American Revivals

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night in Carnegie Hall, offered New York the first of two concerts reviewing certain high points among American music composed in the last ten years. Most of the pieces on both programs (the other will be played Saturday afternoon) have been introduced to the public by the good Doctor himself and are the work of composers whose musical growth has been the object of continuous encouragement on his part. William Schuman, Lukas Foss, Samuel Barber, Henry Cowell and Walter Piston were the writers honored last night. Lukas Foss's "Recordare," not previously heard in New York, was conducted by the composer.

* * *

This is a funeral ode to Mohandas K. Gandhi. Its material is a long-spun melody accompanied by single-note pizzicatti in uniform rhythmic spacing and alternated with brass passages of military connotation. It is pleasant of tune, a little thin of substance, as well as of texture, and definitely monotonous as to rhythm. Its expressive contrasts appeared to your reviewer as excessive in view of the work's not very great expressive intensity. As a whole, the piece seemed more ambitious in expression than its slender material and halting development were able to justify.

* * *

Henry Cowell's Hymn and Fuguing Tune, No. 2, for strings alone, is an extended and songful development in the diatonic model manner practiced by our American back-country forefathers. It sings; it soars; it leaps with joy. And always it is full of a great seriousness and a great dignity. I am not sure it is just the right length for an evocation of that kind. Myself, I should have preferred it longer. Certainly I was sorry when it ended, because it had made music all the way through.

Among the more familiar works, Samuel Barber's Violin Concerto impressed me as wearing well. Its tunes are gracious; its harmony is sophisticated without being ostentatious; its rhythm is always alive, and its instrumentation is delicious. It bears a musical refinement all round superior to anything of the kind heard last evening, though the Piston Third Symphony is a work of far more detailed elaboration and joinery. Barber's piece, moreover, is direct, plain and full as expression. Its weaknesses are a similar expressive content during two movements (this author's characteristic vein of elegy) and an overbusy third movement (a sort of perpetual-motion piece thin of thought). All the same it is a musical work, a real one, and can be listened to.

Too Laissez-Faire

Transcriptions for radio are done on records that turn 33 1-3 times a minute. For six months Columbia Records, Inc., have been selling microgroove records for home use that also turn 33 1-3 times a minute, permitting longer playing and greater fidelity than the conventional 78-turn discs. It would seem that a national standard had been set for a new long-playing record.

But here is RCA-Victor tossing a monkey-wrench by putting out a 45-turn record. And just as the 33 1-3 disc has to have special phonograph mechanism, the 45 disc has to have a still different playing apparatus. So, to the confusion of AM and FM radio, television and standard phonographs, the poor public must add two more complications.

Grudgingly we must admit it couldn't happen in Russia. The commissar for people's music or something would "democratically" decide to keep the 78-turn discs, since it is the disposition of efficient bureaucrats to discourage new developments that make existing machinery obsolete. The Russians have a simple existence maintained for them, like being in the army.

Here we have a lot of laissez faire. Automobile manufacturers make a variety of wheel sizes, so tires and chains can't be swapped around. There are endless variations in the shape and magnitude of storage batteries, so as to increase the inconvenience of replacement. Spark plugs, ditto. Faucet washers vary by tiny fractions, for no reason at all. It took the United States and Britain 50 years to agree on screw threads, and even in this country alone there are still two main varieties. By some near-miracle, we do have a pretty consistent track gauge for railroads, but even here there are a few lingering mavericks.

We wouldn't want a commissar for people's music over here. But any record company that makes the assembling of a music library more difficult and costly than it should be, will have to answer to public opinion.

[231]

NEW YORK, N. Y.
~~PM~~
STAR
JAN 14 1949

Music . . . by Robert A. Hague

Koussevitzky Takes All-American Bow

Some idea of the magnitude of contemporary American music's indebtedness to Serge Koussevitzky can be derived from the two-part American Music Festival the distinguished conductor and the Boston Symphony are presenting this week in Carnegie Hall.

Lukas Foss

Wednesday evening's audience heard compositions by William Schuman, Samuel Barber, Henry Cowell, Walter Piston and Lukas Foss, the last a new piece conducted by the composer. Saturday's program will include Aaron Copland, David Diamond, Roy Harris, Edward Burlingame Hill, Irving Fine and Howard Hanson, the last two represented by works new to New York.

All of the works scheduled were composed during the last ten years; most of them were introduced by the Boston conductor soon after they were written; many of them were specially commissioned by him through the Koussevitzky Music Foundation. It is a record of which Dr. Koussevitzky, who is retiring at the end of the present season, may well be proud.

* * *

For this listener, the crowning glory of Wednesday's concert was the Barber Violin Concerto, beautifully performed by the soloist, Ruth Posselt, and the Boston musicians. At least its first two movements—the fresh and lyrical Allegro, and the Andante with its lovely oboe melody growing more poignant as it is developed by the violin—held him enthralled, touching his heart as no music has in a long time. If the final Presto, a brilliantly devised perpetual motion affair, came as something of a letdown, perhaps that is what the composer intended. It served to jerk back to reality the listener who, at the sound of the violin's darkening song in the Andante, had strayed into revery over the sadness and loss of something which he, too, once experienced and would not find again.

The Star Reviews

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, Serge Koussevitzky conducting; soloist, Ruth Posselt, violinist; Wednesday evening at Carnegie Hall. The program.

American Festival Overture	Schuman
Recordare (1st N. Y. performance) (Conducted by the composer)	Foss
Concerto for Violin and Orchestra	Barber
Hymn and Fuguing Tune No. 2	Cowell
Symphony No. 3	Piston

It is hard to understand why the Barber Concerto has not made its way more widely into current orchestral repertory. Certainly, it was very warmly received by the Boston's notably frigid Wednesday subscribers. I hope Dr. Koussevitzky's successors will continue to program it in seasons to come. It is a beautiful piece.

It is a pleasure, too, to rehear Piston's Third Symphony, which last year received the Pulitzer Prize. Though the writer prefers, and is more moved by, his Second Symphony, the Third is a mature, shapely and vastly skillful work. If it has not much that is new or arresting to say, it always sounds well, speaking with clarity and vigor in the fast movements, and with quiet eloquence in the unhurried, contemplative Adagio.

On first hearing, young Mr. Foss' Recordare did not make a very deep impression on this listener. It is facilely, sometimes tellingly, written, but it is seemingly scanty in substance and commonplace in texture and idiom, its musical speech a melange of contemporary cliches. Though designed as an elegy on Gandhi's death, and begun on the day of his assassination, its mournful measures have little of the power and breadth and dignity one would like to find in a commemorative expression of that tragedy.

* * *

The two remaining pieces on the program were eminently successful in accomplishing what they set out to do. In his Hymn and Fuguing Tune No. 2, Mr. Cowell gracefully and sonorously recalls the early American modal religious musical style, handling his materials with the simplicity, expressiveness and devotional fervor of an early New England Bach. And what could be more appropriate to open the concert than Mr. Schuman's vigorous and spirited American Festival Overture, as indigenous and alive as the street cry, the "call to play" of New York City children, it takes for its theme.

With all five composers present to take bows after the playing of their works, it was a truly festive occasion, and a welcome and convincing reaffirmation of the vitality of American music.

ON THE RECORD

Koussevitzky Double Bass, Schnabel-Fournier Sonata, Busch-Serkin Trio, Some Other Things

By Claudia Cassidy

COLLECTORS IN SEARCH of Serge Koussevitzky's double bass recordings are being rescued by a series of circumstances. Perhaps you remember that when Boston asked its renowned conductor what he wanted in token of admiration and affection in the 25th and farewell season, he said he wanted "a big gift" for his orchestra. That gift was a backlog of financial security, and the fast growing Serge Koussevitzky Anniversary fund is the result. To augment it, a limited edition of 1,000 albums of Koussevitzky recordings has been made available by the Boston orchestra in co-operation with RCA Victor. Each is autografed, holds the portrait of the player with his instrument now hanging in Koussevitzky's Tanglewood home, and features three 12-inch ruby vinylite records of the slow movement from Koussevitzky's double bass concerto, his "Chanson Triste" and "Valse Miniature," and his arrangement of a largo by Eccles, plus a lullaby by Laska. The recordings were made in 1929, and you have to hear what they can do with the double bass to believe it. Pierre Luboshutz is the accompanist. The price is $10, including mailing costs. Address the Boston Symphony orchestra, Symphony hall, Boston 15, Mass.

Koussevitzky

Symphony Saved By Wad of Gum

NEW YORK, N. Y., Jan. 13—If touring orchestra [illegible] its own problems in these days of advanced transportation and modern halls and conveniences they are nothing (according to Leslie Rogers, librarian of the Boston Symphony Orchestra) to the headaches of yesteryear.

Having been associated with the Boston Symphony Orchestra for 37 years during which he has missed only one concert (he wouldn't have missed that one in Providence, he says, if Arthur Fiedler hadn't persuaded him he had a high fever and made him stay home), Mr. Rogers has accompanied the orchestra on every trip it has ever made.

His is the responsibility of seeing to it that the orchestra always has the proper music on the proper stands at the proper time in the proper order and in proper condition. In view of the fact this is an order that calls for the most proper precision, it is generally conceded by the men of the orchestra that Mr. Rogers' job is of the utmost importance. However, in addition to his skill in preparing the musical scores and in making the cuts or corrections required by Dr. Koussevitzky, Mr. Rogers is also a repository of stories on the traveling situation of an orchestra when Dr. Koussevitzky first became the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra 25 years ago.

Awe-Inspiring Scenes

"Back in the old days," he said, refraining from adding ("the good") 'there were very few auditoriums such as we have today. We used to play in armories, with rifles and cannons on the walls. The managers used to try to make special productions of the concerts, so they'd put up trees and palms all around, or hang up those awful old woodland scenes in the wings, with nymphs and fairies depicted in the worst possible sort of mural art.

"Everywhere we went, Schenectady, Troy, Hartford, everywhere, we played in armories. In one of them, one night, there was no dressing room for the men, so the manager hung curtains around the back of the orchestra to provide a dressing room. The men had no sooner started to dress than they looked up and saw that the whole crowd in the second balcony could look right down on them."

It was too late to worry about that, Mr. Rogers told me, so they went right on dressing. They arrived one night in another town, he said, to discover the management hadn't provided seats for the orchestra. After a heated conference they rushed off and found a hundred or so seats, which they rented. As the audience filed into the auditorium it was astonished to see several big hearses drive up to the hall and start to unload seats for the orchestra. They'd rented the chairs from a funeral parlor.

Gum Saved Day

An equally tense situation developed one night when, just as the orchestra had assembled and the conductor had raised his baton to begin a work requiring an organ, the huge instrument began to "cipher" or squeal. The poor organist worked and worked to shut off the high, penetrating noise, but it continued unabated. At length the concertmaster, himself an organist, got up and marched out of the auditorium while conductor, orchestra and audience waited breathlessly. Getting a ladder, the unruffled concertmaster climbed up to the organ and stuck a wad of gum into the offending pipe. The audience gave him an ovation—and the concert began.

A similar situation developed one night in a New Hampshire city when the orchestra found itself playing a fantastic obbligato to a bowling alley located directly below the hall. It played one work, then another, but the terrific crash of bowling balls below proved impossible to endure. A huddle with the management and they found the solution. An emissary went below and engaged the entire alley for the rest of the evening. The concert continued in peace.

The Boston Symphony, according to Mr. Rogers, whose fund of stories and anecdotes exceeds, if possible, his knowledge of orchestral matters, has played in flickering gaslight, in choir stalls so high the conductor couldn't see the violin players, sitting on settees, in car barns, and in all sorts of weird and wonderful situations, but the all-time high in episodes, he says, occurred one night in Omaha, Nebraska.

"We had a new German player," he relates, "who had just arrived in this country. He could hardly speak English and, as a joke, when we got to Omaha, I told him we were right out in Indian country and had better look out. He drew himself up in all his dignity. 'Meester Rogers,' he announced, 'Ich habe read Fenimore Cooper, und de tales of de stocking of de leather, und ich am prepared.' With this he drew aside his frock coat. In his belt he had a bowie knife three feet long."

WASHINGTON, D. C.
POST
JAN 14 1949

Postlude

Koussevitsky, 'in Great Mood,' Rouses Orchestra to Heights

By Paul Hume

Adoration is reserved for the Deity, but we revere the name and greatness of Serge Koussevitsky, who led his Boston Symphony Orchestra last night in Constitution Hall.

For 25 great years the mighty Russian conductor formed one of the miraculous orchestral instruments of our time, stamping it with the unique genius of his personality. No living conductor has done more for the cause of new music in this country or abroad, nor are there many who can stand with him on the pinnacle among mountain peaks to which his achievements entitle him.

All the facets of Koussevitsky's remarkable talents were on display last night, except for a sample of his magic in French repertoire. Modern music from America, which he has always championed, a barbaric score from Prokofieff, whose protagonist he has so often been, and standard classics by Vivaldi and Brahms exhibited the scope and polish of Koussevitsky's gifts.

It was a stroke of program planning to include Aaron Copland's Lincoln Portrait in a Washington concert only six days before a President of the United States is to be inaugurated. Copland treats music of our native soil as a frame for some of the Emancipator's most prophetic words. These were stirringly delivered last night by Wesley Addy.

What thoughts the great President's utterances must have stirred in the minds of such listeners as the daughter of our President, or the exiled King Peter of Yugoslavia. What thoughts may they have stirred in the hearts of the owners of the very hall in which they were spoken, where to this day, those whose fredom became so important to Lincoln are still refused appearance.

These and more purely musical considerations must have mingled in Koussevitsky's mind, who recently described Copland's work in these terms: "Is is based on the great words of the Gettysburg Address, which should be repeatedly heard by this Nation and the world at large, and to which A. Copland wrote a music deeply moving in its simpliciy and sincerity."

Throughout the evening Koussevitsky was in a great mood. Vivaldi, the first music he conducted in this country, was sustained in its nobility. The Prokofieff became a powerful frenzy, always controlled, and yet always seeming to burst its bounds. And the Brahms symphony moved in a heroic vein, lightened by the slow song of the second movement, and the guided pacing of the third.

When Koussevitsky's twenty-ninth concert in Washington came to an end the audience rose and cheered while the beloved man returned time and again to the platform. His orchestra stood with him, and then it was over. We hope that there will be more Koussevitsky concerts in Washington, for there will not be another like him.

WASHINGTON, D. C.
STAR
JAN 14 1949

King at Concert; Margaret Truman Supper Hostess

Out-of-towners in two Capital audiences last night got a taste of Washington's special, but every-day brand of glamour.

Every one's attention was drawn to a particular box in Constitution Hall last evening where the Boston Symphony gave a concert under the direction of Sergei Koussevitzky. Dark-haired, youthful ~~looking King~~ Peter was the guest of Mrs. William R. Castle, wife of the former Undersecretary of State.

Another distinguished guest present was the Right Honorable Peter Fraser, Prime Minister of New Zealand, who has just arrived in town. was entertained by Ambassador and Lady Berendsen at a dinner before the concert and will be the honor guest at the reception they are giving this afternoon.

And over in the Blue Room of the Shoreham Hotel the presence of Miss Margaret Truman, who was looking very lovely, added considerable interest to the show. The Chief Executive's daughter entertained a party of eight at supper, making her second visit there this week to hear the highly amusing French singers, Les Compagnons de la Chanson.

Representative and Mrs. J. Harry McGregor were also entertaining in the blue room. They gave a dinner in honor of Mrs. Clifford Davis, wife of the Tennessee Representative who is the retiring president of the Congressional Club.

Among their guests were Representative Davis, former Senator and Mrs. Wallace H. White, jr.; Representative and Mrs. Lansdale G. Sasscer, Representative and Mrs. J. Leroy Johnson, Representative and Mrs. Albert Thomas, Representative and Mrs. Errett P. Scrivner, Representative and Mrs. Mike Mansfield and Representative and Mrs. Aime J. Forand.

Others there were Representative and Mrs. John E. Fogarty and Mr. and Mrs. Robert [illegible] Freer, who had as their guests Mr. and Mrs. David P. Doyle and Mr. and Mrs. Joseph Dyer.

Miss Dorothy Thompson stirred up the entertaining pace yesterday, although she spent only one day in town. Mr. and Mrs. Norman Littell gave a luncheon for her at the Sulgrave Club, followed by a cocktail gathering at their Arlington home and a dinner in honor of the visiting journalist.

[232]

WASHINGTON, D. C.
STAR

JAN [illegible]

Koussevitzky Receives Ovation In Farewell Concert Here

By Alice Eversman

As indicated at present, the performance of the Boston Symphony last night in Constitution Hall is the last time it will appear here with Serge Koussevitzky as its official head. Seats were at a premium long ago and the packed house of yesterday testified to the desire of the local music public to do honor to the great conductor. Long, continued applause greeted him on his entrance and he and his skilled musicians received ovation after ovation during the program. It was a concert of special significance all the way through.

Were one to seek an allegory of the world situation today in the construction of the program, it could be found in the two central numbers, Prokofieff's "Scythian Suite" and Copland's "A Lincoln Portrait." In one, turmoil and savagery, and in "A Lincoln Portrait," the wise counsel to be remembered and practised today. Quite apart from its musical value, Copland's score, because of the ever stirring import of Lincoln's words, declaimed excellently by Wesley Addy, formed the high point of the evening. The music's chief descriptive moments are in the introduction but the short phrase preceding each spoken excerpt of the great President's speeches and letters were of a character to bind them together. Closing with the immortal section from the Gettysburg Address, the effect produced was echoed in the cheers and handclapping of spontaneous impulse.

The program opened with a spellbinding performance of Vivaldi's "Concerto in D minor" in Siloti's arrangement. According to the program notes, it served also as the opening number of the first concert Koussevitzky conducted in America on October 10, 1924.

It exemplified both the genius of the conductor and the musical sensitiveness of the men under his command. It is difficult to remember a more exquisitely played slow movement than the Largo. Kept at a unvarying deliberate pace that might have become tedious in less skilled hands, it glowed with unflagging warmth and beauty. Not for an instance was the iridescence of the music dimmed or a phrase wanting in expressiveness. The reading demonstrated also the conductor's individual way of maintaining transparency in the orchestral choirs. They rise and subside with great elasticity, so that the important theme of the moment is not overshadowed by any other tonal color. The fugal portion of the "Maestoso" and lineaments of the last movement emerged with notable clarity.

Because the same expertise in defining the musical pattern was present in the playing of the "Scythian Suite," its construction formula was more apparent. Yet some of the bite and excitement inherent in it was lost in the neatness of exposition. Prokofieff, the audacious, has written in bold, broad, splashing colors of barbaric rites and pagan fanaticism. He has gone the limit to depict the ferocity of exaltation, the primitive splendor of nature, the wild and passionate elements in the mythical story. While the orchestra reflected these vivid traits in the richnes of its sonority and the flashing changes in tonal coloration, more abandon would have given the added spice to raise the playing to an intoxicating point.

After the effects of such contrary works as the Prokofieff and the Copland wore off, the Brahms "Symphony No. 1" came as a refreshing return to the familiar. It was played with all the refinement and penetration for which the conductor is famous yet here again, the spirit was of less vital character. Nevertheless the audience's reaction was filled with enthusiasm and vocally expressed by loudly shouted bravos. The demonstration was the public's farewell to Dr. Koussevitzky, who resigns his long-held post as head of one of the greatest musical organizations in the country this season.

WASHINGTON, D. C.
TIMES HERALD

JAN 15 1949

Koussevitzky Receives Ovation In His Farewell Concert Here

Reprinted from Yesterday's Late Editions

By GLENN DILLARD GUNN

Serge Koussevitzky said farewell to Washington Thursday in Constitution hall. The Boston Symphony doubtless will return; but Koussevitzky retires at the end of the present season.

Sergi Koussevitsky

The capacity audience paid him a great tribute. Many stood when he appeared upon the stage Whereupon he played the National Anthem, in honor of the President's daughter who occupied the White House box with a group of friends, and got everybody on his feet.

The tributes continued at every opportunity throughout the concert. The applause, however, never was longer nor the shouting louder than at the conclusion of the program's only American work. This was Aaron Copland's "A Lincoln Portrait," not new to Washington—it had its premiere here—but the first piece of native music which Koussevitzky has played in the Nation's Capital, though he has been here many times.

Other Pieces Familiar

Copland's piece can not be called a symphonic movement in the technical sense of the word. He has composed background music for a set of Lincoln's quotations. It is rugged in sound but attempts no detailed amplification of the Lincoln expression. The music is held together by a fragment of the hymn tune, "Rock of Ages." This, of course, is fitting. At times the development lifts it into important relief.

Still, the immortal words of Lincoln remain the best music and the greatest expression and the composer probably was wise not to intrude too ambitiously. Wesley Addy read the Lincoln lines with fine effect. It was a moving performance.

The rest of the program was familiar. Perhaps one should say over-familiar. Even the early Scythian Suite by Prokofieff has been heard often since Frederick Stock first produced it in America in 1918. It has not gained favor with the general public, nor should it, being little more than an etude in instrumentation and dramatic dissonance.

It was prefaced by a Vivaldi Concerto for orchestra edited by Alexander Siloti. The Brahms First Symphony filled the second half of the concert.

There is little in this list that can be treated as news. If the Boston Symphony had played badly that would have been news. If Koussevitzky had conducted with little animation that would have been news. Since the orchestra played brilliantly and the conductor functioned according to the habit that has won him fame, there seems slight occasion for extended comment upon the performance.

Had he seen fit to play, in addition to the Copland piece, one or more of the 10 American works which comprised his two concerts in New York this week, his far well to the Nation's Capital wou have been memorable. Amor these 10 compositions are a syı phony by Walter Piston, a viol Concerto by Samuel Barber, piaı Concerto by Howard Hanson, aı briefer works by William Sch man, Cowell, Foss, Diamond, Fin and Roy Harris.

WASHINGTON, D. C.
NEWS

JAN [illegible]

Koussevitzky's Final Concert Finds Him at Peak of Career

Serge Koussevitzky gave his final concert here as conductor of he Boston Symphony Orchestra, and there was greatness in every moment of it.

The music world has learned to expect much of the Boston and Koussevitzky, but at Constitution Hall Thursday the orchestra did the seemingly impossible and surpassed itself. Even to those who have heard he Boston Symphony Orchestra nany times, last night's performnce came as a revelation. The exlanation? It might well have been ne orchestra's way of paying the upreme tribute to the great musiian who has directed its destiny or the past quarter of a century.

The program that Dr. Koussevitzky chose for his final appearnce here was memorable in itself. First the D minor Concerto of ivaldi, classical in form yet full warmth and vitality as played nder Dr. Koussevitzky's baton.

Then the Scythian Suite, "Ala and olli," of Prokofieff, a work that nust have aroused in the listeners rimordial impulses that they hought civilization had long subnerged. For this reviewer, the Prokofieff was the high point. It s exciting music, the sort that denands virtuosity of the highest rder from the orchestra and proound musicianship from the conuctor. Last night Mr. Prokofieff ad both.

Third on the program was Aaron Copland's "A Lincoln Portrait," a imely work with Inaugural Day only a week away. The words of Lincoln, spoken by Wesley Addy, nust have had a special meaning or Margaret Truman as she listened from the presidential box. And here again was a fresh demonstration of Dr. Koussevitzky's penetrating musicianship, for the Copland music was poles apart from he Prokofieff, yet it was transmitted with the same sympathetic understanding.

Finally, the Brahms First Symphony, familiar yet like a premiere for Dr. Koussevitzky, and revealin fully the tonal beauty of all sections of the orchestra. The audience stood and cheered. They kept on applauding. Altho they knew there would be no encores, they lingered in the hall. They were reluctant to leave the place where they had just experienced one of the truly great moments in music.

MILT[illegible]INER

MUSIC

De Carvalho, Guest at Symphony, Introduces Score by Villa-Lobos

By CYRUS DURGIN

Eleazar De Carvalho, the Brazilian conductor who is one of Serge Koussevitzky's proteges, is back this week for another visit as guest director of the Boston Symphony concerts. His program is wholly novel, though there is but one piece which could be described as new: the "Fantasia de movimentos mixtos," whose solo violin part is played by Oscar Borgerth, a Brazilian musician new to Boston.

The program of yesterday afternoon and tonight begins with the Fourth Symphony of Alexander Glazunoff, and ends with the five pieces from Albeniz' "Iberia" that were orchestrated by the late Fernandez Arbos.

Villa-Lobos' piece is a sort of violin concerto, whose original version goes back as far as 1921. The three movements have subtitles: "Torment," "Serenity" and "Contentment." Many in yesterday's audience may think of the whole work as a torment, and they have something on their side, for it is long, oftentimes rough and nervous. It made me fidget long before the final movement was over.

There is a good deal of "wrong-note" harmony, and like so much of Villa-Lobos' music that I have heard, the texture is a curious blend of cosmopolitan and South American elements. The slow movement, however, lives up to its title, and contains real lyrical beauty.

If the piece wasn't so much, the soloist proved a sensation. Borgerth is a violinist with a tremendous technique that triumphed over the difficulties of the score. He played it all with deceptive ease, and reaped a large harvest of enthusiastic applause. He has a nice tone, also, that never once went sour or scratched amid all the technical hurly-burly. Borgerth ought to be invited back for an American recital tour, for he obviously is of high musical [illegible].

Only two of the orchestrated Albeniz piano pieces—"Fete-Dieu a Seville" and "Triana" had been played here before. "Evocation," therefore, were novelties. Quite unlike the "Iberia" of Debussy which Ansermet gave us last week, these mood pictures are less sophisticated and more simply colored. They are also wonderful pieces, full of rhythmic life and emotional warmth, orchestrated briliantly if fussily, and of the utmost effect.

De Carvalho has improved as a conductor in the year since we heard him last. His ear was good then, and his sense of rhythm, but he now seems more on his own, interpretively, and gives more spirit and cigar. Perhaps the Albeniz items could have had even stronger rhythmic swing, but they sounded well.

As for the 56-year-old Glazunoff Symphony, which De Carvalho resurrected for reasons which escape me, it will remind you of many things, from Rimsky-Korsakoff to Dvorak. A good deal of it is like any sound-track from any pretentious A-picture coming out of Hollywood, which shows you how far they've gone, musically, out there.

Anyway, the Symphony was warm and easy to take on a foul, February day.

[illegible] have gratified it [illegible]

[233]

WASHINGTON, D. C.
STAR
JAN [illegible]

Koussevitzky Receives Ovation In Farewell Concert Here

By Alice Eversman

As indicated at present, the performance of the Boston Symphony last night in Constitution Hall is the last time it will appear here with Serge Koussevitzky as its official head. Seats were at a premium long ago and the packed house of yesterday testified to the desire of the local music public to do honor to the great conductor. Long, continued applause greeted him on his entrance and he and his skilled musicians received ovation after ovation during the program. It was a concert of special significance all the way through.

Were one to seek an allegory of the world situation today in the construction of the program, it could be found in the two central numbers, Prokofieff's "Scythian Suite" and Copland's "A Lincoln Portrait." In one, turmoil and savagery, and in "A Lincoln Portrait," the wise counsel to be remembered and practised today. Quite apart from its musical value. Copland's score, because of the ever stirring import of Lincoln's words, declaimed excellently by Wesley Addy, formed the high point of the evening. The music's chief descriptive moments are in the introduction but the short phrase preceding each spoken excerpt of the great President's speeches and letters were of a character to bind them together. Closing with the immortal section from the Gettysburg Address, the effect produced was echoed in the cheers and handclapping of spontaneous impulse.

The program opened with a spellbinding performance of Vivaldi's "Concerto in D minor" in Siloti's arrangement. According to the program notes, it served also as the opening number of the first concert Koussevitzky conducted in America on October 10, 1924.

It exemplified both the genius of the conductor and the musical sensitiveness of the men under his command. It is difficult to remember a more exquisitely played slow movement than the Largo. Kept at a unvarying deliberate pace that might have become tedious in less skilled hands, it glowed with unflagging warmth and beauty. Not for an instance was the iridescence of the music dimmed or a phrase wanting in expressiveness. The reading demonstrated also the conductor's individual way of maintaining transparency in the orchestral choirs. They rise and subside with great elasticity, so that the important theme of the moment is not overshadowed by any other tonal color. The fugal portion of the "Maestoso" and lineaments of the last movement emerged with notable clarity.

Because the same expertise in defining the musical pattern was present in the playing of the "Scythian Suite," its construction formula was more apparent. Yet some of the bite and excitement inherent in it was lost in the neatness of exposition. Prokofieff, the audacious, has written in bold, broad, splashing colors of barbaric rites and pagan fanaticism. He has gone the limit to depict the ferocity of exaltation, the primitive splendor of nature, the wild and passionate elements in the mythical story. While the orchestra reflected these vivid traits in the richnes of its sonority and the flashing changes in tonal coloration, more abandon would have given the added spice to raise the playing to an intoxicating point.

After the effects of such contrary works as the Prokofieff and the Copland wore off, the Brahms "Symphony No. 1" came as a refreshing return to the familiar. It was played with all the refinement and penetration for which the conductor is famous yet here again, the spirit was of less vital character. Nevertheless the audience's reaction was filled with enthusiasm and vocally expressed by loudly shouted bravos. The demonstration was the public's farewell to Dr. Koussevitzky, who resigns his long-held post as head of one of the greatest musical organizations in the country this season.

WASHINGTON, D. C.
TIMES HERALD
JAN 15 1949

Koussevitzky Receives Ovation In His Farewell Concert Here

Reprinted from Yesterday's Late Editions

By GLENN DILLARD GUNN

Serge Koussevitzky said farewell to Washington Thursday in Constitution hall. The Boston Symphony doubtless will return; but Koussevitzky retires at the end of the present season.

Sergi Koussevitsky

The capacity audience paid him a great tribute. Many stood when he appeared upon the stage Whereupon he played the National Anthem, in honor of the President's daughter who occupied the White House box with a group of friends, and got everybody on his feet.

The tributes continued at every opportunity throughout the concert. The applause, however, never was longer nor the shouting louder than at the conclusion of the program's only American work. This was Aaron Copland's "A Lincoln Portrait," not new to Washington —it had its premiere here—but the first piece of native music which Koussevitzky has played in the Nation's Capital, though he has been here many times.

Other Pieces Familiar

Copland's piece can not be called a symphonic movement in the technical sense of the word. He has composed background music for a set of Lincoln's quotations. It is rugged in sound but attempts no detailed amplification of the Lincoln expression. The music is held together by a fragment of the hymn tune, "Rock of Ages." This, of course, is fitting. At times the development lifts it into important relief.

Still, the immortal words of Lincoln remain the best music and the greatest expression and the composer probably was wise not to intrude too ambitiously. Wesley Addy read the Lincoln lines with fine effect. It was a moving performance.

The rest of the program was familiar. Perhaps one should say over-familiar. Even the early Scythian Suite by Prokofieff has been heard often since Frederick Stock first produced it in America in 1918. It has not gained favor with the general public, nor should it, being little more than an etude in instrumentation and dramatic dissonance.

It was prefaced by a Vivaldi Concerto for orchestra edited by Alexander Siloti. The Brahms First Symphony filled the second half of the concert.

There is little in this list that can be treated as news. If the Boston Symphony had played badly that would have been news. If Koussevitzky had conducted with little animation that would have been news. Since the orchestra played brilliantly and the conductor functioned according to the habit that has won him fame, there seems slight occasion for extended comment upon the performance.

Had he seen fit to play, in addition to the Copland piece, one or more of the 10 American works which comprised his two concerts in New York this week, his far well to the Nation's Capital wou have been memorable. Amor these 10 compositions are a syr phony by Walter Piston, a viol Concerto by Samuel Barber, piar Concerto by Howard Hanson, ar briefer works by William Sch man, Cowell, Foss, Diamond, Fin and Roy Harris.

WASHINGTON, D. C.
NEWS
JAN 15 1949

Koussevitzky's Final Concert Finds Him at Peak of Career

Serge Koussevitzky gave his final concert here as conductor of he Boston Symphony Orchestra, and there was greatness in every moment of it.

The music world has learned to expect much of the Boston and Koussevitzky, but at Constitution Hall Thursday the orchestra did the seemingly impossible and surpassed itself. Even to those who have heard he Boston Symphony Orchestra nany times, last night's performnce came as a revelation. The exlanation? It might well have been he orchestra's way of paying the upreme tribute to the great musian who has directed its destiny or the past quarter of a century.

The program that Dr. Koussevitzky chose for his final appearnce here was memorable in itself. First the D minor Concerto of ivaldi, classical in form yet full warmth and vitality as played nder Dr. Koussevitzky's baton.

Then the Scythian Suite, "Ala and olli," of Prokofieff. a work that nust have aroused in the listeners rimordial impulses that they hought civilization had long subnerged. For this reviewer, the Prokofieff was the high point. It s exciting music, the sort that denands virtuosity of the highest rder from the orchestra and proound musicianship from the conuctor. Last night Mr. Prokofieff ad both.

Third on the program was Aaron Copland's "A Lincoln Portrait," a imely work with Inaugural Day nly a week away. The words of Lincoln, spoken by Wesley Addy, nust have had a special meaning or Margaret Truman as she lisened from the presidential box. And here again was a fresh demonstration of Dr. Koussevitzky's penetrating musicianship, for the Copand music was poles apart from he Prokofieff, yet it was transmitted with the same sympathetic understanding.

Finally, the Brahms First Symphony, familiar yet like a premiere for Dr. Koussevitzky, and revealin fully the tonal beauty of all sections of the orchestra. The audience stood and cheered. They kept on applauding. Altho they knew there would be no encores, they lingered in the hall. They were reluctant to leave the place where they had just experienced one of the truly great ments in musi[illegible]

[illegible]

MUSIC

De Carvalho, Guest at Symphony, Introduces Score by Vill[illegible]

By CYRUS DURGIN

Eleazar De Carvalho, the Brazilian conductor who is one of Serge Koussevitzky's proteges, is back this week for another visit as guest director of the Boston Symphony concerts. His program is wholly novel, though there is but one piece which could be described as new: the "Fantasia de movimentos mixtos," whose solo violin part is played by Oscar Borgerth, a Brazilian musician new to Boston.

The program of yesterday afternoon and tonight begins with the Fourth Symphony of Alexander Glazunoff, and ends with the five pieces from Albeniz' "Iberia" that were orchestrated by the late Fernandez Arbos.

Villa-Lobos' piece is a sort of violin concerto, whose original version goes back as far as 1921. The three movements have subtitles: "Torment," "Serenity" and "Contentment." Many in yesterday's audience may think of the whole work as a torment, and they have something on their [illegible]. It is long, oftentimes rough and nervous. It made me fidget long before the final movement was over.

There is a good deal of "wrong-note" harmony, and like so much of Villa-Lobos' music that I have heard, the texture is a curious blend of cosmopolitan and South American elements. The slow movement, however, lives up to its title, and contains real lyrical beauty.

If the piece wasn't so much, the soloist proved a sensation. Borgerth is a violinist with a tremendous technique that triumphed over the difficulties of the score. He played it all with deceptive ease, and reaped a large harvest of enthusiastic applause. He has a nice tone, also, that never once went sour or scratched amid all the technical hurly-burly. Borgerth ought to be invited back for an American recital [illegible] for he obviously is of high musical [illegible].

Only [illegible] orchestrated Albeniz [illegible] pieces—"Fete-Dieu a Seville" and "Triana" had been played here before. "Evocation," therefore, [illegible] novelties. Quite unlike the "Iberia" of Debussy which Anscrmet gave us last week, these mood pictures are less sophisticated and more simply colored. They are also wonderful pieces, full of rhythmic life and emotional warmth, orchestrated briliantly if fussily, and of the utmost effect.

De Carvalho has improved as a conductor in the year since we heard him last. His ear was good then, and his sense of rhythm, but he now seems more on his own, interpretively, and gives more spirit and cigar. Perhaps the Albeniz items could have had even stronger rhythmic swing, but they sounded well.

As for the 56-year-old Glazunoff Symphony, which De Carvalho resurrected for reasons which escape me, it will remind you of many things, from Rimsky-Korsakoff to Dvorak. A good deal of it is like any sound-track from any pretentious A-picture coming out of Hollywood, which shows you how far they've gone, musically, out there.

Anyway, the Symphony was warm and easy to take on a foul, February day.

have gratified [illegible]

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE
JAN 15 1949

MUSIC

By Paul Affelder

Academy Audience Hears Premiere Of Hanson's Piano Concerto

Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra returned to the Academy of Music last evening for their second concert of the season. The program was interesting and well balanced, opening with two works for string orchestra — Corelli Sarabanda, Giga e Badinerie and David Diamond's Rounds for String Orchestra, continuing with the first New York performance of Howard Hanson's Piano Concerto in G Major, with the composer serving as guest conductor and Rudolf Firkusny as soloist and concluding with Brahms' First Symphony.

Dr. Koussevitzky was in a mellow mood last night. He played the Corelli Sarabande at such a slow tempo and with so much sentimentality that it tended to lose its classic lines and take on those of romanticism. The succeeding Gigue and Badinerie, however, were infused with more life and grace, though both here and in the Diamond Rounds we have heard the Boston strings play with more precision and fewer false entrances.

Mr. Diamond's composition is one that grows on the listener with repeated hearings. Perhaps it is somewhat lacking in variety; but there is an irresistible vigor and vitality about its opening and closing movements, which are separated by a contrasting slow section. For its adequate presentation, this work requires an orchestra of the brilliance of the Boston Symphony in order to do it full justice. A brilliant performance it certainly was accorded last night, and Dr. Koussevitzky saw to it that the intricacies of the many-voiced writing emerged with full clarity.

Those who attended last night's concert found that they had stolen a march on Manhattan concert-goers, for they were treated to the first New York performance of the Piano Concerto in G Major, Op. 36, by Howard Hanson, director of the Eastman School of Music in Rochester. The Boston Symphony has had the distinction of presenting the premieres of three of Dr. Hanson's four symphonies, and this concerto was commissioned in 1945 by the Koussevitzky Music Foundation.

The concerto is one of those works upon which it is difficult to pass final judgment after a single hearing. We had become so accustomed to the long melodic lines in Dr. Hanson's earlier compositions that it came as somewhat of a shock when we heard only short thematic fragments in this new work. After we got used to this change of style on the composer's part, we found the concerto quite interesting, though not outstanding. It is in four short movements, the first of which is rather baffling. After a brief introduction in a slow tempo, it launches forth into a vigorous main section, so vigorous orchestrally, in fact, that the pianist, while working away furiously, has little chance to emerge into the limelight. After a bit of development, this material is restated, still without giving the soloist half a chance. Then, all of a sudden, along comes the first lyrical section, in a decidedly subdued vein, and the movement ends on a paradoxically quiet note.

The remaining movements are far more coherent in structure and are musically more rewarding as well. The second is a lively, very short scherzo; the third, an andante, is the one truly lyrical section of the work, and the finale, punctuated with a great deal of rhythmic syncopation, brings the concerto to a brilliant conclusion.

We might have found more to admire in the work had the performance been better. The soloist, Rudolf Firkusny, deserves great credit for his virtuosity in the rapid sections and for his fine singing tone in the third movement. But he was badly supported by the orchestra, which did not give of its best effort under the composer's baton.

Most of the time the accompaniment was far too loud, while the winds — particularly the clarinets and trumpets — were annoyingly out of tune. It is dangerous business to play a work of this kind without preceding it with something in which the wind instruments can have a chance to warm up.

Dr. Koussevitzky has always been noted for his readings of the Brahms symphonies. While they are not always absolutely orthodox, they are convincing, vibrantly alive and eloquent. His reading of the First Symphony last evening was along broad lines. The high spot was his searching soulful interpretation of the second movement. Only in the finale did we agree with the fast pace he adopted, and the only reason for our disagreement was that the tempo here was not compatible with what had gone before. Also, in the coda, he had four trumpets blaring forth the chorale so loudly that they all but obliterated the rest of the orchestra. The original scoring calls for only two trumpets, and these would have been ample for this passage.

During the first half of the program the audience had remained luke-warm in its response. At the conclusion of the Symphony, however, it burst into a spontaneous ovation for conductor and players.

List of Boxholders At Symphony Concert

Mrs. Edward C. Blum and her guests were seated in Box 1 at the performance. Her guests were Anna Remsen Alexandre, Mr. and Mrs. George H. Dayton, Dr. Clinton Barker, Mr. and Mrs. Eugene S. Taliaferro, Mr. and Mrs. Robert E. Blum and Mr. and Mrs. Hollis K. Thayer.

Dr. and Mrs. Robert Franklin Ives were hosts in Box 2, entertaining Dr. and Mrs. Thomas H. McClintock, Mrs. Theodore Allen, Louise Castle and Grace B. Carter.

Box 3 was occupied by members of the Brooklyn Committee for the Boston Symphony Orchestra Concerts, Mrs. L. Parker McKinley, Mrs. Louella Wilson Valle, Mr. and Mrs. Haughton Bell, Andrew Gomory and his guests, Mr. and Mrs. Dana Converse Backus and Paul L. Gomory.

Members of the Brooklyn Woman's Club were seated in Box 4: Mrs. John F. Stevens, president; Mrs. Henry J. Nauer, Mrs. William E. Howes and Dr. and Mrs. H. S. Rasi.

Seated in Box 5 were Emma Jessie Ogg and her guests, the Rev. C. R. Barnes, Mr. and Mrs. Edward Fuller, and Mrs. William B. Parker and her guest, Rosalie B. Parker.

Officers from the U. S. Naval Station in Brooklyn were present in Box 7 as guests of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences. Seated in Box 8 were blind veterans and their escorts from the Red Cross, who came as guests of the Brooklyn Committee for the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
JAN 16 1949

HANSON CONDUCTS PREMIERE OF WORK

Leads the Boston Orchestra in Piano Concerto as Guest at American Music Fete

By OLIN DOWNES

The second concert of the second "American Music Festival" which Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra have given in this city took place yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall. A distinguished group of composers represented in a box, were successively saluted by Dr. Koussevitzky, the orchestra which repeatedly rose in their honor, and the audience present.

As at the first concert last Wednesday night, when Lukas Foss conducted his piece, so, yesterday Howard Hanson conduct personally the first performance in New York of his Piano Concerto in G major, with Rudolf Firkusny as soloist. The orchestra and its leader, who has so vigorously championed the American composers through a period of twenty-five fruitful years, gave superb performances of their works. And it is to be remembered that Dr. Koussevitzky planned these programs as demonstration of the advances made by American symphonic composers in the last ten years.

And here one pauses. What is the advance?

The advance may well be reckoned in terms of quantity production and developed craftsmanship. There are more American composers who score better and more confidently for orchestra than there were ten years ago. Have they advanced in originality and communicative power since the earlier time?

One is not so sure, judging, at least, by these last two programs. The music on them that stood up best, in greater part, was that of the older men. For an exception, we can accept at once David Diamond's "Rounds for String Orchestra," a work commissioned by Dmitri Mitropoulos for first performance by the Minneapolis Orchestra in 1944 and properly recognized for its exceptional merits by Dr. Koussevitzky. It has a high degree of virtuosity, but also of spirit, invention and excellence of form.

Praise for Fine's Work

The next piece, Irving Fine's "Toccata Concertánte," is a good job by a gifted pupil of Piston, Hill and Merritt of the Department of Music at Harvard, who later studied with Naida Boulanger in France. For us, it is a good piece of student's work, lively, and considerably more sophisticated than Howard Hanson's four movement piano concerto, of which it can be said that it is written with sureness of hand and an experienced eye to effect, by a composer who is not in the least afraid of being direct, melodic, virtuosic to the point of obvious. The very opening with the horns is obvious, if you put it that way. It is also imaginative, and expresses immediately one of the impelling ideas of the score. A later hearing of this concerto will tell us how it stands by the side of the best other examples of Mr. Hanson's symphonic writing.

The music which towered highest in this program for us, was the now quite familiar Third Symphony of Roy Harris. The beginning is nobly thought—broad-arched, severe, imposing in its suggestion of modality and of big intervals—not little ones, in the step of the theme itself and its spacing and stride. The contrasting passage is like forest murmurs and glinting sunlight outside cathedral walls. The fugue doesn't come to a strong culmination. Instead of the voice parts being led to a complete fruition the counterpoint begins to limp and gag.

Immediately afterward, occurs the most persuasive and moving part of the symphony, we mean the elegiac chant in imitation, with the brass over the pounding tone of the drum. Here is pathos that looks beneath the surface of existence; the rising to the surface of the tragic consciousness which is a part of life. The symphony stood above on the program in the spaciousness and idealism of its concept, its separateness from the passing scene and its architectural purpose—though this purpose is not completely fulfilled.

The last two scores were Edward Hills "Music for English Horn and Orchestra," music of characteristic sensitivity and finish of workmanship, played admirably by Louis Speyer, English hornist of the orchestra; and Aaron Copland's tonal montage, skilfully done, of his "Lincoln Portrait." The fine delivery of the Lincoln texts over the orchestral commentary, by Wesley Addy, was an outstanding performance of the occasion.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE
JAN 16 1949

MUSIC

By VIRGIL THOMSON

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, yesterday in Carnegie Hall. Soloist: Rudolf Firkusny, pianist. The program:

Rounds for String Orhcestra....David Diamond
Toccata Concertante...............Irving Fine
(First New York performance)
Piano Concerto in G major, Op. 36
Howard Hanson
(First Manhattan performance, composer conducting) Symphony No. 3...................Roy Harris
Music for English Horn and Orchestra, Op. 50 ....Edwin B. Hill
(Soloist: Louis Speyer)
A Lincoln Portrait..............Aaron Copland
(Speaker: Wesley Addy)

Second of Two

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY'S second program of recent American compositions, played yesterday afternoon by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall, reinforced an impression gained last Wednesday of general ineptitude on the part of the composers. Perhaps our composers are not as amateurish as most of the music sounded. Perhaps the works were not chosen for their intrinsic qualities. In any case, they came off in two whole concerts as not hugely invigorating.

* * *

The exceptions to general standard last Wednesday were Cowell's Hymn and Fuguing Tune, No. 2, and Barber's Violin Concerto (played handsomely by Ruth Posselt), both of which have musical beauty. Yesterday's exception was Aaron Copland's "A Lincoln Portrait," which has a clean, personal sound and strong dramatic expression. The use of Lincoln's own words to reinforce the emotional effect is unpardonable hamming on the composer's part as if a playwright were to quote classic poetry in every love scene and passages from the Bible (or Karl Marx) to clinch every argument. Nevertheless, the musical passages are first-class and the best Copland.

* * *

The other works held only incidental virtues for this listener. Diamond's Rounds have an optimistic tone he finds not at all unattractive; and they are well enough, if not brilliantly, written for strings. Irvine Fine's Toccata Concertante, though largely derivative, has a grace about it that lifts it above that sectarian devotion to Stravinsky's later works that marks the Boston school of today. Its casual form and scattered instrumental sound are not elements of strength, however.

Rudolf Firkusny

Piano soloist yesterday afternoon with the Boston Symphony Orchestra

Aside from a certain genuine prettiness of material, its chief news value, as I see it, is having introduced for the first time into American composition the direct influence of Henri Sauguet.

* * *

Roy Harris's Third Symphony, America's most successful work in that form (by any standards), has a dignity about it that doesn't wear off. It is earnest, clumsy, pretentious, imaginative and terribly sincere. He will have to stand in the repertory, I guess, till replace-able by something better. Piston's Third, of last Wednesday, has not, for all its careful thought, a reality at all comparable.

* * *

Hanson's Piano Concerto, beautifully played by Rudolf Firkusny and noisily conducted by himself, is a slow-fast-slow-fast work in four movements. Its expression content seems to be related in some way to Stephen Foster, though the Andante, the most eloquent of its sections, bears no reference of the sort. Eclectic clean through is the only way I can describe it.

Edward Burlingame Hill's Music for English Horn and Orchestra, though musically slight, is charmingly and skillfully orchestrated. That and the Copland work were the only pieces on yesterday's program that seemed made for coping to advantage with the qualities of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

The current Symphony program, conducted by Eleazar de Carvalho, offers two amiable inconsequentialities and a footling novelty. It begins with the Fourth Symphony of Glazounov, unheard here since 1923, continues with Villa-Lobos' "Fantasia de movimentos mixtos," for violin and orchestra, in its first Boston performances, and concludes with a suite of five numbers from Albeniz's "Iberia," as orchestrated by Arbos.

Whose idea it was to disinter the Glazounov symphony I do not know. It might have been Dr. Koussevitzky's or his Brazilian protege's. In any case, the music is pleasant enough, although, as it stands today, completely without distinction. A conventionally melancholy mood is established in the introduction, and the first movement-proper is platitudinous. The deft Scherzo would make a good Pop Concert number, and the finale ends in the vein of ballet music, a field in which this minor Russian was particularly at home. Glazounov could also score; this music sounds. Being completely straightforward, it taxes neither orchestra nor conductor, and to judge from the accorded it yesterday, it still appeals to many listeners.

The Brazilian Villa-Lobos is a queer person. Some of his music makes sense all the way through; some makes no sense at all; and some makes sense in spots. This Fantasia belongs in the third category. It was played yesterday by Oscar Borgerth, a compatriot of the composer and conductor, who displayed the prodigious technique that the piece required. It seemed a shame to waste Mr. Borgerth on this material. At least, he was properly rewarded for his efforts.

By a curious coincidence, the previous program ended with an "Iberia," that of Debussy; and a far cry it is from these salon piano pieces of Albeniz, as cleverly dished up for orchestra by the Spanish violinist, who was once concertmaster of the Boston Symphony and who, in appearing as a guest conductor at a pair of concerts in 1929, played two of the five numbers heard yesterday. Two were quite enough. These things belong to the class of composition conveniently described as dinner music. Of course, Mr. de Carvalho, with his Latin blood, knew just what to do with them and the orchestra gave him all that he asked for.

ROCHESTER, N. Y.
DEMOCRAT-CHRONICLE

JAN 16 1949

Hanson Leads New Concerto In Brooklyn

By PAUL AFFELDER

Brooklyn—Those who attended Friday night's concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Brooklyn Academy of Music found they had stolen a march on Manhattan concertgoers, for they were treated to the first New York performance of the Piano Concerto in G major, Op. 36, by Howard Hanson, director of the Eastman School of Music in Rochester.

(The concerto, with Dr. Hanson again as guest conductor, was heard last night in Carnegia Hall, New York).

The Boston Symphony has had the distinction of presenting the premieres of three of Dr. Hanson's four symphonies, and this concerto was commissioned in 1945 by the Koussevitsky Music Foundation.

This new concerto is one of those works upon which it is difficult to pass final judgment after a single hearing. We had become so accustomed to the long melodic lines in Dr. Hanson's earlier compositions that it came as somewhat of a shock when we heard only short thematic fragments in the new work.

After we got used to this change of style on the composer's part we found the concerto quite interesting, though not outstanding. It is in four short movements, the first of which is rather baffling. After a brief introduction in slow tempo, it launches forth into a vigorous main section, so vigorous, orchestrally, in fact, that the pianist, while working away furiously, has little chance to emerge into the limelight.

After a bit of development this material is restated, still without giving the soloist half a chance. Then all of a sudden along comes the first lyrical section, in a decidedly subdued vein, and the movement ends on a paradoxically quiet note.

The remaining movements are far more coherent in structure and are musically more rewarding as well. The second is a lively, very short scherzo; the third, an andante, is the only true lyrical section of the work, and the finale, punctuated with a great deal of rhythmic syncopation, brings the concerto to a brilliant conclusion.

We might have found more to admire in the work had the performance been better. The soloist, Rudolf Firkusny, deserves great credit for his virtuosity in the rapid sections and for his fine singing tone in the third movement.

But he was supported badly by the orchestra, which did not give of its best effort under the composer's baton. Most of the time the accompaniment was far too loud, while the winds—particularly the clarinets and trumpets—were annoyingly out of tune. It is dangerous business to play a work of this kind without preceding it with something in which the wind instruments can have a chance to warm up.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE

JAN 16 1949

THE MUSICAL SCENE

By ARTHUR V. BERGER

THE revised version of Paul Hindemith's "Marienleben," scheduled for its premiere at the New Friends of Music next Sunday, is a more revealing document than one would assume from the report that its composer has merely made his song-cycle more congenial to the voice and more expressive of the sixteen Rilke poems. Critical estimate of these revisions will, of course, be much facilitated when Jennie Tourel, accompanied by Erich Itor Kahn, sings them for next week's Town Hall audience, and should properly be reserved until after that time. But the importance of the emendations as key to Hindemith's recent creative principles is immediately apparent when the two versions of the score are compared and the many pages of his apologia, serving as preface to the new one, are read.

The work is substantially recast. No. 12, alone, is intact, and No. 11 has been modified only very slightly. But some songs were entirely rewritten, and others have numerous changes. Here and there a song is to be found with as many as twenty spots revised.

The vocal lines of "Marienleben," Hindemith now tells us, had been often unnatural, making it difficult to find and keep the pitch. But this is but a ramification of the more essential matter of his recent tonal reform. For, as Hindemith admits in elaborating on this point, the difficulty results from the lack of strong tonal principle in the relation between the voice lines and those of the piano. In the twenties, when the cycle was completed, composers passionately believed we were on the threshold of a new contrapuntal era in which separate musical lines pursued their course innocent of their clash with other lines. "Today," Hindemith observes, "we know how mistaken this attitude was.

"The Birth of Christ," No. 7, now has a long introduction to give it emphasis within the large-scale expressive plan, which originally had not concerned Hindemith much, but which is now pointed up through new elements of balance and musical cross-references. The musical content of this song, too, is all new. The reason given for the change is that the original material was not dignified enough for so exalted a sentiment. But one suspects that the polytonality of the original is something Hindemith would now reject as frivolous under any circumstances.

The revisions reflect not only his more recent system of composition, but a heightened religious consciousness, too. Among other things, for example, there is a plan of key relations in which E is used for all references to Christ, B (as the dominant, generating the tonic, E) for references to Mary, and so on through the scale.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's program-books for its recent American Festival in Boston gave a chronology of the American works it has played in Serge Koussevitzky's regime, which is to end with his current and twenty-fifth season. Repeats or revivals are not recorded. No less than 188 items and sixty-five composers are listed. Breaking down the table, one finds that the most favored composers have had a very close race, since one work consistently separates the top five from one another. Yet, the order tallies remarkably with our unaided impression of the principles that have always guided Dr. Koussevitzky's choice. It would be surprising indeed if Copland were not first, with a score of twelve, since a very close association has maintained between him and the conductor from the start. Next we observe the outcome of an inevitable tie between the orchestra and another cultural monument of the Boston area. Harvard University, represented by Hill (11) and Piston (10). Allegiances to other Americans and to fellow Russian-born musicians are reflected in the next few figures: Bloch (9), Berezowsky (8) and Dukelsky and Harris (7 each).

George A. Sloan's talk to the radio and ticket-buying audience in the Metropolitan Opera intermission, Jan. 8, had the air of a preface to another public-wide plea for funds. The chairman of the board spoke of the serious need for either the construction of a new building for the opera company, or at least extensive alterations in the present building. One hopes that if a plea is actually made, the authorities will specify in advance which of the alternatives is to be adopted in distributing the funds.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
WORLD-TELEGRAM

JAN 17 1949

Music

Koussevitzky Leads Howard Hanson Opus

By LOUIS BIANCOLLI.

American music was still getting a break at the Boston Symphony's matinee session in Carnegie Hall Saturday.

With Serge Koussevitzky conducting most of the program, the current round-up of several of the country's leading symphonic long-hairs brought in David Diamond, Howard Hanson, Irving Fine, Edward B. Hill and Aaron Copland.

The big new item was a piano concerto by Mr. Hanson, with himself conducting and Rudolf Firkusny doing the keyboard honors. The news, perhaps, is that the Nebraska composer has come out of his academic cloisters.

The concerto is a strongly appealing score, gushing with warm melody and tangy streamlets from Tin Pan Alley. Howard Hanson has finally sat down with George Gershwin.

George Doesn't Do It All.

Though long an admirer of Mr. Hanson's music, I was beginning to fear he was cutting himself off from the folk-lore of the cities. His symphonies were good, but often on the Olympian side.

The concerto is nothing of the sort. Themes grow naturally out of the fabric, go places at a lively clip or settle down to nostalgic reveries on what it was like 20 or 30 bars earlier.

The syncopated note is strong in the fast sections, and, of course, everybody was whispering "Rhapsody in Blue" and "Concerto in F." The resemblances stood out all right, but Mr. Hanson doesn't let George do it all.

The melodic patterns are his own and the way he piles up and crosses rhythms shows only a distant kinship to Gershwin's concerto. What is good news is that Prof. Hanson is doing some whooping up of his own.

Solo Line Does Well.

Mr. Firkusny ran off the piano portions of the concerto as if New York, Rochester, Wahoo, Nebr.,—and other Hanson points of contact—were his native terrain, instead of the Czech town of Napajedla.

The solo line came through ringingly, and with Mr. Hanson in there giving the signals, the accompaniment showed a kind of fatherly concern for giving the piano adequate support.

A briskly-worked out "Toccata Concertante" by Mr. Fine, featuring a clever alignment of orchestral choirs, was also billed as local premiere, while young Fine's Harvard teacher, Prof. Hill, augmented the classical note with "Music for English Horn and Orchestra."

Also listed were David Diamond's cheery "Rounds for Orchestra," Roy Harris' Third Symphony—now a hardy perennial—and Copland's beautifully etched "Lincoln Portrait," with Wesley Addy speaking the lines.

Whatever the varying merits of Saturday's music, Mr. Koussevitzky's orchestra made it all equal in the famous glow of the Boston Symphony.

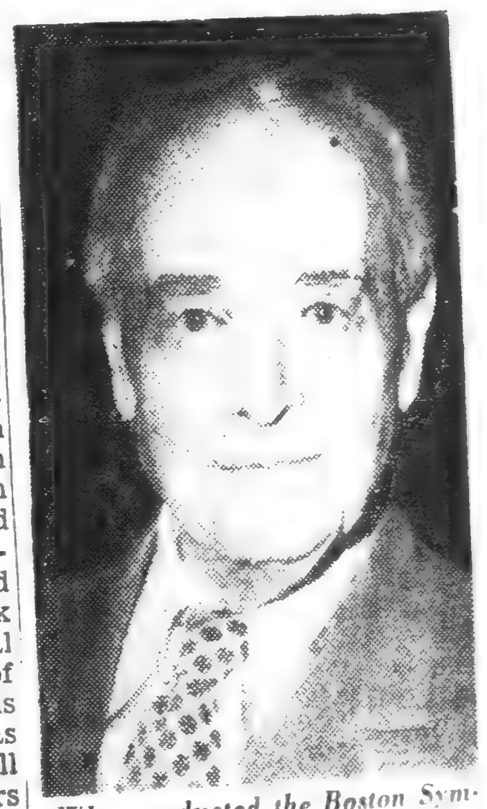
MUSIC

By VIRGIL THOMSON

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, concert of American music Wednesday night at Carnegie Hall. Soloist: Ruth Posselt, violinist. The program:

American Festival Overture....William Schuman
Recordare ....Lukas Foss
(First New York performance, composer conducting)
Concerto for Violin and Orchestra
Samuel Barber
Hymn and Fuguing Tune No. 2....Henry Cowell
Symphony No. 3. ....Walter Piston

Serge Koussevitzky



Who conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra Wednesday night at Carnegie Hall

American Revivals

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra Wednesday night in Carnegie Hall, offered New York the first of two concerts reviewing certain high points about American music composed in the last ten years. Most of the pieces on both programs (the other will be played Saturday afternoon) have been introduced to the public by the good Doctor himself and are the work of composers whose musical growth has been the object of continuous encouragement on his part. William Schuman, Lukas Foss, Samuel Barber, Henry Cowell and Walter Piston were the writers honored Wednesday night. Lukas Foss's "Recordare," not previously heard in New York, was conducted by the composer.

* * *

This is a funeral ode to Mohandas K. Gandhi. Its material is a long-spun melody accompanied by single-note pizzicatti in uniform rhythmic spacing and alternated with brass passages of military connotation. It is pleasant of tune, a little thin of substance, as well as of texture, and definitely monotonous as to rhythm. Its expressive contrasts appeared to your reviewer as excessive in view of the work's not very great expressive intensity. As a whole, the piece seemed more ambitious in expression than its slender material and halting development were able to justify.

* * *

Henry Cowell's Hymn and Fuguing Tune, No. 2, for strings alone, is an extended and songful development in the diatonic modal manner practiced by our American back-country forefathers. It sings; it soars; it leaps with joy. And always it is full of a great seriousness and a great dignity. I am not sure it is just the right length for an evocation of that kind. Myself, I should have preferred it longer. Certainly I was sorry when it ended, because it had made music all the way through.

* * *

Among the more familiar works, Samuel Barber's Violin Concerto impressed me as wearing well. Its tunes are gracious; its harmony is sophisticated without being ostentatious; its rhythm is always alive, and its instrumentation is delicious. It bears a musical refinement all round superior to anything of the kind heard Wednesday evening, though the Piston Third Symphony is a work of far more detailed elaboration and [illegible]. Barber's piece, moreover, is direct. Its plain and full as expression. Its weaknesses are a similar excessive content during two movements (this author's characteristic vein of elegy) and an over-busy third movement, a sort of perpetual-motion piece thin of thought). All the same it is a musical work, a real one, and can be listened to

---

TIME MAGAZINE
CHICAGO, ILL.

JAN 17 1949

78

Serge Koussevitzky was in the middle of his 25th and final year as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. In honor of the quarter-century of musical service, Boston's starchiest citizens unbent to give him (and his whole orchestra) a lavish testimonial dinner and full documentary proof of just how much they admire him: a scroll making him the only non-Harvard lifetime honorary member of Boston's tusty Harvard Club.

[235]

ROCHESTER, N. Y.
DEMOCRAT-CHRONICLE

JAN 16 1949

Hanson Leads New Concerto In Brooklyn

By PAUL AFFELDER

Brooklyn—Those who attended Friday night's concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Brooklyn Academy of Music found they had stolen a march on Manhattan concertgoers, for they were treated to the first New York performance of the Piano Concerto in G major, Op. 36, by Howard Hanson, director of the Eastman School of Music in Rochester.

(The concerto, with Dr. Hanson again as guest conductor, was heard last night in Carnegia Hall, New York).

The Boston Symphony has had the distinction of presenting the premieres of three of Dr. Hanson's four symphonies, and this concerto was commissioned in 1945 by the Koussevitsky Music Foundation.

This new concerto is one of those works upon which it is difficult to pass final judgment after a single hearing. We had become so accustomed to the long melodic lines in Dr. Hanson's earlier compositions that it came as somewhat of a shock when we heard only short thematic fragments in the new work.

After we got used to this change of style on the composer's part we found the concerto quite interesting, though not outstanding. It is in four short movements, the first of which is rather baffling. After a brief introduction in slow tempo, it launches forth into a vigorous main section, so vigorous, orchestrally, in fact, that the pianist, while working away furiously, has little chance to emerge into the limelight.

After a bit of development this material is restated, still without giving the soloist half a chance. Then all of a sudden along comes the first lyrical section, in a decidedly subdued vein, and the movement ends on a paradoxically quiet note.

The remaining movements are far more coherent in structure and are musically more rewarding as well. The second is a lively, very short scherzo; the third, an andante, is the only true lyrical section of the work, and the finale, punctuated with a great deal of rhythmic syncopation, brings the concerto to a brilliant conclusion.

We might have found more to admire in the work had the performance been better. The soloist, Rudolf Firkusny, deserves great credit for his virtuosity in the rapid sections and for his fine singing tone in the third movement.

But he was supported badly by the orchestra, which did not give of its best effort under the composer's baton. Most of the time the accompaniment was far too loud, while the winds—particularly the clarinets and trumpets—were annoyingly out of tune. It is dangerous business to play a work of this kind without preceding it with something in which the wind instruments can have a chance to warm up.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE

JAN 16 1949

THE MUSICAL SCENE

By ARTHUR V. BERGER

THE revised version of Paul Hindemith's "Marienleben," scheduled for its premiere at the New Friends of Music next Sunday, is a more revealing document than one would assume from the report that its composer has merely made his song-cycle more congenial to the voice and more expressive of the sixteen Rilke poems. Critical estimate of these revisions will, of course, be much facilitated when Jennie Tourel, accompanied by Erich Itor Kahn, sings them for next week's Town Hall audience, and should properly be reserved until after that time. But the importance of the emendations as key to Hindemith's recent creative principles is immediately apparent when the two versions of the score are compared and the many pages of his apologia, serving as preface to the new one, are read.

The work is substantially recast. No. 12, alone, is intact, and No. 11 has been modified only very slightly. But some songs were entirely rewritten, and others have numerous changes. Here and there a song is to be found with as many as twenty spots revised.

The vocal lines of "Marienleben," Hindemith now tells us, had been often unnatural, making it difficult to find and keep the pitch. But this is but a ramification of the more essential matter of his recent tonal reform. For, as Hindemith admits in elaborating on this point, the difficulty results from the lack of strong tonal principle in the relation between the voice lines and those of the piano. In the twenties, when the cycle was completed, composers passionately believed we were on the threshold of a new contrapuntal era in which separate musical lines pursued their course innocent of their clash with other lines. "Today," Hindemith observes, "we know how mistaken this attitude was.

"The Birth of Christ," No. 7, now has a long introduction to give it emphasis within the large-scale expressive plan, which originally had not concerned Hindemith much, but which is now pointed up through new elements of balance and musical cross-references. The musical content of this song, too, is all new. The reason given for the change is that the original material was not dignified enough for so exalted a sentiment. But one suspects that the polytonality of the original is something Hindemith would now reject as frivolous under any circumstances.

The revisions reflect not only his more recent system of composition, but a heightened religious consciousness, too. Among other things, for example, there is a plan of key relations in which E is used for all references to Christ, B (as the dominant, generating the tonic, E) for references to Mary, and so on through the scale.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's program-books for its recent American Festival in Boston gave a chronology of the American works it has played in Serge Koussevitzky's regime, which is to end with his current and twenty-fifth season. Repeats or revivals are not recorded. No less than 188 items and sixty-five composers are listed. Breaking down the table, one finds that the most favored composers have had a very close race, since one work consistently separates the top five from one another. Yet, the order tallies remarkably with our unaided impression of the principles that have always guided Dr. Koussevitzky's choice. It would be surprising indeed if Copland were not first, with a score of twelve, since a very close association has maintained between him and the conductor from the start. Next we observe the outcome of an inevitable tie between the orchestra and another cultural monument of the Boston area, Harvard University, represented by Hill (11) and Piston (10). Allegiances to other Americans and to fellow Russian-born musicians are reflected in the next few figures: Bloch (9), Berezowsky (8) and Dukelsky and Harris (7 each).

George A. Sloan's talk to the radio and ticket-buying audience in the Metropolitan Opera intermission, Jan. 8, had the air of a preface to another public-wide plea for funds. The chairman of the board spoke of the serious need for either the construction of a new building for the opera company, or at least extensive alterations in the present building. One hopes that if a plea is actually made, the authorities will specify in advance which of the alternatives is to be adopted in distributing the funds.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
WORLD-TELEGRAM

JAN 17 1949

Music

Koussevitzky Leads Howard Hanson Opus

By LOUIS BIANCOLLI.

American music was still getting a break at the Boston Symphony's matinee session in Carnegie Hall Saturday.

With Serge Koussevitzky conducting most of the program, the current round-up of several of the country's leading symphonic longhairs brought in David Diamond, Howard Hanson, Irving Fine, Edward B. Hill and Aaron Copland.

The big new item was a piano concerto by Mr. Hanson, with himself conducting and Rudolf Firkusny doing the keyboard honors. The news, perhaps, is that the Nebraska composer has come out of his academic cloisters.

The concerto is a strongly appealing score, gushing with warm melody and tangy streamlets from Tin Pan Alley. Howard Hanson has finally sat down with George Gershwin.

George Doesn't Do It All.

Though long an admirer of Mr. Hanson's music, I was beginning to fear he was cutting himself off from the folk-lore of the cities. His symphonies were good, but often on the Olympian side.

The concerto is nothing of the sort. Themes grow naturally out of the fabric, go places at a lively clip or settle down to nostalgic reveries on what it was like 20 or 30 bars earlier.

The syncopated note is strong in the fast sections, and, of course, everybody was whispering "Rhapsody in Blue" and "Concerto in F." The resemblances stood out all right, but Mr. Hanson doesn't let George do it all.

The melodic patterns are his own and the way he piles up and crosses rhythms shows only a distant kinship to Gershwin's concerto. What is good news is that Prof. Hanson is doing some whooping up of his own.

Solo Line Does Well.

Mr. Firkusny ran off the piano portions of the concerto as if New York, Rochester, Wahoo, Nebr.,—and other Hanson points of contact—were his native terrain, instead of the Czech town of Napajedla.

The solo line came through ringingly, and with Mr. Hanson in there giving the signals, the accompaniment showed a kind of fatherly concern for giving the piano adequate support.

A briskly-worked out "Toccata Concertante" by Mr. Fine, featuring a clever alignment of orchestral choirs, was also billed as local premiere, while young Fine's Harvard teacher, Prof. Hill, augmented the classical note with "Music for English Horn and Orchestra."

Also listed were David Diamond's cheery "Rounds for Orchestra," Roy Harris' Third Symphony—now a hardy perennial—and Copland's beautifully etched "Lincoln Portrait," with Wesley Addy speaking the lines.

Whatever the varying merits of Saturday's music, Mr. Koussevitzky's orchestra made it all equal in the famous glow of the Boston Symphony.

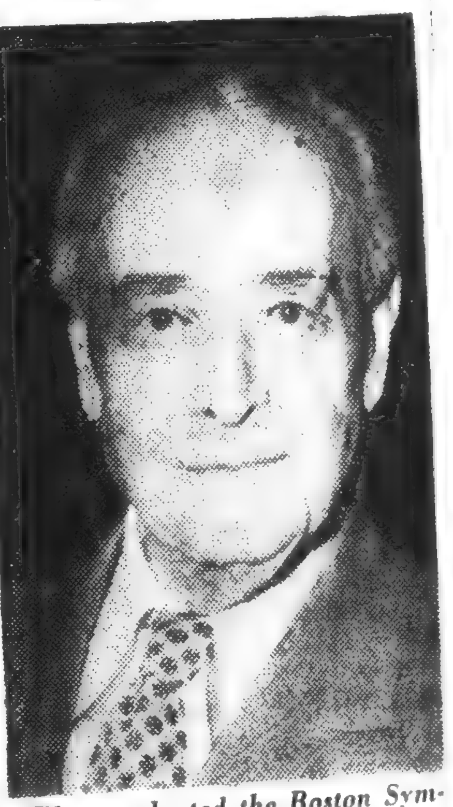
MUSIC

By VIRGIL THOMSON

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, concert of American music Wednesday night at Carnegie Hall. Soloist: Ruth Posselt, violinist. The program:

American Festival Overture...William Schuman
Recordare ....Lukas Foss
(First New York performance, composer conducting)
Concerto for Violin and Orchestra ......Samuel Barber
Hymn and Fuguing Tune No. 2....Henry Cowell
Symphony No. 3..................Walter Piston

Serge Koussevitzky



Who conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra Wednesday night at Carnegie Hall

American Revivals

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra Wednesday night in Carnegie Hall, offered New York the first of two concerts reviewing certain high points about American music composed in the last ten years. Most of the pieces on both programs (the other will be played Saturday afternoon) have been introduced to the public by the good Doctor himself and are the work of composers whose musical growth has been the object of continuous encouragement on his part. William Schuman, Lukas Foss, Samuel Barber, Henry Cowell and Walter Piston were the writers honored Wednesday night. Lukas Foss's "Recordare," not previously heard in New York, was conducted by the composer.

* * *

This is a funeral ode to Mohandas K. Gandhi. Its material is a long-spun melody accompanied by single-note pizzicatti in uniform rhythmic spacing and alternated with brass passages of military connotation. It is pleasant of tune, a little thin of substance, as well as of texture, and definitely monotonous as to rhythm. Its expressive contrasts appeared to your reviewer as excessive in view of the work's not very great expressive intensity. As a whole, the piece seemed more ambitious in expression than its slender material and halting development were able to justify.

* * *

Henry Cowell's Hymn and Fuguing Tune, No. 2, for strings alone, is an extended and songful development in the diatonic modal manner practiced by our American back-country forefathers. It sings; it soars; it leaps with joy. And always it is full of a great seriousness and a great dignity. I am not sure it is just the right length for an evocation of that kind. Myself, I should have preferred it longer. Certainly I was sorry when it ended. because it had made music all the way through.

* * *

Among the more familiar works, Samuel Barber's Violin Concerto impressed me as wearing well. Its tunes are gracious; its harmony is sophisticated without being ostentatious; its rhythm is always alive, and its instrumentation is delicious. It bears a musical refinement all round superior to anything of the kind heard Wednesday evening, though the Piston Third Symphony is a work of far more detailed elaboration and joinery. Barber's piece, moreover, is direct, plain and full as expression. Its weaknesses are a similar expressive content during two movements (this author's characteristic vein of elegy) and an overbusy third movement (a sort of perpetual-motion piece thin of thought). All the same it is a musical work, a real one, and can be listened to.

TIME MAGAZINE
CHICAGO, ILL.

JAN 17 1949

78

Serge Koussevitzky was in the middle of his 25th and final year as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. In honor of the quarter-century of musical service, Boston's starchiest citizens unbent to give him (and his whole orchestra) a lavish testimonial dinner and full documentary proof of just how much they admire him: a scroll making him the only non-Harvard lifetime honorary member of Boston's fusty Harvard Club.

[235]

CHICAGO, ILL.
TRIBUNE
JAN 16 1949

on the Aisle

by Claudia Cassidy

SEEING KIRSTEN FLAGSTAD a little plumper, tho no less beautiful, and hearing the compassionate depth and warmth now flooding that glorious voice and giving it open sesame to the rarest literature of song reminded me so vividly of a letter from Lotte Lehmann perhaps you will like seeing it, too.

"Fruitcake!" she writes reproachfully, "what a name for such a dream. Unfortunately I succumb thoroly to the temptation and eat too much of it. So it will be your fault if I should lose the 'line' which I got with much energy and frustration. When the cake will be finished—I am afraid soon, according to the rate of our greediness—I have to starve myself near death for a time or all my concert dresses shall be too tight. Miss Angovar, the successor to Howard Greer, who does my gowns, has warned me already very severely that I cannot—just cannot—gain an ounce, or everything will be spoiled. So you see what you have done!

"Frances (her friend and translator, Frances Holden) gave me for Christmas three opera scores which I wanted to have and was not able to get: Strauss' 'Intermezzo,' 'Frau ohne Schatten' and 'Ariadne.' It has been the most exciting present I could get and I was dissolved in tears. Reading thru them I lived again in my parts—O, those wonderful roles, how breathtakingly marvellous. To have the power again, the wonderful and careless power of my youth to sing those parts again! Perhaps there will be a time when I can study these parts with a young singer and so—vicariously experiencing them anew—give myself to them thru the medium of another singer.

"My life has been so very rich—and so colorful as if I was swaying between different lives, different stars, different worlds. I have to be very grateful and should not weep that I cannot be the same I have been years ago. One cannot have more wisdom, understanding, deepest penetrating into the endless beauty of the Lied—and yet have youth and power and what not. One progresses—one steps upwards step by step. And conquering always higher planes one has to lose the lovely valleys where one has been at home—once upon a time."

Do you wonder that the wisdom, the rueful tenderness of her Marschallin is one of the miracles of opera? And that her letter also said, "Did you like my 'Winterreise' pictures a little bit?" Because, tho I am not completely without manners, I can find no words to thank her for the little album holding photografs of the paintings she made illustrating the 24 songs of the Shubert cycle.

Twin of That Fruitcake Causes No Damage

Still, I feel a little guilty about that fruitcake, and relieved to know that its twin caused no damage. It caught up with Ruth Page in Palm Springs where she was working with Remisoff on a ballet, in brief holiday from the Ballet Russe de Monte Carlo. Some of the other dancers arrived on holiday junket and the fruitcake vanished in one festive binge. There couldn't have been enough to cause any costume designer any gnashing of teeth, and, for that matter, what can one fruitcake do that fouettes, tours en l'air, entrechats and a cabriole or two won't undo?

Koussevitzky Recording a Rare Item

I seem to have done Victor a bad turn by mentioning my delight in its Christmas gift, the recording of the slow movement of his double bass concerto, played by Serge Koussevitzky with Pierre Luboshutz at the piano. People tried to buy it, and I don't blame them. But Dale Ford writes, "So glad you enjoyed the Koussevitzky Christmas record. I know you will be interested in knowing that this disc is not a reissue, never having been pressed nor made available to the general public." Somehow that recording reminds me of the portrait of the player and his double bass hanging in Koussevitzky's lovely home at Tanglewood. If you say it doesn't do him justice he comes halfway to the picture's defense. He says, "Perhaps it is not very good of me, but it is very fine of the instrument."

A Horn Solo from Neveu Review

One testy and at least occasional reader demands from time to time that I "throw away the hammer and get a horn." The last time he brought up the subject was when I had been more dismayed than delighted with the debut of Ginette Neveu. By sheer coincidence I am able to play him a horn solo from a review by Marguirite Schumann in the Lawrence college Laurentian. "Taking one concert with another," writes Miss Schumann, "we have never warmed much to those exercises for unaccompanied fiddle, where the poor performer, for the sake of his professional pride, forces his four business fingers to encompass a batch of notes that would keep a pianist busy with all 10 digits. The Bach Chaconne, for violin alone, was one of those rare exceptions where we are willing to eat our words, and if comment on it is brief, it is because the Bach was so good we forgot to take notes. Miss Neveu gave that Chaconne a throbbing soul, and every one who says that Bach is passionless has never seen the heat ergs rising from the Neveu Stradivarius." Or, for that matter, from Miss Schumann's typewriter.

Unanswerable Questions

R. L. Smith, back in Houston after a long session overseas when he read about theater in the Overseas Tribune, wants to know the best month to come up from Texas and see the shows. How can you tell a show hungry man the best month was last December?

Even worse, a stamped envelope accompanies this inquiry: "A group of us students from Bethel college, together with our music professor, are planning to attend the opera in the very near future. Can you send us, by return mail, a list of the operas that are to appear?"

Shall I forward this one to the Civic Opera house, just gone dark again, or to the Auditorium, which never got reopened?

Monitor
Jan 13

rt—Music—Theater

Midweek

Classics Conducted By Burgin

Choosing a conservative yet vigorous program, Richard Burgin last night led the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Symphony Hall in performances of Weber's Overture to "Euryanthe"; Brahms' Symphony No. 3 in F major; Bruckner's Adagio from the String Quintet, and Rimsky-Korsakov's Suite from the Opera, "The Fairy Tale of Tsar Saltan."

Mr. Burgin's spirited reading of the Weber Overture supplied a brilliant opening to this fifth program in the Tuesday evening series. He is a strong, energetic conductor. He calls forth powerful sonorities from the orchestra. The more ethereal, poetic essences of the music do not emerge with too much clarity, but he compensates to some extent for this deficiency by his fire and vigor.

His interpretation of the Brahms Third was especially stirring and forceful. He gave an engaging lilt to the nostalgic waltz of the third movement. He followed this Titanic score with the Adagio from Bruckner's only chamber work, played by the string orchestra.

Although originally scored for two violins, two violas, and cello, the Bruckner takes on symphonic dimensions when played by the larger orchestra. It is well-bound in good form. The harmonies reflect the Wagnerian chromaticism. It is a trifle long, perhaps, but interesting throughout.

Mr. Burgin concluded the program with the dashing and colorful "musical pictures" of Rimsky-Korsakov—his Suite for Orchestra from "The Fairy Tale of Tsar Saltan." Last night the orchestra played the first two and fourth movements, omitting "The Flight of the Bumble Bee," the scherzo from the opera which was not published as part of the original suite.

H. R.

Farewell to Springfield

Serge Koussevitzky will make his last appearance in Springfield as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Municipal Auditorium on Tuesday evening at 8:30. Dr. Koussevitzky this spring completes his 25th and final year as conductor of this orchestra.

The Springfield program consists of the Concerto for Orchestra by Carl Philipp Emanuel Bach, arranged by Maximilian Steinberg, "Rounds for String Orchestra" by David Diamond: Prokofiev's "Scythian Suite," and Beethoven's Seventh Symphony.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
SUN
JAN 17 1949

Hanson Concerto Heard With Rudolf Firkusny

The two-session festival of American music sponsored by Serge Koussevitsky during the current visit of the Boston Symphony concluded on Saturday afternoon in Carnegie Hall with another program diverse both in substance and quality. In scope the most consequential of the unfamiliar works was Howard Hanson's only piano concerto, conducted by the composer, with Rudolf Firkusny as soloist. Hanson may be commended for going his own way as a composer, but it is not a way that this listener finds congenial. The melodic content is weak for the meaning it is meant to convey, the musical dress a motley of periods and styles. Firkusny's playing was adroit, but there was little with which he could be convincing. Irving Fine's "Toccata Concertante," a neo-Stravinskyian exercise in orchestral writing, and E. B. Hill's "Music for English Horn and Orchestra" were the other new works. Summoned from the past were Diamond's "Rounds" for strings, the third symphony of Harris and Copland's masterful "Lincoln Portrait," with Wesley Addey as narrator. All the composers were present and acclaimed.

Boston Symphony Offers Final Koussevitzky Concert

Famous Conductor Presents Remarkable Concert at The Auditorium; Will Retire as Orchestra Head At Close of Current Season

Spfld Mass.

By W. HARLEY RUDKIN

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, presented a concert at the Auditorium last evening under the auspices of the Springfield Orchestra Association.

While there was more than a touch of "auld lang syne" in the reception accorded the world famous maestro, here for his final appearance at the conclusion of 25 years at the head of the Boston Symphony, the program itself had more to do with the future than the past.

Known equally for his scholarly understanding of the old masters and his ardent pioneering in the realm of "modern music," Dr. Koussevitzky last evening gave his listeners a rare privilege, that of being able to hear the Boston Symphony at its best in widely varied media.

The Program

The opening section comprised the C. P. E. Bach Concerto in D Major for Strings, arranged by Maximilian Steinberg; progressed through the beguiling "Rounds for String Orchestra," by David Diamond, and the electric, "Scythian Suite" of Prokofieff, and concluded with Beethoven's sonorous Seventh Symphony.

It was an evening that opened rich with promise, and closed with the promise fulfilled.

There concert had no highlight. It was all highlight, with personal preference being the only possible yardstick. All of the music was exciting, all impeccably played. The pleasant departure, for this reviewer at least, was the section which included the modern composers. This is not to decry the excellence of the musicians who have left their mark on the musical history of the world, but rather to reiterate that to live entirely in the past is to eventually stagnate. If no one ever played modern music, it would soon die from lack of nourishment.

In fact, it very nearly did die, until Dr. Koussevitzky and several of his contemporaries provided the needed transfusion. Neither the Diamond nor the Prokofieff, may be considered the ultimate in the music of our age. If no one had ever been interested in anything but Haydn and Mozart, there might never have been a Beethoven. The same holds true of any time.

The "Scythian Suite"

After the tender, rhythmic sweetness of the Bach concerto, a gorgeous glowing pattern woven by the most skillful string orchestra in the world, the Diamond and Prokofieff came as something of a shock. This is particularly true of the "Scythian Suite," a fantasy of rampaging tonal color that seems to run riot with the careless abandon of a shattered prism.

The suite, originally designed as a ballet, is a direct departure from some of Prokofieff's other music—"Lieutenant Kije," the "Classical Symphony," or "Peter and the Wolf." It is a flaming allegory, this tale of "Ala and Lolli," and into the telling Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra last night brought sterling musicianship, plus that something extra which always makes the difference between excellence and perfection.

The Beethoven Seventh, which closed the program, was a fitting climax to a rich association which this area has enjoyed with the Boston Symphony and Dr. Koussevitzky over the past 25 years. It was grand music in the grand manner, by grand musicians.

Records

Koussevitzky Performs on Double Bass

By JAY C. ROSENFELD
(Berkshire Eagle)

An album about to be released by RCA Victor will probably incorporate what to most of us has been a legend into an actual and lasting pleasure. Three Red Seal de luxe Vinylite records made by Serge Koussevitzky in 1929 offer music lovers a chance not only to hear performances of unique beauty, but also to learn of what has come to be a lost art. The albums will be sold as souvenirs of the 25th season of Dr. Koussevitzky as conductor of the Boston Symphony and the proceeds will benefit the Koussevitzky 25th anniversary fund of the orchestra.

The venerated Boston conductor first came into musical prominence as a virtuoso on the double-bass viol, but was forced to let his instrumental activities vanish when his orchestral duties became so much more important when he first arrived in Boston. Meanwhile the contrabass had fallen into disrepute as a solo instrument; these records may be considered as a record for posterity.

* * *

Two of the sides were previously released, but the remaining four sides were kept in the vaults of the Victor company up to now. Koussevitzky felt in 1929 that they did not represent what he had been able to accomplish on the instrument, but today their historic value has persuaded him to approve their release.

Immediately discernible are the attributes which make orchestral music under his direction so absorbing; a magnificent conception of line, a continuously glowing tone and the peerless faculty of maintaining and re-instilling vigorous urgency in the music. Except for a propensity to make his shifts and slides very noticeable, the mechanics of the playing are formidable. His intonation has the character associated with Casals and Heifetz, the tone has a vivid warmth and the bowing the uncanny amplitude of those masters who know the secret of preserving intensity without expending all their resources.

* * *

The breadth of the "Largo" from the Eccles sonata is probably the best example of his individual eloquence and graphic expressiveness. The piano accompaniments were done with completely worthy artistry by Pierre Luboshutz. The literature for the instrument is extremely meager. Thus Koussevitzky composed many things to enlarge his personal repertory. In addition to the Eccles, there are his own "Valse Miniature," his "Chanson Triste," Opus 2 and the second movement, andante, from his own concerto in F minor, Opus 3, and a "Wiegenlied" by Gustav Laska.

It used to be the custom at times to use a smaller instrument for solo playing than the dinosaurian monster ordinarily used today in orchestral playing. There is no reason to warrant any such assumption in this case. The smaller body, however, permitted the achievement of a cello-like tone while the employment of a longer neck retained the problems peculiar to the unwieldy viol. This album exhibits another and less known facet of Koussevitzky's art and proves, if proof were necessary, that the talents which have made him superlative as a conductor served him equally well as a performer.

[236]

NEW YORK, N. Y.
PM
STAR
1949

Music . . . by Robert A. Hague

All-American Festival—Part II

The Star Reviews

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, Serge Koussevitzky conducting; soloists, Rudolf Firkusny, pianist; Louis Speyer, English horn, and Wesley Addy, speaker; Saturday afternoon at Carnegie Hall. The program:

Rounds for String Orchestra	Diamond
Toccata Concertante	Fine
Concerto in G Major for Pianoforte and Orchestra, Op. 36 (Conducted by the composer)	Hanson
Symphony No. 3	Harris
Music for English Horn and Orchestra, Op. 50	Hill
A Lincoln Portrait	Copland

The second and concluding session, Saturday afternoon in Carnegie Hall, of Serge Koussevitzky's and the Boston Symphony's American Music Festival brought performances of six more recent works by native composers. Two of them were receiving first New York hearings—Irving Fine's Toccata Concertante and Howard Hanson's Piano Concerto in G major, with Rudolf Firkusny as soloist.

All six pieces were very cordially received by the sold-out house and most of the composers were present to bow acknowledgment. To Dr. Hanson fell the added honor of conducting his own composition.

• • •

The Hanson Piano Concerto is a handsome and effective piece in the composer's characteristic conservative style. Though thoroughly conventional in mold and manner, and often remindful of its models—the concerti of Schumann, Grieg and Rachmaninoff, it nevertheless has a good deal that is fresh and affecting to say, and says it with considerable grace and conviction. Its opening movement is at first pleasantly lyrical and then engagingly animated; the second, fast, turbulent and brief, with a dash of jazz in its rhythmic make-up; the third, slow and song-like, commonplace in its poetry, but sincerely felt and simply expressed; and the final Allegro, if a little over-insistent in its liveliness and monotonous in its rhythms, gives both soloist and orchestra an opportunity to show off their virtuosity. Mr. Firkusny and the orchestra gave of their highly distinguished best to put the work over handsomely under the composer's baton.

Also along conventional lines, though based on more recent models, is Mr. Fine's Toccata Concertante. It is a skillful and fluent orchestral exercise in the neo-classic or, more specifically, neo-Baroque style—tuneful and energetic, cheerful of mood and felicitous of sound.

Howard Hanson, composer-conductor (left), and Rudolf Firkusny, pianist, who collaborated Saturday in the Boston Symphony's first New York performance of Hanson's Piano Concerto.

Of the more familiar pieces, David Diamond's Rounds for String Orchestra, with its bright, buoyant end movements and lyric central Adagio, was beautifully played by the Boston musicians; as was Edward Burlingame Hill's Music for English Horn and Orchestra, with its long-breathed melody for the solo instrument finely sustained by Louis Speyer. And although this listener has several reservations about the final worth of Roy Harris' Third Symphony, which Dr. Koussevitzky some years ago pronounced "the first truly great orchestral work to be produced in America," he cannot help but admire the skill, compactness and equitable proportion of its writing and the not inconsiderable eloquence and persuasiveness of its speech.

• • •

But the most impressive and truly moving music of the afternoon came at the end in Aaron Copland's A Lincoln Portrait. Here at last was music one could fully believe in, music of real individuality of substance and texture, truly original in thought and style, and of unescapable communicative power. Given an exceptionally sensitive and dramatic performance by Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra, and with Wesley Addy offering an impassioned delivery of Lincoln's own words, which are embedded in the work's final section, it stood head and shoulders above the rest of the program, and brought the festival to an appropriately illustrious close.

Along with the Samuel Barber Violin Concerto, heard at Wednesday's concert, the Copland work confirmed one's faith in the vitality and validity of contemporary American music.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
JOURNAL AMERICAN

JAN 17 1949

Koussevitsky's Festival Was Interesting, Valuable

By MILES KASTENDIECK

Koussevitsky concluded his American Music Festival on Saturday. The survey proved to be interesting and valuable. What questions it posed regarding the last decade in native composition may be considered later. Its service to composers and audiences was inestimable.

The second Carnegie Hall program lined up music of Diamond, Fine, Hanson, Harris, Hill, and Copland. Among the works Fine's Toccata Concertante and Hanson's Piano Concerto were first New York performances. Rudolf Firkusny distinguished himself as the piano soloist.

Since there appears to be more of Hanson in this concerto than in many of his other works, it qualifies as one of the best examples of his writing. It may well be the finest music he has composed. Having definitely emerged from the Sibelius influence he writes securely and well, perhaps too rationally for general appeal.

The four short movements reflect those augularities of style so common in present-day music. There is also some expressive lyricism. The piano plays almost continuously, contributing some clever endings for at least two movements.

Conducting his own work, Hanson leaned too heavily into the orchestration, but Firkusny's neat playing balanced nicely.

That academic style which makes good "paper" music showed Fine to be technically and formally capable. The "Toccata" created no stir musically. The audience applauded politely.

Diamond's "Round for String Orchestra," Harris's Third Symphony, Hill's "Music for English Horn and Orchestra," and Copland's "Lincoln Portrait" indicated the healthy state of American music.

These the Boston Symphony and their illustrious conductor set forth convincingly. Louis Speyer gave a felicitous account of the horn part in Hill's delightful piece. Wesley Addy boomed forth unnecessarily as narrator in the Copland.

Each of these works had its individuality, each made a contribution. None may be a masterpiece, but each belongs in the current reportory of our symphony orchestras. Conductors please take note.

• • •

Mugaloff Recital

Too many splendidly-equipped pianists just miss the mark. In his Carnegie Hall recital last night, Nikita Magaloff exhibited an admirable pianistic style, solid musicianship, and thoughtful interprestation. His playing simply didn't catch fire.

Performances of Haydn's Sonata in F, two Schubert impromptus, and the Liszt Sonata came out a little stiff, with flashes of perception in meaning and in coloring.

Had these been consolidated the recital would have gained distinction. Some tendency toward understatement and speed may have been responsible.

• • •

Noble Program

Credit Stanley Lock with the most provocative piano-recital program of the season to date. Six works in his Town Hall list last night were first performances.

Even Beethoven's Sonata, Opus 28, hardly qualified as hackneyed. It was a daring venture, worthwhile from the start. The composers honored were Bernhard Heiden, Arthur Berger, Vittorio Rieti, Marcelle de Manziarly, and Willem Pijper.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE

JAN 19

Allston Burr, Banker, Dies; Harvard '89

Held Many Alumni Posts, Received Medal in '42; Member of Boston Firm

Special to the Herald Tribune

NEWTON, Mass., Jan. 18.—Allston Burr, eighty-two, investment banker and Harvard alumnus, died today. He lived at Chestnut Hills, Mass.

Mr. Burr had been a director since 1916 of the Boston investment banking firm of Coffin & Burr, Inc., with offices at 60 State Street.

He was president of the Harvard Alumni Association in 1929 and chairman of the Harvard War Memorial Committee for World War I. In 1942 he received the alumni association's annual medal for outstanding service to Harvard, the third man to receive this award.

Mr. Burr was an overseer of the college, treasurer of his class, 1889, and the class's agent for the Harvard Fund. He also had been for many years a trustee of the Phillips Brooks House Association. He was awarded an honorary M. A. degree in 1931 for his services to the university.

After his graduation in 1889, Mr. Burr was associated with the Thompson-Houston Electric Company until 1893, and was treasurer of the United Electric Securities Company until 1898. He then became a member of the investment banking firm of Perry, Coffin and Burr, with which he remained until Coffin and Burr, Inc., was established in 1916.

Mr. Burr was a director of the Children's Mission, the Boston Floating Hospital, the Boston Provident Association, the Family Welfare Society, the Community Federation, and other charities, and was a trustee of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the Boston Athenaeum, and Radcliffe College.

His hobby had been mountain climbing and he was a member of the Alpine Clubs of America, London, Canada, France and Switzerland.

During World War I Mr. Burr was chairman of the Boston Chapter of the American Red Cross, serving until 1921, and was a director at the time of his death.

His clubs include the Harvard, Somerset, Tavern, Union, Union Boat, Boston; Harvard and University, New York, and Faculty, Cambridge, Mass.

His wife, Mrs. Elizabeth Jenks Randolph Burr, whom he married in June, 1898, died in September, 1939. No immediate relatives survive.

ROCHESTER, N. Y.
DEMOCRAT-CHRONICLE

JAN 19 1949

Honored Again

After many years of helping American composers to get public hearings of their music, Dr. Howard Hanson found himself presenting one of his own works as part of the "American Music Festival" of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in New York. It is, of course, no new experience for Dr. Hanson to be on the presenting end of a concert of this sort. His more important works invariably have had premieres of recognized interest to the musical world.

The concert in New York had elements of newness, however, which re-emphasized Dr. Hanson's place among leading American composers of the day. His new work, a Piano Concerto in G major, was on a program that included new music by such distinctive American writers as Roy Harris, David Diamond, Irving Fine, Aaron Copland, all of the new school that is working toward an American classic form. With the Boston Symphony to do the instrumental work, this was something much more than a formal tryout. It was a concert of wide appeal to public and critics.

Olin Downes, veteran critic of the New York Times, found the playing of the orchestra in the Hanson concerto, and under the direction of the composer, "superb." He reported the concerto was "written with sureness of hand and an experienced eye to effect, by a composer who is not in the least afraid of being direct, melodic, virtuosic to the point of the obvious." A later hearing, he thinks, will tell how it stands by the best of Dr. Hanson's other works.

Dr. Hanson for many years has been writing some of the most important serious music in this country. This city is always gratified to find him getting recognition like this from the highest musical authorities.

MUNCIE, IND.
EVENING STAR

1949

A Woman's New York

By ALICE HUGHES

Listening to the American Music Festival played last week in New York, I felt a sense of loss that this is swan-song year for Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, baton-master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Perhaps his successor Dr. Charles Munch, who will conduct in his place next fall after Koussy's retirement, can take his place musically. But no other conductor can project himself to audiences as Koussy does. Tocanini casts a spell upon people, true, with his dedicated spirit. Stokowski's personal magnetism, his blue-white hair and his sensitive hands seize attention. But there's no showman like Kossy. His sense of dramatic timing are hairtrigger.

Koussevitzky is hep to the times. He feels the throb of native pride in such current events as the Freedom Train, Friendship Train and other popular proofs of America's culture and democracy. So he geared his last year of orchestral conducting to the spirit of the times. During his twenty-five years of conducting he has introduced a number of American composers; Aaron Copeland, Samuel Barber, Walter Piston, Henry Cowell, Lukas Foss, Roy Harris, William Schuman, Leonard Bernstein and others. He is devoting this year to a review of the achievement in American music, and the Carnegie Hall cheered and cheered.

Next day the Boston Symphony Orchestra flew to Washington. For its last appearance in the Capital City, Koussy had invited President Truman who wrote regrets: "It's your last, but my first as new President," he wrote in effect. "Because of the Inaugural I will unhappily not be able to attend." But Koussevitzky never takes no for an answer. Changing the program, he wrote again to President Truman: "I am heartbroken you cannot come. Particularly since I have included Aaron Copeland's 'Lincoln Portrait' especially in your honor." Not long after came the reply from President Truman thanking Dr. Koussevitzky sincerely. "Under the circumstances I shall of course be there," he said in effect. And as far as I know, he was.

* * *

UNDERGROUND WALK — Pedestrian traffic isn't half as bad as vehicular in New York. Still it's good to hear about any kind of improvement for the foot-weary. Just like the subway shuttles cross town on 42nd street we'll be able to short-cut across several streets through a new underground passageway. Only difference, pedestrians don't pay a penny for the underground walk. Approved by Police Commissioner Arthur W. Wollander, the project took only two weeks to complete and cost $3,800. There's talk of having the same kind of arrangement for another part of town, too. A good idea for stormy weather and when one's in a rush: No streets to cross nor strollers to avoid.

HACKENSACK, N. J.
RECORD

JAN 20 1949

Koussevitzky Bass Records Released

An album of double-bass recordings by Serge Koussevitzky is about to be issued. The recordings were made for Victor in 1929, when Dr. Koussevitzky played for the last time the instrument by which he first won fame. The collection consists of the andante from Koussevitzky's own Double Bass Concerto, his Chanson Triste and "Valse Miniature", a largo by Eccles, and a lullaby by Laska. A few copies of the Eccles number and the "Chanson Triste" were circulated 20 years ago, but the other recordings are to be released for the first time.

They will make possible a wide acquaintance with the beauties of an instrument otherwise virtually unknown in its solo possibilities as played by an unexampled virtuoso of the double bass. The albums will be sold as souvenirs of the twenty-fifth anniversary season of Dr. Koussevitzky as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The instrument commands a considerable part of the violoncello range, and he played with the ease and subtlety of a cellist, despite the awkwardness of the double-bass bow, which is grasped fistwise. But his instrument gave an especial color of its own to these tones, and could descend into richer depths with equal subtlety.

After 1929 Koussevitsky's duties as conductor compelled him to lay aside the bass which to be played to his own satisfaction exacted many hours of constant practice. Koussevitsky as master artist of the double bass became from that moment a legend.

Jan 19

JOHNSON IN DEBUT CONCERT

Conductor Presents Fine Program in Cambridge

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Thor Johnson, who since 1947 has been the conductor of the Cincinnati Symphony, is this week making his initial appearance as guest conductor of our own orchestra, though he did direct a Pop•Concert the summer before last.

AT SANDERS THEATRE

Since I shall not be able to hear Mr. Johnson at any of the three week-end concerts, I took advantage of the opportunity to hear him last night in Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, where he presented the program that he will conduct next Sunday afternoon in Symphony Hall. With the substitution of a new piece by Norman Dello Joio for Smetana's "The Moldau," this was also the program that will be heard at the concerts of Friday and Saturday.

It began with Mozart's "Haffner" Symphony and continued with five excerpts from Vaughan Williams' "Masque for Dancing," "Job" and concluded with a suite from Strauss' "Der Rosenkavalier," hitherto unperformed by the Boston Symphony. Such gaudy frivolities, I might add, are not for Dr. Koussevitzky.

Those who think that the American-born conductor should have his chance will rejoice in the fact that 35-year-old Mr. Johnson occupies one of the major orchestral posts in this country.

Like Leonard Bernstein, he studied with Dr. Koussevitzky at the Berkshire Music Centre, having previously studied in Europe with Weingartner, Walter and others.

More Rehearsals

Mr. Johnson knows his business. He is also essentially business-like in manner and appearance. Last evening's audience plainly took to him, even heaping rounds of applause on the music of Vaughn Williams that I personally find rather dull stuff.

If it impressed me more favorably when Sir Adrian Boult gave it to us in 1946, it might have been because it shone by comparison with the other British music that surrounded it. At least, it is effectively scored and, as did the music of Strauss later, put the Boston Symphony in a flattering light.

For two reasons it is not entirely fair to judge Mr. Johnson's abilities on the basis of this particular concert. By Friday he will have had two more days of rehearsal, which should benefit the Mozart Symphony, that went a bit stiffly, as well as iron out certain rough spots in the "Rosenkavalier" suite.

Also, a conductor unused to Sanders Theatre, can easily misjudge its sensitive acoustics. Certain passages that last evening were almost deafening will not sound so in Symphony Hall. The music of Smetana received a sturdy performance. If nothing was exactly subtle, a possible reason for that has already been given.

BUFFALO, N. Y.
COURIER-EXPRESS

JAN 20 1949

Koussevitzky's Showmanship Makes Him Hard to Replace

By ALICE HUGHES

Alice Hughes

New York, Jan. 19—Listening to the American Music Festival played last week in New York, I felt a sense of a loss that this is swan-song year for Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, baton-master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Perhaps his successor Dr. Charles Munch, who will conduct in his place next Fall after Koussy's retirement, can take his place musically. But no other conductor can project himself to audiences as Koussy does. Toscanini casts a spell upon people, true, with his dedicated spirit. Stokowski's personal magnetism, his blue-white hair and his sensitive hands seize attention. But there's no showman like Koussy. His sense of dramatic timing is hair-trigger.

Koussevitzky is hep to the times. He feels the throb of native pride in such current events as the Freedom Train, Friendship Train and other popular proofs of America's culture and democracy. So he geared his last year of orchestral conducting to the spirit of the times. During his 25 years of conducting he has introduced a number of American composers—Aaron Copeland, Samuel Barber, Walter Piston, Henry Cowell, Lukas Foss, Roy Harris, William Schuman, Leonard Bernstein and others. He is devoting this year to a review of the achievement in American music, and the Carnegie Hall cheered and cheered.

Next day the Boston Symphony Orchestra flew to Washington. For its last appearance in the Capital City, Koussy had invited President Truman, who wrote regrets: "It's your last, but my first as new President," he wrote in effect. "Because of the Inaugural I will unhappily not be able to attend." But Koussevitzky never takes "no" for an answer. Changing the program, he wrote again to President Truman: "I am heartbroken you cannot come. Particularly since I have included Aaron Copeland's Lincoln Portrait especially in your honor." Not long after came the reply from President Truman thanking Dr. Koussevitzky sincerely. "Under the circumstances I shall of course be there," he said in effect. And as far as I know, he was.

UNDERGROUND WALK—Pedestrian traffic isn't half as bad as vehicular in New York. Still it's good to hear about any kind of improvement for the foot-weary. Just like the subway shuttles crosstown on 42d St. we'll be able to short-cut across several streets through a new underground passageway. Only difference, pedestrians don't pay a penny for the underground walk. Approved by Police Commissioner Arthur W. Wallander, the project took only two weeks to complete and cost $3,800. There's talk of having the same kind of arrangement for another part of town, too. A good idea for stormy weather and when one's in a rush: No streets to cross nor strollers to avoid.

Copyright, 1949, King Features Synd., Inc.

THE NEW YORKER

and I must confess to a moment or two when I wished that the composer-conductor would sneak a few bars of somebody else's into the program, if only for contrast. On reflection, though, I think that Stravinsky knew what he was doing. How many times in one's lifetime is one able to hear a composer of unquestioned immortality conduct an evening of his own works with an orchestra of unquestioned talent?

It was a Stravinsky evening, all right. Stravinsky's son, Soulima, played the solo part in the Concerto for Piano and Wind Orchestra, and played it with diligent devotion to his father, whose mobile hands he seemed to be watching much of the time. (The two Stravinskys look so much alike that when they walked out on the Carnegie Hall stage, I had the thought that, like those old Chinese boxes from our childhood, an endless succession of Stravinskys, each smaller than the next, would suddenly materialize and fill the hall.) Watching the elder Stravinsky conduct and listening to the sounds, I became more aware than ever before of the variety of this man's work and his dedication of himself to it. In Stravinsky's autobiography, there is a portrait of him by Picasso that reduces him to what I take to be his essentials in the eyes of an artist. The other night, we were privileged to hear Stravinsky reduce himself to his own idea of his essentials—no mean privilege.

NOW for the Cleveland Orchestra. It gave us almost a Pop Concert, and a long one, at that: Smetana's overture to "The Bartered Bride," Schumann's First Symphony, Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel," and Brahms' Piano Concerto No. 1. But, through some magic, George Szell, the conductor, and his men aroused a full house to cheers at the end of the concert, and few cheers this season have been so well merited. "Till Eulenspiegel" was played with extraordinary control and understanding. The Schumann came alive and sang its own songs. As for the Brahms, Mr. Szell was fortunate in having as soloist Rudolf Firkusny, whose performance was nothing short of miraculous. The concert was a delight, demonstrating what can happen when a superior group has a superior hand at the helm.

—PHILIP HAMBURGER

[2-c]

ROCHESTER, N. Y.
DEMOCRAT-CHRONICLE
JAN 1 9 1949

Honored Again

After many years of helping American composers to get public hearings of their music, Dr. Howard Hanson found himself presenting one of his own works as part of the "American Music Festival" of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in New York. It is, of course, no new experience for Dr. Hanson to be on the presenting end of a concert of this sort. His more important works invariably have had premières of recognized interest to the musical world.

The concert in New York had elements of newness, however, which re-emphasized Dr. Hanson's place among leading American composers of the day. His new work, a Piano Concerto in G major, was on a program that included new music by such distinctive American writers as Roy Harris, David Diamond, Irving Fine, Aaron Copland, all of the new school that is working toward an American classic form. With the Boston Symphony to do the instrumental work, this was something much more than a formal tryout. It was a concert of wide appeal to public and critics.

Olin Downes, veteran critic of the New York Times, found the playing of the orchestra in the Hanson concerto, and under the direction of the composer, "superb." He reported the concerto was "written with sureness of hand and an experienced eye to effect, by a composer who is not in the least afraid of being direct, melodic, virtuosic to the point of the obvious." A later hearing, he thinks, will tell how it stands by the best of Dr. Hanson's other works.

Dr. Hanson for many years has been writing some of the most important serious music in this country. This city is always gratified to find him getting recognition like this from the highest musical authorities.

MUNCIE, IND.
EVENING STAR
JAN 20 1949

A Woman's New York

By ALICE HUGHES

Listening to the American Music Festival played last week in New York, I felt a sense of loss that this is swan-song year for Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, baton-master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Perhaps his successor Dr. Charles Munch, who will conduct in his place next fall after Koussy's retirement, can take his place musically. But no other conductor can project himself to audiences as Koussy does. Tocanini casts a spell upon people, true, with his dedicated spirit. Stokowski's personal magnetism, his blue-white hair and his sensitive hands seize attention. But there's no showman like Kossy. His sense of dramatic timing are hairtrigger.

Koussevitzky is hep to the times. He feels the throb of native pride in such current events as the Freedom Train, Friendship Train and other popular proofs of America's culture and democracy. So he geared his last year of orchestral conducting to the spirit of the times. During his twenty-five years of conducting he has introduced a number of American composers; Aaron Copeland, Samuel Barber, Walter Piston, Henry Cowell, Lukas Foss, Roy Harris, William Schuman, Leonard Bernstein and others. He is devoting this year to a review of the achievement in American music, and the Carnegie Hall cheered and cheered.

Next day the Boston Symphony Orchestra flew to Washington. For its last appearance in the Capital City, Koussy had invited President Truman who wrote regrets: "It's your last, but my first as new President," he wrote in effect. "Because of the Inaugural I will unhappily not be able to attend." But Koussevitzky never takes no for an answer. Changing the program, he wrote again to President Truman: "I am heartbroken you cannot come. Particularly since I have included Aaron Copeland's 'Lincoln Portrait' especially in your honor." Not long after came the reply from President Truman thanking Dr. Koussevitzky sincerely. "Under the circumstances I shall of course be there," he said in effect. And as far as I know, he was.

* * *

UNDERGROUND WALK — Pedestrian traffic isn't half as bad as vehicular in New York. Still it's good to hear about any kind of improvement for the foot-weary. Just like the subway shuttles crosstown on 42nd street we'll be able to short-cut across several streets through a new underground passageway. Only difference, pedestrians don't pay a penny for the underground walk. Approved by Police Commissioner Arthur W. Wallander, the project took only two weeks to complete and cost $3,800. There's talk of having the same kind of arrangement for another part of town, too. A good idea for stormy weather and when one's in a rush: No streets to cross nor strollers to avoid.

HACKENSACK, N. J.
RECORD
JAN 20 1949

Koussevitzky Bass Records Released

An album of double-bass recordings by Serge Koussevitzky is about to be issued. The recordings were made for Victor in 1929, when Dr. Koussevitzky played for the last ime the instrument by which he irst won fame. The collection consists of the andante from Koussevitzky's own Double Bass Concerto, his Chanson Triste and "Valse Miniature", a largo by Eccles, and a lullaby by Laska. A few copies of the Eccles number and the "Chanson Triste" were circulated 20 years ago, but the other recordings are to be released for the first time.

They will make possible a wide acquaintance with the beauties of an instrument otherwise virtually unknown in its solo possibilities as played by an unexampled virtuoso of the double bass. The albums will be sold as souvenirs of the twenty-fifth anniversary season of Dr. Koussevitzky as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The instrument commands a considerable part of the violoncello range, and he played with the ease and subtlety of a cellist, despite the awkwardness of the double-bass bow, which is grasped fistwise. But his instrument gave an especial color of its own to these tones, and could descend into richer depths with equal subtlety.

After 1929 Koussevitsky's duties as conductor compelled him to lay aside the bass which to be played to his own satisfaction exacted many hours of constant practice. Koussevitsky as master artist of the double bass became from that moment a legend.

Post Jan 19

JOHNSON IN DEBUT CONCERT

Conductor Presents Fine Program in Cambridge

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Thor Johnson, who since 1947 has been the conductor of the Cincinnati Symphony, is this week making his initial appearance as guest conductor of our own orchestra, though he did direct a Pop Concert the summer before last.

AT SANDERS THEATRE

Since I shall not be able to hear Mr. Johnson at any of the three week-end concerts, I took advantage of the opportunity to hear him last night in Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, where he presented the program that he will conduct next Sunday afternoon in Symphony Hall. With the substitution of a new piece by Norman Dello Joio for Smetana's "The Moldau," this was also the program that will be heard at the concerts of Friday and Saturday.

It began with Mozart's "Haffner" Symphony and continued with five excerpts from Vaughan Williams' "Masque for Dancing," "Job" and concluded with a suite from Strauss' "Der Rosenkavalier," hitherto unperformed by the Boston Symphony. Such gaudy frivolities, I might add, are not for Dr. Koussevitzky.

Those who think that the American-born conductor should have his chance will rejoice in the fact that 35-year-old Mr. Johnson occupies one of the major orchestral posts in this country.

Like Leonard Bernstein, he studied with Dr. Koussevitzky at the Berkshire Music Centre, having previously studied in Europe with Weingartner, Walter and others.

More Rehearsals

Mr. Johnson knows his business. He is also essentially business-like in manner and appearance. Last evening's audience plainly took to him, even heaping rounds of applause on the music of Vaughn Williams that I personally find rather dull stuff.

If it impressed me more favorably when Sir Adrian Boult gave it to us in 1946, it might have been because it shone by comparison with the other British music that surrounded it. At least, it is effectively scored and, as did the music of Strauss later, put the Boston Symphony in a flattering light.

For two reasons it is not entirely fair to judge Mr. Johnson's abilities on the basis of this particular concert. By Friday he will have had two more days of rehearsal, which should benefit the Mozart Symphony, that went a bit stiffly, as well as iron out certain rough spots in the "Rosenkavalier" suite.

Also, a conductor unused to Sanders Theatre, can easily misjudge its sensitive acoustics, Certain passages that last evening were almost deafening will not sound so in Symphony Hall. The music of Smetana received a sturdy performance. If nothing was exactly subtle, a possible reason for that has already been given.

BUFFALO, N. Y.
COURIER-EXPRESS
JAN 20 1949

Koussevitzky's Showmanship Makes Him Hard to Replace

By ALICE HUGHES

Alice Hughes

New York, Jan. 19—Listening to the American Music Festival played last week in New York, I felt a sense of a loss that this is swan-song year for Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, baton-master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Perhaps his successor Dr. Charles Munch, who will conduct in his place next Fall after Koussy's retirement, can take his place musically. But no other conductor can project himself to audiences as Koussy does. Toscanini casts a spell upon people, true, with his dedicated spirit. Stokowski's personal magnetism, his blue-white hair and his sensitive hands seize attention. But there's no showman like Koussy. His sense of dramatic timing is hair-trigger.

Koussevitzky is hep to the times. He feels the throb of native pride in such current events as the Freedom Train, Friendship Train and other popular proofs of America's culture and democracy. So he geared his last year of orchestral conducting to the spirit of the times. During his 25 years of conducting he has introduced a number of American composers—Aaron Copeland, Samuel Barber, Walter Piston, Henry Cowell, Lukas Foss, Roy Harris, William Schuman, Leonard Bernstein and others. He is devoting this year to a review of the achievement in American music, and the Carnegie Hall cheered and cheered.

Next day the Boston Symphony Orchestra flew to Washington. For its last appearance in the Capital City, Koussy had invited President Truman, who wrote regrets: "It's your last, but my first as new President," he wrote in effect. "Because of the Inaugural I will unhappily not be able to attend." But Koussevitzky never takes "no" for an answer. Changing the program, he wrote again to President Truman: "I am heartbroken you cannot come. Particularly since I have included Aaron Copeland's Lincoln Portrait especially in your honor." Not long after came the reply from President Truman thanking Dr. Koussevitzky sincerely. "Under the circumstances I shall of course be there," he said in effect. And as far as I know, he was.

UNDERGROUND WALK—Pedestrian traffic isn't half as bad as vehicular in New York. Still it's good to hear about any kind of improvement for the foot-weary. Just like the subway shuttles crosstown on 42d St. we'll be able to short-cut across several streets through a new underground passageway. Only difference, pedestrians don't pay a penny for the underground walk. Approved by Police Commissioner Arthur W. Wallander, the project took only two weeks to complete and cost $3,800. There's talk of having the same kind of arrangement for another part of town, too. A good idea for stormy weather and when one's in a rush: No streets to cross nor strollers to avoid.

Copyright, 1949, King Features Synd., Inc.

THE NEW YORKER

and I must confess to a moment or two when I wished that the composer-conductor would sneak a few bars of somebody else's into the program, if only for contrast. On reflection, though, I think that Stravinsky knew what he was doing. How many times in one's lifetime is one able to hear a composer of unquestioned immortality conduct an evening of his own works with an orchestra of unquestioned talent?

It was a Stravinsky evening, all right. Stravinsky's son, Soulima, played the solo part in the Concerto for Piano and Wind Orchestra, and played it with diligent devotion to his father, whose mobile hands he seemed to be watching much of the time. (The two Stravinskys look so much alike that when they walked out on the Carnegie Hall stage, I had the thought that, like those old Chinese boxes from our childhood, an endless succession of Stravinskys, each smaller than the next, would suddenly materialize and fill the hall.) Watching the elder Stravinsky conduct and listening to the sounds, I became more aware than ever before of the variety of this man's work and his dedication of himself to it. In Stravinsky's autobiography, there is a portrait of him by Picasso that reduces him to what I take to be his essentials in the eyes of an artist. The other night, we were privileged to hear Stravinsky reduce himself to his own idea of his essentials—no mean privilege.

NOW for the Cleveland Orchestra. It gave us almost a Pop Concert, and a long one, at that: Smetana's overture to "The Bartered Bride," Schumann's First Symphony, Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel," and Brahms' Piano Concerto No. 1. But, through some magic, George Szell, the conductor, and his men aroused a full house to cheers at the end of the concert, and few cheers this season have been so well merited. "Till Eulenspiegel" was played with extraordinary control and understanding. The Schumann came alive and sang its own songs. As for the Brahms, Mr. Szell was fortunate in having as soloist Rudolf Firkusny, whose performance was nothing short of miraculous. The concert was a delight, demonstrating what can happen when a superior group has a superior hand at the helm.

—PHILIP HAMBURGER

CIENCE MONITOR, BOSTON, THURSDAY, JANUARY 20, 1949

of Symphony—Baccaloni at

Dello Joio's Variations For Full Orchestra

Norman Dello Joio's Variations, Chaconne, and Finale for full orchestra will be played here for the first time tomorrow afternoon and Saturday evening in Symphony Hall by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Thor Johnson conducting. Mr. Johnson, conductor of the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra, will also direct Mozart's "Haffner" Symphony, excerpts from Vaughan Williams' "Job," and a suite from the Richard Strauss opera, "Der Rosenkavalier."

Dello Joio began his formal study of music when he enrolled at the Institute of Musical Art in New York City at the age of 19. Here he studied piano and organ with Gaston Dethier, and it was soon evident that composition was Dello Joio's forte. He later won a fellowship in the Juilliard Graduate School and studied composition there with Bernard Wagenaar.

* * *

The summers of 1940 and 1941 found him at the Berkshire Music Center, studying composition with Paul Hindemith, with whom he continued during the winter at the Yale School of Music. Twice he won Guggenheim Fellowships —1944-45 and 1945-46.

Dello Joio composed his Variations, Chaconne, and Finale in the summer of 1947 at Wilton, Conn. His original title was Three Symphonic Dances, but his publishers, Carl Fisher, Inc., recommended the change owing to the fact that the work is based on a liturgical melody.

The composition was first performed by the Pittsburg Symphony Society in January, 1948, with Fritz Reiner conducting. The main theme is Gregorian (slightly altered)—a Kyrie from the "Mass of Angels." Dello Joio gives the following description of his work:

"The first movement comprises a set of six variations that follow a simply harmonized statement of the tune in G major. The framework on which the second movement, the Chaconne, is built is a chromatic outline of the first four notes of the Gregorian theme.

* * *

"In the highly rhythmical Allegro vivo, which follows, the character of the Gregorian theme is transformed into the purely contemporary and secular. The concluding pages resolve into a chorale that is set against the prevailing rhythmic tension of the last movement."

The main theme is marked Semplice and is stated first by the oboe, then repeated by the flute, clarinet, and strings. The six variations appear in the following moods: Semplice e grazioso, Andante religioso, Vivacissimo, Pesante, Amabile, and Funèbre.

The second movement, Chaconne, is in three-four time and is marked Adagio serioso. It opens with sustained dotted half-notes in the woodwinds and strings. The horns enter molto cantabile, and the strings soon break into triplet figures. Later the sustained dotted half-notes reappear while the timpani beats out a simple three-rhythm underneath. The movement ends triple-piano.

The third movement, in cut-time, is marked Allegro vivo, giocoso e ritmico. It begins with a timpani solo, to which the strings in pizzicati are added, along with the bass clarinet, bassoon, and contrabassoon playing markato. It gradually builds with rapid eighth-note figures. The brass is added and the movement reaches a climax with the use of the full orchestra.

Norman Dello Joio has turned out several major symphonic and choral works. His score to the ballet, "On Stage!" has been performed extensively here and abroad. He has also produced many works for chamber ensembles.

H R

KLT

Thor Johnson, who will conduct the Boston Symphony concerts Friday afternoon, Saturday evening, and Sunday afternoon.

Introducing Thor Johnson

Thor Johnson, who will appear as guest conductor with the Boston Symphony Orchestra Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, has been since December, 1946, the conductor of the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra.

Mr. Johnson is a native of Wisconsin. He was graduated by the University of North Carolina with a Bachelor of Music degree and a Phi Beta Kappa key. While in college he conducted the Carolina Ensemble—a group that furnished musical settings for the Carolina Players—and served as associate conductor of the North Carolina Symphony Orchestra.

In 1934 he enrolled in the graduate school of music at the University of Michigan. A year later he was awarded the Beebe Foundation scholarship which gave him two years of study in Europe.

While abroad he studied at the Salzburg Mozarteum under Felix Weingartner, Bruno Walter, and Nikolai Malko. Later he attended the Conservatory of Leipzig for a course in conducting under Hans Abendroth. After a brief stay in Prague, where he studied privately, he returned to this country in 1938 to be assistant professor of music at the University of Michigan.

During the summers of 1940 and 1941, Mr. Johnson studied privately as a scholarship student with Dr. Serge Koussevitzky at the Berkshire Music Center. After his discharge from the army in 1946, he became conductor of the Juilliard School of Music orchestra in New York City. In December of that year he was asked to conduct the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra when its regular conductor, Eugene Goossens, became indisposed. After Mr. Goossens announced his intention of withdrawing from the post, Mr. Johnson was appointed the orchestra's conductor.

He successfully completed his first year with the Cincinnati Orchestra and was reappointed for the 1948-49 season. During the 1947-48 season he conducted 114 full-length concerts. Many of these were out of town, played on tours that lasted as long as four weeks. He made the Young People's Concerts so popular that he was obliged to repeat each of the regularly scheduled performances.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
JAN 20 1949

WILLIAM R. KITTREDGE, A RETIRED MERCHANT

William Richards Kittredge, retired Boston commission merchant, died yesterday in a nursing home at Brookline, Mass., after a long illness, according to word received here. He was 89 years old.

Descended from Gen. Jedediah Huntington, aide to George Washington; John Alden and Gov. William Bradford of the Plymouth Colony, he was a son of the late William Porter Kittredge and the late Mrs. Ann Channing Richards Kittredge.

As a boy he came to New York and lived here for some years. Later Mr. Kittredge resided in Orange, N. J. He returned to Boston in 1877. For many years he was a member of the Boston commission merchant firm of William P. Kittredge, named for his father.

A few years ago he was honored with a pass from the Boston Symphony Orchestra for having attended its Pop Concerts in Boston for their first half century. Mr. Kittredge was a member of the Boston City Club. He formerly lived at the Bellevue Hotel, Boston. He was long deacon and treasurer of the Eliot Congregational Church, Roxbury, Mass.

Surviving are a son, Alvah Kittredge of New York; a brother, Henry Richards Kittredge of Boston; a sister, Mrs. Edward H. Fallows of New York and Norfolk, Conn.; five grandchildren and three great-grandchildren.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE
JAN 21 1949

An album of recordings of double-bass solos by Serge Koussevitzky, made by him for RCA Victor in 1929, is soon to go on sale, according to an announcement by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The proceeds will go to the orchestra's Koussevitzky Twenty-fifth Anniversary Fund. The works recorded include Dr. Koussevitzky's "Chanson Triste," his "Valse Miniature," and the andante from his double-bass concerto, a Largo by Eccles and a Lullaby by Laska.

OKLAHOMA CITY, OKLA.
OKLAHOMAN

Conductor Plays American Music For Swan Song

By ALICE HUGHES

NEW YORK—Listening to the American Music Festival played last week in New York, I felt a sense of a loss that this is swan-song year for Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, batonmaster of the Boston symphony orchestra. Perhaps his successor, Dr. Charles Munch, who will conduct in his place next autumn after Koussy's retirement, can take his place musically. But no other conductor can project himself to audiences as Koussy does.

Toscanini casts a spell upon people, true, with his dedicated spirit. Stokowski's personal magnetism, his blue-white hair and his sensitive hands seize attention. But there's no showman like Koussy. His sense of dramatic timing are hair-trigger.

Koussevitzky is hep to the times. He feels the throb of native pride in such current events as the Freedom train, Friendship train and other popular proofs of America's culture and democracy. So he geared his last year of orchestral conducting to the spirit of the times.

During his 25 years of conducting he has introduced a number of American composers: Aaron Copeland, Samuel Barber, Walter Piston, Henry Cowell, Lukas Foss, Roy Harris, William Schuman, Leonard Bernstein and others. He is devoting this year to a review of the achievements in American music, and the Carnegie hall cheered and cheered.

Next day the Boston symphony orchestra flew to Washington. For its last appearance in the capital city. Koussy had invited President Truman who regrets: "It's your last, but my first as new president," he wrote in effect. "Because of the inaugural I will unhappily not be able to attend." But Koussevitzky never takes no for an answer.

Changing the program, he wrote again to Mr. Truman: "I am heartbroken you cannot come. Particularly since I have included Aaron Copeland's 'Lincoln Portrait' especially in your honor." Not long after came the reply from Mr. Truman thanking Dr. Koussevitzky sincerely. "Under the circumstances I shall of course be there," he said in effect. And as far as I know, he was.

UNDERGROUND WALK—Pedestrian traffic isn't half as bad as vehicular in New York. Still it's good to hear about any kind of improvement for the foot-weary. Just like the subway shuttles crosstown on 42nd street we'll be able to short-cut across several streets through a new underground passageway. Only difference, pedestrians don't pay a penny for the underground walk.

Approved by Police Commissioner Arthur W. Wallander, the project took only two weeks to complete and cost $3,800. There's talk of having the same kind of arrangement for another part of town, too. A good idea for stormy weather and when one's in a rush: no streets to cross nor strollers to avoid.

TATTOOED DOGS—From now on dogs planning to run away from their masters in New York will have to reckon with a serial number tattooed on the inside of their thighs. The idea is that of the American Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals.

This Identacode, nothing new, is operating in 44 other states and was used by the army K-9 corps during the war. Three numbers make identification easy. One for the state, another for the county and the last for the dog itself. No more lost dogs? None.

[239]

CIENCE MONITOR, BOSTON, THURSDAY, JANUARY 20, 1949

of Symphony—Baccaloni at

Dello Joio's Variations For Full Orchestra

Norman Dello Joio's Variations, Chaconne, and Finale for full orchestra will be played here for the first time tomorrow afternoon and Saturday evening in Symphony Hall by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Thor Johnson conducting. Mr. Johnson, conductor of the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra, will also direct Mozart's "Haffner" Symphony, excerpts from Vaughan Williams' "Job," and a suite from the Richard Strauss opera, "Der Rosenkavalier."

Dello Joio began his formal study of music when he enrolled at the Institute of Musical Art in New York City at the age of 19. Here he studied piano and organ with Gaston Dethier, and it was soon evident that composition was Dello Joio's forte. He later won a fellowship in the Juilliard Graduate School and studied composition there with Bernard Wagenaar.

* * *

The summers of 1940 and 1941 found him at the Berkshire Music Center, studying composition with Paul Hindemith, with whom he continued during the winter at the Yale School of Music. Twice he won Guggenheim Fellowships—1944-45 and 1945-46.

Dello Joio composed his Variations, Chaconne, and Finale in the summer of 1947 at Wilton, Conn. His original title was Three Symphonic Dances, but his publishers, Carl Fisher, Inc., recommended the change owing to the fact that the work is based on a liturgical melody.

The composition was first performed by the Pittsburg Symphony Society in January, 1948, with Fritz Reiner conducting. The main theme is Gregorian (slightly altered)—a Kyrie from the "Mass of Angels." Dello Joio gives the following description of his work:

"The first movement comprises a set of six variations that follow a simply harmonized statement of the tune in G major. The framework on which the second movement, the Chaconne, is built is a chromatic outline of the first four notes of the Gregorian theme.

* * *

"In the highly rhythmical Allegro vivo, which follows, the character of the Gregorian theme is transformed into the purely contemporary and secular. The concluding pages resolve into a chorale that is set against the prevailing rhythmic tension of the last movement."

The main theme is marked Semplice and is stated first by the oboe, then repeated by the flute, clarinet, and strings. The six variations appear in the following moods: Semplice e grazioso, Andante religioso, Vivacissimo, Pesante, Amabile, and Funèbre.

The second movement, Chaconne, is in three-four time and is marked Adagio serioso. It opens with sustained dotted half-notes in the woodwinds and strings. The horns enter molto cantabile, and the strings soon break into triplet figures. Later the sustained dotted half-notes reappear while the timpani beats out a simple three-rhythm underneath. The movement ends triple-piano.

The third movement, in cut-time, is marked Allegro vivo, giocoso e ritmico. It begins with a timpani solo, to which the strings in pizzicati are added, along with the bass clarinet, bassoon, and contrabassoon playing markato. It gradually builds with rapid eighth-note figures. The brass is added and the movement reaches a climax with the use of the full orchestra.

Norman Dello Joio has turned out several major symphonic and choral works. His score to the ballet, "On Stage!" has been performed extensively here and abroad. He has also produced many works for chamber ensembles.

H R

KLT

Thor Johnson, who will conduct the Boston Symphony concerts Friday afternoon, Saturday evening, and Sunday afternoon.

Introducing Thor Johnson

Thor Johnson, who will appear as guest conductor with the Boston Symphony Orchestra Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, has been since December, 1946, the conductor of the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra.

Mr. Johnson is a native of Wisconsin. He was graduated by the University of North Carolina with a Bachelor of Music degree and a Phi Beta Kappa key. While in college he conducted the Carolina Ensemble—a group that furnished musical settings for the Carolina Players—and served as associate conductor of the North Carolina Symphony Orchestra.

In 1934 he enrolled in the graduate school of music at the University of Michigan. A year later he was awarded the Beebe Foundation scholarship which gave him two years of study in Europe.

While abroad he studied at the Salzburg Mozarteum under Felix Weingartner, Bruno Walter, and Nikolai Malko. Later he attended the Conservatory of Leipzig for a course in conducting under Hans Abendroth. After a brief stay in Prague, where he studied privately, he returned to this country in 1938 to be assistant professor of music at the University of Michigan.

During the summers of 1940 and 1941, Mr. Johnson studied privately as a scholarship student with Dr. Serge Koussevitzky at the Berkshire Music Center. After his discharge from the army in 1946, he became conductor of the Juilliard School of Music orchestra in New York City. In December of that year he was asked to conduct the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra when its regular conductor, Eugene Goossens, became indisposed. After Mr. Goossens announced his intention of withdrawing from the post, Mr. Johnson was appointed the orchestra's conductor.

He successfully completed his first year with the Cincinnati Orchestra and was reappointed for the 1948-49 season. During the 1947-48 season he conducted 114 full-length concerts. Many of these were out of town, played on tours that lasted as long as four weeks. He made the Young People's Concerts so popular that he was obliged to repeat each of the regularly scheduled performances.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
JAN 20 1949

WILLIAM R. KITTREDGE, A RETIRED MERCHANT

William Richards Kittredge, retired Boston commission merchant, died yesterday in a nursing home at Brookline, Mass., after a long illness, according to word received here. He was 89 years old.

Descended from Gen. Jedediah Huntington, aide to George Washington; John Alden and Gov. William Bradford of the Plymouth Colony, he was a son of the late William Porter Kittredge and the late Mrs. Ann Channing Richards Kittredge.

As a boy he came to New York and lived here for some years. Later Mr. Kittredge resided in Orange, N. J. He returned to Boston in 1877. For many years he was a member of the Boston commission merchant firm of William P. Kittredge, named for his father.

A few years ago he was honored with a pass from the Boston Symphony Orchestra for having attended its Pop Concerts in Boston for their first half century. Mr. Kittredge was a member of the Boston City Club. He formerly lived at the Bellevue Hotel, Boston. He was long deacon and treasurer of the Eliot Congregational Church, Roxbury, Mass.

Surviving are a son, Alvah Kittredge of New York; a brother, Henry Richards Kittredge of Boston; a sister, Mrs. Edward H. Fallows of New York and Norfolk, Conn.; five grandchildren and three great-grandchildren.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE
JAN 21 1949

An album of recordings of double-bass solos by Serge Koussevitzky, made by him for RCA Victor in 1929, is soon to go on sale, according to an announcement by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The proceeds will go to the orchestra's Koussevitzky Twenty-fifth Anniversary Fund. The works recorded include Dr. Koussevitzky's "Chanson Triste," his "Valse Miniature," and the andante from his double-bass concerto, a Largo by Eccles and a Lullaby by Laska.

OKLAHOMA CITY, OKLA.
OKLAHOMAN

Conductor Plays American Music For Swan Song

By ALICE HUGHES

NEW YORK—Listening to the American Music Festival played last week in New York, I felt a sense of a loss that this is swan-song year for Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, baton-master of the Boston symphony orchestra. Perhaps his successor, Dr. Charles Munch, who will conduct in his place next autumn after Koussy's retirement, can take his place musically. But no other conductor can project himself to audiences as Koussy does.

Toscanini casts a spell upon people, true, with his dedicated spirit. Stokowski's personal magnetism, his blue-white hair and his sensitive hands seize attention. But there's no showman like Koussy. His sense of dramatic timing are hair-trigger.

Koussevitzky is hep to the times. He feels the throb of native pride in such current events as the Freedom train, Friendship train and other popular proofs of America's culture and democracy. So he geared his last year of orchestral conducting to the spirit of the times.

During his 25 years of conducting he has introduced a number of American composers: Aaron Copeland, Samuel Barber, Walter Piston, Henry Cowell, Lukas Foss, Roy Harris, William Schuman, Leonard Bernstein and others. He is devoting this year to a review of the achievements in American music, and the Carnegie hall cheered and cheered.

Next day the Boston symphony orchestra flew to Washington. For its last appearance in the capital city, Koussy had invited President Truman who regrets: "It's your last, but my first as new president," he wrote in effect. "Because of the inaugural I will unhappily not be able to attend." But Koussevitzky never takes no for an answer.

Changing the program, he wrote again to Mr. Truman: "I am heart-broken you cannot come. Particularly since I have included Aaron Copeland's 'Lincoln Portrait' especially in your honor." Not long after came the reply from Mr. Truman thanking Dr. Koussevitzky sincerely. "Under the circumstances I shall of course be there," he said in effect. And as far as I know, he was.

UNDERGROUND WALK—Pedestrian traffic isn't half as bad as vehicular in New York. Still it's good to hear about any kind of improvement for the foot-weary. Just like the subway shuttles crosstown on 42nd street we'll be able to short-cut across several streets through a new underground passageway. Only difference, pedestrians don't pay a penny for the underground walk.

Approved by Police Commissioner Arthur W. Wallander, the project took only two weeks to complete and cost $3,800. There's talk of having the same kind of arrangement for another part of town, too. A good idea for stormy weather and when one's in a rush: no streets to cross nor strollers to avoid.

TATTOOED DOGS—From now on dogs planning to run away from their masters in New York will have to reckon with a serial number tattooed on the inside of their thighs. The idea is that of the American Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals.

This Identacode, nothing new, is operating in 44 other states and was used by the army K-9 corps during the war. Three numbers make identification easy. One for the state, another for the county and the last for the dog itself. No more lost dogs? None.

LTHAM, MASS.
NEWS TRIBUNE

JAN 21 1949

The Stroller

An album of double bass recordings by Serge Koussevitzky is about to be issued. The recordings were made for RCA-Victor in 1929 when Dr. Koussevitzky played for the last time the instrument by which he first won fame. The collection consists of the Andante from Koussevitzky's own Double Bass Concerto, his Chanson Triste and Valse Miniature, a Largo by Eccles, and a Lullaby by Laska. A few copies of the Eccles number and the Chanson Triste were circulated twenty years ago, but the other recordings are to be released for the first time. Since the early days of electrical recording improvements in low frequency range through re-recording, fidelity by the use of Vinylite, and mechanical performance are such that Dr. Koussevitzky has been able to give his unqualified approval to the new pressings.

They will make possible a wide acquaintance with the beauties of an instrument otherwise virtually unknown in its solo possibilities, as played by an unexampled virtuoso of the double bass. The albums will be sold as souvenirs of the Twenty-fifth Anniversary season of Serge Koussevitzky as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The proceeds will benefit the Koussevitzky Twenty-fifth Anniversary Fund of the Orchestra.

At the age of seventeen, Serge Koussevitzky left the small town in Russia where he was born and presented himself at the school of the Moscow Philharmonic Society. By his own insistence (he had no money) he was admitted as a student of the double bass, the school orchestra being deficient in that section. Studying under Rambousek, he acquired an incredible mastery of the cumbrous instrument in an incredibly short period. Soon he was able to earn a living by playing in orchestras, and after six years he was already attracting attention as a soloist of the double bass. His instrument commanded a considerable part of the range of the violoncello and he played with the ease and subtlety of a cellist, despite the awkwardness of the double bass bow which is grasped fist-wise. But his instrument gave an especial color of its own to these tones and could likewise descend into richer depths with equal subtlety. While making recital tours he attracted the attention of Arthur Nikisch and played under the conductor as soloist with the Leipzig Gewandhaus Orchestra to the astonishment of the audiences which had never heard anything of the sort. It was in 1908 that he first took up the conductor's baton, but for years to come he did not neglect his bass.

In the midst of his second season as the Boston Symphony conductor (February 1926) he received an honorary degree from Brown University and responded by playing the double bass for the first time in this country. He gave his first public recital in Symphony Hall, October 4, 1927, and another in Carnegie Hall in the ensuing season. He was described, not as the best living virtuoso of the double bass, but as the only one within memory who had developed the instrument into the highest realm of individual musicianship.

After 1929 Koussevitzky's arduous duties as conductor of the Boston Orchestra compelled him regretfully to lay aside the bass which to be played to his own satisfaction exacted many hours of constant practice. Koussevitzky as master artist of the double bass became from that moment a legend. At that time, however, he made several recordings for the Victor Company, and these alone preserve what may now almost be called a lost art.

—0—

Startling but true is the statement that one effect of the motor age has been of considerable benefit to the railroads—it has resulted in the gradual fading of the railroad tramp. Statistics on hobos' free peregrinations via railroad were contained in a recent issue of "Tracks," under the heading of "Riders of the Rods and the Blinds."

It discloses that train robberies in earlier years made big headlines, but they were never as costly to the railroads as tramps. This was not so much because the tramps rode "on the house," so to speak, but because of their thefts and damage to freight. Also, they were likely to become clients of shyster lawyers whose specialty was suing railroads on account of injuries to men who had no right to be where they were when injured.

The railroad tramp became an institution right after the Civil War. It is estimated that in the '90's their population was around 60,000. This number grew after the turn of the century to probably 15 times that number. In 1921, 20,643 "undesirable persons" were removed during one month from "trains and property" of one company.

Their numbers are reported as slowly decreasing throughout the 1920's; but after 1930 they increased quickly and enormously—and were augmented by thousands of girls and women. Before the 1930's were out, however, the number of railroad tramps had unquestionably fallen, and meanwhile the number of auto tramps had increased and they were being discussed as the new American problem.

During the busy war years, few persons rode "freights," and tlthough in 1946 the number of freight riders increased appreciably, railroad personnel believe they will never return in hordes.

—0—

To prove one can still have fun at Big Bromley in Manchester, Vt., even though there's no snow for skiing, Fred Pabst, Jr., will hold a "June-in-January" tournament on his slopes this Sunday. Instead of skis and poles, golf clubs and shotguns will be wielded by the participants.

Prizes are offered by Mr. Pabst for the longest golf drive down the slope of "Lord's Prayer," the novice area bulldozed to golf-course smoothness this summer; for the highest tally in the skeet shoot that follows, and for the combined scores in both events.

"People may think us 'nuts' for holding summer sports when any sane person knows we ought to be skiing," he grins, "but we've got to do something besides twiddle our thumbs while we're waiting for the big snowfall."

Open to anyone who wants to take part, the tournament will go completely unorthodox by featuring "Pass Shooting," with birds flying high and directly overhead. The skeet will be scored in the usual way, and the golf drive will be determined on the same basis as distance in ski-jumping, with 20 points for the best drive.

The day's events are to begin at 10:30 A. M., when the "June-in-January" screwballs tee off. Mr. Pabst has only one worry about the whole affair: The weather may be as unpredictable as the Weatherman, and call off the show because of snow.

MUSIC

Thor Johnson Guest Conductor of Boston Symphony Orchestra

By CYRUS DURGIN

Thor Johnson, the young American conductor of the Cincinnati Orchestra, is making his first appearances this week as guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The program which he presented at Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon, and will again tonight, consists of Mozart's "Haffner" Symphony; five movements from "Job—A Masque for Dancing," by Vaughan Williams; the Variations, Chaconne and Finale by Norman Dello Joio, and an orchestral suite from the opera "Der Rosenkavalier" by Richard Strauss.

Having studied conducting with the late Felix Weingartner, with Bruno Walter, Nicolai Malko and Serge Koussevitzky at Tanglewood, Johnson obviously has a good background. But his work yesterday impressed only by its cool time-beating and hardly at all in the way of musicianship, temperament or feeling. He seems to have a certain mechanical efficiency with music that is objective. Clear-cut and dry, like the dull work of Vaughan Williams. His reading of the movements from "Job" had a definition as sharp as mountains in dry air, but of imagination there was little and of warmth there was none. The same applies to the "Haffner" Symphony.

I cannot imagine a poorer performance of the lush, juicy "Hosenkavalier" music by a first rate orchestra. The waltz rhythms were spineless; the Strauss polyphony ran all together; the tempi were ill-considered, and a score that is the epitome of grace, charm, wit and passion came out merely a jumble of sound.

Norman Dello Joio is a young American composer of Italian ancestry whose music has been little played in Boston. His six Variations, Chaconne and Finale, which yesterday had their local premiere, are based on a thematic fragment from a Gregorian kyrie. The writing is spare and logical, the scoring bright and expert. I suspect there is more variety and juice in the music than yesterday's reading brought out. At least, however, the syncopated Finale had plenty of animation. The composer appeared on the stage and bowed to applause.

BRISTOL, CONN.
PRESS

JAN 21 1949

Koussevitsky Makes Double Bass Recordings

An album of double bass recordings by Serge Koussevitzky is about to[redacted]cordings were made for RCA Victor in 1929 when Dr. Koussevitzky played for the last time the instrument by which he first won fame. The collection consists of the Andante from Koussevitzky's own Double Bass Concerto, his Chanson Triste and Valse Miniature, a Largo by Eccles, and a Lullaby by Laska. A few copies of the Eccles number and the Chanson Triste were circulated twenty years ago, but the other recordings are to be released for the first time. Since the early days of electrical recording improvements in low frequency range through re-recording, fidelity by the use of Vinylite, and mechanical performance are such that Dr. Koussevitzky has been able to give his unqualified approval to the new pressings.

They will make possible a wide acquaintance with the beauties of an instrument otherwise virtually unknown in its solo possibilities, as played by an unexampled virtuoso of the double bass. The albums will be sold as souvenirs of the Twenty-fifth Anniversary [illegible] of the Orchestra.

At the age of seventeen, Serge Koussevittzky left the small town in Russia where he was born and presented himself at the school of the Moscow Philharmonic Society. By his insistence (he had no money) he was admitted as a student of the double bass, the school orchestra being deficient in that section. Studying under Rambousek, he acquired an incredible mastery of the cumbrous instrument in an incredibly short period. Soon he was able to earn a living by playing in orchestras, and after six years he was already attracting attention as a soloist of the double bass. His instrument commanded a considerable part of the range of the violincello and he played with the ease and sublety of a cellist, despite the awkwardness of the double bass bow which is grasped fist-wise. But his instrument gave an especial color of its own to these tones and could likewise descend into richer depths with equal subtlety. While making recital tours he attracted the attention of Arthur Nikisch and played under that conductor as soloist with the Leipzig Gewandhaus Orchestra to the astonishment of the audiences which had never heard anything of the sort. It was in 1908 that he first took up the conductor's baton, but for years to come he did not neglect his bass.

In the midst of his second season as the Boston Symphony conductor (February 1926) he received an honorary degree from Brown University and responded by playing the double bass for the first time in this country. He gave his first public recital in Symphony Hall October 4, 1927, and another in Carnegie Hall in the ensuing season. He was described, not as the best living virtuoso of the double bass, but as the only one within memory who had developed the instrument into the highest realm of individual musicianship.

After 1929 Koussevitsky's arduous duties as conductor of the Boston Orchestra compelled him regretfully to lay aside the bass which to be played to his own satisfaction exacted many hours of constant practice. Koussevitzky as master artist of the double bass became from that moment a legend. At that time, however, he made several recordings for the Victor Company, and these alone preserve what may now almost be called a lost art.

MUSIC

Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Thor Johnson conducting, gave the 13th program of the 68th season in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. The program:
Symphony in D, "Haffner" (K-385) Mozart
"Job" .... Vaughan William
Jolo Suite from "Der Rosenkavalier"
Variations, Chaconne and Finale Dello
Strauss

By RUDOLPH ELIE

The conducting of Thor Johnson, who yesterday appeared as guest conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, is notably clean, efficient, dignified and serious. He does not set the world on fire and doesn't, for that matter, try to. It is merely straightforward music-making that, in this day of the virtuoso conductor, is a pleasant change of pace. Since the program itself was also a pleasant change of pace the concert may be graded roughly in the A-2 class.

The blond Mr. Johnson, who is the regular conductor of the Cincinnati Symphony orchestra, is the first of a procession of three guest conductors we are to have in the coming weeks, the others being Ernest Ansermet, Igor Stravinsky and Eleazar de Carvalho. His style is vigorous but contained. It has a certain polish, a good deal of technical command, and it is in the main interesting to watch though it tends to be just a little self-conscious. The musical results, however, are admirably undistorted; Mr. Johnson's preoccupation is clearly with the composer's exact markings and not in the production of incandescent or deeply inspired musical reproduction.

Thus the Mozart "Haffner" Symphony, an exceedingly fine work, though it may have wanted in radiance or overall trajectory, was soundly straightforward while the Vaughan Williams' "Job" was lively and vigorously set forth, the Dello Joio piece had admirable clarity and poise, and the Strauss pot-pourri was at once robust, entertaining and rhythmically varied.

Despite its curious structure and its altogether too frequent pauses, Norman Dello Joio's "Variations, Chaconne and Finale" stands as one of the best short pieces of American music we have heard this year—and it may be said we have heard plenty. The 36-year-old New York-born composer, who was present to receive a cordial reception, here displays a gift for achieving exceptionally beautiful orchestral sounds with a diamond-like purity of line in every voice.

The concert came to an end with a light and amusing pot-pourri of tunes from "Der Rosenkavalier." The author of this arrangement is good old "anonymous," and perhaps it's just as well, but it was good fun nonetheless. Next week Ernest Ansermet offers Beethoven's Fourth Symphony, Martin's Petite Symphonie Concertante, Stravinsky's "Song of the Nightingale" and Debussy's "Iberia."

WEST WARWICK, R. I.
PAWTUXET VALLEY TIMES
JAN 22 1949

MUSIC MENTION

Boston's Symphony Hall "Miracle" in Acoustics

In the lobby of Symphony Hall, there is a bronze plaque on the wall:

"Wallace Clement Sabine, 1868-1919. Pioneer in architectural acoustics, Symphony Hall. The first auditorium in the world to be built in known conformity with acoustical laws was designed in accordance with his specifications and mathematical formulate the fruit of long and arduous research through self-effacing devotion to science. He nobly served the art of music. Here stands his monument."

The remarkable acoustical properties of the auditorium which have contributed to the fame of the Boston Symphony Orchestra through fifty years of concerts, and made its broadcasts and recordings proverbially rich, alive, and real are, therefore, no fortunate accident as has been the case with some concert halls. They are the calculated result of a science little understood in the year 1900 when Symphony Hall was built to be the permanent home of Boston's orchestra, and often still misapplied.

Professor Sabine was a specialist in architectural acoustics. Major Henry L. Higginson appointed him acoustics consultant when the hall was planned. This appointment was a revolutionary step. All questions of structural proportion and materials were subject to Sabine's approval from the early blueprint stage and throughout all stages of the construction of the hall. Even the statues and niches which line the interior walls of the hall above the balconies were placed there for acoustical reasons. Professor Sabine's object was to condition the sound reverberations to the extent of yielding a "live" tone without objectionable echo. This result is often remarked upon in Boston Symphony performances.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's weekly rehearsal broadcasts under Dr. Koussevitzky have shown anew how a great symphony orchestra can sound under nearly perfect conditions. NBC's high fidelity transmissions of the program and also of the RCA Victor broadcast, The Music America Loves Best, with Arthur Fiedler, the Boston Pops Orchestra, and Robert Merrill, are conclusive proof of the importance of fine acoustics in the place of origin of musical broadcasts.

Koussevitzky Double-Bass Records Aid Orchestra Fund

By CYRUS DURGIN

A unique and treasurable record album of 1949 is a collection of pieces played on the double-bass by Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Behind them lies a story.

Before the Russian-born Koussevitzky turned to conducting in 1908, he was famous throughout Europe as a virtuoso of the double-bass. He was then 34. At the age of 17 he had applied at the school of the Moscow Philharmonic Society. He had no money but an inextinguishable passion to study music. Finally he was admitted, but the only instrument open to him was the double-bass, all other sections of the school orchestra having been filled.

In comparatively few years, his concerts on the big and exacting stringed instrument had given him the title of successor to the only other two masters of the "bull fiddle" in all musical history: the Venetian Domenico Dragonetti (1763 . . . 1846), and Giovanni Bottesini, a Lombard who lived from 1821 to 1889.

Recorded in 1929

As the years went on, Koussevitzky's work as conductor left him less and less time for the long hours of practice which his standards of double-bass performance required. After Oct. 22, 1929, when he gave a benefit concert on the instrument at Symphony Hall, he ceased to play it in public.

But about that time he did make some recordings in the Victor studios, accompanied by Pierre Luboshutz, who now is the first half of the illustrious piano duo, Luboshutz and Nemenoff. Those records today are a memorial to Koussevitzky's prowess, and the only preserved examples of his art that we have. Needless to point out, they are priceless.

For years Koussevitzky withheld his authorization for release — apart from two pieces, his own Chanson Triste and a sonata slow movement by Henry Eccles. Now, however, he has agreed to publication of all the records. By agreement between RCA-Victor and the Boston Symphony Orchestra, 1000 copies have been pressed, and these will be distributed through the orchestra. The albums are priced at $10 each, and all returns from their sale will go to the orchestra's Serge Koussevitzky Anniversary Fund. Applications may be made by mail to the orchestra at Symphony Hall, or in person at the box office.

Instrument Sings

These five pieces include, in addition to those already mentioned, the slow movement from Koussevitzky's Double-Bass Concerto and his Valse Miniature, and a Lullaby by Gustav Laska. Of course a technic of great resource is necessary on the double-bass, but the most remarkable quality of Koussevitzky's playing is the way he made it sing. These pieces lie in the upper ranges of the instrument, where it much resembles a cello, and they involve some high harmonics of unearthly beauty. It will in no way dim the lustre of Koussevitzky's fame or achievement to point out that some portamento and a few bow sounds may indicate that in 1929, when conducting duties were heavy and practice time consequently restricted, his technical form was not at the peak of his concert-giving days. The observation is made only for the record.

The important fact is that these records are available, and on non-breakable vinylite with modern low-frequency re-recording. The album, which is LE-1, is done up handsomely in blue, with the impressive signature of Koussevitzky spread across the cover in gold. Within there are notes on his career and the music, and a reproduction of the full-length portrait which shows him with his three-stringed instrument.

Mr. Koussevitzky, the Orchestra and RCA-Victor may be congratulated on this release, and upon the good use to which the receipts will be put.

N SCIENCE MONITOR, BOSTON, SATURDAY, JANUARY 22, 1949 Art—Music—Theater 13

the Stage—Thor Johnson as Guest Conductor

Visitor From Cincinnati at the Symphony Concerts for Week End

By L. A. Sloper

Thor Johnson made his first appearance in Boston to direct the first of the thirteenth pair of concerts on the afternoon of Jan. 21 in Symphony Hall. He chose this program: Mozart's Symphony in D major ("Haffner"); Vaughan Williams' "Job"—A Masque for Dancing; Dello Joio's Variations, Chaconne and Finale; Strauss's Suite from "Der Rosenkavalier."

Mr. Johnson, a native of Wisconsin, is the conductor of the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra. He studied conducting with various masters in Europe and finally with Serge Koussevitzky at Tanglewood. He made an excellent impression on his first appearance here, and he gave us an interesting program.

His stocky Norwegian figure seemed firmly planted on the podium. It was not static, however, nor was it that of a dancer, although his program contained an unusual amount of dance music.

* * *

He obviously knew his music and how he wanted it played. He also knew that he had under his command an orchestra of exceptional quality, and he modestly acknowledged this by inviting the men to rise before he accepted any applause for himself.

His gestures are restrained but forceful at need. He came off well in the test of Mozart, with a lyrical performance of liveliness and clarity, and with no fussy attempt at individual interpretation. He was content to let Mozart speak for himself.

Vaughan Williams' "Job," introduced to us three years ago by Sir Adrian Boult, again made a profound effect, both as illustrative of Blake's drawings and as a musical score apart from literary associations. Vaughan Williams is spokesman for traditional English customs, including the custom of religious devotion, which he expresses in the modal style. This score is notable for its spiritual content. Its less successful measures are those depicting Satan, which are rather theatrical.

* * *

Strange that the Variations, Chaconne and Finale of Norman Dello Joio should be based on a liturgical theme, and strange, too, that being so based, they should lend themselves so well to dance rhythms. Perhaps Mr. Johnson wanted to show us what variations can be played on the old modes, ancient or medieval. Anyhow, he, as well as Mr. Dello Joio, is obviously dancical minded.

This piece was originally called I believe, Three Orchestral Dances, and perhaps it would have been better to retain that title for its descriptive value. Mr. Dello Joio has composed ballets, including "On Stage!" and he conducted Eugene Loring's Dance Players. His present work is well devised compositionally, but it is too long for its content, especially the Chaconne. The composer was present to take a bow.

Finally, more dance music, included in Strauss's Suite from "Der Rosenkavalier." It was amusing to hear the excerpts from the opera in the concert hall, to see how much parts of the score resemble the Strauss tone poems, and to revel again in its orchestration. But on the whole, one missed the glamour of the stage production; the waltzes in particular sounded more banal than usual. And the suite could well be shorter.

[211]

NEW YORKER
NEW YORK CITY
JAN 22 1949

MUSICAL EVENTS

Among the Living

DR. KOUSSEVITZKY and his Boston Symphony Orchestra swept down from the North and into Carnegie Hall a week ago Wednesday, and by the end of the evening I was a good deal wiser and enriched musically. The evening had several remarkable aspects. For one thing, Dr. Koussevitzky's program was made up entirely of modern—and for the most part good modern—American music. There was no compromising, no hedging, no "Flying Dutchman" overtures or dudelsackpfeifers to soften the blow. For another, every composer represented is still alive and breathing, and, furthermore, was alive and breathing in Carnegie Hall that night. Present were William Schuman, Lukas Foss, Samuel Barber, Henry Cowell, and Walter Piston. Not one among them is past fifty-five, and three are still under forty; Mr. Foss is only twenty-six. With the exception of Mr. Foss, who took over the baton to lead his "Recordare," all the composers sat in one upper-tier box and graciously acknowledged, at the conclusion of their respective works, the scant applause of the audience. And this brings me to another aspect of the occasion. The only warmth granted to those composers—aside from the affectionate enthusiasm of Dr. Koussevitzky and his men—was the body heat they must have engendered sitting together in the box. The audience, a huge and dressy throng, rather ostentatiously sat on its hands. A Boston Symphony concert is One of Those Things People Go To, and go they did, but they didn't seem to enjoy it. Listening to the splendid music and then to the driblets of applause, I was reminded of the old Irish gentleman who, finally encouraged to leave a wake at dawn, stood in the doorway and shouted at the deceased's family, "I'm going, but before I go, let me tell you this—you've no respect for the living!"

All the music was interesting, and some of it struck me as being of considerable stature. I think I enjoyed most Mr. Piston's Symphony No. 3 and Mr. Cowell's "Hymn and Fuguing Tune No. 2," for string orchestra. Although the music by Mr. Piston, who was born in 1894, is, in the twentieth-century tradition, starkly cerebral, it has about it an air of strength, hope, and form. One can hear Mr. Piston thinking aloud in his Third Symphony, and his thoughts—for me, at least—are beautiful ones. Mr. Cowell—he's of the Class of '97—has also written a piece in which the glass is not completely shattered. Mr. Foss's "Recordare" was given its first local presentation. He began to compose it on the dark day, a year ago, when Gandhi was murdered, and he was evidently affected, along with articulate and inarticulate millions of others, by the dreadful portent of the violent end of the world's least violent man. Unfortunately, his music seemed in spots to demonstrate an unrestrained pessimism that tended to defeat its solemn purpose.

THE following night, and in Carnegie Hall again, Leopold Stokowski conducted the Philharmonic-Symphony in the sort of program that brings the folks off their hands. All by himself, Mr. Stokowski is enough of a spectacle to arouse, if not applause, at least stunned admiration. That familiar head of hair is worth one movement of an unfamiliar symphony any day. Last week, Mr. Stokowski surprised us with the overture to "The Flying Dutchman," the polka and fugue from "Schwanda" (Schwanda was a bagpipe player, or dudelsackpfeifer, and, for my money, a fool), Brahms' Fourth Symphony (for the steady trade), and, to prove that he was still among the living, Hindemith's "Philharmonic Concerto." This was another first local presentation. Although I listened attentively, I can remember very little of what I heard, and I consider this a bad sign.

ALL present in the Metropolitan's first "Siegfried" of the season sang with skill and understanding. The orchestra, under Mr. Stiedry, was in rare form. Mr. Svanholm was an exuberant Siegfried and met the demands of that problem adolescent with ease. Miss Traubel's Brünnhilde was a thing of exceptional loveliness. Mr. Garris was, as he should have been, a singularly repulsive Mime. Mr. Ernster's Fafner was the most horrible dragon imaginable, and there can be no higher praise for Fafner.

—PHILIP HAMBURGER

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE
JAN 23 1949

KOUSSEVITZKY

By VIRGIL THOMSON

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, in devoting recently to American works two whole programs out of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's ten New York concerts of the season, has rendered a service to music and to the public. He has also reminded us of his own assiduous care for living music and for public instruction. Ten years ago, at the end of the fifteenth year of his tenure with that orchestra, he played a comparable series of works, the cream, in his judgment, of those by American authors that he had previously played. This time he has selected from the last ten years of his activity works and authors that mark a decade and that taken together make up another arch in that vast monument to the creative spirit of his time that is this conductor's whole public career.

* * *

IT IS of no importance to note, save in passing, that Mr. Koussevitzky's list of new works and authors is not the complete list of America's distinguished music. Moore, Luening, Wagenaar and others are conspicuously absent. Sessions appear but once, and not among the revivals. At no time have Ruggles or Varèse, historical figures both, been represented. It is far more valuable to remember that his complete recent lists are more ample than anybody else's (save possibly Manuel Rosenthal's with the French Orchestre National). It is also useful to recall that though he came to this country with a long history of living works played and of composers encouraged, his collaboration with the musical life of his time in America had been facilitated by the similar activities of his predecessor, Pierre Monteux, in Boston, of his younger contemporary, Leopold Stokowski, in Philadelphia, and of the forerunners of them all, Walter Damrosch, in New York, and Frederick Stock, in Chicago. If Serge Koussevitzky has played more new American music than these others, that is largely because in his time there has been more of it to play. Our enlightened leaders have always given us what there was.

* * *

EVEN so, and placing him in the company of all those responsible in history, Mr. Koussevitzky merits an award in this last year of his Boston tenure, an award that history will certainly bestow upon him but that we still living could do honor to ourselves by offering earlier. For no other musical interpreter living has done so much for so many all over the world. As conductor, as publisher, as commissioner of works, he has assumed the music of his time (and it has been a long time) to be worthy of his support, financial, musical and moral. He has published, played, taught and paid, spent of his fortune, his earnings, his time and his vigor without stint. In Russia, in Germany, in France and in the United States, wherever his life has been led, even for short periods, he has left his mark on music and helped other men of music to leave theirs. His huge personal talent has been devoted to a cause, that cause the inclusion of the living creator, along with the listener, in the life of art.

* * *

HAD his talent not been so vast, his achievement would have been less remarkable. But even with gifts so grand, the danger of personal aggrandizement is always present. He could so easily, with a lesser consecration, have come to fame without all that labor and expense. He chose otherwise, because he is a man of moral, as well as artistic, responsibility. He could not devote less than all his resources to the art that is his spiritual life. A man of humble origins, he has known that people, the people, means all the people there are and that art must belong to all the people and draw its strength from all the people. Common folk, aristocrats, intellectuals, the monied, the musical—it takes them all nowadays to make music make sense. And being a leader, if one's talent imposes such a responsibility, requires a full man's full time.

* * *

KOUSSEVITZKY has been a full man and given full-time service during a long lifetime. That service, we hope, is far from ended; but his twenty-five years as conductor of the world's most celebrated orchestra are drawing to a close. It is only just that at this time the whole world of music make him aware of its gratitude for services rendered, pay him some outward sign of the deep honor it owes him. Let these words stand as evidence of one musician's appreciation.

ROCHESTER, N. Y.
DEMOCRAT-CHRONICLE
JAN 23 1949

* * *

Hanson Concerto Gets Critics' Favor

DR. HOWARD HANSON'S new Piano Concerto in G major, played by Rudolf Firkusny as soloist, and Dr. Hanson guest conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall last week, was received favorably by most of the New York critics, the day following a performance in Brooklyn which the Brooklyn Eagle critic characterized as bad work from the orchestra.

I'm told since that comment appeared, that the Boston orchestra considers the Brooklyn concert, usually preceding its Carnegie Hall event, as more or less of a rehearsal. That, it seems to me, is playing exceeding bad faith with the public which pays out its good money. I can see no reason for any orchestra letting down in giving its best where it is catering to music lovers. They are entitled to an orchestra's best at all times.

I can remember the old days when Broadway theater productions were tried out in Rochester before hitting the big time, every effort was made to have these performances top notch.

In the belief that Rochesterians will be interested in what the New York critics thought of the new Hanson work, here are excerpts:

Olin Downes, Times: "The orchestra gave superb performance. . . . Hanson's four-movement concerto is written with sureness of hand and an experienced eye to effect, by a composer who is not in the least afraid of being direct, melodic, virtuosic to the point of the obvious. The very opening with horns is obvious, if you put it that way. It is also imaginative, and expresses immediately one of the impelling ideas of the score. A later hearing will tell us how it stands by the side of the best other examples of Mr. Hanson's symphonic writing."

Robert A. Hague, Star: "The Hanson concerto is a handsome and effective piece in the composer's characteristic conservative style. Though thoroughly conventional in mold and manner, and often remindful of its models, it nevertheless has a good deal to say that is fresh and affecting, to say, and says it with considerable grace and conviction. . . . Firkusny and the orchestra gave of their highly distinguished best to put the work over handsomely under the composer's baton."

Louis Biancolli, World - Telegram: "The big item was a piano concerto by Mr. Hanson. . . . The news, perhaps, is that the Nebraska composer has come out of his academic cloisters. The concerto is a strongly appealing score, gushing with warm melody and tangy streamlets from Tin Pan Alley. Howard Hanson has finally sat down with George Gershwin. The melodic patterns are his own and the way he piles up and crosses rhythms shows only a distant kinship to Gershwin's concerto. What is good news is that Prof. Hanson is doing some whooping up of his own."

Irving Kolodin, The Sun: "In scope the most consequential of the unfamiliar works was Hanson's only piano concerto. Hanson may be commended for going his own way as a composer, but it is not a way that this listener finds congenial. The melodic content is weak for the meaning it is meant to convey, the musical dress a motley of periods and styles. Firkusny's playing was adroit, but there was little with which he could be convincing."

Virgil Thomson, Herald-Tribune: "Hanson's concerto, beautifully played by Firkusny and conducted by himself, is a slow-fast-slow-fast work in four movements. Its expressive content seems to be related in some way to Stephen Foster, though the Andante, the most eloquent of its sections, bears no reference of the sort. Eclectic clean through is the only way I can describe it."

PITTSFIELD, MASS.
BERKSHIRE EAGLE

Recordings Made Of Double Bass By Koussevitzky

BOSTON—An album of double bass recordings by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, which were made for RCA Victor in 1929, will soon be issued. The collection consists of the Andante from Koussevitzky's own double bass concerto, his "Chanson Triste" and "Valse Miniature," a largo by Eccles, and a lullaby by Laska. A few copies of the Eccles number and the "Chanson Triste" were circulated 20 years ago, but the other recordings are to be released for the first time.

Dr. Koussevitzky made the recordings in 1929 when he played for the last time the instrument by which he first won fame. The albums will be sold as souvenirs of the 25th anniversary of Dr. Koussevitzky as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The proceeds will benefit the Koussevitzky 25th anniversary fund of the orchestra.

PHOENIX, ARIZ.
REPUBLIC
JAN 23 1949

New Koussevitzky Album Scheduled

An album of double bass disks by Serge Koussevitzky is about to be issued. The recordings were made for RCA Victor in 1929 when Koussevitsky played for the last the instrument by which he first won fame.

The collection consists of the Andante from Koussevitzky's own Double Bass Concerto, his Chanson Triste and Valse Miniature, a Largo by Eccles, and a Lullaby by Laska.

The fidelity by use of Vinylite and mechanical performance are such that Koussevitzky has given his unqualified approval to the new pressings.

OAKLAND, CAL.
TRIBUNE
JAN 23

Symphonies Ordered

The Koussevitzky Music Foundation has commissioned Arthur Honegger and Randall Thompson to write symphonies.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
JAN 23 1949

CITY TO HAVE FIRST

Brazilian Composer's Fantasia to Be Offered Here Feb. 1

The first United States performance of "Fantasia for Violin and Orchestra," by Heitor Villa-Lobos, Brazilian composer, will be presented by the Boston Symphony in Providence Feb. 1, it was announced yesterday at Symphony Hall, Boston.

The guest conductor, who will make his Providence debut at the Metropolitan Theater concert, is Eleazar de Carvalho. Oscar Borgerth will be violin soloist. Both are noted Brazilian musicians.

[242]

NEW YORKER
NEW YORK CITY
JAN 22 1949

MUSICAL EVENTS

Among the Living

DR. KOUSSEVITZKY and his Boston Symphony Orchestra swept down from the North and into Carnegie Hall a week ago Wednesday, and by the end of the evening I was a good deal wiser and enriched musically. The evening had several remarkable aspects. For one thing, Dr. Koussevitzky's program was made up entirely of modern—and for the most part good modern—American music. There was no compromising, no hedging, no "Flying Dutchman" overtures or dudelsackpfeifers to soften the blow. For another, every composer represented is still alive and breathing, and, furthermore, was alive and breathing in Carnegie Hall that night. Present were William Schuman, Lukas Foss, Samuel Barber, Henry Cowell, and Walter Piston. Not one among them is past fifty-five, and three are still under forty; Mr. Foss is only twenty-six. With the exception of Mr. Foss, who took over the baton to lead his "Recordare," all the composers sat in one upper-tier box and graciously acknowledged, at the conclusion of their respective works, the scant applause of the audience. And this brings me to another aspect of the occasion. The only warmth granted to those composers—aside from the affectionate enthusiasm of Dr. Koussevitzky and his men—was the body heat they must have engendered sitting together in the box. The audience, a huge and dressy throng, rather ostentatiously sat on its hands. A Boston Symphony concert is One of Those Things People Go To, and go they did, but they didn't seem to enjoy it. Listening to the splendid music and then to the driblets of applause, I was reminded of the old Irish gentleman who, finally encouraged to leave a wake at dawn, stood in the doorway and shouted at the deceased's family, "I'm going, but before I go, let me tell you this—you've no respect for the living!"

All the music was interesting, and some of it struck me as being of considerable stature. I think I enjoyed most Mr. Piston's Symphony No. 3 and Mr. Cowell's "Hymn and Fuguing Tune No. 2," for string orchestra. Although the music by Mr. Piston, who was born in 1894, is, in the twentieth-century tradition, starkly cerebral, it has about it an air of strength, hope, and form. One can hear Mr. Piston thinking aloud in his Third Symphony, and his thoughts—for me, at least—are beautiful ones. Mr. Cowell—he's of the Class of '97—has also written a piece in which the glass is not completely shattered. Mr. Foss's "Recordare" was given its first local presentation. He began to compose it on the dark day, a year ago, when Gandhi was murdered, and he was evidently affected, along with articulate and inarticulate millions of others, by the dreadful portent of the violent end of the world's least violent man. Unfortunately, his music seemed in spots to demonstrate an unrestrained pessimism that tended to defeat its solemn purpose.

THE following night, and in Carnegie Hall again, Leopold Stokowski conducted the Philharmonic-Symphony in the sort of program that brings the folks off their hands. All by himself, Mr. Stokowski is enough of a spectacle to arouse, if not applause, at least stunned admiration. That familiar head of hair is worth one movement of an unfamiliar symphony any day. Last week, Mr. Stokowski surprised us with the overture to "The Flying Dutchman," the polka and fugue from "Schwanda" (Schwanda was a bagpipe player, or dudelsackpfeifer, and, for my money, a fool), Brahms' Fourth Symphony (for the steady trade), and, to prove that he was still among the living, Hindemith's "Philharmonic Concerto." This was another first local presentation. Although I listened attentively, I can remember very little of what I heard, and I consider this a bad sign.

ALL present in the Metropolitan's first "Siegfried" of the season sang with skill and understanding. The orchestra, under Mr. Stiedry, was in rare form. Mr. Svanholm was an exuberant Siegfried and met the demands of that problem adolescent with ease. Miss Traubel's Brünnhilde was a thing of exceptional loveliness. Mr. Garris was, as he should have been, a singularly repulsive Mime. Mr. Ernster's Fafner was the most horrible dragon imaginable, and there can be no higher praise for Fafner.

—PHILIP HAMBURGER

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE
JAN [illegible]

KOUSSEVITZKY

By VIRGIL THOMSON

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, in devoting recently to American works two whole programs out of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's ten New York concerts of the season, has rendered a service to music and to the public. He has also reminded us of his own assiduous care for living music and for public instruction. Ten years ago, at the end of the fifteenth year of his tenure with that orchestra, he played a comparable series of works, the cream, in his judgment, of those by American authors that he had previously played. This time he has selected from the last ten years of his activity works and authors that mark a decade and that taken together make up another arch in that vast monument to the creative spirit of his time that is this conductor's whole public career.

* * *

IT IS of no importance to note, save in passing, that Mr. Koussevitzky's list of new works and authors is not the complete list of America's distinguished music. Moore, Luening, Wagenaar and others are conspicuously absent. Sessions appear but once, and not among the revivals. At no time have Ruggles or Varèse, historical figures both, been represented, It is far more valuable to remember that his complete recent lists are more ample than anybody else's (save possibly Manuel Rosenthal's with the French Orchestre National). It is also useful to recall that though he came to this country with a long history of living works played and of composers encouraged, his collaboration with the musical life of his time in America had been facilitated by the similar activities of his predecessor, Pierre Monteux, in Boston, of his younger contemporary, Leopold Stokowski, in Philadelphia, and of the forerunners of them all, Walter Damrosch, in New York, and Frederick Stock, in Chicago. If Serge Koussevitzky has played more new American music than these others, that is largely because in his time there has been more of it to play. Our enlightened leaders have always given us what there was.

* * *

EVEN so, and placing him in the company of all those responsible in history, Mr. Koussevitzky merits an award in this last year of his Boston tenure, an award that history will certainly bestow upon him but that we still living could do honor to ourselves by offering earlier. For no other musical interpreter living has done so much for so many all over the world. As conductor, as publisher, as commissioner of works, he has assumed the music of his time (and it has been a long time) to be worthy of his support, financial, musical and moral. He has published, played, taught and paid, spent of his fortune, his earnings, his time and his vigor without stint. In Russia, in Germany, in France and in the United States, wherever his life has been led even for short periods, he has left his mark on music and helped other men of music to leave theirs. His huge personal talent has been devoted to a cause, that cause the inclusion of the living creator, along with the listener, in the life of art.

* * *

HAD his talent not been so vast, his achievement would have been less remarkable. But even with gifts so grand, the danger of personal aggrandizement is always present. He could so easily, with a lesser consecration, have come to fame without all that labor and expense. He chose otherwise, because he is a man of moral, as well as artistic, responsibility. He could not devote less than all his resources to the art that is his spiritual life. A man of humble origins, he has known that people, the people, means all the people there are and that art must belong to all the people and draw its strength from all the people. Common folk, aristocrats, intellectuals, the monied, the musical—it takes them all nowadays to make music make sense. And being a leader, if one's talent imposes such a responsibility, requires a full man's full time.

* * *

KOUSSEVITZKY has been a full man and given full-time service during a long lifetime. That service, we hope, is far from ended; but his twenty-five years as conductor of the world's most celebrated orchestra are drawing to a close. It is only just that at this time the whole world of music make him aware of its gratitude for services rendered, pay him some outward sign of the deep honor it owes him. Let these words stand as evidence of one musician's appreciation.

ROCHESTER, N. Y.
DEMOCRAT-CHRONICLE
JAN 23 1949

* * *

Hanson Concerto Gets Critics' Favor

DR. HOWARD HANSON'S new Piano Concerto in G major, played by Rudolf Firkusny as soloist, and Dr. Hanson guest conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall last week, was received favorably by most of the New York critics, the day following a performance in Brooklyn which the Brooklyn Eagle critic characterized as bad work from the orchestra.

I'm told since that comment appeared, that the Boston orchestra considers the Brooklyn concert, usually preceding its Carnegie Hall event, as more or less of a rehearsal. That, it seems to me, is playing exceeding bad faith with the public which pays out its good money. I can see no reason for any orchestra letting down in giving its best where it is catering to music lovers. They are entitled to an orchestra's best at all times.

I can remember the old days when Broadway theater productions were tried out in Rochester before hitting the big time, every effort was made to have these performances top notch.

In the belief that Rochesterians will be interested in what the New York critics thought of the new Hanson work, here are excerpts:

Olin Downes, Times: "The orchestra gave superb performance. . . . Hanson's four-movement concerto is written with sureness of hand and an experienced eye to effect, by a composer who is not in the least afraid of being direct, melodic, virtuosic to the point of the obvious. The very opening with horns is obvious, if you put it that way. It is also imaginative, and expresses immediately one of the impelling ideas of the score. A later hearing will tell us how it stands by the side of the best other examples of Mr. Hanson's symphonic writing."

Robert A. Hague, Star: "The Hanson concerto is a handsome and effective piece in the composer's characteristic conservative style. Though thoroughly conventional in mold and manner, and often remindful of its models, it nevertheless has a good deal to say that is fresh and affecting, to say, and says it with considerable grace and conviction. . . . Firkusny and the orchestra gave of their highly distinguished best to put the work over handsomely under the composer's baton."

Louis Biancolli, World - Telegram: "The big item was a piano concerto by Mr. Hanson. . . . The news, perhaps, is that the Nebraska composer has come out of his academic cloisters. The concerto is a strongly appealing score, gushing with warm melody and tangy streamlets from Tin Pan Alley. Howard Hanson has finally sat down with George Gershwin. The melodic patterns are his own and the way he piles up and crosses rhythms shows only a distant kinship to Gershwin's concerto. What is good news is that Prof. Hanson is doing some whooping up of his own."

Irving Kolodin, The Sun: "In scope the most consequential of the unfamiliar works was Hanson's only piano concerto. Hanson may be commended for going his own way as a composer, but it is not a way that this listener finds congenial. The melodic content is weak for the meaning it is meant to convey, the musical dress a motley of periods and styles. Firkusny's playing was adroit, but there was little with which he could be convincing."

Virgil Thomson, Herald-Tribune: "Hanson's concerto, beautifully played by Firkusny and conducted by himself, is a slow-fast-slow-fast work in four movements. Its expressive content seems to be related in some way to Stephen Foster, though the Andante, the most eloquent of its sections, bears no reference of the sort. Eclectic clean through is the only way I can describe it."

PHOENIX, ARIZ.
REPUBLIC
JAN 23 1949

New Koussevitzky Album Scheduled

An album of double bass disks by Serge Koussevitzky is about to be issued. The recordings were made for RCA Victor in 1929 when Koussevitzky played for the last the instrument by which he first won fame.

The collection consists of the Andante from Koussevitzky's own Double Bass Concerto, his Chanson Triste and Valse Miniature, a Largo by Eccles, and a Lullaby by Laska.

The fidelity by use of Vinylite and mechanical performance are such that Koussevitzky has given his unqualified approval to the new pressings.

OAKLAND, CAL.
TRIBUNE
JAN 23 [illegible]

Symphonies Ordered

The Koussevitzky Music Foundation has commissioned Arthur Honegger and Randall Thompson to write symphonies.

PROVIDENCE, R.I.
JOURNAL
JAN 23 1949

CITY TO HAVE FIRST

Brazilian Composer's Fantasia to Be Offered Here Feb. 1

The first United States performance of "Fantasia for Violin and Orchestra," by Heitor Villa-Lobos, Brazilian composer, will be presented by the Boston Symphony in Providence Feb. 1, it was announced yesterday at Symphony Hall, Boston.

The guest conductor, who will make his Providence debut at the Metropolitan Theater concert, is Eleazar de Carvalho. Oscar Borgerth will be violin soloist. Both are noted Brazilian musicians.

PITTSFIELD, MASS.
BERKSHIRE EAGLE
JAN 24 1949

Recordings Made Of Double Bass By Koussevitzky

BOSTON—An album of double bass recordings by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, which were made for RCA Victor in 1929, will soon be issued. The collection consists of the Andante from Koussevitzky's own double bass concerto, his "Chanson Triste" and "Valse Miniature," a largo by Eccles, and a lullaby by Laska. A few copies of the Eccles number and the "Chanson Triste" were circulated 20 years ago, but the other recordings are to be released for the first time.

Dr. Koussevitzky made the recordings in 1929 when he played for the last time the instrument by which he first won fame. The albums will be sold as souvenirs of the 25th anniversary of Dr. Koussevitzky as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The proceeds will benefit the Koussevitzky 25th anniversary fund of the orchestra.

NEW YORKER
NEW YORK CITY
JAN 22 1949

MUSICAL EVENTS

Among the Living

DR. KOUSSEVITZKY and his Boston Symphony Orchestra swept down from the North and into Carnegie Hall a week ago Wednesday, and by the end of the evening I was a good deal wiser and enriched musically. The evening had several remarkable aspects. For one thing, Dr. Koussevitzky's program was made up entirely of modern—and for the most part good modern—American music. There was no compromising, no hedging, no "Flying Dutchman" overtures or dudelsackpfeifers to soften the blow. For another, every composer represented is still alive and breathing, and, furthermore, was alive and breathing in Carnegie Hall that night. Present were William Schuman, Lukas Foss, Samuel Barber, Henry Cowell, and Walter Piston. Not one among them is past fifty-five, and three are still under forty; Mr. Foss is only twenty-six. With the exception of Mr. Foss, who took over the baton to lead his "Recordare," all the composers sat in one upper-tier box and graciously acknowledged, at the conclusion of their respective works, the scant applause of the audience. And this brings me to another aspect of the occasion. The only warmth granted to those composers—aside from the affectionate enthusiasm of Dr. Koussevitzky and his men—was the body heat they must have engendered sitting together in the box. The audience, a huge and dressy throng, rather ostentatiously sat on its hands. A Boston Symphony concert is One of Those Things People Go To, and go they did, but they didn't seem to enjoy it. Listening to the splendid music and then to the driblets of applause, I was reminded of the old Irish gentleman who, finally encouraged to leave a wake at dawn, stood in the doorway and shouted at the deceased's family, "I'm going, but before I go, let me tell you this—you've no respect for the living!"

All the music was interesting, and some of it struck me as being of considerable stature. I think I enjoyed most Mr. Piston's Symphony No. 3 and Mr. Cowell's "Hymn and Fuguing Tune No. 2," for string orchestra. Although the music by Mr. Piston, who was born in 1894, is, in the twentieth-century tradition, starkly cerebral, it has about it an air of strength, hope, and form. One can hear Mr. Piston thinking aloud in his Third Symphony, and his thoughts—for me, at least—are beautiful ones. Mr. Cowell—he's of the Class of '97—has also written a piece in which the glass is not completely shattered. Mr. Foss's "Recordare" was given its first local presentation. He began to compose it on the dark day, a year ago, when Gandhi was murdered, and he was evidently affected, along with articulate and inarticulate millions of others, by the dreadful portent of the violent end of the world's least violent man. Unfortunately, his music seemed in spots to demonstrate an unrestrained pessimism that tended to defeat its solemn purpose.

THE following night, and in Carnegie Hall again, Leopold Stokowski conducted the Philharmonic-Symphony in the sort of program that brings the folks off their hands. All by himself, Mr. Stokowski is enough of a spectacle to arouse, if not applause, at least stunned admiration. That familiar head of hair is worth one movement of an unfamiliar symphony any day. Last week, Mr. Stokowski surprised us with the overture to "The Flying Dutchman," the polka and fugue from "Schwanda" (Schwanda was a bagpipe player, or dudelsackpfeifer, and, for my money, a fool), Brahms' Fourth Symphony (for the steady trade), and, to prove that he was still among the living, Hindemith's "Philharmonic Concerto." This was another first local presentation. Although I listened attentively, I can remember very little of what I heard, and I consider this a bad sign.

ALL present in the Metropolitan's first "Siegfried" of the season sang with skill and understanding. The orchestra, under Mr. Stiedry, was in rare form. Mr. Svanholm was an exuberant Siegfried and met the demands of that problem adolescent with ease. Miss Traubel's Brünnhilde was a thing of exceptional loveliness. Mr. Garris was, as he should have been, a singularly repulsive Mime. Mr. Ernster's Fafner was the most horrible dragon imaginable, and there can be no higher praise for Fafner.

—PHILIP HAMBURGER

PHOENIX, ARIZ.
REPUBLIC
JAN 23 1949

New Koussevitzky Album Scheduled

An album of double bass disks by Serge Koussevitzky is about to be issued. The recordings were made for RCA Victor in 1929 when Koussevitzky played for the last the instrument by which he first won fame.

The collection consists of the Andante from Koussevitzky's own Double Bass Concerto, his Chanson Triste and Valse Miniature, a Largo by Eccles, and a Lullaby by Laska.

The fidelity by use of Vinylite and mechanical performance are such that Koussevitzky has given his unqualified approval to the new pressings.

OAKLAND, CAL.
TRIBUNE
JAN 23 [illegible]

Symphonies Ordered

The Koussevitzky Music Foundation has commissioned Arthur Honegger and Randall Thompson to write symphonies.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
JAN 23 1949

CITY TO HAVE FIRST

Brazilian Composer's Fantasia to Be Offered Here Feb. 1

The first United States performance of "Fantasia for Violin and Orchestra," by Heitor Villa-Lobos, Brazilian composer, will be presented by the Boston Symphony in Providence Feb. 1, it was announced yesterday at Symphony Hall, Boston.

The guest conductor, who will make his Providence debut at the Metropolitan Theater concert, is Eleazar de Carvalho. Oscar Borgerth will be violin soloist. Both are noted Brazilian musicians.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE
JAN [illegible]

KOUSSEVITZKY

By VIRGIL THOMSON

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, in devoting recently to American works two whole programs out of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's ten New York concerts of the season, has rendered a service to music and to the public. He has also reminded us of his own assiduous care for living music and for public instruction. Ten years ago, at the end of the fifteenth year of his tenure with that orchestra, he played a comparable series of works, the cream, in his judgment, of those by American authors that he had previously played. This time he has selected from the last ten years of his activity works and authors that mark a decade and that taken together make up another arch in that vast monument to the creative spirit of his time that is this conductor's whole public career.

* * *

IT IS of no importance to note, save in passing, that Mr. Koussevitzky's list of new works and authors is not the complete list of America's distinguished music. Moore, Luening, Wagenaar and others are conspicuously absent. Sessions appear but once, and not among the revivals. At no time have Ruggles or Varèse, historical figures both, been represented. It is far more valuable to remember that his complete recent lists are more ample than anybody else's (save possibly Manuel Rosenthal's with the French Orchestre National). It is also useful to recall that though he came to this country with a long history of living works played and of composers encouraged, his collaboration with the musical life of his time in America had been facilitated by the similar activities of his predecessor, Pierre Monteux, in Boston, of his younger contemporary, Leopold Stokowski, in Philadelphia, and of the forerunners of them all, Walter Damrosch, in New York, and Frederick Stock, in Chicago. If Serge Koussevitzky has played more new American music than these others, that is largely because in his time there has been more of it to play. Our enlightened leaders have always given us what there was.

* * *

EVEN so, and placing him in the company of all those responsible in history, Mr. Koussevitzky merits an award in this last year of his Boston tenure, an award that history will certainly bestow upon him but that we still living could do honor to ourselves by offering earlier. For no other musical interpreter living has done so much for so many all over the world. As conductor, as publisher, as commissioner of works, he has assumed the music of his time (and it has been a long time) to be worthy of his support, financial, musical and moral. He has published, played, taught and paid, spent of his fortune, his earnings, his time and his vigor without stint. In Russia, in Germany, in France and in the United States, wherever his life has been led, even for short periods, he has left his mark on music and helped other men of music to leave theirs. His huge personal talent has been devoted to a cause, that cause the inclusion of the living creator, along with the listener, in the life of art.

* * *

HAD his talent not been so vast, his achievement would have been less remarkable. But even with gifts so grand, the danger of personal aggrandizement is always present. He could so easily, with a lesser consecration, have come to fame without all that labor and expense. He chose otherwise, because he is a man of moral, as well as artistic, responsibility. He could not devote less than all his resources to the art that is his spiritual life. A man of humble origins, he has known that people, the people, means all the people there are and that art must belong to all the people and draw its strength from all the people. Common folk, aristocrats, intellectuals, the monied, the musical—it takes them all nowadays to make music make sense. And being a leader, if one's talent imposes such a responsibility, requires a full man's full time.

* * *

KOUSSEVITZKY has been a full man and given full-time service during a long lifetime. That service, we hope, is far from ended; but his twenty-five years as conductor of the world's most celebrated orchestra are drawing to a close. It is only just that at this time the whole world of music make him aware of its gratitude for services rendered, pay him some outward sign of the deep honor it owes him. Let these words stand as evidence of one musician's appreciation.

PITTSFIELD, MASS.
BERKSHIRE EAGLE
JAN 24 1949

Recordings Made Of Double Bass By Koussevitzky

BOSTON—An album of double bass recordings by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, which were made for RCA Victor in 1929, will soon be issued. The collection consists of the Andante from Koussevitzky's own double bass concerto, his "Chanson Triste" and "Valse Miniature," a largo by Eccles, and a lullaby by Laska. A few copies of the Eccles number and the "Chanson Triste" were circulated 20 years ago, but the other recordings are to be released for the first time.

Dr. Koussevitzky made the recordings in 1929 when he played for the last time the instrument by which he first won fame. The albums will be sold as souvenirs of the 25th anniversary of Dr. Koussevitzky as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The proceeds will benefit the Koussevitzky 25th anniversary fund of the orchestra.

ROCHESTER, N. Y.
DEMOCRAT-CHRONICLE
JAN 23 1949

* * *

Hanson Concerto Gets Critics' Favor

DR. HOWARD HANSON'S new Piano Concerto in G major played by Rudolf Firkusny as soloist, and Dr. Hanson guest conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie [illegible] week, was received favorably by most of the New York critics, the day following a performance in Brooklyn which the Brooklyn Eagle critic characterized as bad work from the orchestra.

I'm told since that comment appeared, that the Boston orchestra considers the Brooklyn concert, usually preceding its Carnegie Hall event, as more or less of a rehearsal. That, it seems to me, is playing exceeding bad faith with the public which pays out its good money. I can see no reason for any orchestra letting down in giving its best where it is catering to music lovers. They are entitled to an orchestra's best at all times.

I can remember the old days when Broadway theater productions were tried out in Rochester before hitting the big time, every effort was made to have these performances top notch.

In the belief that Rochesterians will be interested in what the New York critics thought of the new Hanson work, here are excerpts:

Olin Downes, Times: "The orchestra gave superb performance. . . . Hanson's four-movement concerto is written with sureness of hand and an experienced eye to effect, by a composer who is not in the least afraid of being direct, melodic, virtuosic to the point of the obvious. The very opening with horns is obvious, if you put it that way. It is also imaginative, and expresses immediately one of the impelling ideas of the score. A later hearing will tell us how it stands by the side of the best other examples of Mr. Hanson's symphonic writing."

Robert A. Hague, Star: "The Hanson concerto is a handsome and effective piece in the composer's characteristic conservative style. Though thoroughly conventional in mold and manner, and often remindful of its models, it nevertheless has a good deal to say that is fresh and affecting, to say, and says it with considerable grace and conviction. . . . Firkusny and the orchestra gave of their highly distinguished best to put the work over handsomely under the composer's baton."

Louis Biancolli, World - Telegram: "The big item was a piano concerto by Mr. Hanson. . . . The news, perhaps, is that the Nebraska composer has come out of his academic cloisters. The concerto is a strongly appealing score, gushing with warm melody and tangy streamlets from Tin Pan Alley. Howard Hanson has finally sat down with George Gershwin. The melodic patterns are his own and the way he piles up and crosses rhythms shows only a distant kinship to Gershwin's concerto. What is good news is that Prof. Hanson is doing some whooping up of his own."

Irving Kolodin, The Sun: "In scope the most consequential of the unfamiliar works was Hanson's only piano concerto. Hanson may be commended for going his own way as a composer, but it is not a way that this listener finds congenial. The melodic content is weak for the meaning it is meant to convey, the musical dress a motley of periods and styles. Firkusny's playing was adroit, but there was little with which he could be convincing."

Virgil Thomson, Herald-Tribune: "Hanson's concerto, beautifully played by Firkusny and conducted by himself, is a slow-fast-slow-fast work in four movements. Its expressive content seems to be related in some way to Stephen Foster, though the Andante, the most eloquent of its sections, bears no reference of the sort. Eclectic clean through is the only way I can describe it."

NEW YORKER
NEW YORK CITY
JAN 22 1949

MUSICAL EVENTS

Among the Living

Dr. Koussevitzky and his Boston Symphony Orchestra swept down from the North and into Carnegie Hall a week ago Wednesday, and by the end of the evening I was a good deal wiser and enriched musically. The evening had several remarkable aspects. For one thing, Dr. Koussevitzky's program was made up entirely of modern—and for the most part good modern—American music. There was no compromising, no hedging, no "Flying Dutchman" overtures or dudelsackpfeifers to soften the blow. For another, every composer represented is still alive and breathing, and, furthermore, was alive and breathing in Carnegie Hall that night. Present were William Schuman, Lukas Foss, Samuel Barber, Henry Cowell, and Walter Piston. Not one among them is past fifty-five, and three are still under forty; Mr. Foss is only twenty-six. With the exception of Mr. Foss, who took over the baton to lead his "Recordare," all the composers sat in one upper-tier box and graciously acknowledged, at the conclusion of their respective works, the scant applause of the audience. And this brings me to another aspect of the occasion. The only warmth granted to those composers—aside from the affectionate enthusiasm of Dr. Koussevitzky and his men—was the body heat they must have engendered sitting together in the box. The audience, a huge and dressy throng, rather ostentatiously sat on its hands. A Boston Symphony concert is One of Those Things People Go To, and go they did, but they didn't seem to enjoy it. Listening to the splendid music and then to the driblets of applause, I was reminded of the old Irish gentleman who, finally encouraged to leave a wake at dawn, stood in the doorway and shouted at the deceased's family, "I'm going, but before I go, let me tell you this—you've no respect for the living!"

All the music was interesting, and some of it struck me as being of considerable stature. I think I enjoyed most Mr. Piston's Symphony No. 3 and Mr. Cowell's "Hymn and Fuguing Tune No. 2," for string orchestra. Although the music by Mr. Piston, who was born in 1894, is, in the twentieth-century tradition, starkly cerebral, it has about it an air of strength, hope, and form. One can hear Mr. Piston thinking aloud in his Third Symphony, and his thoughts—for me, at least—are beautiful ones. Mr. Cowell—he's of the Class of '97—has also written a piece in which the glass is not completely shattered. Mr. Foss's "Recordare" was given its first local presentation. He began to compose it on the dark day, a year ago, when Gandhi was murdered, and he was evidently affected, along with articulate and inarticulate millions of others, by the dreadful portent of the violent end of the world's least violent man. Unfortunately, his music seemed in spots to demonstrate an unrestrained pessimism that tended to defeat its solemn purpose.

The following night, and in Carnegie Hall again, Leopold Stokowski conducted the Philharmonic-Symphony in the sort of program that brings the folks off their hands. All by himself, Mr. Stokowski is enough of a spectacle to arouse, if not applause, at least stunned admiration. That familiar head of hair is worth one movement of an unfamiliar symphony any day. Last week, Mr. Stokowski surprised us with the overture to "The Flying Dutchman," the polka and fugue from "Schwanda" (Schwanda was a bagpipe player, or dudelsackpfeifer, and, for my money, a fool), Brahms' Fourth Symphony (for the steady trade), and, to prove that he was still among the living, Hindemith's "Philharmonic Concerto." This was another first local presentation. Although I listened attentively, I can remember very little of what I heard, and I consider this a bad sign.

All present in the Metropolitan's first "Siegfried" of the season sang with skill and understanding. The orchestra, under Mr. Stiedry, was in rare form. Mr. Svanholm was an exuberant Siegfried and met the demands of that problem adolescent with ease. Miss Traubel's Brünnhilde was a thing of exceptional loveliness. Mr. Garris was, as he should have been, a singularly repulsive Mime. Mr. Ernster's Fafner was the most horrible dragon imaginable, and there can be no higher praise for Fafner.

—Philip Hamburger

PHOENIX, ARIZ.
REPUBLIC
JAN 23 1949

New Koussevitzky Album Scheduled

An album of double bass disks by Serge Koussevitzky is about to be issued. The recordings were made for RCA Victor in 1929 when Koussevitsky played for the last the instrument by which he first won fame.

The collection consists of the Andante from Koussevitzky's own Double Bass Concerto, his Chanson Triste and Valse Miniature, a Largo by Eccles, and a Lullaby by Laska.

The fidelity by use of Vinylite and mechanical performance are such that Koussevitzky has given his unqualified approval to the new pressings.

OAKLAND, CAL.
TRIBUNE
JAN 23 1949

Symphonies Ordered

The Koussevitzky Music Foundation has commissioned Arthur Honegger and Randall Thompson to write symphonies.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
JAN 23 1949

CITY TO HAVE FIRST

Brazilian Composer's Fantasia to Be Offered Here Feb. 1

The first United States performance of "Fantasia for Violin and Orchestra," by Heitor Villa-Lobos, Brazilian composer, will be presented by the Boston Symphony in Providence Feb. 1, it was announced yesterday at Symphony Hall, Boston.

The guest conductor, who will make his Providence debut at the Metropolitan Theater concert, is Eleazar de Carvalho. Oscar Borgerth will be violin soloist. Both are noted Brazilian musicians.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE
JAN 23 1949

KOUSSEVITZKY

By VIRGIL THOMSON

Serge Koussevitzky, in devoting recently to American works two whole programs out of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's ten New York concerts of the season, has rendered a service to music and to the public. He has also reminded us of his own assiduous care for living music and for public instruction. Ten years ago, at the end of the fifteenth year of his tenure with that orchestra, he played a comparable series of works, the cream, in his judgment, of those by American authors that he had previously played. This time he has selected from the last ten years of his activity works and authors that mark a decade and that taken together make up another arch in that vast monument to the creative spirit of his time that is this conductor's whole public career.

* * *

It is of no importance to note, save in passing, that Mr. Koussevitzky's list of new works and authors is not the complete list of America's distinguished music. Moore, Luening, Wagenaar and others are conspicuously absent. Sessions appear but once, and not among the revivals. At no time have Ruggles or Varèse, historical figures both, been represented. It is far more valuable to remember that his complete recent lists are more ample than anybody else's (save possibly Manuel Rosenthal's with the French Orchestre National). It is also useful to recall that though he came to this country with a long history of living works played and of composers encouraged, his collaboration with the musical life of his time in America had been facilitated by the similar activities of his predecessor, Pierre Monteux, in Boston, of his younger contemporary, Leopold Stokowski, in Philadelphia, and of the forerunners of them all, Walter Damrosch, in New York, and Frederick Stock, in Chicago. If Serge Koussevitzky has played more new American music than these others, that is largely because in his time there has been more of it to play. Our enlightened leaders have always given us what there was.

* * *

Even so, and placing him in the company of all those responsible in history, Mr. Koussevitzky merits an award in this last year of his Boston tenure, an award that history will certainly bestow upon him but that we still living could do honor to ourselves by offering earlier. For no other musical interpreter living has done so much for so many all over the world. As conductor, as publisher, as commissioner of works, he has assumed the music of his time (and it has been a long time) to be worthy of his support, financial, musical and moral. He has published, played, taught and paid, spent of his fortune, his earnings, his time and his vigor without stint. In Russia, in Germany, in France and in the United States, wherever his life has been led, even for short periods, he has left his mark on music and helped other men of music to leave theirs. His huge personal talent has been devoted to a cause, that cause the inclusion of the living creator, along with the listener, in the life of art.

* * *

Had his talent not been so vast, his achievement would have been less remarkable. But even with gifts so grand, the danger of personal aggrandizement is always present. He could so easily, with a lesser consecration, have come to fame without all that labor and expense. He chose otherwise, because he is a man of moral, as well as artistic, responsibility. He could not devote less than all his resources to the art that is his spiritual life. A man of humble origins, he has known that people, the people, means all the people there are and that art must belong to all the people and draw its strength from all the people. Common folk, aristocrats, intellectuals, the monied, the musical—it takes them all nowadays to make music make sense. And being a leader, if one's talent imposes such a responsibility, requires a full man's full time.

* * *

Koussevitzky has been a full man and given full-time service during a long lifetime. That service, we hope, is far from ended; but his twenty-five years as conductor of the world's most celebrated orchestra are drawing to a close. It is only just that at this time the whole world of music make him aware of its gratitude for services rendered, pay him some outward sign of the deep honor it owes him. Let these words stand as evidence of one musician's appreciation.

PITTSFIELD, MASS.
BERKSHIRE EAGLE
1949

Recordings Made Of Double Bass By Koussevitzky

BOSTON—An album of double bass recordings by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, which were made for RCA Victor in 1929, will soon be issued. The collection consists of the Andante from Koussevitzky's own double bass concerto, his "Chanson Triste" and "Valse Miniature," a largo by Eccles, and a lullaby by Laska. A few copies of the Eccles number and the "Chanson Triste" were circulated 20 years ago, but the other recordings are to be released for the first time.

Dr. Koussevitzky made the recordings in 1929 when he played for the last time the instrument by which he first won fame. The albums will be sold as souvenirs of the 25th anniversary of Dr. Koussevitzky as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The proceeds will benefit the Koussevitzky 25th anniversary fund of the orchestra.

ROCHESTER, N. Y.
DEMOCRAT-CHRONICLE
JAN 23 1949

* * *

Hanson Concerto Gets Critics' Favor

Dr. Howard Hanson's new Piano Concerto in G major, played by Rudolf Firkusny as soloist, and Dr. Hanson guest conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall last week, was received favorably by most of the New York critics, the day following a performance in Brooklyn which the Brooklyn Eagle critic characterized as bad work from the orchestra.

I'm told since that comment appeared, that the Boston orchestra considers the Brooklyn concert, usually preceding its Carnegie Hall event, as more or less of a rehearsal. That, it seems to me, is playing exceeding bad faith with the public which pays out its good money. I can see no reason for any orchestra letting down in giving its best where it is catering to music lovers. They are entitled to an orchestra's best at all times.

I can remember the old days when Broadway theater productions were tried out in Rochester before hitting the big time, every effort was made to have these performances top notch.

In the belief that Rochesterians will be interested in what the New York critics thought of the new Hanson work, here are excerpts:

Olin Downes, Times: "The orchestra gave superb performance. . . . Hanson's four-movement concerto is written with sureness of hand and an experienced eye to effect, by a composer who is not in the least afraid of being direct, melodic, virtuosic to the point of the obvious. The very opening with horns is obvious, if you put it that way. It is also imaginative, and expresses immediately one of the impelling ideas of the score. A later hearing will tell us how it stands by the side of the best other examples of Mr. Hanson's symphonic writing."

Robert A. Hague, Star: "The Hanson concerto is a handsome and effective piece in the composer's characteristic conservative style. Though thoroughly conventional in mold and manner, and often remindful of its models, it nevertheless has a good deal to say that is fresh and affecting, to say, and says it with considerable grace and conviction. . . . Firkusny and the orchestra gave of their highly distinguished best to put the work over handsomely under the composer's baton."

Louis Biancolli, World-Telegram: "The big item was a piano concerto by Mr. Hanson. . . . The news, perhaps, is that the Nebraska composer has come out of his academic cloisters. The concerto is a strongly appealing score, gushing with warm melody and tangy streamlets from Tin Pan Alley. Howard Hanson has finally sat down with George Gershwin. The melodic patterns are his own and the way he piles up and crosses rhythms shows only a distant kinship to Gershwin's concerto. What is good news is that Prof. Hanson is doing some whooping up of his own."

Irving Kolodin, The Sun: "In scope the most consequential of the unfamiliar works was Hanson's only piano concerto. Hanson may be commended for going his own way as a composer, but it is not a way that this listener finds congenial. The melodic content is weak for the meaning it is meant to convey, the musical dress a motley of periods and styles. Firkusny's playing was adroit, but there was little with which he could be convincing."

Virgil Thomson, Herald-Tribune: "Hanson's concerto, beautifully played by Firkusny and conducted by himself, is a slow-fast-slow-fast work in four movements. Its expressive content seems to be related in some way to Stephen Foster, though the Andante, the most eloquent of its sections, bears no reference of the sort. Eclectic clean through is the only way I can describe it."

[242]

Times

26 C

NATIONAL THEATRE PROPOSED IN HOUSE

Opera, Ballet Also Covered in Bill—$250,000 Asked for Plan-Laying Assembly

Special to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

WASHINGTON, Jan. 24—Congress was called upon today to take the "first effective step" toward the establishment of a national theater and a national opera and ballet.

Representative Jacob K. Javits, Republican, of New York, offered a resolution asking a $250,000 appropriation to finance a national assembly of leaders in these arts who would formulate the actual, concrete plans for such a new national institution.

Supported by prominent figures in the field of drama and music, the measure would empower the President to convene the national assembly. The only restrictions that would be imposed on the assembly would be that, in its planning, it establish safeguards against "Governmental control or direction" and steer clear of making it a medium for "unemployment relief."

"This is not to be another WPA," Mr. Javits told a news conference.

To insure against the "dangers of the paralyzing hand of government control of the arts and the use that can be made of them to control thought," the resolution directed that constituent elements of the assembly itself be entrusted with direction of the new national institutions.

Stating that Senator Irving M. Ives, also of New York, would join in sponsoring the proposal, Mr. Javits declared that it did not constitute a "brick-an-mortar" plan.

If an actual theatre building were to be constructed, it would develop as part of the over-all plan. In such an event, he said, Washington itself, now without a legitimate theatre, might be the location of such a building.

The real purpose of the proposal, he said, was to provide the formula whereby this country, one of the few in the world not having a national theatre, opera or ballet, might proceed to establish one. Once established, he said, traveling companies woulld be sent around the country to bring the arts to millions who now find them unavailable.

"In this way, America's riches in dramatic and musical talent," he said, "may best be developed and our democratic culture served and advanced."

The ultimate cost of such an ambitious program, he said, might well run to $25,000,000 a year, but he added it would be "well warranted." He noted in a brief speech on the floor that Great Britain, despite its very serious economic problems, had just voted $4,000,000 for its Arts Council to support a national theatre.

Plan Hailed on Broadway

The proposal to provide for a national theatre and a national opera and ballet was hailed yesterday by leading Broadway figures as "an historic occasion for the American theatre." Opera circles were a bit more reserved, however.

At a joint interview at the American National Theatre and Academy, 139 West Forty-fourth Street, Helen Hayes, Oscar Serlin, Vinton Freedley, Clarence Derwent, Blanch Yurka, G. Lawton Campbell and others expressed unqualified approval of the measure. All are members of ANTA, which helped draft the bill.

They emphasized that any proposed national theatre would not compete with commercial productions, but were reluctant to discuss possible costs of a Government-subsidized arts program. It was pointed out that commercial shows center in New York, whereas the projected national theatre would include establishments in every state of the union.

They also said there were several preliminary steps to be taken before a national theatre could be set up. First, the bill must be passed. This would authorize the President to call an assembly of representatives of all branches of theatre, opera and ballet to prepare and submit a detailed program. Then, Congress must appropriate the money.

Plans Are Discussed

Mr. Campbell, chairman of the board of ANTA, reported that it was planned that the national theatre would carry on along the lines set by ANTA in the last few years: giving advice, scripts, technical help and big names for locally organized professional theatre groups.

He said major theatrical enterprises existed at present in only fifteen cities in the nation, outside New York, whereas twenty-five years ago there were stock companies in almost every city.

"ANTA's job is to bring the theatre back to all those places," he said. "We're not going to replace anything; our job is to supplement and help."

Oscar Serlin, producer of "Life With Father" and "Life With Mother," added:

"I think the important thing to stress is that it's going to be a professional theatre, not amateur."

Mr. Derwent, president of Actors Equity Association, said:

"Provisions of this bill will constitute the first firm steps toward the realization by Government aid of this long-over-due measure which, apart from its cultural significance, will greatly implement the efforts now afoot to rehabilitate the theatre, restore it to its former pre-eminence, and provide employment for members of Equity."

A dissenting opinion came later from Lee Shubert, theatre owner. He said he hoped the project worked, but doubted it would.

"Nothing works in the theatre unless it's commercial," he said. "Plays produced for art for art's sake never have been a success. Too many people will have things to say about them."

Plans for establishing the national theatre were said to be far ahead of those for the national opera and ballet.

TOLEDO, OHIO
BLADE
25 1949

Koussevitzky's Monument

THROUGHOUT HIS long career in the music of America, Serge Koussevitzky has made it a part of his job to give tangible encouragement to American composers. He has done it in several ways. But, most important of all, he has played their music on the programs of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Now, as he completes his astoundingly successful career with the Boston musicians, Mr. Koussevitzky does not, as many other conductors might have done, devote his talents and those of his musicians to works in which they have already established both proficiency and reputation. Instead, he continues to perform new music by American composers. Two complete programs played in New York last week were made up of new works by contemporary native composers.

This is not the easy road to popularity for a conductor, who is concerned about pleasing his audiences. For modern music—American or otherwise—is not always pleasant to hear, particularly on first acquaintance. One might not have blamed Mr. Koussevitzky for wanting to make his last season with the Boston orchestra one which would be sure to please its audiences.

That he chose to play even more of the music of Americans than usual is a fitting monument to his important place in the history of the nation's musical life. Only by being heard can the music of native composers be properly evaluated. And many an American composer—whether his music survives or is forgotten—will owe his first opportunity to be heard to the willingness of Serge Koussevitzky to risk the displeasure of tradition-loving audiences so that music in America might have opportunity to thrive as a living art.

MUSIC

Ernest Ansermet Guest Conductor of Boston Symphony

By CYRUS DURGIN

Ernest Ansermet, the distinguished Swiss conductor, made last night the first of his three appearances as guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. From the outset he proved his clear title to the international reputation which had preceded him here. He is a meticulous conductor, firm of beat, but not a metronome. He insists upon fine detail and a clear balance of sonority. After the French style, he draws a light, satiny tone. Above all, he has that enviable mastery of rhythm which is at once a hallmark of an expert conductor and the despair of those who have it not.

The music proceeds not from bar to bar, but in a subtle, sensitive and plastic flow. This was evident in every score of the evening, and especially so in the magically evocative "Iberia" of Debussy, which ended the program. It had been as apparent in the two opening pieces of Beethoven: the "Leonore" Overture No. 2 and the Fourth Symphony, and Stravinsky's capriciously meandering "Song of the Nightingale."

His treatment of Beethoven is best described by that overworked but sometimes precise word "classic." Everything was in perfect proportion, and absolutely neat. Mr. Ansermet's choice of pace for each of the four movements was impeccable. The scherzo has been more exciting from other hands and the adagio more sentimental. But you would go far to find a more musicianly reading.

This tall, white-bearded gentleman is not a dynamic figure to watch, for he goes about his work very calmly. But the confidence, the respect and the response of the orchestra were to be found in the sounds he drew from them. They played very well, indeed, for him.

I had never heard Stravinsky or the Debussy "Iberia" interpreted in just this way. Delicacy and subtlety were the governing characteristics. A hasty impression might fasten upon the term "impersonal," but actually these readings were decidely individual, a fact you realize when once you perceive that Mr. Ansermet's personal style is mellow rather than spectacularly intense.

The Beethoven Symphony, the Stravinsky and Debussy will be repeated next Friday and Saturday. In place of the Overture we shall hear a Petite Symphonic Concertante by the Swiss Frank Martin.

Incidentally, and for the sake of the record, it may be added that while these appearances are Mr. Ansermet's first with the Boston Symphony they are not his Boston debut. He appeared here in 1915 with Diaghilev's Ballet Russe.

Jan. 26

SYMPHONY CONCERT

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

After 34 years Ernest Ansermet had returned to Boston. The distinguished Swiss maestro, who who came to the Boston Opera House in 1915 as conductor of the Diaghilev Ballet Russe, is this week making his first appearances at Symphony Hall. The program that he offered last evening is substantially the same as that which he will conduct on Friday and Saturday evening.

The one item peculiar to last evening's list was the Second "Leonore" Overture of Beethoven. The other pieces were that master's Fourth Symphony, Stravinsky's "Song of the Nightingale" and Debussy's "Iberia." These will all turn up later in the week, along with a new work by Mr. Ansermet's compatriot, Frank Martin.

The hear the rarely-performed "Leonore" No. 2 is to realize how great a composer was Beethoven. Not because it is a fine piece, which undoubtedly it is, but because having written one so good, he could turn around and make it so much better. There are certain conductors, and perhaps Mr. Ansermet is one of them, who actually prefer "Leonore" No. 2 to No. 3, while the former counted among its champions none other than Robert Schumann. The advantage in No. 2, if advantage it is, lies in the fact that there is no recapitulation of the thematic material. Instead, after a few transitional measures, Beethoven goes from the trumpet-call, itself different from the less satisfactory than the one in No. 3, right into the exciting coda. The proponents of the piece see here a closer relationship with the opera. But what of it?

Mr. Ansermet gave us this Overture for all that it was worth, and he accomplished striking performances of the other numbers, which, however, had better be discussed when he has had more time to perfect them, though it is hard to see just where the perfecting will be done. Last night he seemed very sure of himself, and of the orchestra, and the orchestra plainly felt itself to be in good hands. The audience was enthusiastic throughout.

Jan 26

THE

MUSIC

Tuesday Symphony

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Ernest Ansermet conducting, gave the sixth program of the Tuesday series in Symphony Hall last night. The program:

Overture to Leonore, No. 2, Op. 72;	Beethoven
Symphony No. 4 in B flat, Op. 60	Beethoven
Chant du Rossignol	Stravinsky
Iberia	Debussy

By RUDOLPH ELIE

It didn't take Ernest Ansermet, the noted Swiss conductor, long to demonstrate the reason for the formidable reputation that has preceded him here as he made his debut with the Boston Symphony orchestra last night.

He gave a program of music, much of it exceedingly difficult to perform, following only two rehearsals with the orchestra, and it was very clear from the outset that he is a man who knows his business as few others. Tall, with a close-cropped halo of grey hair, a trim Louis Pasteur beard, and an extremely affable but correct stage manner, Mr. Ansermet informs his conducting at once with a striking clarity and a most musical insight. His beat, though plastic and flexible, reflects the precision of his musical thinking; the up-beat in particular signalling his intentions to the orchestra so clearly it is never caught in a fuzzy or disjointed attack.

Last night he seldom let himself go; a certain technical alertness or perhaps preoccupation occasionally got between himself and the interpretative quality he is clearly capable of. That is to say he could not afford last night to seek for a transcendent performance, to ever let himself risk the least possibility of a misinterpreted gesture. The results, though of the utmost beauty, of classical repose (in the Beethoven Fourth notably) and discriminatory balance and texture, were seldom electrifying. But it was clear that Mr. Ansermet when he can be at ease—not that he didn't seem it last night — will give us music of rare beauty.

Of the program more Saturday, but it may be mentioned that the unfamiliar Leonore No. 2, after a tentative sort of beginning, proved especially good to hear again, that the Fourth never sounded more grateful, that the Stravinsky "Song of the Nightingale" is a most amusing and interesting piece, and that Debussy's "Iberia" remains his most evocative essay for orchestra. It may also be mentioned that the capacity audience last night was wonderfully cordial to the distinguished visitor, most appreciative of the orchestra's fine response, and not a little impressed by the work of the first desk soloists.

Programs Set At Tanglewood

NEW YORK—(UP)—The 12th annual Berkshire Festival will open at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass., on July 16, the ~~Boston~~ Symphony Orchestra announced. ~~The festival~~ will climax the 25th season of Serge Koussevitzky as conductor of the orchestra.

Nine concerts will be given in the Tanglewood music shed, through three week ends, on Thursday evenings, Saturday evenings, and Sunday afternoons (series A on July 28, 30 and 31; series B, Aug. 4, 6, and 7; series C, Aug. 11, 13 and 14). The guest conductors of the festival will be Leonard Bernstein and Eleazar de Carvalho. Soloists will be announced.

Before the concerts in the large music shed by the full orchestra Dr. Koussevitzky will conduct four concerts by a smaller orchestra in the initimate theater-concert hall. These concerts will be given on the Saturday evening and Sunday afternoon of two week ends, July 16-17, and July 23-24. Two different programs will be given each week end. They will be drawn from the music of Bach and Mozart, as in previous seasons, and this year music of Haydn and Schubert will be added.

In connection with the Koussevitzky anniversary, the Boston Orchestra has arranged with RCA Victor to distribute a souvenir album of double bass recordings made by Dr. Koussevitzky in 1929, when he played for the last time the instrument which first brought him fame. The album, containing three vinylite records, will be sold for $10 each. All proceeds will go to the Koussevitzky anniversary fund of the orchestra.

[243]

8

on — Ansermet as Symphony Guest

Wide World

Ernest Ansermet, founder and conductor of the Orchestre de la Suisse Romande of Geneva, making his guest appearance with the Boston Symphony at its concerts this week.

Swiss Conductor Receives Ovation at First Concert

Last night Ernest Ansermet, the distinguished Swiss conductor, made his first guest appearance with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall. He was warmly received and enthusiastically applauded for his restrained and scholarly control at the baton. His refreshing interpretations of well-known works compelled the listener's attention.

For the sixth program in the Tuesday evening series M. Ansermet chose two works by Beethoven—his Overture to "Leonore" No. 2, Opus 72, and the Symphony No. 4 in B-flat major, Opus 60. The rest of the program was given to Stravinsky's Symphonic Poem, "Chant du Rossignol," and to Debussy's "Ibéria" from his "Images" for Orchestra, No. 2.

* * *

A native of Vevey, Switzerland, M. Ansermet first attained international prominence as a conductor when he toured Europe and both Americas with Serge Diaghilev's Ballet Russe in 1915. It was during this tour that he first conducted in Boston. In 1918 he became the founder and conductor of the Orchestra de la Suisse Romande in Geneva. He has been active as a guest conductor since 1946.

M. Ansermet's control over the orchestra was so subtly poised that he achieved sudden dynamic contrasts with only the slightest change of gesture. He is cool in manner, subjective in interpretation. He takes his time to let the beauty of the music speak for itself. The "Leonore" Overture took on a new aspect under his touch. The music was filled with subdued kinetic energy that seemed more powerful because never fully expended.

* * *

In the performance of Beethoven's Fourth — one of his more lyrical and romantic works—M. Ansermet brought out many facets of prismatic color. It was a Teutonic composition seen through Gallic eyes. It was like a German countryside painted by Monet.

Stravinsky's "Song of the Nightingale," adapted from his opera based on Hans Christian Andersen's fairy tale, was last played here in 1925 under Dr. Serge Koussevitzky's direction. It is filled with Stravinsky's early theatrical effects and rapidly changing rhythms. While it has good splotches of color, it is for the most part invertebrate and spasmodic. It is ballet music that loses in the divorcement from stage action and soon becomes tedious. Even an expert reading like M. Ansermet's cannot save it.

The gorgeous texture of Debussy's "Ibéria" scintillated with its tambourines and castanets, its swirling Spanish tempos, its fiddles strummed like mandolins. Here M. Ansermet was in his element. We were swept along by the sensuous beauties of an idyllic Spain.

H. R.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

For some little time, and for one reason or another, the Symphony Concerts have been a bit trying. That of yesterday, conducted by our Swiss guest, Ernest Ansermet, and featuring a new work by his fellow-countryman, Frank Martin, was a joy from beginning to end.

In addition to the Martin "Petite Symphonie Concertante," for harpsichord, harp, piano and two string orchestras, the program offered, as repetitions from last Tuesday's concert, when Mr. Ansermet made his Symphony Hall debut, Beethoven's Fourth Symphony, Stravinsky's "Song of the Nightingale" and Debussy's "Iberia." On Tuesday these three pieces were given a sympathetic and, as it then appeared, a finished performance. Yet compared with those of yesterday, these several performances seemed no more than a careful reading through. Everything was now heightened and pointed up. Whereas Mr. Ansermet's version of the Symphony had impressed as singularly clear and precise, it was now all of these things and highly eloquent besides.

In retrospect Tuesday's performance of the difficult music of Stravinsky seemed tentative beside yesterday's vivid and glowing account of it, with every pictorial detail in sharpest relief, while the "Iberia" was saturated with atmosphere, and had never sounded more intoxicating, tonally or rhythmically.

Speaking of Martin's piece ahead of time, Mr. Ansermet said that while he had played in Switzerland the music of many Swiss composers, he had not felt that this music was suitable for export, but that of Martin was in very different case. Possibly the make-up of this charming composition, with its unusual combining of harpsichord, harp and piano, is more striking and original than its actual content. However, the latter is full of charm. Here is a contemporary composer, of the middle generation who is willing and able to write music of ready appeal, instead of exploiting some theory of composition.

No doubt because of the fragile tone of the harpsichord, Mr. Ansermet employed only a handful of players in each of these string orchestras. The solo harp and piano parts were taken, as might have been expected, by Bernard Zighera and Lukas Foss, respectively, and the harpsichordist was Sylvia Marlowe. Here was artistry in abundance, and the audience, cordially disposed throughout the afternoon, seemed particularly to relish this novel tonal dish.

It is a pity that Mr. Ansermet will not be with us for a longer time, but it is to be hoped that we will have him again as guest. An accomplished conductor, a sensitive and discerning musician, he puts himself wholly at the service of the composer. That such an attitude can be appreciated was shown by the ovation accorded him at the concert's end.

First Time In Boston For Martin Work

One novelty will be heard at the Symphony Hall concerts given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra tomorrow afternoon and Saturday evening — Frank Martin's "Petite Symphonie Concertante" for harp, harpsichord, piano, and two string orchestras. Ernest Ansermet of Switzerland will be the guest conductor. M. Ansermet has championed M. Martin's compositions since 1919, when he first performed one of the Swiss composer's works.

M. Ansermet is the founder and conductor of Geneva's 30-year-old Orchestre de la Suisse Romande. This week's Tuesday evening concert marked his first appearance with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The rest of his program for the week-end concerts includes Beethoven's Fourth Symphony; Stravinsky's symphonic poem, "Song of the Nightingale," and Debussy's "Ibéria."

Soloists for the Martin composition will be Sylvia Marlowe, harpsichord; Bernard Zighera, harp, and Lukas Foss, piano. The work, written in 1944-45, is a product of the composer's maturity. He is one of the first musicians of French culture to master Schönberg's 12-tone technique.

* * *

Although he has written a symphony and his "Musique de Ballet" by using the strict 12-tone system, his works of the past 10 years show that he has found liberation from the orthodox Schönberg school. He once told Edmond Appia, the conductor, that "one should multiply experiments and technical researches in order to master all one's potentialities and thus be able to respond materially to one's spiritual concept."

He now employs broad melodic lines, subtle harmonic and rhythmic patterns, and a sustained contrapuntal texture. We find this blend of several methods in his "Petite Symphonie Concertante." Twenty-two minutes long, it is in two sections, separated by a short fermata. The opening is an Adagio in three-four time, the first 46 measures of which include all thematic material employed afterward.

In the second mood, Allegro con moto, the time changes to three-two, and two themes are developed along symphonic lines. The three solo instruments often play as a trio and constitute, in a sense, a third orchestra. This fast section [illegible] to a tranquil lento, then returns to the first tempo.

A second Adagio is taken up after the short pause that separates the two sections. It is in four-four time and makes considerable use of the solo instruments playing without the orchestras. This mood becomes more animated until it breaks into an Allegretto alla Marcia in four-eight time. The music builds, the time changes to three-eight, and the ensemble then swings into a dance-like Vivace for the finale.

* * *

Jacques de Menasce, writing in the Musical Quarterly for April, 1948, makes the following observation:

"In the 'Petite Symphonie Concertante' one is unable to discover any ties with folklore, either of the Swiss Romande or of France, two sources to which Martin would have turned naturally. Nevertheless, a composer's origins and his background cannot be completely overlooked. The imponderable of atavism does exist and one may feel justified in pointing to such attributes of Martin's as . . . his conciseness and feeling for form, the clear articulation of all his utterances, and the sensitivity of his color schemes—all characteristic attributes of a spiritual climate associated with Latin civilization generally and with France in particular.

"Howbeit, with or without a national background, the 'Petite Symphonie Concertante' is a fine work that reflects well on a composer who has been proving his excellence for some time." H. R.

Globe Jan 27

Conductor Ansermet One of Few in Field Who Talks Well on Music

By CYRUS DURGIN

It seems to be a fact in this less than best of all possible worlds that most musicians cannot talk well about the beauty they bring to the public. One exception is Ernest Ansermet, the tall, courtly, white-bearded, long-nosed Swiss gentleman who is guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this week.

He can talk about many things clearly and vividly, and music is one of them. Perhaps that is because he was a professor of mathematics before he became a conductor. Mathematicians, you know, have very clear minds, and usually agile tongues.

"Music to me," says Mr. Ansermet, "is all feeling. It is feeling expressed in terms of melody, rhythm and harmony. It is speculative, not realistic or practical. Mathematics is speculative, too, and that probably is why a good mathematician oftentimes has deep feeling for music."

Mr. Ansermet did not cite the example, but this chronicler immediately thought of Albert Einstein and his fiddle.

Mathematics was a bridge into music for Mr. Ansermet, who was born in Vevey, Nov. 11, 1883, and therefore is now 65.

"Not Enough Time for Art . . ."

"I wanted to compose, but I realized that in my country at that time I couldn't make a job of it. Mathematics always had been easy to me, so I decided that if I taught mathematics I would have a certain number of hours each day—and a three-months' Summer vacation—for music. It worked well until I discovered that the science was taking too much time and there was not enough for the art.

"So then I began my career in conducting. I have never practiced any instrument to the extent of becoming a virtuoso. But I played various orchestral instruments to learn about the orchestra. I'd rehearse with the violins, and I'd play the clarinet and trumpet. I tackled the tympani and the triangle, too. The same went for the piano. But, actually mastery of an instrument is not essential to conducting. Knowledge of how the instruments are played and their potentialities is the requisite."

This practicality and logic and lucidity is probably the main trait in Mr. Ansermet's character. He is not an intense conductor and probably he is not an intense man. But both in his art and his thinking he is orderly and profound. He has, too, a relaxed point of view which may reflect his European origin and conditioning.

"I do not spend much time memorizing scores as many of your American conductors do. We do not do that in Europe. Perhaps we are lazy," he added with a twinkling eye and a bubbling laugh.

"In Europe our orchestras are not as good as yours, and for that reason less is expected of our conductors. Over here the conditions are different, and conductors feel obliged to give more, to learn a great number of scores by heart. I prefer to think a lot about a small number of scores that I like."

In Switzerland Mr. Ansermet is conductor of the Orchestre de la Suisse Romande in Geneva, which plays on the radio as well as in concert halls. He first visited Boston some 34 years ago, in 1915, as conductor with the legendary Ballet Russe of Serge Dinghilev. He has toured most of Europe and much in the two Americas. He has gained an especial reputation with modern music, and he did much, in the Diaghilev days, to spread the fame of Stravinsky.

Quite out of sympathy with the 12-tone method of composition, Mr. Ansermet believes that the present time is a crisis in the history of composition.

"It is a very critical period, I believe. We have gone far in extending our musical vocabulary. But we have not yet caught up in formulating a theory assimilating these new means of expression. No one knows what are the laws governing the application of all that we have discovered. For that reason, I think many young composers feel lost."

All this was said with the quiet assurance of a man of years of experience, who knows what he is talking about, but also with the vigor of a man whose mind has remained young. That sign of youth is also reflected in him physically. His white hair and beard show his years, but his conductor's hands might be those of a man of 25.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
SUN

JAN 27 1949

THE NEW RECORDS

By IRVING KOLODIN

What might be interpreted as a small rift in the dark clouds hanging over the record field will be visible when Columbia's "Kiss Me Kate" album appears in the shops. There will be the name of the star, Alfred Drake, in large letters; and, in somewhat smaller letters—probably the smallest consistent with visibility—"by courtesy of RCA-Victor."

Those who know their way around the entertainment industry realize that this gesture of co-operation is merely a matter of conflicting contracts. Drake has a recording contract with RCA, but he also has a contract with the producers of the Cole Porter show, who in turn have a contract with Columbia for the "original cast" version of the show. It would have been simplest, of course, had RCA outbid its business rival for the rights to record "Kate," but failing that, the tide of industrial empire flows on, with the compromise as noted. (Drake, incidentally, will make a solo, "non-original cast" album of "Kate" excerpts for RCA, with Jane Pickens.)

With this small sign of reasonableness as symbol, it might fervently be hoped that the practice will extend a little farther in the record field. There is the imminent prospect, for example, of Toscanini conducting "Aida" with the NBC Symphony Orchestra. Here would seem a long-awaited opportunity to preserve one of the rare performances of opera directed by Toscanini—an opportunity that was missed, for one reason or another, when Toscanini did his "Fidelio," "Boheme," "Traviata" and "Otello." But Richard Tucker, the Radames, is a Columbia artist. The beau geste would be for Columbia to swap his services for those of Drake. There is, however, one small impediment to the execution of this happy plan: RCA is about to start shipment of a complete "Aida" made in Rome under the direction of Serafin, with Gigli, Caniglia, Stignani, &c. So we shall have to go on waiting and hoping another year for a Toscanini opera.

Projects From Boston.

Two record projects originating in Boston have come to attention recently, both of an uncommon nature, and with something more than commercial intent. On behalf of the twenty-fifth anniversary of Serge Koussevitzky's services with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, RCA has reissued the collection of double bass solos recorded by the eminent virtuoso and conductor nearly a score of years ago, with the proceeds to benefit the fund recently established by the orchestra in Koussevitzky's honor.

Those who recall the single Carnegie Hall recital by Koussevitzky in 1928, or who heard the original issues of these sides, know that his command of the instrument was close to miraculous. Now the selections — mostly by himself, but also a largo by Eccles and a lullaby by Laska—have been dubbed onto new masters, the bass response reinforced and the pressings issued on Vinylite. What rumbles, then, is only the instrument, and that very little in Koussevitzky's hands. We commend the album not only as an oddity, but also as a benefit to a deserving purpose. (RCA Victor Limited Edition album No. 1)

The other project emanates from the "Haydn Society of the United States," and concerns a subscription issue of that master's "Missa Solemnis" ("Harmoniemesse"). Made in Munich under the direction of Ludwig Berberich, the issue covers fourteen twelve-inch sides. and is limited to 500 subscription copies. Subscription books close April 1st, and if the number of subscribers exceeds 500, those in excess will be rejected. Vinylite is used, the records are in automatic sequence and the price is $15.75. Address the office of the secretary, 179 Cambridge street, Boston, Mass. I can offer no opinion of the quality of the records, for test pressings are not yet available.

PITTSFIELD, MASS.
PERKSHIRE EAGLE

JAN 27 1949

Records

Koussevitzky Performs on Double Bass

By JAY C. ROSENFELD

An album about to be released by RCA Victor will probably incorporate what to most of us has been a legend into an actual and lasting pleasure. Three Red Seal de luxe Vinylite records made by Serge Koussevitzky in 1929 offer music lovers a chance not only to hear performances of unique beauty, but also to learn of what has come to be a lost art. The albums will be sold as souvenirs of the 25th season of Dr. Koussevitzky as conductor of the Boston Symphony and the proceeds will benefit the Koussevitzky 25th anniversary fund of the orchestra.

The venerated Boston conductor first came into musical prominence as a virtuoso on the double-bass viol, but was forced to let his instrumental activities vanish when his orchestral duties became so much more important when he first arrived in Boston. Meanwhile the contrabass had fallen into disrepute as a solo instrument; these records may be considered as a record for posterity.

* * *

Two of the sides were previously released, but the remaining four sides were kept in the vaults of the Victor company up to now. Koussevitzky felt in 1929 that they did not represent what he had been able to accomplish on the instrument, but today their historic value has persuaded him to approve their release.

Immediately discernible are the attributes which make orchestral music under his direction so absorbing; a magnificent conception of line, a continuously glowing tone and the peerless faculty of maintaining and re-instilling vigorous urgency in the music. Except for a propensity to make his shifts and slides very noticeable, the mechanics of the playing are formidable. His intonation has the character associated with Casals and Heifetz, the tone has a vivid warmth and the bowing the uncanny amplitude of those masters who know the secret of preserving intensity without expending all their resources.

* * *

The breadth of the "Largo" from the Eccles sonata is probably the best example of his individual eloquence and graphic expressiveness. The piano accompaniments were done with completely worthy artistry by Pierre Luboshutz. The literature for the instrument is extremely meager. Thus Koussevitzky composed many things to enlarge his personal repertory. In addition to the Eccles, there are his own "Valse Miniature," his "Chanson Triste" Opus 2 and the second movement, andante, from his own concerto in F minor, Opus 3, and a "Wiegenlied" by Gustav Laska.

It used to be the custom at times to use a smaller instrument for solo playing than the dinosaurian monster ordinarily used today in orchestral playing. There is no reason to warrant any such assumption in this case. The smaller body, however, permitted the achievement of a cello-like tone while the employment of a longer neck retained the problems peculiar to the unwieldy viol. This album exhibits another and less known facet of Koussevitzky's art and proves, if proof were necessary, that the talents which have made him superlative as a conductor served him equally well as a performer.

CHICAGO, ILL.
TRIBUNE

JAN 28 1949

ON THE RECORD

Koussevitzky Double Bass, Schnabel-Fournier Sonata, Busch-Serkin Trio, Some Other Things

By Claudia Cassidy

COLLECTORS IN SEARCH of Serge Koussevitzky's double bass recordings are being rescued by a series of circumstances. Perhaps you remember that when Boston asked its renowned conductor what he wanted in token of admiration and affection in the 25th and farewell season, he said he wanted "a big gift" for his orchestra. That gift was a backlog of financial security, and the fast growing Serge Koussevitzky Anniversary fund is the result. To augment it, a limited edition of 1,000 albums of Koussevitzky recordings has been made available by the Boston orchestra in co-operation with RCA Victor. Each is autografed, holds the portrait of the player with his instrument now hanging in Koussevitzky's Tanglewood home, and features three 12-inch ruby vinylite records of the slow movement from Koussevitzky's double bass concerto, his "Chanson Triste" and "Valse Miniature," and his arrangement of a largo by Eccles, plus a lullaby by Laska. The recordings were made in 1929, and you have to hear what they can do with the double bass to believe it. Pierre Luboshutz is the accompanist. The price is $10, including mailing costs. Address the Boston Symphony orchestra, Symphony hall, Boston 15, Mass.

Koussevitzky

—o—

BEETHOVEN: Sonata No. 3, in A major, Opus 69, played by Pierre Fournier, cellist, and Artur Schnabel, pianist (Victor DM-1231; three 12-inch records). Schnabel's illness has canceled his concerts, and the French cellist is not booked in Chicago so far, but this serene music, superbly played, is an agreeable consolation prize.

BEETHOVEN: Trio No. 4, in D major, Opus 70, No. 1, played by Rudolf Serkin, piano; Adolf Busch, violin, and Herman Busch, violoncello (Columbia MM-804; three 12-inch records.) Good music and good playing, with the ardor of Serkin's glowing piano surging up to make it bloom.

—o—

COPLAND: Sonata for Piano, played by Leonard Bernstein (Victor DM-1278; three 12-inch records.) This remarkable score is almost chameleonic in its response to pianists. Mr. Bernstein gives it a shallow sound, accentuating the jazz, which is the casual approach. On the final side he plays his anniversary sketches, "Aaron Copland," "My Sister, Shirley," and "In Memoriam: Alfred Eisner."

—o—

MEZZO-SOPRANO ARIAS: Sung by Cloe Elmo, with the E.I.A.R. orchestra, conducted by Armando la Rosa Parodi and Ugo Tansini, with Gina Cigna, soprano (Cetra 10; three 12-inch records.) The important thing here is the way Elmo's gorgeous quality makes opera something more vital than a dead language. Some of the excerpts are scrappy, and Cigna is no asset in the "Aida" act scenes. But the aria from "Adrienne Lecouvreur" is richly sung, and the album also holds Azucena's "Condotta ell'era in ceppi" (the aftermath of "Stride la vampa"), "O grandi occu lucenti," from "Fedora," and Brangaene's warning, also sung in Italian, from "Tristan and Isolde."

—o—

SINGLES: Erna Berger, a lyric soprano with a pure and lovely quality, sings "Et Incarnatus Est" from Mozart's Mass in C minor with the Philharmonia orchestra, under the direction of Joseph Krips, one of Salzburg's conductors next summer (Victor 12-0692). . . . If you missed the joint recitals by Francis Poulenc and the gifted French baritone, Pierre Bernac, Victor 12-0426 has expert reproductions of three "Metamorphoses" and some excursions into the ways of the dromedary, the mountain goat, the grasshopper, etc. . . . Eleanor Steber sings Micaela's air from "Carmen" and Louise's "Depuis le jour" with Walter Susskind and the Philharmonia orchestra. Still a beautiful exuberant voice, sometimes riskily misused.

MUSIC

Ansermet Introduces Fine Work by Swiss Composer Frank Martin

By CYRUS DURGIN

Ernest Ansermet, the distinguished Swiss conductor who this week is guest leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, introduced to this city yesterday a fine piece of music by his compatriot, Frank Martin. It is a Petite Symphonie Concertante for two small string orchestras and a solo group of harpischord (Sylvia Marlowe), piano (Lukas Foss) and harp (Bernard Zighera).

Martin (whose name Mr. Ansermet pronounces Mar-TEEN) is now about 59, and his career has involved exploration of several methods and styles of composition, including the 12-tone system originated by Arnold Schoenberg. What there is of this system in the Petite Symphonie Concertante has been thoroughly digested, for the method, inherently pedantic, does not limit Mr. Martin's personal expression, which makes both sense and music.

The two small string ensembles (eight violins, four violas, two cellos and two basses each) toss the thematic material and the development back and forth, with the three percussive instruments literally and figuratively in the middle. Sometimes harp, harpsichord and piano apepar as soloists, sometimes as a "concertino" in the old concerto grosso manner. This combination of instruments, when you come to think of it, is very imaginative, and produces a beautifully fresh and unusual compound of tone color. The score is brisk, logical [illegible] tractive, worthy to be he[illegible] The finale is an almost [illegible] which makes a [illegible] for a thoroughly exp[illegible] tiating composit[illegible]

Mr. Ansermet [illegible] the qualities noted at [illegible] pearance on Tuesday [illegible] of the highest orde[illegible] a [illegible] sense of rhythm; [illegible] and absolute clarity. He [illegible] warmly greeted by the Frid[illegible] ence. The rest of his prog[illegible] been heard before: Be[illegible] Fourth Symphony; "So[illegible] Nightingale" by S[illegible] "Iberia" by Debuss[illegible]

[245]

56
8

BOS

ANSERMET NOTABLE AS CONDUCTOR

Noted Swiss Guest Says U. S. Has Best Orchestras

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

In the midst of a series of promising proteges of Dr. Koussevitzky the current series of symphony concerts has found room for one notable guest conductor. He is the Swiss, Ernest Ansermet. This is his first visit to Boston since he came here with the Russian Ballet in 1915. He was a comparatively young man then; he is not a very old one now—65, though, except at close range, his white hair and gray beard make him look a little more than his age.

MAN OF INTELLECT

Actually, Mr. Ansermet seems to be in the full tide of his physical and mental vigor, especially the latter. Our great conductors have not all been men of intellect. Mr. Ansermet is plainly that. He not only has his likes and dislikes among modern composers, he can also rationalize them. He is a true cosmopolitan, a citizen of the world, who has conducted on three continents and speaks I do not know how many languages. His English is fluent and precise, and he can draw fine distinctions.

I had the pleasure of spending nearly two hours with Mr. Ansermet in his Boston hotel this week and I came away with enough material for a dozen articles: on modern composers and musical trends and systems, on politics and their relation to art, on the decline of the ballet, on American audiences and orchestras, and things I can no longer remember. Since I can not share all these riches with the reader I will single out a few high spots.

Mr. Ansermet began his career by teaching mathematics. "Music was my chief interest," he said, "but since I was not proficient on any instrument (he plays several after a fashion) I saw no prospect of getting a job in my country, and since mathematics was my other passion I devoted myself for a time to that." Outside the more obvious connections between the two, he finds a great point of resemblance in the fact that they are both "speculative," the one along the lines of intellect, the other along the lines of feeling. Both are concerned with the abstract not the concrete.

Unlike Sir Thomas Beecham, and like most visiting Europeans, Mr. Ansermet finds the American orchestras, particularly those of Boston and Philadelphia, the best in the world. "In the New York Philharmonic there are fine musicians but that orchestra plays under so many different conductors that it has no distinctive personality. To conduct one of these orchestras," said Mr. Ansermet, "is like riding a race horse. Much is expected of you and you have to be very careful, but the possibilities are boundless." The great European orchestras are getting back on their feet but they haven't got there yet. And even at their best they tended to be more limited than ours. The Vienna Philharmonic, for instance, is wonderful in the German classics but quite at sea when confronted with Stravinsky.

Americans Cordial

In view of his long and close association with that composer it was surprising to find Mr. Ansermet viewing him so realistically, protesting that his dogmas had now stifled his feelings, that in his own conducting he was too much preoccupied with rhythm ("he tells the numbers aloud as he conducts") and too little with meter. "In his new book he says that God denied Beethoven the gift of melody and gave it to Bellini. I would say that God denied Stravinsky the gift of melody and gave it to Prokofieff."

Despite its wonderful flowering at the beginning of this century the ballet, Mr. Ansermet feels, never became, like the opera, a social phenomenon, but did become the property of highbrows and intellectuals. He also deplores the disappearance of the plot and its replacement by dance abstractions. Regarding American audiences Mr. Ansermet finds them cordial and responsive but he is shocked at their ability to shake off the music as soon as it is done. "Once the last note is sounded they begin to talk about tomorrow's cocktail party." And he told of his horror in finding an audience act that way in New York after Dr. Koussevitzky had conducted the "Pathetic" Symphony of Tchaikovsky; the most impressive performance of it he ever heard.

New Fame For Phoenix

It may not be as true of a community as of an institution that it is the lengthened shadow of a man, but there is no doubt that the character of a city or town can be strongly influenced by a few of its residents. The spirit of a mind that burns with Walter Pater's "hard gem-like flame" of genius can move mountains of indifference.

Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, the renowned conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who is retiring this season, has already brought that kind of stimulus to Phoenix, where he plans to make his home. It is rather hard to imagine Dr. Koussevitsky in retirement, and he knows it as well as anyone. Actually he will merely transfer his energy, and fortunately for Phoenix, the desert country of the Southwest has attracted him.

Here he plans to establish a conservatory of music that the world will know. That is big talk for Phoenix—and exactly the kind of talk we need here. With Dr. Koussevitsky's prestige and effort behind such a move, it can succeed.

If, as he predicted, Phoenix can become an important musical center, last year's formation of the Phoenix Symphony Orchestra will prove to have been the first step toward cultural development of the community. The Orchestra has unquestionably made Phoenix conscious of the importance of good music. And that consciousness may be the fertile field needed for the seeds of the far-reaching proposal made by Dr. Koussevitsky.

It is interesting to note that a school of opera is included in his plans. A good beginning, or companion activity, might be the long-talked-of "opera under the stars" movement for Phoenix, by which light operatic productions would be presented by students under the incomparable night sky of Phoenix in the spring.

Dr. Koussevitsky will continue a limited number of his activities in the East. What time he finds to spare for the Phoenix project will result in a kind of progress that can't be measured in bricks and mortar, sales tax receipts or crop carloads. It will be entered on the short side of our present ledger.

Herald - Jan. 29

PAGE EIGHT

MUSIC

Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Ernest Ansermet conducting, gave the fifteenth program of the 68th season in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. The soloists were Sylvia Marlowe, harpsichord; Bernard Zighera, harp, and Lukas Foss, piano. The program:

Symphony No. 4 in B flat, Op 60 . Beethoven
Petite Symphonie Concertante . . . . . Martin
Chant du Rossignol . . . . Stravinsky
Iberia . . . . Debussy

By RUDOLPH ELIE

Just as Tuesday night's audience had been on the occasion of its first acquaintance with Ernest Ansermet, yesterday afternoon's audience was clearly impressed with the poise, distinction and musical sensitivity the eminent Swiss conductor brings to the conductor's stand.

His is music making of an elevated spirit, never overwhelmingly exciting, but extremely cultured, tasteful, distinguished. There is a clarity of thought, a rationality, a sense of proportion, of balance that is eloquent yet never forced, polished but never elegant. It is the work, in short, of a craftsman who not only makes a sharp distinction between climax and noise, but an equally sharp distinction between dignity of motion and overwrought exhortation.

There was new music yesterday, one of the works new to Boston, the other not heard here in 24 years. The first was Frank Martin's "Petite Symphonie Concertante," an odd piece scored by the Swiss composer for two string orchestras with solo harp, harpsichord and piano. I found it one of the more interesting novelties of the season so far, if not always for its musical content at least for the unusual sonorities and timbres this peculiar assortment of solo instruments provides.

It is not "difficult" music in the sense its idiom is either obscure or overly dissonant; on the contrary it is music decidedly lyrical in vein, its obscurities springing more from increased harmonic tensions as in Schoenberg's "Verklaerte Nacht" (which its mood often recalls) than from melodic or harmonic complexities. The second section, with its powerful adagio recitatives for each solo instrument in turn followed by a lively and spirited march seemed most grateful to me, but the whole work is interesting and musical throughout, and will certainly bear repetition.

All three soloists—Sylvia Marlowe at the harpsichord, Bernard Zighera at the harp and Lukas Foss at the piano—performed with notable finesse, mastering the obviously difficult problems of performance with great musicianship.

Stravinsky's "Song of the Nightingale" in its metamorphosis from opera to symphonic poem seems to me as entertaining and instructive a piece as we've had all season long. It is picture music pure and by no means simple, and it must be listened to program in hand, otherwise the whimsical or delightfully amusing moments are lost to the listener who, unprepared for the fun, sits bewildered at the joke. The instructive part is listening to the incredible instrumental combinations the composer devises, and marvelling at the effects he achieves with each. It may be that the piece goes on just a little too long, but certainly the first three quarters of this comical tale of a nightingale competing with a mechanical bird for the favor of a Chinese emperor is the sheerest delight.

The program opened with a beautifully modelled performance of Beethoven's Fourth and ended with a most evocative and fragrant performance of Debussy's "Iberia." Next week Eleazar de Carvalho will offer Glazounoff's Fourth Symphony, a Fantasy by Villa-Lobos for violin and orchestra (Oscar Bergerth,, soloist) and Albeniz' Iberia Suite.

MORE THAN $600,000 IN GIFTS MADE

Moors Aids Charities —Leaves $250,000 to Friends

Bequests of more than $600,000 to various Greater Boston educational, religious and charitable institutions, were contained in the will of the late Back Bay banker, Arthur W. Moors, filed yesterday in Suffolk Probate Court and disposing of an estimated "well above $1,000,000" estate.

FUND TO HARVARD

In addition to his public bequests, Mr. Moors, who resided at 171 Beacon st., Back Bay, prior to his death Jan. 8, made personal gifts of more than $250,000 to relatives and friends.

Among the principal benefactors under the terms of the will are Harvard University and the First Church in Boston. Harvard received a $100,000 trust fund to provide scholarships for deserving students of Latin or ancient Greek.

In addition to an outright bequest of $5000, the First Church will receive the interest of a $160,000 trust fund which the testator expressed hope "will go far towards enabling the church for many generations to continue its furtherance of liberal religion in its present building."

Additional Gift

The will stipulated, however, that the trust continue only as long as the church is a member of the American Unitarian Society or its successor, and as long as its services and activities are carried on in its present edifice at Berkeley and Marlborough sts., Back Bay.

If in the opinion of the trustee of the estate—the Second National Bank of Boston—the two conditions are not fulfilled, the will directs that the trust cease and the principal be divided into the following shares, one-half for Harvard College, one-quarter to the Boston Museum of Fine Arts and one-quarter to the Greater Boston Community Fund.

The will also contained two $50,000 trust funds, the income of which will be used by the Hale House Association to support its summer camp, "Camp Hale" and the other to provide funds annually at the time of the appeal of the Greater Boston Community Fund.

More to Charities

A $40,000 trust fund bequest was made to the First Parish Church of Cohasset, the income of which is to be used to pay running expenses. To aid the North End Union, a settlement house, the will sets up a $25,000 trust fund to be administered by the Benevolent Fraternity of Unitarian Churches, and a $25,000 trust fund to the Boston Museum of Fine Arts.

Large bequests also went to the Massachusetts General Hospital, $5000 for a free bed; $10,000 to the Boston Symphony Orchestra; $15,000 to the Permanent Charity Fund; $10,000 to the Massachusetts Congregational Charitable Society; $20,000 to the Family Society of Greater Boston; $10,000 to the Peter Bent Brigham Hospital; $25,000 to the permanent fund of the Hale House Association.

The testator's extensive real estate holdings in Cohasset were willed to his brother, John F. Moors, 150 Fisher st., Brookline, who was also bequeathed $10,000.

The largest personal bequests were $50,000 to Catherine C. Fyffe who, the will said, "attended my wife for many years and later was my attendant." And $50,000 to his sister, Mrs. Adelaide M. Brown, 242 Beacon st., Back Bay.

His confidential secretary for 20 years, Mrs. Frances Nagle Cochrane of 2648 Massachusetts ave., Lexington, was bequeathed $20,000. She is the wife of John Cochrane, an automobile salesman and they have lived in Lexington for four years. Previously they resided in Belmont.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
JAN 30 1949

Three Firsts In Symphony Performance

HIGHLIGHTED by Providence debuts of a noted guest conductor, a violin soloist and a concerto, all from Brazil, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its third program of the season Tuesday night at 8:30 o'clock in the Metropolitan Theater.

Eleazar de Carvalho, who will conduct the concert, will feature the first performance in this country of "Fantasia de Movimentos Mixtos" for Violin and Orchestra, by Heitor Villa-Lobos, Brazil's outstanding composer. The soloist will be Oscar Borgerth, a native of Rio de Janiero, who is now on his first visit to this country.

This afternoon at 3:30 o'clock in the Rhode Island School of Design Auditorium a concert of Ukrainian national, folk and liturgical songs will be presented by the Kobzars, male chorus, under the direction of Melvin J. Zelchivsky. Also taking part is the Zelechivsky Family Quartet, consisting of Melvin, Hope and John Zelechivsky and Irene Zelechivsky Kanazawich. John Zelechivsky will appear as solo dancer.

The Amy Beach Club will give a concert at Mathewson Street Methodist Church Thursday night at 8:15 o'clock under the auspices

---

DR. CHRISTOPHER HONAAS
. . . on Berkshire faculty

☆

Dr. Honaas Wins Coveted Post

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and director of the Berkshire Music Center, has invited Dr. Christopher O. Honaas, director of the Rollins Conservatory of Music, to join the faculty of the Berkshire Music Center, Tanglewood, Mass., at the next Summer session, it was announced yesterday.

Dr. Honaas, who will replace Robert Shaw, will direct choral ensembles, teach classes in choral conducting, and lecture on choral literature, technique and interpretations at the Summer session.

Director of the Winter Park Bach Choir, Dr. Honaas will conduct the annual Bach Festival March 3, 4 and 5 of this year in Knowles Memorial Chapel. He will also conduct a Bach Sing at the Convention of the Southern Division of the Music Education National Conference in Tampa on April 27.

Dr. Honaas joined the faculty of Rollins College in 1932, becoming director of the Knowles Memorial Chapel Choir the following year. A graduate of the MacPhail School of Music in Minneapolis, he received his Bachelor of Music degree from the University of Michigan and in the Summer of 1932 completed work for his master of music degree at New York University.

Serge Koussevitzky Given $6,462 And Citation At Brown

Providence, R. I., March 2. (UP) — Serge Koussevitzky, retiring conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was presented with a gift of $6.462 and a citation from Brown University during his final concert in Providence Tuesday night.

Koussevitzky, retiring this year after directing the famed Boston Symphony for 25 years, was lauded in the citation for his skills, "aesthetic integrity and . . . devotion to the public interest."

The citation was read by President Henry M. Wriston of Brown University. Presentation of the purse, representing gifts from 258 Rhode Island contributors to the Koussevitzky Anniversary Fund, was made by former assistant secretary of navy for air, John Nicholas Brown.

[216]

AMERICAN

NEW YORK, N. Y.
JOURNAL AMERICAN
JAN 30 1949

MUSIC

By Miles Kastendieck

ALL-AMERICAN programs are hardly [illegible]. It takes a Koussevitzky to make them so. His recent American Music Festival in Carnegie Hall [illegible] Boston) had its novel aspect. Nothing like it had occurred in our major concert halls in the last ten years. On that last occasion it was another Koussevitzky festival.

Having such a survey once in a decade hardly enables the concert-going public to evaluate native music very well. Of course there is the annual contemporary American Music Festival at Columbia University each Spring, but that is something of a specialized nature. Koussevitzky is apparently the only conductor who has been vitally concerned with the hearing of American music.

Decade Ago

WHEN he lined up his programs ten years ago, Foote, Harris, Piston and Thompson supplied the music for one program; Carpenter, Hanson, Hill and Schuman the other. Foote's Orchestral Suite was the only historical item; Carpenter's "Skyscrapers" the chief entry from the "twenties." Hanson and Harris' Third Symphonies were the major works presented

When he lined up this year's festival, Barber, Cowell, Foss, Piston and Schuman were represented on the first program; Copland, Diamond, Fine, Hanson, Harris and Hill comprised the other. Schuman's "American Festival" Overture which had its premiere a decade ago opened this festival. Harris' Third Symphony was repeated. All the music embraced the ten year interim.

Healthy State

ON the whole the programs of ten years ago are more consistently solid and satisfying. The new works presented this year appeared less substantial. All the music, however, indicated that the state of American music is quite healthy.

Since Koussevitzky assumes so much responsibility in the promotion of native music, what a boon it would be if he planned one weekend of the Berkshire Festival to honor the American composer. In three concerts he could present a formidable array of outstanding works. He might even go further and plan an extra concert at which works receiving the award of the Music Critics Circle of New York could be played. Since the greater part of all this music is in the Boston Symphony repertory, the undertaking should not be too demanding. This might be one of the noblest parting gestures that he could make.

One wonders who will carry on his work. We should certainly be more concerned about having American orchestral music on Philharmonic - Symphony programs. In the music center of the world native music should not be neglected as it is. The old saying that nothing ventured, nothing gained makes a hollow echo when orchestral conductors repeatedly shun rehearings of works definitely recognized as worthwhile.

NEW HAVEN, CONN.
REGISTER
JAN 30 1949

Serge Koussevitsky

Most of us realize the greatness of Serge Koussevitsky as a conductor, but most of us need to be reminded that he was originally a virtuoso on the double bass; in fact, one of the greatest who ever lived. The instrument itself is not generally recognized as one suitable for solo performance because of the great artistry demanded. There may be some virtuosos on the double bass at the present time but anyhow recitals on the instrument are a rarity in this country.

Mr. Koussevitsky regretfully laid aside his bass in 1929 because of his arduous duties as conductor of the Boston Orchestra. This was shortly after he had given two recitals one in Symphony Hall, Boston and the other in Carnegie Hall, New York. Happily, the eminent conductor made a few recordings shortly before he gave up his playing and an album of these is shortly to be released.

The collection consists of the Andante from Koussevitsky's own Double Bass Concerto, his Chanson Triste and Valse Miniature, a Largo by Eccles, and a Lullaby by Laska. A few copies of the Eccles number and the Chanson Triste were circulated 20 years ago, but the other recordings are to be released for the first time. Since the early days of electrical recording improvements in low frequency range through recording, fidelity by the use of Vinylite, and mechanical performance are such that Dr. Koussevitsky has been able to give his unqualified approval to the new pressings. They will make possible a wide acquaintance with the beauties of an instrument otherwise virtually unknown in its solo possibilities, as played by an unexampled virtuoso of the double bass. The albums will be sold as souvenirs of the 25th Anniversary season of Serge Koussevitsky as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The proceeds will benefit the Koussevitsky 25th Anniversary Fund of the Orchestra.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
JAN 30 1949

ELEAZAR de CARVALHO: He's the only conductor of a symphony orchestra who sports that kind of a tie.

Farm to Podium Is Story Of Young Brazilian's Rise

By G. Y. LOVERIDGE

LAST summer at the Berkshire Music Center, I happened to be in the audience when a relatively unknown young man, Eleazar de Carvalho, conducted the student orchestera in "Death and Transfiguration." De Carvalho, a powerful figure in a dark blue suit, fastened his feet to the podium as though he were facing a gale, moved very little thereafter except to deliver short jabs and hooks at the orchestra, and conducted without a score.

Strauss has been conducted with more polish, and he has been played by musicians more experienced, but it is unlikely that he has been communicated to an audience with more voltage. Plainly the young man was an extraordinary specimen.

Guest Conductor

Tuesday night he will show his wares in Providence, as guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Metropolitan Theater. His program will include the first performance in this country of a violin fantasia by a fellow Brazilian, Villa-Lobos, and the "Russian Easter Overture," by Rimsky-Korsakov, the work with which de Carvalho first brought himself to the attention of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, music director of the orchestra and of the Music Center.

De Carvalho has had a singular career, according to sources in which I have full confidence. He was born in 1915 on a farm in the interior of northeastern Brazil, son of an Indian mother and a father of Dutch descent, both Presbyterians.

Eleazer was 10 before he saw his first piano and marching band. At once he wanted to be a musician, but his father couldn't see it. Eleazer was sent to school, where he was a handful for the faculty; presently he appeared in a school for apprentice seamen. He was 11 now, and he took over the tuba concession in the school band. Still playing the tuba, he enlisted in the Brazilian Navy at 13.

Attended Night Classes

Navy life contained more deck-swabbing and less music than he fancied, so he began attending night classes in general subjects and music at Rio Branco, paying his own way. At 19 he graduated from both schools. Continuing his music studies, he obtained a discharge from the Navy in 1936, when he was 21, and played the tuba and double-bass in orchestras, circus bands and cabaret ensembles. Finally he got a steady job in the Municipal Theater of Rio de Janeiro.

Now he had opportunity to see how noted conductors operated. Since a tuba player has relatively little to do in many scores, and since he was too poor to buy much music for study, de Carvalho spent the periods between grunts memorizing the music as it was played. He even began to write music in these intervals, having arranged with friendly musicians on either side to cue him in with a kick in the shins or some other useful gesture when it was his turn to join the tumult. In this way he memorized the entire scores, note for note, of many symphonies and operas.

First Opera in 1939

His own first opera, "The Discovery of Brazil," was performed in 1939. He conducted. His second opera, "Tiradentes," won a $4000 government award. He went on conducting and composing with immense energy, becoming more and more famous in his native land.

Then in 1946 he came to the United States and visited the Berkshire Music Center. Nobody [illegible] was, the enrollment for the season was filled, and there was no chance for de Carvalho. But he had not been in the Brazilian Navy and played the tuba and the double bass for nothing. He went to Dr. Koussevitzky, himself an eminent performer on what has now become known as the dog house, and said, "Let me conduct the student orchestra for exactly five minutes. If you do not find anything in my abilities in that time, Doctor, I will return at once to Rio."

"What will you conduct?" Dr. Koussevitzky asked.

"Anything."

The "Russian Easter Overture" was handed to him. He handed it back. "I shall not need this," he said. It was one of the dozens of works he knew by heart.

He conducted for five minutes, then looked at Koussevitzky. The famous conductor motioned for him to continue.

At the end, Koussevitzky said, "Do not go back to Rio."

Can't Play Piano

De Carvalho cannot play the piano, so he studies new scores by sol-faing the music for each instrument to himself, and committing every note to memory. An acquaintance reports coming upon him recently in a deserted park in Boston during a light snowstorm. De Carvalho is uncommonly sensitive to cold, and he was wearing some sort of fur cap and had a fur collar turned up around his neck. In his left hand, as he walked about, he held a score, which he referred to from time to time, and with his right, he was conducting himself as he sang parts of the score.

(For further information, attend Tuesday's concert.)

[247]

WILMINGTON, DEL.
STAR

Double Bass Solos By Koussevitzky

[illegible]

NEW YORK, N. Y.
JOURNAL AMERICAN
JAN 30 1949

MUSIC

By Miles Kastendieck

ALL-AMERICAN programs are hardly [illegible]. It takes a Koussevitzky to make them so. His recent American Music Festival in Carnegie Hall ([illegible] Boston) had its novel aspect. Nothing like it had occurred in our major concert halls in the last ten years. On that last occasion it was another Koussevitzky festival.

Having such a survey once in a decade hardly enables the concert-going public to evaluate native music very well. Of course there is the annual contemporary American Music Festival at Columbia University each Spring, but that is something of a specialized nature. Koussevitzky is apparently the only conductor who has been vitally concerned with the hearing of American music.

Decade Ago

WHEN he lined up his programs ten years ago, Foote, Harris, Piston and Thompson supplied the music for one program; Carpenter, Hanson, Hill and Schuman the other. Foote's Orchestral Suite was the only historical item; Carpenter's "Skyscrapers" the chief entry from the "twenties." Hanson and Harris' Third Symphonies were the major works presented

When he lined up this year's festival, Barber, Cowell, Foss, Piston and Schuman were represented on the first program; Copland, Diamond, Fine, Hanson, Harris and Hill comprised the other. Schuman's "American Festival" Overture which had its premiere a decade ago opened this festival. Harris' Third Symphony was repeated. All the music embraced the ten year interim.

Healthy State

ON the whole the programs of ten years ago are more consistently solid and satisfying. The new works presented this year appeared less substantial. All the music, however, indicated that the state of American music is quite healthy.

Since Koussevitzky assumes so much responsibility in the promotion of native music, what a boon it would be if he planned one weekend of the Berkshire Festival to honor the American composer. In three concerts he could present a formidable array of outstanding works. He might even go further and plan an extra concert at which works receiving the award of the Music Critics Circle of New York could be played. Since the greater part of all this music is in the Boston Symphony repertory, the undertaking should not be too demanding. This might be one of the noblest parting gestures that he could make.

One wonders who will carry on his work. We should certainly be more concerned about having American orchestral music on Philharmonic-Symphony programs. In the music center of the world native music should not be neglected as it is. The old saying that nothing ventured, nothing gained makes a hollow echo when orchestral conductors repeatedly shun rehearings of works definitely recognized as worthwhile.

NEW HAVEN, CONN.
REGISTER
JAN 30 1949

Serge Koussevitzky

Most of us realize the greatness of Serge Koussevitzky as a conductor, but most of us need to be reminded that he was originally a virtuoso on the double bass; in fact, one of the greatest who ever lived. The instrument itself is not generally recognized as one suitable for solo performance because of the great artistry demanded. There may be some virtuosos on the double bass at the present time but anyhow recitals on the instrument are a rarity in this country.

Mr. Koussevitzky regretfully laid aside his bass in 1929 because of his arduous duties as conductor of the Boston Orchestra. This was shortly after he had given two recitals one in Symphony Hall, Boston and the other in Carnegie Hall, New York. Happily, the eminent conductor made a few recordings shortly before he gave up his playing and an album of these is shortly to be released.

The collection consists of the Andante from Koussevitzky's own Double Bass Concerto, his Chanson Triste and Valse Miniature, a Largo by Eccles, and a Lullaby by Laska. A few copies of the Eccles number and the Chanson Triste were circulated 20 years ago, but the other recordings are to be released for the first time. Since the early days of electrical recording improvements in low frequency range through recording, fidelity by the use of Vinylite, and mechanical performance are such that Dr. Koussevitzky has been able to give his unqualified approval to the new pressings. They will make possible a wide acquaintance with the beauties of an instrument otherwise virtually unknown in its solo possibilities, as played by an unexampled virtuoso of the double bass. The albums will be sold as souvenirs of the 25th Anniversary season of Serge Koussevitsky as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The proceeds will benefit the Koussevitsky 25th Anniversary Fund of the Orchestra.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
JAN 30 1949

ELEAZAR de CARVALHO: He's the only conductor of a symphony orchestra who sports that kind of a tie.

Farm to Podium Is Story Of Young Brazilian's Rise

By G. Y. LOVERIDGE

LAST summer at the Berkshire Music Center, I happened to be in the audience when a relatively unknown young man, Eleazar de Carvalho, conducted the student orchestera in "Death and Transfiguration." De Carvalho, a powerful figure in a dark blue suit, fastened his feet to the podium as though he were facing a gale, moved very little thereafter except to deliver short jabs and hooks at the orchestra, and conducted without a score.

Strauss has been conducted with more polish, and he has been played by musicians more experienced, but it is unlikely that he has been communicated to an audience with more voltage. Plainly the young man was an extraordinary specimen.

Guest Conductor

Tuesday night he will show his wares in Providence, as guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Metropolitan Theater. His program will include the first performance in this country of a violin fantasia by a fellow Brazilian, Villa-Lobos, and the "Russian Easter Overture," by Rimsky-Korsakov, the work with which de Carvalho first brought himself to the attention of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, music director of the orchestra and of the Music Center.

De Carvalho has had a singular career, according to sources in which I have full confidence. He was born in 1915 on a farm in the interior of northeastern Brazil, son of an Indian mother and a father of Dutch descent, both Presbyterians.

Eleazer was 10 before he saw his first piano and marching band. At once he wanted to be a musician, but his father couldn't see it. Eleazer was sent to school, where he was a handful for the faculty; presently he appeared in a school for apprentice seamen. He was 11 now, and he took over the tuba concession in the school band. Still playing the tuba, he enlisted in the Brazilian Navy at 13.

Attended Night Classes

Navy life contained more deck-swabbing and less music than he fancied, so he began attending night classes in general subjects and music at Rio Branco, paying his own way. At 19 he graduated from both schools. Continuing his music studies, he obtained a discharge from the Navy in 1936, when he was 21, and played the tuba and double-bass in orchestras, circus bands and cabaret ensembles. Finally he got a steady job in the Municipal Theater of Rio de Janeiro.

Now he had opportunity to see how noted conductors operated. Since a tuba player has relatively little to do in many scores, and since he was too poor to buy much music for study, de Carvalho spent the periods between grunts memorizing the music as it was played. He even began to write music in these intervals, having arranged with friendly musicians on either side to cue him in with a kick in the shins or some other useful gesture when it was his turn to join the tumult. In this way he memorized the entire scores, note for note, of many symphonies and operas.

First Opera in 1939

His own first opera, "The Discovery of Brazil," was performed in 1939. He conducted. His second opera, "Tiradentes," won a $4000 government award. He went on conducting and composing with immense energy, becoming more and more famous in his native land.

Then in 1946 he came to the United States and visited the Berkshire Music Center. Nobody [redacted] was, the enrollment for the season was filled, and there was no chance for de Carvalho. But he had not been in the Brazilian Navy and played the tuba and the double bass for nothing. He went to Dr. Koussevitzky, himself an eminent performer on what has now become known as the dog house, and said, "Let me conduct the student orchestra for exactly five minutes. If you do not find anything in my abilities in that time, Doctor, I will return at once to Rio."

"What will you conduct?" Dr. Koussevitzky asked.

"Anything."

The "Russian Easter Overture" was handed to him. He handed it back. "I shall not need this," he said. It was one of the dozens of works he knew by heart.

He conducted for five minutes, then looked at Koussevitzky. The famous conductor motioned for him to continue.

At the end, Koussevitzky said, "Do not go back to Rio."

Can't Play Piano

De Carvalho cannot play the piano, so he studies new scores by sol-faing the music for each instrument to himself, and committing every note to memory. An acquaintance reports coming upon him recently in a deserted park in Boston during a light snowstorm. De Carvalho is uncommonly sensitive to cold, and he was wearing some sort of fur cap and had a fur collar turned up around his neck. In his left hand, as he walked about, he held a score, which he referred to from time to time, and with his right, he was conducting himself as he sang parts of the score.

(For further information, attend Tuesday's concert.)

WILMINGTON, DEL.
STAR

Double Bass Solos By Koussevitzky

An album of double bass recordings by Serge Koussevitzky is about to be issued. [illegible] Dr. Koussevitzky [illegible] time the instrument [illegible] first [illegible]. The collection consists of the Andante [illegible] Koussevitzky's own Double Bass Concerto, his Chanson [illegible] and Valse Miniature, a Largo [illegible] Eccles, and a Lullaby [illegible] Laska. A few copies of the Eccles [illegible] and the Chanson Triste [illegible] twenty years ago, [illegible] recordings are [illegible] the first time.

The album [illegible] souvenirs of the [illegible] anniversary season of Serge Koussevitzky as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra [illegible] proceeds will benefit the Koussevitzky twenty-fifth anniversary fund for the orchestra.

At the age of 17, Koussevitzky left the small town in Russia where he was born and presented himself at the school of the Moscow Philharmonic Society. [illegible] his own insistence [illegible] money he was admitted as a student of the double bass [illegible] school orchestra [illegible] that section. [illegible] mastery of the [illegible] Soon he was able [illegible] by playing in [illegible] six years he was [illegible] ing attention [illegible] double bass. He [illegible] manded a considerable [illegible] range of the violoncello [illegible] played with the ease [illegible] of a cellist, despite the [illegible] ness of the double bass [illegible] is grasp [illegible] the instrument gave [illegible] of its own [illegible] likewise [illegible] with equal [illegible] recital tours [illegible] played and [illegible] soloist with [illegible] of the audience [illegible] heard anything [illegible]

In the midst [illegible] as the Boston [illegible] (February [illegible] as honorary [illegible] University and [illegible] the double [illegible] Hall October [illegible] in Carnegie H[illegible] [illegible] the best living [illegible] double bass [illegible] the instrument [illegible] realm of [illegible]

After 1929, [illegible] duous duties as [illegible] Boston Orchestra [illegible] regretfully to [illegible] which to be play[illegible] satisfaction exacted [illegible] constant practice [illegible] as master artist [illegible] became from [illegible]

[247]

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE

JAN 30 1949

MUSIC ON THE RADIO

By B. H. HAGGIN

AMERICAN BROADCASTING COMPANY having dropped the Boston Symphony, National Broadcasting Company has been broadcasting Dress Rehearsal, a half-hour of an actual final rehearsal of the Boston Symphony in Symphony Hall (Mondays at 1 [illegible] WNBC, rebroadcast on WNBC Tuesdays at 11:30 p.m.). The [illegible] nature of a conductor's work with an orchestra would seem [illegible] to make it self-explanatory [illegible] not to a broadcasting company. And so to explain the self-explanatory there is Olin Downes. On other such occasions one could escape Mr. Downes's teachings by snapping off the radio for ten minutes; this time they are inescapable.

At the first broadcast, after the announcer's "We take you now to Symphony Hall" . . . one heard orchestra and conductor faintly in the background while Mr. Downes told of the moving associations the occasion had for him, of when he had sat in Symphony Hall as a boy, and so on at length before he yielded to the rehearsal. Later, Koussevitzky's demand for "a real declamation," which he illustrated with his own declamation of the phrase, led Mr. Downes to break in with "You have heard how Koussevitzky sings to the musicians. Great conductors all know this fundamental secret of music—that music originated with song. Instruments must sing like the human voice."

At one point in the next broadcast Mr. Downes blanketed the rehearsal proceedings with an explanation that the seemingly minute details Koussevitzky had been criticizing ("no balance . . . not in tune . . . not enough together" . . .) were extremely important for an orchestra like the Boston Symphony, and that conductor and orchestra were seeking perfection. And some later remarks by Koussevitzky led Mr. Downes to explain that "Dr. Koussevitzky is still not satisfied," and to go on with a statement by Paderewski that "great musicians are those who get the last 10 per cent," which he developed at length.

At a rehearsal of a Piston symphony Koussevitzky, after the scherzo, asked Piston about the tempo and Piston answered that it was perfect; also, Koussevitzky stopped in the Adagio to ask: "Have you something to say?" and Piston answered: "The celli and bassi are a little too loud." This led Mr. Downes to inform the radio audience that the composer was present and was being consulted by the conductor—the point of all this being, I suspect, its relation to Koussevitzky's notorious disregard for the composer's wishes in tempo and dynamics. And it led Mr. Downes also to blanket part of the Adagio with a lecture on the large orchestra that Piston used, the esthetic basis of his music, its relation to his interest in drawing, the eminent position he had achieved in American music.

After all of which one may, I think, remind Mr. Downes and N. B. C. that Dress Rehearsal was supposed to let the radio public listen to Koussevitzky work with his orchestra.

Boston Symphony Concert Hailed as Festive Occasion

Ovations for Dr. Koussevitzky Mark His Farewell Local Appearance in Varied Program; Ezio Pinza Southernaires Here; Pasquier Trio at Amherst

By VICTOR PRAHL

There was a festive air about the concert given by the Boston Symphony on Tuesday night. The music loving citizens of Springfield turned out en masse to honor Dr. Koussevitsky in his farewell appearance, filling the Auditorium to capacity. They rose to greet him upon his entrance and again at the end of the program when there was prolonged applause, cheers and bravos. This was all as it should have been, for aside from the nature of the occasion, it was a concert of great music, magnificently performed. Although a farewell appearance, as far as performance was concerned, it might have marked the debut of a newly discovered conductor of genius, so alert, vital, and high-spirited was the approach to the music.

Contrasting Works

A master program builder, Dr. Koussevitsky chose four compositions in vivid contrast. Always the persistent champion of the American composer, he offered David Diamond's "Rounds for String Orchestra," and still more dynamic in the greater scope of the modern idiom, Prokofieff's "Scythian Suite." He opened with Maximillian Steinberg's splendid orchestration of C. P. Emmanuel Bach's concerto in D major for strings, and closed with Beethoven's romantic "Seventh." Equally at home in these varying schools, it was an arresting program that held the interest of the large audience, arousing them to outbursts of enthusiasm.

The rich sonorities of the strings in this Stradivarius of orchestras, has never soared forth more opulently than in the slow movement of the Bach, nor have we ever heard a more beautifully scaled, fadeaway pianissimo than that with which this gorgeous "Lento" ended. The prolific David Diamond is a young composer of talent, and there were some good moments in his rounds, particularly in the third part, but often the voices sounded thick and did not come through clearly. With all due respect to the American composer, we cared least for this work, nor did its performance quite equal that of the other compositions.

Serge Prokofieff is a master of descriptive music whether it is for a film, ballet, something to entertain the children, or merely program music, as in the case of the "Scythian Suite" with its pagan monsters, moon maidens and evil Gods. Written 35 years ago when the composer was 24, this dynamic score is still fresh, and even though its loud dissonances may pall at times, it is convincing in forcefulness of primitive musical statement.

Beethoven "Seventh"

After such a heavy dose of the moderns, Beethoven's "Seventh" came as the gentle rain from heaven. This great work which Wagner called the "apotheosis of the dance" was expressive in every phrase. The famous "Allegretto," so simple of theme but so marvellously scored, was as beautiful as any performance within memory. And the mounting frenzy and bacchanalian abandon in the accelerating [illegible] of the finale, was an exciting climax to the most thrilling symphony concert heard in some time.

It was good seeing Dr. Koussevitsky who has given us so many fine performances of great music during the past 25 years, at the head of his own orchestra, on the stage of our Auditorium. And it was obvious that he was pleased with the warmth and enthusiasm of his reception. [illegible] Leslie and the management of the Springfield Symphony [illegible] congratulated for presenting the concert and seeing it through to success.

Art—Music—Theater

Symphony Concer

Ernest Ansermet as Guest Offers Novelty by Martin

By L. A. Sloper

Ernest Ansermet, as guest, directed the fourteenth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's season on Friday afternoon in Symphony Hall. His program included Beethoven's Fourth Symphony, Frank Martin's Petite Symphonie Concertante for Harpsichord, Harp, Piano and Two String Orchestras, Stravinsky's "Chant du Rossignol," and Debussy's "Ibéria."

The Swiss conductor commanded our attention and our respect from the start. He is obviously a technical master of the orchestra and a musician. His virtues are those of the Gallic race: restraint, clarity, rhythmic freedom, emotion under the control of intellect. Therefore you would expect him to be at his best in French music, and you would not be disappointed.

M. Ansermet offered a novelty in the Petite Symphonie Concertante of Frank Martin, a Swiss composer of distinction. It is a novelty also in its style, which is based on a sort of twelve-tone system seen through the eyes of a man brought up in the French cultural tradition, with a knowledge of classic linear texture.

⁂

It is therefore much more accessible to the listener than some of Schönberg's experiments. It has a clear outline and substantial structure. It is a work of scholarship and imagination, rather brooding in mood, dramatic in effect, suggesting the atmosphere of "Paolo and Francesca" or "The Love of the Three Kings"—but not in the sense of program or operatic music. On the contrary, it justifies its title as absolute music.

Yet its effect was partly lost because its intimate nature was in part obscured by performance in so large a hall. The harpsichord (Sylvia Marlowe) was inaudible in ensemble passages, or audible only as a vague sound like that of a broom sweeping linoleum outside the door. This surely was a serious loss: for when it was audible in concertino passages or with a pianissimo orchestra, it had something important to contribute.

⁂

It also seemed strange to write in parts for both harpsichord and piano. Of course, however discreet the pianist, they cannot be balanced properly. The harp, on the other hand, can hold its own with the piano. Lukas Foss was the pianist and Bernard Zighera the harpist.

M. Ansermet's Beethoven was a curious study of the French temperament in collision with the Teutonic. There are few conductors of French tradition who understand German music. M. Ansermet understands the letter but not the spirit. Everything about his Fourth Symphony was right, but the total effect was unsatisfactory. I suspect that French rhythm cannot be adapted to German music.

Stravinsky's symphonic poem (so described) has been played at these concerts but twice before. No doubt wisely, for the music cries out for dancers. It is less capable of standing alone than "Pétrouchka" or "Le Sacre." It serves only as further evidence that the composer is a man of the theater. This work, begun early in his career, sounds even now like a foreshadowing of the later ballets. It is odd, too, to be reminded that it seems to be the source of the decadent bourgeois trombone glissando that got Shostakovitch into trouble.

The Debussy of course was M. Ansermet's most valuable interpretation. The orchestral palette and the rhythms were beautifully used to bring out the poetic expressiveness of the score. The guest was applauded warmly and even cheered for his Beethoven and his Martin, too. He had a big success throughout the concert.

Music to Suit Every Palate Heard by Boston Audiences

Old and New Works in First Hearings

FIRST RCA-VICTOR SHOW FROM SYMPHONY HALL. Arthur Fiedler, conductor; Robert Merrill, baritone, soloist; and Boston Pops Orchestra. The program was broadcast over the NBC network on Dec. 12. (Fay Foto Service)

THE much-traveled Leonard Bernstein returned to the scene of his earliest successes to score a personal triumph at Symphony Hall when he was both guest conductor and piano soloist for the eighth pair of Boston Symphony Orchestra Friday-Saturday concerts. Those few in the audiences who knew that the remarkable results achieved came after but one rehearsal with the orchestra had cause to cheer.

Bernstein arrived the day before the program and an evening session was hurriedly called to rehearse the list of Schumann's Overture to Byron's Manfred; the Beethoven Piano Concerto No. 1, with the conductor leading from the soloist's bench; Afternoon of a Faun, by Debussy; and the Stravinsky Fire-Bird Suite. Nor was this all completely familiar music to the players: the Schumann had not been played on this series since 1931, and the concerto, unbelievable as it may seem, was receiving its first Boston Symphony performance before Friday-Saturday audiences. (Still stranger, Beethoven's Second Piano Concerto has never been performed by the orchestra in Boston.)

Brilliant in Double Role

There was little to choose between Bernstein the conductor and Bernstein the pianist: in both roles he was brilliant. Short of heaping praise upon praise, there is not much more that one can say. He is gaining in depth as he matures, and his talent is solidifying into a more concrete and universal pattern.

Only one more person, we feel, needs to be absolutely certain of Mr. Bernstein's abilities and that person is Mr. Bernstein himself.

Koussevitzky Returns

The following week Serge Koussevitzky returned to the podium for the ninth program, with C. P. E. Bach's String Concerto in D, as arranged for orchestra by Maximilian Steinberg; the Sibelius Seventh; and four Wagner excerpts Prelude and Love-death from Tristan, Siegfried's Death Music from Götterdämmerung, Introduction to Act III and Prelude to Meistersinger.

Most of this music has been made thoroughly familiar to symphony patrons by the conductor, and the audience accepted the magnificent offerings with a sort of gracious aplomb, with the exception, of course, of the Meistersinger Prelude, which, coming after the three preceding rather somber items, brought down the house.

Foss Directs Own Work

Another Koussevitzky protege made a splash in the Hub during the fortnight when pianist-composer-conductor Lukas Foss directed his cantata, The Prairie, before a large and enthusiastic Jordan Hall audience. This setting of Carl Sandburg's poem, it will be remembered, won a special citation from the New York Critic's Circle as best dramatic work of the year when it was first performed in 1944. For its initial Boston hearing, The Prairie enlisted an orchestra assembled from the symphony with Richard Burgin as concertmaster, Phyliss Curtin, soprano, Eunice Alberts, contralto, Donald Sullivan, tenor, Matthew Lockhart, bass, and the Boston University Choral Art Society, Dr. H. Augustine Smith, director.

The work held interest throughout its entirety and it thoroughly deserves the ten-minute ovation that repeatedly called the composer back to the platform at the end. It has force, charm, beauty and energy, it is completely cohesive and logical. The vocal writing is excellent and the orchestra supplies an exquisitely sensitive commentary from start to finish. All in all, this is an amazingly mature work for a man barely turned twenty as Foss was when he wrote it.

The chief virtue of the performance itself was the air of enthusiasm that prevailed. Mr. Foss is a fine conductor, the players responded devotedly, the soloists had absorbed the spirit of the work, and the chorus was outstanding for quality, flexibility and ensemble.

The concert opened with Bach's Concerto in D minor, Mr. Foss as soloist directing from the piano. This, too, drew admiring comment and sincere applause.

Trieste Trio Bows

The same hall housed the Boston debut of that admirable ensemble, The Trieste Trio, presented by the Richmond management before a small but deeply impressed audience. Brahms, Beethoven and Schubert each were fused into such an ensemble as to make one doubt if better performances of the listed works have ever been achieved. Individual playing matched the ensemble.

New Works Impress

Luise Vosgerchian, pianist, gave two first performances in her interesting Jordan Hall list. A sonata by Paul Des Marais had too much pointless strumming and unwarranted length to justify unqualified approval in spite of some poetic sentiment. Music for Piano, which includes an interesting set of variations among its four items, finds Irving Fine writing in an intimate and friendly style to bring about very pleasing results. The little pieces are unpretentious, but most charming. The recitalist played the new music with evident understanding and liking. With the exception of a Beethoven Sonata done in too prettified style, Miss Vosgerchian matched fine artistry with a completely reliable technique and the large audience gave full rein to its appreciation.

Radcliffe Benefit Series

A series of three concerts to benefit the Radcliffe 70th Anniversary Fund saw the first two Sanders Theatre (Cambridge) programs devoted almost entirely to ancient music. Violinist Robert Brink was outstanding in a Rosenmuller sonata with Daniel Pinkham at the harpsichord. Choral offerings in the second list brought to the fore a first-class choral conductor, Lorna Cooke DeVaron, whose singers, made up of Radcliffians and Harvardians, maintained a high level of precision and quality. The final program presented the Juilliard String Quartet in characteristically precise and brilliant playing. Mozart, Bartok Fifth and Beethoven Third Ramousovsky caused the good-sized audience to register its approval emphatically. The only fault one might find with the Juilliards is that they are occasionally too speed-minded.

NEW ENGLAND NOTES

Patrice Munsel gave her capacity Boston Morning Musicales audience some beautiful singing in the season's second program for the Boston School of Occupational Therapy at the Hotel Statler. The varied list received artistic support from Stuart Ross at the piano and from Betty Wood, flutist. Although singers proverbially are not at their best before lunch, each year finds the series heavily studded with singers, this year being no exception. As in Miss Munsel's case, the artists usually overcome the handicap.

Peripatetic Orchestra

The Rhode Island Philharmonic Orchestra, Francis Madeira, conductor, just about covers all of Little Rhody in each of its tour of concerts. The same program is given in quick succession in Providence, Pawtucket, Woonsocket, Newport and Westerly. The virtue of such a plan, which provides a full week's work to the musicians for each concert, is obvious. While the orchestra is of chamber proportions in size, at least it is completely professional, and sponsors of the group plan to increase personnel as circumstances allow. The opening tour this year listed Lully, Beethoven, Bizet and Mendelssohn together with a piece, by Mary Howe, Sand, which attempts to picture its rather gritty substance in all aspects. Surely this must be a musical "first." Michael Rabin, 12-year-old violinist, was soloist in the Mozart Concerto No. 3.

Rural Picture

The vogue for "folk" art is being reflected in the success scored by Mary MacNaught's Village Tale, pictures of New England rural life. Though the set is designedly simple and unpretentious, the composer herself is a skilled musician, having studied in Boston, at Wellesley College, under Roy Harris at Peterborough, N. H., and with Nadia Boulanger in Paris. It all started last March when Arthur Fiedler, after hearing the work in its first performance with the Hingham (Mass.) Civic Orchestra, placed it on his list for performance at Pops. Next came a performance at the Ozark Music Festival, William Hacker, conducting. Requests for score and parts have come in from Belgium and Copenhagen. Scheduled also is a London, England, BBC broadcast, with the South African pianist, Lionel Bowman, playing the solo piano sections. Back in Boston again, the dancer, Seniar Russakoff is using Village Tale for a folk dance ballet to be presented in the spring. Miss MacNaught says that she wrote the piece more for her own amusement than anything else and she is slightly bewildered at the success of her pictures of village life. She has also written The Log of the Sea Witch, Maine Coast Music, to be introduced soon in a two-piano version by Morse and Boyer.

Guild Competition

Each year the Musical Guild of Boston holds a competition among young artists two winners being presented in a Jordan Hall joint debut program. The winners for this season's concert were Olga Stone, pianist, and Dorothy Bales, violinist. The Guild does useful work in New England, the contest being only one of its many activities. It promotes the interest of musicians in various fields and maintains a free concert bureau.

Tribute to Walter Howe

It was a shock to hear of Walter Howe's death. He seemed to be in the best of health as he directed this season's fine Worcester Festival. We had nothing but praise for his work this year, and he was responsible for the best Festival in recent seasons. His passing leaves a gap that will not easily be filled.

Feature of the Music Lovers' Club of Boston Christmas concert was the effective work done by the Carolers, a group directed by the club's president, Marie A Bergeron. Two well-known young local artists, Arline Porceliam, soprano and Phyllis Moss, pianist, made up the

JULES WOLFFERS
PIANIST — TEACHER — LECTURER
Boston University College of Music

ALFRED ROSBASH
BARITONE
Music Center: Steinert Hall
162 Boylston Street Boston 16, Mass

ROY SOSSEN
MODERN PIANO STUDIOS
Experienced faculty — Classical foundation
400 Boylston St., Boston 16, Mass.

MARY MAC NAUGHT
COMPOSER
Music Center, Steinert Hall
162 Boylston Street, Boston, Mass

CLARA SHEAR, Mus. B.
TEACHER OF SINGERS
162 Boylston St., Boston 16, Mass
Formerly with Chicago Civic Opera Company

Maestro GIOVANNI POMPEO
Composer-Arranger
Symphonic, Operatic Conductor, Director, Studio of Musical Arts. Approved for G.I. Study.
246 Huntington Ave., Boston 15 KE. 6-4481

MARIE A. BERGERON
Teacher of Singing
INTERPRETATION — RECITAL PROGRAMS
122 Huntington Ave., Boston, Mass.

EMILIA IPPOLITO
VOICE — COACHING — REPERTOIRE — AUTHENTIC BEL CANTO METHOD
Teacher of Francesco Albanese, La Scala, Milan; Maria Carbone, Covent Garden, London, international radio
Lorraine DiGregorio, San Carlo, Naples; many others in concert, opera, radio, in Europe and the Americas 448 PARK DRIVE CI. 7-7768 BOSTON 15, MASS.

MADAME VINELLO JOHNSON
TEACHER OF SINGING — VOICE PRODUCTION — BEL CANTO
Pupils in leading roles in San Carlo Opera and in European and South American opera
Trinity Court Boston 16, Mass. KE. 6-6520

Ordinarily no one classes the Boston Symphony Orchestra as a Massachusetts industry. But year-end reports show that their radio broadcasts brought $200,000 to the state in 1948 and record royalties another $200,000. The road tour last year netted another $100,000, which shows a clear half million we wouldn't have otherwise.

Expenses, however, are high; last year's totaled $1,450,000, and the BSO had to depend on $60,000 from Friends of the Orchestra to break even. Obviously it's a nonprofit organization, yet a strange contradiction creeps in; the federal government still taxes their tickets 20 per cent just like a commercial show or movie. In 1948, this cost the BSO $160,000, and was a big reason for unbalancing their finances.

Before the war, the Boston Symphony was classed as nonprofit, and was not taxed. No one knows whether the wartime levy will be removed, and that's why the orchestra trustees are busy raising the $250,000 Koussevitzky Fund, a kind of cushion to absorb possible deficits if the Friends fail. Edward A. Taft is fund chairman, and already has secured $126,000, a lot of it from unmusical people who still believe the BSO is a big asset to the state and their business.

FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 4, 1949

7-Inch Discs Are Ready; A Koussevitzky Souvenir

THE RECORD week brought two developments of more than passing interest. Columbia announced that it's new seven-inch microgroove records now are on the market and Victor issued a special album of double bass recordings by Serge Koussevitzky as a souvenir of his 25th anniversary as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

First classical releases on the small 33 rpm discs, which play as long as conventional 10 and 12-inch records, are Shostakovich's "Age of Gold Polka." Rimsky Korsakoff's "Flight of the Bumble Bee" and Glinka's "Life of the Czar" mazurka all on one record, as played by the New York Philharmonic under Kurtz, and the recitative and aria from the second act of Weber's "Der Freischutz," sung by soprano Ljuba Welitsch with the Philharmonic orchestra under Walter Susskind.

COLUMBIA promises that hereafter it will make all its weekly masterworks, popular and American folk music single releases available simultaneously on both 7-inch microgroove discs and on conventional 10 and 12-inch shellac records. They have the same reproduction qualities as the larger, longer playing microgrooves with which most record collectors, at least those who follow the reviews, are now familiar.

The Koussevitzky album is a connoisseur's item. In the first place, it is probably the only double bass recording now available—and by an old master, at that. In the second, the edition has been limited to 1,000 copies, although its sponsor, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, hopes that a reprint may be necessary. All returns from the album will go to the Serge Koussevitzky Anniversary Fund. The records are vinylite, three of them.

Music to Suit Every Palate Heard by Boston Audiences

Old and New Works in First Hearings

THE much-traveled Leonard Bernstein returned to the scene of his earliest successes to score a personal triumph at Symphony Hall when he was both guest conductor and piano soloist for the eighth pair of Boston Symphony Orchestra Friday-Saturday concerts. Those few in the audiences who knew that the remarkable results achieved came after but one rehearsal with the orchestra had cause to cheer.

Bernstein arrived the day before the program and an evening session was hurriedly called to rehearse the list of Schumann's Overture to Byron's Manfred; the Beethoven Piano Concerto No. 1, with the conductor leading from the soloist's bench; Afternoon of a Faun, by Debussy; and the Stravinsky Fire-Bird Suite. Nor was this all completely familiar music to the players: the Schumann had not been played on this series since 1931, and the concerto, unbelievable as it may seem, was receiving its first Boston Symphony performance before Friday-Saturday audiences. (Still stranger, Beethoven's Second Piano Concerto has never been performed by the orchestra in Boston.)

Brilliant in Double Role

There was little to choose between Bernstein the conductor and Bernstein the pianist: in both roles he was brilliant. Short of heaping praise upon praise, there is not much more that one can say. He is gaining in depth as he matures, and his talent is solidifying into a more concrete and universal pattern.

Only one more person, we feel, needs to be absolutely certain of Mr. Bernstein's abilities and that person is Mr. Bernstein himself.

Koussevitzky Returns

The following week Serge Koussevitzky returned to the podium for the ninth program, with C. P. E. Bach's String Concerto in D, as arranged for orchestra by Maximilian Steinberg; the Sibelius Seventh; and four Wagner excerpts—Prelude and Love-death from Tristan, Siegfried's Death Music from Götterdämmerung, Introduction to Act III and Prelude to Meistersinger.

Most of this music has been made thoroughly familiar to symphony patrons by the conductor, and the audience accepted the magnificent offerings with a sort of gracious aplomb, with the exception, of course, of the Meistersinger Prelude, which, coming after the three preceding rather somber items, brought down the house.

Foss Directs Own Work

Another Koussevitzky protege made a splash in the Hub during the fortnight when pianist-composer-conductor Lukas Foss directed his cantata, The Prairie, before a large and enthusiastic Jordan Hall audience. This setting of Carl Sandburg's poem, it will be remembered, won a special citation from the New York Critic's Circle as best dramatic work of the year when it was first performed in 1944. For its initial Boston hearing, The Prairie enlisted an orchestra assembled from the symphony with Richard Burgin as concertmaster, Phyliss Curtin, soprano, Eunice Alberts, contralto, Donald Sullivan, tenor, Matthew Lockhart, bass, and the Boston University Choral Art Society, Dr. H. Augustine Smith, director.

The work held interest throughout its entirety and it thoroughly deserves the ten-minute ovation that repeatedly called the composer back to the platform at the end. It has force, charm, beauty and energy, it is completely cohesive and logical. The vocal writing is excellent and the orchestra supplies an exquisitely sensitive commentary from start to finish. All in all, this is an amazingly mature work for a man barely turned twenty as Foss was when he wrote it.

The chief virtue of the performance itself was the air of enthusiasm that prevailed. Mr. Foss is a fine conductor, the players responded devotedly, the soloists had absorbed the spirit of the work, and the chorus was outstanding for quality, flexibility and ensemble.

The concert opened with Bach's Concerto in D minor, Mr. Foss as soloist directing from the piano. This, too, drew admiring comment and sincere applause.

Trieste Trio Bows

The same hall housed the Boston debut of that admirable ensemble, The Trieste Trio, presented by the Richmond management before a small but deeply impressed audience. Brahms, Beethoven and Schubert each were fused into such an ensemble as to make one doubt if better performances of the listed works have ever been achieved. Individual playing matched the ensemble.

FIRST RCA-VICTOR SHOW FROM SYMPHONY HALL.
Arthur Fiedler, conductor; Robert Merrill, baritone, soloist; and Boston Pops Orchestra. The program was broadcast over the NBC network on Dec. 12. (Fay Foto Service)

New Works Impress

Luise Vosgerchian, pianist, gave two first performances in her interesting Jordan Hall list. A sonata by Paul Des Marais had too much pointless strumming and unwarranted length to justify unqualified approval in spite of some poetic sentiment. Music for Piano, which includes an interesting set of variations among its four items, finds Irving Fine writing in an intimate and friendly style to bring about very pleasing results. The little pieces are unpretentious, but most charming. The recitalist played the new music with evident understanding and liking. With the exception of a Beethoven Sonata done in too prettified style, Miss Vosgerchian matched fine artistry with a completely reliable technique and the large audience gave full rein to its appreciation.

Radcliffe Benefit Series

A series of three concerts to benefit the Radcliffe 70th Anniversary Fund saw the first two Sanders Theatre (Cambridge) programs devoted almost entirely to ancient music. Violinist Robert Brink was outstanding in a Rosenmuller sonata with Daniel Pinkham at the harpsichord. Choral offerings in the second list brought to the fore a first-class choral conductor, Lorna Cooke DeVaron, whose singers, made up of Radcliffians and Harvardians, maintained a high level of precision and quality. The final program presented the Juilliard String Quartet in characteristically precise and brilliant playing. Mozart, Bartok Fifth and Beethoven Third Ramousovsky caused the good-sized audience to register its approval emphatically. The only fault one might find with the Juilliards is that they are occasionally too speed-minded.

NEW ENGLAND NOTES

Patrice Munsel gave her capacity Boston Morning Musicales audience some beautiful singing in the season's second program for the Boston School of Occupational Therapy at the Hotel Statler. The varied list received artistic support from Stuart Ross at the piano and from Betty Wood, flutist. Although singers proverbially are not at their best before lunch, each year finds the series heavily studded with singers, this year being no exception. As in Miss Munsel's case, the artists usually overcome the handicap.

Peripatetic Orchestra

The Rhode Island Philharmonic Orchestra, Francis Madeira, conductor, just about covers all of Little Rhody in each of its tour of concerts. The same program is given in quick succession in Providence, Pawtucket, Woonsocket, Newport and Westerly. The virtue of such a plan, which provides a full week's work to the musicians for each concert, is obvious. While the orchestra is of chamber proportions in size, at least it is completely professional, and sponsors of the group plan to increase personnel as circumstances allow. The opening tour this year listed Lully, Beethoven, Bizet and Mendelssohn together with a piece, by Mary Howe, Sand, which attempts to picture its rather gritty substance in all aspects. Surely this must be a musical "first." Michael Rabin, 12-year-old violinist, was soloist in the Mozart Concerto No. 3.

Rural Picture

The vogue for "folk" art is being reflected in the success scored by Mary MacNaught's Village Tale, pictures of New England rural life. Though the set is designedly simple and unpretentious, the composer herself is a skilled musician, having studied in Boston, at Wellesley College, under Roy Harris at Peterborough, N. H., and with Nadia Boulanger in Paris. It all started last March when Arthur Fiedler, after hearing the work in its first performance with the Hingham (Mass.) Civic Orchestra, placed it on his list for performance at Pops. Next came a performance at the Ozark Music Festival, William Hacker, conducting. Requests for score and parts have come in from Belgium and Copenhagen. Scheduled also, is a London, England, BBC broadcast, with the South African pianist, Lionel Bowman, playing the solo piano sections. Back in Boston again, the dancer, Seniar Russakoff is using Village Tale for a folk dance ballet to be presented in the spring. Miss MacNaught says that she wrote the piece more for her own amusement than anything else and she is slightly bewildered at the success of her pictures of village life. She has also written The Log of the Sea Witch, Maine Coast Music, to be introduced soon in a two-piano version by Morse and Boyer.

Guild Competition

Each year the Musical Guild of Boston holds a competition among young artists two winners being presented in a Jordan Hall joint debut program. The winners for this season's concert were Olga Stone, pianist, and Dorothy Bales, violinist. The Guild does useful work in New England, the contest being only one of its many activities. It promotes the interest of musicians in various fields and maintains a free concert bureau.

Tribute to Walter Howe

It was a shock to hear of Walter Howe's death. He seemed to be in the best of health as he directed this season's fine Worcester Festival. We had nothing but praise for his work this year, and he was responsible for the best Festival in recent seasons. His passing leaves a gap that will not easily be filled.

Feature of the Music Lovers' Club of Boston Christmas concert was the effective work done by the Carolers, a group directed by the club's president, Marie A. Bergeron. Two well-known young local artists, Arline Porceliam, soprano, and Phyllis Moss, pianist, made up the

JULES WOLFFERS
PIANIST — TEACHER — LECTURER
Boston University College of Music

ALFRED ROSBASH
BARITONE
Music Center: Steinert Hall
162 Boylston Street Boston 16, Mass.

ROY SOSSEN
MODERN PIANO STUDIOS
Experienced faculty — Classical foundation
400 Boylston St., Boston 16, Mass.

MARY MAC NAUGHT
COMPOSER
Music Center, Steinert Hall
162 Boylston Street, Boston, Mass.

CLARA SHEAR, Mus. B.
TEACHER OF SINGERS
102 Boylston St., Boston 16, Mass.
Formerly with Chicago Civic Opera Company

Maestro GIOVANNI POMPEO
Composer-Arranger
Symphonic, Operatic Conductor, Director, Studio of Musical Arts. Approved for G.I. Study.
246 Huntington Ave., Boston 15 KE. 6-4481

MARIE A. BERGERON
Teacher of Singing
INTERPRETATION — RECITAL PROGRAMS
122 Huntington Ave., Boston, Mass.

EMILIA IPPOLITO
VOICE — COACHING — REPERTOIRE — AUTHENTIC BEL CANTO METHOD
Teacher of Francesco Albanese, La Scala, Milan; Maria Carbone, Covent Garden, London, international radio. [illegible] DiGregorio, San Carlo, Naples; many others in concert, opera, radio, in Europe and the Americas
CI. 7-7768 BOSTON 15, MASS.

MADAME VINELLO JOHNSON
TEACHER OF SINGING — VOICE PRODUCTION — BEL CANTO
Pupils in leading roles in San Carlo Opera and in European and South American opera
Trinity Court — Boston 16, Mass. — KE. 6-6520

Ordinarily no one classes the Boston Symphony Orchestra as a Massachusetts industry. But year-end reports show that their radio broadcasts brought $200,000 to the state in 1948 and record royalties another $200,000. The road tour last year netted another $100,000, which shows a clear half million we wouldn't have otherwise.

Expenses, however, are high; last year's totaled $1,450,000, and the BSO had to depend on $60,000 from Friends of the Orchestra to break even. Obviously it's a nonprofit organization, yet a strange contradiction creeps in; the federal government still taxes their tickets 20 per cent just like a commercial show or movie. In 1948, this cost the BSO $160,000, and was a big reason for unbalancing their finances.

Before the war, the Boston Symphony was classed as nonprofit, and was not taxed. No one knows whether the wartime levy will be removed, and that's why the orchestra trustees are busy raising the $250,000 Koussevitzky Fund, a kind of cushion to absorb possible deficits if the Friends fail. Edward A. Taft is fund chairman, and already has secured $126,000, a lot of it from unmusical people who still believe the BSO is a big asset to the state and their business.

FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 4, 1949

7-Inch Discs Are Ready; A Koussevitzky Souvenir

THE RECORD week brought two developments of more than passing interest. Columbia announced that it's new seven-inch microgroove records now are on the market and Victor issued a special album of double bass recordings by Serge Koussevitzky as a souvenir of his 25th anniversary as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

First classical releases on the small 33 rpm discs, which play as long as conventional 10 and 12-inch records, are Shostakovich's "Age of Gold Polka," Rimsky Korsakoff's "Flight of the Bumble Bee" and Glinka's "Life of the Czar" mazurka all on one record, as played by the New York Philharmonic under Kurtz; and the recitative and aria from the second act of Weber's "Die Freischutz," sung by soprano Ljuba Welitsch with the Philharmonic orchestra under Walter Susskind.

COLUMBIA promises that hereafter it will make all its weekly masterworks, popular and American folk music single releases available simultaneously on both 7-inch microgroove discs and on conventional 10 and 12-inch shellac records. They have the same reproduction qualities as the larger, longer playing microgrooves with which most record collectors, at least those who follow the reviews, are now familiar.

The Koussevitzky album is a connoisseur's item. In the first place, it is probably the only double bass recording now available—and by an old master, at that. In the second, the edition has been limited to 1,000 copies, although its sponsor, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, hopes that a reprint may be necessary. All returns from the album will go to the Serge Koussevitzky Anniversary Fund. The records are vinylite, three of them.

[249]

balance of the program with John Kiley the accompanist.

Ghost in Symphony Hall?

Heard at Symphony Hall after Serge Koussevitzky brought James Houghton o the stage when the Boston University Chorus assisted in the Faust Symphony by Liszt: "Who's that tall man with Koussevitzky?"

"Why, don't you know? That's the composer, of course."

So it's L'Abbé Houghton these days on the campus.

A Premiere and a Prodigy

Centerpiece of the piano recital presented by Robert Bennet-Kaplan for the Salon of Allied Arts at Recital Hall was he first performance of his own Conertstück in the formidable key of A-flat minor. The work scored an immediate it with the audience as did the recitalst's way with the surrounding Bach, Beethoven, Brahms, Schumann, Debussy nd Turina.

Here is another for the Truth is tranger than Fiction department. Paul Cherkassky, conductor of the Boston Civic Symphony Orchestra, dropped in o see a local teacher on some matter without an appointment. Hearing a leson going on, he waited outside the door. He was so struck by the quality of what e heard that at the conclusion of the esson he engaged the student, without urther ado, to be soloist with the Civic. Lucky beneficiary of this adventitious ircumstance is 14-year-old Bernard Kritzman who has been playing the piano since he was four. Mr. Cherkassky ays that he engaged young Bernard not because of his age, but in spite of it. The onductor does not believe in public display of prodigies, but, he says, Bernard an hold his own with more mature colleagues purely on artistic and pianstic grounds. So in April, Bernard will ppear with the Civic in the Khatchaourian Piano Concerto.

In School and Studio

The Fenway Opera Workshop, Emilia ppolito, director, presented that inseparable pair, Cavalleria Rusticana and Pagliacci before a large audience in Colins Hall, Teachers College, Boston. The productions achieved professional polish and finish to bring credit to all participants. Artist-students from Mme. Ippoito's and other studios proved to be well-coached and well-trained. Outstandng were Pauline McIsaac, Santuzza; John Colonna, Turiddu, Roger J. Krohn, Alfio, Wilbur Bigelow, Canio, and Winifred Gundry, Nedda. Lorraine DiGregorio, newly arrived from Italy and a former pupil of Mme. Ippolito, assisted in the direction and coaching.

Education for Parents

The Zimbler String Sinfonietta, which upplies chamber music to high school tudents in the suburban Boston communities of Newton and Brookline, have been "educating" the parents also with evening programs in the school audioriums.

Three young singers from the studio of Clara Shear are coming to the fore: Gloria Strickland, coloratura soprano, was given the leading role in a New England Mutual Hall production of Iolanthe; in another Gilbert-Sullivan opus, Gondoliers, at Milton, Mass., Claire Murphy, lyric-coloratura, was also in the leading role; Ann Lifton, young blind soprano from the Perkins Institute, has sung before some very select audiences to excellent advantage.

Attracting much favorable reaction these days are the enterprising programs being supplied by the New England Conservatory Orchestra under Malcolm Holmes. Improvement in all the choirs is marked and the level of performance surpasses anything previously heard from school orchestras hereabouts.

Praise from Koussevitzky

No less a person than Serge Koussevitzky has publicly commended in the highest terms the progress of the Boston University College of Music. Recent activities of the college include a concert by the University Brass Choir, Robert D. King, conductor, framed around a fine exposition of Hindemith's Concert Music for piano, brass and harps (Marilyn Hudson, pianist), and ending with a stirring Divertimento by Samuel Adler who conducted this first performance. The University Orchestra, Edgar Curtis, conductor, played Mozart, Haydn, Vaughan Williams and Milhaud at Jordan Hall. The Milhaud Suite Provencale was effectively done and the bucolic finale was forced to an encore by the applause. On the faculty side, Wilma Thompson, associate of Wellington Smith, was heard in a program at Recital Hall. William Achilles was accompanist.

The new Boston Conservatory auditorium is scheduled for completion this spring. If acoustic promises are fulfilled this will be an ideal place for chamber music, debuts and the like. More on this later.

CRESCENDO CLUB LUNCHEON,
Music Box, Hotel Copley Square, Boston. Music notables discuss production of The Prairie by Lukas Foss at Jordan Hall. L. to r., Marie Bergeron, Mrs. Nelson W. Howard, Mrs. Leon Weltman, president of the Crescendo Club, Edward I. Adelman, Mr. Foss, Clara Shear, Mrs. Chester A. Merrifield. (Photo, Bernard Paul)

SYMPHONY HALL IN BOSTON showing the Civic Orchestra of that city, Paul Cherkassky, conductor, after a concert.

NEW ENGLAND SURVEY

(Continued from page 5)

sic in demand throughout the entire country. In most New England public schools, music is a neglected step-child, barely tolerated and certainly not encouraged. Proof of this may be found in the musical state of most high-school graduates here—a more musically illiterate group of persons it would be difficult to find in any civilized community. Here the answer lies jointly in the budget and in lack of musical enterprise. Some school committees pay such low salaries that only teachers who need experience will take these positions and then only to leave at first opportunity. Salaries in the larger centers, of course, are more adequate, but not on a par with what is being paid elsewhere.

General Concert Picture

Leaving education, we come to the general concert picture in the area. In Boston visiting artists get good houses if they are household words, so to speak. Usually one might say that the finer the music presented, the smaller the audiences. If the recitalist is a "name" artist, well and good; if not, few will take a chance. In cities outside the Hub the concert agencies present series of concerts through the regular booking channels but here too, little or no indigenous talent is given a real opportunity to express itself.

Worcester has its fine Festival in October, but is forced to rely on imports to make the event a success. There are other festivals throughout the six states but nothing that can compete with what is being done elsewhere.

In all the New England states, there is only one full-time professional orchestra, the Boston Symphony. Several orchestras are on a semi-professional basis including the Springfield Symphony under Alexander Leslie. As far as most of the civic orchestras are concerned the musical results are negligible, to say the least. Nevertheless, it is good to see such activity if only to keep the spark alive, and the writer never turns down an invitation to be present, feeling that such endeavors should be encouraged.

Much of the gloomy picture being painted here is, as we well know, not a condition peculiar to this region alone. But if New England can not do better, it is as well that others know conditions as they actually exist here. As matters stand at present, New England is a feeding ground for the rest of the country—most talented musicians leave here as soon as they are able.

Enthusiasm Needed

And to end this survey on a note of optimism, there are signs that conditions are changing for the better. We note recent lists of programs in Worcester and other cities where a nice balance is being attempted between native talent and visiting artists. Many young and enthusiastic musicians are working and propagandizing in the smaller cities, with at least some interest being shown.

We have everything here but spirit and enthusiasm. If these can be aroused, New England may well once again prove an example and inspiration to the rest of the country.

Bernard Paul photographer for the Courier 134 newbury st. publicity boston portraiture

MARY MAC NAUGHT
COMPOSER
of
"Village Tale" for Orchestra
Premiered by Fiedler
Boston Symphony-Pops
SCORE AND PARTS ON RENTAL
Music Center, Steinert Hall
162 Boylston St., Boston, Mass.

WADSWORTH PROVANDIE
Teacher of Singing
246 Huntington Ave., Boston, Mass. KE. 6-9495

ARLINGTON ACADEMY of MUSIC
"The School of the East for Intensive Professional Music Training"
Full and part time courses in theoretical subjects and all instruments
FACULTY OF MODERN MUSIC ARTISTS—Special correspondence course in Arranging *Approved for Veterans — Mid-year term starts January 31, 1949
General School and Offices: "Intown Studio"
386 MASS. AVE., ARLINGTON, MASS. 209 MASS. AVE., BOSTON, MASS.

HARRIOT EUDORA BARROWS
Teacher of Singing
113 West 57th Street, New York City
Miss Barrows teaches in Bosto
Soloists from the Studio of Miss Barro
Haydn Society an
GENEVA HOLMES JEFFERDS, soprano, St. C
ALICE ARMSTRONG KIMBALL, soprano, Mess
ELSIE LOVELL HANKINS, contralto, Messiah,
VERA KEANE, contralto, Verdi Requiem, Wa
JOHN HERRICK, baritone, Verdi Requiem (S JOHN METCALF, baritone, Messiah, two per

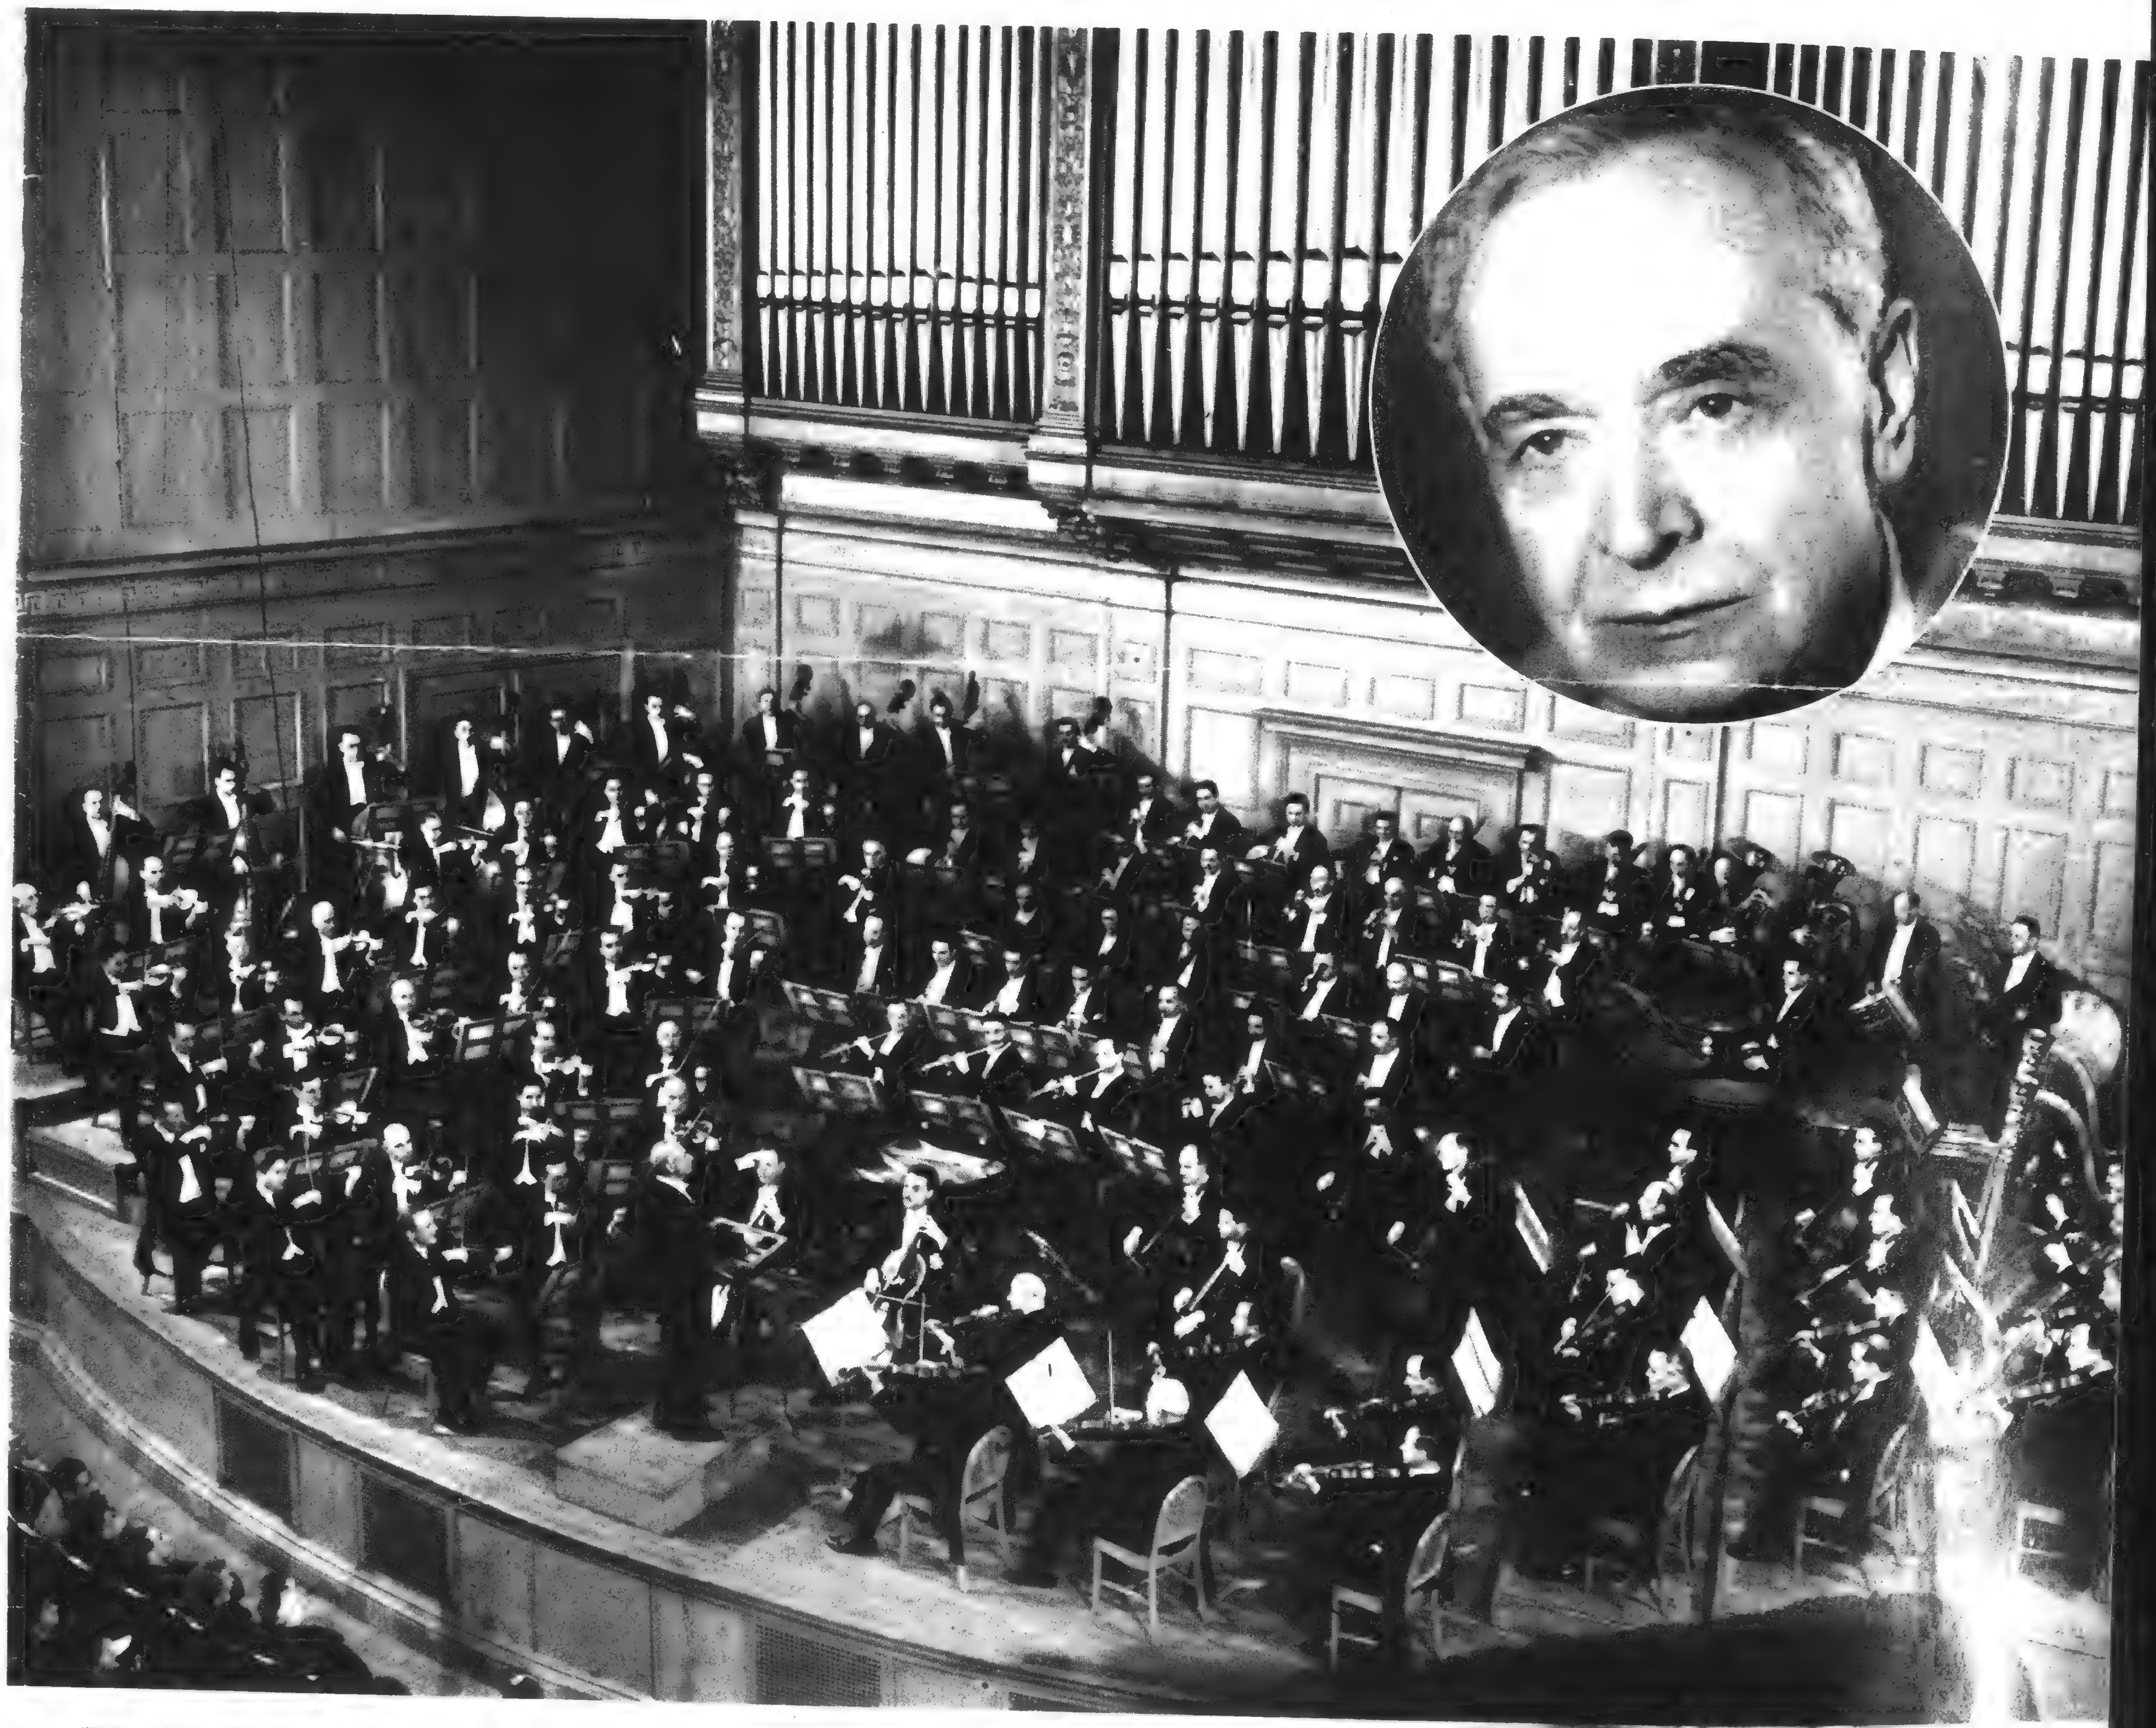
musical COURIER

NEW ENGLAND ISSUE

JANUARY 1,

25 cents



BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, Conductor

musical COURIER

NEW ENGLAND ISSUE

JANUARY 1, 1949
25 cents

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, Conductor

[251]

MUSIC IN REVIEW

Our Critic Considers Orchestra's Programs

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

At the outset of this, his last season as head of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky proposed to revive certain native works with which his name had been more or less closely associated, as well as to make additions to that impressive list. These pieces might have been strung along through the programs, but he saw fit to concentrate most of them in a two-program American Music Festival. In all, 10 works were thus disposed of, each from a different hand; and three actual premieres took place, two in the first pair of concerts and one in the second.

In order, these first performances were those of Howard Hanson's Piano Concerto, Lukas Foss' "Recordare" and Leo Sowerby's Fourth Symphony. Otherwise, and in the following succession, the Festival renewed our acquaintance with Henry Cowell's Hymn and Fuguing Tune for strings, William Schuman's American Festival Overture, Walter Piston's Third Symphony, Samuel Barber's Violin Concerto, the Third Symphony of Roy Harris, Edward Burlingame Hill's Music for English Horn and Orchestra and Aaron Copland's "A Lincoln Portrait."

Only Mr. Foss

If the thing was to be done at all, this assemblage of works from living composers (and, incidentally, of those represented, only Mr. Foss was European-born) was designed to provide the maximum amount of variety and, so far as possible, entertainment. There was a solo pianist (Rudolph Firkusny), a solo violinist (Ruth Posselt), a solo English-hornist (Louis Speyer) and a speaker (Wesley Addy). Moreover, two composers, Mr. Hanson and Mr. Foss, conducted their own works. On the basis of this festival it would be difficult to generalize regarding current musical trends in this country. Only the Messrs. Cowell, Schuman, Sowerby and Copland were self-consciously American, and the outcome was quite different in each case. Mr. Harris has an unmistakable style; the rest revealed themselves as electics, Mr. Hanson harking back to the romanticists and Mr. Hill to the impressionists.

The wisdom of Dr. Koussevitsky's course—and he presented two very similar programs in New York last week—may well be questioned. In calling attention so forcibly to the American composer and his generally significant accomplishment, he did that abstract gentleman a service. The individual piece, and hence the writer of it, was often at a disadvantage. Too much of the same thing makes it difficult for the listener, as does also the presence of too many works that are either new or unfamiliar. There is also the suggestion of coddling. Many years ago a certain conductor wishing to present in New York a program of American music, asked MacDowell for a contribution. That composer's reply has often been quoted. He said in effect that he was firmly opposed to American programs; he felt that the American composer should take his chances with the others, and that if he couldn't stand the comparison it was just too bad.

Not Too Well

By general consent, the first of Dr. Koussevitzky's programs did not come off too well. Mr. Hanson's Concerto proved to be an unsuccessful venture in a form he had not previously essayed, and Mr. Foss' piece seemed to have made no very distinct impression on anyone. That left only Mr. Cowell's pleasing but monotonous attempt to revive Colonial hymnody, the violently exuberant urban-Americanism of Mr. Schuman and Mr. Piston's thoughtful, well-written, high-minded but scarcely inspiring Symphony. It still saved the day.

To these ears Mr. Sowerby's Symphony in B (for boisterous, bustling and bumptious) was merely a skillful asembling of musical cliches. Nevertheless, his attempt to portray in tone the American Big City won him many friends. The Barber Concerto is a composition of genuine merit, combining ingratiating ideas with expert treatment of both the solo instrument and the orchestra. The Harris Symphony, a little uncouth, perhaps, may well outlive the other nine items. Whether or not your ear is attuned to it, the Oklahoma-born composer has a very personal idiom, not the commonest phenomenon in American music.

The Friday afternoon audience, which had heaped applause on the Sowerby and Barber pieces, received it with pointed indifference. After this forthrightness, Mr. Hill's measures fell agreeably on probably every ear. Once more, "A Lincoln Portrait" aroused great enthusiasm. The first two movements, in the homespun idiom that Mr. Copland has so successfully cultivated of late, are, of course, admirable. But the declaiming of Lincoln's majestic words over an insignificant orchestral background (that Dr. Koussevitzky sometimes let get out of hand), is a trick that traps the unwary and that rebounds undeservedly to the glory of Mr. Copland. Who couldn't make an effect with those words?

Testimonial for Dr. Koussevitzky Scheduled by Symphony Society

By CYRUS DURGIN

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will be given a testimonial dinner at Symphony Hall at the close of this, his 25th and final season. This was announced yesterday afternoon by Robert G. Dodge, chairman of the dinner committee, at the annual meeting of the Society of the Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall.

The dinner will take place Monday, May 2, at 7 in the evening, and will be by invitation. The members of the orchestra will attend as guests of the subscribers. The exercises will include music.

Edward A. Taft, chairman of the Serge Koussevitzky 25th Anniversary Fund, reported that, to date, 3188 gifts to the fund have brought a total of $142,296.16. The goal of the fund is $250,000. These gifts break down as follows: from the Boston area, $120,024.70 in 2413 gifts; from the New York area, $9,308.01 in 405 gifts; from the Providence area, $6462 in 258 gifts; from other parts of the country, $1613 in 112 gifts. This compares with last year's 2663 gifts which amounted to $59,087.57 received from the Society of Friends of the Orchestra. Mr. Taft reminded his listeners that while this year's donations are about two and one-half times greater than last year, the over-all goal is four times greater.

Wolcott Reelected Chairman

Oliver Wolcott, who was unanimously reelected chairman of the Society of Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, said:

"Although the income of the orchestra has risen $16,000 as compared with last year, expenses also have risen to the extent of $69,000 over last year.

"Royalties on the orchestra's recordings were about the same as last year. The ban did not hurt, since we were drawing on the backlog of recordings made the year before. With the lifting of the ban last month, we shall resume recording in April. Due to the late start of the two broadcast programs—the Pops Orchestra on Sunday afternoon and the Monday rehearsals of the full Boston Symphony—it is not possible to make exact comparison of radio revenues with those of last year. But the prospect is that the income will be about the same. A two-year contract with the personnel of the orchestra has been concluded which we think does them full justice."

1914 Higginson Letter Read

Henry B. Cabot, president of the orchestra's board of trustees, spoke briefly. He read a letter of 1914 from Maj Henry Lee Higginson, the Symphony's founder, to Miss Fanny Mason, in which Maj Higginson summarized his policy of obtaining the best possible players and conductor, and letting the conductor run the artistic matters without interference.

Following the business meeting, Dr. Koussevitzky conducted the orchestra in the three-movement Suite by Corelli, and Debussy's "La Mer." Tea was served in the Huntington-av. foyer.

The committee for the Koussevitzky dinner in May consists of Robert G. Dodge, chairman; Mrs. Ronald T. Lyman and Thomas D. Perry Jr., vice chairman; Mrs. Frank G. Allen, Mrs. John S. Ames, Mrs. Nelson S. Bartlett, Richard Burgin, Wallace Goodrich, Mrs. M. Graeme Haughton, Jacob J. Kaplan, A. P. Loring Jr., John T. Noonan, Willis Page, Edward A. Taft, Mrs. Edward Thaw, Mrs. Bayard Warren, Charles H. Watkins and Oliver Wolcott.

WALTHAM, MASS. NEWS TRIBUNE

Berkshire Music Center Dates Set For Summertime

Serge Koussevitzky announces plans for the 1949 session of the Berkshire Music Center, the summer school of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at Tanglewood in Lenox.

The Music Center will have a six-week session from July 4 to Aug. 14, through the period of the Berkshire Festival Concerts (July 16 to Aug. 14), which will climax Dr. Koussevitzky's 25th anniversary season.

Dr. Koussevitzky will direct the school, with Aaron Copland as assistant director. Additions to the faculty include Olivier Messiaen, the Parisian composer, who will make his first visit to America to join Aaron Copland as teacher of composition.

Scandinavian Personalities IN AMERICA

by INEZ LIND

Thor Johnson, young American-Scandinavian, makes great success as Guest Conductor of Boston Symphony Orchestra

Thor Johnson, young, blonde and talented American-Scandinavian conductor of the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra, came to Boston recently upon the invitation of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and made an outstanding success as guest-conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. In being given an opportunity to conduct the greatest symphony orchestra in the world, the thirty-five-year-old conductor, protegee and former pupil of Dr. Koussevitzky, realizes the big dream of his life.

The acquaintance of teacher and pupil dates back to 1935 when the Boston orchestra made one of its annual visits to the University of Michigan at Ann Arbor where young Thor upon receiving his Master's Degree in Music had been appointed to serve on the Faculty. Dr. Koussevitzky, ever on the alert for music talent, happened to be an interested listener and spectator when the teacher of music was conducting a student symphony ensemble. The noted conductor immediately sent word to Thor inviting him to a conference the next morning. "You will study with me," commanded the master and began mapping out a course of study for the jubilant Thor, recommending him for a European scholarship through the Beebe Foundation. Thor went to Europe and after two years of study in Salzburg and Leipzig under Weingartner, Bruno Walter, Malko and Abenroth, returned to the University of Michigan where he organized and conducted the "Little Symphony of Ann Arbor," also the Grand Rapids Symphony and many music festivals.

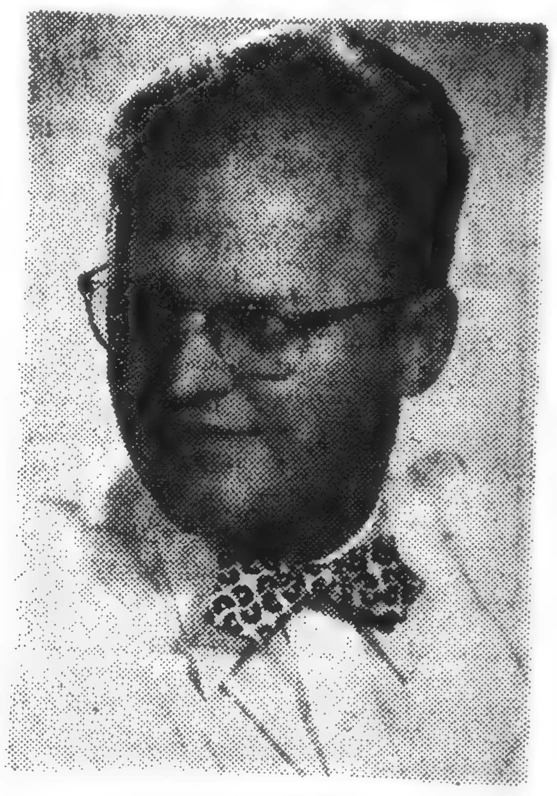
Thor Johnson is a third generation Norwegian whose grandfather, a Norwegian sea captain, settled in Wisconsin. His father, the Reverend Herbert Bernhardt Johnson, and his mother, who gave up a career as concert pianist at the time of her marriage, moved from Wisconsin to North Carolina with their two children when Thor was three years old. His music studies began at the age of seven, first on the piano, then the trumpet violin and double bass. The latter instrument gave the best money yield through his dance-band college years at the University of Carolina where he received his B. A. in Music.

During summer vacations "golden boy" Thor (who, next to music loves to box and go fishing) established the Ashville Mozart Festival, which he conducted several summers up to the time he joined the special conducting class of Dr. Koussevitzky at the Berkshire Music Center.

"The most important thing about Tanglewood," declared the former Music Center student in an interview preceding his debut as guest-conductor of Boston's famous symphony orchestra, "is the opportunity it offers to musicians, the high integrity which cannot be found anywhere else in the world. Here, a musician comes to realize the seriousness of his profession as well as his responsibility as an artist."

Never did a conductor, regardless of age or experience, emerge from a long session of rehearsing a hundred highly trained artist musicians in a taxing program involving several "firsts," appear more relaxed, more affable and more cooperative than did this Viking genius.

"Yes, this is it—the day I've been waiting for," admitted the smiling young man looking very boyish and very happy. "Dr. Koussevitzky has taken every opportunity to look after me leading up to this day and let me tell you what he did to help me when I was called on an 'emergency' to conduct the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra. Something happened to their regular conductor prior to a Chicago concert and I was hurriedly called to fill his place. I was a complete stranger to the members and they to me. I didn't know the program and hadn't even heard the scheduled symphony and there was no time for a rehearsal. Luckily the Boston Symphony with Dr. Koussevitzky conducting, was also giving a concert in Chicago. I rushed to find my friend and teacher, showed him the program and he began giving me instructions at once. "You will do it, you will do it," he kept repeating as I was leaving and all the way back to the opera house I heard nothing else."



THOR JOHNSON.

Everyone knows that Thor Johnson was rocketed to musical fame as "the youngest permanent American conductor of a major orchestra" when he accepted the appointment and became conductor of the well known Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra. Before this appointment, Mr. Johnson had been returned to civilian life after four years and a half of army service. He enlisted in the Signal Corps in 1942, but when his music career became known he was soon commissioned to organize and conduct soldier symphony orchestras and was sent to England with the American University Symphony Orchestra. "I well remember Boston," Johnson recalled, "I had received special peremission to come here and conduct the Boston 'Pops' before embarkation—so Boston was the last place I saw in America."

"If we in America accept this new role as leader of the world, the artistic world, then the importance of a place like Tanglewood becomes even greater because the experiences offered under Dr. Koussevitzky's guidance are fitting and in line with the leadership we have assumed. We already have the finest Europe has to offer. Our future is not in imitating Europe. The best music written today is written by composers in the United States. We no longer need apologize to any one for our music," the young conductor pointed out triumphantly.

"So, you like modern music, Mr. Conductor?"

"Yes, I like contemporary music—the music of my generation," was the quick-as-a-flash comeback from Thor, namesake of the God of Thunder although he looked more like the namesake of the Sun-God. "We hear a lot of the old music on the radio and we have it on records, do we want to hear only the old music in the concert world of today? I think not. We can thank Dr. Koussezitzky for giving us the opportunity to hear the composers of contemporary music, and I doubht any other conductor could have been as successful with such a tremendous range of repertoire that he has given to America's concert going public."

Judging by the interesting programs submitted by Thor Johnson for his four guest-conductor appearances with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the pupil will follow in the master's footsteps and American concert audiences may look forward perhaps to an even broader range of repertoire.

Boston is grateful for the coming of Thor Johnson, for the warmth and sincerety of his personality which came out in the beauty of his conducting.

[252]

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
FEB

MUSIC

Boston Symphony Is Conducted by De Carvalho at ~~Metropolitan,~~ Borgerth, Violinist, Gives First Performance of Difficult Brazilian Work

By RUTH TRIPP

The Boston Symphony Orchestra played the third concert of the season at the Metropolitan Theater last evening. A capacity audience heard the brilliant young Brazilian musician, Eleazar De Carvalho was guest conductor and Oscar Borgerth, violinist, also from Brazil, as soloist. The evening was notable because of a first performance in the United States of "Fantasia de movimentos mixtos" for violin and orchestra, by the Brazilian composer, Villa-Lobos. Soloist, conductor and orchestra were given an ovation for their inspired performance of this difficult work.

The program:

"The Russian Easter, Overture on Themes of the Obichod," Op. 36 ..... Rimsky-Korsakov
Evocation from "Iberia," Suite (Orchestrated by E. Fernandez Arbos) ..... Albeniz
"Fantasia de movimentos mixtos," for Violin and Orchestra ..... Villa-Lobos
I. Lent; Anime (Alma convulsa)
II. Andante (Serenidade)
III. Allegro non troppo (Contentamente)
(First performance in United States)
Intermission
Symphony No. 4 in E-flat, Op. 48 ..... Glazounoff
I. Andante; Allegro moderato
II. Scherzo; Allegro vivace
III. Andante; Allegro

Eleazar De Carvalho conducts without score or baton and his performance is strong and compelling. Even in its gentler passages his work expresses great power held in check. Unfailing is his cues, Mr. De Carvalho took the orchestra through all the gradations of tone color in a straightforward, honest fashion which seemed, at the same moment, to be youthful without a trace of subtlety and yet, thoroughly mature in its capacity to move the listener deeply.

The orchestra responded magnificently to the guest conductor's direction and in "The Russian Easter Overture" gave a clear cut interpretation of this melodious score. The playing of the brass section was especially brilliant.

The Albeniz piece provided easy listening and its interesting rhythm was perhaps the outstanding characteristic.

When the moment came to hear the Villa-Lobos "Fantasia" the atmosphere became almost electric and from the moment that Oscar Borgerth drew his bow across the strings, the listener was aware that a great musical event was taking place. The music presented fiendish difficulties for both soloist and orchestra. Especially in the first movement, when strange intervals were piled higher and higher in the great tonal mass, it suddenly seemed as if someone had stepped on all the pedals of a great pipe organ. The second movement was the high spot for this listener. Its lazy motion was overpowering with tropical monotony. Its tone color was lush and beautiful.

The mood changed in the third movement and constantly changing rhythms and a terrific rate of speed made it fascinating to hear.

Oscar Borgerth is a virtuoso artist. He submerged himself completely in the music he interpreted for us and his great beauty of tone will stay with this listener for some time. His modest manner belied his accomplishment, but the audience caught his inspiration instantly and was quick to give him and the orchestra unstinted approval.

The Glazounoff Symphony was both nostalgic and gay and its delightfully obvious construction was well delineated by Mr. De Carvalho. A splendid climax was made in the last movement and the audience left the concert completely satisfied at having heard another of the fine concerts which the Boston Symphony gives without fail.

DALLAS, TEXAS
TIMES HERALD
FE

Berkshire Festival Details Announced

Special to The Times Herald

Boston, Feb. 8.—The Boston Symphony Orchestra announces its 12th annual Berkshire Festival to open at Tanglewood, in Lenox, Mass., on July 16. The festival will be the climax of the 25th season of Serge Koussevitzky as the conductor of the orchestra.

Nine concerts will be given in the Music Shed, through three week ends, on Thursday evenings, Saturday evenings and Sunday afternoons (Series A on July 28, 30 and 31; Series B, Aug. 4, 6 and 7; Series C, Aug. 11, 13 and 14.) The guest conductors of the festival will be Leonard Bernstein and Eleazar de Carvalho. Soloists will be announced.

Before these concerts in the large Music Shed by the full orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky will conduct four concerts by an orchestra of smaller proportions in the intimate Theatre-Concert Hall. These concerts will be given on the Saturday evening and Sunday afternoon of two week ends, July 16-17 and July 23-24. Two different programs will be given each week end. They will be drawn from the music of Bach and Mozart, as in previous seasons, and this year music of Haydn and Schubert will be added.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE
FEB 3 - 1949

Stravinsky Will Conduct 4 Concerts of His Music

Igor Stravinsky will conduct in four concerts of his music here this month, it was announced yesterday. Three of these will be with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in its concerts of Wednesday night and Saturday afternoon, Feb. 16 and 19, in Carnegie Hall, and Friday night, Feb. 18, at the Brooklyn Academy of Music. All three programs include Mr. Stravinsky's concerto in D for strings, ode in Three Parts and ballet, "Orpheus." Soulima Stravinsky will be the soloist in his father's piano capriccio on Wednesdays and in the concerto for piano and wind orchestra on Saturday.

Mr. Stravinsky will conduct the first American performance of his mass in the concert of the Chamber Art Society in Town Hall on Saturday afternoon, Feb. 26, at 5:30. The rest of the program includes his concerto for two solo pianos, with Soulima Stravinsky and Beveridge Webster; three choruses to be conducted by Robert Shaw, and the Octuor to be conducted by the society's director, Robert Craft.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN
FEB 2 - 1949

Music

DeCarvalho Directs Boston Symphony At Metropolitan

By RUTH TRIPP

The Boston Symphony Orchestra played the third concert of the season at the Metropolitan Theater last evening. A capacity audience heard the brilliant young Brazilian musician, Eleazar De Carvalho, as guest conductor and Oscar Borgerth, violinist, also from Brazil, as soloist. The evening was notable because of a first performance in the United States of "Fantasia de movimentos mixtos" for violin and orchestra, by the Brazilian composer, Villa-Lobos. Soloist, conductor and orchestra were given an ovation for their inspired performance of this difficult work.

The program:

"The Russian Easter, Overture on Themes of the Obichod," Op. 36 ..... Rimsky-Korsakov
Evocation from "Iberia," Suite (Orchestrated by E. Fernandez Arbos) ..... Albeniz
"Fantasia de movimentos mixtos," for Violin and Orchestra ..... Villa-Lobos
I. Lent; Anime (Alma convulsa)
II. Andante (Serenidade)
III. Allegro non troppo (Contentamente)
(First performance in United States)
Intermission
Symphony No. 4 in E-flat, Op. 48 ..... Glazounoff
I. Andante; Allegro moderato
II. Scherzo; Allegro vivace
III. Andante; Allegro

Eleazar De Carvalho conducts without score or baton and his performance is strong and compelling. Even in its gentler passages his work expresses great power held in check Unfailing in his cues, Mr. De Carvalho took the orchestra through all the gradations of tone color in a straightforward, honest fashion which seemed, at the same moment, to be youthful without a trace of subtlety and yet, thoroughly mature in its capacity to move the listener deeply.

The orchestra responded magnificently to the guest conductor's direction and in "The Russian Easter Overture" gave a clear cut interpretation of this melodious score. The playing of the brass section was especially brilliant.

The Albeniz piece provided easy listening and its interesting rhythm was perhaps the outstanding characteristic.

When the moment came to hear the Villa-Lobos "Fantasia" the atmosphere became almost electric and from the moment that Oscar Borgerth drew his bow across the strings, the listener was aware that a great musical event was taking place. The music presented fiendish difficulties for both soloist and orchestra. Especially in the first movement, when strange intervals were piled higher and higher in the great tonal mass, it suddenly seemed as if someone had stepped on all the pedals of a great pipe organ. The second movement was the high spot for this listener. Its lazy motion was overpowering with tropical monotony. Its tone color was lush and beautiful.

The mood changed in the third movement and constantly changing rhythms and a terrific rate of speed made it fascinating to hear.

Oscar Borgerth is a virtuoso artist. He submerged himself completely in the music he interpreted for us and his great beauty of tone will stay with this listener for some time. His modest manner belied his accomplishment, but the audience caught his inspiration instantly and was quick to give him and the orchestra unstinted approval.

The Glazounoff Symphony was both nostalgic and gay and its delightfully obvious construction was well delineated by Mr. De Carvalho. A splendid climax was made in the last movement and the audience left the concert completely satisfied at having heard another of the fine concerts which the Boston Symphony gives without fail.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
FEB 6 - 1949

BERKSHIRE FESTIVAL WILL OPEN ON JULY 16

The twelfth annual Berkshire Music Festival will open at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass., on July 16, it was announced yesterday. Serge Koussevitzky will conduct the Boston Symphony in the usual three series of major concerts in the Music Shed, with the assistance of Leonard Bernstein and Eleazar de Carvalho, guest conductors.

Concerts will begin on July 16, when Mr. Koussevitzky leads the first of two pairs of small concerts in the Theatre-Concert Hall. These Saturday evening - Sunday afternoon programs will consist of music by Bach, Mozart, Haydn and Schubert. The major series begins July 28 and concludes Aug. 14.

Last year's subscribers will have a chance to renew their subscriptions before the public sale begins on March 1.

The Berkshire Music Center's six-week session will run from July 4 to Aug. 14. Information may be had from Symphony Hall, Boston 15, Mass.

—SATURDAY, MARCH 5, 19

MUSIC

Koussevitzky Returns to Symphony in Brahms Program; Hess Soloist

By CYRUS DURGIN

As Anthony Hope might have put it, in his Ruritanian fashion, the King reigned in his capitol yesterday. This is to say that Serge Koussevitzky returned to the Boston Symphony Orchestra after an unusually long mid-Winter respite in Arizona and Florida. The occasion of his home-coming brought an all-Brahms program and a large, eagerly-expectant andience. It also brought, as soloist, that perennial favorite in this city, pianist Dame Myra Hess.

The pieces of this Brahms program were three: the "Tragic" Overture, the D minor Piano Concerto and the Fourth Symphony in E minor. In prospect it was a list calculated to please those of conservative tastes; nothing novel and nothing to require arduous listening; in fact, to the younger Symphony-goers, a program a mite on the stuffy if not the dull side.

But where Serge Koussevitzky is concerned, advance hunches and predictions are proverbially unreliable. Such is the spontaneity and the intensity of his conducting that any work, no matter how familiar, may likely come blazing to life and pleasantly titillate any audience. That is precisely what happened yesterday and beyond all speculation will occur again tonight at Symphony Hall.

The "Tragic Overture," though some 20 years and more separate it from the earlier D minor Concerto, shares something of the same granitic quality. It is a work austere and heroic of proportions; characteristic of Brahms' North German ancestry, and less touched than other of his music, by the expansive and gentle Viennese graces which Brahms found so much to his pleasure and comfort.

Even the E minor Symphony, as much a masterpiece of construction as any cathedral, fits in the same category, although the severity of German symphonic usage is tempered by the melodic flow of the slow movement, and the athletic vigor of the scherzo. All three of these pieces are characterized by an aspect best termed Gothic. But don't put too fine a point upon the comparison!

All these qualities were fully emphasized by Mr. Koussevitzky's performance. The orchestra was in its top form and never sounded more richly sonorous or more sensitively alert to the multitudinous nuances which the conductor demanded. And since the art of Koussevitzky never has remained static in any composition, there was something which, if not new, warranted keen observation. That was the delicate balance of the orchestral voices. Brahms never has been extolled as a master of orchestral color and detail, but what sometimes has sounded solid and mono-chromatic, yesterday had many tints and a transparency that were extraordinary.

Dame Myra—Once again having the printed music before her and a gentleman to turn the pages — played with all the strength, the knowing musicianship and the polish of style that these numerous years have proved her mastery as a keyboard artist. To call her an exciting pianist would be exaggeration, but that she is a profound and gracious virtuoso is mere stating of acknowledged fact. All Brahms may be too much of a good thing, but the symphony concerts this week are memorable.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE
FEB 7 - 1949

Boston Symphony Lists Schedule at Tanglewood

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will hold its twelfth annual Berkshire Music Festival next July and August in Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass. Serge Koussevitzky will complete his twenty-fifth and last year as the orchestra's regular conductor with this festival; Leonard Bernstein and Eleazar de Carvalho will reappear as guest conductors.

The full orchestra will be heard in the usual three series of three concerts in the Music Shed on Thursday and Saturday nights and Sunday afternoons, as follows: Series A, July 28, 30, 31; Series B, Aug. 4, 6, 7; Series C, Aug. 11, 13, 14. Dr. Koussevitzky will conduct an orchestra of smaller proportions in Tanglewood's Theater-Concert Hall on Saturday nights and Sunday afternoons, July 16, 17, 23 and 24, presenting two different programs each week end. These will be devoted to music of Bach, Mozart, Haydn and Schubert. Subscribers to last year's festival concerts can renew their subscriptions before the opening of the public sale on March 1.

The Berkshire Music Center will hold its seventh session at Tanglewood under Koussevitzky's direction for six weeks, July 10 to Aug. 14. Further information about the festival and the center may be obtained by writing to Berkshire Festival or Berkshire Music Center, Symphony Hall, Boston.

The first Berkshire Festivals were held in 1934 and 1935 under the late Henry Hadley's direction. The Association of the Boston Symphony and Dr. Koussevitzky with the Berkshire region began in 1936. The Tanglewood property was first used in 1937, and the Music Shed was opened the following summer. The Berkshire Music Center was opened in 1940. No full-scale festivals were held from 1942 to 1945, because of the war, but 1943 was the only summer when there were no musical activities at Tanglewood.

ST. LOUIS, MO.
GLOBE DEMOCRAT

The Music Whirl

By HARRY R. BURKE

BOSTON'S SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA is commemorating the 25 years of service by its great leader, Serge Koussevitzky, with a volume of recordings from his repertory as a virtuoso of the double bass. It is a limited edition (Victor three 12-inch vinylite discs) of the Red Seal de luxe type, but available only from the orchestra, the proceeds going to its Koussevitzky Anniversary Fund. To one of them this chronicler has fallen heir.

And it is an heritage. Of historic significance, because it is doubtful if the world ever heard a solo double bass to equal Koussevitzky. He abandoned that role when he was called to Boston, but these recordings of 20 years ago have been made by recording, he believes, a significant record of his art. Two sides comprise the Andante of the Concerto he composed for his beloved instrument; two others present his "Chanson Triste" and "Valse Miniature." A lullaby by Laska and Koussevitzky's transcription of a Largo by Eccles round out the album.

The brusque quality we think of as a hallmark of the double bass is not in this flexible and fluent tone. To this reviewer it recalls the cello of Pablo Casals, but the tone is deeper-bosomed, more passionate. And the — Koussevitzky bow searches out the implications of the long line of Russian romantic melody with exquisite expressiveness. Pierre Luboschutz provides accompaniment. Alto

---

THE BOSTON DAILY GLOBE
4 Feb 1949

Berkshire Festival Will Open July 16

The Boston Symphony Orchestra announces its 12th annual Berkshire Festival to open at Tanglewood, in Lenox, July 16. The Festival will be the climax of the 25th season of Serge Koussevitzky as the conductor.

Nine concerts will be given in the Music Shed, through three week-ends, on Thursday and Saturday evenings, and Sunday afternoons (Series A on July 28, 30, and 31; Series B, Aug. 4, 6, and 7; Series C, Aug. 11, 13, and 14). Guest conductors will be Leonard Bernstein and Eleazar de Carvalho. Soloists will be announced.

Before these concerts in the large Music Shed by the full orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky will conduct four concerts by an orchestra of smaller proportions in the intimate Theatre-Concert Hall. These concerts will be given on the Saturday evening and Sunday afternoon of two week-ends, July 16-17, and July 23-24.

The Berkshire Music Center, Serge Koussevitzky, director, will hold a six weeks' session at Tanglewood from July 4 to Aug. 14, the seventh season of the school. Information about the Music Center and the programs of the Festival, when announced, may be obtained by applying to Symphony Hall, Boston 15.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

FEB [illegible]

MUSIC

Boston Symphony Is Conducted by De Carvalho at ~~Metropolitan,~~ Borgerth, Violinist, Gives First Performance of Difficult Brazilian Work

By RUTH TRIPP

The Boston Symphony Orchestra played the third concert of the season at the Metropolitan Theater last evening. A capacity audience heard the brilliant young Brazilian musician, Eleazar De Carvalho was guest conductor and Oscar Borgerth, violinist, also from Brazil, as soloist. The evening was notable because of a first performance in the United States of "Fantasia de movimentos mixtos" for violin and orchestra, by the Brazilian composer, Villa-Lobos. Soloist, conductor and orchestra were given an ovation for their inspired performance of this difficult work.

The program:

"The Russian Easter, Overture on Themes of the Obichod," Op. 36 ..... Rimsky-Korsakov
Evocation from "Iberia," Suite (Orchestrated by E. Fernandez Arbos) ..... Albeniz
"Fantasia de movimentos mixtos," for Violin and Orchestra ..... Villa-Lobos
I. Lent; Anime (Alma convulsa)
II. Andante (Serenidade)
III. Allegro non troppo (Contentamente)
(First performance in United States)
Intermission
Symphony No. 4 in E-flat, Op. 48 ..... Glazounoff
I. Andante; Allegro moderato
II. Scherzo; Allegro vivace
III. Andante; Allegro

Eleazar De Carvalho conducts without score or baton and his performance is strong and compelling. Even in its gentler passages his work expresses great power held in check. Unfailing is his cues, Mr. De Carvalho took the orchestra through all the gradations of tone color in a straightforward, honest fashion which seemed, at the same moment, to be youthful without a trace of subtlety and yet, thoroughly mature in its capacity to move the listener deeply.

The orchestra responded magnificently to the guest conductor's direction and in "The Russian Easter Overture" gave a clear cut interpretation of this melodious score. The playing of the brass section was especially brilliant.

The Albeniz piece provided easy listening and its interesting rhythm was perhaps the outstanding characteristic.

When the moment came to hear the Villa-Lobos "Fantasia" the atmosphere became almost electric and from the moment that Oscar Borgerth drew his bow across the strings, the listener was aware that a great musical event was taking place. The music presented fiendish difficulties for both soloist and orchestra. Especially in the first movement, when strange intervals were piled higher and higher in the great tonal mass, it suddenly seemed as if someone had stepped on all the pedals of a great pipe organ. The second movement was the high spot for this listener. Its lazy motion was overpowering with tropical monotony. Its tone color was lush and beautiful.

The mood changed in the third movement and constantly changing rhythms and a terrific rate of speed made it fascinating to hear.

Oscar Borgerth is a virtuoso artist. He submerged himself completely in the music he interpreted for us and his great beauty of tone will stay with this listener for some time. His modest manner belied his accomplishment, but the audience caught his inspiration instantly and was quick to give him and the orchestra unstinted approval.

The Glazounoff Symphony was both nostalgic and gay and its delightfully obvious construction was well delineated by Mr. De Carvalho. A splendid climax was made in the last movement and the audience left the concert completely satisfied at having heard another of the fine concerts which the Boston Symphony gives without fail.

DALLAS, TEXAS
TIMES HERALD

FE[illegible]

Berkshire Festival Details Announced

Special to The Times Herald

Boston, Feb. 8.—The Boston Symphony Orchestra announces its 12th annual Berkshire Festival to open at Tanglewood, in Lenox, Mass., on July 16. The festival will be the climax of the 25th season of Serge Koussevitzky as the conductor of the orchestra.

Nine concerts will be given in the Music Shed, through three week ends, on Thursday evenings, Saturday evenings and Sunday afternoons (Series A on July 28, 30 and 31; Series B, Aug. 4, 6 and 7; Series C, Aug. 11, 13 and 14.) The guest conductors of the festival will be Leonard Bernstein and Eleazar de Carvalho. Soloists will be announced.

Before these concerts in the large Music Shed by the full orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky will conduct four concerts by an orchestra of smaller proportions in the intimate Theatre-Concert Hall. These concerts will be given on the Saturday evening and Sunday afternoon of two week ends, July 16-17 and July 23-24. Two different programs will be given each week end. They will be drawn from the music of Bach and Mozart, as in previous seasons, and this year music of Haydn and Schubert will be added.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE

FEB 3 - 1949

Stravinsky Will Conduct 4 Concerts of His Music

Igor Stravinsky will conduct in four concerts of his music here this month, it was announced yesterday. Three of these will be with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in its concerts of Wednesday night and Saturday afternoon, Feb. 16 and 19, in Carnegie Hall, and Friday night, Feb. 18, at the Brooklyn Academy of Music. All three programs include Mr. Stravinsky's concerto in D for strings, ode in Three Parts and ballet, "Orpheus." Soulima Stravinsky will be the soloist in his father's piano capriccio on Wednesdays and in the concerto for piano and wind orchestra on Saturday.

Mr. Stravinsky will conduct the first American performance of his mass in the concert of the Chamber Art Society in Town Hall on Saturday afternoon, Feb. 26, at 5:30. The rest of the program includes his concerto for two solo pianos, with Soulima Stravinsky and Beveridge Webster; three choruses to be conducted by Robert Shaw, and the Octuor to be conducted by the society's director, Robert Craft.

THE BOSTON DAILY GLOBE

4 Feb 1949

Berkshire Festival Will Open July 16

The Boston Symphony Orchestra announces its 12th annual Berkshire Festival to open at Tanglewood, in Lenox, July 16. The Festival will be the climax of the 25th season of Serge Koussevitzky as the conductor.

Nine concerts will be given in the Music Shed, through three weekends, on Thursday and Saturday evenings, and Sunday afternoons (Series A on July 28, 30, and 31; Series B, Aug. 4, 6, and 7; Series C, Aug. 11, 13, and 14). Guest conductors will be Leonard Bernstein and Eleazar de Carvalho. Soloists will be announced.

Before these concerts in the large Music Shed by the full orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky will conduct four concerts by an orchestra of smaller proportions in the intimate Theatre-Concert Hall. These concerts will be given on the Saturday evening and Sunday afternoons of two week-ends, July 16-17, and July 23-24.

The Berkshire Music Center, Serge Koussevitzky, director, will hold a six weeks session at Tanglewood from July 4 to Aug. 14, the seventh season of the school. Information about the Music Center and the programs of the Festival, when announced, may be obtained by applying to Symphony Hall, Boston 15.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

FEB [illegible] 1949

Music

DeCarvalho Directs Boston Symphony At Metropolitan

By RUTH TRIPP

The Boston Symphony Orchestra played the third concert of the season at the Metropolitan Theater last evening. A capacity audience heard the brilliant young Brazilian musician, Eleazar De Carvalho, as guest conductor and Oscar Borgerth, violinist, also from Brazil, as soloist. The evening was notable because of a first performance in the United States of "Fantasia de movimentos mixtos" for violin and orchestra, by the Brazilian composer, Villa-Lobos. Soloist, conductor and orchestra were given an ovation for their inspired performance of this difficult work.

The program:

"The Russian Easter, Overture on Themes of the Obichod," Op. 36 ..... Rimsky-Korsakov
Evocation from "Iberia," Suite (Orchestrated by E. Fernandez Arbos) ..... Albeniz
"Fantasia de movimentos mixtos," for Violin and Orchestra ..... Villa-Lobos
I. Lent; Anime (Alma convulsa)
II. Andante (Serenidade)
III. Allegro non troppo (Contentamente)
(First performance in United States)
Intermission
Symphony No. 4 in E-flat, Op. 48 ..... Glazounoff
I. Andante; Allegro moderato
II. Scherzo; Allegro vivace
III. Andante; Allegro

Eleazar De Carvalho conducts without score or baton and his performance is strong and compelling. Even in its gentler passages his work expresses great power held in check Unfailing in his cues, Mr. De Carvalho took the orchestra through all the gradations of tone color in a straightforward, honest fashion which seemed, at the same moment, to be youthful without a trace of subtlety and yet, thoroughly mature in its capacity to move the listener deeply.

The orchestra responded magnificently to the guest conductor's direction and in "The Russian Easter Overture" gave a clear cut interpretation of this melodious score. The playing of the brass section was especially brilliant.

The Albeniz piece provided easy listening and its interesting rhythm was perhaps the outstanding characteristic.

When the moment came to hear the Villa-Lobos "Fantasia" the atmosphere became almost electric and from the moment that Oscar Borgerth drew his bow across the strings, the listener was aware that a great musical event was taking place. The music presented fiendish difficulties for both soloist and orchestra. Especially in the first movement, when strange intervals were piled higher and higher in the great tonal mass, it suddenly seemed as if someone had stepped on all the pedals of a great pipe organ. The second movement was the high spot for this listener. Its lazy motion was overpowering with tropical monotony. Its tone color was lush and beautiful.

The mood changed in the third movement and constantly changing rhythms and a terrific rate of speed made it fascinating to hear.

Oscar Borgerth is a virtuoso artist. He submerged himself completely in the music he interpreted for us and his great beauty of tone will stay with this listener for some time. His modest manner belied his accomplishment, but the audience caught his inspiration instantly and was quick to give him and the orchestra unstinted approval.

The Glazounoff Symphony was both nostalgic and gay and its delightfully obvious construction was well delineated by Mr. De Carvalho. A splendid climax was made in the last movement and the audience left the concert completely satisfied at having heard another of the fine concerts which the Boston Symphony gives without fail.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

FEB 6 - 1949

BERKSHIRE FESTIVAL WILL OPEN ON JULY 16

The twelfth annual Berkshire Music Festival will open at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass., on July 16, it was announced yesterday. Serge Koussevitzky will conduct the Boston Symphony in the usual three series of major concerts in the Music Shed, with the assistance of Leonard Bernstein and Eleazar de Carvalho, guest conductors.

Concerts will begin on July 16, when Mr. Koussevitzky leads the first of two pairs of small concerts in the Theatre-Concert Hall. These Saturday evening - Sunday afternoon programs will consist of music by Bach, Mozart, Haydn and Schubert. The major series begins July 28 and concludes Aug. 14.

Last year's subscribers will have a chance to renew their subscriptions before the public sale begins on March 1.

The Berkshire Music Center's six-week session will run from July 4 to Aug. 14. Information may be had from Symphony Hall, Boston 15, Mass.

—SATURDAY, MARCH 5, 19

MUSIC

Koussevitzky Returns to Symphony in Brahms Program; Hess Soloist

By CYRUS DURGIN

As Anthony Hope might have put it, in his Ruritanian fashion, the King reigned in his capitol yesterday. This is to say that Serge Koussevitzky returned to the Boston Symphony Orchestra after an unusually long mid-Winter respite in Arizona and Florida. The occasion of his home-coming brought an all-Brahms program and a large, eagerly-expectant andience. It also brought, as soloist, that perennial favorite in this city, pianist Dame Myra Hess.

The pieces of this Brahms program were three: the "Tragic" Overture, the D minor Piano Concerto and the Fourth Symphony, in E minor. In prospect it was a list calculated to please those of conservative tastes; nothing novel and nothing to require arduous listening; in fact, to the younger Symphony-goers, a program a mite on the stuffy if not the dull side.

But where Serge Koussevitzky is concerned, advance hunches and predictions are proverbially unreliable. Such is the spontaneity and the intensity of his conducting that any work, no matter how familiar, may likely come blazing to life and pleasantly titillate any audience. That is precisely what happened yesterday and beyond all speculation will occur again tonight at Symphony Hall.

The "Tragic Overture," though some 20 years and more separate it from the earlier D minor Concerto, shares something of the same granitic quality. It is a work austere and heroic of proportions; characteristic of Brahms' North German ancestry, and less touched than other of his music, by the expansive and gentle Viennese graces which Brahms found so much to his pleasure and comfort.

Even the E minor Symphony, as much a masterpiece of construction as any cathedral, fits in the same category, although the severity of German symphonic usage is tempered by the melodic flow of the slow movement, and the athletic vigor of the scherzo. All three of these pieces are characterized by an aspect best termed Gothic. But don't put too fine a point upon the comparison!

All these qualities were fully emphasized by Mr. Koussevitzky's performance. The orchestra was in its top form and never sounded more richly sonorous or more sensitively alert to the multitudinous nuances which the conductor demanded. And since the art of Koussevitzky never has remained static in any composition, there was something which, if not new, warranted keen observation. That was the delicate balance of the orchestral voices Brahms never has been extolled as a master of orchestral color and detail, but what sometimes has sounded solid and mono-chromatic, yesterday had many tints and a transparency that were extraordinary.

Dame Myra—Once again having the printed music before her and a gentleman to turn the pages — played with all the strength, the knowing musicianship and the polish of style that these numerous years, have proved her mastery as a keyboard artist. To call her an exciting pianist would be exaggeration, but that she is a profound and gracious virtuoso is mere stating of acknowledged fact. All Brahms may be too much of a good thing, but the symphony concerts this week are memorable.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE

FEB 7 - 1949

Boston Symphony Lists Schedule at Tanglewood

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will hold its twelfth annual Berkshire Music Festival next July and August in Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass. Serge Koussevitzky will complete his twenty-fifth and last year as the orchestra's regular conductor with this festival; Leonard Bernstein and Eleazar de Carvalho will reappear as guest conductors.

The full orchestra will be heard in the usual three series of three concerts in the Music Shed on Thursday and Saturday nights and Sunday afternoons, as follows: Series A, July 28, 30, 31; Series B, Aug. 4, 6, 7; Series C, Aug. 11, 13, 14. Dr. Koussevitzky will conduct an orchestra of smaller proportions in Tanglewood's Theater-Concert Hall on Saturday nights and Sunday afternoons, July 16, 17, 23 and 24, presenting two different programs each week end. These will be devoted to music of Bach, Mozart, Haydn and Schubert. Subscribers to last year's festival concerts can renew their subscriptions before the opening of the public sale on March 1.

The Berkshire Music Center will hold its seventh session at Tanglewood under Koussevitzky's direction for six weeks, July 10 to Aug. 14. Further information about the festival and the center may be obtained by writing to Berkshire Festival or Berkshire Music Center, Symphony Hall, Boston.

The first Berkshire Festivals were held in 1934 and 1935 under the late Henry Hadley's direction. The Association of the Boston Symphony and Dr. Koussevitzky with the Berkshire region began in 1936. The Tanglewood property was first used in 1937, and the Music Shed was opened the following summer. The Berkshire Music Center was opened in 1940. No full-scale festivals were held from 1942 to 1945, because of the war, but 1943 was the only summer when there were no musical activities at Tanglewood.

ST. LOUIS, MO.
GLOBE DEMOCRAT

FEB 2[illegible]

The Music Whirl

By HARRY R. BURKE

BOSTON'S SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA is commemorating the 25 years of service by its great leader, Serge Koussevitzky, with a volume of recordings from his repertory as a virtuoso of the double bass. It is a limited edition (Victor three 12-inch vinylite discs) of the Red Seal de luxe type, but available only from the orchestra, the proceeds going to its Koussevitzky Anniversary Fund. To one of them this chronicler has fallen heir.

And it is an heritage. Of historic significance, because it is doubtful if the world ever heard a solo double bass to equal Koussevitzky. He abandoned that role when he was called to Boston, but these recordings of 20 years ago have been made by recording, he believes, a significant record of his art. Two sides comprise the Andante of the Concerto he composed for his beloved instrument; two others present his "Chanson Triste" and "Valse Miniature." A lullaby by Laska and Koussevitzky's transcription of a Largo by Eccles round out the album.

The brusque quality we think of as a hallmark of the double bass is not in this flexible and fluent tone. To this reviewer it recalls the cello of Pablo Casals, but the tone is deeper-bosomed, more passionate. And the —— Koussevitzky bow searches out the implications of the long line of Russian romantic melody with exquisite expressiveness. Pierre Luboschutz provides accompaniment. Alt

PITTSFIELD, MASS.
BERKSHIRE EAGLE

EB7-1949

1949 Music Festival To Climax Koussevitzky's 25th Season

The Berkshire Music Festival will open its 12th annual season at Tanglewood July 16, climaxing the 25th season of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Nine concerts will be given in the Music Shed through the week ends on Thursday evenings, Saturday evenings and Sunday afternoons (Series A on July 28, 30 and 31; Series B, Aug. 4, 6 and 7; Series C, Aug. 11, 13 and 14).

The guest conductors of the Festival will be Leonard Bernstein and Eleazer de Carvalho. Before these concerts in the Music Shed by the full orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky will conduct four concerts by an orchestra of smaller proportions in the Theatre-Concert Hall. These concerts will be given on the Saturday evening and Sunday afternoon of two weeks ends July 16-17 and July 23-24. Two different programs will be given each week end. They will be drawn from the music of Bach and Mozart, as in previous seasons and this year music of Haydn and Schubert will be added.

Subscribers to the Berkshire Festival concerts of last year may renew their subscriptions before the public sale which begins March 1. Subscribers are also offered seats to the concerts in the Theatre-Music Hall at reduced prices.

The Berkshire Music Center, with Dr. Koussevitzky as director, will hold a six weeks' session at Tanglewood from July 4 to Aug. 14 the seventh season of the school. Information about the Music Center and the programs of the Festival, when announced, may be obtained by applying to Symphony Hall in Boston.

HUDSON, N. Y.
DAILY STAR

1949

BOSTON SYMPHONY ANNOUNCES PLANS FOR BERKSHIRE SEASON

The Boston Symphony Orchestra announces its Twelfth annual Berkshire Festival to open at Tanglewood, in Lenox, Massachusetts, July 16. The Festival will be the climax of the Twenty-fifth season of Serge Koussevitzky as the conductor of the Orchestra.

Nine concerts will be given in the Music Shed, through three week ends, on Thursday evenings, Saturday evenings, and Sunday afternoons (Series A on July 28, 30, and 31; Series B, August 4, 6, and 7; Series C, August 11, 13, and 14). The guest conductors of the Festival will be Leonard Bernstein and Eleazar de Carvalho. Soloists wil be announced. Before these concerts in the large Music Shed by the full orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky will conduct four concerts by an orchestra of smaller proportions in the intimate Theatre-Concert Hall. These concert Hall. These concerts will be given on the Saturday evening and Sunday afternoon of two week ends, July 16-17, and July 23-24. Two different programs will be given each week end: They will be drawn from the music of Bach and Mozart, as in previous seasons, and this year music of Haydn and Schubert will be added.

Subscribers to the Berkshire Festival concerts of last year will have the privilege of renewing their subscriptions before the public sale which begins March first. Subscribers are also offered seats to the concerts in the Theatre-Concert Hall at reduced prices.

The Berkshire Music Center, Serge Koussevitzky, director, will hold a six weeks' session at Tanglewood from July 4 to August 14, the Seventh season of the School. Information about the Music Center and the programs of the Festival, when announced, may be obtained by applying to Symphony Hall, Boston 15, Mass.

WEST WARWICK, R. I.
PAWTUXET VALLEY TIMES

FEB [illegible] 1949

MUSIC

Announce Berkshire Festival

Twelfth Annual Session to Open on July 16

The Boston Symphony orchestra announces its 12th annual Berkshire Festival to open at Tanglewood, in Lenox, Massachusetts, on July 16. The festival will be the climax of the 25th season of Serge Koussevitzky as the conductor of the orchestra.

Nine concerts will be given in the Music Shed, through three week-ends, on Thursday evenings, Saturday evenings, and Sunday afternoons (Series A on July 28, 30 and 31; Series B, August 4, 6 and 7; Series C, August 11, 13 and 14). The guest conductors of the festival will be Leonard Bernstein and Elzear de Carvalho. Soloists will be announced. Before these concerts in the large music shed by the full orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky will conduct concerts by an orchestra of smaller proportions in the intimate Theatre-Concert Hall. These concerts will be given on the Saturday evening and Sunday afternoon of two weekends, July 16-17, and July 23-24. Two different programs will be given each week end. They will be drawn from the music of Bach and Mozart, as in previous seasons, and this year music of Haydn and Schubert will be added.

Subscribers to the Berkshire Festival concerts of last year will have the privilege of renewing their subscriptions before the public sale which begins March first. Subscribers are are also offered seats to the concerts in the Theatre-Concert Hall at reduced prices.

The Berkshire Music Center Serge Koussevitzky, director, will hold a six weeks' session at Tanglewood from July 4 to August 14 the Seventh season of the school. Information about the Music Center and the programs of the Festival, when announced, may be obtained by applying to Symphony Hall, Boston 15, Mass.

WALTHAM, MASS.
NEWS TRIBUNE

Berkshire Festival Program is Listed

The Boston Symphony Orchestra announces its 12th annual Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood, in Lenox, on July 16. The Festival will be the climax of the 25th season of Serge Koussevitzky as the conductor of the orchestra.

Nine concerts will be given in the Music Shed, through three weekends, on Thursday evenings, Saturday evenings and Sunday afternoons (Series A on July 28, 30 and 31; Series B, Aug. 4, 6 and 7; Series C, Aug. 11, 13 and 14). The guest conductors of the Festival will be Leonard Bernstein and Eleazar de Carvalho. Soloists will be announced. Before these concerts in the large Music Shed by the full orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky will conduct four concerts by an orchestra of smaller proportions in the intimate Theatre-Concert Hall. These concerts will be given on the Saturday evening and Sunday afternoon of two weekends, July 16-17 and July 23-24. Two different programs will be given each weekend. They will be drawn from the music of Bach and Mozart, as in previous seasons, and this year music of Haydn and Schubert will be added.

Subscribers to the Berkshire Festival concerts of last year will have the privilege of renewing their subscriptions before the public sale which begins March 1. Subscribers are also offered seats to the concerts in the Theatre-Concert Hall at reduced prices.

The Berkshire Music Center, Serge Koussevitzky, director, will hold a six weeks' session at Tanglewood from July 4 to Aug. 14, the seventh season of the school. Information about the Music Center and the programs of the Festival, when announced, may be obtained by applying to Symphony Hall, Boston 15, Mass.

Faculty Listed For Tanglewood Summer School

BOSTON: Serge Koussevitzky announces plans for the 1949 session of the Berkshire Music Center, the summer school of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood in Lenox, Mass. The Music Center will have a six-week session from July 4 to Aug. 14, through the period of the Berkshire Festival concerts (July 16 to Aug. 14) which will climax Dr. Koussevitzky's 25th anniversary season.

Dr. Koussevitzky will direct the school with Aaron Copland as assistant director. Additions to the faculty include Olivier Messiaen, the Parisian composer, who will make his first visit to America to join Aaron Copland as teacher of composition. The members of the Juilliard String Quartet (Robert Mann, Robert Koff, Raphael Hillyer and Arthur Winograd) will assist Gregor Piatigorsky, who will be in charge of chamber music. Twenty-five members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will also take part in this department.

Among the faculty, together with the principles of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will be Leonard Bernstein, Richard Burgin and Eleazar de Carvalho assisting Dr. Koussevitzky in the conducting classes and with the student orchestra. Hugh Ross will head the choral department. Robert Shaw, regularly a member of the choral faculty, will be on leave of absence, and Mr. Ross will be joined by Christopher Honaas, head of the music department of Rollins College in Winter Park, Fla.

There will be five departments as in former seasons: I—Orchestral and Choral Conducting. II—Orchestra and Chamber Music. III—Composition. IV — Opera and V—Chorus. The opera department will include a considerably expanded opera and chamber orchestra which will perform for the opera productions and will give concerts from the chamber orchestra repertoire.

There will be some 40 school performances, including concerts by all the departments, by members of the faculty, and visiting artists, and a major opera production under the direction of Boris Goldovsky in the tradition of Benjamin Britten's "Peter Grimes" (American premiere in 1946), Mozart's "Idomeneo" (American premiere in 1947) and Rossini's "The Turk in Italy" (1948). Members of the Friends of the [illegible] Music Center, an organ[illegible] contributors to the su[illegible] [illegible] are invited

---

CINCINNATI, O.
ENQUIRER

Defends Thor Johnson.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE ENQUIRER.

Permit me to express my most emphatic dissent from the article leveled against the conductor of our magnificent Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Thor Johnson, by Msgr. Edward A. Freking in the Catholic Telegraph. I am myself a Catholic, and I believe that Monsignor Freking was sincere when he penned his indictment against Mr. Johnson. He probably listened to some of those who, from the beginning, opposed Mr. Johnson because he is young, and because he is not a foreigner but an American!

Having been a violinist in our orchestra for 35 years, I came here in 1909 with Leopold Stokowski, and I know positively that Mr. Johnson is immeasurably better prepared for and equal to his task than was Stokowski in 1909. Also, as a musician, qualified to judge, I definitely disagree with the priest's opinion that Johnson is "not a genius." I am retired from the orchestra since 1946; but for the second season now, I have attended every concert twice. My reason for this is that the concerts have been conducted in a masterly manner, with an enthusiasm that is electrifying. Mr. Johnson has a phenomenal memory and an infallible instinct for the proper determination of tempi. Having played under Van der Stucken, Stokowski, Kunwald, Ysaye and Reiner, I can truthfully attest that the orchestra is at present doing the very best work of its entire career. Others have noted Mr. Johnson's outstanding success with the concerts for young people, our future audiences. This is simply invaluable.

Mr. Johnson has recently scored a triumph with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He cannot be expected to remain and honor Cincinnati with his superlative gifts if the musical public of our city, swayed by an initial erroneous prejudice, fail to give him their personal support and appreciation.

FELIX LEIPNIKER, 2110 St. James Ave., Cincinnati.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE ENQUIRER.

I am a musician and have attended the concerts of the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra for 15 years. The opinions voiced in this letter are not mine alone, but also those of my husband and many of his colleagues on the music faculty of Miami University. We feel that the orchestra is playing as well or better than it ever did. By what authority does the Catholic Telegraph Register "Observer" place the Symphony as twentieth among the orchestras of the nation?

"The Observer" says many of those who really appreciate music no longer attend the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra concerts. Can he prove this? Surely not all the people sitting in those hundreds of seats go only because it is the thing to do or to show off their clothes. I see many of the same faces now that I did 10 years ago and they are all those of music lovers.

He also criticizes the practice of selling blocks of tickets to commercial establishments and intimates that it was begun since Mr. Thor Johnson became conductor. "The Observer" says that if the Symphony were up to its standard of the past, this practice of "padding the audience" would not be necessary. If the writer whom I am quoting attended the Symphony concerts in the past, he could have observed by reading the programs that commercial establishments have bought blocks of tickets for many, many years and Mr. Johnson had nothing to do with it. Civic musical organizations, even those of the highest standards, are seldom self-supporting. In other countries they are often supported by the government. Since that is not the practice in this country, our musical organizations must be partially supported by personal contributions or by business establishments.

Before Mr. Johnson was given the contract as conductor of the Symphony, there were many pressure groups in Cincinnati, each of whom had its own personal choice of conductor. When Mr. Johnson came to Cincinnati he did so under great prejudice from the groups who were not granted their wish. He is apparently still being judged by prejudice rather than by his own merits. The article written by "The Observer" is a good example of this, for it is one of destructive rather than constructive criticism.

MRS. GEORGE F. BARRON, Wespiser Place, Oxford, Ohio.

MUSIC

Two Stravinskys, Igor and Soulima, Appear at the Symphony Concerts

By CYRUS DURGIN

It is an all-Stravinsky program at the Boston Symphony concerts this week, and I mean all-Stravinsky. Igor, the father, is guest conductor in four of his own pieces, and Soulima, the 39-year-old son, is making his first Boston appearances as piano soloist in the Capriccio. The list begins with the Ode of 1943, dedicated to the memory of Mme, Nathalie Koussevitzky, and otherwise includes the Concerto in D for strings, new to these concerts, and the score of the ballet "Orpheus," which is having its first performances in concert form.

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 12,

Apart from the Capriccio, which is 20 years old, all this music represents the late Stravinsky. Human nature being what it is, I find it hard to write objectively of so brilliant and important a figure in contemporary music. To my taste, the early Stravinsky, of 35 to 40 years ago, with his richness and his vigor, his revolutionary achievements in rhythm and expressivity, is the great Stravinsky, but in recent years he has become progressively more arid and cerebral.

His present music abounds in abstract patterns and solo effects, melodic invention has largely disappeared, and the dimensions of his work are shrinking to chamber music size. Seldom, yesterday afternoon, was the whole Boston Symphony required to play simultaneously.

Through a good deal of the Ode, the Concerto and the Ballet, there is practically nothing you could call a tune, and the rhythmic reiterations— perhaps fascinating on paper, but almost uniformly thumping in sound—become dull to the point of boredom. It is not a question of dissonance; many other composers have given us as much or more, but it is a matter of dryness, absence of feeling and passion. And once again, it may be pointed out that, as with many other creators, perhaps Igor Stravinsky is not the best conductor of his own work.

Now let's look at the other side: All these pieces are formally compact and their logical construction is inescapable. The Concerto has its bright pages, and the tiny slow movement, startlingly, is a song all the way. Two of the sections in "Orpheus" sound more musical than mathematical, giving a pleasant impression of pseudo-archaicism. (Incidentally, it is probable that "Orpheus" would make a far different impression with dancing and the background of the theatre; in concert it is disconcertingly naked.)

Of all four pieces, today the Capriccio sounds the best, most lively, most interesting, most human. Possibly history will show it to have been trifling in its humors of the 1920's, and slight in its overall value. But the piano and orchestra are joined engrossingly in a percussive style. Soulima Stravinsky played with spirit and what may have been a thorough comprehension of the solo part. His work, further, was nimble and clean, and rhythmically alive and elastic. It would be interesting to hear him in a concert of other music.

The two Stravinskys were cordially received, and the orchestra obviously did its best.

[234]

AMERICAN

BOSTON, SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 12, 1949 Art—Music—Theater 15

nsky as Guest Conductor of Symphony

Conducts Program of Own Works, With Son as Soloist

By L. A. Sloper

Igor Stravinsky was guest conductor for the sixteenth concert pair of the Boston Symphony Orchestra season, given Feb. 11-12 in Symphony Hall. His program came from his own works, including the Ode in Three Parts for Orchestra; the Capriccio for Piano and Orchestra; the Concerto in D for String Orchestra, and the Suite from the Ballet, "Orpheus." The Concerto had its first performance "at these concerts." The ballet suite had its first concert performance anywhere. The composer's son, Soulima, was the piano soloist.

Here was a program devoted not only to the works of one composer, but to works, with one exception, in his later style. The Capriccio for Orchestra was written in 1928, and has been frequently played in Boston. It is a light, gay piece of strong popular appeal, and for some of us it was the most refreshing number of the afternoon. Soulima Stravinsky gave a good account of the piano part, having the keen sense of rhythmic freedom that would be expected of Igor's son. Composer and pianist received an ovation.

The tricky rhythms of the Capriccio were present in all the later scores. Indeed, do not all Stravinsky's compositions consist of studies in rhythms? The early ones also had brilliant orchestration, but it was chiefly their rhythms that caught us.

Since then Stravinsky has gradually been getting more and more arid and cerebral. He always insisted that he had no desire for expression in his music, and it was always apparent that he had no gift for melody. Thus the other three numbers of this program had an inevitable monotony. The Ode, written in 1943 in memory of Mme Natalie Koussevitzky, does express some emotion, and in the second movement even some gayety; but expression is kept sternly within bounds and the instrumentation is spare.

This spare orchestration is found also in the remaining two items of the program. The Concerto in D is in the old concerto grosso style, with momentary recollections of Handel, but it has none of Handel's lyricism. It is in fact a pattern of rhythms, spasmodic in expression, interrupted by irrelevant explosions from the lower strings. The second movement, an Arioso, attempts the songful manner, but this is not sustained, but is constantly stopped as above.

The "Orpheus" Suite of course returns to the story style, and hence must have a certain amount of expression. This expression, however, is very controlled, and again the instrumentation is so sparse that there is no danger of overexuberance.

Like most ballet music, this suffers from the absence of the stage action which it is supposed to illustrate, or to accompany. There are moments of beauty, but the dance airs, especially those of the Angel of Death and of the Furies, are so inexpressive and so thinly scored that they make little impression. The final Apotheosis of Orpheus fails to suggest the grandeur of the theme and closes on a note of anti-climax.

Nevertheless, there is in this and in the other recent scores on the program a fascination in the scoring, the harmonies and above all the rhythms, which, if the composer would only forget his preoccupation with technique and let himself go, might very well carry us along as the "Sacre" did and still does.

Stravinsky as conductor limits himself as always to the motions necessary to keep the orchestra accurate. But at the Friday afternoon concert he did not obtain accuracy at all times. The playing tended to be ragged. There were several [illegible] entries in the Concerto and inaccuracies elsewhere. Possibly the orchestra—though it has often played under his direction—had not adjusted itself to his beat. The audience nevertheless was enthusiastic throughout and Mr. Stravinsky was repeatedly recalled.

Museum Lecture-Concert

Music and art of the sea will be the theme of the correlated lecture and concert program at the Boston Museum of Fine Arts Sunday afternoon. Walter Muir Whitehill, director and librarian of the Boston Athenaeum, will give an illustrated lecture on Maritime Arts in the main lecture hall at 3 o'clock.

A concert of sea shanties, sung without accompaniment or harmonization by a male chorus, will follow at 4 o'clock in the Tapestry Gallery. Eliot [illegible] Witling, organist of the Park Street Church, Peabody, will direct. Harold Tibbetts will be the tenor soloist. The program includes short-drag shanties, halliard shanties, windlass or capstan shanties, and forecastle songs.

Lecture and concert are open free to the public.

OTTAWA, CANADA
CITIZEN
FEB 12 1949

Berkshire Festival

Plans for the Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood, Mass., were announced this week. This festival, which will be the climax of Serge Koussevitzky's twenty-fifth season with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will begin on July 16 with a concert for small orchestra, presenting works by Bach, Mozart, Schubert and Haydn. Similar concerts will be given on July 17, 23 and 24. The regular concerts for full orchestra will be as follows: Series A, July 28, 30, 31; Series B, August 4, 6, 7; Series C, August, 11 13, 14. Guest conductors will be Leonard Bernstein and Eleazar de Carvalho.

HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES
FEB 12 1949

Berkshire Festival To Open at Lenox For 12th Season

The 12th annual Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood with the Boston Symphony Orchestra will open at Lenox, Mass., July 16. The festival will be the climax of Serge Koussevitzky's 25th season as conductor of the orchestra.

Nine concerts will be given in the Music Shed, through three weekends, on Thursday evenings, Saturday evenings, and Sunday afternoons. The guest conductors of the Festival will be Leonard Bernstein and Eleazar de Carvalho. Before these concerts in the large shed, Mr. Koussevitsky will conduct four concerts by a smaller orchestra in the Theater-Concert Hall. These will be given on Saturday evenings and Sunday afternoons of the two weekends, July 16-17, and July 23-24. The regular concerts will be gin July 23.

Subscribers to last year's festival may renew their tickets before the public sale begins Mar. 1. The Berkshire Music Center will hold a six weeks' session at Tanglewood from July 4 to Aug. 14, the seventh season of the school.

OAKLAND, CAL.
TRIBUNE
FEB 13 1949

accompanist.

Boston Orchestra Plans Koussevitzky Fund

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has proposed establishment of a Koussevitzky anniversary revolving fund of $250.000, to be contributed by friends of the orchestra and used "for cultural and educational development by the orchestra and as a cushion against emergencies." The fund is intended as a tribute to Serge Koussevitzky, who is retiring after 25 years as conductor of the orchestra.

MERIDEN, CONN.
RECORD
FEB 1[illegible]

Koussevitzky Makes Double Bass Recordings

An album of double bass recordings is soon to be released, made in 1929 by the greatest living double bass player, Serge Koussevitzky. That the cumbersome instrument is capable of more than growled bass notes and a plucked dance-band foundation, is conclusively proved by these records. So they say. The collection consists of the Andante from Mr. Koussevitzky's own Double Bass Concerto, a Largo by Eccles, and a Lullaby by Laska. The albums will be sold as souvenirs of the Twenty-fifth Anniversary season of Serge Koussevitzky as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

At the age of 17, Mr. Koussevitzky left his small town in Russia, entering the Moscow Philharmonic Society school by his incredible mastery of the double bass. He played with the ease and color of a 'cellist. For years his skill has been a legend. Hence enormous interest is attached to this forth-coming release.

DALLAS, TEXAS
NEWS
FEB

Berkshire Festival To Open in July

Special to The News

BOSTON, Mass., Feb. 12.—The Boston Symphony Orchestra announces its twelfth annual Berkshire Festival to open at Tanglewood, in Lenox, Mass., on July 16. The festival will be the climax of the twenty-fifth season of Serge Koussevitzky as the conductor of the orchestra.

Nine concerts will be given in the Music Shed, through three week ends, on Thursday evenings, Saturday evenings and Sunday afternoons (Series A on July 28, 30 and 31; Series B, Aug. 4, 6 and 7; Series C, Aug. 11, 13 and 14). The guest conductors of the festival will be Leonard Bernstein and Eleazar de Carvalho. Soloists will be announced at a later date.

The Berkshire Music Center, Serge Koussevitzky, director, will hold a six weeks' session at Tanglewood from July 4 to Aug. 14, the seventh season of the school. Information about the Music Center and the programs of the festival, when announced, may be obtained by applying to Symphony Hall, Boston 15, Mass.

NATION
NEW YORK, N. Y.
FEB 12 1949

Records

B. H. HAGGIN

BACH'S Brandenburg Concerto No. 3, one of the finest in the series, has been recorded for English Decca by the Boyd Neel String Orchestra (K-1619, $2.10). Though without the wonderful sensitiveness of the old Busch Chamber Players' performance, this one by a larger group of strings is good of its kind, and is well reproduced except for the weakness and edged quality of the violins. The same edged violin sound is heard in the recording of No. 1, a less interesting work, which the entire Boyd Neel Orchestra plays well (ED-87, $7.35).

The beautiful aria "Erbarme dich" from Bach's St. Matthew Passion is sung (in English) by Katherine Ferrier, contralto, who sang it also in the Decca set issued a year ago. On the new record (K-1465) her singing is again superb; but there is a heavy instrumental accompaniment by the National Symphony under Sargent this time, instead of the earlier sensitive playing by the Reginald Jacques Orchestra; and Ferrier's rich voice is reproduced more coarsely.

I find very little of Fauré's suave and pretty music interesting; and that little doesn't include the Piano Quartet Opus 45, which seems to be well performed by the London Belgian Piano Quartet, and is well reproduced except for the occasional brashness of the strings and weakness of the piano in loud passages (ED-74, $9.45) (the first side of my copy scrapes badly). Nor does it include the songs of "L'Horizon chimérique," which are excellently sung by Gerard Souzay, baritone, with good piano accompaniments by Jean Damase (K-1693).

The quiet portions of Franck's Three Chorales for organ contain some exquisite writing; but even this is repetitious and long-winded; in addition there are the bombastic proclamations and affirmations that are hard to take; and the episodic structure is made more difficult to bind together by the record-breaks. Dupré's performances seem good; and the recorded sound of the organ of St. Mark's Church in North Audley Street, London, is remarkably life-like but poorly balanced—the high registers appearing to come from a vast distance (ED-80, $13.65).

Beethoven's Piano Trio Opus 70 No. 1, one of his duller works, has been recorded for Columbia by the Busch-Serkin Trio (MM-804, $4.75). The trio plays well as a group; but this doesn't outweigh Adolf Busch's tone, Serkin's excessive intensity, and the shallow, brash recorded sound—to say nothing of noisy surfaces.

Haydn's Violin Concerto No. 1, an early and uninteresting work, is excellently performed by Isaac Stern with a string orchestra, and well reproduced except for a boomy bass (MM-799, $4.75).

Two excerpts from Copland's music for "Billy the Kid"—the lovely Prairie Night, and the Celebration Dance, which I don't care for—are well performed by Stokowski and the New York Philharmonic (19011-D). And Milhaud's amusing, through repetitious, "Le Boeuf sur le toit" is well done by Mitropoulos and the Minneapolis Symphony (MX-308, $3.50).

The Haydn Society of the United States, 179 Cambridge Street, Boston, announces a first recording of Haydn's

---

ROCHESTER, N. Y.
DEMOCRAT-CHRONICLE
FEB 13 1949

Berkshire Festival Announces Dates

CLIMAXING the 25th season of Serge Koussevitzky as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the orchestra announces its 12th annual Berkshire Festival to open at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass., on July 16.

Nine concerts will be given in the Music Shed through three weekends, on Thursday evenings, Saturday evenings and Sunday afternoons. Guest conductors will be Leonard Bernstein and Eleazar de Carvalho.

Before these concerts in the Music Shed by the full orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky will conduct four concerts by an orchestra of smaller proportions in the intimate Theater - Concert Hall. These concerts will be given on the Saturday evening and Sunday afternoon of two weekends, July 16-17 and July 23-24.

The Berkshire Music Center, directed by Koussevitzky, will hold a six weeks' session at Tanglewood from July 4 to Aug. 14.

CHICAGO, ILL.
TRIBUNE

Tanglewood Opens July 16

The Boston Symphony orchestra has announced its 12th annual Berkshire festival to open at Tanglewood, in Lenox, Mass., July 16. The festival will be the climax of the 25th season of Serge Koussevitzky as director of the orchestra. Guest conductors will be Leonard Bernstein and Eleazar de Carvalho. Soloists will be announced.

Nine concerts will be given in the music shed, thru three weekends, on Thursday and Saturday evenings and Sunday afternoons, July 28 thru Aug. 14. Before these concerts by the full orchestra, Mr. Koussevitzky will conduct four programs by an orchestra of smaller proportions in the intimate theater-concert hall. These will be given on the week-ends of July 16 and 23. Subscribers to last year's concerts may renew their reservations before March 1, the date when public sale begins.

The school at the Berkshire center will hold a six week session starting July 4. Information on the school, as for the public concerts, may be obtained from Symphony Hall, Boston 15, Mass.

nsky as Guest Conductor of Symphony

Conducts Program of Own Works, With Son as Soloist

By L. A. Sloper

Igor Stravinsky was guest conductor for the sixteenth concert pair of the Boston Symphony Orchestra season, given Feb. 11-12 in Symphony Hall. His program came from his own works, including the Ode in Three Parts for Orchestra; the Capriccio for Piano and Orchestra; the Concerto in D for String Orchestra, and the Suite from the Ballet, "Orpheus." The Concerto had its first performance "at these concerts." The ballet suite had its first concert performance anywhere. The composer's son, Soulima, was the piano soloist.

Here was a program devoted not only to the works of one composer, but to works, with one exception, in his later style. The Capriccio for Orchestra was written in 1928, and has been frequently played in Boston. It is a light, gay piece of strong popular appeal, and for some of us it was the most refreshing number of the afternoon. Soulima Stravinsky gave a good account of the piano part, having the keen sense of rhythmic freedom that would be expected of Igor's son. Composer and pianist received an ovation.

The tricky rhythms of the Capriccio were present in all the later scores. Indeed, do not all Stravinsky's compositions consist of studies in rhythms? The early ones also had brilliant orchestration, but it was chiefly their rhythms that caught us.

Since then Stravinsky has gradually been getting more and more arid and cerebral. He always insisted that he had no desire for expression in his music, and it was always apparent that he had no gift for melody. Thus the other three numbers of this program had an inevitable monotony. The Ode, written in 1943 in memory of Mme Natalie Koussevitzky, does express some emotion, and in the second movement even some gayety; but expression is kept sternly within bounds and the instrumentation is spare.

This spare orchestration is found also in the remaining two items of the program. The Concerto in D is in the old concerto grosso style, with momentary recollections of Handel, but it has none of Handel's lyricism. It is in fact a pattern of rhythms, spasmodic in expression, interrupted by irrelevant explosions from the lower strings. The second movement, an Arioso, attempts the songful manner, but this is not sustained, but is constantly stopped as above.

The "Orpheus" Suite of course returns to the story style, and hence must have a certain amount of expression. This expression, however, is very controlled, and again the instrumentation is so sparse that there is no danger of overexuberance.

Like most ballet music, this suffers from the absence of the stage action which it is supposed to illustrate, or to accompany. There are moments of beauty, but the dance airs, especially those of the Angel of Death and of the Furies, are so inexpressive and so thinly scored that they make little impression. The final Apotheosis of Orpheus fails to suggest the grandeur of the theme and closes on a note of anti-climax.

Nevertheless, there is in this and in the other recent scores on the program a fascination in the scoring, the harmonies and above all the rhythms, which, if the composer would only forget his preoccupation with technique and let himself go, might very well carry us along as the "Sacre" did and still does.

Stravinsky as conductor limits himself as always to the motions necessary to keep the orchestra accurate. But at the Friday afternoon concert he did not obtain accuracy at all times. The playing tended to be ragged. There were several false entries in the Concerto and inaccuracies elsewhere. Possibly the orchestra—though it has often played under his direction—had not adjusted itself to his beat. The audience nevertheless was enthusiastic throughout and Mr. Stravinsky was repeatedly recalled.

Museum Lecture-Concert

Music and art of the sea will be the theme of the correlated lecture and concert program at the Boston Museum of Fine Arts Sunday afternoon. Walter Muir Whitehill, director and librarian of the Boston Athenaeum, will give an illustrated lecture on Maritime Arts in the main lecture hall at 3 o'clock.

A concert of sea shanties, sung without accompaniment or harmonization by a male chorus, will follow at 4 o'clock in the Tapestry Gallery. Eliot P. Wirling, organist of the Park Street Church, Peabody, will direct. Harold Tibbetts will be the tenor soloist. The program includes short-drag shanties, halliard shanties, windlass or capstan shanties, and forecastle songs.

Lecture and concert are open free to the public.

OTTAWA, CANADA
CITIZEN
FEB 12 1949

Berkshire Festival

Plans for the Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood, Mass., were announced this week. This festival, which will be the climax of Serge Koussevitky's twenty-fifth season with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will begin on July 16 with a concert for small orchestra, presenting works by Bach, Mozart, Schubert and Haydn. Similar concerts will be given on July 17, 23 and 24. The regular concerts for full orchestra will be as follows: Series A, July 28, 30, 31; Series B, August 4, 6, 7; Series C, August, 11 13, 14. Guest conductors will be Leonard Bernstein and Eleazar de Carvalho.

HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES
FEB 12 1949

Berkshire Festival To Open at Lenox For 12th Season

The 12th annual Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood with the Boston Symphony Orchestra will open at Lenox, Mass., July 16. The festival will be the climax of Serge Koussevitsky's 25th season as conductor of the orchestra.

Nine concerts will be given in the Music Shed, through three weekends, on Thursday evenings, Saturday evenings, and Sunday afternoons. The guest conductors of the Festival will be Leonard Bernstein and Eleazar de Carvalho. Before these concerts in the large shed, Mr. Koussevitsky will conduct four concerts by a smaller orchestra in the Theater-Concert Hall. These will be given on Saturday evenings and Sunday afternoons of the two weekends, July 16-17, and July 23-24. The regular concerts will be gin July 23.

Subscribers to last year's festival may renew their tickets before the public sale begins Mar. 1. The Berkshire Music Center will hold a six weeks' session at Tanglewood from July 4 to Aug. 14, the seventh season of the school.

OAKLAND, CAL.
TRIBUNE
FEB 13 1949

accompanist.

Boston Orchestra Plans Koussevitzky Fund

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has proposed establishment of a Koussevitzky anniversary revolving fund of $250,000, to be contributed by friends of the orchestra and used "for cultural and educational development by the orchestra and as a cushion against emergencies." The fund is intended as a tribute to Serge Koussevitzky, who is retiring after 25 years as conductor of the orchestra.

MERIDEN, CONN.
RECORD
FEB 12 1949

Koussevitzky Makes Double Bass Recordings

An album of double bass recordings is soon to be released, made in 1929 by the greatest living double bass player, Serge Koussevitzky. That the cumbersome instrument is capable of more than growled bass notes and a plucked dance-band foundation, is conclusively proved by these records. So they say. The collection consists of the Andante from Mr. Koussevitzky's own Double Bass Concerto, a Largo by Eccles, and a Lullaby by Laska. The albums will be sold as souvenirs of the Twenty-fifth Anniversary season of Serge Koussevitzky as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

At the age of 17, Mr. Koussevitzky left his small town in Russia, entering the Moscow Philharmonic Society school by his incredible mastery of the double bass. He played with the ease and color of a 'cellist. For years his skill has been a legend. Hence enormous interest is attached to this forth-coming release.

DALLAS, TEXAS
NEWS
FEB

Berkshire Festival To Open in July

Special to The News

BOSTON, Mass., Feb. 12.—The Boston Symphony Orchestra announces its twelfth annual Berkshire Festival to open at Tanglewood, in Lenox, Mass., on July 16. The festival will be the climax of the twenty-fifth season of Serge Koussevitzky as the conductor of the orchestra.

Nine concerts will be given in the Music Shed, through three week ends, on Thursday evenings, Saturday evenings and Sunday afternoons (Series A on July 28, 30 and 31; Series B, Aug. 4, 6 and 7; Series C, Aug. 11, 13 and 14). The guest conductors of the festival will be Leonard Bernstein and Eleazar de Carvalho. Soloists will be announced at a later date.

The Berkshire Music Center, Serge Koussevitzky, director, will hold a six weeks' session at Tanglewood from July 4 to Aug. 14, the seventh season of the school. Information about the Music Center and the programs of the festival, when announced, may be obtained by applying to Symphony Hall, Boston 15, Mass.

NATION
NEW YORK, N. Y.
FEB 12 1949

Records

B. H. HAGGIN

BACH'S Brandenburg Concerto No. 3, one of the finest in the series, has been recorded for English Decca by the Boyd Neel String Orchestra (K-1619, $2.10). Though without the wonderful sensitiveness of the old Busch Chamber Players' performance, this one by a larger group of strings is good of its kind, and is well reproduced except for the weakness and edged quality of the violins. The same edged violin sound is heard in the recording of No. 1, a less interesting work, which the entire Boyd Neel Orchestra plays well (ED-87, $7.35).

The beautiful aria "Erbarme dich" from Bach's St. Matthew Passion is sung (in English) by Katherine Ferrier, contralto, who sang it also in the Decca set issued a year ago. On the new record (K-1465) her singing is again superb; but there is a heavy instrumental accompaniment by the National Symphony under Sargent this time, instead of the earlier sensitive playing by the Reginald Jacques Orchestra; and Ferrier's rich voice is reproduced more coarsely.

I find very little of Fauré's suave and pretty music interesting; and that little doesn't include the Piano Quartet Opus 45, which seems to be well performed by the London Belgian Piano Quartet, and is well reproduced except for the occasional brashness of the strings and weakness of the piano in loud passages (ED-74, $9.45) (the first side of my copy scrapes badly). Nor does it include the songs of "L'Horizon chimérique," which are excellently sung by Gerard Souzay, baritone, with good piano accompaniments by Jean Damase (K-1693).

The quiet portions of Franck's Three Chorales for organ contain some exquisite writing; but even this is repetitious and long-winded; in addition there are the bombastic proclamations and affirmations that are hard to take; and the episodic structure is made more difficult to bind together by the record-breaks. Dupré's performances seem good; and the recorded sound of the organ of St. Mark's Church in North Audley Street, London, is remarkably life-like but poorly balanced—the high registers appearing to come from a vast distance (ED-80, $13.65).

Beethoven's Piano Trio Opus 70 No. 1, one of his duller works, has been recorded for Columbia by the Busch-Serkin Trio (MM-804, $4.75). The trio plays well as a group; but this doesn't outweigh Adolf Busch's tone, Serkin's excessive intensity, and the shallow, brash recorded sound—to say nothing of noisy surfaces.

Haydn's Violin Concerto No. 1, an early and uninteresting work, is excellently performed by Isaac Stern with a string orchestra, and well reproduced except for a boomy bass (MM-799, $4.75).

Two excerpts from Copland's music for "Billy the Kid"—the lovely Prairie Night, and the Celebration Dance, which I don't care for—are well performed by Stokowski and the New York Philharmonic (19011-D). And Milhaud's amusing, through repetitious, "Le Boeuf sur le toit" is well done by Mitropoulos and the Minneapolis Symphony (MX-308, $3.50).

The Haydn Society of the United States, 179 Cambridge Street, Boston, announces a first recording of Haydn's

---

ROCHESTER, N. Y.
DEMOCRAT-CHRONICLE
FEB 13 1949

Berkshire Festival Announces Dates

CLIMAXING the 25th season of Serge Koussevitzky as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the orchestra announces its 12th annual Berkshire Festival to open at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass., on July 16.

Nine concerts will be given in the Music Shed through three weekends, on Thursday evenings, Saturday evenings and Sunday afternoons. Guest conductors will be Leonard Bernstein and Eleazar de Carvalho.

Before these concerts in the Music Shed by the full orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky will conduct four concerts by an orchestra of smaller proportions in the intimate Theater - Concert Hall. These concerts will be given on the Saturday evening and Sunday afternoon of two weekends, July 16-17 and July 23-24.

The Berkshire Music Center, directed by Koussevitzky, will hold a six weeks' session at Tanglewood from July 4 to Aug. 14.

CHICAGO, ILL.
TRIBUNE
1949

Tanglewood Opens July 16

The Boston Symphony orchestra has announced its 12th annual Berkshire festival to open at Tanglewood, in Lenox, Mass., July 16. The festival will be the climax of the 25th season of Serge Koussevitzky as director of the orchestra. Guest conductors will be Leonard Bernstein and Eleazar de Carvalho. Soloists will be announced.

Nine concerts will be given in the music shed, thru three week-ends, on Thursday and Saturday evenings and Sunday afternoons, July 28 thru Aug. 14. Before these concerts by the full orchestra, Mr. Koussevitzky will conduct four programs by an orchestra of smaller proportions in the intimate theater-concert hall. These will be given on the week-ends of July 16 and 23. Subscribers to last year's concerts may renew their reservations before March 1, the date when public sale begins.

The school at the Berkshire center will hold a six week session starting July 4. Information on the school, as for the public concerts, may be obtained from Symphony Hall, Boston 15, Mass.

[255]

WORCESTER, MASS.
TELEGRAM

Music

TO MAKE CHANGE AT TANGLEWOOD

By RAYMOND MORIN

The opening announcement by the Boston Symphony Orchestra of its Twelfth annual Berkshire Festival, to open at Tanglewood in Lenox on July 16, makes but one important change from last Summer's schedule.

Two different programs will be given each weekend at the preliminary concerts on Saturday evenings and Sunday afternoons, July 16-17 and July 23-24. In previous seasons, the same programs were repeated the second weekend.

Haydn and Schubert

These four concerts, which are performed by an orchestra of smaller proportions in the intimate Theater-Concert Hall, will be drawn from the music of Bach and Mozart as before, and this year music of Haydn and Schubert will be added.

Nine concerts, constituting the festival proper, will be given in the Music Shed, through three weekends, on Thursday evenings, Saturday evenings, and Sunday afternoons—(Series A on July 28, 30, and 31; Series B, Aug. 4, 6, and 7; Series C, Aug. 11, 13, and 14).

The festival will be the climax of the 25th season of Serge Koussevitzky as conductor of the Boston Symphony. The guest conductors will be Leonard Bernstein and Eleazar de Carvalho. Soloists and programs will be announced.

Subscribers to the Berkshire Festival concerts of last year will have the privilege of renewing their subscriptions before the public sale, which begins March 1. Subscribers also are offered seats to the concerts in the Theater-Concert Hall at reduced prices.

ELEAZAR DE CARVALHO

INDIANAPOLIS, IND.
STAR

FEB 13 1949

Koussevitzky Names Dates Of Festival

Boston, Mass., Feb. 1

THE BOSTON Symphony chestra has announced its 1 annual Berkshire festival to op at Tanglewood, in Lenox, Ma July 16. The festival will be t climax of the 25th season Serge Koussevitzky as the co ductor of the orchestra.

Nine concerts will be given the Music Shed, through thre week ends, on Thursday and Sat urday nights and Sunday afternoons.

Guest conductors will be Leonard Bernstein and Eleazar de Carvalho. Soloists will be announced.

BEFORE the concerts by the full orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky will conduct four performances by an ensemble of smaller proportions in the intimate Theater-Concert Hall. These concerts will be given on the Saturday nights and Sunday afternoons of two week ends, July 16-17 and July 23-24. Two different programs will be given each week end. They will be drawn from the music of Bach and Mozart, as in previous seasons. This year music of Haydn and Schubert will be added.

Subscribers to the Berkshire Festival concerts of last year will have the privilege of renewing subscriptions before public sale which begins March 1. Subscribers are also offered seats to concerts in the Theater-Concert Hal at reduced prices.

The Berkshire Music Center Serge Koussevitzky, director, wil hold a six weeks' session at Tan glewood from July 4 to Aug. 14 the seventh season of the school Information about the Musi Center and the programs of th Festival may be obtained b applying to Symphony Hall, Boston 15, Mass.

ORLANDO, FLA.
SENTINEL-STAR

FEB 14 1949

Koussevitzky On 'Magazine'

Serge Koussevitzky, famed conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, will appear on the Rollins College Animated Magazine next Sunday, Pres. Hamilton Holt announced last night.

The internationally known musician will be one of 15 distinguished contributors to "the magazine that comes alive," including Pres. Karl T. Compton of Massachusetts Institute of Technology, Seb. Paul H. Douglas of Illinois, Edward R. Murrow, radio news analyst and others.

Founders' Week program, held this year in recognition of 64 years of achievement by Rollins, will be highlighted today when six winners of the Reeve Essay Contest deliver condensed versions of their papers in the Reeve Oratorical Contest for Men at 3:30 p.m. today at a public event in Knowles Memorial Chapel.

Both essay and oratorical contests were established through the genorosity of the late Gen. Charles McCormick Reeve of Winter Park and Minneapolis. Winner today will receive the Hamilton Holt medal.

The celebration will continue at 8:15 p.m. when Olga Llano, brilliant student pianist, is presented in a recital of Spanish and Latin America music at the Woman's Club of Winter Park.

Proceeds of the recital will be devoted to the Casa Iberia scholarship fund.

An exhibition of faculty and student art will open at 2-5 p.m. and will be on view daily without charge at the Morse Gallery of Art. A special exhibit of shells also can be seen at Beal-Maltbie Museum from 10 a.m. to 5 p.m. daily.

Founders' Week will conclude next Monday morning with the Midwinter Convocation in Knowles Memorial Chapel.

Reserved seat tickets for the Animated Magazine are on sale at Annie Russell Theater 2-5 p.m. through Saturday. They can also be purchased by mail by writing Miss Chloe M. Lyle, cashier, Rollins College, enclosing $1.20 for each ticket and self-addressed envelope. There will be thousands of free seats available also.

PHOENIX, ARIZ.
GAZETTE

Dr. Koussevitzky Praises Phoenix Symphony After Rehearsal Visit

In a surprise visit last night at a rehearsal of the Phoenix Symphony Orchestra in North Phoenix High School Auditorium, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, famed conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, took over the podium of Conductor John Barnett, with arms folded in background, to praise the personnel after he had listened to their playing.

By ESTHER CLARK

A slightly built man with silvering hair slipped unobtrusively into an aisle seat of the almost-empty auditorium and was soon humming softly the melody of Rachmaninov's "Piano Concerto" being played by the Phoenix Symphony Orchestra.

Conductor John Barnett, vigorously rehearsing the players, was unaware that Dr. Serge Koussevitzky was listening last night in North Phoenix High School Auditorium.

"I want to watch them work," said the world-famous conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra before he slipped into the auditorium.

IN A WHISPERED aside to his petite wife, Olga, "They are good and that young man is a fine musician and conductor."

Sitting beside her distinguished husband, blonde Mrs. Koussevitzky smiled appreciatively at the smoothly co-ordinated results coming from Barnett's prompting baton.

Summer residents of Boston, but no longer during the Winter since they bought a desert home in the Arcadia district, they leave Phoenix tomorrow to return to the East.

"We will be back next Winter and I hope then I can begin work on my conservatory of music," said Dr. Koussevitzky, who this year concludes his 25th and final year with the Boston Symphony. He hopes to establish a music center here similar to his Tanglewood project in Massachusetts.

HIS VISIT LAST night at the rehearsal found the almost-complete complement of the Phoenix Symphony polishing up the "Piano Concerto," which is to be one of the selections on the 8:30 p. m. concert Monday in Phoenix Union High School Auditorium.

The Russian-born maestro later told Barnett that Rachmaninov was "guilty" of making him (Koussevitzky) a conductor rather than a composer.

"We played together hundreds of times in Russia and he was so much better at composing that I decided to be a conductor," explained the 75-year-old musical genius, rated by many as one of the world's two greatest conductors.

AS BARNETT prepared to dismiss his players for intermission, Dr. Koussevitzky agilely mounted the stage steps, shook hands with the 32-year-old Phoenix leader and Sidney Tretick, concert-master, and was invited by Barnett to say a few words.

Picking up Barnett's baton, he used it, not to direct but to punctuate his remarks to the orchestra, which of one accord, had stood up to salute him as he stepped on the podium.

"I have the greatest admiration for you, sacrificing much of your time to attend rehearsals and faithfully play in your concerts, since I know you must also earn a living," said the eminent conductor.

HE TOLD THEM that "music works for peace and happiness and should be supported by the government, for as man's great hope, it is more necessary than good roads and bridges."

"We shall have our school here if your community makes an effort to raise the money. I am ready to help achieve this dream and I know your excellent conductor will help," he added.

DENTON, TEXAS
RECORD-CHRONICLE

FEB 17 1949

Schoep to Sing Leading Role In F. W. Opera

Arthur Schoep, member of the voice faculty of North Texas State College, has a leading role in the Fort Worth Civic Opera Association's production of "La Boheme" on Feb. 23 and 25 in Will Rogers Memorial Auditorium.

Schoep is cast as Marcel, the romantic painter member of the foursome of young Bohemians who lived in a Paris garret. He sang with the Rochester orchestras, with the Boston Opera Company, and last summer at the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Berkshire Music Center in Rossini's "The Turk in Italy."

Four other visiting stars will appear in the production, which will be sung in English. They are Ernest Lawrence, who has appeared with leading companies from coast to coast, and who is cast as Rudolph; Ann Ayars, beautiful young New Yorker, as Mimi; Lois Hartzell of the San Francisco Opera Company, as Musetta, and Lloyd Harris of the Philadelphia and New Orleans operas, as Benoit, the landlord.

Seats are scaled at [illegible] $3.00 and $2.40, on the lower floor, and $3.000, $2.40 and $1.00 in the balcony. Ticket requests should be addressed to the Fort Worth Civic Opera Association, mezzanine floor of Meacham's, Fort Worth.

BUFFALO, N. Y.
NEWS

FEB 19 1949

* * *

Olivier Messiaen, the Parisian composer, will make his first visit to this country next Summer to join Aaron Copland as teacher of composition at the 1949 session of the Berkshire Music Center, summer school of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood Mass.

ASHEVILLE, N.C.
CITIZEN
2/20/49

Berkshire Festival Will Open July 16

NEW YORK, Feb. 19.—(UP)—The 12th annual Berkshire Festivaa will open at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass., on July 16, the Boston Symphony Orchestra announces. The festival will climax the 25th season of Serge Koussevitzky as conductor of the orchestra.

WORCESTER, MASS.
TELEGRAM

Music

TO MAKE CHANGE AT TANGLEWOOD

By RAYMOND MORIN

The opening announcement by the Boston Symphony Orchestra of its Twelfth annual Berkshire Festival, to open at Tanglewood in Lenox on July 16, makes but one important change from last Summer's schedule.

ELEAZAR DE CARVALHO

Two different programs will be given each weekend at the preliminary concerts on Saturday evenings and Sunday afternoons. July 16-17 and July 23-24. In previous seasons, the same programs were repeated the second weekend.

Haydn and Schubert

These four concerts, which are performed by an orchestra of smaller proportions in the intimate Theater-Concert Hall, will be drawn from the music of Bach and Mozart as before, and this year music of Haydn and Schubert will be added.

Nine concerts, constituting the festival proper, will be given in the Music Shed, through three weekends, on Thursday evenings, Saturday evenings, and Sunday afternoons—(Series A on July 28, 30, and 31; Series B, Aug. 4, 6, and 7; Series C, Aug. 11, 13, and 14).

The festival will be the climax of the 25th season of Serge Koussevitzky as conductor of the Boston Symphony. The guest conductors will be Leonard Bernstein and Eleazar de Carvalho. Soloists and programs will be announced.

Subscribers to the Berkshire Festival concerts of last year will have the privilege of renewing their subscriptions before the public sale, which begins March 1. Subscribers also are offered seats to the concerts in the Theater-Concert Hall at reduced prices.

INDIANAPOLIS, IND.
STAR

FEB 13 1949

Koussevitzky Names Dates Of Festival

Boston, Mass., Feb. 1

THE BOSTON Symphony chestra has announced its 1 annual Berkshire festival to op at Tanglewood, in Lenox, Ma July 16. The festival will be t climax of the 25th season Serge Koussevitzky as the co ductor of the orchestra.

Nine concerts will be given the Music Shed, through thre week ends, on Thursday and Saturday nights and Sunday after noons.

Guest conductors will be Leonard Bernstein and Eleazar de Carvalho. Soloists will be announced.

BEFORE the concerts by the full orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky will conduct four performances by an ensemble of smaller proportions in the intimate Theater-Concert Hall. These concerts will be given on the Saturday nights and Sunday afternoons of two week ends, July 16-17 and July 23-24. Two different programs will be given each week end. They will be drawn from the music of Bach and Mozart, as in previous seasons. This year music of Haydn and Schubert will be added.

Subscribers to the Berkshire Festival concerts of last year will have the privilege of renewing subscriptions before public sale which begins March 1. Subscribers are also offered seats to concerts in the Theater-Concert Hal at reduced prices.

The Berkshire Music Center Serge Koussevitzky, director, will hold a six weeks' session at Tanglewood from July 4 to Aug. 14 the seventh season of the school. Information about the Music Center and the programs of the Festival may be obtained by applying to Symphony Hall, Boston 15, Mass.

ORLANDO, FLA.
SENTINEL-STAR

FEB 14 1949

Koussevitzky On 'Magazine'

Serge Koussevitzky, famed conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, will appear on the Rollins College Animated Magazine next Sunday, Pres. Hamilton Holt announced last night.

The internationally known musician will be one of 15 distinguished contributors to "the magazine that comes alive," including Pres. Karl T. Compton of Massachusetts Institute of Technology, Seb. Paul H. Douglas of Illinois, Edward R. Murrow, radio news analyst and others.

Founders' Week program, held this year in recognition of 64 years of achievement by Rollins, will be highlighted today when six winners of the Reeve Essay Contest deliver condensed versions of their papers in the Reeve Oratorical Contest for Men at 3:30 p.m. today at a public event in Knowles Memorial Chapel.

Both essay and oratorical contests were established through the genorosity of the late Gen. Charles McCormick Reeve of Winter Park and Minneapolis. Winner today will receive the Hamilton Holt medal.

The celebration will continue at 8:15 p.m. when Olga Llano, brilliant student pianist, is presented in a recital of Spanish and Latin America music at the Woman's Club of Winter Park.

Proceeds of the recital will be devoted to the Casa Iberia scholarship fund.

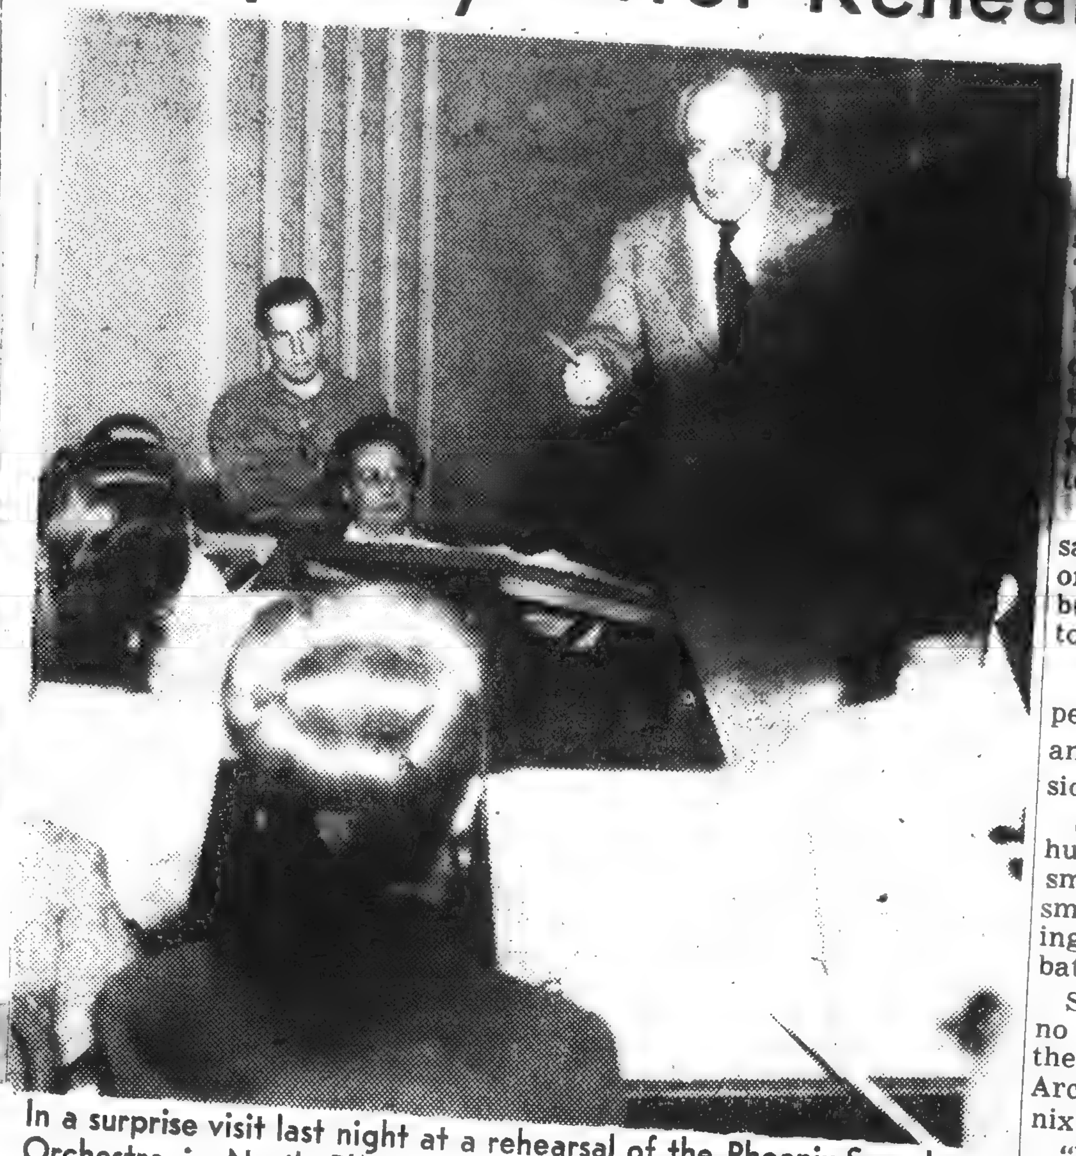
An exhibition of faculty and student art will open at 2-5 p.m. and will be on view daily without charge at the Morse Gallery of Art. A special exhibit of shells also can be seen at Beal-Maltbie Museum from 10 a.m. to 5 p.m. daily.

Founders' Week will conclude next Monday morning with the Midwinter Convocation in Knowles Memorial Chapel.

Reserved seat tickets for the Animated Magazine are on sale at Annie Russell Theater 2-5 p.m. through Saturday. They can also be purchased by mail by writing Miss Chloe M. Lyle, cashier, Rollins College, enclosing $1.20 for each ticket and self-addressed envelope. There will be thousands of free seats available also.

PHOENIX, ARIZ.
GAZETTE

Dr. Koussevitzky Praises Phoenix Symphony After Rehearsal Visit



In a surprise visit last night at a rehearsal of the Phoenix Symphony Orchestra in North Phoenix High School Auditorium, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, famed conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, took over the podium of Conductor John Barnett, with arms folded in background, to praise the personnel after he had listened to their playing.

By ESTHER CLARK

A slightly built man with silvering hair slipped unobtrusively into an aisle seat of the almost-empty auditorium and was soon humming softly the melody of Rachmaninov's "Piano Concerto" being played by the Phoenix Symphony Orchestra.

Conductor John Barnett, vigorously rehearsing the players, was unaware that Dr. Serge Koussevitzky was listening last night in North Phoenix High School Auditorium.

"I want to watch them work," said the world-famous conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra before he slipped into the auditorium.

IN A WHISPERED aside to his petite wife, Olga, "They are good and that young man is a fine musician and conductor."

Sitting beside her distinguished husband, blonde Mrs. Koussevitzky smiled appreciatively at the smoothly co-ordinated results coming from Barnett's prompting baton.

Summer residents of Boston, but no longer during the Winter since they bought a desert home in the Arcadia district, they leave Phoenix tomorrow to return to the East.

"We will be back next Winter and I hope then I can begin work on my conservatory of music," said Dr. Koussevitzky, who this year concludes his 25th and final year with the Boston Symphony. He hopes to establish a music center here similar to his Tanglewood project in Massachusetts.

HIS VISIT LAST night at the rehearsal found the almost-complete complement of the Phoenix Symphony polishing up the "Piano Concerto," which is to be one of the selections on the 8:30 p. m. concert Monday in Phoenix Union High School Auditorium.

The Russian-born maestro later told Barnett that Rachmaninov was "guilty" of making him (Koussevitzky) a conductor rather than a composer.

"We played together hundreds of times in Russia and he was so much better at composing that I decided to be a conductor," explained the 75-year-old musical genius, rated by many as one of the world's two greatest conductors.

AS BARNETT prepared to dismiss his players for intermission, Dr. Koussevitzky agilely mounted the stage steps, shook hands with the 32-year-old Phoenix leader and Sidney Tretick, concert-master, and was invited by Barnett to say a few words.

Picking up Barnett's baton, he used it, not to direct but to punctuate his remarks to the orchestra, which of one accord, had stood up to salute him as he stepped on the podium.

"I have the greatest admiration for you, sacrificing much of your time to attend rehearsals and faithfully play in your concerts, since I know you must also earn a living," said the eminent conductor.

HE TOLD THEM that "music works for peace and happiness and should be supported by the government, for as man's great hope, it is more necessary than good roads and bridges."

"We shall have our school here if your community makes an effort to raise the money. I am ready to help achieve this dream and I know your excellent conductor will help," he added.

DENTON, TEXAS
RECORD-CHRONICLE

FEB 17 1949

Schoep to Sing Leading Role In F. W. Opera

Arthur Schoep, member of the voice faculty of North Texas State College, has a leading role in the Fort Worth Civic Opera Association's production of "La Boheme" on Feb. 23 and 25 in Will Rogers Memorial Auditorium.

Schoep is cast as Marcel, the romantic painter member of the foursome of young Bohemians who lived in a Paris garret. He sang with the Rochester orchestras, with the Boston Opera Company, and last summer at the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Berkshire Music Center in Rossini's "The Turk in Italy."

Four other visiting stars will appear in the production, which will be sung in English. They are Ernest Lawrence, who has appeared with leading companies from coast to coast, and who is cast as Rudolph; Ann Ayars, beautiful young New Yorker, as Mimi; Lois Hartzell of the San Francisco Opera Company, as Musetta, and Lloyd Harris of the Philadelphia and New Orleans operas, as Benoit, the landlord.

Seats are scaled at [illegible] $3.00 and $2.40, on the lower floor, and $3.000, $2.40 and $1.00 in the balcony. Ticket requests should be addressed to the Fort Worth Civic Opera Association, mezzanine floor of Meacham's, Fort Worth.

BUFFALO, N. Y.
NEWS

FEB 19 1949

* * *

Olivier Messiaen, the Parisian composer, will make his first visit to this country next Summer to join Aaron Copland as teacher of composition at the 1949 session of the Berkshire Music Center, summer school of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood Mass.

ASHEVILLE, N.C.
CITIZEN
2/20/49

Berkshire Festival Will Open July 16

NEW YORK, Feb. 19.—(UP)—The 12th annual Berkshire Festivaa will open at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass., on July 16, the Boston Symphony Orchestra announces. The festival will climax the 25th season of Serge Koussevitzky as conductor of the [illegible].

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

FEB 1[illegible]949

STRAVINSKY LEADS OWN WORKS HERE

Conducts Boston Symphony in Program at Carnegie Hall—Son, Soulima, Is Soloist

By OLIN DOWNES

Igor Stravinsky, with his son, Soulima Stravinsky as piano soloist, conducted a program of his works with the Boston Symphony last night in Carnegie Hall. The younger Stravinsky, who in contrast to his father is a tall youth, played with great respect and precision his parent's concerto for piano and wind instruments with double bass and tympani re-enforcements. At the end of this performance a large contingent of the audience applauded long and persistently, recalling father and son to the stage.

The performance deserved this tribute—as a performance. But even the Stravinsky idolaters, for whom he can do no wrong, must on this occasion have had their fill. For the program was a long one, and for many of the dwellers in the outer darkness of incomprehension, unrewarding, as a whole, to hear.

For this listener by far the most entertaining score was the Concerto for String Orchestra, composed in Hollywood in 1946, and very nimbly written. But this work also seems to have been misunderstood. When it was finished some got up and left as if they were mad with Stravinsky for having so loosely jested with them. Whereas he had been delightful and gay as a master on a holiday might be.

The first movement of this concerto is in the clearest classical form, with themes amusing, contrasted and recapitulated. In the slow movement there is the suspicion of parody of Prokofieff of the "Classic Symphony," as also of Ravel of "La Valse" in the finale. This is light music, almost cafe music, done in perfect taste. And we have just as much respect for a master doing this kind of thing as we have when he writes a page of "Petruchka." Nor do we have to compare the two creators for their weight and thickness, either.

But the other scores? With the best will in the world it is impossible to share in encomiums lavished upon them, which seem to us affected and snobbish. The "Ode" in three parts, dedicated to the memory of the noble woman who was the first wife of Dr. Koussevitzky, and which he commissioned Stravinsky to compose, is nevertheless, musically speaking, unimportant.

The concerto, of which we heard the world première when Stravinsky himself played the piano part at a Koussevitzky concert in Paris in the spring of 1924, does not grow with acquaintance, which includes several performances of the work since heard on this side of the water. The combination of the wind instruments and the piano may be novel in its dryness and metallicism; it does not make the piece living music. The ingredients of Bach and jazz may also be very smart; the piece grinds on, profusely and laboriously contrived, and the very apotheosis of the insignificant.

Last came the suite from the ballet, "Orpheus," composed in Hollywood in 1947, and introduced here by the Ballet Society at the City Center in April of last year. It has fine pages, lofty of utterance, and so impressing on the listener in the concert room. But this score does not stand on its own feet, as earlier scores of ballet music by Stravinsky do. It cries out, it needs to be explained and justified by the stage action.

The audience listened with obvious respect and attention to Mr. Stravinsky though enth[illegible] was not undivided. La[illegible] program was changed. [illegible]rtaining Capriccio for [illegible]rchestra originally in [illegible], will be played by Soul[illegible] Boston Symphony ma[illegible] Saturday, whe[illegible] Mr. [illegible]ky will again be the guest leader.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
POST
HOME NEWS

FEB 17 1949

Music...

The Two Stravinsky's With Boston Symphony

By HARRIETT JOHNSON

For its third excursion to New York this season, the Boston Symphony featured an All-Stravinsky Concert last night in Carnegie Hall, an event which also was something of a family affair. Composer Irgo Stravinsky was on the podium, and his son, Soulima Stravinsky, made his New York debut as piano soloist in the "Concerto for Piano and Wind Orchestra," (with double basses and timpani).

The elder Stravinsky, looking slim, trim and at least 15 years younger than his 66 score, was the conscientious and efficient arbiter of four of his works.

First on the list was the ode in three parts, for orchestra, composed for the Koussevitzky Music Foundation, and dedicated to the memory of Mme. Natalie Koussevitzky. Its first performance was by the Boston ensemble in 1943. The "Wind" Concerto, composed during 1923-'24, followed. After the intermission came the "Concerto in D" for string orchestra dated "Hollywood, August 8, 1946," a lively score, uncontaminated by the atmosphere surrounding its creation. No one could accuse Mr. Stravinsky of setting down one bar in either this piece or the Orpheus ballet music which followed (dated "Hollywood, Sept. 23, 1947"), that had any resemblance to conventional lush movie-score sound.

This initial appearance of the "Orpheus" music apart from the ballet, however, left one listener with grave doubts regarding its validity as a piece for the concer hall. In the theatre, combine with Balanchine's arresting choreography and Noguchi's in-spired decor, the music becam an effective adjunct to the whole.

Heard on its own, however, th score's lack of melodic, dynami and rhythmic contrast becomes bugbear for concentration, considering that it takes a generou 35 minutes to perform.

When one compares this es teric music with the earthy vita ity and spontaneous contrasts such ballet music as "Petrouc ka" and the "Sacre de Pri temps," composed over 30 yea ago, it is obvious that the co poser, in abrogating his form style and techniques, is demat ing a revolution from the e habits of his audie[illegible]

The younger Stravinsky, So lima, blond and taller than short, sprightly fat[illegible] was competent soloist in the [illegible]rto for piano and wind instruments. Composed along ensemble lines, the solo part is not a virtuoso piece in any sense. The pianist performed with technical skill and understanding of the music's requirements.

KINGSTON, N. Y.
FREEMAN

FEB 17 194[illegible]

Berkshire Festival Plans

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has announced its 12th annual Berkshire Festival to open at Tanglewood, in Lenox, Mass., July 16. The festival will be the climax of the 25th season of Serge Koussevitzky as the conductor of the orchestra.

Nine concerts will be given in the Music Shed, through three week-ends, Thursday evenings, Saturday evenings, and Sunday afternoons, July 28, 30, and 31; August 4, 6, 7, 11, 13, and 14. The guest conductors of the festival will be Leonard Bernstein and Eleanor de Carvalho. Soloists will be announced. Before these concerts in the large Music Shed by the full orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky will conduct four concerts by an orchestra of smaller proportion in the intimate Threatre-Concert Hall. These concerts will be given on the Saturday evening and Sunday afternoon of two week-ends, July 16-17, and July 23-24. Two different programs will be given each week-end. They will be drawn from the music of Bach and Mozart, as in previous seasons, and this year music of Haydn and Schubert will be added.

The Berkshire Music Center, Serge Koussevitzky, director, will hold a six weeks' session at Tanglewood from July 4 to August 14, the seventh season of the school. Information about the Music Center and the programs of the festival, when announced, may be obtained by applying to Symphony Hall, Boston 15, Mass.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE

FEB 17 1949

MUSIC

By VIRGIL THOMSON

John Brook, Boston

Soulima Stravinsky (left), pianist, was the soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with his father, Igor Stravinsky (right), conducting a program of his own music

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, concert of Igor Stravinsky's music conducted by the composer, last night at Carnegie Hall. Soloist: Soulima Stravinsky, pianist. The program:

Ode in Three Parts, for Orchestra
Concerto for Piano and Wind Orchestra (with Double-Basses)
Concerto in D for String Orchestra
Orpheus, Ballet in Three [illegible]

Stiffly Conducted

STRAVINSKY'S [illegible] Orpheus" had not been [illegible] here as a concert piece [illegible] the composer conducted it last [illegible] Carnegie Hall. When Ballet Society produced the work last season the score made a deep impression on musicians. At last night's performance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra it struck this musician as a deeply rewarding work and one of the masterpieces.

* * *

Dominated at all times by the strings of the orchestra, its sonorous variety is nevertheless rich. Constantly static of harmony and rhythm, it evokes action, all the same, as well as feeling. Wholly diatonic in style, it has a melodious grace appropriate and a simple charm that are just right for a subject out of classical mythology. Mostly the music is slow, too; but from beginning to end it is all so interesting, so full of expressive life, that monotony is at no point present. A magical sort of work it is, because it creates a spell. That spell resembles a little the mood of Satie's "Socrate." The whole air around becomes at once motionless and vibrant. "Orpheus" is surely one of the great Stravinsky scores.

* * *

The Concerto in D for String Orchestra, usually considered a minor work, delighted all by its jollity and animation. Indeed, it was the only piece that Mr. Stravinsky led last night with any ease. Perhaps his lively way with it explains its happy reception. In any case, it was the one moment of the evening when fun got loose The other works were all tragic of theme; and they were tightly, laboriously led.

Soulima Stravinsky, playing the twenty-five-year-old Piano Concerto, read it correctly, gave us the notes. Igor Stravinsky, conducting it, somehow squeezed all the life out of it with his stubborn and hesitant beat. The same was true in the Ode, which began the program. Granted that three sad pieces and one jolly one do not make an ideal menu, I think the great man was not in his best form. He let his sonorities thicken unblended and his phrases bog down from lack of afflatus. Nothing moved along, except the String Concerto. Many, discouraged, left the hall.

CAROL, 20, SCORES IN VIOLIN PROGRAM

Making Debut at Town Hall, He Displays Interpretative and Technical Adeptness

By NOEL STRAUS

Extraordinary gifts as technician and interpreter were disclosed by Norman Carol, 20-year-old violinist from Philadelphia, at his first New York recital last night in Town Hall. For the last two years the remarkable young musician has been a member of the first violin section of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, a post offered him by Serge Koussevitzky after he had won the John Hancock Scholarship Award in a nation-wide audition held by that organization and its conductor. In 1946 and 1947 he was concertmaster of the principal student orchestra at Tanglewood, and also appeared with it as soloist.

Despite his youth, Mr. Carol played all of his varied offerings with a positive grasp of style, depth of insight and skill of finger and bow awaited only from a completely mature artist. His work was noteworthy for its refinement of feeling, its poetry and imagination. He possessed a sonorous, warm tone, which remained pure even in the most exacting passages and [illegible] employed with the subtlest [illegible]gradations. His intonation was secure and proved unusually reliable in the uppermost "positions." In every respect, indeed, his performances, which invariably gripped the attention, were worthy of the highest praise.

Handel Sonata Is First

Handel's Sonata in E major, which opened the program, was delivered with fine comprehension of its classic character. The Andante and Largo were expertly differentiated in mood, the corner movements admirable in their verve and rhythmic allure. Every phrase was deftly shaped and meaningful in a reading hardly to be improved upon for expressiveness and musicality.

As immaculately clean was the performance of the "Symphonie Espagnole" of Lalo, in which the sensuous, exotic nature of the music could not have been more knowingly captured. The technical exactions of the display piece were met with surprising ease and accuracy, the flying passagework in the first and last divisions being outstanding in merit, and the entire work noteworthy for charm and depth of expressiveness.

As a rule the unaccompanied suites and sonatas of Bach are boring for the average listener. But there was not a moment in the seven pieces making up the Partita in E major which was not a joy to hear in Mr. Carol's singularly rewarding account of them. Seldom is this work played with such immaculate beauty of tone, such absolute technical mastery, or so keen an understanding of its poetry. This was a most masterly achievement, from any point of view, with its highly perfected treatment of double and manifold stopping and all other mechanical hedges and its unfailing ability to hold the attention.

Paganini Pieces Well Done

Mr. Carol turned from this superb accomplishment to the widely contrasted field of Paganini's "Caprices," Nos. 20 and 24, in which he was as signally at home. In the latter of these exorbitantly demanding selections he made light of the legato octaves, the speedy thirds and tenths, the harmonics and alternating passages for bowed and pizzicato notes, all of which were not only splendidly negotiated but fell into their appointed place in a most colorful and wholely satisfying interpretation of the variations. As virtuosic was the playing of the "Caprice," No. 20, with its fascinating lyricism in the opening measures, and its dazzling treatment of the middle part with the lofty octaves.

Erich Itor Kahn provided excellent support at the piano for Mr. Carol's contributions, which also included the Chopin-Milstein "Nocturne" in C sharp minor and Sarasate's "Zigeuner[illegible]" The recital must go on record as one of the finest heard from any new young artist of the season to date.

PITTSFIELD, MASS.
BERKSHIRE EAGLE

Plans Released For School At Tanglewood

Parisian Joins Faculty—Shaw Granted Leave

TANGLEWOOD—Serge Koussevitzky has announced plans for the 1949 season of the Berkshire Music Center, the summer school of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Lenox. The Music Center will have a six-week session from July 4 to Aug. 14, through the period of the Berkshire Festival Concerts (July 16 to Aug. 14) which will climax Dr. Koussevitzky's 25th anniversary season.

Dr. Koussevitzky will direct the school with Aaron Copland as assistant director. Additions to the faculty include Olivier Messiaen, the Parisian composer, who will make his first visit to America to join Aaron Copland as teacher of composition. The members of the Juilliard String Quartet (Robert Mann, Robert Koff, Raphael Hillyer and Arthur Winograd) will assist Gregor Piatigorsky, who will be in charge of chamber music. Twenty-five members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will also function in this department. Among the faculty, together with the principals of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will be Leonard Bernstein, Richard Burgin and Eleaze[illegible] Carvalho, assisting Dr. Koussevitzky in the conducting classes an[illegible] the student orchestra. Hugh Ross will head the choral [illegible] Robert Shaw, regularly [illegible] of the choral faculty, [illegible] leave of absence. Mr. Ross [illegible] joined by Christopher Honaas, head of the music department of Rollins College in Winter Park, Fla.

There will be five departments as in former seasons: Orchestral and choral conducting; orchestra and chamber music; composition; opera; chorus. The opera department will include an expanded opera and chamber orchestra which will perform for the [illegible] productions and will [illegible] from the chamber orches[illegible]toire. There will be [illegible] performances, including [illegible] all the departments, by [illegible] the faculty, and visiting a[illegible] a major opera produc[illegible] the direction of Boris Goldovsky [illegible] the tradition of Benjamin Britten's "Peter Grimes" (American premiere in 1946), Mozart's "Idomeneo" (American premiere in 1947) and Rossini's "The Turk in Italy" (1948). Members of the Friends of the Berkshire Music Center, an organization of contribu[illegible] support of the school [illegible] to these concerts.

The Berkshire [illegible] in 1940 by [illegible]vitzky and is established [illegible] sponsorship of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in conne[illegible] the concerts of the Berkshire Festival.

Information about the Music Center and the Berkshire Festival may be secured by writing the Berkshire Music Center, Symphony Hall, Boston 15.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

FEB 17 1949

STRAVINSKY LEADS OWN WORKS HERE

Conducts Boston Symphony in Program at Carnegie Hall—Son, Soulima, Is Soloist

By OLIN DOWNES

Igor Stravinsky, with his son, Soulima Stravinsky as piano soloist, conducted a program of his works with the Boston Symphony last night in ~~Carnegie Hall.~~ The younger Stravinsky, who in contrast to his father is a tall youth, played with great respect and precision his parent's concerto for piano and wind instruments with double bass and tympani re-enforcements. At the end of this performance a large contingent of the audience applauded long and persistently, recalling father and son to the stage.

The performance deserved this tribute—as a performance. But even the Stravinsky idolaters, for whom he can do no wrong, must on this occasion have had their fill. For the program was a long one, and for many of the dwellers in the outer darkness of incomprehension, unrewarding, as a whole, to hear.

For this listener by far the most entertaining score was the Concerto for String Orchestra, composed in Hollywood in 1946, and very nimbly written. But this work also seems to have been misunderstood. When it was finished some got up and left as if they were mad with Stravinsky for having so loosely jested with them. Whereas he had been delightful and gay as a master on a holiday might be.

The first movement of this concerto is in the clearest classical form, with themes amusing, contrasted and recapitulated. In the slow movement there is the suspicion of parody of Prokofieff of the "Classic Symphony," as also of Ravel of "La Valse" in the finale. This is light music, almost cafe music, done in perfect taste. And we have just as much respect for a master doing this kind of thing as we have when he writes a page of "Petruchka." Nor do we have to compare the two creators for their weight and thickness, either.

But the other scores? With the best will in the world it is impossible to share in encomiums lavished upon them, which seem to us affected and snobbish. The "Ode" in three parts, dedicated to the memory of the noble woman who was the first wife of Dr. Koussevitzky, and which he commissioned Stravinsky to compose, is nevertheless, musically speaking, unimportant.

The concerto, of which we heard the world première when Stravinsky himself played the piano part at a Koussevitzky concert in Paris in the spring of 1924, does not grow with acquaintance, which includes several performances of the work since heard on this side of the water. The combination of the wind instruments and the piano may be novel in its dryness and metallicism; it does not make the piece living music. The ingredients of Bach and jazz may also be very smart; the piece grinds on, profusely and laboriously contrived, and the very apotheosis of the insignificant.

Last came the suite from the ballet, "Orpheus," composed in Hollywood in 1947, and introduced here by the Ballet Society at the City Center in April of last year. It has fine pages, lofty of utterance, and so impressing on the listener in the concert room. But this score does not stand on its own feet, as earlier scores of ballet music by Stravinsky do. It cries out, it needs to be explained and justified by the stage action.

The audience listened with obvious respect and attention to Mr. Stravinsky though enthusiasm was not undivided. La[illegible] program was changed. [illegible]taining Capriccio for [illegible] orchestra originally in [illegible], will be played by Soul[illegible] Boston Symphony mat[illegible] Saturday, when Mr. Stra[illegible]y will again be the guest leader.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
POST
HOME NEWS
FEB 17 1949

Music...

The Two Stravinsky's With Boston Symphony

By HARRIETT JOHNSON

For its third excursion to New York this season, the Boston Symphony featured an All-Stravinsky Concert last night in Carnegie Hall, an event which also was something of a family affair. Composer Irgo Stravinsky was on the podium, and his son, Soulima Stravinsky, made his New York debut as piano soloist in the "Concerto for Piano and Wind Orchestra," (with double basses and timpani).

The elder Stravinsky, looking slim, trim and at least 15 years younger than his 66 score, was the conscientious and efficient arbiter of four of his works.

First on the list was the ode in three parts, for orchestra, composed for the Koussevitzky Music Foundation, and dedicated to the memory of Mme. Natalie Koussevitzky. Its first performance was by the Boston ensemble in 1943. The "Wind" Concerto, composed during 1923-'24, followed. After the intermission came the "Concerto in D" for string orchestra dated "Hollywood, August 8, 1946," a lively score, uncontaminated by the atmosphere surrounding its creation. No one could accuse Mr. Stravinsky of setting down one bar in either this piece or the Orpheus ballet music which followed (dated "Hollywood, Sept. 23, 1947"), that had any resemblance to conventional lush movie-score sound.

This initial appearance of the "Orpheus" music apart from the ballet, however, left one listener with grave doubts regarding its validity as a piece for the concert hall. In the theatre, combined with Balanchine's arresting choreography and Noguchi's inspired decor, the music became an effective adjunct to the whole.

Heard on its own, however, the score's lack of melodic, dynamic and rhythmic contrast becomes a bugbear for concentration, considering that it takes a generous 35 minutes to perform.

When one compares this esoteric music with the earthy vitality and spontaneous contrasts of such ballet music as "Petrouchka" and the "Sacre de Printemps," composed over 30 years ago, it is obvious that the composer, in abrogating his former style and techniques, is demanding a revolution from the ear habits of his audience.

The younger Stravinsky, Soulima, blond and taller than his short, sprightly father, was competent soloist in the concerto for piano and wind instruments. Composed along ensemble lines, the solo part is not a virtuoso piece in any sense. The pianist performed with technical skill and understanding of the music's requirements.

KINGSTON, N. Y.
FREEMAN
FEB 17 194[illegible]

Berkshire Festival Plans

The ~~Boston Symphony~~ Orchestra has announced its ~~12th~~ annual Berkshire Festival to open at Tanglewood, in Lenox, Mass., July 16. The festival will be the climax of the 25th season of Serge Koussevitsky as the conductor of the orchestra.

Nine concerts will be given in the Music Shed, through three week-ends, Thursday evenings, Saturday evenings, and Sunday afternoons, July 28, 30, and 31; August 4, 6, 7, 11, 13, and 14. The guest conductors of the festival will be Leonard Bernstein and Eleanor de Carvalho. Soloists will be announced. Before these concerts in the large Music Shed by the full orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky will conduct four concerts by an orchestra of smaller proportion in the intimate Threatre-Concert Hall. These concerts will be given on the Saturday evening and Sunday afternoon of two week-ends, July 16-17, and July 23-24. Two different programs will be given each week-end. They will be drawn from the music of Bach and Mozart, as in previous seasons, and this year music of Haydn and Schubert will be added.

The Berkshire Music Center, Serge Koussevitzky, director, will hold a six weeks' session at Tanglewood from July 4 to August 14, the seventh season of the school. Information about the Music Center and the programs of the festival, when announced, may be obtained by applying to Symphony Hall, Boston 15, Mass.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE
FEB 17 1949

MUSIC

By VIRGIL THOMSON

John Brook, Boston

Soulima Stravinsky (left), pianist, was the soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with his father, Igor Stravinsky (~~right), con~~ducting a program of his own music

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, concert of Igor Stravinsky's music conducted by the composer, last night at Carnegie Hall. Soloist: Soulima Stravinsky, pianist. The program:
Ode in Three Parts, for Orchestra
Concerto for Piano and Wind Orchestra (with Double-Basses)
Concerto in D for String Orchestra
Orpheus, Ballet in Three [illegible]

Stiffly Conduct[illegible]

STRAVINSKY'S ballet "Orpheus" had not been heard here as a concert piece till the composer conducted it last night in Carnegie Hall. When Ballet Society produced the work last season the score made a deep impression on musicians. At last night's performance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra it struck this musician as a deeply rewarding work and one of the masterpieces.

* * *

Dominated at all times by the trings of the orchestra, its sonoous variety is nevertheless rich. onstantly static of harmony and hythm, it evokes action, all the ime, as well as feeling. Wholly iatonic in style, it has a melodious race appropriate and a simple harm that are just right for a ubject out of classical mythology. ostly the music is slow, too; but om beginning to end it is all so teresting, so full of expressive e, that monotony is at no point esent. A magical sort of work it because it creates a spell. That ll resembles a little the mood of Satie's "Socrate." The whole air around becomes at once motionless and vibrant. "Orpheus" is surely one of the great Stravinsky scores.

* * *

The Concerto in D for String Orchestra, usually considered a minor work, delighted all by its jollity and animation. Indeed, it was the only piece that Mr. Stravinsky led last night with any ease. Perhaps his lively way with it explains its happy reception. In any case, it was the one moment of the evening when fun got loose The other works were all tragic of theme; and they were tightly, laboriously led.

Soulima Stravinsky, playing the twenty-five-year-old Piano Concerto, read it correctly, gave us the notes. Igor Stravinsky, conducting it, somehow squeezed all the life out of it with his stubborn and hesitant beat. The same was true in the Ode, which began the program. Granted that three sad pieces and one jolly one do not make an ideal menu, I think the great man was not in his best form. He let his sonorities thicken unblended and his phrases bog down from lack of afflatus. Nothing moved along, except the String Concerto. Many, discouraged, left the hall.

CAROL, 20, SCORES IN VIOLIN PROGRAM

Making Debut at Town Hall, He Displays Interpretative and Technical Adeptness

By NOEL STRAUS

Extraordinary gifts as technician and interpreter were disclosed by Norman Carol, 20-year-old violinist from Philadelphia, at his first New York recital last night in Town Hall. For the last two years the remarkable young musician has been a member of the first violin section of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, a post offered him by Serge Koussevitzky after he had won the John Hancock Scholarship Award in a nation-wide audition held by that organization and its conductor. In 1946 and 1947 he was concertmaster of the principal student orchestra at Tanglewood, and also appeared with it as soloist.

Despite his youth, Mr. Carol played all of his varied offerings with a positive grasp of style, depth of insight and skill of finger and bow awaited only from a completely mature artist. His work was noteworthy for its refinement of feeling, its poetry and imagination. He possessed a sonorous, warm tone, which remained pure even in the most exacting passages and was employed with the subtlest of gradations. His intonation was secure and proved unusually reliable in the uppermost "positions." In every respect, indeed, his performances, which invariably gripped the attention, were worthy of the highest praise.

Handel Sonata Is First

Handel's Sonata in E major, which opened the program, was delivered with fine comprehension of its classic character. The Andante and Largo were expertly differentiated in mood, the corner movements admirable in their verve and rhythmic allure. Every phrase was deftly shaped and meaningful in a reading hardly to be improved upon for expressiveness and musicality.

As immaculately clean was the performance of the "Symphonie Espagnole" of Lalo, in which the sensuous, exotic nature of the music could not have been more knowingly captured. The technical exactions of the display piece were met with surprising ease and accuracy, the flying passagework in the first and last divisions being outstanding in merit, and the entire work noteworthy for charm and depth of expressiveness.

As a rule the unaccompanied suites and sonatas of Bach are boring for the average listener. But there was not a moment in the seven pieces making up the Partita in E major which was not a joy to hear in Mr. Carol's singularly rewarding account of them. Seldom is this work played with such immaculate beauty of tone, such absolute technical mastery, or so keen an understanding of its poetry. This was a most masterly achievement, from any point of view, with its highly perfected treatment of double and manifold stopping and all other mechanical hedges and its unfailing ability to hold the attention.

Paganini Pieces Well Done

Mr. Carol turned from this superb accomplishment to the widely contrasted field of Paganini's "Capríces," Nos. 20 and 24, in which he was as signally at home. In the latter of these exorbitantly demanding selections he made light of the legato octaves, the speedy thirds and tenths, the harmonics and alternating passages for bowed and pizzicato notes, all of which were not only splendidly negotiated but fell into their appointed place in a most colorful and wholely satisfying interpretation of the variations. As virtuosic was the playing of the "Caprice," No. 20, with its fascinating lyricism in the opening measures, and its dazzling treatment of the middle part with the lofty octaves.

Erich Itor Kahn provided excellent support at the piano for Mr. Carol's contributions, which also included the Chopin-Milstein "Nocturne" in C sharp minor and Sarasate's "Zigeunerweisen." The recital must go on record as one of the finest heard from any new young artist of the season to date.

PITTSFIELD, MASS.
BERKSHIRE EAGLE

Plans Released For School At Tanglewood

Parisian Joins Faculty—Shaw Granted Leave

TANGLEWOOD—Serge Koussevitzky has announced plans for the 1949 season of the Berkshire Music Center, the summer school of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Lenox. The Music Center will have a six-week session from July 4 to Aug. 14, through the period of the Berkshire Festival Concerts (July 16 to Aug. 14) which will climax Dr. Koussevitzky's 25th anniversary season.

Dr. Koussevitzky will direct the school with Aaron Copland as assistant director. Additions to the faculty include Olivier Messiaen, the Parisian composer, who will make his first visit to America to join Aaron Copland as teacher of composition. The members of the Juilliard String Quartet (Robert Mann, Robert Koff, Raphael Hillyer and Arthur Winograd) will assist Gregor Piatigorsky, who will be in charge of chamber music. Twenty-five members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will also function in this department. Among the faculty, together with the principals of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will be Leonard Bernstein, Richard Burgin and Eleazar de Carvalho, assisting Dr. Koussevitzky in the conducting class [illegible] the student orchestra. Hugh Ross will head the choral department [illegible] Robert Shaw, regularly [illegible] of the choral faculty, [illegible] leave of absence. Mr. Ross [illegible] joined by Christopher Honaas, [illegible] of the music department of Rollins College in Winter Park, Fla.

There will be five departments as in former seasons: Orchestral and choral conducting; orchestra and chamber music; composition; opera; chorus. The opera department will include an extended opera and chamber orchestra which will perform for [illegible] productions and will [illegible] from the chamber [illegible] toire. [illegible] performances [illegible] all the departments [illegible] the faculty, and visiting [illegible] a major opera production [illegible] the direction of Boris Goldovsky [illegible] the tradition of Benjamin Britten's "Peter Grimes" (American premiere in 1946), Mozart's "Idomeneo" (American premiere in 1947) and Rossini's "The Turk in Italy" (1948). Members of the Friends of the Berkshire Music Center, an organization of contributors [illegible] support of the [illegible] to these concerts [illegible] The Berkshire [illegible] founded in 1940 by [illegible] and is established [illegible] sponsorship of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in connection with the concerts of the Berkshire Festival.

Information about the Music Center and the Berkshire Festival may be secured by writing the Berkshire Music Center, Symphony Hall, Boston 15.

[257]

NEW YORK, N. Y.
SUN
FEB 17 1949

The Music Makers

By IRVING KOLODIN

Stravinsky and Son Soulima in Carnegie—'Pelleas' Returns.

Igor Stravinsky, as pater familias, presided over several generations of descendants at last night's concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall. In nearer relationship were some spiritual offerings of the composer's last decade or so; at a greater distance in time was his physical descendant, Soulima, as piano soloist in the concerto of 1924. Many other progeny—by named "Firebird," "Petrouchka," "Sacre du Printemps"—who have long since grown up, no longer need a helping hand to make their way in the world.

IRVING KOLODIN

Before one embarks on an expansion of the idea that it is the duller children of which a parent is always most fond, a look at last night's program may be in order. It was all-Stravinsky, not merely in the sense that he composed all of the works, but rather more because no one else could have written any of them; the simple, expressive "Ode" dedicated to Nathalie Koussevitzky; the lightly learned "Concerto" ("Basle") for strings; the dry, sometimes fernetic but never actually exciting "Piano Concerto" with wind instruments, tympani and double basses accompaniment; and the score of the "Orpheus" ballet, first given here last spring.

Complete ballet scores, as concert pieces, are ever a treacherous business; Stravinsky himself has written most of the handful which can stand the exposure. I would not say that this one adds to the total, imaginative as some of its sections are, and tender and poetic. But "Orpheus" is not a ballet d'action so much as it is a ballet Balanchine, which means that much of it must be seen to be believed, and there is then no assurance it will be. "Orpheus," as a subject, is of itself a special challenge to a composer, since the subject involved is music, and the power of music to be persuasive, on a life or death level. In its proper relationship, I think much of "Orpheus" is—with subtlety, with an archaic grace, and an expressive idiom of remarkable economy. But much else of it is time rather than ear-filling, of little aural appeal, and especially not after a preceding hour and a half by the same composer.

Of the concerto, there is little new to be said. It is work of willful purpose, to prove that the percussive piano, the "orchestre d'harmonie" (or wind band) and the pungent bass plus tympani, can live together without blessing of the string clergy. I find the conceit for a while novel, and then labored. Some of its rhythmic wiles are engaging, and Stravinsky, fils, performed the piano part crisply and with facility if with rather shallow tone. A note in passing on the "Basle" concerto: the composer's treatment—neatly drawn, full of compact detail and sly phrasings—rather refuted his own established attitude that such a work does not require "interpretation." Perhaps it doesn't, of the conventional kind; but is not this highly systematized sort as m[illegible] interpretation? In any [illegible] the score sounded infinitely [illegible] than it has from other [illegible] The orchestral work [illegible] was impecc[illegible] response full of g[illegible]

NEW YORK, N. Y.
JOURNAL AMERICAN
FEB 17 1949

Stravinskys Concert Guests

By MILES KASTENDIECK

Life with the Stravinskys got a public hearing in Carnegie Hall last night. Father and son appeared as guests of the Boston Symphony. Father conducted his own music. Son appeared as piano soloist in one of his father's works.

The Stravinsky "cult" may have been transported with so noble an evening of music. The staid B. S. audience responded slowly. It applauded the "Ode in Three Parts" and the "Concerto for Piano and Wind Orchestra" politely. It found the "Concerto in D for String Orchestra" more to its liking. The first local concert performance of "Orpheus, Ballet in Three Scenes" topped the evening.

For the initiated, the elementary rhythm that pulsates through all the music gives it vitality. In the first half that was about all the appeal an average concertgoer could find. The intellectual aspect was of the ivory-towered sort.

With the concerto for string orchestra, the music acquires more content. It even picks up a melodic line that has some flow. The admirable workmanship then counts for something.

With the ballet music, however, Stravinsky finds himself, and incidentally, an audience. Writing with a programatic background apparently brings his "inspiration" into focus.

The "Orpheus" has been heard here at the City Center Ballet performances and appraised as one of his finest scores in many years. It proved so again last night.

Stravinsky is still not his best interpreter even with the Boston Symphony. His son is a well-equipped, accomplished pianist who needs more than his father's concerto to disclose his full talent. He handled it with due appreciation for the effectiveness of percussiveness and got a hand for a neatly turned performance.

* * *

"Pelleas" Returns

"Pelleas and Melisande" was adequately revived at the Metropolitan last night, no more no less. It served to introduce the tenor, Jacques Jansen, who made a good impression vocally, a fair one stylistically, and a static one dramatically. Elen Dosia as Melisande proved to be earth-bound in her calculated aloofness.

Emil Cooper's straight-forward account of the score may well have contributed to the lack of poetry and intensity so necessary to a proper interpretation. This was a plodding performance, lightened by John Brownlee's Golaud and Nicola Moscona's Arkel.

MANCHESTER, N. H.
UNION
FEB-13 1949

Lyons

Last Sunday, after an absence of more than a year, Jascha Heifetz returned to the concert stage in a recital at Boston's Symphony Hall. The concert was attended by many members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who were deeply moved by the performance. A delegation visited Heifetz in the Artists Room later, and as an expression of their feeling they arrived with a waste-basket full of their own fiddles.

LEONARD LYONS.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
FEB 18 1949

HERE'S A MUSICIAN WHO LOVES HIS JOB

And De Carvalho, Conductor, Will Prove It, Too, Commuting Between Cleveland and City

Special to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

BOSTON, Feb. 17—Eleazar de Carvalho, Brazilian conductor who will lead the Boston Symphony Orchestra in four concerts next week, completed a flying itinerary today that will enable him to commute between New York and Cleveland, almost daily, for the first two weeks of March, on his next two assignments.

After conducting the Boston Orchestra in his closing engagement on Feb. 27, Mr. de Carvalho will fly to Cleveland for a rehearsal with that city's symphony orchestra for the next day. He will be guest conductor during the vacation of George Szell.

On March 2 Mr. de Carvalho will be in New York as an instructor at the Juilliard School of Music. He then will fly back to Cleveland for his first performance on March 3. The next day he will be in New York again for one day, then fly to Cleveland for his second performance, March 5.

After rehearsing the Cleveland Orchestra on each of the next three days, the Brazilian will fly to New York for a Juilliard School appearance on March 9, and will be due in Cleveland once more for performances March 10 and 12..

PASSAIC, N. J.
HERALD-NEWS
FEB 18 1949

Stravinskys, Father and Son, in Notable Performance with Boston Symphony

By Ford Baker

Igor Stravinsky conducted a thoroughly satisfying concert of his own and other Russian music at the Mosque Theatre last night. At 67, he has a ballet master's agility and a mobile conducting technique that brought out the best in the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Soloist on the program was Mr. Stravinsky's son, Soulima and it is problematic if anyone else could play with such brilliance the piano solo part of the composer's "capriccio" programmed last night. The number was perhaps the only part of the program that was in the modern vein in which you wait vainly for a melody to evolve that you can follow.

Strangely enough, a lilting waltz evolved from the tortuous rhythms of the capriccio that was reminiscent only in its attack of Ravel's "La Valse". Syncopated material suitable for a modern jazz number came out of the rhythmic study and there was no question that the younger Stravinsky's "nose-in-the-keys" technique was brilliant and exact.

A sprightly evening started off with the Glinka overture to "Russlan and Ludmilla" at a fast, bright clip. Tschaikovsky's Second Symphony was more of a technical study, despite its haunting first-movement theme than the more famous fifth and sixth symphonies. It put the string sections to their finest effort and the final monumental movement had much of the impact of Moussorgsky's heavier work.

The final number on the program, a "divertimento" from the Stravinsky's allegorical ballet "Le Basier de La Fee" seemed a concession to the balletomanes in the audience as well as those who need to hook up their classical with modern music. It was charming, tuneful and lilting, and included a rollicking bit of a waltz in the Swiss manner, complete with yodels and the "umppah" of a tuba. Best of all, the woodman's theme from "Peter and the Wolf" showed up strongly in the score with excellent scoring in the woodwinds and brass.

The concert was part of the 68th season of the Griffith Music Foundation.

NEWARK, N. J.
~~CALL~~
News
18 1949

Stravinsky Conducts

Musical Genius Leads Boston Symphony in Griffith Event at the Mosque

BY ALAN BRANIGAN

More than 3,000 music lovers gained a first hand acquaintance with one of the great musical geniuses of the day, Igor Stravinsky, last night at the Mosque. Some of them may have come away from the encounter a bit puzzled, but none, it is safe to say, failed to be impressed and more than a bit dazzled.

Stravinsky, wiry, intense and worried looking, appeared as guest conductor of the Boston Symphony, taking the place of the soon-to-retire Serge Koussevitzky. The concert was the first of two the Bostonians will give here under Griffith Music Foundation auspices, both being welcome parts of the foundation's first symphonic series. The project to date has been one of unusual accomplishment and it is hoped that the Griffith forces feel encouraged to continue the same way next year.

Except for the first composition on the program, the evening was devoted to strange music. The opening work was Glinka's "Russlan and Ludmilla," one of the earliest of the Russian masterpieces which used the country's folk idioms with success. The piece was fairly uneventful, except as an introduction to Stravinsky's sparse, self-effacing and highly efficient conductorial approach.

The first of the unfamiliar works came from the pen of a most familiar composer, Tschaikowsky. Given its only performance here in recent memory was the Slavic master's Symphony No. 2 in C Minor, known to its adherents as the "Little Russian" symphony. (The first is subtitled "Winter Reverie" and the third is the "Polish," if anybody is interested.)

Formality

One felt little difficulty in determining why the Symphony No. 2 has remained obscure. It is pleasant enough music. The first movement, the only undistinguished one, is dry and formal. But it is followed by an Andantino of great charm, a rollicking sort of scherzo and a finale full of vitality stemming from a bumptious peasant tune, all quite fetching.

But the orchestral means are the sign of betrayal; for here Tschaikowsky obviously is trying out the instrumental tricks that were to serve him far better in the fourth, fifth and sixth symphonies. It is interesting to see a great talent in the process of developing, but not necessarily thrilling.

The Stravinsky works that followed were far more fascinating. First came the famous "Capriccio" for piano and orchestra, with the piano solo played by Igor's son Soulima in a brisk, non-expressive manner that suited the music to perfection. The composition is a concerto grosso, following the old Italian pattern in form but far different in its modern harmonic dress.

The sounds were sweetly provocative and whimsical throughout. The occasional dissonance could have discomforted only the unduly touchy. The chamber orchestra used in the work was a model of clarity as well as a collective instrument of amazing skill considering the difficult music it essayed.

Fantasy

The final number was a suite from Stravinsky's affecting and evocative ballet, "The Kiss of the Fairy," played with full orchestra. The composition is a highly developed takeoff of Tschaikowsky's ballet style of, say, "Aurora's Wedding." All the sugary sentiment is there in the themes, but the orchestral dress is a flashing fantasy of bizarre colorings.

Of especial note was a prolonged dissection of Peter Ilytch's "Hopak," carried out humorously. Some of the string passages were of the utmost loveliness. And throughout Stravinsky crouched and weaved on the podium, bringing his music to life with almost maternal care.

The orchestra's performance, as might be expected of the Boston, was absolutely beyond cavil.

GLENS FALLS, N. Y.
POST STAR
FEB 12 1949

The fifth series of Orchestras of the Nation programs (NBC, Saturday, 3 P. M., EST) was launched Dec. 18 by the Minneapolis Symphony under its regular conductor, Dimitri Mitropoulos. This year, Samuel Chotzinoff, NBC general music director, has announced the most extensive schedule so far. Most of the 22 concerts by orchestras from as many cities will be concerned with a series under the sub-title Pioneers of Music, originated and planned by Ernest La Prade. These programs will trace the development of music through its pioneers and innovators in 17 concerts, starting Feb. 18.

The twelfth annual Berkshire Music Festival will open at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass., on July 16, it was announced yesterday. Serge Koussevitzky will conduct the Boston Symphony in the usual three series of major concerts in the Music Shed, with the assistance of Leonard Bernstein and Eleazar de Carvalho, guest conductors.

Concerts will begin on July 16, when Mr. Koussevitzky leads the first of two pairs of small concerts in the Theatre-Concert Hall. These Saturday evening-Sunday afternoon programs will consist of music by Bach, Mozart, Haydn and Schubert. The major series begins July 28 and concludes Aug. 14.

Last year's subscribers will have a chance to renew their subscriptions before the public sale begins on March 1.

The Berkshire Music Center's six-week session will run from July 4 to Aug. 14. Information may be had from Symphony Hall, Boston 15, Mass.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE
FEB 19 1949

Boston Symphony Plays At Brooklyn Academy

A capacity audience welcomed the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night at the third concert of their current Brooklyn season in the opera house of the Brooklyn Academy of Music.

The program was given over entirely to works by Igor Stravinsky, with the composer appearing as guest conductor. Heard in the program was the Concerto in D for Spring Orchestra, the Capriccio for Piano and Orchestra, the Ode in Three Parts, for Orchestra, and the "Orpheus," ballet in three scenes. The piano soloist in the capriccio was Soulima Stravinsky, son of the composer.

The fourth concert of the orchestra's 1948-1949 series in Brooklyn, will take place on Friday evening, Mar. 18. The series is presented each season under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences [illegible] in cooperation with the Philharmonic Society of Brooklyn and the Brooklyn Committee for the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE

FEB 19 1949

MUSIC

By Paul Affelder

Stravinsky and His Son Are Featured In Boston Symphony's 3d Concert Here

For the Boston Symphony Orchestra's third concert of the season at the Academy of Music last evening, it brought along Igor Stravinsky as guest conductor and his son, Soulima, as piano soloist. The program was all-Stravinsky and included the Ode in Three Parts, the Capriccio for Piano and Orchestra, the Concerto in D for String Orchestra and the music for the ballet, "Orpheus."

In the entire realm of music there are barely a handful of composers whose works will stand up under a whole evening of scrutiny. Stravinsky is not one of them. The average listener requires greater variety and greater inventiveness than he can glean from the music of this composer, as varied and gifted as he may be.

Perhaps, if he had elected to include on his program at least one of his early ballet scores, such as "The Fire Bird" or "Petrouchka"—even "Le Sacre du Printemps"—the concert might have been more appealing.

We understand that when Mr. Stravinsky presented a similar program with the orchestra at Carnegie Hall on Wednesday there was a steady exodus of subscribers. The Brooklyn audience last night remained very attentive but this reviewer is one of those who would have liked to leave long before the end.

By far the most interesting and rewarding work on the program was the Concert for String Orchestra, composed in Hollywood in 1946. It follows roughly the form of the classic concerto grosso, with a few solo instruments pitted against the main body of strings. The first movement is brisk, with an abundance of syncopation; the middle movement has a rather rich melodic character that is reminiscent of Viennese music, and the finale is fast moving. It was given a clean, tightly knit performance.

The earlier Capriccio is not an overly inspired piece but the two Stravinskys have a way with this music and it emerged as a work of rather intimate portions, much in the manner of a chamber concerto. Soulima played crisply and with great clarity, blending his solo part admirably with the orchestra.

The Ode, written in memory of Mme. Natalie Koussevitzky, the Boston conductor's first wife, bears up better with repeated hearings, but, even now, interest in it begins to wane after the nobility of the opening movement.

Earlier this season we were highly pleased with the presentation of "Orpheus" in ballet form at the City Center. When the music is divorced from the stage action, however, it loses all its meaning. It seemed last night as if an accompaniment were being played without the all-important soloist. Stripped of its visual counterpart the score, written mostly for slow-moving, subdued strings, sounds inordinately dull.

PORTLAND, ME.
SUNDAY TELEGRAM

FEB 20

Berkshire Center Adds To Faculty

Boston, Feb. 19. (AP) — Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, today announced Olivier Messiaen, noted Parisian composer, will be on the faculty of the Berkshire Music Center.

The Center will have a six-week season from July 4 to Aug. 14. Messiaen, making his first visit to America, will join Aaron Copland as teacher of composition.

Doctor Koussevitzky, founder of the Center, now in its tenth season, will direct the school, with Copland as assistant. There will be five departments as in former seasons.

The famed Berkshire Festival concerts will be given July 16 to Aug. 14.

ELMIRA, N. Y.
TELEGRAM

—World of Music—

Berkshire Festival Opens July 16

—United Press—

New York—(UP)—The 12th annual Berkshire Festival will open at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass., on July 16, the Boston Symphony Orchestra announces. The festival will climax the 25th season of Serge Koussevitzky as conductor of the orchestra.

Nine concerts will be given in the Tanglewood music shed through three weekends, on Thursday evenings, Saturday evenings and Sunday afternoons (series A on July 28, 30, and 31; series B Aug. 4, 6 and 7; series C, Aug. 11 13, and 14). The guest conductors of the festival will be Leonard Bernstein and Eleazar de Carvalho. Soloists will be announced.

Before the concerts in the large music shed by the full orchestra Dr. Koussevitzy will conduct four concerts by a smaller orchestra in the intimate theater-concert hall. These concerts will be given on the Saturday evening and Sunday afternoon of two weekends, July 16-17, and July 23-24. Two different programs will be given each weekend. They will be drawn from the music of Bach and Mozart, as in previous seasons, and this year music of Haydn and Schubert will be added.

SCRANTON, PA.
SCRANTONIAN

FEB

The World Of Music

The 12th annual Berkshire Festival will open at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass., on July 16, the Boston Symphony Orchestra announces. The festival will climax the 25th season of Serge Koussevitzky as conductor of the orchestra.

Nine concerts will be given in the Tanglewood music shed, through three week-ends, on Thursday evenings, Saturday evenings, and Sunday afternoons (series A on July 28, 30 and 31; series B, August 4, 6 and 7; series C, August 11, 13 and 14). The guest conductors of the festival will be Leonard Bernstein and Eleazar de Carvalho. Soloists will be announced.

Before the concerts in the large music shed by the full orchestra Dr. Koussevitzky will conduct four concerts by a smaller orchestra in the intimate theater-concert hall. These concerts will be given on the Saturday evening and Sunday afternoon of two week-ends, July 16-17, and July 23-24. Two different programs will be given each week-end. They will be drawn from the music of Zach and Mozart, as in previous seasons, and this year music af Hayden and Schubert will be added.

In connection with the Koussevitzky anniversary, the Boston Orchestra has arranged with RCA Victor to distribute a souvenir album of double bass recordings made by Dr. Koussevitzky in 1929, when he played for the last time the instrument which first brought him fame. The album containing three vinylite records will be sold for $10 each. All proceeds will go to the Koussevitzky anniversary fund of the orchestra.

NEW HAVEN, CONN.
REGISTER

FEB 20 1949

ON BERKSHIRE FACULTY

Boston, Feb. 19 —(AP)— Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, today announced Olivier Messiaen, noted Parisian composer, will be on the faculty of the Berkshire Music Center. The Center will have a six-week season from July 4 to August 14. Messiaen, making his first visit to America, will join Aaron Copland as teacher of composition.

TROY, N. Y.
OBSERVER & BUDGET

FEB 20 1949

WORLD OF MUSIC

Berkshire Festival To Open With Concert of July 16— Edinburgh Announces Plans for This Summer's Session

NEW YORK (UP)—The 12th annual Bershire Festival will open at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass., on July 16, the Boston Symphony Orchestra announces. The festival will climax the 25th season of Serge Koussevitzky, as conductor of the orchestra.

Nine concerts will be given in the Tanglewood music shed, through three week ends, on Thursday evenings, Saturday evenings and Sunday afternoon (series A on July 28, 30 and 31; series B, Aug. 4, 6, and 7; series C, Aug. 11, 13 and 14). The guest conductors of the festival will be Leonard Bernstein and Eleazar de Carvalho. Soloists will be announced.

Before the concerts in the large music shed by the full orchestra Dr. Koussevitzky will conduct four concerts by a smaller orchestra in the intimate theater concert hall. These concerts will be given on the Saturday evening and Sunday afternoon of two week-ends, July 16-17, and July 23-24. Two different programs will be given each week-end. They will be drawn from the music of Bach and Mozart, as in previous seasons, and this year music of Haydn and Schubert will be added.

In connection with the Koussevitzky anniversary, the Boston Orchestra has arranged with RCA Victor to distribute a souvenir album of double bass recordings made by Dr. Koussevitzky in 1929 when he played for the last time the instrument which first brought him fame. The album, containing three vinylite records, will be sold for $10 each. All proceeds will go to the Koussevitzky anniversary fund of the orchestra.

WATERBURY, CONN.
REPUBLICAN

FEB 19 1949

Messiaen To Join Staff Of Berkshire Center

Boston, Feb. 19—(AP)—Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, today announced Olivier Messiaen, noted Parisian composer, will be on the faculty of the Berkshire Music Center.

The center will have a six-week season from July 4 to Aug. 14. Messiaen, making his first visit to America, will join Aaron Copland as teacher of composition.

Dr. Koussevitzky, founder of the center, now in its 10th season, will direct the school with Copland as assistant. There will be five departments as in former seasons.

The famed Berkshire Festival concerts will be given July 16 to Aug. 14.

ST. LOUIS, MO.
POST DISPATCH

20 1949

MUSIC SCHOLARSHIP AUDITION

A scholarship to the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood, Mass., will be awarded to the orchestral-instrument player selected at an audition to be held Mar. 19 at noon at Kiel Auditorium, it was announced yesterday by the Women's Association of the St. Louis Symphony Orchestra, sponsors of the program.

The scholarship will cover tuition and room and board for a six-week course at Tanglewood. The school is operated by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Applications must be sent to Mrs. James C. Bassford, [illegible] West Pine Boulevard. Residents of the St. Louis area 19 years or older are eligible.

INDIANAPOLIS, IND.
TIMES

FEB 20 1949

Berkshire Fete To Honor Koussevitzky

Festival Climaxes 25th Season For Conductor

NEW YORK, Feb. 19 (UP)—The 12th annual Berkshire Festival will open at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass., on July 16, the Boston Symphony Orchestra announces. The festival will climax the 25th season of Serge Koussevitzky as conductor of the orchestra.

Nine concerts will be given in the Tanglewood music shed, through three week-ends, on Thursday evenings, Saturday evenings, and Sunday afternoons (series A on July 28, 30, and 31; series B, Aug. 4, 6, and 7; series C, Aug. 11, 13, and 14). The guest conductors of the festival will be Leonard Bernstein and Eleazar de Carvalho. Soloists will be announced.

Before the concerts in the large music shed by the full orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky will conduct four concerts by a smaller orchestra in the intimate theater-concert hall.

Offer Album

These concerts will be given on the Saturday evening and Sunday afternoon of two week-ends, July 16-17, and July 23-24.

Two different programs will be given each week-end. They will be drawn from the music of Bach and Mozart, as in previous seasons, and this year music of Haydn and Schubert will be added.

In connection with the Koussevitzky anniversary, the Boston Orchestra has arranged with RCA Victor to distribute a souvenir album made by Dr. Koussevitzky in 1929, when he played for the last time the instrument which first brought him fame.

The album, containing three vinylite records, will be sold for $10 each. All proceeds will go to the Koussevitzky anniversary fund of the orchestra.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

FEB 20 1949

DONATES MUSIC TO ISRAEL

Koussevitzky Gives Scores From His Library to University

Serge Koussevitzky, retiring conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has donated a large part of his personal library of orchestral scores to the Hebrew University in Jerusalem, it was announced yesterday. It is to serve as the nucleus of a library known as the Koussevitzky collection.

The library will make scores of orchestral and chamber music available to musical organizations and individuals throughout Israel. The announcement added that a sponsors' committee is being formed, and that donations of scores and parts will be accepted at the Hebrew University House, 9 East Eighty-ninth Street.

TULSA, OKLA.
WORLD

Berkshire Music Festival July 16

NEW YORK, Feb. 19 (U.P.)—The 12th annual Berkshire Festival will open at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass., on July 16, the Boston Symphony Orchestra announces. The festival will climax the 25th season of Serge Koussevitzky as conductor of the orchestra.

Nine concerts will be given in the Tanglewood music shed, through three weekends, on Thursday evenings, Saturday evenings, and Sunday afternoons (series A on July 28, 30 and 31; series B, Aug. 4, 6 and 7; series C, Aug. 11, 13 and 14). The guest conductors of the festival will be Leonard Bernstein and Eleazar de Carvalho. Soloists will be announced.

Before the concerts in the large music shed by the full orchestra Dr. Koussevitzky will conduct four concerts by a smaller orchestra in the intimate theater-concert hall. These concerts will be given on the Saturday evening and Sunday afternoon of two weekends, July 16-17, and July 23-24. Two different programs will be given each weekend. They will be drawn from the music of Bach and Mozart, as in previous seasons, and this year music of Haydn and Schubert will be added.

In connection with the Koussevitzky anniversary, the Boston orchestra has arranged with RCA-Victor to distribute a souvenir album of double bass recordings made by Dr. Koussevitzky in 1929, when he played for the last time the instrument which first brought him fame. The album, containing three vinylite records, will be sold for $10 each. All proceeds will go to the Koussevitzky anniversary fund of the orchestra.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

FEB 20 1949

MESSIAEN WILL TEACH AT BERKSHIRE CENTER

Olivier Messiaen, noted French composer, will make his first visit to this country to teach at the 1949 session of the Berkshire Music Center, it was announced yesterday. He will teach with Aaron Copland, the school's assistant director. The term runs from July 4 to Aug. 14.

Other additions to the faculty include members of the Juilliard String Quartet, who will assist Gregor Piatigorsky in the chamber music department, and Christopher Honaas, head of the music department of Rollins College, who will assist Hugh Ross in the choral department while Robert Shaw is on leave of absence.

Leonard Bernstein, Richard Burgin and Eleazar de Carvalho will assist Serge Koussevitzky in the conducting classes. There will be five departments: orchestral and choral conducting, orchestra and chamber music, composition, opera and chorus. About forty concerts are planned by students, faculty and visiting performers, as well as an opera production.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

FEB 20 1949

STRAVINSKY WORKS HEARD

He Leads Boston Orchestra With Son Again as Piano Soloist

Igor Stravinsky conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a program of his own compositions, for the third time this week, at Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon. His son, Soulima, was again soloist, this time in the Capriccio for Piano and Orchestra.

The work brims with light-hearted figuration which sounded grateful and witty in the hands of Soulima. He made the most of the demands for clean, dry tone, evoked a singing quality in the few spots where it was needed, and produced some staccato chords of a surprisingly gutty quality in the slow movement. The rhythmically (and even melodically) jazz-like last movement might have benefited from a less dead-pan rendition. The orchestra responded well to Stravinsky père's concise beat.

The remainder of the event was devoted to the Ode in Three Parts, the Concerto in D for String Orchestra and the melodious music to the ballet, "Orpheus." A number of listeners left the hall during the last work.

C. H.

[259]

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE

FEB 19 1949

MUSIC

By Paul Affelder

Stravinsky and His Son Are Featured In Boston Symphony's 3d Concert Here

For the Boston Symphony Orchestra's third concert of the season at the Academy of Music last evening, it brought along Igor Stravinsky as guest conductor and his son, Soulima, as piano soloist. The program was all-Stravinsky and included the Ode in Three Parts, the Capriccio for Piano and Orchestra, the Concerto in D for String Orchestra and the music for the ballet, "Orpheus."

In the entire realm of music there are barely a handful of composers whose works will stand up under a whole evening of scrutiny. Stravinsky is not one of them. The average listener requires greater variety and greater inventiveness than he can glean from the music of this composer, as varied and gifted as he may be.

Perhaps, if he had elected to include on his program at least one of his early ballet scores, such as "The Fire Bird" or "Petrouchka"—even "Le Sacre du Printemps"—the concert might have been more appealing.

We understand that when Mr. Stravinsky presented a similar program with the orchestra at Carnegie Hall on Wednesday there was a steady exodus of subscribers. The Brooklyn audience last night remained very attentive but this reviewer is one of those who would have liked to leave long before the end.

By far the most interesting and rewarding work on the program was the Concert for String Orchestra, composed in Hollywood in 1946. It follows roughly the form of the classic concerto grosso, with a few solo instruments pitted against the main body of strings. The first movement is brisk, with an abundance of syncopation; the middle movement has a rather rich melodic character that is reminiscent of Viennese music, and the finale is fast moving. It was given a clean, tightly knit performance.

The earlier Capriccio is not an overly inspired piece but the two Stravinskys have a way with this music and it emerged as a work of rather intimate portions, much in the manner of a chamber concerto. Soulima played crisply and with great clarity, blending his solo part admirably with the orchestra.

The Ode, written in memory of Mme. Natalie Koussevitzky, the Boston conductor's first wife, bears up better with repeated hearings, but, even now interest in it begins to wane aft er the nobility of the opening movement.

Earlier this season we wer highly pleased with the presen tation of "Orpheus" in balle form at the City Center. Whe the music is divorced from th stage action, however, it lose all its meaning. It seemed la night as if an accompanime were being played without th all-important soloist. Stripp of its visual counterpart th score, written mostly for slo moving, subdued strings, soun inordinately dull.

PORTLAND, ME.
SUNDAY TELEGRAM

FEB [illegible]

Berkshire Center Adds To Faculty

Boston, Feb. 19. (AP) — Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, today announced Olivier Messiaen, noted Parisian composer, will be on the faculty of the Berkshire Music Center.

The Center will have a six-week season from July 4 to Aug. 14. Messiaen, making his first visit to America, will join Aaron Copland as teacher of composition.

Doctor Koussevitzky, founder of the Center, now in its tenth season, will direct the school, with Copland as assistant. There will be five departments as in former seasons.

The famed Berkshire Festival concerts will be given July 16 to Aug. 14.

ELMIRA, N. Y.
TELEGRAM

[illegible] 1949

—World of Music—

Berkshire Festival Opens July 16

—United Press—

New York—(UP)—The 12th annual Berkshire Festival will open at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass., on July 16, the Boston Symphony Orchestra announces. The festival will climax the 25th season of Serge Koussevitzky as conductor of the orchestra.

Nine concerts will be given in the Tanglewood music shed through three weekends, on Thursday evenings, Saturday evenings and Sunday afternoons (series A on July 28, 30, and 31; series B Aug. 4, 6 and 7; series C, Aug. 11, 13, and 14). The guest conductors of the festival will be Leonard Bernstein and Eleazar de Carvalho. Soloists will be announced.

Before the concerts in the large music shed by the full orchestra Dr. Koussevitzy will conduct four concerts by a smaller orchestra in the intimate theater-concert hall. These concerts will be given on the Saturday evening and Sunday afternoon of two weekends, July 16-17, and July 23-24. Two different programs will be given each weekend. They will be drawn from the music of Bach and Mozart, as in previous seasons, and this year music of Haydn and Schubert will be added.

SCRANTON, PA.
SCRANTONIAN

FEB 20 1949

The World Of Music

The 12th annual Berkshire Festival will open at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass., on July 16, the Boston Symphony Orchestra announces. The festival will climax the 25th season of Serge Koussevitzky as conductor of the orchestra.

Nine concerts will be given in the Tanglewood music shed, through three week-ends, on Thursday evenings, Saturday evenings, and Sunday afternoons (series A on July 28, 30 and 31; series B, August 4, 6 and 7; series C, August 11, 13 and 14). The guest conductors of the festival will be Leonard Bernstein and Eleazar de Carvalho. Soloists will be announced.

Before the concerts in the large music shed by the full orchestra Dr. Koussevitzky will conduct four concerts by a smaller orchestra in the intimate theater-concert hall. These concerts will be given on the Saturday evening and Sunday afternoon of two week-ends, July 16-17, and July 23-24. Two different programs will be given each week-end. They will be drawn from the music of Zach and Mozart, as in previous seasons, and this year music af Hayden and Schubert will be added.

In connection with the Koussevitzky anniversary, the Boston Orchestra has arranged with RCA Victor to distribute a souvenir album of double bass recordings made by Dr. Koussevitzky in 1929, when he played for the last time the instrument which first brought him fame. The album, containing three vinylite records, will be sold for $10 each. All proceeds will go to the Koussevitzky anniversary fund of the orchestra.

NEW HAVEN, CONN.
REGISTER

FEB 20 1949

ON BERKSHIRE FACULTY

Boston, Feb. 19 —(AP)— Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, today announced Olivier Messiaen, noted Parisian composer, will be on the faculty of the Berkshire Music Center. The Center will have a six-week season from July 4 to August 14. Messiaen, making his first visit to America, will join Aaron Copland as teacher of composition.

TROY, N. Y.
OBSERVER & BUDGET

FEB 20 1949

WORLD OF MUSIC

Berkshire Festival To Open With Concert of July 16—Edinburgh Announces Plans for This Summer's Session

NEW YORK UP)—The 12th annual Bershire Festival will open at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass., on July 16, the Boston Symphony Orchestra announces. The festival will climax the 25th season of Serge Koussevitzky, as conductor of the orchestra.

Nine concerts will be given in the Tanglewood music shed, through thre week ends, on Thursday evengs, Saturday evenings, and Sunday afternoons (series A on July 28, 30 and 31; series B, Aug. 4, 6, and 7; series C, Aug. 11, 13 and 14). The guest conductors of the festival will be Leonard Bernstein and Eleazar de Carvalho. Soloists will be announced.

Before the concerts in the large music shed by the full orchestra Dr. Koussevitzky will conduct four concerts by a smaller orchestra in the intimate theater concert hall. These concerts wil lbe given on the Saturday evening and Sunday afternoon of two week-ends, July 16-17, and July 23-24. Two different programs will be given each week-end. They will be drawn from the music of Bach and Mozart, as in previous seasons. and this year music of Haydn and Schubert will be added.

In connection with the Koussevitzky anniversary, the Boston Orchestra has arranged with RCA Victor to distribute a souvenir album of double bass recordings made by Dr. Koussevitzky in 1929, when he played for the last time the instrument which first brought him fame. The album, containing three vinylite records, will be sold for $10 each. All proceeds will go to the Koussevitzky anniversary fund o fthe orchestra.

WATERBURY, CONN.
REPUBLICAN

FEB 20 1949

Messiaen To Join Staff Of Berkshire Center

Boston, Feb. 19—(AP)—Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, today announced Olivier Messiaen, noted Parisian composer, will be on the faculty of the Berkshire Music Center.

The center will have a six-week season from July 4 to Aug. 14. Messiaen, making his first visit to America, will join Aaron Copland as teacher of composition.

Dr. Koussevitzky, founder of the center, now in its 10th season, will direct the school with Copland as assistant. There will be five departments as in former seasons.

The famed Berkshire Festival concerts will be given July 16 to Aug. 14.

ST. LOUIS, MO.
POST DISPATCH

FEB 20 1949

MUSIC SCHOLARSHIP AUDITION

A scholarship to the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood, Mass., will be awarded to the orchestral-instrument player selected at an audition to be held Mar. 19 at noon at Kiel Auditorium, it was announced yesterday by the Women's Association of the St. Louis Symphony Orchestra, sponsors of the program.

The scholarship will cover tuition and room and board for a six-week course at Tanglewood. The school is operated by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Applications must be sent to Mrs. James C. Bassford, [illegible] West Pine Boulevard. Residents of the St. Louis area 19 years or older are eligible.

INDIANAPOLIS, IND.
TIMES

FEB 20 1949

Berkshire Fete To Honor Koussevitzky

Festival Climaxes 25th Season For Conductor

NEW YORK, Feb. 19 (UP)—The 12th annual Berkshire Festival will open at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass., on July 16, the Boston Symphony Orchestra announces. The festival will climax the 25th season of Serge Koussevitzky as conductor of the orchestra.

Nine concerts will be given in the Tanglewood music shed, through three week-ends, on Thursday evenings, Saturday evenings, and Sunday afternoons (series A on July 28, 30, and 31; series B, Aug. 4, 6, and 7; series C, Aug. 11, 13, and 14). The guest conductors of the festival will be Leonard Bernstein and Eleazar de Carvalho. Soloists will be announced.

Before the concerts in the large music shed by the full orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky will conduct four concerts by a smaller orchestra in the intimate theater-concert hall.

Offer Album

These concerts will be given on the Saturday evening and Sunday afternoon of two week-ends, July 16-17, and July 23-24.

Two different programs will be given each week-end. They will be drawn from the music of Bach and Mozart, as in previous seasons, and this year music of Haydn and Schubert will be added.

In connection with the Koussevitzky anniversary, the Boston Orchestra has arranged with RCA Victor to distribute a souvenir album made by Dr. Koussevitzky in 1929, when he played for the last time the instrument which first brought him fame.

The album, containing three vinylite records, will be sold for $10 each. All proceeds will go to the Koussevitzky anniversary fund of the orchestra.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

FEB 20 1949

DONATES MUSIC TO ISRAEL

Koussevitzky Gives Scores From His Library to University

Serge Koussevitzky, retiring conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has donated a large part of his personal library of orchestral scores to the Hebrew University in Jerusalem, it was announced yesterday. It is to serve as the nucleus of a library known as the Koussevitzky collection.

The library will make scores of orchestral and chamber music available to musical organizations and individuals throughout Israel. The announcement added that a sponsoring committee is being formed and that donations of scores and parts will be accepted at the Hebrew University House, 9 East Eighty-ninth Street.

TULSA, OKLA.
WORLD

Berkshire Music Festival July 16

NEW YORK, Feb. 19 (U.P.)—The 12th annual Berkshire Festival will open at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass., on July 16, the Boston Symphony Orchestra announces. The festival will climax the 25th season of Serge Koussevitzky as conductor of the orchestra.

Nine concerts will be given in the Tanglewood music shed, through three weekends, on Thursday evenings, Saturday evenings, and Sunday afternoons (series A on July 28, 30 and 31; series B, Aug. 4, 6 and 7; series C, Aug. 11, 13 and 14). The guest conductors of the festival will be Leonard Bernstein and Eleazar de Carvalho. Soloists will be announced.

Before the concerts in the large music shed by the full orchestra Dr. Koussevitzky will conduct four concerts by a smaller orchestra in the intimate theater-concert hall. These concerts will be given on the Saturday evening and Sunday afternoon of two weekends, July 16-17, and July 23-24. Two different programs will be given each weekend. They will be drawn from the music of Bach and Mozart, as in previous seasons, and this year music of Haydn and Schubert will be added.

In connection with the Koussevitzky anniversary, the Boston orchestra has arranged with RCA-Victor to distribute a souvenir album of double bass recordings made by Dr. Koussevitzky in 1929, when he played for the last time the instrument which first brought him fame. The album, containing three vinylite records, will be sold for $10 each. All proceeds will go to the Koussevitzky anniversary fund of the orchestra.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

FEB 20 1949

MESSIAEN WILL TEACH AT BERKSHIRE CENTER

Olivier Messiaen, noted French composer, will make his first visit to this country to teach at the 1949 session of the Berkshire Music Center, it was announced yesterday. He will teach with Aaron Copland, the school's assistant director. The term runs from July 4 to Aug. 14.

Other additions to the faculty include members of the Juilliard String Quartet, who will assist Gregor Piatigorsky in the chamber music department, and Christopher Honaas, head of the music department of Rollins College, who will assist Hugh Ross in the choral department while Robert Shaw is on leave of absence.

Leonard Bernstein, Richard Burgin and Eleazar de Carvalho will assist Serge Koussevitzky in the conducting classes. There will be five departments: orchestral and choral conducting, orchestra and chamber music, composition, opera and chorus. About forty concerts are planned by students, faculty and visiting performers, as well as an opera production.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

FEB 20 1949

STRAVINSKY WORKS HEARD

He Leads Boston Orchestra With Son Again as Piano Soloist

Igor Stravinsky conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a program of his own compositions, for the third time this week, at Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon. His son, Soulima, was again soloist, this time in the Capriccio for Piano and Orchestra.

The work brims with lighthearted figuration which sounded grateful and witty in the hands of Soulima. He made the most of the demands for clean, dry tone, evoked a singing quality in the few spots where it was needed, and produced some staccato chords of a surprisingly gutty quality in the slow movement. The rhythmically (and even melodically) jazz-like last movement might have benefited from a less dead-pan rendition. The orchestra responded well to Stravinsky père's concise beat.

The remainder of the event was devoted to the Ode in Three Parts, the Concerto in D for String Orchestra and the melodious music to the ballet, "Orpheus." A number of listeners left the hall during the last work.

C. H.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE

FEB 20 1949

Messiaen Will Be on Faculty At Tanglewood

French Composer to Make His First American Visit This July and August

[illegible] Messiaen, the French [illegible] has accepted the invitation [illegible] Berkshire Music Center [illegible] composition instruction [illegible] Copland during the six-week session ex[illegible] July 4 to Aug. 14. [illegible] assistant to Serge [illegible] in the direction of the [illegible] early on the compo[illegible] of the school at Tan[illegible] Lenox, Mass., and each [illegible] by another com[illegible] from foreign musi[illegible] of foreign ori[illegible] national reputation, [illegible] was Darius Mil[illegible] be Mr. Messiaen's [illegible] this country.

[illegible] members of the [illegible] Orchestra and [illegible] of the Juilliard [illegible] assist in the depart[illegible] chamber music, which [illegible] directed by Gregor [illegible] Hugh Ross will head [illegible] choral department. Since Robert Shaw, who will take a [illegible] of absence next summer, will [illegible] be there to share with him, [illegible] in the past, the choral duties, [illegible] Ross will be assisted by Chris[illegible] Honaas, head of the music department of Rollins College.

[illegible] Bernstein, Richard [illegible] and Eleazor de Carvalho [illegible] be on the faculty to [illegible] Dr. Koussevitzky in the conducting classes and with the student orchestra. The opera department this year will have a chamber orchestra, allowing it to expand its activities. In addition to some forty concerts to be sponsored specifically by the school as distinct from the Berkshire Festival, there will be the annual major opera performance under the direction of Boris Goldovsky. These concerts are open to students and the Friends of the Berkshire Music Center.

This will be the seventh season of the school, which was established by Dr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony in 1940 and was suspended during the war. As before, the Berkshire Festival concerts will be held during the school session, namely, from July 16 to Aug. 14, and will climax Dr. Koussevitsky's twenty-fifth anniversary season.

ST. LOUIS, MO.
GLOBE DEMOCRAT

FEB 20 [illegible]

Berkshire Scholarship Auditions March 19

A scholarship to the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood Mass., will be awarded to an orchestral-instrument player to be selected at auditions March 19 at Kiel Auditorium, the Women's Association of the St. Louis Symphony Society, sponsor of the program, announced yesterday.

Residents of the St. Louis metropolitan area, 18 years or older, ar eligible. The music center's standards are such that only advanced students or young professionals are urged to apply.

Z. Serge Koussevitzky directs the school operated by the Boston Symphony Society, with world-famous musicians as instructors.

Applications must be sent by March 14 to Mrs. James C. Bassford, 4954 West Pine, and contain the applicant's name, age, address, a listing of all schools attended and names of private teachers.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

FEB 22 1949

NEGRO LEADER HAILED BY ROLLINS COLLEGE

Special to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

WINTER PARK, Fla., Feb. 21—Rollins College awarded the honorary degree of Doctor of Humanities to Mrs. Mary McLeod Bethune, one of the nation's leading Negroes, at its midwinter convocation today.

It is believed that this is the first time an honorary degree has been conferred on a Negro by a white college in the South.

Degrees were conferred also on President Karl T. Compton of Massachusetts Institute of Technology; Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra; Edward R. Murrow, CBS news analyst; Paul E. Stillman of Glendale, Calif., publisher; Albert J. McCartney, director of the Chicago Sunday Evening Club, and Leonard H. Dyer and Eugene R. Smith of Winter Park.

The Algeron Sydney Sullivan Medallion, for outstanding character, was awarded to Cynthia Eastwood, assistant to the dean of Rollins, and posthumously to Dr. Edwin L. Clarke, nationally known sociologist, who died last September.

Mrs. Bethune, founder and president-emeritus of Bethune Cookman College of Daytona Beach, is founder and present president and director of the National Council of Negro Women and has been named as one of the fifty greatest living American women.

CINCINNATI, O.
ENQUIRER

[illegible] 1949

Koussevitzky Makes Plans For 12th Berkshire Season

NEW YORK, Feb. 19—(UP)—The 12th annual Berkshire Festival will open at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass., on July 16, the Boston Symphony Orchestra announces. The festival will climax the 25th season of Serge Koussevitzky as conductor of the orchestra.

Nine concerts will be given in the Tanglewood music shed through three week ends, on Thursday evenings, Saturday evenings, and Sunday afternoons (series A on July 28, 30 and 31; series B, August 4, 6 and 7; series C, August 11, 13 and 14). The guest conductors of the festival will be Leonard Bernstein and Eleazar de Carvalho. Soloists will be announced.

Before the concerts in the large music shed by the full orchestra Dr. Koussevitzsky will conduct four concerts by a smaller orchestra in the intimate theater-concert hall. These concerts will be given on the Saturday evening and Sunday afternoon of two week ends, July 16-17, and July 23-24. Two different programs will be given each week end. They will be drawn from the music of Bach and Mozart, as in previous seasons, and this year music of Haydn and Schubert will be added.

In connection with the Koussevitzky anniversary, the Boston Orchestra has arranged with RCA Victor to distribute a souvenir album of double bass recordings made by Dr. Koussevitzky in 1929, when he played for the last time the instrument which first brought him fame. The album, containing three vinylite records, will be sold for $10 each. All proceeds will go to the Koussevitzky anniversary fund of the orchestra.

* * *

PLANS for the third international festival of music and drama at Edinburgh, Scotland, from August 21 to September 11, are rapidly taking shape.

Seven internationally known orchestras under leading conductors are scheduled. They include the Orchestre de la Suisse Romande under its conductor and founder, Ernest Ansermet, and the Royal Philharmonic Orchestra under Sir Thomas Beecham. The Philharmonic Orchestra of London and the B. B. C. Scottish Orchestra are among the others. Bruno Walter is among the noted conductors engaged.

There will be outstanding musicians, soloists, choirs and ballet dancers. One event will be the first performance of Ernest Bloch's new piano concerto, with the composer conducting the BBC Scottish Symphony and Corinne Lacomble, American pianist, as soloist.

* * *

"TROUBLED ISLAND," an opera based on the life of Jean Jacques Dessalines, the Haitian liberator, will be given its first performance at the New York City Center on March 30, directed by Laszlo Halasz.

William Grant Still, Negro composer, wrote the music, and the libretto is by Langston Hughes, developed from his own prose play, "Drums of Haiti."

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

[illegible]

Tribute Planned To Koussevitzky Here March 1

ON his final appearance in this city as regular conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, from which he is retiring this season after 25 years of leadership, there will be a special ceremony honoring Dr. Serge Koussevitzky at the orchestra's concert Tuesday night Mar. 1 in the Metropolitan Theater.

Because of this the time of the concert has been advanced to 8:15 o'clock from the usual 8:30.

Will Announce Fund Total

The ceremony is designed "to give Koussevitzky's host of Providence admirers the opportunity to demonstrate their warm appreciation of his great contribution to the musical life of the city," said Mrs. G. Maurice Congdon, chairman of the Providence Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra who, with Mrs. Arthur M. Allen, vice chairman, is in charge of the event.

A feature will be the announcement of the total amount of the Rhode Island contribution to the Koussevitzky Anniversary Fund, to which a large number of Providence subscribers and friends of the orchestra have already contributed generously, according to Mrs. Congdon.

[illegible] contributors whose [illegible] in Boston by next [illegible] be printed in the [illegible] those who still wish to [illegible] testimonial gift may [illegible] mailing their contributions [illegible] Anniversary Fund Headquarters, Symphony Hall, Boston. [illegible] be made payable to [illegible] Symphony Orchestra.

Started in Boston

[illegible] fund was started in Boston [illegible] as a spontaneous testimonial [illegible] express in tangible [illegible] appreciation of music [illegible] for Koussevitzky's [illegible] outstanding service to music. [illegible] asked what form he would [illegible] gift to take, Koussevitzky [illegible] would consider it the [illegible] all personal tributes if his [illegible] make this fund a gift to the orchestra itself "as convincing [illegible] that this splendid orchestra [illegible] all its maturity, fine tra[illegible] and high ideals . . . shall [illegible] or fall through lack [illegible] financial support."

NEW YORK, N. Y.
POST
HOME NEWS
FEB 21 1949

Shostakovich Coming Here for Culture Meet

Dimitri Shostakovich, famous Russian composer, will make his first visit to the U. S. next month as a member of the first important Soviet cultural and scientific group authorized to come here by the Soviet Government in recent years.

The group will attend a Cultural and Scientific Conference for World Peace March 25—27 at the Waldorf-Astoria, said Dr. Harlow Shapley, chairman of the National Council of the Arts, Sciences and Professions, which is sponsoring the meeting.

Dr. Shapley revealed the Soviet Government had selected the Russian delegation.

The 43-year-old composer turned down a bid to visit this country in 1946, when his Ninth Symphony was played for the first time in this country by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He was one of several Russian musicians taken to task in Moscow in 1948 for "bourgeois tendencies," and apologized at the time with a promise to rectify his "mistakes."

Other members of the Soviet group are S. A. Gerasimov, motion picture director; A. A. Fadeev, secretary general of the Secretariat of the Union of Soviet Writers; A. I. Oparin, one of the Soviet Union's leading bio-chemists, and P. A. Pavlenko, novelist, who wrote the film script for "Alexander Nevsky."

Millburn, N.J.
Item
2/24/49

Current Impressions

By REEVE STONE

ALL RUSSIAN PROGRAM

Last Thursday Stravinsky Day at the Mosque went by without any mark of distinction except for the appearance of Igor and Soulima Stravinsky.

Before a well-packed house, Igor Stravinsky first led the Boston Symphony Orchestra through Glinka's Overture to "Russlan and Ludmilla." For me, the spirited reading of this not overly impressive score was the highlight of the evening. The soaring melody against a background of steady and demanding rhythm made this familiar work a fairly easy pill to swallow—but not so with the Tschaikowsky piece that followed.

Tschaikowsky's Second Symphony is not by the maudlin Tschaikowsky we usually think of, but by the younger, over-dramatic Tschaikowsky. A fragile opus, the work was held together only by Stravinsky's skillful conducting and the expert playing of the large string section and the French horns.

After the intermission, Soulima Stravinsky appeared on stage with his father and, as the man said who sat in back of me, "They certainly look as much alike as two peas in a pod." They joined forces in the elder's Capriccio for Orchestra with Piano Solo. A minor Stravinsky work, it gave little opportunity for the young pianist to display his abilities. The percussive Capriccio has never impressed me favorably and last Thursday's rendition was no exception.

The balance of the program consisted of Swan Lakeish and Nutcrackerish themes tossed around to make what Stravinsky calls "The Fairy's Kiss." On first hearing, the piece is vaguely entertaining in spots, but once is enough. Even a strong stomach squirms more and more as the four movements proceed to the final notes.

One of the most prolific composers of our day, this one time bad boy of music is becoming accepted by the musical public to a far greater degree than was probably ever expected. It is understandable that all of his works can not be on a par with his best. We can regret, however, that Thursday's program presented us with the poorest of his creations. Perhaps the more we hear by Stravinsky, the more we come to the conclusion that some of his music is very good and some of it is very bad.

A recent Columbia long-playing record combines the names of four Frenchmen: Francois Couperin with Maurice Ravel and Jean Cocteau with Darius Milhaud.

The works recorded are Ravel's "Tombeau de Couperin" and Milhaud's "Nothing Doing Bar." The spirit of the two pieces presented on this one disc are completely opposite. The Ravel work looks back on the days of Francois Couperin and by the use of the 18th Century dance forms, the listener is presented with a 20th Century interpretation of the prelude, forlane, menuet and rigaudon forms which Couperin used skillfully.

A Busy Bar

On the other side of the record, there is a thorough contrast in Milhaud's "Nothing Doing Bar" in which everything is doing. With a multitude of themes that bounce from one to another in a variety of rhythms, this piece is as obvious as the Ravel one is subtle and delicate.

Originally written by Milhaud in 1919 as a piece which might accompany any short and silent Charlie Chaplin film, it was later employed by Cocteau as accompanying music for a satiric pantomime set in a bar in which there are dice games, bookies, boxers women with paper hair and a policeman who is decapitated when a fan falls on him.

Ernst Krenek sums up the music as "perfect nonsense, with a bunch of shameless ditties escaped from some Rio de Janeiro honkytonk." Milhaud enjoys writing music and writes all kinds. It would be a mistake to consider the rollicking "Nothing Doing Dan" as typical of the bulk of his work. Other sides are seen in the domestic recordings of his "Suite Provencale" which he says is based on "popular folk airs from the Provence of the Eighteenth Century"; "Creation of the World," one of the first pieces of music to use the jazz idiom (before Mr. Gershwin, incidentally); and his Incidental Music to "L'Orestie."

Milhaud is one of the many European composers who have adopted the U. S. for their home. For several years this composer, who has been considered by some critics as the best since Ravel, has been living in California and teaching at Mills College.

Backstage at Symphony

Brazilian Conductor Chants Praises of Fernandez Music

By Harold Rogers

Last week Laning Humphrey 'phoned me from Symphony Hall to ask me if I'd like to have a chat with Eleazar de Carvalho about the coming world première of the Fernandez First Symphony. I had thought this young Brazilian to be bilingual, like most conductors, so I told Mr. Humphrey I'd be right over and then dashed out of the office without a Portuguese dictionary.

I was right, however—Senhor de Carvalho is certainly bilingual. He speaks English and Portuguese simultaneously. But Mr. Humphrey, who has a keen ear for Portuguese, unobstrusively obliged as interpreter and anyway, Senhor de Carvalho augments his motley speech with his eloquent eyes and hands. He will introduce the new symphony at the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concerts tomorrow afternoon and Saturday evening in Symphony Hall.

* * *

"This seemphony of Fernandez is so trágico," Senhor de Carvalho said, his brow contorted in despair. "Even Fernandez himself is trágico. When I go back to Brazil last August I see Fernandez. I have dinner with Fernandez. We rehearse the seemphony, and I was to see Fernandez the day after for lunch. I call him in the morning, but—he was gone. He was no more here. He plan to come to Boston to hear the world première of his seemphony, but he was no more. Very trágico."

"Who is Fernandez?" I asked.

"Fernandez? Why, he is one of os quarto melhores compositores brasileiros!"

"Fernandez," interposed Mr. Humphrey, "is one of the four best Brazilian composers."

"Thanks," I said.

* * *

"Yes," Senhor de Carvalho went on, his lips becoming the spillway for a torrential syllabic flow, "Oscar Lorenzo Fernandez was one of the moderno, nationalista composers. In order of importância, they are Villa-Lobos, the oldest, then Camargo Guarnieri, then comes Fernandez, and last, Francisco Mignone. Brazilian música has two groups. The first ends with Francisco Braga, discípulo of Massenet. These composers did not write like brasileiros — they wrote like Europeans. Villa-Lobos heads the new group. He was first to use the temas indigenas—the Indian themes."

Warming up to his subject, Senhor de Carvalho explained that Fernandez also had two periods—the first having the Brazilian physiognomy, and the second in the pure or absolute idiom without folk themes. In his first period he produced a trio in the nationalist idiom; his atmospheric Brazilian Suite for Orchestra; a symphonic poem, "Imbapara," based on Indian themes, and his Afro-Brazilian "Batuque," which has been played by the Boston Symphony.

* * *

In his second period Fernandez spoke not in the nationalist idiom, but as himself, producing his two symphonies — his Symphony in Si in 1945 (or, in this country, the Symphony in B) and his Second Symphony in 1947. I asked Senhor de Carvalho to analyze the Symphony in Si which he will conduct here.

"The seemphony is in four movements," he said. "Fernandez wrote in neoclassical style — polytonality with melodia, much melodia. On his face Fernandez is strong, virile, even alegre, gay, but in his inside, his heart, he is full of melancólico—so trágico. I tell the players they must be sad, or they play it bad.

* * *

"The first movement opens moderato with pastorale tema in the horns—like a cadenza ad libitum—oh-h-h-h, do-do-doh-h-h-h—very dramático. The form is almost like a sonata. Out of the horn tema Fernandez makes the whole first movement. The second tema has an Indian face on it—allegro agitato. Then it goes back to the opening tema and ends pizzicato vibrato in the strings. Very dark in feeling, very melancólico.

"The second movement is a gay ostinato in Brazilian rhythms—allegro vivo e scherzoso. Chink, chinka-chink, chinka-chink—and the celli come in first with the tema—doo, da-doo, doo—and the trumpets come in one by one till there are four of them—ta-ta-ta-ta-tit, ta-ta—and then Fernandez adds the rest of the strings, and they all play together in eight different tonalities! Oh, he is so gay, but then in the central part the melodia sounds gay, but oh—in his heart he is so heavy—oh-h-h-h-h . . ."

Words failing him, Senhor de Carvalho cupped his hands, palms upward, in the general vicinity of his heart. Then he went on:

"The third movement is lentamente, andante, and it is fúnebre—oh, so fúnebre. It begin with the clarinet in low voice, and then comes the bass and the celli, and they play the songlike melodias so queixosamente—so plaintively." A cloud then passed over his swarthy face. "And in the central part—oh, it is so—so intenso—so anxious. And then it stops so calmly, quietly.

* * *

"And the fourth movement—it is allegro energico. Fernandez takes the small horn tema from the second movement, and from it he makes the main tema of the last movement. In the second tema you feel his throbbing heart, and then in the recapitulation he puts the temas together in shorter form and ends the seemphony quickly!"

Senhor de Carvalho settled back in his chair and smiled benignly, showing his even white teeth, and it was like the sun appearing after a turbulent storm. I breathed a sigh of relief. For the moment he had me convinced it was all so melancólico—so trágico.

W. Vollrath

Nicole Henriot, piano soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the concerts of Friday afternoon, Saturday night, and Sunday afternoon in Symphony Hall.

GREENSBURG, PA. TRIBUNE

24 1949

The World Of Music

NEW YORK (U.P.)—The 12th annual Berkshire Festival will open at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass., on July 16, the Boston Symphony Orchestra announced. The festival will climax the 25th season of Serge Koussevitzky as conductor of the orchestra.

Nine concerts will be given in the Tanglewood music shed, through three week-ends, on Thursday evenings, Saturday evenings, and Sunday afternoons (series A on July 28, 30, and 31; series B, August 4, 6, and 7; series C, August 11, 13 and 14). The guest conductors of the festival will be Leonard Bernstein and Eleazer de Carvalho. Soloists will be announced.

Before the concerts in the large music shed by the full orchestra Dr. Koussevitzky will conduct four concerts by a smaller orchestra in the intimate theater-concert hall. These concerts will be given on the Saturday evening and Sunday afternoon of two week-ends, July 16-17, and July 23-24. Two different programs will be given each week-end. They will be drawn from the music of Bach and Mozart, as in previous seasons, and this year music of Haydn and Schubert will be added.

In connection with the Koussevitzky anniversary, the Boston Orchestra has arranged with RCA Victor to distribute a souvenir album of double bass recordings made by Dr. Koussevitzky in 1929 when he played for the last time the instrument which first brought him fame. The album, containing three vinylite records, will be sold for $10 each. All proceeds will go to the Koussevitzky anniversary fund for the orchestra.

WORCESTER, MASS. TELEGRAM

FEB 25 1949

Parisian Composer To Be at Berkshire

BOSTON, Friday (AP) — Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, yesterday announced Olivier Messiaen, noted Parisian composer, will be on the faculty of the Berkshire Music Center.

The center will have a six-week season from July 4 to Aug. 14. Messiaen, making his first visit to America, will join Aaron Coplan as teacher of composition.

Leonard Bernstein Wins Merit Award of Boston Symphony

The Boston Symphony Orchestra Merit Award for 1949, carrying with it an honorarium of $1000, has been made to Leonard Bernstein for his Second Symphony, "The Age of Anxiety," inspired by the poem of that title by W. H. Auden.

This work was given its first performance a few weks ago in Symphony Hall, by the Boston Orchestra, with Serge Koussevitzky conducting, and the composer playing the important piano part.

This award was established three seasons ago by Mark M. Horblit, music-loving Boston attorney. The two previous recipients were Aaron Copland, for his Third Symphony, and Walter Piston, also for his Third Symphony — which additionally won the Pulitzer Prize of [illegible]

The committee for the award

Current Impressions

By REEVE STONE

ALL RUSSIAN PROGRAM

Last Thursday Stravinsky Day at the Mosque went by without any mark of distinction except for the appearance of Igor and Soulima Stravinsky.

Before a well-packed house, Igor Stravinsky first led the Boston Symphony Orchestra through Glinka's Overture to "Russlan and Ludmilla." For me, the spirited reading of this not overly impressive score was the highlight of the evening. The soaring melody against a background of steady and demanding rhythm made this familiar work a fairly easy pill to swallow—but not so with the Tschaikowsky piece that followed.

Tschaikowsky's Second Symphony is not by the maudlin Tschaikowsky we usually think of, but by the younger, over-dramatic Tschaikowsky. A fragile opus, the work was held together only by Stravinsky's skillful conducting and the expert playing of the large string section and the French horns.

After the intermission Soulima Stravinsky appeared on stage with his father and, as the man said who sat in back of me, "They certainly look as much alike as two peas in a pod." They joined forces in the elder's Capriccio for Orchestra with Piano Solo. A minor Stravinsky work, it gave little opportunity for the young pianist to display his abilities. The percussive Capriccio has never impressed me favorably and last Thursday's rendition was no exception.

The balance of the program consisted of Swan Lakeish and Nutcrackerish themes tossed around to make what Stravinsky calls "The Fairy's Kiss." On first hearing, the piece is vaguely entertaining in spots, but once is enough. Even a strong stomach squirms more and more as the four movements proceed to the final notes.

One of the most prolific composers of our day, this one time bad boy of music is becoming accepted by the musical public to a far greater degree than was probably ever expected. It is understandable that all of his works can not be on a par with his best. We can regret, however, that Thursday's program presented us with the poorest of his creations. Perhaps the more we hear by Stravinsky, the more we come to the conclusion that some of his music is very good and some of it is very bad.

A recent Columbia long-playing record combines the names of four Frenchmen: Francois Couperin with Maurice Ravel and Jean Cocteau with Darius Milhaud.

The works recorded are Ravel's "Tombeau de Couperin" and Milhaud's "Nothing Doing Bar." The spirit of the two pieces presented on this one disc are completely opposite. The Ravel work looks back on the days of Francois Couperin and by the use of the 18th Century dance forms, the listener is presented with a 20th Century interpretation of the prelude, forlane, menuet and rigaudon forms which Couperin used skillfully.

A Busy Bar

On the other side of the record there is a thorough contrast in Milhaud's "Nothing Doing Bar" in which everything is doing. With a multitude of themes that bounce from one to another in a variety of rhythms, this piece is as obvious as the Ravel one is subtle and delicate.

Originally written by Milhaud in 1919 as a piece which might accompany any short and silent Charlie Chaplin film, it was later employed by Cocteau as accompanying music for a satiric pantomime set in a bar in which there are dice games, bookies, boxers, women with paper hair and a policeman who is decapitated when a fan falls on him.

Ernst Krenek sums up the music as "perfect nonsense, with a bunch of shameless ditties escaped from some Rio de Janeiro honkytonk." Milhaud enjoys writing music and writes all kinds. It would be a mistake to consider the rollicking "Nothing Doing Dan" as typical of the bulk of his work. Other sides are seen in the domestic recordings of his "Suite Provencale" which he says is based on "popular folk airs from the Provence of the Eighteenth Century"; "Creation of the World," one of the first pieces of music to use the jazz idiom (before Mr. Gershwin, incidentally); and his Incidental Music to "L'Orestie."

Milhaud is one of the many European composers who have adopted the U. S. for their home. For several years this composer, who has been considered by some critics as the best since Ravel, has been living in California and teaching at Mills College.

MUSIC

Richard Burgin Leads Fifth Tuesday Night Symphony Program

By JOHN WM. RILEY

Perhaps "Ideal Program" is a fair description of that which Richard Burgin conducted by Symphony Hall last evening—the fifth in the Boston Symphonic Tuesday evening series. There was a bright opener, a friendly old favorite in the middle, a pleasant interlude and a circusy piece to finish things off.

The four offered the proper contrasts of fresh and familiar, unusual and standard. They were: The Overture to Weber's "Euryanthe," Brahms' Third Symphony, the Adagio from Bruckner's String Quintet, and the Suite from Rimsky-Korsakov's opera "The Fairy Tale of Tsar Saltan" without the famous, and easily dispensed-with "Flight of the Bumble Bee."

Weber's Overture, written, like the preface of a book after the composition of the major work, is an introduction to, and a summation of, that long forgotten opera. It's a close-packed and welcome condensation of a windier work and makes a fine element of spice in most any symphonic program.

The Brahms Symphony Mr. Burgin played with tenderness and affection—no special pleading (as is the wont of some conductors), no straining for effect. He followed the Grand Line and permitted no special fuss over details, which fell into place of their own accord. The lovely Bruckner movement, which, according to a reliable source, had been performed in Cambridge by the Boston Symphony, but not in Symphony Hall, was a further extension of the mood developed by the Brahms. One never quite got over the beauty of the first bars; but the piece is still a wonder of enveloping sound.

So the program closed with the Rimsky-Korsakov Suite, a mixed grille (to badly mix a metaphor) of lean tunes, juicy sonorities and rich plum pudding. Taken all around, it was a thoroughly satisfying musical diet, served with Mr. Burgin's own special touch.

[261]

Backstage at Symphony

Brazilian Conductor Chants Praises of Fernandez Music

By Harold Rogers

Last week Laning Humphrey 'phoned me from Symphony Hall to ask me if I'd like to have a chat with Eleazar de Carvalho about the coming world première of the Fernandez First Symphony. I had thought this young Brazilian to be bilingual, like most conductors, so I told Mr. Humphrey I'd be right over and then dashed out of the office without a Portuguese dictionary.

I was right, however—Senhor de Carvalho is certainly bilingual. He speaks English and Portuguese simultaneously. But Mr. Humphrey, who has a keen ear for Portuguese, unobstrusively obliged as interpreter and anyway, Senhor de Carvalho augments his motley speech with his eloquent eyes and hands. He will introduce the new symphony at the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concerts tomorrow afternoon and Saturday evening in Symphony Hall.

* * *

"This seemphony of Fernandez is so trágico," Senhor de Carvalho said, his brow contorted in despair. "Even Fernandez himself is trágico. When I go back to Brazil last August I see Fernandez, I have dinner with Fernandez. We rehearse the seemphony, and I was to see Fernandez the day after for lunch. I call him in the morning, but—he was gone. He was no more here. He plan to come to Boston to hear the world première of his seemphony, but he was no more. Very trágico."

"Who is Fernandez?" I asked.

"Fernandez? Why, he is one of os quarto melhores compositores brasileiros!"

"Fernandez," interposed Mr. Humphrey, "is one of the four best Brazilian composers."

"Thanks," I said.

* * *

"Yes," Senhor de Carvalho went on, his lips becoming the spillway for a torrential syllabic flow, "Oscar Lorenzo Fernandez was one of the moderno, nationalista composers. In order of importância, they are Villa-Lobos, the oldest, then Camargo Guarnieri, then comes Fernandez, and last, Francisco Mignone. Brazilian música has two groups. The first ends with Francisco Braga, discípulo of Massenet. These composers did not write like brasileiros — they wrote like Europeans. Villa-Lobos heads the new group. He was first to use the temas indigenas—the Indian themes."

Warming up to his subject, Senhor de Carvalho explained that Fernandez also had two periods—the first having the Brazilian physiognomy, and the second in the pure or absolute idiom without folk themes. In his first period he produced a trio in the nationalist idiom; his atmospheric Brazilian Suite for Orchestra; a symphonic poem, "Imbapara," based on Indian themes, and his Afro-Brazilian "Batuque," which has been played by the Boston Symphony.

* * *

In his second period Fernandez spoke not in the nationalist idiom, but as himself, producing his two symphonies — his Symphony in Si in 1945 (or, in this country, the Symphony in B) and his Second Symphony in 1947. I asked Senhor de Carvalho to analyze the Symphony in Si which he will conduct here.

"The seemphony is in four movements," he said. "Fernandez wrote in neoclassical style — polytonality with melodia, much melodia. On his face Fernandez is strong, virile, even alegre, gay, but in his inside, his heart, he is full of melancólico—so trágico. I tell the players they must be sad, or they play it bad.

* * *

"The first movement opens moderato with pastorale tema in the horns—like a cadenza ad libitum—oh-h-h-h, do-do-doh-h-h-h—very dramático. The form is almost like a sonata. Out of the horn tema Fernandez makes the whole first movement. The second tema has an Indian face on it—allegro agitato. Then it goes back to the opening tema and ends pizzicato vibrato in the strings. Very dark in feeling, very melancólico.

"The second movement is a gay ostinato in Brazilian rhythms—allegro vivo e scherzoso. Chink, chinka-chink, chinka-chink—and the celli come in first with the tema—doo, da-doo, doo—and the trumpets come in one by one till there are four of them—ta-ta-ta-ta-tit, ta-ta—and then Fernandez adds the rest of the strings, and they all play together in eight different tonalities! Oh, he is so gay, but then in the central part the melodia sounds gay, but oh—in his heart he is so heavy—oh-h-h-h-h . . ."

Words failing him, Senhor de Carvalho cupped his hands, palms upward, in the general vicinity of his heart. Then he went on:

"The third movement is lentamente, andante, and it is fúnebre—oh, so fúnebre. It begin with the clarinet in low voice, and then comes the bass and the celli, and they play the songlike melodias so queixosamente—so plaintively." A cloud then passed over his swarthy face. "And in the central part—oh, it is so—so intenso—so anxious. And then it stops so calmly, quietly.

* * *

"And the fourth movement—it is allegro energico. Fernandez takes the small horn tema from the second movement, and from it he makes the main tema of the last movement. In the second tema you feel his throbbing heart, and then in the recapitulation he puts the temas together in shorter form and ends the seemphony quickly!"

Senhor de Carvalho settled back in his chair and smiled benignly, showing his even white teeth, and it was like the sun appearing after a turbulent storm. I breathed a sigh of relief. For the moment he had me convinced it was all so melancólico—so trágico.

W. Vollrath

Nicole Henriot, piano soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the concerts of Friday afternoon, Saturday night, and Sunday afternoon in Symphony Hall.

GREENSBURG, PA.
TRIBUNE
FEB 24 1949

WORCESTER, MASS.
TELEGRAM
FEB 25 1949

The World Of Music

NEW YORK (U.P.)—The 12th annual Berkshire Festival will open at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass., on July 16, the Boston Symphony Orchestra announced. The festival will climax the 25th season of Serge Koussevitzky as conductor of the orchestra.

Nine concerts will be given in the Tanglewood music shed, through three week-ends, on Thursday evenings, Saturday evenings, and Sunday afternoons (series A on July 28, 30, and 31; series B, August 4, 6, and 7; series C, August 11, 13 and 14). The guest conductors of the festival will be Leonard Bernstein and Eleazer de Carvalho. Soloists will be announced.

Before the concerts in the large music shed by the full orchestra Dr. Koussevitzky will conduct four concerts by a smaller orchestra in the intimate theater-concert hall. These concerts will be given on the Saturday evening and Sunday afternoon of two week-ends, July 16-17, and July 23-24. Two different programs will be given each week-end. They will be drawn from the music of Bach and Mozart, as in previous seasons, and this year music of Haydn and Schubert will be added.

In connection with the Koussevitzky anniversary, the Boston Orchestra has arranged with RCA Victor to distribute a souvenir album of double bass recordings made by Dr. Koussevitzky in 1929 when he played for the last time the instrument which first brought him fame. The album, containing three vinylite records, will be sold for $10 each. All proceeds will go to the Koussevitzky anniversary fund for the orchestra.

[illegible]

Parisian Composer To Be at Berkshire

BOSTON, Friday (AP) — Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, yesterday announced Olivier Messiaen, noted Parisian composer, will be on the faculty of the Berkshire Music Center.

The center will have a six-week season from July 4 to Aug. 14. Messiaen, making his first visit to America, will join Aaron Coplan as teacher of composition.

Leonard Bernstein Wins Merit Award of Boston Symphony

The Boston Symphony Orchestra Merit Award for 1949, carrying with it an honorarium of $1000, has been made to Leonard Bernstein for his Second Symphony, "The Age of Anxiety," inspired by the poem of that title by W. H. Auden.

This work was given its first performance a few weks ago in Symphony Hall, by the Boston Orchestra, with Serge Koussevitzky conducting, and the composer playing the important piano part.

This award was established three seasons ago by Mark M. Horblit, music-loving Boston attorney. The two previous recipients were Aaron Copland, for his Third Symphony, and Walter Piston, also for his Third Symphony — which additionally won the Pulitzer Prize of [illegible].

The committee for the award

Union, N.J.
[illegible]

Current Impressions

By REEVE STONE

ALL RUSSIAN PROGRAM

Last Thursday Stravinsky Day at the Mosque went by without any mark of distinction except for the appearance of Igor and Soulima Stravinsky.

Before a well-packed house, Igor Stravinsky first led the Boston Symphony Orchestra through Glinka's Overture to "Russlan and Ludmilla." For me, the spirited reading of this not overly impressive score was the highlight of the evening. The soaring melody against a background of steady and demanding rhythm made this familiar work a fairly easy pill to swallow—but not so with the Tschaikowsky piece that followed.

Tschaikowsky's Second Symphony is not by the maudlin Tschaikowsky we usually think of, but by the younger, over-dramatic Tschaikowsky. A fragile opus, the work was held together only by Stravinsky's skillful conducting and the expert playing of the large string section and the French horns.

After the intermission, Soulima Stravinsky appeared on stage with his father and, as the man said who sat in back of me, "They certainly look as much alike as two peas in a pod." They joined forces in the elder's Capriccio for Orchestra with Piano Solo. A minor Stravinsky work, it gave little opportunity for the young pianist to display his abilities. The percussive Capriccio has never impressed me favorably and last Thursday's rendition was no exception.

The balance of the program consisted of Swan Lakeish and Nutcrackerish themes tossed around to make what Stravinsky calls "The Fairy's Kiss." On first hearing, the piece is vaguely entertaining in spots, but once is enough. Even a strong stomach squirms more and more as the four movements proceed to the final notes.

One of the most prolific composers of our day, this one time bad boy of music is becoming accepted by the musical public to a far greater degree than was probably ever expected. It is understandable that all of his works can not be on a par with his best. We can regret, however, that Thursday's program presented us with the poorest of his creations. Perhaps the more we hear by Stravinsky, the more we come to the conclusion that some of his music is very good and some of it is very bad.

A recent Columbia long-playing record combines the names of four Frenchmen: Francois Couperin with Maurice Ravel and Jean Cocteau with Darius Milhaud.

The works recorded are Ravel's "Tombeau de Couperin" and Milhaud's "Nothing Doing Bar." The spirit of the two pieces presented on this one disc are completely opposite. The Ravel work looks back on the days of Francois Couperin and by the use of the 18th Century dance forms, the listener is presented with a 20th Century interpretation of the prelude, forlane, menuet and rigaudon forms which Couperin used skillfully.

A Busy Bar

On the other side of the record there is a thorough contrast in Milhaud's "Nothing Doing Bar" in which everything is doing. With a multitude of themes that bounce from one to another in a variety of rhythms, this piece is as obvious as the Ravel one is subtle and delicate.

Originally written by Milhaud in 1919 as a piece which might accompany any short and silent Charlie Chaplin film, it was later employed by Cocteau as accompanying music for a satiric pantomime set in a bar in which there are dice games, bookies, boxers women with paper hair and a policeman who is decapitated when a fan falls on him.

Ernst Krenek sums up the music as "perfect nonsense, with a bunch of shameless ditties escaped from some Rio de Janeiro honky-tonk." Milhaud enjoys writing music and writes all kinds. It would be a mistake to consider the rollicking "Nothing Doing Dan" as typical of the bulk of his work. Other sides are seen in the domestic recordings of his "Suite Provencale" which he says is based on "popular folk airs from the Provence of the Eighteenth Century"; "Creation of the World," one of the first pieces of music to use the jazz idiom (before Mr. Gershwin, incidentally); and his Incidental Music to "L'Orestie."

Milhaud is one of the many European composers who have adopted the U. S. for their home. For several years this composer, who has been considered by some critics as the best since Ravel, has been living in California and teaching at Mills College.

MUSIC

Richard Burgin Leads Fifth Tuesday Night Symphony Program

By JOHN WM. RILEY

Perhaps "Ideal Program" is a fair description of that which Richard Burgin conducted by Symphony Hall last evening—the fifth in the Boston Symphonic Tuesday evening series. There was a bright opener, a friendly old favorite in the middle, a pleasant interlude and a circusy piece to finish things off.

The four offered the proper contrasts of fresh and familiar, unusual and standard. They were: The Overture to Weber's "Euryanthe," Brahms' Third Symphony, the Adagio from Bruckner's String Quintet, and the Suite from Rimsky-Korsakov's opera "The Fairy Tale of Tsar Saltan" without the famous, and easily dispensed-with "Flight of the Bumble Bee."

Weber's Overture, written, like the preface of a book after the composition of the major work, is an introduction to, and a summation of, that long forgotten opera. It's a close-packed and welcome condensation of a windier work and makes a fine element of spice in most any symphonic program.

The Brahms Symphony Mr. Burgin played with tenderness and affection—no special pleading (as is the wont of some conductors), no straining for effect. He followed the Grand Line and permitted no special fuss over details, which fell into place of their own accord. The lovely Bruckner movement, which, according to a reliable source, had been performed in Cambridge by the Boston Symphony, but not in Symphony Hall, was a further extension of the mood developed by the Brahms. One never quite got over the beauty of the first bars; but the piece is still a wonder of enveloping sound.

So the program closed with the Rimsky-Korsakov Suite; a mixed grille (to badly mix a metaphor) of lean tunes, juicy [illegible] and rich plum pudding. Taken all around, it was a thoroughly satisfying musical diet, served with Mr. Burgin's own special touch.

NEW YORKER
NEW YORK CITY
FEB 26 1949

MUSICAL EVENTS

Welcome

TWO great orchestras from out of town played here last week—the Boston Symphony and the Cleveland Orchestra. Their programs were a good deal farther apart than Cleveland and Boston. The Boston Symphony, under the direction of Igor Stravinsky, devoted itself to an evening of Stravinsky, while the Cleveland group, in no mood for novelty, presented a brilliant, if orthodox, array of Smetana, Schumann, Strauss, and Brahms. Both evenings struck me as being quite wonderful experiences, and indicative of the rich and full musical life of our country.

Stravinsky, in his "Chronicle of My Life," has unburdened himself on the subject of conductors. At one point, he says, "One cannot even pretend that the easygoing fashion in which 'interpreters' treat their contemporaries is because they feel that these contemporaries have not sufficient reputation to matter. The old masters, the classics, are subjected to just the same treatment, notwithstanding all their authority. It is enough to cite Beethoven and to take as an illustration his Eighth Symphony, which bears the composer's own precise metronomic directions. But, are they heeded? There are as many different renderings as there are conductors! 'Have you heard my Fifth, my Eighth?' That is a phrase that has become quite usual in the mouths of these gentlemen. . . ." From this, I think we are safe in concluding that Mr. Stravinsky's conducting of his own works the other night at Carnegie Hall was his idea of how Stravinsky should be conducted. All the signs—from Stravinsky's intense, sometimes even persnickety, beat to the evident respect of the orchestra for his music—indicated the same thing. I can recall no symphonic concert in which so much pure music, as pure music, was thrust upon the public. Stravinsky made no concessions, no compromises. There was no sentim[illegible] shading. There was simply a clear, crisp, clean, almost naked rendering of his "Ode in Three Parts," Concerto for Piano and Wind Orchestra, Concerto in D for String Orchestra, and "Orpheus" ballet music. Admittedly, that is a lot of any one composer's music for one evening.

Henriot Symphony Soloist

Carvalho Introduces Fernandez Symphony

By L. A. Sloper

Nicole Henriot from Paris was soloist at the seventeenth Friday afternoon concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Feb. 25 in Symphony Hall. After her performance in the Liszt Piano Concerto in E flat, she received a prolonged ovation.

Eleazar de Carvalho, returning for a second tour of duty as guest conductor, directed a program beautifully devised to set off its center piece. It opened with the first performance of the Symphony in B major by Oscar Lorenzo Fernandez, the late Brazilian composer, and closed with Strauss's "Also Sprach Zarathustra." It was an afternoon of romance, ecstasy, Sturm und Drang.

When Miss Henriot appeared on the platform, slight, girlish, fragile-looking, we wondered if she was up to Liszt's old warhorse. The doubt was quickly dispelled. She rode the piece with a fine bravura, a clear, round tone, and a keen rhythmic sense. It was a brilliant performance.

* * *

There was, it is true, a tendency to break up her phrases and to indulge in capricious tempi which marred the lyric line. But she was so appealing and so much the master of her instrument that the audience was loth to let her go. Mr. De Carvalho gallantly kissed her hand while the public cheered.

Fernandez's symphony is nothing if not romantic. In spite of an insistence on a polytonality that produces the harshest of harmonies, it is full of lush tunes and stinging rhythms. The first movement is perhaps the most interesting musically, with a development of two easily recognizable themes. The material and the rhythms both suggest an Indian origin. The second movement, a Scherzo, is based, one guesses, on native dances.

The third, Lentamente, is Tchaikovsky's Adagio Lamentoso in modernist guise, a twentieth-century "Tristan," plus Siegfried's Funeral March. It is very, very sad, with an intensity of sadness that Anglo-Saxons find it difficult to understand. The Finale is again somber in mood and the conclusion is tempestuously mournful.

The composer moves among the instruments freely, with frequent employment of the woodwinds and a particular affection for the English horn.

* * *

But who can compare with the Strauss of the early tone poems as master of the orchestra? Here is an unsurpassed tonal splendor, to be listened to without reference to the libretto, which could not be expressed in music in any case. Just as sound, the score topped the program.

Here, and throughout the afternoon, the orchestra played willingly and brilliantly for Mr. De Carvalho. Unfortunately, his understanding of the Strauss score was not equal to his technical ability. Often the orchestra seemed to get out of hand, solo voices were not always heard distinctly. Mr. Burgin wandered a little in pitch in the finale, and there was a general muddiness of effect.

Roland Halfpenny, who was to have played the organ part, was unable to appear. Mr. De Carvalho had to make do with the double-basses and drums. Actually, the organ wasn't missed; there was plenty going on without it.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Some 16 and a half hours after one Boston audience had shouted itself hoarse at the Opera House, a second acted in like fashion at Symphony Hall. The two occasions were the local premiere of Strauss' "Salome" and the repetition from last season of Mahler's Second Symphony, with Leonard Bernstein again conducting, and the chorus drawn once more from the choirs of Harvard and Radcliffe. Yesterday, however, the soloists were different. They were Adele Addison, soprano, and Nan Merriman, contralto. At this particular pair of concerts, as when Dr. Muck previously led this "Resurrection" Symphony here in 1918, no other piece stood on the program, making it probably the shortest regular Symphony Concert on record. And while an interval might have occurred between the first and second movements, where Mahler requests a pause of at least five minutes, there was no intermission.

Great was the contrast between these two works, so nearly contemporaneous, and from the hands of composers who were both colleagues and rivals. That both were conductors also had not a little to do with their mastery of the orchestra as an expressive medium. But whereas Strauss, in his setting of the decadent play of Wilde, gives us something close to the absolute zero in human degradation, Mahler is here concerned with humanity's loftiest aspiration, that for life beyond the grave. Yet so wide is the sphere of art that we can call both music drama and choral symphony masterpieces. Moreover, well known as they are elsewhere, Boston has been a bit slow in catching on to them.

If there is any weakness in the "Resurrection" Symphony it is in the undue length of the instrumental portion of the finale before the so eagerly-awaited chorus appears. Save for some unfortunate beeps in the brass section, the orchestral performance was an eloquent one. Mr. Bernstein loves this music and understands it, nor does he need a score when conducting it. There is not room on the stage of Symphony Hall for both an adequate chorus and the huge orchestra that Mahler requires in order to paint such weighty matters as death and the Day of Judgement. It did not seem to me that the group of yesterday sang with quite the volume of tone produced by its predecessor. Be that as it may, I am certain that Adele Addison fell way behind Ellabelle Davis in her conveyance of the soprano part. Miss Addison has a light, pretty voice, but something more than that is indicated for these apocalyptic doings. In the matter of size Miss Merriman's voice came closer to filling the bill, but it is possible to sing the wonderful solo that makes the fourth movement with

---

ATURDAY, FEBRUARY 26,

MUSIC

New Pianist, Symphony and De Carvalho Make Memorable Concert

By CYRUS DURGIN

Taken all in all yesterday's concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was one of the big and memorable ones of the season. First there was a tremendous new pianistic talent, Nicole Henriot, who in her Boston debut played the E-flat Concerto of Liszt. Second there was a new and interesting Symphony, the First, by the late Brazilian composer, Oscar Lorenzo Fernandez, which received first performance. And third, Eleazar de Carvalho, in his second round of appearances as guest conductor, achieved the finest work one has yet heard from him.

Fernandez' Symphony, in the key of B major, is large of design and heavily, expertly scored, with much intricate detail. The first movement and the slow one are conservative in idiom, but not old-fashioned; there are some Indian influences in the scherzo, and the finale is a big construction with powerful dissonance. Throughout there are evidences that Fernandez learned a good deal from the Frenchmen of, say, the generations of Debussy, Ravel and D'Indy.

Mostly the expressive nature of the Symphony is on a dark if not quite tragic emotional side, with agitated rhythms conjuring up what De Carvalho refers to as an "anxious" quality. A long, metrically free solo theme, first coming out of the horns, plays an important part and in its way sets the general atmosphere. This is skilled and solid symphonic writing, perhaps not of striking originality, but yet of engaging vitality and color. We ought to hear it again.

Nicole Henriot is only a month over 24, but she is definitely one of the future keyboard great. Even now her technical gifts are matured, and she plays with a virtuoso sweep. She can whisper and thunder, and go at uncanny speed, martellato octaves and all, and more important she plays with the broad style and the emotional warmth of a first-rate artist.

Yesterday the Liszt E-flat Concerto sounded brand new. The ovation which Mlle. Henriot received was historical in its length and enthusiasm. Time after time the blonde, attractive young woman was called back, entering and leaving the stage so fast it looked as if she were skittling along on roller skates.

All through the afternoon, there was a somewhat different De Carvalho before us, displaying the technical control and the dynamic vigor we have noticed already, but reading Fernandez, Liszt and "Thus Spake Zarathustra" of Strauss with an individuality, a bold freedom of expression which he has not mustered before. This was the young Brazilian conductor at his best, and it was decidedly impressive.

"Zarathustra," incidentally, had to be played without the organ, since Halfpenny, who [illegible] taken the part, became sick a minute or two before the performance was to begin.

THE SYMPHONY

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

It looked on paper as though Leonard Bernstein, in the double role of composer and pianist, was up against some pretty stiff competition at yesterday's Symphony Concert. Actually, he made out very well. It was a kindness to his "The Age of Anxiety," Symphony No. 2 for piano and orchestra (after W. H. Auden), that Dr. Koussevitzky finally preceded it by Beethoven's Overture to "Coriolanus," not by his Third "Leonore," which would have crushed it at the outset. Again, the program originally ended with Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel," a masterpiece in the domain of illustrative music which Mr. Bernstein eccentrically cultivates in this era of absolutism. However, "Till" was replaced by Ravel's "La Valse," which still followed Strauss' "Death and Transfiguration."

Now "Death and Transfiguration" is not the best Strauss, though played with a certain restraint, it can still be impressive; and "La Valse" generally counts as an entertaining number.

But yesterday both works were over-interpreted. The Strauss became trumpery, the Ravel trivial, with an orgiastic finish that was positively embarrassing.

Possibly, most of my readers are no more familiar with Auden's "boroque eclogue" than I was when word of Mr. Bernstein's forthcoming piece (the score was completed on March 20 last) set me to reading it. This wordy poem, with passages of prose, its scene laid during the late war, has to do with four lonely people who meet in a New York bar, drift into bozy half-consciousness, progress to the apartment of the one girl in the group, and finally go their several ways, aware both of the emptiness of their lives and of the fact that what they need is faith in something. Mr. Bernstein has not attempted a musical paraphrase of this extraordinary poem. Strauss, you may be sure, would have given us the tinkling of glasses or even the gurgling of a bottle. Nor does he attempt to characterize the four figures, who, after all, are little more than mouthpieces for Mr. Auden's philosophizing.

He has managed, however, to get the essence of the poem into a coherent and consistent musical scheme; and on a second hearing one could ignore Auden entirely and concentrate on Bernstein. What the latter has given us is music sensitively imagined and expertly conveyed. It is not particularly original, but it is always musical, ingenious and resourceful. There is a jazzy episode (the scene in Rosetta's apartment) and a soaring, somewhat Mahlerish epilogue. For a more detailed analysis there is no space here. It is sufficient to say that the piece made its effect; that the participants were warmly applauded; to prophesy that the work will have an extensive career; and to marvel at Dr. Koussevitzky's ability to absorb its contents in such short order.

MUSIC

New Honegger Work at Symphony; Heifetz Is Soloist in Two Pieces

By CYRUS DURGIN

There is a new work by Arthur Honegger, his Fourth Symphony, at the concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra this week. Jascha Heifetz is violin soloist in two concertos. The latter are the D major (K. 218) by Mozart, and the No. 2, in G minor, by Prokofieff, which Heifetz introduced here in 1937 and repeated in 1940. The one other number is "La Mer" by Debussy, and Serge Koussevitzky conducts.

This first Boston performance of the Honegger, yesterday afternoon, revealed a small, harmless, cheerful and cleverly factured work in three movements. It is essentially musicians' music, and its predominant merit I would think to be inward and technical.

The composer acknowledges a kinship with the spirit of Mozart and Haydn in this score, which is subtitled "Delights of Basel."

It was written in 1946. The title refers to the fact Honegger, at the time, was thinking how nice it would be to leave his "odious and stupid conditions of life" and run off to spend some time with his musical friends in the Swiss city. A couple of Basel songs are quoted.

It seems unlikely this Fourth Symphony will ever amount to much. But it is relatively pleasant and easy to take.

Two violin concertos more unlike, except in relative size of accompanying orchestras, would be hard to imagine. Nevertheless, Heifetz delivered some of his finest bowing and phrasing and flawless technic in both Mozart and the grotesquely modern Prokofieff. Each, moreover, went with impeccable style; the flavor of each was sharply differentiated.

Neither performance had a great deal of emotional heat. In that respect they suggested the old Heifetz of some years ago. But everything was neat and crisp and looked and sounded so easy. Such, in itself, is a good deal of a virtue. Needless to say, Heifetz was received by the Friday audience with much enthusiasm.

But the biggest ovation came at the end of "La Mer," which Koussevitzky had conducted like the wizard of color and subtlety and emotional tension, that he is. At this point applause was compounded with cheers, and deservedly so.

Debussy, like Ravel, has been a specialty with Koussevitzky. I can think of no one who conducts those composers so well, let alone better. This was the definitive "La Mer."

[262]

NEW YORKER
NEW YORK CITY
FEB 26 1949

MUSICAL EVENTS

Welcome

TWO great orchestras from out of town played here last week—the Boston Symphony and the Cleveland Orchestra. Their programs were a good deal farther apart than Cleveland and Boston. The Boston Symphony, under the direction of Igor Stravinsky, devoted itself to an evening of Stravinsky, while the Cleveland group, in no mood for novelty, presented a brilliant, if orthodox, array of Smetana, Schumann, Strauss, and Brahms. Both evenings struck me as being quite wonderful experiences, and indicative of the rich and full musical life of our country.

Stravinsky, in his "Chronicle of My Life," has unburdened himself on the subject of conductors. At one point, he says, "One cannot even pretend that the easygoing fashion in which 'interpreters' treat their contemporaries is because they feel that these contemporaries have not sufficient reputation to matter. The old masters, the classics, are subjected to just the same treatment, notwithstanding all their authority. It is enough to cite Beethoven and to take as an illustration his Eighth Symphony, which bears the composer's own precise metronomic directions. But, are they heeded? There are as many different renderings as there are conductors! 'Have you heard my Fifth, my Eighth?' That is a phrase that has become quite usual in the mouths of these gentlemen. . . ." From this, I think we are safe in concluding that Mr. Stravinsky's conducting of his own works the other night at Carnegie Hall was his idea of how Stravinsky should be conducted. All the signs—from Stravinsky's intense, sometimes even persnickety, beat to the evident respect of the orchestra for his music—indicated the same thing. I can recall no symphonic concert in which so much pure music, as pure music, was thrust upon the public. Stravinsky made no concessions, no com[illegible]. There was no senti[illegible]ding. There was s[illegible]lean, almost naked [illegible] in Three Parts," [illegible] and Wind Orche[illegible] String Orche[illegible] music. A[illegible] that is a lot of any one comp[illegible]ic for one evening,

---

Henriot Symphony Soloist

Carvalho Introduces Fernandez Symphony

By L. A. Sloper

Nicole Henriot from Paris was soloist at the seventeenth Friday afternoon concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Feb. 25 in Symphony Hall. After her performance in the Liszt Piano Concerto in E flat, she received a prolonged ovation.

Eleazar de Carvalho, returning for a second tour of duty as guest conductor, directed a program beautifully devised to set off its center piece. It opened with the first performance of the Symphony in B major by Oscar Lorenzo Fernandez, the late Brazilian composer, and closed with Strauss's "Also Sprach Zarathustra." It was an afternoon of romance, ecstasy, Sturm und Drang.

When Miss Henriot appeared on the platform, slight, girlish, fragile-looking, we wondered if she was up to Liszt's old warhorse. The doubt was quickly dispelled. She rode the piece with a fine bravura, a clear, round tone, and a keen rhythmic sense. It was a brilliant performance.

* * *

There was, it is true, a tendency to break up her phrases and to indulge in capricious tempi which marred the lyric line. But she was so appealing and so much the master of her instrument that the audience was loth to let her go. Mr. De Carvalho gallantly kissed her hand while the public cheered.

Fernandez's symphony is nothing if not romantic. In spite of an insistence on a polytonality that produces the harshest of harmonies, it is full of lush tunes and stinging rhythms. The first movement is perhaps the most interesting musically, with a development of two easily recognizable themes. The material and the rhythms both suggest an Indian origin. The second movement, a Scherzo, is based, one guesses, on native dances.

The third, Lentamente, is Tchaikovsky's Adagio Lamentoso in modernist guise, a twentieth-century "Tristan," plus Siegfried's Funeral March. It is very, very sad, with an intensity of sadness that Anglo-Saxons find it difficult to understand. The Finale is again somber in mood and the conclusion is tempestuously mournful.

The composer moves among the instruments freely, with frequent employment of the woodwinds and a particular affection for the English horn.

* * *

But who can compare with the Strauss of the early tone poems as master of the orchestra? Here is an unsurpassed tonal splendor, to be listened to without reference to the libretto, which could not be expressed in music in any case. Just as sound, the score topped the program.

Here, and throughout the afternoon, the orchestra played willingly and brilliantly for Mr. De Carvalho. Unfortunately, his understanding of the Strauss score was not equal to his technical ability. Often the orchestra seemed to get out of hand, solo voices were not always heard distinctly, Mr. Burgin wandered a little in pitch in the finale, and there was a general muddiness of effect.

Roland Halfpenny, who was to have played the organ part, was unable to appear. Mr. De Carvalho had to make do with the double-basses and drums. Actually, the organ wasn't missed; there was plenty going on without it.

THE SYMPHONY

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

It looked on paper as though Leonard Bernstein, in the double role of composer and pianist, was up against some pretty stiff competition at yesterday's Symphony Concert. Actually, he made out very well. It was a kindness to his "The Age of Anxiety," Symphony No. 2 for piano and orchestra (after W. H. Auden), that Dr. Koussevitzky finally preceded it by Beethoven's Overture to "Coriolanus," not by his Third "Leonore," which would have crushed it at the outset. Again, the program originally ended with Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel," a masterpiece in the domain of illustrative music which Mr. Bernstein eccentrically cultivates in this era of absolutism. However, "Till" was replaced by Ravel's "La Valse," which still followed Strauss' "Death and Transfiguration."

Now "Death and Transfiguration" is not the best Strauss, though played with a certain restraint, it can still be impressive; and "La Valse" generally counts as an entertaining number.

But yesterday both works were over-interpreted. The Strauss became trumpery, the Ravel trivial, with an orgiastic finish that was positively embarrassing.

Possibly, most of my readers are no more familiar with Auden's "boroque eclogue" than I was when word of Mr. Bernstein's forthcoming piece (the score was completed on March 20 last) set me to reading it. This wordy poem, with passages of prose, its scene laid during the late war, has to do with four lonely people who meet in a New York bar, drift into bozy half-consciousness, progress to the apartment of the one girl in the group, and finally go their several ways, aware both of the emptiness of their lives and of the fact that what they need is faith in something. Mr. Bernstein has not attempted a musical paraphrase of this extraordinary poem. Strauss, you may be sure, would have given us the tinkling of glasses or even the gurgling of a bottle. Nor does he attempt to characterize the four figures, who, after all, are little more than mouthpieces for Mr. Auden's philosophizing.

He has managed, however, to get the essence of the poem into a coherent and consistent musical scheme; and on a second hearing one could ignore Auden entirely and concentrate on Bernstein. What the latter has given us is music sensitively imagined and expertly conveyed. It is not particularly original, but it is always musical, ingenious and resourceeful. There is a jazzy episode (the scene in Rosetta's apartment) and a soaring, somewhat Mahlerish epilogue. For a more detailed analysis there is no space here. It is sufficient to say that the piece made its effect; that the participants were warmly applauded; to prophesy that the work will have an extensive career; and to marvel at Dr. Koussevitzky's ability to absorb its contents in such short order.

MUSIC

New Ho[illegible] Work at Symphon[illegible]eifetz Is Soloist in Two Pieces

By CYRUS DURGIN

There is a new work by Arthur Honegger, his Fourth Symphony, at the concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra this week. Jascha Heifetz is violin soloist in two concertos. The latter are the D major (K. 218) by Mozart, and the No. 2, in G minor, by Prokofieff, which Heifetz introduced here in 1937 and repeated in 1940. The one other number is "La Mer" by Debussy, and Serge Koussevitzky conducts.

This first Boston performance of the Honegger, yesterday afternoon, revealed a small, harmless, cheerful and cleverly factured work in three movements. It is essentially musicians' music, and its predominant merit I would think to be inward and technical.

The composer acknowledges a kinship with the spirit of Mozart and Haydn in this score, which is subtitled "Delights of Basel."

It was written in 1946. The title refers to the fact Honegger, at the time, was thinking how nice it would be to leave his "odious and stupid conditions of life" and run off to spend some time with his musical friends in the Swiss city. A couple of Basel songs are quoted.

It seems unlikely this Fourth Symphony will ever amount to much. But it is relatively pleasant and easy to take.

Two violin concertos more unlike, except in relative size of accompanying orchestras, would be hard to imagine. Nevertheless, Heifetz delivered some of his finest bowing and phrasing and flawless technic in both Mozart and the grotesquely modern Prokofieff. Each, moreover, went with impeccable style; the flavor of each was sharply differentiated.

Neither performance had a great deal of emotional heat. In that respect they suggested the old Heifetz of some years ago. But everything was neat and crisp and looked and sounded so easy. Such, in itself, is a good deal of a virtue. Needless to say, Heifetz was received by the Friday audience with much enthusiasm.

But the biggest ovation came at the end of "La Mer," which Koussevitzky had conducted like the wizard of color and subtlety and emotional tension that he is. At this point applause was compounded with cheers, and deservedly so.

Debussy, like Ravel, has been a specialty with Koussevitzky. I can think of no one who conducts those composers so well, let alone better. This was the definitive "La Mer."

SYMPHONY CONCERT

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Some 16 and a half hours after one Boston audience had shouted itself hoarse at the Opera House, a second acted in like fashion at Symphony Hall. The two occasions were the local premiere of Strauss' "Salome" and the repetition from last season of Mahler's Second Symphony, with Leonard Bernstein again conducting, and the chorus drawn once more from the choirs of Harvard and Radcliffe. Yesterday, however, the soloists were different. They were Adele Addison, soprano, and Nan Merriman, contralto. At this particular pair of concerts, as when Dr. Muck previously led this "Resurrection" Symphony here in 1918, no other piece stood on the program, making it probably the shortest regular Symphony Concert on record. And while an interval might have occurred between the first and second movements, where Mahler requests a pause of at least five minutes, there was no intermission.

Great was the contrast between these two works, so nearly contemporaneous, and from the hands of composers who were both colleagues and rivals. That both were conductors also had not a little to do with their mastery of the orchestra as an expressive medium. But whereas Strauss, in his setting of the decadent play of Wilde, gives us something close to the absolute zero in human degradation, Mahler is here concerned with humanity's loftiest aspiration, that for life beyond the grave. Yet so wide is the sphere of art that we can call both music drama and choral symphony masterpieces. Moreover, well known as they are elsewhere, Boston has been a bit slow in catching on to them.

If there is any weakness in the "Resurrection" Symphony it is in the undue length of the instrumental portion of the finale before the so eagerly-awaited chorus appears. Save for some unfortunate beeps in the brass section, the orchestral performance was an eloquent one. Mr. Bernstein loves this music and understands it, nor does he need a score when conducting it. There is not room on the stage of Symphony Hall for both an adequate chorus and the huge orchestra that Mahler requires in order to paint such weighty matters as death and the Day of Judgement. It did not seem to me that the group of yesterday sang with quite the volume of tone produced by its predecessor. Be that as it may, I am certain that Adele Addison fell way behind Ellabelle Davis in her conveyance of the soprano part. Miss Addison has a light, pretty voice, but something more than that is indicated for these apocalyptic doings. In the matter of size Miss Merriman's voice came closer to filling the bill, but it is possible to sing the wonderful solo that makes the fourth movement with

---

ATURDAY, FEBRUARY 26,

MUSIC

New Pianist, Symphony and De Carvalho Make Memorable Concert

By CYRUS DURGIN

Taken all in all yesterday's concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was one of the big and memorable ones of the season. First there was a tremendous new pianistic talent, Nicole Henriot, who in her Boston debut played the E-flat Concerto of Liszt. Second there was a new and interesting Symphony, the First, by the late Brazilian composer, Oscar Lorenzo Fernandez, which received first performance. And third, Eleazar de Carvalho, in his second round of appearances as guest conductor achieved the finest work one has yet heard from him.

Fernandez' Symphony, in the key of B major, is large of design and heavily, expertly scored, with much intricate detail. The first movemen and the slow one are conservative in idiom, but not old-fashioned; there are some Indian influences in the scherzo, and the finale is a big construction with powerful dissonance. Throughout there are evidences that Fernandez learned a good deal from the Frenchmen of, say, the generations of Debussy, Ravel and D'Indy.

Mostly the expressive nature o the Symphony is on a dark if no quite tragic emotional side, with agitated rhythms conjuring up wha De Carvalho refers to as an "anxious" quality. A long, metrically free solo theme, first coming out o the horns, plays an important par and in its way sets the genera atmosphere. This is skilled and solid symphonic writing, perhaps not o striking originality, but yet of engaging vitality and color. We ought to hear it again.

Nicole Henriot is only a month over 24, but she is definitely one of the future keyboard great. Even now her technical gifts are matured, and she plays with a virtuoso sweep. She can whisper and thunder, and go at uncanny speed, martellato octaves and all, and more important she plays with the broad style and the emotional warmth of a first-rate artist.

Yesterday the Liszt E-flat Concerto sounded brand new. The ovation which Mlle. Henriot received was historical in its length and enthusiasm. Time after time the blonde, attractive young woman was called back, entering and leaving the stage so fast it looked as if she were skittling along on roller skates.

All through the afternoon, there was a somewhat different De Carvalho before us, displaying the technical control and the dynamic vigor we have noticed already, but reading Fernandez, Liszt and "Thus Spake Zarathustra" of Strauss with an individuality, a bold freedom of expression which he had not mustered before. This was the young Brazilian conductor at his best, and it was decidedly impressive.

"Zarathustra," incidentally, had to be played without [illegible], since Halfpenny, who [illegible] taken the part, became sick a minute or two before the performance was to begin.

[262]

BALTIMORE, MD.
NEWS-POST
MAR 4 1949

Auditions Set By Berkshire Music Center

Dates are being announced for those who wish to apply for admission to the student orchestra or to the opera class, of the Berkshire Music Center, to open its session at Tanglewood, Mass., on July 4 under direction of Dr. Serge Koussevitsky.

April 12 is the date for instrumental auditions, the nearest center for this city being The Art Alliance, 251 South Eighteenth street, Philadelphia.

Strings will be heard at 1 P. M.; woodwinds at 2.30; brass at 3.30; piano at 4.30; harp, tympani and percussion at 7.

At 11 A. M. Tuesday Boris Goldovsky will hold auditions for the opera department at the Philadelphia Musical Academy, 1617 Spruce street. An accompanist will be present.

Particulars may be obtained from Thomas D. Perry, Jr., Berkshire Music Center, Symphony Hall, Boston 15, Mass.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
MAR. 6 - 1949

THE WORLD

By ROSS PARMENTER

CHILD: Representatives of the Holland Festival announced some time ago they would be presenting the world première of Benjamin Britten's "Spring Symphony." But Mr. Britten himself, it seems, has promised the first performance to Serge Koussevitzky. We have received a copy of a letter the composer wrote the conductor in November. Calling it "my latest child, your 'Spring Symphony'," he wrote:

"I am hopeful that it will be done in time for you to play the work in April. I will let you have bulletins from time to time so that you can make your programs accordingly. I am sorry to be so difficult and so unwilling to commit myself but the work is one of the biggest and most serious that I have ever undertaken and I do not want it to come out to you unless I am entirely satisfied with every semiquaver."

EL PASO, TEXAS
TIMES
MAR 6 1949

BOSTON SYMPHONY

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

After his long midseason vacation Dr. Koussevitzky returned yesterday to the Symphony Concerts. It was not, however, the first time that he had conducted in Symphony Hall since he exchanged the sun of Arizona for the winter snows of Massachusetts. He and the orchestra entertained the Friends of the Boston Symphony at the annual meeting Wednesday.

It is safe to assume that the current program was built round the First Piano Concerto of Brahms, that was the chosen vehicle of Dame Myra Hess, the soloist on this Friday-Saturday pair. Be that as it may, the list runs wholly to that composer's music. Unheard at these concerts since 1933, the "Tragic" Overture sounded an initial somber note and more or less set the key for the whole, while that seasonal visitor, the Fourth Symphony, brought the end.

Theoretically, an all-Brahms program, plus Myra Hess and a returning Koussevitzky should make an ideal combination for the Friday subscribers. Certainly there was no lack of enthusiasm, though the overture stirred hardly more than a few ripples of applause.

But there was not the frantic excitement of the week before when little Miss Henriot set them all by the ears with a very different first piano concerto, that of Franz Liszt.

This was an afternoon of serious music, some of it lofty and inspired, some of it, as in the working-out section of the Overture, on the dull side. Brahms was always an admirable technician, but there are places where he was not much else. Yet there are enough fine things in the "Tragic" Overture to make its revival worthwhile.

The First Piano Concerto is less sustained than the Second. There are times when Brahms' invention flags, and after what has come before, the concluding pages of the rondo, in which Brahms strove for a brilliant ending, as well as a happy one, are somewhat out of character. In spite of this final brave attempt at gaiety, the Concerto was a long time in making its way, and even today it requires of the listener an almost reverent attention.

We have heard more powerful performances of the work than that of yesterday, speaking now of the piano part, but none that were more poetic, more devout, more imbued with the Brahmsian spirit. As in her recent Symphony Hall recital, Dame Myra played with the music before her. Actually, whether a soloist or a conductor uses the notes makes little difference. The important thing is that the music be well conducted or well performed.

MUSIC

Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, gave the 18th program of the [illegible] season in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. The soloist was Myra Hess. The all-Brahms program consisted of the Tragic Overture, the Piano Concerto No. 1 in D minor and the Symphony No. 4 in E minor.

By RUDOLPH ELIE

Serge Koussevitzky returned for the final lap of his 25th and valedictory season yesterday afternoon, fit and sun-tanned following his mid-winter vacation in Arizona, and devoted the entire program to the music of Brahms. Myra Hess appeared as soloist in the D minor Concerto and it all added up to a good solid concert though not one marked by any especial notability.

Although it is true that Brahms is one of the few whose music can sustain the "all' in an all-anybody concert, yesterday's choice of the Tragic Overture, the D minor Piano Concerto and the Fourth Symphony doesn't offer quite the contrast in mood that makes for a well-rounded program. The Overture, though not particularly tragic in character, is nonetheless in a dark, melancholy vein. So, in fact, is the Concerto; its first two movements are unmost unrelievedly sombre (the slow movement indeed has long and probably erroneously been considered a sort of farewell to Schumann), while the rondo, though jocose in spirit is hardly gay. There is a gentle melancholy pervading the Fourth, too, a symphony that is certainly the summit of Brahms' art. Individually any of these works are a rich musical experience; all together they prove heavy.

Myra Hess, at once a great personality, a great musician and a great woman, displayed once again the depth of her musical perception in the Brahms. It is not exactly a woman's concerto, not that women can't play it but that everything about it seems to call for the straight-off-the-top-of-Mount-Olympus quality of a bearded prophet. This is a little absurd in view of the fact that Brahms was only 21 when he composed it, but nonetheless there is an air of pompous majesty, even of self-conscious grandeur about it that calls for a pianist combining the qualities of Horowitz, Solomon and God.

Dame Myra, however, is only a distinguished Englishwoman who is no prophet and does not have the extraordinary technical command called for in Brahms' individual piano style. Notwithstanding this, she more than made up for it in the devotional reading she gave the work in the tender lyrical passages of the first movement and, in particular, in the beautiful adagio. And there is no question but that her forcefulness and momentum were effective. It was, in fine, a splendid but not an ultimate performance either by pianist or orchestra.

As always, on returning from a brief vacation, Dr. Koussevitzky took no time at all to demonstrate that he is, all said and done, the master. He is, for the most of us, the measuring stick; we compare others to him not him to others. Everything about him, from the way he walks onto the stage to the way he calls upon the musicians to soar to new heights of tonal splendor, is matchless in its effect. And yesterday, in Brahms' great Fourth Symphony, he was in the top of his form.

The revised program for next week offers Gregor Piatigorsky, cellist, in two concertos: those of Milhaud and Saint-Saens. The program begins with Roussel's F major Suite and ends with Tchaikovsky's Fourth Symphony.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
NEWS
MAR 10 1949

Conductor Honored

A dinner and concert in honor of Serge Koussevitzky, retiring conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will be given on May 10 in the grand ballroom of the Waldorf-Astoria.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
POST
HOME NEWS
MAR 11 1949

Noted U. S. Musicians Cable Welcome to Shostakovich

A cablegram of welcome to Dimitri Shostakovich, Soviet Russian composer, has been dispatched by a number of prominent musicians, the National Council of the Arts, Sciences and Professions said today.

Shostakovich is expected to attend the "Cultural and Scientific Conference for World Peace" Mar. 25-27 at the Waldorf.

"We are delighted to learn of your forthcoming visit to the U. S. and welcome you as one of the outstanding composers of the world," the cablegram said. "Music is an international language and your visit will serve to symbolize the bond which music can create among all people."

The signers were listed by NCASP as Serge Koussevitzky, Lawrence Tibbett, Vladimir Horowitz, Leonard Bernstein, Eugene Ormandy, Roy Harris, Randall Thompson, Morton Gould, Dmitri Mitropolous, Lukas Foss, Gian Carlo Menotti, Paul Creston, Artie Shaw, Warner Lawson, Richard Burgin, Lehman Engel, Guy Hutchins and Samuel Barber.

HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES
MAR 12 1949

Student Orchestras Auditions Slated

Auditions for admission to the student orchestras at the Berkshire Music Center will be held next week in the Recital Hall, Carnegie Hall: strings, Wednesday, 10 a. m.; woodwinds, Thursday, 10 a. m.; brass, Friday, 10 a. m.; piano, Friday, 11:30 a. m.

HANOVER, PA.
SUN
MAR 12 1949

The Boston Symphony Orchestra announces its Twelfth annual Berkshire Festival to open at Tanglewood, in Lenox, Massachusetts, on July 16. The Festival will be the climax of the Twenty-fifth season of Serge Koussevitzky as the conductor of the orchestra.

Nine concerts will be given in the Music Shed, through three week-ends, on Thursday evenings, Saturday evenings, and Sunday afternoons (Series A on July 28, 30 and 31; Series B, August 4, 6, and 7; Series C, August 11, 13 and 14). The guest conductors of the Festival will be Leonard Bernstein and Eleazar de Carvalho. Soloists will be announced. Before these concerts in the large Music Shed by the full orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky will conduct four concerts by an orchestra of smaller proportions in the intimate Theater-Concert Hall. These concerts will be given on the Saturday evening and Sunday afternoon of two week-ends, July 16-17, and July 23-24. Two different programs will be given each week-end. These will be drawn from the music of Bach and Mozart, as in previous seasons, and this year music of Haydn and Schubert will be added.

Art—Music—Theater 5

Week-End Symphony

Piatigorsky to Be Soloist In Milhaud Cello Concerto

Melody, according to Darius Milhaud, is "the only living element in music." It permits a work to survive.

And melody is never conspicuous by its absence in this Frenchman's writing. There is abundant melodic line in his first Cello Concerto, to be heard by Symphony Hall patrons for the first time tomorrow afternoon and Saturday evening. Gregor Piatigorsky will be the soloist. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

An erstwhile member of the famous "French Six," Milhaud is now exerting a profound influence on American music as an educator at Mills College in California, where he has taught since 1940. He wrote his Cello Concerto in 1934. The Little Orchestra Society gave the work its American première on Jan. 3 of this year at Times Hall, New York City. Thomas Scherman directed; Piatigorsky was soloist.

⁂

Miles Kastendieck made the following observations in the New York Journal American on this occasion: "In frankly nonchalant mood, Milhaud has tossed off a delightful work. It unabashedly espouses the popular, yet pauses a moment to pursue serious thought. The orchestration is fascinating, but the value of the music lies in an exceptional piece of writing for cello.

"The first and third movements capture the beguiling lilt of folksy music with more than a dash of syncopation to make the [illegible] carefree. The second lets the cello sing in full-throated glory. Each captures its mood securely but treats it as a passing fancy."

Sounding a slightly cooler note, Robert Bagar set down these impressions for the New York World-Telegram: "It is a light, tossed-off sort of piece, with a first movement not unlike a popular song with one or two loftier pretensions. Throughout the work there is mostly conventional harmony, excepting little nips, here and there, at the corners of things.

⁂

"The second movement offers a reflective solo, set amidst passages of somber and doleful sonorities of the muted brass, distant drums, and tremolos on the bridge in the violas. And the third is a happy, sparkling, festive selection with much leaping about for the cello."

But Milhaud has said certain definite things about his approach to composition, and we arrive at a fuller understanding of his works by looking to the man himself. He writes:

"I have never been able to understand the establishment of different categories in music: classical music and modern music; serious music and light music. It is most unjust. There is only music, and one can find it in a café melody or an operetta tune as well as in a symphony, an opera, or a work of chamber music.

⁂

"I have no aesthetic rules or philosophy, or theories," he continues. "I love to write music. I always do it with pleasure; otherwise I must not write it. I have always made it my rule to accept musical jobs of every kind. Naturally, there are certain types of work I prefer; but a composer should do everything with application, with all the resources of contemporary technique at his disposal."

The short movements of Milhaud's Cello Concerto are marked Nonchalant, Grave, and Joyeux. Mr. Piatigorsky will also play the Saint-Saëns Concerto in A minor. Dr. Koussevitzky will open the program with Roussel's Suite in F and close it with Tchaikovsky's Fourth Symphony. H. R.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
NEWS
MAR 1[illegible]

TANGLEWOOD ALUMNI WILL HAVE REUNION

Tanglewood Alumni Association will hold its first general meeting for the organization of former Berkshire Music Center students in the Boston area on Sunday, at 7 p. m. in Symphony Hall. Among the guest speakers will be Lukas Foss '40, composer and conductor and official pianist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Association has been in progress of organization for several months and already has chapters organized in New York, Chicago and Philadelphia. Cynthia Sweeney of New Bedford is National Secretary. The Boston Chapter will include all of New England.

This meeting will be the first general meeting in Boston and the first reunion of all Tanglewood students now living in Boston and studying in Boston colleges and convservatories. Preliminary committee meetings have already laid plans for an interesting program of activities including public and private concerts and performances of new compositions.

MERIDEN, CONN.
RECORD

Auditions in New York for Tanglewood Summer School

Auditions for admission to the student orchestras of the Berkshire Music Center will be held this week in New York by members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra who are also members of the faculty of the Berkshire Music Center, Tanglewood. The Music Center, which is sponsored by the Boston Symphony, is directed by Serge Koussevitzky, with Aaron Copland as Assistant Director. This summer's session, the seventh, will be held from July 4th through August 14th.

The auditions for orchestral instruments will be held in the Recital Hall of Carnegie Hall, 154 West 57th Street, New York, as follows:

Strings, Wednesday, March [illegible] at 10 a. m.

Woodwinds, Thursday, the [illegible] at 10 a. m.

Brass, Friday, the 18th, [illegible] a. m.

Piano, Friday, March [illegible] 11:30 a. m.

Auditions for tympani, percussion and harp will be held on the stage at Carnegie Hall on Wednesday, March 16, at 6:30 p. m. Please use street entrance.

Opera auditions. Boris Goldovski, head of the opera department at the Berkshire Music Center, will hold auditions for singers who wish to apply for admission in the Chapter Room of Carnegie Hall, Friday, March 18, at 10 a. m.

The catalogue of the Berkshire Music Center and information about the courses of study may be obtained from Thomas Perry, Symphony Hall, Boston, Mass.

LOS ANGELES, CAL.
NEWS
MAR 3 1949

Tanglewood again opens

Getting closer to home, we have the summer school of the Boston Symphony, the Berkshire Music Center, opening its annual six-weeks session at Tanglewood July 4, to continue through the period of the Berkshire Festival concerts at Lenox, Mass., which this year climax Serge Koussevitsky's 25th anniversary season.

This year Aaron Copland will be assistant director to Koussevitsky, with Parisian composer Olivier Messiaen making his first American visit to join Copland as teacher of composition.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
NEWS
MAR 2 - 1949

Berkshire Trials

Boris Goldovsky will audition singers for the Berkshire Music Center at Carnegie Hall, Friday morning, and the following Friday.

BALTIMORE, MD.
NEWS-POST
MAR [illegible] 1949

Auditions Se
By Berkshire Music Center

Dates are being announced fo those who wish to apply for admission to the student orchestra or to the opera class, of the Berkshire Music Center, to open its session at Tanglewood, Mass., on July 4 under direction of Dr. Serge Koussevitsky.

April 12 is the date for instrumental auditions, the nearest center for this city being The Art Alliance, 251 South Eighteenth street, Philadelphia.

Strings will be heard at 1 P. M.; woodwinds at 2.30; brass at 3.30; piano at 4.30; harp, tympani and percussion at 7.

At 11 A. M. Tuesday Boris Goldovsky will hold auditions for the opera department at the Philadelphia Musical Academy, 1617 Spruce street. An accompanist will be present.

Particulars may be obtained from Thomas D. Perry, Jr., Berkshire Music Center, Symphony Hall, Boston 15, Mass.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
MAR. 6 - 1949

THE WORLD

By ROSS PARMENTER

CHILD: Representatives of the Holland Festival announced some time ago they would be presenting the world première of Benjamin Britten's "Spring Symphony." But Mr. Britten himself, it seems, has promised the first performance to Serge Koussevitzky. We have received a copy of a letter the composer wrote the conductor in November. Calling it "my latest child, your 'Spring Symphony'," he wrote:

"I am hopeful that it will be done in time for you to play the work in April. I will let you have bulletins from time to time so that you can make your programs accordingly. I am sorry to be so difficult and so unwilling to commit myself but the work is one of the biggest and most serious that I have ever undertaken and I do not want it to come out to you unless I am entirely satisfied with every semiquaver."

EL PASO, TEXAS
TIMES
MAR 6 1949

Berkshire Music Fete Opens July 16

New York. (UP)—The 12th annual Berkshire Festival will open at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass., on July 16, the Boston Symphony Orchestra announces. The festival will climax the 25th season of Serge Koussevitzky as conductor of the orchestra.

Nine concerts will be given in the Tanglewood music shed, through three week-ends, on Thursday evenings, Saturday evenings, and Sunday afternoons (series A on July 28, 30 and 31; series B, Aug. 4, 6, and 7; series C, Aug. 11, 13, and 14). The guest conductors of the festival will be Leonard Bernstein and Eleazar de Carvalho. Soloists will be announced.

Before the concerts in the large music shed by the full orchestra Dr. Koussevitzky will conduct four concerts by a smaller orchestra in the intimate theater-concert hall. These concerts will be given on the Saturday evening and Sunday afternoon of two week-ends, July 16-17, and July 23-24. Two different programs will be given each week end. They will be drawn from the music of Bach and Mozart, as in previous seasons, and this year music of Haydn and Schubert will be added

In connection with the Koussevitzky anniversary, the Boston Orchestra has arranged with RCA Victor to distribute a souvenir album of double bass recordings made by Dr. Koussevitzky in 1929 when he played for the last time the instrument which first brought him fame. The album, containing three vinylite records, will be sold for $10 each. All proceeds will go to the Koussevitzky anniversary fund of the orchestra.

A dinner and concert in honor of Serge Koussevitzky, retiring conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will be given on May 10 in the grand ballroom of the Waldorf-Astoria.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
POST
HOME NEWS
MAR 11 1949

Noted U. S. Musicians Cable Welcome to Shostakovich

A cablegram of welcome to Dimitri Shostakovich, Soviet Russian composer, has been dispatched by a number of prominent musicians, the National Council of the Arts, Sciences and Professions said today.

Shostakovich is expected to attend the "Cultural and Scientific Conference for World Peace" Mar. 25-27 at the Waldorf.

"We are delighted to learn of your forthcoming visit to the U. S. and welcome you as one of the outstanding composers of the world," the cablegram said. "Music is an international language and your visit will serve to symbolize the bond which music can create among all people."

The signers were listed by NCASP as Serge Koussevitzky, Lawrence Tibbett, Vladimir Horowitz, Leonard Bernstein, Eugene Ormandy, Roy Harris, Randall Thompson, Morton Gould, Dmitri Mitropolous, Lukas Foss, Gian Carlo Menotti, Paul Creston, Artie Shaw, Warner Lawson, Richard Burgin, Lehman Engel, Guy Hutchins and Samuel Barber.

MUSIC

Mar 5 Herald

Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, gave the 18th program of the [illegible] Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. The soloist was Myra Hess. The [illegible] program consisted of the Tragic Overture, the Piano Concerto No. 1 in D minor, and the Symphony No. 4 in E minor.

By RUDOLPH ELIE

Serge Koussevitzky returned for the final lap of his 25th and valedictory season yesterday afternoon, fit and sun-tanned following his mid-winter vacation in Arizona, and devoted the entire program to the music of Brahms. Myra Hess appeared as soloist in the D minor Concerto and it all added up to a good solid concert though not one marked by any especial notability.

Although it is true that Brahms is one of the few whose music can sustain the "all' in an all-anybody concert, yesterday's choice of the Tragic Overture, the D minor Piano Concerto and the Fourth Symphony doesn't offer quite the contrast in mood that makes for a well-rounded program. The Overture, though not particularly tragic in character, is nonetheless in a dark, melancholy vein. So, in fact, is the Concerto; its first two movements are unmost unrelievedly sombre (the slow movement indeed has long and probably erroneously been considered a sort of farewell to Schumann), while the rondo, though jocose in spirit is hardly gay. There is a gentle melancholy pervading the Fourth, too, a symphony that is certainly the summit of Brahms' art. Individually any of these works are a rich musical experience; all together they prove heavy.

Myra Hess, at once a great personality, a great musician and a great woman, displayed once again the depth of her musical perception year, will be at first base when the Regulars and Yannigans play their first intra-squad game Sunday. He indicated Fleming has a fine chance to take over the regular first-base post from Ed Stevens.

---

The Buc skipper said Wally Judnich, outfielder bought from Cleveland, probably will see a lot of duty in centrefield during the season.

BOXING GOSSIP
by Doc Almy

While over the years we have seen many wrestling and glove bouts, some very good and others equally bad, the combination of these branches of strenuous sport such as was afforded by Zanelli vs. Cesario, dual N. E. ring titles the stake, at the Garden the other night was mighty tough on the eyes of this and many other beholders. While it could have been a pretty fair scrap, at least as it shaped up on paper, it turned out to be merely a case of Zanelli continually barging in, receiving a few pokes to the face and then a clinching, holding, maulfest with one principal about as guilty as the other.

The lone fairly clean blow scored in the entire 12 rounds was landed by Zanelli, a left hook to the head at the start of the fourth, which knocked Cesario down for the official eight-count. When this cereform.

---

The revised program for next week offers Gregor Piatigorsky, cellist, in two concertos: those of Milhaud and Saint-Saens. The program begins with Roussel's F major Suite and ends with Tchaikovsky's Fourth Symphony.

HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES
MAR 12 1949

Student Orchestras Auditions Slated

Auditions for admission to the student orchestras at the Berkshire Music Center will be held next week in the Recital Hall, Carnegie Hall: strings, Wednesday, 10 a. m.; woodwinds, Thursday, 10 a. m.; brass, Friday, 10 a. m.; piano, Friday, 11:30 a. m.

HANOVER, PA.
SUN
MAR 12 1949

The Boston Symphony Orchestra announces its Twelfth annual Berkshire Festival to open at Tanglewood, in Lenox, Massachusetts, on July 16. The Festival will be the climax of the Twenty-fifth season of Serge Koussevitzky as the conductor of the orchestra.

Nine concerts will be given in the Music Shed, through three week-ends, on Thursday evenings, Saturday evenings, and Sunday afternoons (Series A on July 28, 30 and 31; Series B, August 4, 6, and 7; Series C, August 11, 13 and 14). The guest conductors of the Festival will be Leonard Bernstein and Eleazar de Carvalho. Soloists will be announced. Before these concerts in the large Music Shed by the full orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky will conduct four concerts by an orchestra of smaller proportions in the intimate Theater-Concert Hall. These concerts will be given on the Saturday evening and Sunday afternoon of two week-ends, July 16-17, and July 23-24. Two different programs will be given each week-end. They will be drawn from the music of Bach and Mozart, as in previous seasons, and this year music of Haydn and Schubert will be added.

[263]

Week-End Symphony

Piatigorsky to Be Soloist In Milhaud Cello Concerto

Melody, according to Darius Milhaud, is "the only living element in music." It permits a work to survive.

And melody is never conspicuous by its absence in this Frenchman's writing. There is abundant melodic line in his first Cello Concerto, to be heard by Symphony Hall patrons for the first time tomorrow afternoon and Saturday evening. Gregor Piatigorsky will be the soloist. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

An erstwhile member of the famous "French Six," Milhaud is now exerting a profound influence on American music as an educator at Mills College in California, where he has taught since 1940. He wrote his Cello Concerto in 1934. The Little Orchestra Society gave the work its American première on Jan. 3 of this year at Times Hall, New York City. Thomas Scherman directed; Piatigorsky was soloist.

⁂

Miles Kastendieck made the following observations in the New York Journal American on this occasion: "In frankly nonchalant mood, Milhaud has tossed off a delightful work. It unabashedly espouses the popular, yet pauses pursue serious chestration is fase value of the exceptional piece ello.

third movements iling lilt of folksy
e than a dash of syncopation to make them vividly carefree. The second lets the cello sing in full-throated glory. Each captures its mood securely but treats it as a passing fancy."

Sounding a slightly cooler note, Robert Bagar set down these impressions for the New York World-Telegram: "It is a light, tossed-off sort of piece, with a first movement not unlike a popular song with one or two loftier pretensions. Throughout the work there is mostly conventional harmony, excepting little nips, here and there, at the corners of things.

⁂

"The second movement offers a reflective solo, set amidst passages of somber and direful sonorities of the muted brass, distant drums, and tremolos on the bridge in the violas. And the third is a happy, sparkling, festive selection with much leaping about for the cello."

But Milhaud has said certain definite things about his approach to composition, and we arrive at a fuller understanding of his works by looking to the man himself. He writes:

"I have never been able to understand the establishment of different categories in music: classical music and modern music; serious music and light music. It is most unjust. There is only music, and one can find it in a café melody or an operetta tune as well as in a symphony, an opera, or a work of chamber music.

⁂

"I have no aesthetic rules, or philosophy, or theories," he continues. "I love to write music. I always do it with pleasure; otherwise I just do not write it. I have always made it my business to accept musical jobs of every kind. Naturally, there are certain types of work I prefer; but a composer should do everything with application, with all the resources of contemporary technique at his disposal."

The short movements of Milhaud's Cello Concerto are marked Nonchalant, Grave, and Joyeux. Mr. Piatigorsky will also play the Saint-Saëns Concerto in A minor. Dr. Koussevitzky will open the program with Roussel's Suite in F and close it with Tchaikovsky's Fourth Symphony. H. R.

Eddie said that his ankle, broken at Brooklyn, on July 8, had given him no trouble since his operation on Dec. 18 in Mobile, Ala.

Pleased With Salary

"Three days ago I played 18 holes of golf and also took part in an hour and a half baseball drill without any ill effects, so I know I'm all set for this season," he observed. "I'm 100 per cent satisfied with my salary, otherwise I wouldn't be here."

Stanky held a reunion with another famed ex-Dodger, Pete Reiser, and afterwards talked with Billy Southworth.

Outfielder Jim Russell arrived late this evening. He flew to Tampa and took a bus from there to Bradenton.

The Braves now have their championship 1948 infield intact with Earl Torgeson, who has abandoned his contact lenses on the field, at first, Stanky at second, Alvin Dark at short and Bob Elliott on third.

Reiser Tries Third Base

Reiser has been working out at third as well as in the outfield and Southworth stated this afternoon that if Elliott should be incapacitated, Pete might fill in for him. "In that way we would keep our power in the lineup," Billy ex-

---

, MASS.
1949

ALUMNI
VE REUNION

mni Association neral meeting for former Berkshire
ts in the Boston
7 p. m. in Sym-
the guest speak-oss '40, composer
fficial pianist of y Orchestra.
been in prog-on for several has chapters orrk, Chicago and Sweeney of New Secretary. The
l include all o

This meeting will be the first general meeting in Boston and the first reunion of all Tanglewood students now living in Boston and studying in Boston colleges and conservatories. Preliminary committee meetings have already laid plans for an interesting program of activities including public and private concerts and performances of new compositions.

LOS ANGELES, CAL.
NEWS
MAR 3 1949

Tanglewood again opens

Getting closer to home, we have the summer school of the Boston Symphony, the Berkshire Music Center, opening its annual six-weeks session at Tanglewood July 4, to continue through the period of the Berkshire Festival concerts at Lenox, Mass., which this year climax Serge Koussevitsky's 25th anniversary.

This year Aaron Copland will be assistant director to Koussevitsky, with Parisian composer Olivier Messiaen making his first American visit to join Copland as teacher of composition.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
NEWS
MAR 2 - 1949

Berkshire Trials

Boris Goldovsky will audition singers for the Berkshire Music Center at Carnegie Hall, Friday morning, and the following Friday.

MERIDEN, CONN.
RECORD

Auditions in New York for Tanglewood Summer School

Auditions for admission to the student orchestras of the Berkshire Music Center will be held this week in New York by members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra who are also members of the faculty of the Berkshire Music Center, Tanglewood. The Music Center, which is sponsored by the Boston Symphony, is directed by Serge Koussevitzky, with Aaron Copland as Assistant Director. This summer's session, the seventh, will be held from July 4th through August 14th.

The auditions for orchestral instruments will be held in the Recital Hall of Carnegie Hall, 154 West 57th Street, New York as follows:

Strings, Wednesday, March 16 at 10 a. m.

Woodwinds, Thursday, the 17th, at 10 a. m.

Brass, Friday, the 18th, at 10 a. m.

Piano, Friday, March 18 at 11:30 a. m.

Auditions for tympani, percussion and harp will be held backstage at Carnegie Hall on Wednesday, March 16, at 6:30 p. m. Please use street entrance.

Opera auditions. Boris Goldowski, head of the opera department at the Berkshire Music Center will hold auditions for singers who wish to apply for admission in the Chapter Room of Carnegie Hall Friday, March 18, at 10 a. m.

The catalogue of the Berkshire Music Center and information about the courses of study may be obtained from Thomas Perry, Symphony Hall, Boston, Mass.

HARTFORD, CONN. TIMES

MAR 12 1949

Resolved: Respect, Affection

ENGROSSED resolution expressing the community's respect and affection will be presented Dr. Serge Koussevitzky Monday night when he appears at the Bushnell Memorial. Mrs. Elizabeth Wel[illegible] Cooley is holding the resolution.—[Hartford Times Photo

---

BUFFALO, N. Y. NEWS

[illegible] 12 1949

Auditions for admission to student orchestras of the Berkshire Music Center will be held in New York next week. Auditions for orchestral instruments will be held in Carnegie Hall, 154 West 57th St., as follows: Strings, Wednesday at 10 A. M.; woodwinds, Thursday, at 10 A. M.; brass, Friday, at 10 A. M.; piano, Friday, at 11:30 A. M. Auditions for tympani, percussion and harp will be held backstage in the hall Wednesday at 6:30 P. M. Opera auditions will be conducted Friday at 10 A. M.. Information may be obtained from Thomas Perry, Symphony Hall, Boston 15, Mass.

* * *

Richard Seibold will discuss Franck's Symphonic Variations in his music appreciation class in the Buffalo Museum of Science Monday at 7:30 P. M.

* * *

BOSTON HERALD, SATURDAY, MARCH 12,

MUSIC

Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, gave the 19th program of the 68th season in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. Gregor Piatigorsky, cellist, was the soloist. The program:

Suite in F major, Op 33..........Roussel
Concerto for Violoncello, No. 1...Milhaud
Concerto for Violoncello in A minor, Op. 33..................Saint-Saens
Symphony No. 4 in F minor, Op. 36 Tchaikovsky

By RUDOLPH ELIE

You would think the last word had been said on Tchaikovsky's Fourth Symphony 20 years ago; indeed, unless you had a special place in your heart for this whacking symphony of passion and sentimentality run amuck you might have toyed with the idea of ducking out at the intermission. And if you had you would have missed one of the day's most astonishing musical phenomena: Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony orchestra creating, out of dead symbols on a printed page, music of such impact the only response to it is a yell. Once again, the incredible Serge Koussevitzky!

Tchaikovsky, whatever he may be to others is to Koussevitzky what the fountain of youth would have been to Ponce de Leon. All he has to do, apparently, is take one draught of this heady water and of a sudden the years melt away from him as snow in a hot spring. Not that he ever seems his 75 years in anything, but Tchaikovsky—there is the potion that takes his years away.

While energizing him physically, however, the potion still allows the greater Koussevitzky to remain in command. And so he brings to bear all the wisdom, the ripe maturity, the musical authority of his years. The result yesterday was that, for me at least, the Fourth was a virtually new experience. I had never before realized the drama of the opening moments as the composer sets the stage for the turbulent events to follow. Nor, for that matter, had the slow movement ever seemed so elevated in mood; it had always previously seemed mawkish. The pizzicato movement, hitherto seemingly as fresh as a three months old hit parade tune, had wonderful grace and fastidiousness while the finale, until now just about possible to take, all but unseated me. It was a terrific performance and it earned Dr. Koussevitzky (who seemed as pleased as his audience) a clamorous response.

* * *

The symphony was not the only notable aspect by any means, for the first half of the concert was amply rewarding, too. There was Gregor Piatigorsky, perhaps our greatest cellist, in the very top of his form in two exceedingly effective concertos. The Milhaud, receiving its first Boston performance, is a composition that begins with a captivating, even lilting first movement called "nonchalant," passes through a solemn "grave" and ends with an ebullient, rousing finale called "joyeux." Dating from 1934, it is happy work that offers no problems for the listener whatever [illegible] how the cellist solves his [illegible] for me. The same [illegible] be said of the Saint-Saens concerto. There are no problems [illegible] at all for the listener; more grateful music for the cello would be hard to imagine Mr. Piatigorsky, a man whose stature and stage presence lends his playing additional interest (for his technical mastery is in a class by itself), was excellently accompanied by conductor and orchestra and got his usual ovation.

The concert began with Roussel's F major Suite, a work that deserves a good deal more comment than it will get at the moment, what with space running out, but one that speaks well enough for itself. In short, a concert that ranks high in a season of highs. Next week the orchestra is off on its final tour. It returns on March 23 with Leonard Bernstein repeating the great Second Symphony of Mahler with Adele Addison and Nan Merriman as soloists and the Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe Choral [illegible]

NEW YORK, N. Y. HERALD TRIBUNE

MAR 13 1949

Dinner and Concert To Honor Koussevitzky

A dinner and concert in honor of Serge Koussevitzky, who is completing his twenty-fifth and last year as the Boston Symphony Orchestra's regular conductor, will be held on Tuesday night, May 10 at the Waldorf-Astoria Hotel under the auspices of the League of Composers and a group of Dr Koussevitzky's friends. Both he and conductors trained by him will take part in the program, which will include works commissioned by the Koussevitzky Foundation.

Prominent composers of several countries have been invited to become honorary sponsors for this event. Messages have already been received from Richard Strauss, Ralph Vaughan Williams, Francesco Malipiero, Jacques Ibert, Pavel Borkevic, of Czechoslovakia, and Carlos Chavez, and many American composers and foreign composers living in the United States are planning to attend. Reservations can be made at Suite 1533, 9 Rockefeller Plaza, New York 20, or by calling COlumbus, 5-7460.

The members of the dinner committee include Aaron Copeland, Leonard Bernstein, Mrs. Arthur M. Reis, Mrs. N. Penrose Hallowell, Mrs. Robert Woods Bliss, Mrs. William C. Breed, Mrs. Harold Brooks, Mrs. Otto H. Kahn, Alfred Knopf, Mrs. Charles E. Mitchell, Mrs. John T. Pratt, William Schuman, Miss Gertrude Robinson Smith and Lieutenant Colonel John A. Warner.

CINCINNATI, OHIO ENQUIRER

MAR 13 1949

AN ALBUM of double-bass recordings has been issued by RCA-Victor, with Serge Koussevitzky, greatest living virtuouso of the instrument, appearing both as soloist and composer. The albums are being sold as souvenirs of the 25th anniversary of Koussevitzky's baton reign with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, proceeds going to the conductor's Anniversary Fund. The conductor, who regretfully laid aside the huge instrument after a Carnegie Hall recital in 1929, plays an "Andante" from his own Concerto for Double-Bass, his "Chanson Triste" and "Valse Miniature"—plus a Largo from a Sonata by Henry Eccles (early 18th century English comoser) and a Lullaby by the contemporary, Laska. There is no bass-slappin here, not even a pizzicato. Difficult, even awkward listening the firt time one plays these records, they improve immeassurably on more intimate association. There is a note of Rachmaninoff, and Tchaikovsky in the "Andant," of Bach in the "Largo," and Brahms in the Cradle Song." Tasteful piano accompaniment is by Pierre Luboshutz.

AN ALBUM of double-bass recordings has been issued by RCA-Victor, with Serge Koussevitzky greatest living virtuouso of the instrument, appearing both as soloist and composer. The albums are being sold as souvenirs of the 25th anniversary of Koussevitzky's baton reign with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, proceeds going to the conductor's Anniversary Fund. The conductor, who regretfully laid aside the huge instrument after a Carnegie Hall recital in 1929, plays an "Andante" from his own Concerto for Double-Bass, his "Chanson Triste" and "Valse Miniature"—plus a Largo from a Sonata by Henry Eccles (early 18th century English comoser) and a Lullaby by the contemporary, Laska. There is no bass-slappin here, not even a pizzicato. Difficult, even awkward listening the firt time one plays these records, they improve immeassurably on more intimate association. There is a note of Rachmaninoff, and Tchaikovsky in the "Andant," of Bach in the "Largo," and Brahms in the Cradle Song." Tasteful piano accompaniment is by Pierre Luboshutz.

TULSA, OKLA. WORLD

MAR 13 1949

Bass Fiddlers Get Edge On Piccolo Players

BOSTON (UP)—The bass players in the Boston Symphony orchestra envy the piccolo players when it comes to toting instruments from place to place, but they come into their own when the orchestra is on tour.

Then, all musicians but the bass players have to get their suitcase-increased evening clothes pressed before the performance. The bass players have no such problem. While traveling, they hang their evening clothes inside the big wooden boxes used to protect their instruments.

CINCINNATI, OHIO POST

MAR 13 1949

ANOTHER THING that distinguishes the Robert Merrill show is the blessed absence of studio applause. No doubt there is an audience in Boston's Symphony Hall But it's not permitted to waste time or destroy the intimacy of the program with palm beating. For that, someone or other rates hearty thanks.

TULSA, OKLA. WORLD

[illegible] 1949

Berkshire Festival Plans Announced

Serge Koussevitsky has announced plans for the 1949 session of the Berkshire Music Center, the Summer school of the Boston Symphony orchestra at Tanglewood in Massachusetts. The center will have a six-week session from July 4 to Aug. 14, during which the Berkshire festival concerts will be given.

Dr. Koussevitsky will direct the school, with Aaron Copland as assistant director. The faculty will include Olivier Messiaen, Parisian composer on his first visit to America; Gregor Piatigorsky, Leonard Bernstein, Richard Burgin, Eleazar de Carvalho and Hugh Ross.

[illegible] MARCH 12, 1949 Art—Music—Theater *11

Soloist With the Symphony

Milhaud's Cello Concerto No. 1 Introduced

By L. A. Sloper

Gregor Piatigorsky gave the first Boston performance of Darius Milhaud's Cello Concerto No. 1 at yesterday's Boston Symphony concert, the nineteenth of the Friday series. Dr. Koussevitzky conducting. The soloist also offered the Saint-Saëns Concerto in A minor, which had rested on the shelves for a decade, to fill out the playing time. Another French work, Roussel's Suite in F major, opened the program. The final [illegible] scheduled was Tchaikovsky's Fourth Symphony.

Milhaud's concerto is a light-hearted work, which bears out the composer's statement that he loves to write music and always does so with pleasure. The end movements are marked "Nonchalant" and "Joyeux," which fairly well describes them, except that "Dreamy" might be a better appellation for the first. The last is lively and gay. The second, marked "Grave," is just so. The cello sings a little mournfully to a background of quiet weeping in the orchestra. But the important thing is that the cello sings throughout. If the work is not world-shaking, it is very agreeable in the "pure music" tradition.

And that is precisely what Roussel was attempting in his Suite in F. He accomplished it, too, but not so deftly as Milhaud. He had fun, but at the cost of considerable labor. On a fourth hearing, only the middle movement of his Suite (which is dedicated to Dr. Koussevitzky) made much appeal. Roussel resembles Mahler in one particular: he is honored chiefly in his own country.

Mr. Piatigorsky, of course, distinguished himself both in the Milhaud and in the Saint-Saëns. He is a musician and a master of his instrument. He received an ovation.

• So did Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra, who equally distinguished themselves in the widely divergent accompaniments of the two concerti, besides providing a technically brilliant and musically persuasive account of Roussel's Suite. And everybody knows what Koussevitzky can accomplish with Tchaikovsky.

NEW YORK, N. Y. TIMES

MAR 13 1949

GIFT: When Serge Koussevitzky conducted his final concert with the Boston Symphony in Providence, R. I., recently, he was accorded a standing ovation from the audience and presented with a citation from Brown University and a check for $6,462. John Nicholas Brown, who presented the check, explained the odd sum was reached by the different sized gifts of 258 grateful Rhode Islanders.

HEMIDEMISEMIQUAVERS: Members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be in New York this week auditioning applicants for the student orchestra of the Berkshire Music Centre, and Boris Goldovsky will audition singers for the center's opera department on Friday. . . . Music Reporter, which reprints the New York music criticisms, lists fifteen more debutants for February, bringing the total to 118 this season. . . . The American Junior Red Cross and the Music Educators National Conference are planning to send 1,000 albums of recorded American school music to be distributed in foreign schools. . . . Arthur Cohn and Nicolas Slonimsky are leaving for Europe next month to round up music for the Free Library of Philadelphia and the Edwin A. Fleisher Music Collection. . . . Leeds Music Corporation has brought out an edition of the ten piano Sonatas of Scriabin.

NEW YORK, N. Y. TIMES

MAR 13 1949

COMPOSERS TO HONOR KOUSSEVITZKY MAY 10

The League of Composers, which honored Serge Koussevitzky two years ago on the fifth anniversary of the Koussevitzky Music Foundation, will honor him again on May 10 with a dinner and concert at the Waldorf-Astoria on his silver anniversary as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The musical program is being designed to illustrate four aspects of Dr. Koussevitzky's contribution to music in this country. He will appear as a conductor of an orchestra assembled for the occasion. His work in training young conductors will be demonstrated when former students lead the orchestra. His contributions as a music educator will be shown by performances by members of the Berkshire Music Center.

Finally, the role he has played in stimulating new music will be shown by the fact that the orchestra will play works that have been commissioned by the foundation the conductor established in memory of his wife.

Members of the dinner committee include Aaron Copland, Leonard Bernstein, Mrs. Arthur M. Reis, Mrs. N. Penrose Hallowell, Mrs. Robert Woods Bliss, Mrs. William C. Breed, Mrs. Harold Brooks, Mrs. Otto H. Kahn, Alfred Knopf, Mrs. Charles E. Mitchell, Mrs. John T. Pratt, William Schuman, Miss Gertrude Robinson Smith and Lieut. Col. John A. Warner.

[264]

HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES
MAR 12 1949

Resolved: Respect, Affection

ENGROSSED resolution expressing the community's respect and affection will be presented Dr. Serge Koussevitzky Monday night when he appears at the Bushnell Memorial. Mrs. Elizabeth Wel Cooley is holding the resolution.—[Hartford Times Photo

---

BUFFALO, N. Y.
NEWS
.2 1949

* * *

Auditions for admission to student orchestras of the Berkshire Music Center will be held in New York next week. Auditions for orchestral instruments will be held in Carnegie Hall, 154 West 57th St., as follows: Strings, Wednesday at 10 A. M.; woodwinds, Thursday, at 10 A. M.; brass, Friday, at 10 A. M.; piano, Friday, at 11:30 A. M. Auditions for tympani, percussion and harp will be held backstage in the hall Wednesday at 6:30 P. M. Opera auditions will be conducted Friday at 10 A. M.. Information may be obtained from Thomas Perry, Symphony Hall, Boston 15, Mass.

* * *

Richard Seibold will discuss Franck's Symphonic Variations in his music appreciation class in the Buffalo Museum of Science Monday at 7 30 P. M.

* * *

BOSTON HERALD, SATURDAY, MARCH 12,

MUSIC

Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, gave the 19th program of the 68th season in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. Gregor Piatigorsky, cellist, was the soloist. The program:

Suite in F major, Op 33 .... Roussel
Concerto for Violoncello, No. 1 ... Milhaud
Concerto for Violoncello in A minor, Op. 33 .... Saint-Saens
Symphony No. 4 in F minor, Op. 36 Tchaikovsky

By RUDOLPH ELIE

You would think the last word had been said on Tchaikovsky's Fourth Symphony 20 years ago; indeed, unless you had a special place in your heart for this whacking symphony of passion and sentimentality run amuck you might have toyed with the idea of ducking out at the intermission. And if you had you would have missed one of the day's most astonishing musical phenomena: Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony orchestra creating, out of dead symbols on a printed page, music of such impact the only response to it is a yell. Once again, the incredible Serge Koussevitzky!

Tchaikovsky, whatever he may be to others is to Koussevitzky what the fountain of youth would have been to Ponce de Leon. All he has to do, apparently, is take one draught of this heady water and of a sudden the years melt away from him as snow in a hot spring. Not that he ever seems his 75 years in anything, but Tchaikovsky—there is the potion that takes his years away.

While energizing him physically, however, the potion still allows the greater Koussevitzky to remain in command. And so he brings to bear all the wisdom, the ripe maturity, the musical authority of his years. The result yesterday was that, for me at least, the Fourth was a virtually new experience. I had never before realized the drama of the opening moments as the composer sets the stage for the turbulent events to follow. Nor, for that matter, had the slow movement ever seemed so elevated in mood; it had always previously seemed mawkish. The pizzicato movement, hitherto seemingly as fresh as a three months old hit parade tune, had wonderful grace and fastidiousness while the finale, until now just about possible to take, all but unseated me. It was a terrific performance and it earned Dr. Koussevitzky (who seemed as pleased as his audience) a clamorous response.

* * *

The symphony was not the only notable aspect by any means, for the first half of the concert was amply rewarding, too. There was Gregor Piatigorsky, perhaps our greatest cellist, in the very top of his form in two exceedingly effective concertos. The Milhaud, receiving its first Boston performance, is a composition that begins with a captivating, even lilting first movement called "nonchalant," passes through a solemn "grave" and ends with an ebullient, rousing finale called "joyeux." Dating from 1934, it is happy work that offers no problems for the listener whatever [illegible] how the cellist solves his [illegible] for me. The same might well be said of the Saint-Saens concerto. There are no problems [illegible] at all for the listener; more grateful music for the cello would be hard to imagine Mr. Piatigorsky, a man whose stature and stage presence lends his playing additional interest (for his technical mastery is in a class by itself), was excellently accompanied by conductor and orchestra and got his usual ovation.

The concert began with Roussel's F major Suite, a work that deserves a good deal more comment than it will get at the moment, what with space running out, but one that speaks well enough for itself. In short, a concert that ranks high in a season of highs. Next week the orchestra is off on its final tour. It returns on March 23 with Leonard Bernstein repeating the great Second Symphony of Mahler with Adele Addison and Nan Merriman as soloists and the Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe Choral [illegible]

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE
MAR 13 1949

Dinner and Concert To Honor Koussevitzky

A dinner and concert in honor of Serge Koussevitzky, who is completing his twenty-fifth and last year as the Boston Symphony Orchestra's regular conductor, will be held on Tuesday night, May 10, at the Waldorf-Astoria Hotel under the auspices of the League of Composers and a group of Dr Koussevitzky's friends. Both he and conductors trained by him will take part in the program, which will include works commissioned by the Koussevitzky Foundation.

Prominent composers of several countries have been invited to become honorary sponsors for this event. Messages have already been received from Richard Strauss, Ralph Vaughan Williams, Francesco Malipiero, Jacques Ibert, Pavel Borkevic, of Czechoslovakia, and Carlos Chavez, and many American composers and foreign composers living in the United States are planning to attend. Reservations can be made at Suite 1533, 9 Rockefeller Plaza, New York 20, or by calling COlumbus, 5-7460.

The members of the dinner committee include Aaron Copeland, Leonard Bernstein, Mrs. Arthur M. Reis, Mrs. N. Penrose Hallowell, Mrs. Robert Woods Bliss, Mrs. William C. Breed, Mrs. Harold Brooks, Mrs. Otto H. Kahn, Alfre

---

CINCINNATI, OHIO
ENQUIRER
MAR 13 1949

AN ALBUM of double-bass recordings has been issued by RCA-Victor, with Serge Koussevitzky, greatest living virtuouso of the instrument, appearing both as soloist and composer. The albums are being sold as souvenirs of the 25th anniversary of Koussevitzky's baton reign with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, proceeds going to the conductor's Anniversary Fund. The conductor, who regretfully laid aside the huge instrument after a Carnegie Hall recital in 1929, plays an "Andante" from his own Concerto for Double-Bass, his "Chanson Triste" and "Valse Miniature"—plus a Largo from a Sonata by Henry Eccles (early 18th century English comoser) and a Lullaby by the contemporary, Laska. There is no bass-slappin here, not even a pizzicato. Difficult, even awkward listening the firt time one plays these records, they improve immeassurably on more intimate association. There is a note of Rachmaninoff, and Tchaikovsky in the "Andant," of Bach in the "Largo," and Brahms in the Cradle Song." Tasteful piano accompaniment is by Pierre Luboshutz.

AN ALBUM of double-bass recordings has been issued by RCA-Victor, with Serge Koussevitzky greatest living virtuouso of the instrument, appearing both as soloist and composer. The albums are being sold as souvenirs of the 25th anniversary of Koussevitzky's baton reign with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, proceeds going to the conductor's Anniversary Fund. The conductor, who regretfully laid aside the huge instrument after a Carnegie Hall recital in 1929, plays an "Andante" from his own Concerto for Double-Bass, his "Chanson Triste" and "Valse Miniature"—plus a Largo from a Sonata by Henry Eccles (early 18th century English comoser) and a Lullaby by the contemporary, Laska. There is no bass-slappin here, not even a pizzicato. Difficult, even awkward listening the firt time one plays these records, they improve immeassurably on more intimate association. There is a note of Rachmaninoff, and Tchaikovsky in the 'Andant," of Bach in the "Largo," nd Brahms in the Cradle Song." 'asteful piano accompaniment is y Pierre Luboshutz.

TULSA, OKLA
WORLD
MAR 13 1949

Bass Fiddlers Get Edge On Piccolo Players

BOSTON (UP)—The bass players in the Boston Symphony orchestra envy the piccolo players when it comes to toting instruments from place to place, but they come into their own when the orchestra is on tour.

Then, all musicians but the bass players have to get their suitcase-increased evening clothes pressed before the performance. The bass players have no such problem. While traveling, they hang their evening clothes inside the big wooden boxes used to protect their instruments.

MARCH 12, 1949 Art—Music—Theater *11

Soloist With the Symphony

Milhaud's Cello Concerto No. 1 Introduced

By L. A. Sloper

Gregor Piatigorsky gave the first Boston performance of Darius Milhaud's Cello Concerto No. 1 at yesterday's Boston Symphony concert, the nineteenth of the Friday series. Dr. Koussevitzky conducting. The soloist also offered the Saint-Saëns Concerto in A minor, which had rested on the shelves for a decade, to fill out his playing time. Another French work, Roussel's Suite in F major, opened the program. The final item scheduled was Tchaikovsky's Fourth Symphony.

Milhaud's concerto is a lighthearted work, which bears out the composer's statement that he loves to write music and always does so with pleasure. The end movements are marked "Nonchalant" and "Joyeux," which fairly well describes them, except that "Dreamy" might be a better appellation for the first. The last is lively and gay. The second, marked "Grave," is just so. The cello sings a little mournfully to a background of quiet weeping in the orchestra. But the important thing is that the cello sings throughout. If the work is not world-shaking, it is very agreeable in the "pure music" tradition.

And that is precisely what Roussel was attempting in his Suite in F. He accomplished it, too, but not so deftly as Milhaud. He had fun, but at the cost of considerable labor. On a fourth hearing, only the middle movement of his Suite (which is dedicated to Dr. Koussevitzky) made much appeal. Roussel resembles Mahler in one particular: he is honored chiefly in his own country.

Mr. Piatigorsky, of course, distinguished himself both in the Milhaud and in the Saint-Saëns. He is a musician and a master of his instrument. He received an ovation.

So did Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra, who equally distinguished themselves in the widely divergent accompaniments of the two concerti, besides providing a technically brilliant and musically persuasive account of Roussel's Suite. And everybody knows what Koussevitzky can accomplish with Tchaikovsky.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
MAR 13 1949

GIFT: When Serge Koussevitzky conducted his final [illegible] the Boston Symphony in Providence, R. I., recently, he was accorded a standing ovation from the audience and presented with a citation from Brown University and a check for $6,462. John Nicholas Brown, who presented the check, explained the odd sum was reached by the different sized gifts of 258 grateful Rhode Islanders.

HEMIDEMISEMIQUAVERS: Members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be in New York this week auditioning applicants for the student orchestras of the Berk shire Music Centre, and Boris Go dovsky will audition singers fo the center's opera department o Friday. . . . Music Reporter, whic reprints the New York music crit cisms, lists fifteen more debutant for February, bringing the total t 118 this season. . . . The America Junior Red Cross and the Musi Educators National Conference ar planning to send 1,000 albums c recorded American school music t be distributed in foreign school . . . Arthur Cohn and Nicolas Slc nimsky are leaving for Europ next month to round up music fc the Free Library of Philadelphi and the Edwin A. Fleisher Musi Collection. . . . Leeds Music Corpc ration has brought out an editio of the ten piano Sonatas of Scriabin.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
MAR 13 1949

COMPOSERS TO HONOR KOUSSEVITZKY MAY 10

The League of Composers, which honored Serge Koussevitzky two years ago on the fifth anniversary of the Koussevitzky Music Foundation, will honor him again on May 10 with a dinner and concert at the Waldorf-Astoria on his silver anniversary as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The musical program is being designed to illustrate four aspects of Dr. Koussevitzky's contribution to music in this country. He will appear as a conductor of an orchestra assembled for the occasion. His work in training young conductors will be demonstrated when former students lead the orchestra. His contributions as a music educator will be shown by performances by members of the Berkshire Music Center.

Finally, the role he has played in stimulating new music will be shown by the fact that the orchestra will play works that have been commissioned by the foundation the conductor established in memory of his wife.

Members of the dinner committee include Aaron Copland, Leonard Bernstein, Mrs. Arthur M. Reis, Mrs. N. Penrose Hallowell, Mrs. Robert Woods Bliss, Mrs. William C. Breed, Mrs. Harold Brooks, Mrs. Otto H. Kahn, Alfred Knopf, Mrs. Charles E. Mitchell, Mrs. John T. Pratt, William Schuman, Miss Gertrude Robinson Smith and Lieut. Col. John A. Warner.

CINCINNATI, OHIO
POST
MAR 13 1949

ANOTHER THING that distin guishes the Robert Merrill show i the blessed absence of studio ap plause. No doubt there is an audi ence in Boston's Symphony Hall But it's not permitted to wast time or destroy the intimacy of the program with palm beating. For that, someone or other rates hearty thanks.

TULSA, OKLA
WORLD
.3 1949

Berkshire Festival Plans Announced

Serge Koussevitsky has announced plans for the 1949 session of the Berkshire Music Center, the Summer school of the Boston Symphony orchestra at Tanglewood in Massachusetts. The center will have a six-week session from July 4 to Aug. 14, during which the Berkshire festival concerts will be given.

Dr. Koussevitsky will direct the school, with Aaron Copland as assistant director. The faculty will include Olivier Messiaen, Parisian composer on his first visit to America; Gregor Piatigorsky, Leonard Bernstein, Richard Burgin, Eleazar de Carvalho and Hugh Ross.

AMERICAN H

HENDERSON, TEXAS
TEXAS NEWS
1949

Serge Koussevitsky has announced plans for the 1949 session of the Berkshire Music Center, the summer school of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood in Massachusetts. The center will have a six-week session from July 4 to Aug 14. during which theBerkshire festival concerts will be given. Dr. Koussevitsky will direct the school, with Aaron Copland as assistant director. The faculty will include Olivier Messiaen, Portisian composer on his first visit to America; Kregor Piatigorsky, Leonard Bernstein, Richard Burgin, Eleazar de Carvalho and Hugh Ross

The Philadelphia Orchestra will be back on the air for its sixth season of broadcasts, beginning March 6. There will be an eight-week series on Saturdays from 5 to 6 p.m. e.s.t. over the Columbia network. The first broadcast will consist of Progofieff's Classical Symphony and the Brahms Fourth.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
MAR 15 1949

Auditions for Berkshire Center

Auditions for orchestra players who wish to attend the Berkshire Music Center this summer will be held this week in Carnegie Recital Hall on the following schedule: Strings, tomorrow at 10 A. M.; woodwinds, Thursday at 10; brass, Friday at 10; piano, Friday at 11:30. Players of timpani, percussion and harp will be heard backstage at Carnegie Hall tomorrow at 6:30 P. M.

MADISON, WIS.
STATE JOURNAL
MAR 6 - 1949

Berkshire Center Plans Announced

Serge Koussevitzky has announced plans for the 1949 session of the Berkshire Music Center, the summer school of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood in Massachussetts The center will have a six-week session from July 4 to Aug. 14, during which the Berkshire festival concerts will be given.

Dr. Koussevitzky will direct the school, with Aaron Copland as assistant director. The faculty will include Olivier Messiaen, Parisian composer on his first visit to America; Gregor Piatigorsky, Leonard Bernstein, Richard Burgin, Eleazar de Carvalho, and Hugh Ross.

NEW REPUBLIC
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MAR 14 1949

MUSIC: The Conductors Play Musical Chairs

AFTER SEVERAL calm years in which few of the American orchestras—except the tempestuous Chicago Symphony—have changed their conductors, the orchestral scene has suddenly gone topsy-turvy.

The most startling change, because it marks the end of the longest association between a conductor and an orchestra since that of the Chicago Symphony Orchestra and the late Frederick Stock, will take place in Boston. In October, Charles Munch, formerly of Strasbourg and Paris, and latterly a peripatetic guest conductor in this country, becomes music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, replacing Serge Koussevitzky, who retires this spring at the end of a 25-year period of distinguished service. Koussevitzky will continue to direct the Berkshire Festival and the summer school at Tanglewood, and will make a few guest appearances in Boston next season. But the orchestra's policies will be in the hands of Munch.

Time will tell whether Munch possesses, or can develop, either the magnificent public presence of Koussevitsky or his persuasive idealism. But his musical taste is essentially French, despite his ambiguous Alsatian background, as Koussevitzky's is, despite his Russian origin; and he arrives with a Parisian reputation to guarantee him an initial status mere American success would not have provided in the eyes of Boston.

8 +

A short time ago, Bruno Walter resigned as musical adviser (in other words, chief conductor) of the New York Philharmonic-Symphony Society, effective next fall. Immediately a chain reaction began. Dimitri Mitropoulos was invited to share with Leopold Stokowski the conductorship of the Philharmonic—which the management rightly considers to be more than a one-man job, in view of the long and crowded season. Mitropoulos asked to be released from the Minneapolis Orchestra, which he had directed for more than a decade. Not too hesitantly, the Minneapolis board agreed to a parting of the ways; dissatisfaction over his long absences as guest conductor in New York and his irrepressible campaigning for Henry Wallace throughout the orchestra's last Southern tour counterbalanced the enthusiasm of some Minneapolis people for his capable work with the organization.

To fill the vacant post, Minneapolis seized the Hungarian conductor, Antal Dorati, away from Dallas. After a few weeks' thought, the Dallas Symphony decided to engage Walter Hendl, the 32-year-old assistant conductor of the New York Philharmonic-Symphony, thereby making him, as of next fall, the youngest American-born conductor of a major orchestra. Thus Bruno Walter's decision to take things easier will alter three careers in October, and may make way for the beginning of a fourth, if the Philharmonic continues to use its assistant conductorship as a training ground for a gifted young American.

SYMPHONY CONCERT IS THRILLING

Bruckner-Wagner Music Tribute to Koussevitsky

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

No, it wasn't Max Fiedler or Karl Muck who put together the Bruckner-Wagner program that serves for the current and next-to-the-last pair of symphony concerts, but Serge Koussevitzky. And this reviewer, hearing the music that thrilled him in his youth, listened to it yesterday with unashamed enjoyment.

ALL MAGNIFICENT

Specifically, Dr. Koussevitzky had placed together the Austrian master's Seventh Symphony and the German's "Siegfried Idyll" and "Tannhaeuser" Overture. From the standpoint of sound, all three performances were magnificent, as well they might have been. Bruckner and Wagner had an ear for orchestral richness. And this was the Boston Symphony.

Interpretatively, Dr. Koussevitzky fared better with Bruckner, a much harder composer to handle, than he did with Wagner, though there were fine moments in both the Idyll and the Overture. He played Wagner for effect, and, if he did not lose, he did not exactly win. At times the Idyll was restless, febrille; it did not always breathe the air of domestic felicity that was its motivation. The Overture began too slowly and ended too frantically. In both the beginning and the end Wagner had already done all that was necessary. There are times when it is best to let a composer speak for himself.

Not Minute Too Long

Bruckner, on the other hand needs plenty of assistance, and while this or the other Brucknerite might take exception to this or the other detail, the fact remains that the Symphony, without cuts was made consistently pleasurable and though consuming nearly an hour, it was not a minute too long.

It was interesting to hear the Seventh, after having heard the Third from the City Symphony the night before. While the Third deserves no such neglect as has been its rate hereabouts, it is easy to see why the Seventh is the most popular of them all. It has all of Bruckner's virtues and few of his defects.

Success Complete

The one really weak spot is the altering development section of he first movement. The common omplaint that the finale is mere nticlimax was not in order yeserday. It is, of course, the least memorable of the four movements acking the serene beauty of the first, the sublimity of the second the power of the third. But somehow, as Dr. Koussevitzky played it, you felt it was all right for it to be exactly what is was, that no other type of movement would have served any better. There had been climaxes enough for one hour. Brahms built up his finales by playing down the middle movements. Bruckner chose another course. The Symphony's success with yesterday's audience was complete.

MAR 15 1949

Koussevitzky's Farewell Triumph of Artistry

By CARL E. LINDSTROM

CITY'S TRIBUTE—a resolution passed by the council—is presented to retiring conductor, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky. Left-right: Dr. Koussevitzky, Charles F. T. Seaverns, Mayor Coleman, City Manager Sharpe.—[Hartford Times Photo

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY would have us believe that we took leave of him last night. You don't really part company with such an artist any more than you say goodbye to music. You stand up and make as grand a noise as you can with clapping and keep him coming back to the podium, see him try to share this personal ovation with the musicians who are applauding also, but even if he is determined that this was his last concert at Bushnell Memorial his art is indelibly inscribed upon the memory.

Years hence it will sound as clearly as it did on your way home last night; as clear and true as his first Hartford concerts still sound to those who were fortunate enough to hear them well over a quarter of a century ago.

Beethoven's Seventh will ever sound precisely as it did last night. You won't hear Toscanini's perfectly chiseled interpretation like the engraver's copperplate, nor recall precisely the intellectual refinements of Bruno Walter's readings. You remember Koussevitzky's way because there's more of Koussevitzky than of Beethoven in it.

* * *

THOSE GRANITIC opening chords like great Ionic pillars are Beethovian enough but then there is the almost comic fastidiousness of the bridge passage into the vivace. That's Koussevitzky all over, and so is the over-brilliant tone that he forces from brass, so edgey that it makes you feel you've bitten into a quince. He knows his orchestra—for the only one of its kind.

Oh yes, Koussevitzky has his faults. They say his Boston Orchestra is so perfect a mechanism that it lacks character. The answer to that was that closing harmony in the epilogue of Vaughan-Williams' Sixth Symphony as beautifuly suspended over infinity as a hummingbird in a delphinium horn.

And they say he doesn't beat time. No, he doesn't. He only gets inside the music and takes you with him.

Koussevitzky always has a better time than anyone else at the concert—if having a good time is running an esthetic temperature. If you are tense, he is ecstatic. If you are happy; he is beatified. There are felicities in the music that you would not see if the perceptive Doctor did not see them first; and quips whose point he will not let you miss.

* * *

THAT'S THE WAY Koussevitzky leads his orchestra. There are no tentative or muddy passages even in new scores because the man thinks his music clearly. You may not like the Vaughan-Williams Symphony but he will not let you be confused about it.

For me the slow movement is one of the most portentous experiences in music. You seem to stand at the verge not of something awesome but something so dangerously beautiful that only the creator of those pages knows what lies beyond that last door which he seems unwilling to open. The scherzo shakes loose a torrent of rousing sound as though to dispel the disturbing presentiments of what has gone before.

The whole symphony is disturbing. You rather expect to meet it again. If it is a critic's business to make predictions, this one foresees a good many more performances. I like it better than at its premiere in the Tanglewood concerts last August; better, too, than "A London Symphony."

* * *

THOUGH KOUSSEVITZKY gloried in his wind choir, the strings had K. P. E. Bach's D major Concerto virtually all to themselves. This superbly groomed tone is the ornament of the Boston Orchestra, its aristocratic diction the criterion of musical speech. But this was more than sensuous sound for here too Koussevitzky's expressive design was paramount—the intensification of the slow movement and its final bars so accentuated that who knows where you left off hearing it—like the departure of music itself.

The departure of Koussevitzky indeed!

THE HARTFORD COURANT: TUESDAY, MARCH 15, 1949.

Farewell To Great Conductor

The City says its formal farewell to a great conductor. Left to right, William H. Putnam and Charles W. Gross, senior members of the Bushnell Memorial board of trustees; Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra; Charles F. T. Seaverns, president of the Bushnell Memorial; Mayor Coleman; and City Manager Sharpe (Courant Photo).

Koussevitzky In Farewell Concert Here

Boston's Conductor Saluted by Audience And Common Council

Concertgoers here said goodbye to the city's most beloved musical figure Monday night.

At the close of the performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the audience which had crammed Bushnell Memorial to the back walls, rose in farewell greeting to Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor.

Twenty-five years ago, Dr. Kousseviazky, new imperator of the great orchestra, came here for he first time. Ever since the Bushnell Memorial was founded, he returned each season, most of them twice, or more than any other conductor. Monday night, however, was his final concert here, the conclusion of a local musical epoch or dynasty. For this season, Dr. Koussevitzky steps down from the podium of the Boston Symphony, into a quasi-retirement.

As the audience handed up its final tributes of applause, the great Doctor surveyed the house like a benign Augustus. The years which have stooped his shoulders have tempered the former imperiousness, until last night his grave smile and little bows were those of a pater-familias.

Three times he was called back by the applause which would not die down. Each time he shared the acclaim with the orchestra which itself was saluting the master by rapping on the fiddles or the less professional handclapping. It was plain that the audience hoped he would speak, give some last "Vale!" He didn't.

Backstage, in the Bushnell green room, after Dr. Koussevitzky had had time to change, the City officially tendered its goodbyes and quarter-century gratitude. Mayor Coleman presented the conductor with an engrossed resolution, recently passed by the Common Council.

It said in part:

"Whereas for a quarter century we have taken joy in the peerless art of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and,

"Whereas the many visits of this large-spirited musician and his orchestra to Hartford have served to extend and deepen incalculably our interest in great music, thereby quickening the entire life of the community . . . .

"Resolved, that we, the Court of Common Council, in behalf of all our fellow-citizens, acknowledge to Dr. Koussevitzky the profound admiration and affection which Hartford holds for him and for the orchestra which he inspires to such superlative performance."

Mayor Coleman hoped that the resolution "will remind him of Hartford whenever he looks at it." Charles F. T. Seaverns, president of the Bushnell Memorial, wanted him to know "how grateful we are to you and how sorry to see you leave." Of all the conductors to come here, "You have been the dearest to us," he declared.

Recalls First Visit.

In return, Dr. Koussevitzky recalled his first visits here, when the orchestra had played in a local theater. When he saw the Bushnell Memorial for the first time, he had been vastly taken with it, he said. "But," he had asked himself on that occasion, "what kind of an audience will it hold?"

"I found that it holds a very musical public," Dr. Koussevitzky said, speaking slowly and emphatically. "It is an audience that values great art and great artists. It has always been a very great joy for me to come here all these years."

Dr. Koussevitzky also paid tributes to the city's "two wonderful music schools," and had a pat on the head for the music reviewers of the city's two newspapers.

Also attending the informal, little, formal leave-taking were two senior members of the Bushnell trustees, Charles W. Gross and William H. Putnam, and City Manager Sharpe.

The hall was packed for the concert. Tickets had not been available for nearly a fortnight. It proved to be an occasion of the handsome musicmaking consistently delivered by Dr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony.

The program opened with a seraphic performance of the C.P.E. Bach Concerto in D Major, in which the concertino sections were exquisitely played by woodwinds added to the original score by Maximilian Steinberg. Dr. Koussevitzky worked over it in a quiet ecstacy, bending now over the first desk of the violins for some delicate passage, now over the violas for some lush moments. It was magnificent.

The Vaughan Williams Sixth Symphony, which Dr. Koussevitzky had premiered at Tanglewood last summer, was heard here for the first time. Shortly past the perfervid Tschaikovian opening comes a long, swingy section, to which it is possible to sing, "Vaughan Williams, yo' is mah man now!" That is, if he is. He wasn't mine, any more than when I heard the work at Tanglewood. It's an enormously solid piece, substantial as steak and kidney pie, and all moderned up. It's sonorous and it's expertly tailored everywhere.

Hard Times A-Knockin'.

But despite its suavity of construction, its alternate tumult and bemusings on war and peace (which are said to be its themes), it fails to speak to me. All I can find in it are the conventional musical cliches which are being used everywhere to denote hard times. Its vastness, its violence and its endless ending give an impression of importance which the inner stuff fails to bear out. The performance was something tremendous.

The closing Beethoven Seventh Symphony was played in an extraordinarily pastoral vein, almost as if it might have been the Sixth. Dr. Koussevitzky found a special lyricism for it. So often conceived as a sterile kind of hipskotch, full of bounce and metronomics, it was hear covered and ornamented with warmth and beauty, grace and dapple. It made a fine closing piece for the Koussevitzkian Period in our musical history here. May it be pressed in our memory book with a few stray laurel leaves from the brow of the master!

—T.H.P.

ATHENS, OHIO
MESSENGER
MAR 1 5 1949

ROUND THE RECORD

By MICHAEL SWYERS

Do you know what is played nightly at the Cocoanut Grove? . . . Freddy Martin's vocalists chant that it is "The Humphrey Bogart Rhumba". "If you don't like Bogart," as the lyrics go on, you can call it the "Lana Turner", the "Bing Crosby", or even the "Bugs Bunny Rhumba" . . . this rhumba is a favorite of Dana Ward at the Rainbow Restaurant.

Perry Como's "Forever and Ever" backed by "I Don't See Me In Your Eyes Anymore" will probably cause a great sensation among the "starry-eyed" set. That barber can really cut the records!

o o o

The Boston Symphony Orchestra under the conduction of Maestro Serge Koussevitzky has recorded Ravel's "Ma Mere l'Oye" ("Mother Goose Suite"). This recording is packaged in Victor's new soft-gray envelope, which is now being used whenever a composition calls for two records.

Capitol's Margaret Whiting vocals "Dreamer With A Penny" for the "June, moon, spoon," crowd . . . this disk is for easy listenin', if you have the time for such luxury.

For the Kiddies: Gene Kelly narrates "The Cuckoo Who Lived In a Clock", a nonbreakable album complete with birth imitations, original music, and sound effects. If you are seven or seventeen it is very possible that this recording will appeal to you.

OUT OF TUNE . . . The "King Cole Trio", now a quartet is concerting in Noo Yawk . . . Swoon Man Sinatra to be removed from Radio's "Hit Parade" on May 24 . . . . the Broadway and road musical "Annie Get Your Gun" to be filmed by MGM . . . Stan Kenton, who is now resting in Brazil may be back this summer as a bandleader, according to rumor . . . Eden "Nature Boy" Ahbez, known to his family as just plain George McGrew, has composed a new tune. It is labeled "Land Of Love" . . . wonder what it is like?

During a recent discussion among a few "local yokels", these tunes were selected as the greatest contributors in the field of "American Musical Progress" "Three Little Fishes" . . . "A Tisket ATasket" . . . "Mairzy Doats" . . . "Shoo Fly Pie" "Open the Door, Richard!" and now . . . "Sixty-Two Ladies in Sea-Green Pajamas" . . . No wonder the "Snake Pit" is overcrowded these days!

HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES
MAR 1 6 1949

Dr. Koussevitzky Bows Out

Ever since he took command of the Boston Symphony a quarter of a century ago, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky has been a regular and most welcome visitor to Hartford. It was not until the opening of the Bushnell in 1930 that we could offer an auditorium really worthy of him and the musicians he has led with such distinction. But, just as it did Monday night, the city has always provided an audience that was our finest homage.

Dr. Koussevitzky says he has always found us aware of the value of "great art and great artists." If he has read our hearts as correctly as he has interpreted our applause, he knows who stands at the center of our musical appreciation. Mr. Seaverns spoke for the entire community when he told Dr. Koussevitzky that of all the conductors who come here, "You have been the dearest to us."

It was fitting that Mayor Coleman should have presented an engrossed resolution from the Common Council. But, at best, words about music and musicians are futile things. Only the forces Dr. Koussevitzky himself has so often evoked, with that imperious genius of his, could adequately pay him the tribute we all feel. And, alas, there is only one Dr. Koussevitzky! And so we have recourse to applause, to resolutions, to inadequate expressions of all sorts. We can only hope that the sensitivity that makes him such a great master of music will also enable him adequately to feel the admiration, the gratefulness and the good will that Hartford bears toward him and his orchestra.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
SUN
MAR 17 1949

Koussevitzky Directs Vaughan Williams' No. 6

There was both unity and perspective in the program directed by Serge Koussevitzky in Carnegie Hall last night, beginning his next to last visit here in his long career with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Of historic impact were the C. P. E. Bach string concerto arranged by Steinberg and the fourth symphony of Tchaikovsky, both fundaments of this conductor's artistic creed; to them headed the sixth symphony of Vaughan Williams for whose American premiere he was responsible last summer.

The work has been heard from other hands since then, but not with such drama, force, logic and musical integrity. Together with fervor, Koussevitzky's presentation has a structural sense which adds much to the composer's purpose. Little was hurried, nothing dragged, in a systematic solution of problems resembling the turning of tumblers in the combination of a safe. It was also welcome to have, in John Burk's always excellent program book, the composer's own notes on his score; especially such off-hand comments as "the reprise is only hinted at, just enough to show this is a symphony and not a symphonic poem"; or "the woodwind experiment as to how the fugal subject will sound upside down but the brass are angry and insist on playing it the right way up." So much final objectivity suggests how much essential subjectivity there is in the writing. It was a superb concert.

I. K.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HOME NEWS
MAR 1[illegible] 1949

Vaughan William's '6th' Played by Bostonians

By HARRIETT JOHNSON

The most provocative work of last night's concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall was the recently composed Sixth Symphony by Ralph Vaughan Williams, given a previous Carnegie performance this season by the Philharmonic under the direction of Leopold Stokowski.

A rehearing of the sympony strengthens my original conviction that this musice is among the most imaginative and powerful symphonic works of our time. Serge Koussevitsky who conducted, directed its first American performance last August at the Berkshire festival

He obviously has a profound understanding of its contents and conducted a performance that was transcendental in its effect. The composer worked approximately three years on the score, completing it in 1947.

Abundant in cross rhythms, melodic and harmonic complexities and dramatized by a pugent instrumentation including a saxaphone, the symphony is alternately joyous, dramatic, goodnatured or eerily introspective, or just plain expressive in a fascinating way. Pigeon-holing every bar gets to be a limiting bore, and this symphony, being highly imaginative, says a lot, thank fortune, which can't be explained in words.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE

MAR 1[illegible]

CONCERT AN

Boston Symphony

By Arthur V. Berger

Serge Koussevitzky and his Boston Symphony Orchestra were in fine condition last night at the society's fourth evening concert at Carnegie Hall this season. A program that was in every way a conductor's delight showed this presently retiring visitor from Boston in a remarkably vigorous and spontaneous mood for music-making. The C. P. E. Bach Concerto in the Maximilian Steinberg arrangement, long one of Mr. Koussevitzky's special offerings, was the usual tour de force for the luxurious Boston string sections each to respond as one man. The early Romanticism of this adventurous son of the great Bach becomes, in the Andante, a vehicle for an almost Parsifalian atmosphere in Mr. Koussevitzky's reading, but it is something this conductor can carry off, and Louis Speyer, the English-horn player, was given a bow at the end of the work for sustaining the long phrases of the solo passages so well.

The contemporary work of the program, the Sixth Symphony of Ralph Vaughan-Williams, employs orchestral forces in an expansive symphonic way that is also something Mr. Koussevitzky thrives upon, and this orchestral method was further prolonged during the second half of the concert, when he gave a masterly account of the Fourth Symphony of Tchaikovsky. The Vaughan-Williams was discussed at length in these columns after its American premiere at Tanglewood last summer, and again less than two months ago, when it was first performed here under Leopold Stokowski.

On a rehearing, the quiet, somewhat mysterious epilogue affirms itself as much as the distinguished part of this English work. It is quite different from anything in the earlier three movements, and these movements in themselves embrace, along with this composer's characteristic, pastoral and modal manner, such mutually discrete episodes as the rather sympathetic, blues-like ones and the grandiose miliary ones. If Shostakovich is suggested in the latter episodes, it may be simply because he has become chief purveyor of the symphonic military style in our time. But there is more than a suggestion of the "Bolero"-like theme of the "Leningrad" Symphony in the second movement of the Vaughan-Williams.

HA[illegible]ACK, N. J.
BE[illegible] RECORD

[illegible] 18 1949

Music News

Dr. Koussevitzky last night solved a brand-new musical problem: how to part with an audience that won't go. Leading the Boston Symphony at the Mosque, Newark, in the Griffith Foundation series, he had wound up with Debussy's "La Mer" and the Beethoven Seventh so eloquently the audience just stayed there and kept raising the roof. Wise old Serge, meditating on it after his umpteenth bow, finally took his concertmaster by the arm and told him to go home, then shooed the rest of the orchestra off stage before him. That did it!

AMARILLO, TEXAS
NEWS

MAR 18 1949

As a contribution to the newly established Serge Koussevitzky Fund of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Inc., devoted to the interests of the orchestra, an unusual album of double bass recordings made by Dr. Koussevitzky is now being offered to the public by the orchestra. Proceeds from the sale of these albums at $10 each will go into the fund. The album is described as a souvenir of the 25th anniversary of Dr. Koussevitzky with the orchestra. The album can be obtained only by addressing the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Symphony Hall, Boston, 15, Mass. The collection was recorded in 1929 by RCA Victor and includes the Andante from Koussevitzky's own Double Bass Concerto, his Chanson Triste and Valse Miniature, a Largo by Eccles and a Lullaby by Laska.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

MAR 19 1949

EMIL ARCIERI

Special to The New York Times.

BOSTON, March 18—Emil Arcieri, clarinetist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, died today in Robert Breck Brigham Hospital after a brief illness. His age was 47.

Born in Lynn, Mass, Mr. Arcieri studied music in Paris under Gaston Hamelin. He joined the Boston organization in 1921.

Surviving are his widow, Mrs. Selma Arcieri; his mother, Mrs. Anunziata Arcieri of Keene, N. H.; three brothers and two sisters.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE

MAR 19 1949

MUSIC

By Paul Affelder

Burgin Wields the Baton at 4th Concert In Boston Symphony Series at Academy

On its fourth visit of the season to the Academy of Music last night, the Boston Symphony Orchestra was under the direction of its concertmaster and associate conductor, Richard Burgin, who chose an interesting and effective program, including Weber's "Euryanthe" Overture, Brahms' Third Symphony, the Adagio from Anton Bruckner's String Quintet and three movements from the "Tsar Sultan" Suite of Rimsky-Korsakoff.

The overture was probably the best performed and interpreted work of the evening. It had crispness and enthusiastic vigor in its faster sections, while the largo for divided violins and violas emerged with haunting beauty, and the fugato that followed it was exceptionally clear.

The Brahms symphony was another matter. Mr. Burgin has a long, vigorous beat, one not conducive to producing precise attacks and subtly controlled tempi. Consequently, the entire symphony was marked by a stodginess and lack of color. It was a routine, often boring performance.

The Adagio from the Bruckner Quintet, played by the members of the string section, also began in a somewhat perfunctory fashion, but as this overlong but frequently inspired work progressed, so did the conductor's inspiration, so that toward the end there was real eloquence in his reading. The tone of the strings was warm and finely rounded throughout.

The more we hear of Rimsky-Korsakoff, the more we marvel at the wonderful coloristic effects he achieves in his orchestration. These came through last night, despite the unnaturally slow tempi adopted by Mr. Burgin in the opening march, and they shone with special luster in the more animated final section of the suite.

Without meaning to reflect on Mr. Burgin's conducting, we feel that, considering the fact that this is Serge Koussevitzky's last season with the orchestra, Brooklynites were entitled to hear him more frequently than they have thus far.

In the four concerts that the Bostonians have presented here to date, Dr. Koussevitzky has directed less than two. He was in charge of the first and part of the second, the Hanson Piano Concerto having been conducted by its composer. The third concert was under Igor Stravinsky's baton, and certainly was not a highly inspired affair, nor was last night's anything about which to get excited.

We sincerely hope and trust that Dr. Koussevitzky will give us a real and justly deserved treat at his last appearance next month.

Pension Fund Concert

One of the greatest successes in Serge Koussevitzky's illustrious 25 years with the Boston Symphony occurred last night when, at the conclusion of the Bach B-Minor Mass, a shouting, stamping, cheering throng stood up and roared its heart-felt appreciation of an inspired performance.

After three days of operatic and symphonic music, all composed with sheer genius, the unmatched genius of Johann Sebastian Bach shone with renewed light when the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society, under Dr. Koussevitzky's masterful leadership, sang the Kyrie and Gloria from the Mass in the afternoon, and the remaining four sections in the evening.

Fifty-odd players from the Boston Symphony played the orchestral score which included harpsichord and organ. Soloists in both performances were Adele Addison, soprano; Eunice Alberts, contralto; Sumner Crockett, tenor; Leo [illegible]sky, bass; Richard Burgin, violin; Louis Speyer and Jean [illegible], oboi d'amore; William [illegible], horn; James Pappoutsakis, flute; E. Power Biggs, organ; Lukas Foss, harpsichord. The concert was for the benefit of the Pension Fund and was the 108th in that series of special musical events.

Magnificent (overworked as that word is) is the only adjective I can apply to the choral portions of the Mass, and to their performance yesterday. Technically [illegible] all the way along, there was a spontaneity of expression and a [illegible] to the conductor's demands that fused the rendition into one of inspiring sincerity. Vocally, the [illegible] were flexible and brilliant, the altos rich in timbre, with [illegible] and basses sustaining [illegible] with remarkable [illegible].

Of the soloists Miss Alberts was outstanding, although all of them sang with conviction and [illegible] control. Her [illegible] warmth and [illegible] cient size, which [illegible] lacking in Miss Addison's soprano. The soprano tone was [illegible] quality, pure, and [illegible] but other [illegible] down to [illegible] singing in the Bene[illegible] discerning musician [illegible] mand of vocal nuance. [illegible]sky was better in the [illegible] being heard to advantage [illegible] "Et in Spiritum" in the Credo. Mention must also be made of Mr. Burgin's superlative violin [illegible] obligato passages which [illegible] the Kyrie and Benedictus.

But the guiding light [illegible] of the whole performance [illegible] Koussevitzky, whose [illegible] inspiration seemed [illegible] sublimities of the G[illegible] Sanctus were [illegible] a fervor which [illegible] orchestra [illegible]

The sight [illegible] students singing [illegible] with glowing enthusiasm [illegible] not to be forgotten. There [illegible] many students with [illegible] audience which, from the last [illegible] cony seat to the first [illegible] floor, remained to cheer [illegible] its homage to Dr. Koussevitzky [illegible] the end of the program.

HARRY [illegible]

NEWARK, N. J.
~~CALL~~
NEWS

Boston Symphony

Resplendent Debussy Performance High Spot of Griffith Mosque Concert

BY ALAN BRANIGAN

In a vivid and resplendent conclusion to Griffith Music Foundation's first symphony concert series, the Boston Symphony gave the best of its performances here last night at the Mosque. The packed house was eager to respond to the group and its widely admired director, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, and turned the evening into a series of thoroughly deserved ovations.

The foundation's president, Mrs. Parker O. Griffith, between ecstatic gasps over the orchestra's performance, confided that the series has been an estimable success. Furthermore, it will be continued next year with one concert each by the New York Philharmonic Symphony and the Little Orchestra Society of New York and two visits by the Bostonians. One of the latter will be led by the group's incoming conductor, Charles Muench, and the other by Dr. Koussevitzky.

Authority

The veteran Russian musician was in excellent fettle last night. Every movement bespoke the authority of his long years in the service of music. And the climacteric moments of the music found him vibrant with motions, as he imparted his own excitement to the players. Through all of it, one felt in Dr. Koussevitzky the benign, serene, philosophical depth of a master musician who is also a student of life.

The fortunate audience heard at least one orchestral performance that was far superior to anything done here in recent decades. And that was the Boston's glowing, reverberant playing of Debussy's impressionistic tone poem, "La Mer." The sun gleamed over the waves, the clouds floated over the immense reaches, and the wind and the sea spoke to each other—in a series of images that unmistakably rendered the meaning and the color of the scenes.

The work had not been done here previously, according to our usually reliable memory. The performance emphasized one aspect that music lovers are too likely to forget—that recordings and broadcasts simply fail to deliver the essence of a complicated and delicate mechanism like the Debussy score. It has to be heard in a hall, with some one of Koussevitzky's genius presiding, for the full effect to be reached. Last night it was reached, and it would be difficult to understand how anybody who heard the work could soon lose the memory.

Second Son

The Debussy was preceded by an interesting, lively playing of Concerto in D for orchestra, arranged by Maximilian Steinberg from a score by Carl Philipp Emanuel Bach. This work by the brilliant second son of Johann Sebastian proved to be a delightful experience, both in the sheer beauty of the Boston's tone and in the warmth of its style. The latter, although relying on Johann Sebastian's polyphonic mannerisms, was one step nearer to the personalized music that came afterward. The lyric measures of the slow movement were particularly rewarding.

The concert came to a resounding conclusion with Beethoven's Seventh Symphony, the one to which authorities have imputed the "spirit of the dance." Dr. Koussevitzky took the symphony at a brisk and flowing pace, from the hammered out rhythms of the opening movement, through the eloquent allegretto and the nimble scherzo to the finale that went at a hectic, dizzying and breathless speed. The result was electrifying.

Afterward, there were shouts of "bravo" and storms of applause, as Dr. Koussevitzky shook hands with the section principals, with an extra smile for the young eager beaver who plays first cello with such enthusiasm. The orchestra members stood up and beamed, the audience beamed in return and mutual respect and admiration ran high.

MUSIC

Brilliant Concert by Symphony; Piatigorsky Plays Milhaud Concerto

By CYRUS DURGIN

The concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon was a brilliant show, from the tricky Suite in F major by Roussel to the Tchaikovsky Fourth Symphony, with whose finale Serge Koussevitzky fairly lifted the roof off Symphony Hall.

In between came two concertos for cello, one by Darius Milhaud, new to Boston, and the Saint-Saens in A minor, performed dazzlingly by that huge virtuoso, Gregor Piatigorsky.

Credit for this consistent brilliance must be divided about equally among composers, conductor and soloist. The Roussel Suite is bright and astringent, enormously clever, rhythmically buoyant and sparkling as a diamond.

Perhaps neither the Saint-Saens Concerto nor the Tchaikovsky Symphony is a masterpiece of the first order, but each is contrived expertly, each is brimming with good tunes, and they both are enormously effective when so well performed.

In this concluding season of Koussevitzky's regime, each reading of Tchaikovsky is something to be treasured—even if you don't like the composer so well as certain others—because Tchaikovsky is one of the Koussevitzky specialties.

Yesterday the F minor Symphony was terrific—so intense that a scattering of applause broke out after the first movement—and there was a din of clapping and cheering at the very end.

Milhaud's Cello Concerto, composed in 1934, is proof—if any was needed—that it is possible to write unstrained, lyrical music for the cello and yet not sound old-fashioned. This is a small Concerto, a Petit Kleine Concertino, to mix languages and arrive at the right size, which sings its way in lovely, distinctive melody from first bar to last.

The opening movement is probably one of few to carry the direction "Nonchalant." The other two are Grave (but it isn't so serious as that) and Joyeux. Let us hear this piece again!

Messrs. Koussevitzky, Platigorsky and the whole orchestra received their due in applause. No one who heard it will forget yesterday's concert.

[267]

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE
MAR 1

CONCERT AN

Boston Symphony

By Arthur V. Berger

Serge Koussevitzky and his Boston Symphony Orchestra were in fine condition last night at the society's fourth evening concert at Carnegie Hall this season. A program that was in every way a conductor's delight showed this presently retiring visitor from Boston in a remarkably vigorous and spontaneous mood for music-making. The C. P. E. Bach Concerto in the Maximilian Steinberg arrangement, long one of Mr. Koussevitzky's special offerings, was the usual tour de force for the luxurious Boston string sections each to respond as one man. The early Romanticism of this adventurous son of the great Bach becomes, in the Andante, a vehicle for an almost Parsifalian atmosphere in Mr. Koussevitzky's reading, but it is something this conductor can carry off, and Louis Speyer, the English-horn player, was given a bow at the end of the work for sustaining the long phrases of the solo passages so well.

The contemporary work of the program, the Sixth Symphony of Ralph Vaughan-Williams, employs orchestral forces in an expansive symphonic way that is also something Mr. Koussevitzky thrives upon, and this orchestral method was further prolonged during the second half of the concert, when he gave a masterly account of the Fourth Symphony of Tchaikovsky. The Vaughan-Williams was discussed at length in these columns after its American premiere at Tanglewood last summer, and again less than two months ago, when it was first performed here under Leopold Stokowski.

On a rehearing, the quiet, somewhat mysterious epilogue affirms itself as much as the distinguished part of this English work. It is quite different from anything in the earlier three movements, and these movements in themselves embrace, along with this composer's characteristic, pastoral and modal manner, such mutually discrete episodes as the rather sympathetic, blues-like ones and the grandiose miliary ones. If Shostakovich is suggested in the latter episodes, it may be simply because he has become chief purveyor of the symphonic military style in our time. But there is more than a suggestion of the "Bolero"-like theme of the "Leningrad" Symphony in the second movement of the Vaughan-Williams.

HACKENSACK, N. J.
BERGEN RECORD
MAR 18 1949

Music News

Dr. Koussevitzky last night solved a brand-new musical problem: how to part with an audience that won't go. Leading the Boston Symphony at the Mosque, Newark, in the Griffith Foundation series, he had wound up with Debussy's "La Mer" and the Beethoven Seventh so eloquently the audience just stayed there and kept raising the roof. Wise old Serge, meditating on it after his umpteenth bow, finally took his concertmaster by the arm and told him to go home, then shooed the rest of the orchestra off stage before him. That did it.

AMARILLO, TEXAS
NEWS
MAR 18 [illegible]

As a contribution to the newly established Serge Koussevitzky Fund of the ~~Boston~~ Symphony Orchestra, Inc., devoted to the interests of the orchestra, an unusual album of double bass recordings made by Dr. Koussevitzky is now being offered to the public by the orchestra. Proceeds from the sale of these albums at $10 each will go into the fund. The album is described as a souvenir of the 25th anniversary of Dr. Koussevitzky with the orchestra. The album can be obtained only by addressing the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Symphony Hall, Boston, 15, Mass. The collection was recorded in 1929 by RCA Victor and includes the Andante from Koussevitzky's own Double Bass Concerto, his Chanson Triste and Valse Miniature, a Largo by Eccles and a Lullaby by Laska.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
MAR 19 1949

EMIL ARCIERI

Special to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

BOSTON, March 18—Emil Arcieri, clarinetist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, died today in Robert Breck Brigham Hospital after a brief illness. His age was 47.

Born in Lynn, Mass, Mr. Arcieri studied music in Paris under Gaston Hamelin. He joined the Boston organization in 1921.

Surviving are his widow, Mrs. Selma Arcieri; his mother, Mrs. Anunziata Arcieri of Keene, N. H.; three brothers and two sisters.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE
MAR 19 1949

MUSIC

By Paul Affelder

Burgin Wields the Baton at 4th Concert In Boston Symphony Series at Academy

On its fourth visit of the season to the Academy of Music last night, the Boston Symphony Orchestra was under the direction of its concertmaster and associate conductor, Richard Burgin, who chose an interesting and effective program, including Weber's "Euryanthe" Overture, Brahms' Third Symphony, the Adagio from Anton Bruckner's String Quintet and three movements from the "Tsar Sultan" Suite of Rimsky-Korsakoff.

The overture was probably the best performed and interpreted work of the evening. It had crispness and enthusiastic vigor in its faster sections, while the largo for divided violins and violas emerged with haunting beauty, and the fugato that followed it was exceptionally clear.

The Brahms symphony was another matter. Mr. Burgin has a long, vigorous beat, one not conducive to producing precise attacks and subtly controlled tempi. Consequently, the entire symphony was marked by a stodginess and lack of color. It was a routine, often boring performance.

The Adagio from the Bruckner Quintet, played by the members of the string section, also began in a somewhat perfunctory fashion, but as this overlong but frequently inspired work progressed, so did the conductor's inspiration, so that toward the end there was real eloquence in his reading. The tone of the strings was warm and finely rounded throughout.

The more we hear of Rimsky-Korsakoff, the more we marvel at the wonderful coloristic effects he achieves in his orchestration. These came through last night, despite the unnaturally slow tempi adopted by Mr. Burgin in the opening march, and they shone with special luster in the more animated final section of the suite.

Without meaning to reflect on Mr. Burgin's conducting, we feel that, considering the fact that this is Serge Koussevitzky's last season with the orchestra, Brooklynites were entitled to hear him more frequently than they have thus far.

In the four concerts that the Bostonians have presented here to date, Dr. Koussevitzky has directed less than two. He was in charge of the first and part of the second, the Hanson Piano Concerto having been conducted by its composer. The third concert was under Igor Stravinsky's baton, and certainly was not a highly inspired affair, nor was last night's anything about which to get excited.

We sincerely hope and trust that Dr. Koussevitzky will give us a real and justly deserved treat at his last appearance next month.

NEWARK, N. J.
~~CALL~~
NEWS
[illegible]

Boston Symphony

Resplendent Debussy Performance High Spot of Griffith Mosque Concert

BY ALAN BRANIGAN

In a vivid and resplendent conclusion to Griffith Music Foundation's first symphony concert series, the Boston Symphony gave the best of its performances here last night at the Mosque. The packed house was eager to respond to the group and its widely admired director, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, and turned the evening into a series of thoroughly deserved ovations.

The foundation's president, Mrs. Parker O. Griffith, between ecstatic gasps over the orchestra's performance, confided that the series has been an estimable success. Furthermore, it will be continued next year with one concert each by the New York Philharmonic Symphony and the Little Orchestra Society of New York and two visits by the Bostonians. One of the latter will be led by the group's incoming conductor, Charles Muench, and the other by Dr. Koussevitzky.

Authority

The veteran Russian musician was in excellent fettle last night. Every movement bespoke the authority of his long years in the service of music. And the climacteric moments of the music found him vibrant with motions, as he imparted his own excitement to the players. Through all of it, one felt in Dr. Koussevitzky the benign, serene, philosophical depth of a master musician who is also a student of life.

The fortunate audience heard at least one orchestral performance that was far superior to anything done here in recent decades. And that was the Boston's glowing, reverberant playing of Debussy's impressionistic tone poem, "La Mer." The sun gleamed over the waves, the clouds floated over the immense reaches, and the wind and the sea spoke to each other—in a series of images that unmistakably rendered the meaning and the color of the scenes.

The work had not been done here previously, according to our usually reliable memory. The performance emphasized one aspect that music lovers are too likely to forget—that recordings and broadcasts simply fail to deliver the essence of a complicated and delicate mechanism like the Debussy score. It has to be heard in a hall, with some one of Koussevitzky's genius presiding, for the full effect to be reached. Last night it was reached, and it would be difficult to understand how anybody who heard the work could soon lose the memory.

Second Son

The Debussy was preceded by an interesting, lively playing of Concerto in D for orchestra, arranged by Maximilian Steinberg from a score by Carl Philipp Emanuel Bach. This work by the brilliant second son of Johann Sebastian proved to be a delightful experience, both in the sheer beauty of the Boston's tone and in the warmth of its style. The latter, although relying on Johann Sebastian's polyphonic mannerisms, was one step nearer to the personalized music that came afterward. The lyric measures of the slow movement were particularly rewarding.

The concert came to a resounding conclusion with Beethoven's Seventh Symphony, the one to which authorities have imputed the "spirit of the dance." Dr. Koussevitzky took the symphony at a brisk and flowing pace, from the hammered out rhythms of the opening movement, through the eloquent allegretto and the nimble scherzo to the finale that went at a hectic, dizzying and breathless speed. The result was electrifying.

Afterward, there were shouts of "bravo" and storms of applause, as Dr. Koussevitzky shook hands with the section principals, with an extra smile for the young eager beaver who plays first cello with such enthusiasm. The orchestra members stood up and beamed, the audience beamed in return and mutual respect and admiration ran high.

MUSIC

Brilliant Concert by Symphony; Piatigorsky Plays Milhaud Concerto

By CYRUS DURGIN

The concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon was a brilliant show, from the tricky Suite in F major by Roussel to the Tchaikovsky Fourth Symphony, with whose finale Serge Koussevitzky fairly lifted the roof off Symphony Hall.

In between came two concertos for cello, one by Darius Milhaud, new to Boston, and the Saint-Saens in A minor, performed dazzlingly by that huge virtuoso, Gregor Piatigorsky.

Credit for this consistent brilliance must be divided about equally among composers, conductor and soloist. The Roussel Suite is bright and astringent, enormously clever, rhythmically buoyant and sparkling as a diamond.

Perhaps neither the Saint-Saens Concerto nor the Tchaikovsky Symphony is a masterpiece of the first order, but each is contrived expertly, each is brimming with good tunes, and they both are enormously effective when so well performed.

In this concluding season of Koussevitzky's regime, each reading of Tchaikovsky is something to be treasured—even if you don't like the composer so well as certain others—because Tchaikovsky is one of the Koussevitzky specialties.

Yesterday the F minor Symphony was terrific—so intense that a scattering of applause broke out after the first movement—and there was a din of clapping and cheering at the very end.

Milhaud's Cello Concerto, composed in 1934, is proof—if any was needed—that it is possible to write unstrained, lyrical music for the cello and yet not sound old-fashioned. This is a small Concerto, a Petit Kleine Concertino, to mix languages and arrive at the right size, which sings its way in lovely, distinctive melody from first bar to last.

The opening movement is probably one of few to carry the direction "Nonchalant." The other two are Grave (but it isn't so serious as that) and Joyeux. Let us hear this piece again!

Messrs. Koussevitzky, Platigorsky and the whole orchestra received their due in applause. No one who heard it will forget yesterday's concert.

Pension Fund Concert

One of the greatest successes in Serge Koussevitzky's illustrious 25 years with the Boston Symphony occurred last night when, at the conclusion of the Bach B-Minor Mass, a shouting, stamping, cheering throng stood up and roared its heart-felt appreciation of an inspired performance.

After three days of operatic and symphonic music, all composed with sheer genius, the unmatched genius of Johann Sebastian Bach shone with renewed light when the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society, under Dr. Koussevitzky's masterful leadership, sang the Kyrie and Gloria from the Mass in the afternoon, and the remaining four sections in the evening.

Fifty-odd players from the Boston Symphony played the orchestral score which included harpsichord and organ. Soloists in both performances were Adele Addison, soprano; Eunice Alberts, contralto; Sumner Crockett, tenor; Lee Wolovsky, bass; Richard Burgin, violin; Louis Speyer and Jean Devergie, oboi d'amore; Willem Valkenir, horn; James Pappoutsakis, flute; E. Power Biggs, organ; Lukas Foss, harpsichord. The concert was for the benefit of the Pension Fund and was the 108th in that series of special musical events.

Magnificent (overworked as that word is) is the only adjective I can apply to the choral portions of the Mass, and to their performance yesterday. Technically sure, all the way along, there was a spontaneity of expression and a sensitivity to the conductor's demands that fused the rendition into one of inspiring sincerity. Vocally, the sopranos were flexible and brilliant, the altos rich in timbre, with tenors and basses sustaining high tessituras with remarkable tonal success.

Of the soloists Miss Alberts was outstanding, although all of them sang with conviction and technical control. Her contralto voice has warmth and range, and also sufficient size, which is the one thing lacking in Miss Addison's soprano. The soprano tone was of beautiful quality, pure, and nicely phrased, but other voices have to be scaled down to match it. Mr. Crockett's singing in the Benedictus displayed discerning musicality and a command of vocal nuance. Mr. Wolovsky was better in the upper register, being heard to advantage in the "Et in Spiritum" in the Credo. Mention must also be made of Mr. Burgin's superlative violin solos and obligato passages which enhanced the Kyrie and Benedictus.

But the guiding light and spirit of the whole performance was Dr. Koussevitzky, whose energy and inspiration seemed endless. The sublimities of the Gloria and the Sanctus were recreated by him with a fervor which united chorus and orchestra into one [illegible].

The sight of nearly [illegible] students singing the ageless score with glowing enthusiasm was one not to be forgotten. There were many students with scores in the audience which, from the last balcony seat to the first row on the floor, remained to cheer and express its homage to Dr. Koussevitzky at the end of the program.

HARRY LAWTON.

[267]

HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT

MAR 19 1949

Koussevitzky Lauds Music in America

Special to The Hartford Times

Boston, Mass.—America has finally gained a recognized foothold in the world of contemporary music which, instead of weakening with the rehabilitation of Europe, continues to grow stronger.

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, famed conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra who made his farewell in Hartford Monday, has expressed his faith in new American composers by constantly devoting his programs to the performances of their music.

Europe unquestionably led the world in her output of the great music from the masters, but, says Dr. Koussevitzky, American composers of today rank hand-in-hand with their European contemporaries.

There is, however, a sharp difference between the two, and an understandable one. Europe, with 2,000 years of hardship and maturity behind her, does not compose, write, or think in the same way as a two-century-old America. This, states Dr. Koussevitzky, is exemplified in the "moods" found in the music of each continent.

* * *

THESE MOODS, explains the eminent conductor, are prime examples of two wholly different ways of life. That is to say, that while American music will retain its original freshness and enthusiasm through its Walter Pistons, Roy Harrises, William Schumans, and Aaron Coplands for many years to come, at the same time, the present political chaos of Europe will not only bring a certain amount of decadence into her diplomatic endeavors, but into her art, literature and music as well.

England, however, tremendously relieved from the rigors of the last war, has made a firm step forward in her contributions to music mainly by the efforts of her own productive Ralph Vaughan Williams and Benjamin Britten.

Relaxing under the famous Chaliapin portrait of himself in the Conductor's Room at Symphony Hall, Dr. Koussevitzky spoke freely of the degenerate attitude of Russia toward her own music, as well as that of other countries. With her recent restrictions upon the harmonic patterns which her composers may and may not use, she is depriving the world of two of its greatest geniuses, Prokofieff and Shostakovitch. Presumably neither of these men are working now behind the Iron Curtain.

* * *

NOT ONLY DOES Russia snuff out her own culture, says Dr. Koussevitzky, but the real tragedy is that the entire world must suffer because of the stupidity of a limited few. And this remark was stated with a vehemence which means, in a way, to indicate Dr. Koussevitzky's own personal feelings on the matter.

However pessimistic Dr. Koussevitzky is upon the Russian political attitude toward music, he is very enthusiastic over the future prospects of American composers and instrumentalists. He expresses the firm belief that it is no longer necessary for Americans to go abroad for musical training. Not only American composers, but instrumentalists as well, are just as highly ranked these days as the European artists, says Dr. Koussevitzky.

The fiery conductor, himself a man of great emotional enthusiasm, has put an accent upon youth. William Kapell, Isaac Stern, and the French violinist, Ginette Neveu, to mention a few, are all young in years, but have, in the estimation of both Dr. Koussevitzky and their public, already approached greatness.

When queried about his plans after retiring from the Symphony at the end of this present season, Dr. Koussevitzky admitted his intentions to compose a great deal, which should be good news to many, and also to conduct frequently. As for the Berkshire Music Center and Festival each summer in Tanglewood, Dr. Koussevitzky intends to carry on his work there indefinitely, regardless of his retirement from the symphony.
—F. S.

MAR 20 1949

Opera Auditions Held

Boris Goldovsky, head of the opera department of the Berkshire Music Center, will hold auditions in Cleveland for singers who wish to apply for admission to the opera department. The auditions will be held at the Cleveland Institute of Music, 3411 Euclid Av, Cleveland, on Monday, March 28, at 10 a. m. The Berkshire Music Center, which is sponsored by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will hold its seventh session at Tanglewood, Lenox, Massachusetts, from July 4 to August 14. Serge Koussevitzky is director and Aaron Copland is assistant director. The music center offers an opportunity for music study in connection with the Berkshire festival concerts of the Boston Symphony at Tanglewood. The catalog of the Berkshire Music Center and information about the courses offered may be obtained from Thomas Perry, Symphony Hall, Boston 15, Massachusetts.

FORT WAYNE, IND.
NEWS SENTINEL

MAR 19 1949

RECORDED MUSIC

Ravel Wrote With Grace, Hansen Finds

BY WALTER A. HANSEN
(News-Sentinel Music Critic)

One never ceases to marvel at the orchestral magic wrought by the late Maurice Ravel (1875-1937). There are good reasons for saying that this able French composer has far less to tell us in his music than those masters who by common consent are numbered among the greatest of the great, but there are equally good reasons for declaring without any hesitation whatever that no one excelled him in the art of instrumentation.

Whom do we think of first whenever we undertake to enumerate those composers whose skill in writing for the modern orchestra must be regarded as great in the true sense of the word? Our thoughts turn to Richard Wagner, to Hector Berlioz, to Nicolas Rimsky-Korsakoff, to Claude Debussy, to Ottorino Respighi, to Richard Strauss and to Ravel.

Skill Mentioned

Yes, one often meets men and women who say, "Ravel's music is not for us. We do not like it." For reasons best known to themselves they are not attracted by what Ravel has to say in his works, but they cannot effectively question the gifted Frenchman's technical skill.

Ravel's writing is always full of grace. It is refined to the nth degree. It is highly polished. One writer likened it to "those formal French gardens in which the trees are trimmed to precise shapes and the flowers laid out in well-ordered patterns." This author—it was Gilbert Chase—found consummate skill in Ravel's scores. He knew, of course, that in the opinion of some there was "too much artifice" in the Frenchman's way of writing; but he was sure that even those holding to such a view would be forced to "admit that he (Ravel) conceals this artifice with infinite grace."

Serge Koussevitzky

It is this "infinite grace" of expression which makes Ravel's suite titled "Ma Mere l'Oye" ("Mother Goose Suite") a masterpiece. If it is true that any work which has permanent value must be looked upon as a classic, then one is compelled to conclude that this appealing composition must be numbered among the classics of recent times.

Arranged in 1912

Ravel wrote the "Mother Goose Suite" in 1908. Originally it was a piano duet. Four years later the composer arranged it for orchestra, and it is this version which has become known throughout the world. The score calls for piccolo, two flutes, two oboes, English horn, two clarinets, two bassoons, double bassoon, two horns, tympani, bass drum, cymbals, triangle, tam-tam, xylophone, glockenspiel, celesta, harp and strings.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Serge Koussevitzky, gives a superb performance of the "Mother Goose Suite" in a recent recording (RCA Victor DM-1268). Here Dr. Koussevitzky is at his best. The reading does full justice to the magic contained in the score.

Ravel composed the suite for two children—Mimi and Jean Godebski. He based it on the fairy tales of Charles Perrault, whose "Comte de ma Mere l'Oye" was published in 1697. The work has the following five parts: "Pavane of the Sleeping Beauty," only 20 measures in length; "Hop o' My Thumb"; "Laideronette, Empress of the Pagodas"; "The Conversation of Beauty and the Beast" and "The Fairy Garden."

* * * *

Other Recordings

Marian Anderson, the great Negro contralto, sings Richard Stauss' "Morgen" ("Tomorrow") and "Befreit" ("Freed") with spine-tingling beauty (RCA Victor 12-0734). Franz Rupp is at the piano.

Licia Albanese, soprano, is heard in the recitative, "Quel Guardo il Cavaliere," and the aria, "So Anch' Lo la Vitru Magica," from the first act of Donizetti's "Don Pasquale," and, on the opposite side of the 12-inch disc, in the recitative, "Giunse Affin il Momento," and the aria, "Deh Vieni, Non Tardar," from the fourth act of Mozart's "The Marriage of Figaro" (RCA Victor 12-0733). For the selections from Donizetti's opera the distinguished artist has the assistance of the RCA Victor Orchestra under D. Marzollo; for the Mozart music the orchestra is under the baton of Jean Paul Morel.

Florence Quartararo, soprano, and Ramon Vinaym, tenor, sing the duet, "Parle-moi de Ma Mere" ("Tell Me of My Mother"), from the first act of Bizet's "Carmen," with the RCA Victor Orchestra under Mr. Morel (RCA Victor 12-0687).

FLINT, MICH.
JOURNAL

MAR 20 1949

Berkshire Festival Plans Told For Koussevitzky's Anniversary

New York —UP— The 12th annual Berkshire Festival will open July 16, at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass., the Boston Symphony Orchestra announces. The festival will climax the 25th season with Serge Koussevitzky as conductor of the orchestra.

Nine concerts will be given in the Tanglewood music shed, through three week ends, on Thursday evenings, Saturday evenings, and Sunday afternoons (series A, July 28, 30 and 31; series B, Aug. 4, 6 and 7; series C, Aug., 11, 13 and 14). The guest conductors of the festival will be Leonard Bernstein and Eleazar de Carvalho. Soloists will be announced.

Before the concerts in the large music shed by the full orchestra Dr. Koussevitzky will conduct four concerts by a smaller orchestra in the intimate theater-concert hall. These concerts will be given on the Saturday evening and Sunday afternoon of two week ends, July 16-17 and July 23-24.

Two different programs will be given each week end. They will be drawn from the music of Bach and Mozart, as in previous seasons and this year the music of Haydn and Schubert will be added.

In connection with the Koussevitzky anniversary, the Boston Orchestra has arranged with RCA Victor to distribute a souvenir album of double bass recordings made by Dr. Koussevitzky in 1929, when he played for the last time the instrument which first brought him fame. The album, containing three vinylite records, will sell for $10. All proceeds will go to the Koussevitzky anniversary fund of the orchestra.

LEWISTON, ME.
SUN

MAR 21 1949

Koussevitsky Announces Plans For Berkshire Music Center

BOSTON — Serge Koussevitzky has announced plans for the 1949 session of the Berkshire Music Center, the Summer school of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at Tanglewood in Lenox, Massachusetts. The Music Center will have a six-week session from July 4 to August 14 through the period of the Berkshire Festival concerts (July 16 to August 14) which will climax Dr. Koussevitzky's 25th anniversary season.

Dr. Koussevitzky will direct the school with Aaron Copland as assistant director. Additions to the faculty include Olivier Messiaen, the Parisian composer, who will make his first visit to America to join Aaron Copland as teacher of composition. The members of the Juilliard String Quartet (Robert Mann, Robert Koff, Raphael Hillyer and Arthur Winograd) will assist Gregor Piatigorsky, who will be in charge of chamber music. Twenty-five members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will also take part in this department. Among the faculty, together with the principals of the Boston Symphony Orchestry, will be Leonard Bernstein, Richard Burgin and Eleazar de Carvalho assisting Dr. Koussevitzky in the conducting classes and with the student orchestra. Hugh Ross will head the Choral Department. Robert Shaw, regularly a member of the choral faculty, will be on leave of absence, and Mr. Ross will be joined by Christopher Honaas, head of the music department of Rollins College, Winter Park, Fla.

There will be five departments as in former seasons—Orchestral and Choral Conducting, Orchestra and Chamber Music, Composition, Opera and Chorus. The opera department will include a considerably expanded opera and chamber orchestra which will perform for the opera productions and will give concerts from the chamber orchestra repertoire. There will be some 40 school performances, including concerts by all the departments, by members of the faculty, and visiting artists, and a major opera production under the direction of Boris Goldovsky in the tradition of Benjamin Britten's "Peter Grimes" (American premiere in 1946), Mozart's "Idomeneo" (American premiere in 1947) and Rossini's "The Turk in Italy" (1948). Members of the Friends of the Berkshire Music Center, an organization of contributors to the support of the school, are invited to these concerts.

The Berkshire Music Center was initiated in 1940 by Dr. Koussevitzky and is established under the sponsorship of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in connection with the concerts of the Berkshire Festival.

Information about the Music Center and the Berkshire Festival may be secured by writing the Berkshire Music Center, Symphony Hall, Boston 15, Mass.

ERIE, PA.
DISPATCH-HERALD-SUN

MAR 20 1949

Auditions for Opera

SINGERS IN ERIE and this area who wish to audition for admission to the Berkshire Music Center's opera department this coming summer will have a chance to do so this month.

Boris Goldovsky, head of the department, will hold auditions at the Cleveland Institute of Music, 3411 Euclid Ave., in Cleveland, beginning at 10 a. m. Monday, March 28.

Berkshire opens its seventh session at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass. July 4, closing August 24. Serge Koussevitsky is director, Aaron Copland, assistant director.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
JOURNAL AMERICAN

MAR 21 1949

Koussevitsky and Orchestra Weave Magic

By MILES KASTENDIECK

Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony worked their customary magic in Carnegie Hall on Saturday afternoon. The program of two war horses was prefaced by a little insight into French music. Debussy's "La Mer" and the Brahms' First Symphony were introduced by Roussel's Suite in F and Satie's Two "Gymnopedies."

A superb performance of the Roussel reminded the audience of the outspoken nature, the biting harmony, and the essential vitality of this music. In contrast there was the "dream" music that Debussy's orchestration made of Satie's two piano pieces.

Already enhanced by Debussy, they became even more beautiful in the sensitive performance that Koussevitzky fashioned. Here was a case where transcription clearly heightened the value of the original music.

In the light of these performances [illegible] surprising to find that the [illegible] of "La Mer" fell [illegible] kind of realization [illegible] identified the work closely with this conductor. Its details were over-refined; its pace [illegible] too deliberate.

It took a while to whip up the Brahms to the incandescence it finally achieved. There was something in the nature of a last fling as the performance culminated. The glory of the orchestra found full utterance, reminding the listener again what a magnificent instrument Koussevitzky has made of it.

* * *

Curtains

Verdi rang down the curtain of the 64th subscription season of the Metropolitan Opera on Saturday. "Rigoletto" in the afternoon and "Traviata" in the evening attracted the customary capacity audiences.

It was also curtains for the Ballet Russe de Monte Carlo at City Center yesterday. The sure-fire bill of "Swan Lake," "Nutcracker" and "Scheherazade" in the afternoon, "Pas de Quatre," "Giselle" and "Gaite Parisienne" in the evening wound up the engagement. The company will return Sept. 10.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

There were three distinguishing features in the concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Dr. Koussevitzky was again at the helm, and the first of the afternoon's artistic accomplishments (although it came second on the program) was his superb reading of Debussy's "La Mer." This miracle has been wrought before, but since this week end may be the last time we shall hear the work under his direction, it is worthy of further comment. Not only was the performance notable for the variegation of tone color, but also for the compelling sweep and rhythmic surge which are the distinguished conductor's specialties. The French tone may be purer, but the sounds evoked yesterday were luminous beyond comparison.

Preceding the Debussy work came Honegger's Fourth Symphony, heard here for the first time. The three movements are short and curiously gentle, written with masterly transparency through which shine small solo passages for nearly everything from piccolo to snare drum. In his explicit program notes, the composer has explained that the first movement expresses the hope of possible escape from the stupid and trivial things of life. In the second and third sections, this hope is realized with the creative artist enjoying life with musical friends in Switzerland. To carry out this pleasant atmosphere he employs two popular Swiss folk-tunes which are used ingeniously, especially in the concluding polyphonic movement.

Following the intermission came the third feature of the afternoon, the appearance of Jascha Heifetz to play not the customary one concerto, but two. To delight the classicists there was the Mozart Concerto in D major, and for the modernists the noted violinist offered the Prokofieff Concerto in G minor. The Heifetz interpretation of Mozart was, as always on the exquisite side. His practice of playing Rondos in the Dresden china style may not have appealed to the admirers of the more virile type Mozart, but I found it delightful in the closing section of the concerto.

The audience expressed its enthusiasm for both soloist and conductor by prolonged applause at the conclusion of the program.

HARRY LAWTON.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE

MAR 21 1949

Boston Symphony

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, fourth afternoon concert of its New York series Saturday at Carnegie Hall. The program:

Suite in F major, Op. 33 ....Roussel
Two Gymnopedies (Nos. 1 and 3)
Satie, orchestrated by Debussy
La Mer ....Debussy
Symphony No. 1, in C minor........Brahms

By Francis D. Perkins

The Boston Symphony Orchestra completed its fourth visit of the season to Carnegie Hall Saturday afternoon when Serge Koussevitzky divided his program between works by three French composers born in the 1860s and the first symphony of Brahms. Originally, he had planned to open the concert with another work of Brahms, the Tragic Overture; the house program cited the substitution of Albert Roussel's suite but omitted Debussy's orchestrations of the two "Gymnopedies" by Erik Satie which followed. The correct course of events was announced by Dr. Koussevitzky to his hearers from the stage.

In regard to balance and contrast, as well as to the quality of the music performed, it was a well ordered program. Roussel's suite in F major was introduced to New York by the Bostonians under Dr. Koussevitzky twenty-two years ago; it had several performances here in the 1930s, and was played by the Philharmonic-Symphony last season after an eleven-year absence from local stages. With a certain classicism of form, and titles associated with the eighteenth century for two of its three movements, it does not suggest a nostalgia for that age either in content or in atmosphere; the idiom is distinctly Roussel's and of his time, and skill in structure and scoring is accompanied by musical invention and expressive range and persuasiveness.

The conductor and orchestra gave an imaginative account of the suite and of the two Satie pieces; these, originally two of a set of three piano works, had a performance which fully revealed their essential clarity and dignity and also their atmosphere, with its unspecific but pervasive suggestion of a remote, classic age. Here and there, in Debussy's "La Mer," there seemed to be an understatement of certain phrases, as compared with previous performances of this masterpiece by the same conductor and orchestra, but the interpretation as a whole, with its expected aural appeal, reflected the rich imaginative resources of the music.

The spirited and expressive interpretation of the Brahms symphony was marked by the high standards of performances which are associated with the Bostonians, and brought the concert to a duly climactic and warmly applauded close.

COLUMBUS, OHIO
CITIZEN

MAR 22 1949

Tanglewood Opera Tryouts In Cleveland

Boris Goldovsky, head of the opera department of the Berkshire Music Center, will hold auditions in Cleveland for singers who wish to apply for admission to the opera department. The auditions will be held at the Cleveland Institute of Music, 3411 Euclid-av, Cleveland, on Monday, March 28, at 10 a. m.

The Berkshire Music Center, which is sponsored by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will hold its seventh session at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass., from July 4 to Aug. 14. Serge Koussevitzky is director and Aaron Copland is assistant director. The music center offers an opportunity for music study in connection with the Berkshire Festival Concerts of the Boston Symphony at Tanglewood.

The catalog of the Berkshire Music Center and information about the courses offered may be obtained from Thomas Perry, Symphony Hall, Boston 15, Mass.

WHEN THE WALDEN String Quartet appears at 8:30 p. m. today in the Art Gallery, it will mark their final concert of the season. These concerts have been under the sponsorship of the newly formed Prestige Concerts. Tickets for this concert will be available at the door.

The program follows:

Quartet in F Minor, Op. 95 ...Beethoven
Quartet No. 1, Op. 25 .... Britten
Intermission
Quintet in F Minor, Op. 34 .....Brahms
Evelyn Garvey, pianist

THE WOMEN'S MUSIC CLUB will present a group of members in concert on Sunday, March 27, at 3:30 p. m., in the Columbus Gallery of Fine Arts. The public is invited.

The program:

Thanks Be to Thee .... Handel
La Mer, Est Plus Belle ...... Debussy
Ava Maria .... Bruch
Opal Berry Stauffer, contralto
Cora Kurtz Coffinbeery, accompanist
Scherzo from Opus 78 .... Schubert
Two American Minstral Songs ..Arranged
Rosa Lee
Uncle Ned
Capriccio in Molto Perpetuo . Stoeving
Violin quartet—Mabel Dunn Hopkins, Elizabeth Stoltz Johnston, Isabel Chandler, Etta Mae Sherman. Frances Beall, accompanist.
Have You Seen But a White Lillie Grow .... Old English
When I Bring You Colored Toys .... Carpenter
Children of the Moon .... Warren
Vocal Trio—Ruth Deeds, [illegible] William J. Barton, Mrs. Beryl [illegible]sberg. Sara Reynard, accompanist.
Sonata F Sharp Minor .... Scarlatti
Ballet des Hombres [illegible] .... Gluck-Friedman
Minuet L'Arlesienne Suite No. 1 .... Bizet-Rachmaninoff
Fantasie, F Minor Op. 49 .... Chopin
Jessie Peters, pianist

Maplewood, N.J.
Record
3/24/49

Music Notes

By Gertrude H. Hale

The concert by the Boston Symphony, with Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, last week at the Mosque brings these reflections.

Once the plaything of princes and nobles, the modern symphony has become the most powerful and eloquent of all musical instruments. Musical history tells us of the small, ill-assorted group of instruments brought together in the 16th century by Monteverde and developed later by Haydn, Mozart and Beethoven, but surely the power and excellence of a modern symphonic orchestra, was never dreamed of by those pioneers.

The real purpose of a symphony orchestra is what one might call psychological, namely, to produce a certain effect on our consciousness. Why? Because each instrument possesses some distinctive trait for producing an impression on the listener's heart and mind. Each instrument gives some tint or shade in this assembling of tone color. In hearing alone, the different instruments, one discovers how versatile each can be, and the variety of roles each can play in the musical drama.

When most symphony orchestras assemble on a stage, it seems as if there was an active maelstrom of men, sending out a confusion of sounds, as they tune together, but gradually the listener hears as the program opens, the co-ordination of tones, laws of structure and progression as the musical composition unfolds.

Symphony and orchestral writing demands that the composer know not only the individual psychology of each instrument with its capabilities and peculiarities, but also how it will combine and fit in with every other instrument.

Two instruments which sound well alone might make an atrocious combination. So a composer's problem is to mix, balance and contrast the timbre of the instruments, with the total compass from the lowest notes of the tuba to the shriek of the piccolo, and tone from the pale blue of the flute to the jet black of the drum.

It was Beethoven who adopted clarinets and made his first known large work somewhat remarkable.

The Seventh Symphony of Beethoven, played by the Boston Symphony last Thursday, was considered by its composer as among one of his best works and many critics call it the perfect symphony.

With this Seventh Symphony, the only one of Beethoven's immortal works written in the key of A major, there began an entirely new music. Ludwig, in "Beethoven, the Life of a Conquerer" writes, "The titan who struggled so long to reach Olympus, was raised aloft to it in this Symphony, without a struggle. Instead of his own struggle he portrays those of the gods."

In hearing again this Seventh Symphony, one discovers the emotions that are portrayed and one perceives what boundless dreams Beethoven must have had. In previous symphonies, Beethoven dramatized power, freedom, defiance and fate, but in the Seventh, emotions rise heavenward. Your scribe had a few herself, as she recalled her youthful days in Boston, sitting on the lap of her father so she could see the conductor and players in the orchestra, and trying hard to listen. Probably not a man who played at that time is alive today, but each one gave his best, and added a rich heritage which has made the Boston Symphony Orchestra the peer in the world of music.

Just a word about Koussevitzky who is the Prince of conductors. He is a great conductor because he is a great man. In personality rich in experience, [illegible] in sympathy, with a mind fresh, forceful, and alert, to conceive and revitalize the creative mood of the composer.

NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
STANDARD-TIMES

Pianist, Singer In Tanglewood Alumni Body

Miss Har[illegible] Kapla[illegible] Adams Street, [illegible] pianist and [illegible] Miss Cyn[illegible] S[illegible] daughter [illegible] Sweeney of Sou[illegible] members of a new [illegible] ter of the Ta[illegible] Alumni Association.

The alumni [illegible] who have studied at Tanglewood, the Berkshire [illegible] Center founded by Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Miss Kaplan is [illegible] editor with Leon[illegible] Bu[illegible] assistant librarian [illegible] the Boston Symphony, [illegible] to be [illegible] distribution [illegible] New York and [illegible] as well as Boston chapters. She also is [illegible] chairman [illegible] Boston chapter.

Miss Sweeney, [illegible] Radcliffe College, is [illegible] of the [illegible] Tanglewood [illegible] Association.

A group of composer [illegible] of the association are [illegible] an orchestral work to be played in honor of Dr. Koussevitzky at the public tribute which will be given for him May 2 in Symphony Hall, Boston. The association looks forward to holding musical meetings at which former fellow students may renew friendships and discuss musical subjects of common interest.

Album Feature Koussevitzky On Double Bass

By Alice Eversman

What will surely rank as a collector's item of great value is the album of double bass recordings by Serge Koussevitzky recently issued by RCA Victor. The issue is a limited one and devised as a souvenir of the 25th anniversary season of the conductor as head of the Boston Symphony. Proceeds will be added to the Koussevitzky 25th anniversary fund established this year to benefit the orchestra. The fund is an outcome of the desire on the part of those who have enjoyed the symphony programs to honor the conductor in a special way on his retirement at the end of this season. It was his wish that any such tribute take the form of a gift to the orchestra.

The collection of recordings consists of the "Andante" from the concerto Koussevitzky wrote for the instrument, his "Chanson Triste" and "Valse Miniature," Eccles' "Largo" and Laska's "Lullaby." With the exception of the "Chanson" and the "Largo," which were recorded and circulated 20 years ago, the other numbers are released for the first time. It was in 1929 when his duties as the Boston conductor occupied so much of his time, that he abandoned the solo performances on the double bass. Two years previously he had given a recital in Symphony Hall and one in Carnegie Hall the following season. At the end of his solo career, he made several recordings for Victor but they are not widely known.

More than the interest attached to the acquaintance of Koussevitzky as a virtuoso as well as a conductor, is the fact that double bass players of a proficiency to give public concerts and make recordings are too few to matter. The difficulties of the instrument, its dark and cumbersome tone and the lack of solo literature have confined it almost exclusively to the orchestra. The Koussevitzky recordings, however, show that these hindrances can be overcome in the hands of an artist and virtuoso. The tone which the noted conductor draws is velvety and light, resembling more that of a cello. He is a master of artistic effects on the instrument as he is in conducting the orchestra. One of his hopes in permitting the release of the album is that more people will realize the possibilities of the instrument and dedicate themselves to its study. Only 1,000 copies of the album are available now, but if the demand warrants it, a reprint may be made.

INDIANAPOLIS, IND.
STAR

MAR 22 1949

Berkshire Auditions To Be Held At Chicago

Boris Goldovsky, head of the opera department at the Berkshire Music Center, will hold auditions in Chicago for singers who wish to apply for admission to the opera department. Auditions will be held at Orchestra Hall, Chicago, Saturday at 1 p.m. An accompanist will be present.

The Berkshire Music Center, sponsored by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will hold its seventh session at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass., from July 4 to Aug. 14. Serge Koussevitzky is director of the center. The Music Center offers opportunity for music study in connection with the Berkshire Festival Concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

ss.

er
ood
y

of 161 Bedford ist, and soprano, s. Patrick nouth, are med chap- d Alumni musicians anglewood, ic Center ussevitzky, erve as co- Burkat, as- the Boston of bulletins association umni of the adelphia, as rs. She also of the Bosstudent at secretary of vood Alumni oser members are composing to be played sevitzky at the will be given mphony Hall, looks musical meet- er fellow stu- riendships and bjects of com-

---

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
MORNING UNION
[illegible] 1949

Adele Addison Is Soloist With Boston Symphony Orchestra

By WILLARD M. CLARK

[illegible] n Symphony Hall, Boston, [illegible] and listened to [illegible] of one of the [illegible] of the 19th Century [illegible] for that matter, [illegible] second symphony [illegible] "Resurrection." The [illegible] calls for orchestra, [illegible] and soprano soloists [illegible] by Leonard Bernstein. [illegible] was the Boston [illegible] chorus was made up of members of the Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe Choral Society and the soloists were Nan Merriman, contralto, and Adele Addison, soprano.

That's why we were there, to hear Miss Addison participate in this memorable work. We were well repaid for she had the purity of voice, the feeling for text and the musicianship to make the most of this very complicated score. No wonder the hall resounded with bravos after the performance for it was truly great.

Conducts Without Score

Mr. Bernstein has a knack of making whatever he interprets sometimes sound just a bit better than it really is. It is a question whether the Mahler symphony justifies its extreme length—it takes one hour and a quarter for performance. During 1948, he conducted this work in Boston and at Tanglewood. As usual, he conducted without score and with an incisive beat and wonderfully clear cues.

This "Resurrection" symphony, as its name implies, deals with life and death and the final judgment. The opening movement depicts the death of a hero. The utter ruthlessness of the long funeral march sets the mood and holds it throughout the movement. The second movement, an andante, is delightfully gay and melodic with a sort of Landler dance form throughout. The third movement is a scherzo, but what a scherzo, sardonic, brutal and tireless in its progression. In the fourth and fifth movements soloists and chorus are heard.

The contralto has a solo of great beauty, the text of which was taken from the famous anthology of old German folk-poetry, "Des Knaben Wunderhorn." Miss Merriman sang it exquisitely. Her voice is large, rich and warm, and she uses it skillfully. Suddenly, out of utter silence, the chorus is heard in the words of Klopstock's ode, "Resurrection," opening the final movement. It was from this ode that Mahler gained the inspiration for the tremendous finale of this symphony, depicting in mighty tone that "death and judgment are at hand."

Audience Moved

As the chorus sings, one soprano voice rises above it proclaiming, "You will arise again, my dust, after a short repose." As Miss Addison sang these words in German and with the simplicity of complete assurance of their truth, the audience about us was visibly moved. Again in "Believe, you were not born in vain," she sang with telling effect. The voice cut through the orchestra without losing its lovely quality and every word was understandable. She was particularly effective in the contralto-soprano duet which, with a peal of organ, bells, and jubilant orchestra, the symphony ends.

Mr. Bernstein apparently is very close to the meaning of this work. He built up tremendous climaxes, and drew the most alluring sounds from the strings. Always, rhythm was uppermost The performance never sagged and if certain pages were found arid, it was the fault of the composer, not the conductor.

The work will be repeated tonight. Sunday, Miss Addison will be soloist in the Bach "Mass in B Minor." The first portion will be given in the afternoon. There will be time out for dinner and the work will be concluded at the evening performance. It was said that Symphony Hall is completely sold out for this performance.

SCIENCE MONITOR

—Pension

Koussevitzky Directs Bach B Minor Mass

By Harold Rogers

[illegible] Sebastian Bach, with [illegible] humility, once referred to the first two sections of [illegible] Mass in B minor as an "in[illegible] example of my skill [illegible]"

[illegible] day's performance of the [illegible] given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the [illegible] forces of the Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe Choral Society served to reaffirm what [illegible] been patent—Bach's "in[illegible]" Mass is to be counted among the greatest musical utterances ever composed. And [illegible] of course, who [illegible] none greater.

* * *

[illegible] performance, divided into afternoon and evening sessions, [illegible] conducted by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky for the benefit of the Boston Symphony's Pension Fund. The choristers were expertly trained by G. Wallace Woodworth. Adele Addison, soprano, Eunice Alberts, contralto, Sumner Crockett, tenor, and Lee Wolovsky, bass, were soloists whose emotional grasp and musicianship were equal to the demands. Symphony Hall was filled.

In the future we may hear productions of the B minor Mass that can be matched to the one heard yesterday, but some time may pass before we hear one that surpasses it. The purity of line and phrase, the sensitive balance [illegible] between orchestra and chorus, the nobility of the solo voices, all blended under Dr. Koussevitzky's baton to bring Bach's exalted conceptions into vivid focus.

* * *

Outstanding among the choruses were the opening Kyrie, a five-part fugue; the section beginning "Qui tollis" in the Gloria; that of the Credo beginning "Et incarnatus est," sublimely pure in conception and execution; the passacaglia, "Crucifixus," and the noble Sanctus.

Yesterday Bach's great Mass, sung in ecclesiastical Latin, appeared to transcend even the vast [illegible] of Protestantism for which it was composed. Whether Bach knew it or not, he was speaking in universal terms.

A demonstration followed that reached its height in enthusiasm when Dr. Koussevitzky took a curtain call with Mr. Woodworth.

EL PASO, TEXAS
TIMES
[illegible] 27 1949

Koussevitzky To Direct School

New York. (UP)—Serge Koussevitzky has announced plans for the 1949 session of the Berkshire Music Center, the summer school of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood in Massachusetts. The center will have a six-week session from July 4 to Aug. 14, during which the Berkshire festival concerts will be given.

Dr. Koussevitzky will direct the school, with Aaron Copland as assistant director. The faculty will include Olivier Messiaen, Parisian composer on his first visit to America; Gregor Patigorsky, Leonard Berstein, Richard Burgin, Eleazar de Carvalho and Hugh Ross.

MUSIC

March 28

B Minor Mass

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, gave a performance of the Mass in B minor by Johann Sebastian Bach yesterday afternoon and evening in Symphony Hall. The soloists were Adele Addison, soprano; Eunice Alberts, contralto; Sumner Crockett, tenor, and Lee Wolovsky, bass. The assisting chorus was that of the Radcliffe Choral Society and the Harvard Glee Club, G. Wallace Woodworth, conductor.

By RUDOLPH ELIE

Here ended the association of one our greatest living conductors ith one of our greatest choral ganizations; an association that as, in the last 25 years, produced me of the grandest moments that ave ever shaken the warm grey alls of Symphony Hall.

Yesterday it was the Mass in B inor by Sebastian Bach, and no ore fitting valedictory for the rting of their separate ways uld possibly be imagined; it was hail and farewell of the most alted nature. Moreover, it was recollection of the perhaps five six thousand young men and omen who have stood before this mense musical figure during ese 25 years and have sung their arts out for him hardly knowing at they were doing, so intense s their emotion.

And what emotion has more validity, more nobility, more grandeur an that which springs from sing- g great music in concert with e's fellows? Here, as in no other owd situation, is there produced e feeling that the universe is disclosing itself as it should, and that somehow we all belong to it and are a part of it. If this is true of the performers, it is almost equally true of the listener, for aside from the emotions great music is capable of stirring, choral music is also words.

The B minor Mass contains the words of the most solemn rite of the Catholic church, but they touch all members of Christianity as well. No one was ever more Protestant than Bach himself, and though he composed this work for his Catholic sovereign (a "trifling example" of his ability, he said), it is in fact neither Roman nor Protestant but transcendantly ecumenical. It is also undeniably the greatest choral work ever committed to paper.

Its performance yesterday was stupendous. The choruses of Harvard and Radcliffe, prepared by G. Wallace Woodworth, never achieved more beauty of tone or more unanimity. The entrances were marvels of precision, the voice leading of the sheerest clarity, the balance, even in the great double chorus of the Osanna, breathtaking. And as for volume without distortion, the Et Resurrexit still rings in my ears.

I do not remember a more distinguished quartet of young soloists. The two women, Adele Addison and Eunice Alberts, were perhaps the more remarkable for the exquisite qualities of their voices and the truly astonishing integration of their voices in the duets, but Sumner Crockett and Lee Wolovsky were almost equally fine. The orchestral soloists were Richard Burgin, violin; Louis Speyer and Jean Devergie, oboes; Willem Valkenier, horn; James Pappoutsakis, flute, and Georges Mager and Roger Voison on the high trumpet, and it hardly need be said they performed magnificently. E. Power Biggs played the organ and Lukas Foss the harpsichord to provide additional sonority to the ensemble.

"The B minor Mass? Sure, I sang it with Koussevitzky the last time he ever did it." The 340 young men and women who can say that, as well the capacity audience that heard them do it, have something to remember. It is going to be a long time before we ever hear the like again.

MUSIC

Bach's B Minor Mass Given to Benefit the Symphony Pension Fund

By CYRUS DURGIN

Looking at it as calmly as possible, yesterday was historic, both for the Boston Symphony Orchestra and for conductor Serge Koussevitzky. In Symphony Hall during the afternoon and evening they performed, for the benefit of the pension fund, Bach's great B-minor Mass in about as superb a fashion as ever you will hear it done. This was a re-creation of vast dimensions and almost visionary intensity, and at the end it aroused an ovation the like of which I never before have heard in Symphony Hall.

The choice of the B-minor Mass for the last pension fund concert that Mr. Koussevitzky will conduct here as music director of the Boston Symphony was altogether fortunate. In years past his presentations of it, and also of the "St. Matthew" Passion, brought those scores renewed public interest and made them box office sellouts. Last done in 1944, the B-minor Mass again, yesterday, occasioned a capacity audience.

The choruses again were the Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe Choral Society, G. Wallace Woodworth conductor. The four soloists were Adele Addison, Negro soprano; Eunice Alberts, contralto; Sumner Crockett, tenor, and Lee Wolovsky, bass, whose first public appearance in Boston this was, according to the records.

Mr. Woodworth's preparation of any choral score may always be expected to be superlative, and this season's work adheres to the standard. He has had the benefit, I think, of unusually good material, for the choral tone was stronger and richer, without forcing, than at some past concerts. Especially was this true of the tenor and bass sections. From time to time the moving voices were not crystal clear, but mostly the stupendous counterpoint was evenly voiced.

This was a fortunate quartet of soloists, for, while the voices are all young and not of the tonal weight that comes with maturity, the four were admirably balanced. Both Miss Addison and Miss Alberts sang very cleanly and with luscious tone. Miss Alberts, however, by reason of being more easily heard (for Miss Addison's voice is lighter) must be credited with the finest solo work of all. I shall never forget how beautifully she did the Agnus Dei. Mr. Crockett, even if his voice has a passing suggestion of "throatiness," and Mr. Wolovsky, who has a resonant but agile bass, did well, indeed.

The Mass, of course, was given in two sections, beginning at 3 and 8, and complete, except for the da capo repetition of the Hosanna, which was omitted. In this place, to avoid two arias being heard consecutively, Mr. Koussevitzky transposed the tenor Benedictus so that it preceded the Hosanna.

This monumental score, ever one of the wonders of all musical art, is perhaps too long in some of its sections, where the counterpoint becomes a shade academic and perhaps a little dry. The entire score never was intended for complete performance as a church service, for one reason because Bach was a Lutheran, and the Lutheran Mass consisted only of the Kyrie and Gloria. But as a concert work of art, mingling the genius of Bach with individual feeling of devotion, this is both great and profound. The highest points are no less than stupendous, and one of them is the "In gloria Dei Patris, Amen," the phrase which ends the Gloria in a truly glorious burst of affirmation.

MUSIC

Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Leonard Bernstein conducting, gave the [illegible] concert of the 68th season in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. The program consisted of Mahler's Symphony No. 2 in C minor.

The soloists were Adele Addison, soprano, and Nan Merriman, contralto, with the choruses of the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society (G. Wallace Woodworth, conductor) as assisting artists.

By RUDOLPH ELIE

Monday it was Mozart's C minor Mass, Tuesday it was Bartok's Quartets, Wednesday the opening of the Metropolitan's local season, Thursday it was "Salome," tonight it's "Aida" (in the flesh or on television), tomorrow it will be Bach's B minor Mass—and yesterday it was Mahler's Second Symphony. What a week!

For that matter, what a symphony! It was clear enough last year, when Mr. Bernstein re-introduced it to Boston after it had lain silent for 30 years, that this is one of the most feverishly personal works in the symphonic literature. Not that Mahler ever seeks impersonality; on the contrary, where others may bare their emotions but always convey the impression they know just what they're doing, Mahler almost glories in his expiatory self-revelation. And, like those who suddenly realize they have told too much of themselves to a friend, he as quickly turns harsh, as if to withdraw his confession.

In this immense work, one that calls for the fullest instrumentation with organ, chorus and soloists, Mahler tells of death and of life after death. He was to be preoccupied with this theme all his life, but here he tells us so in unmistakable terms. Even if he had not, it is likely that the listener, without knowledge of the program or of the text sung in the closing movements, could not mistake the significance of this music, now naively supplicating, again doubting and wondering; now otherworldly, again hopeful and triumphant.

It is a musico-emotional experience if there ever was one, and it would be only too gratifying to be able to say that it was fully realized yesterday. I feel, however, that it was not, and all for the most absurd reasons. Perhaps through the possible over-tiredness of the orchestra (for it must have been rehearsing violently all week, what with one thing or another), it never made so many obvious slips. Ordinarily a slip is of such little consequence I never feel called upon to mention it—and I get little opportunity to do so at that. Yesterday, however, was an exception; it didn't go too well. And despite the lovely qualities produced by both soloists, Nan Merriman and Adele Addison, neither quite managed to soar above the orchestral sound as they should have. And, of all things, some silly girl in the middle of the back row of the chorus giggled and chattered her head off throughout. I never thought I'd have to pick on some little girl out of a crowd of 200 performers, but she nearly drove me and, I'm sure a good many others, mad.

Providence Youth Fellow

AMERICAN

NEW YORK, N.Y.
TIMES
MAR 20 1949

BOSTON SYMPHONY AT CARNEGIE HALL

Koussevitzky Gives Roussel Suite and Satie, Brahms and Debussy Compositions

By OLIN DOWNES

The Boston Symphony concert which Dr. Koussevitzky conducted yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall advanced familiar yet suprising things—familiar because of their familiarity, surprising because of the unexpected things that Dr. Koussevitzky did with certain of them, ending with a sweepingly dramatic performance of the finale of the Brahms C minor symphony.

One of the most brilliant moments came with the opening F major Suite of Albert Roussel. How splendidly this fine, solid, vigorous music stands up with the years! It was composed in 1926, at Dr. Koussevitzky's invitation, for the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and is dedicated to him. The music really has no age, because it is so vital, so straightforward and genuine in the writing that it belongs to no definite artistic "trend"—unless a general one toward classicism—or to the pretensions of no group or clique of composers. It is just superbly well made music, wholly exceptional, perhaps, in the normality and health of its spirit.

It has a splendid swing and stride, a fine harmonic tension, which sounded good yesterday, sounds good today, and will sound splendidly tomorrow. The dissonance is not discord, it is the strong balanced pull of intervals which have both centrifugal and centripetal relations to each other. They hold the balance of the middle between the compulsions of the opposites. Fine, biting harmony, good two-fisted counterpoint, vital rythms, clear lines, and in the finale a folk element and abounding vivacity and humor.

Work of Top Musician

And mind: this is not music of the grandoise or of the titanic masters of the art. It is just the work of a first-class sincere musician who appears to have sought no glory, excepting in doing a thorough job for himself. And everyone rejoiced in the kick and the strength and the clarity of his art.

It was an ideal arrangement to follow this open-air writing of Roussel with the more original and far more visionary music of the young Eric Satie—the two "Gymnopedies," two of the piano pieces of Satie that Debussy, with the piercing perception of the born genius, recognized as the gem of the unique beauty that lay imbedded in this material that came from a partially inarticulate source, and gave it its perfect and exquisite setting. Dream? Play one of these pieces, so bare in color, so chaste in line in the original piano version. Then listen and sense the perfume of Debussy's orchestration, which reveals all of the sensuousness, the nostalgia, the vision of an antique and severe yet tender beauty that Satie could project in skeleton form, but could not by himself fully realize. From this meeting of the greater musician and the lesser one emerges the perfect beauty.

Hearing these Gymnopedies in an early performance in Boston back in the first decade of this century, wondering in those our salad days who this strangely gifted composer might be, we asked the favor of our good friend Clement Lenom, now in this city, then oboiest of the Boston Symphony, to trace Satie to his lair, if he might, during his summer visit to Paris. And he found him and recounted to us the rather indescribable personality of a fantastic, funny man. What was funny? Mr. Lenom couldn't quite tell us by word of mouth. But he brought back with him proof sheets of the "Gymnopedies," then some twenty years old, in their original form, and a letter.

The letter described ironically, jocularly, perhaps sadly, too, certain disappointments of the composer's life—perhaps, even, the disappoint of life with him. It ended by remarking with humble pride that Messrs. Debussy and Ravel had done Eric Satie the honor to find something suggestive in his ideas, and that, if Satie had failed, it was perhaps because he was a dreamer—dreamers being, nevertheless, unfortunately too rare. The sovereign artist, Debussy, brings the dream to realization in his orchestration of the "Gymnopedies." And Dr. Koussevitzky penetrated as deeply to its essence.

"La Mer" Included on Bill

The Boston Symphony's performance of "La Mer," that is to say Dr. Koussevitzky's particularly intuitive and subtly conceived projection of the music, is now one of the traditions of the orchestra he has been perfecting for twenty-five years. The opening impressed one anew by its mystery and its echoes as faint as those heard in a seashell of the sea at dawn. Coloring was of extraordinary fineness, as of course, but the curious thing was this: that the music had less of sweep and more of the episodic than is customary with this singularly versatile and unpredictable interpreter, and that the outstanding achievements of the concert were its first two items and that old, tried and true battle horse of all the conductors in the world—the Brahms First Symphony.

One might differ with a detail or more of the opening movement, or with another detail farther on. These are miniscule, and, in any event, matters partially of opinion. The slow movement was read with an eloquence and depth of conviction that stand out in the recollection of many performances. The over-all conception was so fresh and impressive in its communication, so great in spirit and dramatically delivered that hardened concertgoers were astonished at their own reaction. The last movement, exciting as it is likely to be, had a singular cohesiveness, fire and inevitability. There is a dangerous wealth of material and elaborateness of design in it. Yesterday it was all white hot, as when the horn passage from the introduction of the last movement returned, amid the tumult; as when the chorale of that introduction, returning, was flung, as if in flaming letters, against the sky.

MUSIC

Mahler's 'Resurrection' Symphony Conducted by Leonard Bernstein

By CYRUS DURGIN

Leonard Bernstein conducts the "Resurrection" Symphony by Gustav Mahler, this week, at the last two of his guest appearances this season with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Soloists are Adele Addison, Negro soprano, and Nan Merriman, contralto. The chorus is drawn from the Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe Choral Society, prepared by G. Wallace Woodworth.

A year ago last February Bernstein made a tremendously favorable impression when he revived the Symphony, which had not been heard here for 30 years. He did it again during last Summer's Berkshire Festival.

This week's performances are in response to popular request. The work has the program all to itself. There is no intermission, which means a solid hour-and-one-half of music.

As usual, Bernstein does not bother either with the printed score or a baton. This is not a feat, for he has the vast, five movements completely in his head, and his interpretation has that direct, personal quality which indicates thorough assimilation of everything in the score.

Since it always is well to repeat what one believes to be the truth, let it be said here again that this Symphony in C minor is a great and difficult work, full of Mahler's characteristic inward feelings about life and death.

Because Mahler was so complex, and his musical style so inclusive, the nature of the Symphony can range with equal validity from the stormy first movement through the folksongish andante to the eerie scherzo, wonderful contralto solo of the "Primal Light" movement, and imposing choral finale of hope and affirmation.

As conductor Mahler never spared himself, and as composer he never spared those who were to perform his music. The "Resurrection" Symphony makes great demands on an orchestra. Little things went wrong here and there, attributable to the pressure of a terribly hard week of rehearsals for this program and for the pension fund performance of Bach's Mass in B minor to come on Sunday.

But, in the main, the performance was overwhelmingly moving, and drew, at the end, a rousing ovation of applause and cheers.

Both Miss Merriman and Miss Addison have beautiful voices, and Miss Merriman's work was an impressive [illegible] last Summer.

Miss Addison [illegible] could not be heard a [illegible] part, though surely her vo[illegible] enough. She ought to sing [illegible] tonight.

The chorus was small [illegible] quiet, but rich and [illegible] Mahler wanted. B[illegible] only so many people on [illegible] phony Hall [illegible] platfo[illegible] tion concert.

KOUSSEVITZKY

Continued From the First Page

Yesterday's concert naturally was charged with more emotion than that generated by Beethoven's great music and its marvelous performance. An association of 25 years between Mr. Koussevitzky, the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the Boston public is a relationship terminated only with extreme reluctance. This community long since came to feel affection as well admiration for the Russian-born interpretive genius who is now a fellow citizen. Consequently there was sadness as well as excitement in the air at Symphony Hall.

When Mr. Koussevitzky first appeared on the stage, the audience rose to applaud him, as they have done at beginning and end of the season for many years. But this time they stood a little longer, and clapped a little louder, until with that familiar gesture, the conductor bade them be seated.

Sense of Time Running Out

There was an affecting sense of time's quick running out as Beethoven's vivacious little First Symphony ran its course. The feeling became heightened through first movement, scherzo, adagio and the chorale finale of the Ninth, and there must have been many in the audience who wished they could always retain in their mind's ear the glorious sounds of the orchestra and the loud choral affirmation on Schiller's words, "All mankind knows all men brothers."

One split second after that quick, staccato chord in D major which ends the Ninth Symphony, such a din broke loose as I never have heard in Symphony Hall. The house rocked with handclapping, cheers, whistles and the stamping of feet.

Taking a moment to catch his breath, Mr. Koussevitzky marshaled the four soloists into a semi-circle behind his stand, and then turned to face the audience. Hereupon the noise grew even louder as the conductor slowly bowed, his face still red and set from the spell of the music. He left the stand, and walked slowly off stage through the ranks of the orchestra. Back he came, bringing G. Wallace Woodworth, who had prepared the combined choruses of the Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe Choral Society.

Six times Mr. Koussevitzky was called back, to bow and bow again, all the while the audience stood and the ovation continued. Nearly 10 minutes had passed when he flung his arms wide in request of silence. He was still mopping face with handkerchief as he began to speak:

"Ladies and gentlemen. Two years ago when I gave my resignation to the board of trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, I knew it would be hard to separate myself from you, my public, and my"—and here emotion choked him for a second—"and my dear orchestra. But let us be happy! Let us be happy that we have had 25 years together. We have worked and created the greatest orchestra in the world. We have had a tremendous musical evolution. We have helped many composers until now we have in this country many composers equal to any in the other world. I thank you for your cooperation, for your devotion to the orchestra and for your confidence in me."

One more bow and he was gone.

Soon the green room at the northeast corner of the second floor of Symphony Hall was crammed with friends and well-wishers who milled around the grand piano and its vase of flowers in the middle of the room, until Mr. Koussevitzky emerged from his dressing chamber. For each visitor there was a warm smile and a handshake, and for some of his close friends, a kiss on the cheek. Mme. Olga Koussevitzky, his wife, received with him.

Weeks ago it was evident that this special occasion would find many more people seeking admission to these concerts than Symphony Hall could contain. Weeks ago every last ticket was gone. Even so, the outer lobbies were thronged yesterday with those hopeful that somehow they might get in, and some of them remained through intermission.

The crowd for the limited number of "rush" or unreserved seats in the second balcony reached the exceptional number of 500. The first man was in line at 5:30 yesterday morning. By 9:30 there were 252 people in line. That is an exact count, because candidates 251 and 252 were friends, young men. Only 251 of these seats are available, and, when the custodian with the little counting gadget in his hand had checked off No. 251, the other young man reluctantly was told he couldn't get in. Surely the toughest luck of the week!

The soloists for Beethoven's Ninth Symphony were Frances Yeend, soprano; Eunice Alberts, contralto; David Lloyd, tenor, and James Pease, bass, the same quartet who had done the score with the orchestra in New York a fortnight ago. They all have good voices that balance well, and they all are good musicians.

Schiller's text for the finale this time was sung in German. The Harvard and Radcliffe singers did well and produced a good body of tone, though there was one place where things seemed to go haywire for a moment. As for the orchestra, they sustained the glorious standards for which so long they have been famed. I don't think the recitative for cellos and basses, at the beginning of the finale, has ever been done with greater beauty.

And here let one reviewer voice his profound gratitude that he has been able to follow two-thirds of Koussevitzky's Boston career, and weekly sit before the supreme musical art of a transcendental orchestra and a great man.

National Arts Group Lauds Koussevitzky as Music Pioneer

NEW YORK, April 2[illegible] (AP)—Serge Koussevitzky [illegible] day as "a pioneer [illegible] contemporary music [illegible] his retirement as co[illegible] Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Carleton Smith [illegible] National Arts Fo[illegible] a statement addressed to Koussevitzky, who retires [illegible] read:

"You have made a [illegible] contribution to the [illegible] America.

"Generations to come [illegible] and treasure the [illegible] done.

"You have [illegible] distinguished stand[illegible] performance. [illegible] pioneer in introd[illegible] rary music. You [illegible] inspired young [illegible] carry on your ideas [illegible] their lives.

"Composers, perform[illegible] lic members [illegible] mittee unite [illegible] life and man[illegible] cessful activit[illegible] quarter century in Boston."

anglewood ortunately.

hrough her voice is big ng it louder

all for the nse sonority you can get on the Sym-out an extra al subscrip-

SCENE AT BOSTON
SYMPHONY

A SPRING CASUAL of Pacific wool gabardine, for season-long wear over suit or dress. Moderately full back, a slimmer front and a youthful Directoire collar. Misses' sizes in Blue, Grey, Beige, Green, Black. $65.

As a ticket to the Symphony is a symbol of gracious Boston living, the name Stearns symbolizes the lasting satisfaction of timeless good taste in town and country clothes.

R. H. STEARNS CO.
RHCo Boston

THE SYMPHONY

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

It looked on paper as though Leonard Bernstein, in the double role of composer and pianist, was up against some pretty stiff competition at yesterday's Symphony Concert. Actually, he made out very well. It was a kindness to his "The Age of Anxiety," Symphony No. 2 for piano and orchestra (after W. H. Auden), that Dr. Koussevitzky finally preceded it by Beethoven's Overture to "Coriolanus," not by his Third "Leonore," which would have crushed it at the outset. Again, the program originally ended with Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel," a masterpiece in the domain of illustrative music which Mr. Bernstein eccentrically cultivates in this era of absolutism. However, "Till" was replaced by Ravel's "La Valse," which still followed Strauss' "Death and Transfiguration."

Now "Death and Transfiguration" is not the best Strauss, though played with a certain restraint, it can still be impressive; and "La Valse" generally counts as an entertaining number.

But yesterday both works were over-interpreted. The Strauss became trumpery, the Ravel trivial, with an orgiastic finish that was positively embarrassing.

Possibly, most of my readers are no more familiar with Auden's "boroque eclogue" than I was when word of Mr. Bernstein's forthcoming piece (the score was completed on March 20 last) set me to reading it. This wordy poem, with passages of prose, its scene laid during the late war, has to do with four lonely people who meet in a New York bar, drift into bozy half-consciousness, progress to the apartment of the one girl in the group, and finally go their several ways, aware both of the emptiness of their lives and of the fact that what they need is faith in something. Mr. Bernstein has not attempted a musical paraphrase of this extraordinary poem. Strauss, you may be sure, would have given us the tinkling of glasses or even the gurgling of a bottle. Nor does he attempt to characterize the four figures, who, after all, are little more than mouthpieces for Mr. Auden's philosophizing.

He has managed, however, to get the essence of the poem into a coherent and consistent musical scheme; and on a second hearing one could ignore Auden entirely and concentrate on Bernstein. What the latter has given us is music sensitively imagined and expertly conveyed. It is not particularly original, but it is always musical, ingenious and resourceful. There is a jazzy episode (the scene in Rosetta's apartment) and a soaring, somewhat Mahlerish epilogue. For a more detailed analysis there is no space here. It is sufficient to say that the piece made its effect; that the participants were warmly applauded; to prophesy that the work will have an extensive career; and to marvel at Dr. Koussevitzky's ability to absorb its contents in such short order.

THE SYMPHONY

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

It looked on paper as though Leonard Bernstein, in the double role of composer and pianist, was up against some pretty stiff competition at yesterday's Symphony Concert. Actually, he made out very well. It was a kindness to his "The Age of Anxiety," Symphony No. 2 for piano and orchestra (after W. H. Auden), that Dr. Koussevitzky finally preceded it by Beethoven's Overture to "Coriolanus," not by his Third "Leonore," which would have crushed it at the outset. Again, the program originally ended with Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel," a masterpiece in the domain of illustrative music which Mr. Bernstein eccentrically cultivates in this era of absolutism. However, "Till" was replaced by Ravel's "La Valse," which still followed Strauss' "Death and Transfiguration."

Now "Death and Transfiguration" is not the best Strauss, though played with a certain restraint, it can still be impressive; and "La Valse" generally counts as an entertaining number.

But yesterday both works were over-interpreted. The Strauss became trumpery, the Ravel trivial, with an orgiastic finish that was positively embarrassing.

Possibly, most of my readers are no more familiar with Auden's "boroque eclogue" than I was when word of Mr. Bernstein's forthcoming piece (the score was completed on March 20 last) set me to reading it. This wordy poem, with passages of prose, its scene laid during the late war, has to do with four lonely people who meet in a New York bar, drift into bozy half-consciousness, progress to the apartment of the one girl in the group, and finally go their several ways, aware both of the emptiness of their lives and of the fact that what they need is faith in something. Mr. Bernstein has not attempted a musical paraphrase of this extraordinary poem. Strauss, you may be sure, would have given us the tinkling of glasses or even the gurgling of a bottle. Nor does he attempt to characterize the four figures, who, after all, are little more than mouthpieces for Mr. Auden's philosophizing.

He has managed, however, to get the essence of the poem into a coherent and consistent musical scheme; and on a second hearing one could ignore Auden entirely and concentrate on Bernstein. What the latter has given us is music sensitively imagined and expertly conveyed. It is not particularly original, but it is always musical, ingenious and resourceful. There is a jazzy episode (the scene in Rosetta's apartment) and a soaring, somewhat Mahlerish epilogue. For a more detailed analysis there is no space here. It is sufficient to say that the piece made its effect; that the participants were warmly applauded; to prophesy that the work will have an extensive career; and to marvel at Dr. Koussevitzky's ability to absorb its contents in such short order.

MUSIC

Koussevitzky Conducts Bruckner Seventh and Two Pieces by Wagner

By CYRUS DURGIN

The flight of time can be a little frightening on occasion, and this is one of them. Here there are only two weeks more of this Boston Symphony season. Then it will be over and Serge Koussevitzky will have departed as music director. The fact was borne in rather heavily at Symphony Hall, yesterday afternoon, as the orchestra gave out with the richness of its wonderful tone, precision and eloquence in a German program devoted to the Seventh Symphony of Bruckner and two Wagner pieces: "A Siegfried Idyll" and the Overture to "Tannhaeuser."

This was one of the afternoons with this glorious instrument that you wish could be preserved forever, held suspended in time, to be savored indefinitely. For while the orchestra will continue on its wonderful way, it will be different without the fiery and poetizing Koussevitzky and his especial qualities of sound and expression.

Bruckner's Seventh Symphony had not been done at these concerts since 1939, almost a full decade. This week Mr. Koussevitzky is playing it in the full length of about an hour, which will delight those willing to be patient over the vast construction and the sculptured beauties of that still debated Austrian of the 19th Century. (By the same token, Bruckner uncut will annoy those unsympathetic to him. No matter!)

It takes such a magnificent orchestra as this to give Bruckner his due, for the involved contrapuntal weavings, the niceties of rhythms and accents, the sweeping melodic phrases and those grandiose bursts of brass constitute virtuoso music. Only thus can it be seen what a technical craftsman he was, how much of a poet in tones (even though in life an awkward yokel!), and how much of a really inspired creator.

As for Wagner, the little "Siegfried Idyll," which even with the larger number of instruments required for symphonic performance, still suggests the peace and beauty of the house at Triebschen where first it was heard, that, too, was marvelously performed. The "Tannhaeuser" Overture is something of a warhorse with Mr. Koussevitzky. He brings to it a sort of heroic proportion which is his own, more than Wagner's, and the theme of the pilgrims' chorus, as it returns in four-time, is twisted out of simple metrical shape. All the same, this reading was tremendously powerful, and aroused a volley of cheers when it was over.

Crowds Rush for Tickets To Koussevitzky's Farewell

A history-making and sentimental event in the music world—the last Friday afternoon appearance of Serge Koussevitzky as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra—took place this afternoon after a frenzied morning on the part of music lovers attempting to buy or argue their way into Symphony Hall.

Symphony

(Continued from First Page)

Lines for the usual 300 rush seats began to form at Symphony Hall at 9 A. M. Telephones throughout Greater Boston buzzed with offers to purchase tickets from lucky holders at twice, three times and even four times their price. And no one who held one was known to have given it up.

For his final Friday afternoon concert, Koussevitzky had chosen an all-Beethoven program, including the Ninth Symphony—"Beethoven's last also." He conducted both the orchestra and a chorus in the Ninth performance.

John N. Burk, secretary at Symphony Hall, said that never in the history of the Boston orchestra had there been such pressure for tickets. "We have been pressed all season, from last October, for today's and tomorrow night's concerts. I don't think there has been one ticket turned back. It is a sentimental occasion," said Burk.

He reported that by noon, some 500 or 600 persons had appeared tside the box office to wait for "peanut gallery" rush seats.

e 74-year-old world-famous ductor will bid an official farell to active participation in the usic world Monday night at a vic dinner in Symphony Hall.

SAN DIEGO, CAL.
UNION

MAR 13 1949

* * *

BERKSHIRE FESTIVAL

The Berkshire Music Festival, climaxing Serge Koussevitsky's 25th season as conductor of the Boston Symphony, will be held at Tanglewood in Lenox, Mass., from July 16 to Aug. 14. Guest conductors will be Leonard Bernstein and Eleazar De Carvalho.

Nine concerts will be given in the Music Shed on Thursday and Saturday evenings and Sunday afternoons. Koussevitsky will also conduct four concerts by a smaller orchestra in the intimate Theater-Concert Hall.

The Berkshire Music Center, Koussevitsky, director, will hold a six-week session at Tanglewood from July 4 to Aug. 14. The Center provides opportunity of music study in connection with the Festival concerts. Aaron Copland will be the assistant director. The faculty, including principal players of the Boston Symphony, will offer instruction in orchestral and choral conducting, orchestra and chamber music, composition, opera, choral singing and ensemble playing.

MUSIC

Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, gave the 12th program of the 68th season in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. The soloist was Ruth Posselt, violinist; the narrator Wesley Addy. The program:

Symphony No. 4 in B	Sowerby
Concerto for Violin	Barber
Symphony No. 3	Harris
Music for English Horn	Hill
A Lincoln Portrait	Copland

By RUDOLPH ELIE

There's no denying that the batch of American music offered yesterday as the two-program festival of American music came to a close went a long way to adjusting the impressions the first program created. Here, for the most part, was contemporary music of a high order; much of it most refreshingly un-American in contrast to last week's self-conscious assortment of Americana.

Two of the works, the Sowerby Symphony and the Barber Violin Concerto are clearly important compositions, the Barber concerto, indeed, seeming to smack of longevity. The Harris Third Symphony, which emphasizes many of the idiomatic tricks so belabored in this space last week, proved obvious and unconvincing after the Sowerby and the Barber, but the situation was neatly brought back in hand by Hill's Music for English Horn, an honest and enjoyable piece, and Copland's "A Lincoln Portrait," which though a novelty, is nonetheless effective.

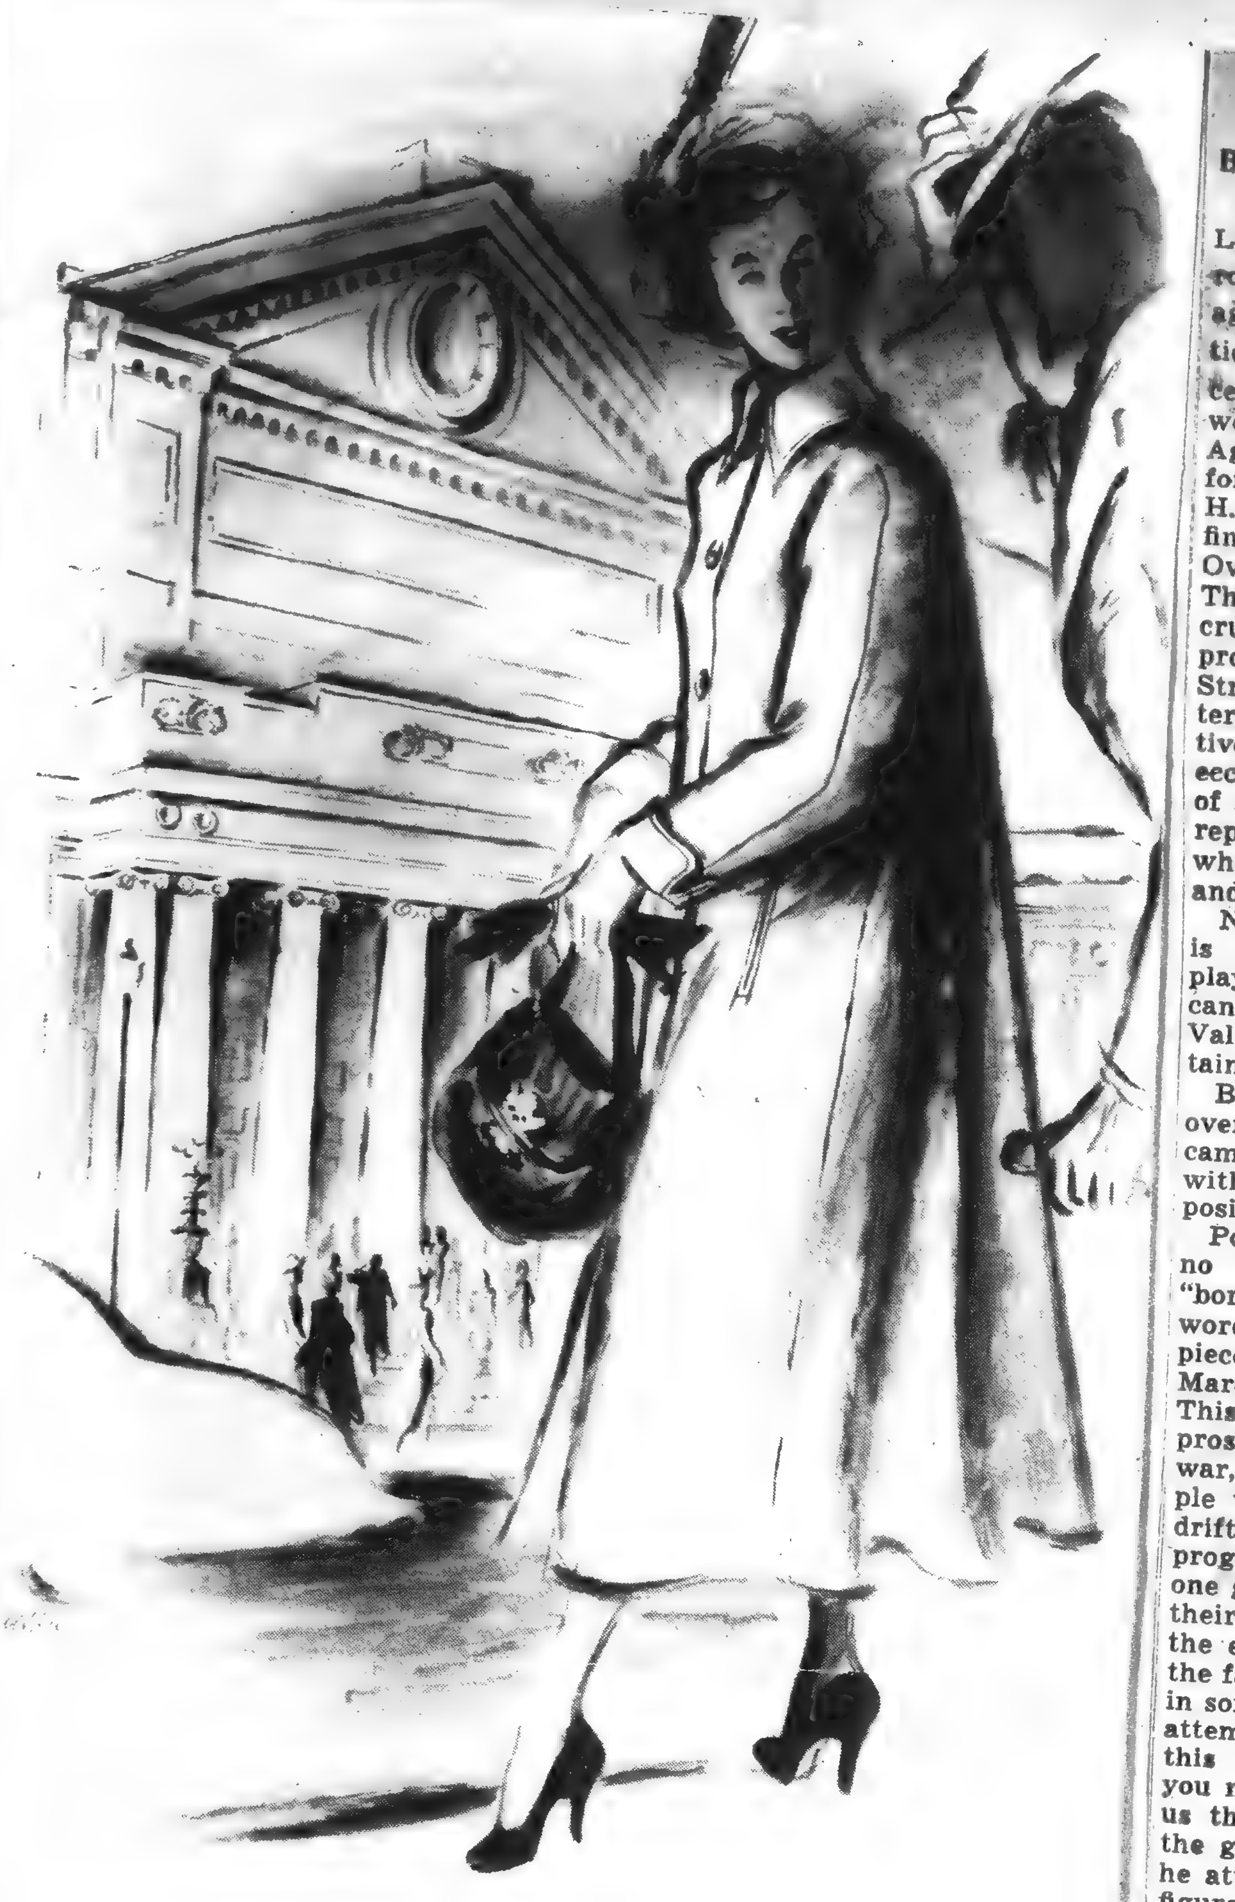
The position occupied by Leo Sowerby is rather unusual. His organ music certainly ranks with the finest being produced today, while his vocal and choral music, much of it of a liturgical nature, is practically standard repertoire. He has worked in the larger forms extensively, too, and in this, his Fourth Symphony, he has produced a work at once virile and tender, boisterous and finished.

Although I distinctly recall being impressed by Mr. Barber's violin concerto on first hearing in 1942, either he has subjected it to extensive revision or my memory has failed me entirely. In any case I had no idea, until yesterday, how remarkably beautiful and effective this work is. As in the case of Sowerby's symphony, it seldom descends to a self-conscious attempt to be typically American. On the contarary, it is almost Mozartian in the purity of its motives. Mr. Barber has set out to write music for the violin, music of thematic originality and structural clarity. He has also set out to speak to a living musical audience, not the great-grandchildren of that audience. The result is that this work may well survive the years and grow more welcome with each hearing. It has everything, a noble, dignified and at times playful opening, a slow movement that is singing, eloquent and thematically beautiful, a finale that is brilliant and witty.

Yesterday it also had Ruth Posselt at the very top of her form. While her technical mastery of the instrument has always been a source of wonder, the expressivity of her tone, the strength and drive of her bowing, the sweep of her interpretative powers was never more apparent than yesterday. She, Dr. Koussevitzky and Mr. Barber got an enormous reception at a time when the audience is usually intent on getting out into the corridors for the intermission. Mr. Sowerby, incidentally, also received a warm reception when he appeared on the stage after the premiere of his symphony.

We've all had more than one occasion to note Louis Speyer's artistry on the English horn, and his performance yesterday of the Hill piece was still another proof of it. The work itself, dedicated to Mr. Speyer, is charming throughout, Copland's "A Lincoln Portrait," the speaking part of which was capably done by Wesley Addy, concluded the two-week festival of American music to bring Dr. Koussevitzky and all concerned a good deal more heartfelt reception than was the case last week—and to put American music back in the race.

Thor Johnson will be guest conductor when the orchestra returns from its New York tour on January 21, the program offering Mozart's Haffner Symphony, Vaughan Williams' "Job," Dello Jolo's Variations, Chaconne and Finale, and a Suite from Strauss' "Der Rosenkavalier."



SCENE AT BOSTON SYMPHONY

A SPRING CASUAL of Pacific wool gabardine, for season-long wear over suit or dress. Moderately full back, a slimmer front and a youthful Directoire collar. Misses' sizes in Blue, Grey, Beige, Green, Black. $65.

As a ticket to the Symphony is a symbol of gracious Boston living, the name Stearns symbolizes the lasting satisfaction of timeless good taste in town and country clothes.

R. H. STEARNS CO.
RHCo Boston

THE SYMPHONY

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

It looked on paper as though Leonard Bernstein, in the double role of composer and pianist, was up against some pretty stiff competition at yesterday's Symphony Concert. Actually, he made out very well. It was a kindness to his "The Age of Anxiety," Symphony No. 2 for piano and orchestra (after W. H. Auden), that Dr. Koussevitzky finally preceded it by Beethoven's Overture to "Coriolanus," not by his Third "Leonore," which would have crushed it at the outset. Again, the program originally ended with Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel," a masterpiece in the domain of illustrative music which Mr. Bernstein eccentrically cultivates in this era of absolutism. However, "Till" was replaced by Ravel's "La Valse," which still followed Strauss' "Death and Transfiguration."

Now "Death and Transfiguration" is not the best Strauss, though played with a certain restraint, it can still be impressive; and "La Valse" generally counts as an entertaining number.

But yesterday both works were over-interpreted. The Strauss became trumpery, the Ravel trivial, with an orgiastic finish that was positively embarrassing.

Possibly, most of my readers are no more familiar with Auden's "boroque eclogue" than I was when word of Mr. Bernstein's forthcoming piece (the score was completed on March 20 last) set me to reading it. This wordy poem, with passages of prose, its scene laid during the late war, has to do with four lonely people who meet in a New York bar, drift into bozy half-consciousness, progress to the apartment of the one girl in the group, and finally go their several ways, aware both of the emptiness of their lives and of the fact that what they need is faith in something. Mr. Bernstein has not attempted a musical paraphrase of this extraordinary poem. Strauss, you may be sure, would have given us the tinkling of glasses or even the gurgling of a bottle. Nor does he attempt to characterize the four figures, who, after all, are little more than mouthpieces for Mr. Auden's philosophizing.

He has managed, however, to get the essence of the poem into a coherent and consistent musical scheme; and on a second hearing one could ignore Auden entirely and concentrate on Bernstein. What the latter has given us is music sensitively imagined and expertly conveyed. It is not particularly original, but it is always musical, ingenious and resourceful. There is a jazzy episode (the scene in Rosetta's apartment) and a soaring, somewhat Mahlerish epilogue. For a more detailed analysis there is no space here. It is sufficient to say that the piece made its effect; that the participants were warmly applauded; to prophesy that the work will have an extensive career; and to marvel at Dr. Koussevitzky's ability to absorb its contents in such short order.

THE SYMPHONY

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

It looked on paper as though Leonard Bernstein, in the double role of composer and pianist, was up against some pretty stiff competition at yesterday's Symphony Concert. Actually, he made out very well. It was a kindness to his "The Age of Anxiety," Symphony No. 2 for piano and orchestra (after W. H. Auden), that Dr. Koussevitzky finally preceded it by Beethoven's Overture to "Coriolanus," not by his Third "Leonore," which would have crushed it at the outset. Again, the program originally ended with Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel," a masterpiece in the domain of illustrative music which Mr. Bernstein eccentrically cultivates in this era of absolutism. However, "Till" was replaced by Ravel's "La Valse," which still followed Strauss' "Death and Transfiguration."

Now "Death and Transfiguration" is not the best Strauss, though played with a certain restraint, it can still be impressive; and "La Valse" generally counts as an entertaining number.

But yesterday both works were over-interpreted. The Strauss became trumpery, the Ravel trivial, with an orgiastic finish that was positively embarrassing.

Possibly, most of my readers are no more familiar with Auden's "boroque eclogue" than I was when word of Mr. Bernstein's forthcoming piece (the score was completed on March 20 last) set me to reading it. This wordy poem, with passages of prose, its scene laid during the late war, has to do with four lonely people who meet in a New York bar, drift into bozy half-consciousness, progress to the apartment of the one girl in the group, and finally go their several ways, aware both of the emptiness of their lives and of the fact that what they need is faith in something. Mr. Bernstein has not attempted a musical paraphrase of this extraordinary poem. Strauss, you may be sure, would have given us the tinkling of glasses or even the gurgling of a bottle. Nor does he attempt to characterize the four figures, who, after all, are little more than mouthpieces for Mr. Auden's philosophizing.

He has managed, however, to get the essence of the poem into a coherent and consistent musical scheme; and on a second hearing one could ignore Auden entirely and concentrate on Bernstein. What the latter has given us is music sensitively imagined and expertly conveyed. It is not particularly original, but it is always musical, ingenious and resourceful. There is a jazzy episode (the scene in Rosetta's apartment) and a soaring, somewhat Mahlerish epilogue. For a more detailed analysis there is no space here. It is sufficient to say that the piece made its effect; that the participants were warmly applauded; to prophesy that the work will have an extensive career; and to marvel at Dr. Koussevitzky's ability to absorb its contents in such short order.

MUSIC

Koussevitzky Conducts Bruckner Seventh and Two Pieces by Wagner

By CYRUS DURGIN

The flight of time can be a little frightening on occasion, and this is one of them. Here there are only two weeks more of this Boston Symphony season. Then it will be over and Serge Koussevitzky will have departed as music director. The fact was borne in rather heavily at Symphony Hall, yesterday afternoon, as the orchestra gave out with the richness of its wonderful tone, precision and eloquence in a German program devoted to the Seventh Symphony of Bruckner and two Wagner pieces: "A Siegfried Idyll" and the Overture to "Tannhaeuser."

This was one of the afternoons with this glorious instrument that you wish could be preserved forever, held suspended in time, to be savored indefinitely. For while the orchestra will continue on its wonderful way, it will be different without the fiery and poetizing Koussevitzky and his especial qualities of sound and expression.

Bruckner's Seventh Symphony had not been done at these concerts since 1939, almost a full decade. This week Mr. Koussevitzky is playing it in the full length of about an hour, which will delight those willing to be patient over the vast construction and the sculptured beauties of that still debated Austrian of the 19th Century. (By the same token, Bruckner uncut will annoy those unsympathetic to him. No matter!)

It takes such a magnificent orchestra as this to give Bruckner his due, for the involved contrapuntal weavings, the niceties of rhythms and accents, the sweeping melodic phrases and those grandiose bursts of brass constitute virtuoso music. Only thus can it be seen what a technical craftsman he was, how much of a poet in tones (even though in life an awkward yokel!), and how much of a really inspired creator.

As for Wagner, the little "Siegfried Idyll," which even with the larger number of instruments required for symphonic performance, still suggests the peace and beauty of the house at Triebschen where first it was heard, that, too, was marvelously performed. The "Tannhaeuser" Overture is something of a warhorse with Mr. Koussevitzky. He brings to it a sort of heroic proportion which is his own, more than Wagner's, and the theme of the pilgrims' chorus, as it returns in four-time, is twisted out of simple metrical shape. All the same, this reading was tremendously powerful, and aroused a volley of cheers when it was over.

Crowds Rush for Tickets To Koussevitzky's Farewell

A history-making and sentimental event in the music world—the last Friday afternoon appearance of Serge Koussevitzky as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra—took place this afternoon after a frenzied morning on the part of music lovers attempting to buy or argue their way into Symphony Hall.

Symphony

(Continued from First Page)

Lines for the usual 300 rush seats began to form at Symphony Hall at 9 A. M. Telephones throughout Greater Boston buzzed with offers to purchase tickets from lucky holders at twice, three times and even four times their price. And no one who held one was known to have given it up.

For his final Friday afternoon concert, Koussevitzky had chosen an all-Beethoven program, including the Ninth Symphony—"Beethoven's last also." He conducted both the orchestra and a chorus in the Ninth performance.

John N. Burk, secretary at Symphony Hall, said that never in the history of the Boston orchestra had there been such pressure for tickets. "We have been pressed all season, from last October, for today's and tomorrow night's concerts. I don't think there has been one ticket turned back. It was a sentimental occasion," said Burk.

He reported that by noon, some 500 or 600 persons had appeared side the box office to wait for e "peanut gallery" rush seats. e 74-year-old world-famous ductor will bid an official fare- ll to active participation in the usic world Monday night at a vic dinner in Symphony Hall.

SAN DIEGO, CAL.
UNION

MAR 13 1949

* * *

BERKSHIRE FESTIVAL

The Berkshire Music Festival, climaxing Serge Koussevitsky's 25th season as conductor of the Boston Symphony, will be held at Tanglewood in Lenox, Mass., from July 16 to Aug. 14. Guest conductors will be Leonard Bernstein and Eleazar De Carvalho.

Nine concerts will be given in the Music Shed on Thursday and Saturday evenings and Sunday afternoons. Koussevitsky will also conduct four concerts by a smaller orchestra in the intimate Theater-Concert Hall.

The Berkshire Music Center, Koussevitsky, director, will hold a six-week session at Tanglewood from July 4 to Aug. 14. The Center provides opportunity of music study in connection with the Festival concerts. Aaron Copland will be the assistant director. The faculty, including principal players of the Boston Symphony, will offer instruction in orchestral and choral conducting, orchestra and chamber music, composition, opera, choral singing and ensemble playing.

MUSIC

Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, gave the 12th program of the 68th season in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. The soloist was Ruth Posselt, violinist; the narrator Wesley Addy. The program:

Symphony No. 4 in B [illegible]....Sowerby
Concerto for Violin....Barber
Symphony No. 3....Harris
Music for English Horn....Hill
A Lincoln Portrait....Copland

By RUDOLPH ELIE

There's no denying that the batch of American music offered yesterday as the two-program festival of American music came to a close went a long way to adjusting the impressions the first program created. Here, for the most part, was contemporary music of a high order; much of it most refreshingly un-American in contrast to last week's self-conscious assortment of Americana.

Two of the works, the Sowerby Symphony and the Barber Violin Concerto are clearly important compositions, the Barber concerto, indeed, seeming to smack of longevity. The Harris Third Symphony, which emphasizes many of the idiomatic tricks so belabored in this space last week, proved obvious and unconvincing after the Sowerby and the Barber, but the situation was neatly brought back in hand by Hill's Music for English Horn, an honest and enjoyable piece, and Copland's "A Lincoln Portrait," which though a novelty, is nonetheless effective.

The position occupied by Leo Sowerby is rather unusual. His organ music certainly ranks with the finest being produced today, while his vocal and choral music, much of it of a liturgical nature, is practically standard repertoire. He has worked in the larger forms extensively, too, and in this, his Fourth Symphony, he has produced a work at once virile and tender, boisterous and finished.

Although I distinctly recall being impressed by Mr. Barber's violin concerto on first hearing in 1942, either he has subjected it to extensive revision or my memory has failed me entirely. In any case I had no idea, until yesterday, how remarkably beautiful and effective this work is. As in the case of Sowerby's symphony, it seldom descends to a self-conscious attempt to be typically American. On the contarary, it is almost Mozartian in the purity of its motives. Mr. Barber has set out to write music for the violin, music of thematic originality and structural clarity. He has also set out to speak to a living musical audience, not the great-grandchildren of that audience. The result is that this work may well survive the years and grow more welcome with each hearing. It has everything, a noble, dignified and at times playful opening, a slow movement that is singing, eloquent and thematically beautiful, a finale that is brilliant and witty.

Yesterday it also had Ruth Posselt at the very top of her form. While her technical mastery of the instrument has always been a source of wonder, the expressivity of her tone, the strength and drive of her bowing, the sweep of her interpretative powers was never more apparent than yesterday. She, Dr. Koussevitzky and Mr. Barber got an enormous reception at a time when the audience is usually intent on getting out into the corridors for the intermission. Mr. Sowerby, incidentally, also received a warm reception when he appeared on the stage after the premiere of his symphony.

We've all had more than one occasion to note Louis Speyer's artistry on the English horn, and his performance yesterday of the Hill piece was still another proof of it. The work itself, dedicated to Mr. Speyer, is charming throughout. Copland's "A Lincoln Portrait," the speaking part of which was capably done by Wesley Addy, concluded the two-week festival of American music to bring Dr. Koussevitzky and all concerned a good deal more heartfelt reception than was the case last week—and to put American music back in the race.

Thor Johnson will be guest conductor when the orchestra returns from its New York tour on January 21, the program offering Mozart's Haffner Symphony, Vaughan Williams' "Job," Dello Joio's Variations, Chaconne and Finale, and a Suite from Strauss' "Der Rosenkavalier."

Herald Tribu

NEW YOR

Peabody Radio Awards Given To 3 Networks

A. B. C., N. B. C. Each Get 4, C. B. S., 2; Murrow Wins Prize for News Reporting

Thirteen George Foster Peabody awards and citations for meritorious public service in the radio and television industry were presented yesterday to netwroks, local stations and individuals during a luncheon of the Radio Executives Club of New York at the Roosevelt.

The American Broadcasting Company broadcast the first portion of the proceedings, during which it received four awards, and the National Broadcasting Company broadcast the last portion, during which is also received four awards. Two awards went to the Columbia Broadcasting System. Three citations went to the Rocky Mountain Radio Council and the Lowell Institute Co-operative Broadcasting Council for education through broadcasting, and to station WNEW for its "Little Songs About the United Nations."

John E. Drewry, Dean of the Henry W. Grady School of Journalism, University of Georgia, introduced the winners. The awards were estamlished in memory of Mr. Peabody, benefactor and life trustee of the university. They are administered by the Grady School and a national advisory board.

Edward Weeks, chairman of the Peabody Advisory Board and editor of "The Atlantic Monthly," presented the awards. Arthur Pryor, vice-president of the Radic Executives Club, presided.

The awards were as follows:

Public service by a regional station: Station KNBC (N. B. C.), San Francisco, for its "Forests Aflame" series.

Public service by a local station: Station WDAR (A. B. C.), Savannah, for "You and Youth" series.

Reporting and interpretation of the news: Edward R. Murrow (C. B. S.).

Entertainment in drama: The N. B. C. University Theater and The Groucho Marx Show (A. B. C.).

Entertainment in music: N. B. C., for its programs of "good music," especially the N. B. C. Symphony, Orchestras of the Nation, First Piano Quartet, and Boston Symphony Rehearsals.

Educational program: A. B. C., for "Communism—U. S. Brand."

Children's program: "Howdy Doody," N. B. C. television.

Promotion of international understanding: C. B. S., with special reference to its United Nations programs.

Contribution to the art of television: A. B. C., for "Actors Studio."

The awards were accepted in person by executives of the companies concerned and by Mr Murrow, but Groucho Marx accepted his by electrical transcription from Hollywood. Because of the time scheduled by the radi

---

THE BOSTON HERALD, SATURDAY, APRIL 2, 1949

MUSIC

Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, gave the 22d program of the 68th season in Symphony Hall Jascha Heifetz, violinist, was the soloist in the following program:

Symphony No. 4..............Honegger
"La Mer"..............Debussy
Concerto for Violin in D (K.218)
Mozart
Concerto for Violin in G minor, Op. 63
Prokofieff

By RUDOLPH ELIE

Honegger and Heifetz, not to mention Debussy, Mozart, Koussevitzky and the orchestra all combined yesterday afternoon to provide a nicely contrived program. There wasn't anything particularly notable (if great violin playing may ever be considered less than notable) but after this past fortnight of musical climaxes it was perhaps just as well.

All in all I found the Honegger Symphony a work at once charming and ingratiating. It is unquestionably a little specialized; nobody we know goes about whistling the Swiss folk tunes which are the seedlings that grew into this music any more than the Swiss whistle the American folk tunes that are so liberally quoted by, for instance, Copland.

It follows then, despite the dissimilarities of the textures employed by Copland and Honegger, that our reaction to this music would parallel the reception, in Switzerland, of Copland's "Appalachian Spring;"—we recognize the advanced musical impulse of the music, but its nostalgia largely escapes us.

Be that as it may, it is a work of a masterly hand. The clarity, the balance, the transparency of its texture is delightful to hear. The musical ideas are distinguished but deliberately light. Moreover, there are many humorous touches and an overall tenderness in the scoring that proves a welcome relief from the tendency to pile one effect on top of another. It will, in any case, be a pity if Mr. Honegger means what he says, that this is "probably" his last symphony.

After a surprisingly rough beginning in the opening movement of the Mozart concerto—the exceedingly lovely No. 4 in D—Jascha Heifetz went on to give one of his flawless performances with orchestra. It always surprises me that he doesn't put more of himself into it; nobody ever seems more detached and remote than Mr. Heifetz. In the Beethoven and Brahms concertos this comes under the heading of nobility, I imagine, and is well suited to the rite. But in other things Mr. Heifetz moves me not at all, except to cross one leg over the other. It is doubtless a defect in me but I like blood and a few wrong notes, and I like to fancy the soloist is enjoying himself.

Incidentally, to close on an equally peevish note, wouldn't it be a good idea to let us have a little more light from a lower level aimed at the apron of the stage? It seems to me it could be done discreetly without going Hollywood and without offering a glare for the musicians. As it is it is impossible to see the soloist's countenance, or Koussevitzky's either, when he turns about, and an artist's expression, though possibly an extra-musical consideration, remains one of the ponderable factors in concert hall performance.

It needs hardly to be added that the performance of Debussy's "La Mer" achieved its usual great success. The program next week offers Beethoven's third Leonore Overture, Bernstein's Symphony No. 2 for Piano and Orchestra (Leonard Bernstein, soloist), and Strauss' "Death and Transfiguration" and "Till Eulenspiegel."

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE
APR [illegible]

Schedule of Programs For Tanglewood Concerts

Serge Koussevitzky has announced the programs to be played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in this summer's Berkshire Music Festival in the Music Shed at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass. He will conduct six of the nine concerts. Two will be conducted by Leonard Bernstein and one by Eleazar de Carvalho. The dates and programs are:

Series A: Thursday night, July 28, Dr. Koussevitzky conducting: Vivaldi, Concerto for orchestra (arr. Siloti); Strauss, Death and Transfiguration; Brahms, Symphony No. 2. Saturday night, July 30, Dr. Koussevitzky conducting: Beethoven, Overture to "Egmont" and piano concerto in G major (soloist, Claudio Arrau); Liszt, Faust Symphony. Sunday afternoon, July 31, Mr. Bernstein conducting: Overture to 'Manfred" and Fourth Symphony; Stravinsky, Rites of Spring.

Series B: Thursday night, Aug. 4, Dr. Koussevitzky conducting, Tchaikovsky, String Serenade, Violin Concerto (soloist, Jascha Heifetz) and Fourth Symphony. Saturday night, Aug. 6, Dr. Koussevitzky conducting: Roussel, Suite in F; Milhaud, Cello Concerto No. 1 (soloist, Gregor Piatigorsky); Messiaen, L'Ascension; Franck, Symphony. Sunday afternoon, Aug. 7, Mr. de Carvalho conducting: William Schuman, Symphony for Strings; Villa-Lobos, Mandu-carara; Strauss, Thus Spake Zarathustra.

Series C: Thursday night, Aug. 11, Mr Bernstein conducting: Schubert, Symphony No. 4 (Tragic); Shostakovitch, Symphony No. 7. Saturday night, Aug. 13, Dr. Koussevitzky conducting: Haydn, Symphony No. 88, in G major; Benjamin Britten, Symphony with Chorus (first performance). Sunday afternoon, Aug. 14, Dr. Koussevitzky conducting: C. P. E. Bach, Concerto for orchestra; Copland, Quiet City; Debussy, The Sea; Beethoven, Symphony No. 5.

The programs of the Bach and Mozart concerts in Tanglewood's Theater-Concert Hall on Saturday nights and Sunday afternoons, July 16 and 17, 23 and 24, will be announced later.

BUFFALO, N. Y.
COURIER-EXPRESS
APR 3 - 1949

Bass Clarinet Player Recalls Travels as Boy

Studied Piano, Violin While Still in Europe

By MARGARET FESS

Harald F. Hansen, bass clarinetist with the Buffalo Philharmonic Orchestra, has an international background. His parents are Danish, he was born in Hamburg, Germany, and is an American citizen. Before most children are old enough to study geography, Harald had lived in Sweden, Denmark, Switzerland, Austria and Germany.

Hansen says of his early childhood that it was really more a case of living in a piano crate than a suitcase. His father, Einar Hansen, who has been a violinist with the Boston Symphony for 22 years, in his early European tours, was accompanied not only by his wife and young son, but also by a piano.

"He really needed the piano," Hansen remarked.

It was on this piano, that went from one musical center to another, that Harald began his studies. He was about seven when his father gave him his first lessons and at the age of 11 he began work with the violin.

At about this time, his father had an opportunity to play in Boston. For the long trip across the ocean, Einar Hansen was forced to forego his usual entourage of wife, son and piano. However, his first impression of the United States was so favorable that he soon sent for the trio. His touring days were over and the family settled permanently in Boston.

Graduated at Cambridge

Although his musical education had been clear sailing, "living in a piano crate" had presented school problems. Most of Harald's book learning had been in German or Swiss classrooms where only German was spoken.

"I guess my school days were sort of checkered," said the young man. "At first, because of the language barrier, I was put back a couple of grades. Then I skipped several. It all came out even in the end for I was just 17 when I was graduated from Cambridge High School."

At this point the young man passed two mileposts in his life. The first was switching from the violin to the clarinet and the second was accepting a position playing at the Summer resort of York Harbor, Me. The latter led to marriage, fatherhood, permanent Summer employment and the launching of his favorite pastime, building and sailing boats.

After his first Summer at York Harbor, he enrolled in the Juilliard School of Music in New York. Here while contemplating trying out for the school's orchestra, he learned to his dismay that there were about 20 aspiring clarinetists for one chair. He immediately switched to the bass clarinet and has been playing it ever since.

Completing his studies in New York in 1941, Hansen taught the clarinet in the Longy School of Music in Cambridge for a year and then auditioned for the Indianapolis Symphony where he played bass clarinet for five seasons. This is his first season in Buffalo.

At York Harbor he met a girl whose father came from the same Danish village as Hansen's grandfather did. When the two were married about a year and a half ago the young lady did not have to change her name. It was, and is, Norma Hansen.

"We can't figure out any relationship, even 'way back," said Hansen "In fact, Norma is part Swedish and part Danish. I'm all Danish. Hansens are a dime a dozen in both Sweden and Denmark."

Little Erika Hansen, now five months old, is following in her father's footsteps. She was just three weeks old when her parents took her "on tour." Erika was born in York Harbor three weeks before the concert season opened in Buffalo. The family arrived here by plane for opening night.

Although boat building is Hansen's favorite side-line, he did not make his own sailboat, the Black Duck.

The musician has reserved opinion on Buffalo's weather. Its mildness has been a pleasant surprise, but he regrets that his skis have not been taken out of their packing box.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
NEWS
[illegible] 6 - 1949

Berkshire Festival Program Announced for the Summer

Bernstein, Heifitz, Arrau, Piatigorsky Announced as Guest Artists for Tanglewood; Britten Symphony Will Have World Premiere

The programs for the Berkshire Festival by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood in Lenox next summer are announced by Serge Koussevitzky who is now completing his last season as the orchestra's conductor.

The concerts in the Shed will open on Thursday evening, July 28, with Vivaldi's Concerto for Orchestra (in Siloti's arrangement), Strauss' "Death and Transfiguration," and Brahms' Symphony No. 2. On Saturday evening, July 30, Dr. Koussevitzky will commemorate the 200th anniversary of the birth of Goethe with Beethoven's Overture to Goethe's "Egmont," and Liszt's Faust Symphony which was inspired by the text of the German poet. Beethoven's Fourth Piano Concerto with Claudio Arrau as soloist will be on this program. On Sunday afternoon, July 31, Leonard Bernstein will conduct Schumann's Overture to "Manfred" and Fourth Symphony, and Stravinsky's "Rite of Spring."

Heifetz, Piatigorsky

The second week of concerts will begin on Thursday evening, August 4, with a Tchaikovsky program including the String Serenade, the Violin Concerto with Jascha Heifetz as soloist, and the Fourth Symphony. On Saturday evening, August 6, Dr. Koussevitzky will present Roussel's Suite in F, Milhaud's First 'Cello Concerto with Gregor Piatigorsky as soloist, "L'Ascension," by Messiaen (who will be on the faculty of the Berkshire Music Center), and the Symphony by Cesar Franck. On Sun-

7, Eleaz

GREGOR PIATIGORSKY

Carvalho will conduct as guest William Schuman's Symphony for Strings, Mandu-carara by Villa-Lobos, and Strauss's "Thus Spake Zarathustra."

The third week of concerts will open on Thursday evening, August 11, with Leonard Bernstein as guest presenting Schubert's Fourth Symphony ("Tragic") and the Seventh Symphony by Shostakovitch. On Saturday evening, August 13, Dr. Koussevitzky will present a symphony with chorus which Benjamin Britten has just completed and which will then have its first public performance. This will be preceded by Haydn's Symphony in G major, No. 88. Koussevitzky's closing program on Sunday afternoon, August 14, will consist of the Orchestra Concerto by C. P. E. Bach, Copland's "Quiet City," Debussy's "The Sea," and Beethoven's Fifth Symphony.

The programs for two pairs of Bach-Mozart concerts in the smaller Theatre Concert Hall on July 16 and 17, and July 23 and 24 will be announced shortly.

Herald Tribune

NEW YOR

Peabody Radio Awards Given To 3 Networks

A. B. C., N. B. C. Each Get 4, C. B. S., 2; Murrow Wins Prize for News Reporting

Thirteen George Foster Peabody awards and citations for meritorious public service in the radio and television industry were presented yesterday to netwroks, local stations and individuals during a luncheon of the Radio Executives Club of New York at the Roosevelt.

The American Broadcasting Company broadcast the first portion of the proceedings, during which it received four awards, and the National Broadcasting Company broadcast the last portion, during which is also received four awards. Two awards went to the Columbia Broadcasting System. Three citations went to the Rocky Mountain Radio Council and the Lowell Institute Co-operative Broadcasting Council for education through broadcasting, and to station WNEW for its "Little Songs About the United Nations."

John E. Drewry, Dean of the Henry W. Grady School of Journalism, University of Georgia, introduced the winners. The awards were estamlished in memory of Mr. Peabody, benefactor and life trustee of the university. They are administered by the Grady School and a national advisory board.

Edward Weeks, chairman of the Peabody Advisory Board and editor of "The Atlantic Monthly," presented the awards. Arthur Pryor, vice-president of the Radic Executives Club, presided.

The awards were as follows:

Public service by a regional station: Station KNBC (N. B. C.), San Francisco, for its "Forests Aflame" series.

Public service by a local station: Station WDAR (A. B. C.), Savannah, for "You and Youth" series.

Reporting and interpretation of the news: Edward R. Murrow (C. B. S.).

Entertainment in drama: The N. B. C. University Theater and The Groucho Marx Show (A. B. C.).

Entertainment in music: N. B. C., for its programs of "good music," especially the N. B. C. Symphony, Orchestras of the Nation, First Piano Quartet, and Boston Symphony Rehearsals.

Educational program: A. B. C., for "Communism—U. S. Brand."

Children's program: "Howdy Doody," N. B. C. television.

Promotion of international understanding: C. B. S., with special reference to its United Nations programs.

Contribution to the art of television: A. B. C., for "Actors Studio."

The awards were accepted in person by executives of the companies concerned and by Mr. Murrow, but Groucho Marx accepted his by electrical transcription from Hollywood. Because of the time scheduled by the radio

---

THE BOSTON HERALD, SATURDAY, APRIL 2, 1949

MUSIC

Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, gave the 22d program of the 68th season in Symphony Hall. Jascha Heifetz, violinist, was the soloist in the following program:

Symphony No. 4 .... Honegger
"La Mer" .... Debussy
Concerto for Violin in D (K.218) Mozart
Concerto for Violin in G minor, Op. 63 Prokofieff

By RUDOLPH ELIE

Honegger and Heifetz, not to mention Debussy, Mozart, Koussevitzky and the orchestra all combined yesterday afternoon to provide a nicely contrived program. There wasn't anything particularly notable (if great violin playing may ever be considered less than notable) but after this past fortnight of musical climaxes it was perhaps just as well.

All in all I found the Honegger Symphony a work at once charming and ingratiating. It is unquestionably a little specialized: nobody we know goes about whistling the Swiss folk tunes which are the seedlings that grew into this music any more than the Swiss whistle the American folk tunes that are so liberally quoted by, for instance, Copland.

It follows then, despite the dissimilarities of the textures employed by Copland and Honegger, that our reaction to this music would parallel the reception, in Switzerland, of Copland's "Appalachian Spring;"—we recognize the advanced musical impulse of the music, but its nostalgia largely escapes us.

Be that as it may, it is a work of a masterly hand. The clarity, the balance, the transparency of its texture is delightful to hear. The musical ideas are distinguished but deliberately light. Moreover, there are many humorous touches and an overall tenderness in the scoring that proves a welcome relief from the tendency to pile one effect on top of another. It will, in any case, be a pity if Mr. Honegger means what he says, that this is "probably" his last symphony.

After a surprisingly rough beginning in the opening movement of the Mozart concerto—the exceedingly lovely No. 4 in D—Jascha Heifetz went on to give one of his flawless performances with orchestra. It always surprises me that he doesn't put more of himself into it; nobody ever seems more detached and remote than Mr. Heifetz. In the Beethoven and Brahms concertos this comes under the heading of nobility, I imagine, and is well suited to the rite. But in other things Mr. Heifetz moves me not at all, except to cross one leg over the other. It is doubtless a defect in me but I like blood and a few wrong notes, and I like to fancy the soloist is enjoying himself.

Incidentally, to close on an equally peevish note, wouldn't it be a good idea to let us have a little more light from a lower level aimed at the apron of the stage? It seems to me it could be done discreetly without going Hollywood and without offering a glare for the musicians. As it is it is impossible to see the soloist's countenance, or Koussevitzky's either, when he turns about, and an artist's expression, though possibly an extramusical consideration, remains one of the ponderable factors in concert hall p erformance.

It needs hardly to be added that the performance of Debussy's "La Mer" achieved its usual great success. The program next week offers Beethoven's third Leonore Overture, Bernstein's Symphony No. 2 for Piano and Orchestra (Leonard Bernstein, soloist), and Strauss' "Death and Transfiguration" and "Till Eulenspiegel."

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE
APR 7 - 194

Schedule of Programs For Tanglewood Concerts

Serge Koussevitzky has announced the programs to be played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in this summer's Berkshire Music Festival in the Music Shed at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass. He will conduct six of the nine concerts. Two will be conducted by Leonard Bernstein and one by Eleazar de Carvalho. The dates and programs are:

Series A: Thursday night, July 28, Dr. Koussevitzky conducting: Vivaldi, Concerto for orchestra (arr. Siloti); Strauss, Death and Transfiguration; Brahms, Symphony No. 2. Saturday night, July 30, Dr. Koussevitzky conducting: Beethoven, Overture to "Egmont" and piano concerto in G major (soloist, Claudio Arrau); Liszt, Faust Symphony. Sunday afternoon, July 31, Mr. Bernstein conducting: Overture to 'Manfred" and Fourth Symphony; Stravinsky, Rites of Spring.

Series B: Thursday night, Aug. 4, Dr. Koussevitzky conducting: Tchaikovsky, String Serenade, Violin Concerto (soloist, Jascha Heifetz) and Fourth Symphony. Saturday night, Aug. 6, Dr. Koussevitzky conducting: Roussel, Suite in F; Milhaud, Cello Concerto No. 1 (soloist, Gregor Piatigorsky); Messiaen, L'Ascension; Franck, Symphony. Sunday afternoon, Aug. 7, Mr. de Carvalho conducting: William Schuman, Symphony for Strings; Villa-Lobos, Mandu-carara; Strauss, Thus Spake Zarathustra.

Series C: Thursday night, Aug. 11, Mr. Bernstein conducting: Schubert, Symphony No. 4 (Tragic); Shostakovitch, Symphony No. 7. Saturday night, Aug. 13, Dr. Koussevitzky conducting: Haydn, Symphony No. 88, in G major; Benjamin Britten, Symphony with Chorus (first performance). Sunday afternoon, Aug. 14, Dr. Koussevitzky conducting: C. P. E. Bach, Concerto for orchestra; Copland, Quiet City; Debussy, The Sea; Beethoven, Symphony No. 5.

The programs of the Bach and Mozart concerts in Tanglewood's Theater-Concert Hall on Saturday nights and Sunday afternoons, July 16 and 17, 23 and 24, will be announced later.

BUFFALO, N. Y.
COURIER-EXPRESS
APR 3 - 1949

Bass Clarinet Player Recalls Travels as Boy

Studied Piano, Violin While Still in Europe

By MARGARET FESS

Harald F. Hansen, bass clarinetist with the Buffalo Philharmonic Orchestra, has an international background. His parents are Danish, he was born in Hamburg, Germany, and is an American citizen. Before most children are old enough to study geography, Harald had lived in Sweden, Denmark, Switzerland, Austria and Germany.

Hansen says of his early childhood that it was really more a case of living in a piano crate than a suitcase. His father, Einar Hansen, who has been a violinist with the Boston Symphony for 22 years, ~~in his early European tours~~, was accompanied not only by his wife and young son, but also by a piano.

"He really needed the piano," Hansen remarked.

It was on this piano, that went from one musical center to another, that Harald began his studies. He was about seven when his father gave him his first lessons and at the age of 11 he began work with the violin.

At about this time, his father had an opportunity to play in Boston. For the long trip across the ocean, Einar Hansen was forced to forego his usual entourage of wife, son and piano. However, his first impression of the United States was so favorable that he soon sent for the trio. His touring days were over and the family settled permanently in Boston.

Graduated at Cambridge

Although his musical education had been clear sailing, "living in a piano crate" had presented school problems. Most of Harald's book learning had been in German or Swiss classrooms where only German was spoken.

"I guess my school days were sort of checkered," said the young man. "At first, because of the language barrier, I was put back a couple of grades. Then I skipped several. It all came out even in the end for I was just 17 when I was graduated from Cambridge High School."

At this point the young man passed two mileposts in his life. The first was switching from the violin to the clarinet and the second was accepting a position playing at the Summer resort of York Harbor, Me. The latter led to marriage, fatherhood, permanent Summer employment and the launching of his favorite pastime, building and sailing boats.

After his first Summer at York Harbor, he enrolled in the Juilliard School of Music in New York. Here while contemplating trying out for the school's orchestra, he learned to his dismay that there were about 20 aspiring clarinetists for one chair. He immediately switched to the bass clarinet and has been playing it ever since.

Completing his studies in New York in 1941, Hansen taught the clarinet in the Longy School of Music in Cambridge for a year and then auditioned for the Indianapolis Symphony where he played bass clarinet for five seasons. This is his first season in Buffalo.

At York Harbor he met a girl whose father came from the same Danish village as Hansen's grandfather did. When the two were married about a year and a half ago the young lady did not have to change her name. It was, and is, Norma Hansen.

"We can't figure out any relationship, even 'way back," said Hansen. "In fact, Norma is part Swedish and part Danish. I'm all Danish. Hansens are a dime a dozen in both Sweden and Denmark."

Little Erika Hansen, now five months old, is following in her father's footsteps. She was just three weeks old when her parents took her "on tour." Erika was born in York Harbor three weeks before the concert season opened in Buffalo. The family arrived here by plane for opening night.

Although boat building is Hansen's favorite side-line, he did not make his own sailboat, the Black Duck.

The musician has reserved opinion on Buffalo's weather. Its mildness has been a pleasant surprise, but he regrets that his skis have not been taken out of their packing box.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
NEWS
6 - 1949

Berkshire Festival Program Announced for the Summer

Bernstein, Heifitz, Arrau, Piatigorsky Announced as Guest Artists for Tanglewood; Britten Symphony Will Have World Premiere

The programs for the Berkshire Festival by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood in Lenox next summer are announced by Serge Koussevitzky who is now completing ~~his last~~ season as the orchestra's conductor.

The concerts in the Shed will open on Thursday evening, July 28, with Vivaldi's Concerto for Orchestra (in Siloti's arrangement), Strauss' "Death and Transfiguration," and Brahms' Symphony No. 2. On Saturday evening, July 30, Dr. Koussevitzky will commemorate the 200th anniversary of the birth of Goethe with Beethoven's Overture to Goethe's "Egmont," and Liszt's Faust Symphony which was inspired by the text of the German poet. Beethoven's Fourth Piano Concerto with Claudio Arrau as soloist will be on this program. On Sunday afternoon, July 31, Leonard Bernstein will conduct Schumann's Overture to "Manfred" and Fourth Symphony, and Stravinsky's "Rite of Spring."

Heifetz, Piatigorsky

The second week of concerts will begin on Thursday evening, August 4, with a Tchaikovsky program including the String Serenade, the Violin Concerto with Jascha Heifetz as soloist, and the Fourth Symphony. On Saturday evening, August 6, Dr. Koussevitzky will present Roussel's Suite in F, Milhaud's First 'Cello Concerto with Gregor Piatigorsky as soloist, "L'Ascension," by Messiaen (who will be on the faculty of the Berkshire Music Center), and the Symphony by Cesar Franck. On Sun- [illegible] 7, Eleazar

GREGOR PIATIGORSKY

Carvalho will conduct as guest William Schuman's Symphony for Strings, Mandu-carara by Villa-Lobos, and Strauss's "Thus Spake Zarathustra."

The third week of concerts will open on Thursday evening, August 11, with Leonard Bernstein as guest presenting Schubert's Fourth Symphony ("Tragic") and the Seventh Symphony by Shostakovitch. On Saturday evening, August 13, Dr. Koussevitzky will present a symphony with chorus which Benjamin Britten has just completed and [illegible] will then have its first public performance. This will be preceded by Haydn's Symphony in G major, No. 88. Koussevitzky's closing program on Sunday afternoon, August 14, will consist of the Orchestra Concerto by C. P. E. Bach, Copland's "Quiet City," Debussy's "The Sea," and Beethoven's Fifth Symphony.

The programs for two pairs of Bach-Mozart concerts in the smaller Theatre Concert Hall on July 16 and 17, and July 23 and 24 will be announced shortly.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
SUN
APR 2 - 1949

Beethoven No End

Forewarning of a Remarkable Event to Occur During Easter Week.

By IRVING KOLODIN.

I wish the tidings were otherwise, but I find myself bound to warn the local musical public that it is confronted with the prospect of five performances of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony during the week of April 10 to 17. Nine performances of the Fifth Symphony might be considered in the realm of the possible for a single week, but multiples of the Ninth, with its orchestra, chorus and soloists—surely no city elsewhere has ever been honored so greatly.

IRVING KOLODIN

Here we have a prime specimen of what might be called the Conductorial Coincidence, the simple happenstance by which two virtuosi of the baton miles apart, in different States (but aren't they all?), each at wit's end for what to do that will make even the Oldest Subscriber happy, decide on the same mammoth work, by pure chance. Or is it? The Philharmonic-Symphony's performance of the Ninth Symphony was announced a fair time ago; in fact, a whole year ago, as climax of the Beethoven Cycle directed by Bruno Walter. It was then scheduled for its present dates, for the usual Thursday evening, the Friday and Sunday matinees.

Now we are advised by a well-kept grapevine that the Boston Symphony will similarly end its series with the same work; that is to say, beginning on Wednesday evening and repeating on Saturday afternoon. Only the limitations of the stage in Brooklyn's Academy of Music prevent us from the gaudy prospect of six performances in five days, with opportunity for one who has not had his fill of it on Friday afternoon feasting on it again in the evening!

What the Doctor Ordered.

That there are some special circumstances involved might well be suspected. The last visit of the season by the Boston Symphony will also mark the last time it will come here under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, who is concluding the final season of his memorable twenty-five with the orchestra. Various earlier visits have had their ceremonial touches, and in this last one we will have the reminder of Koussevitzky as a firm proponent of the brotherhood of man, celebrating through Schiller and Beethoven his faith that the "umschlingen millionen" will finally find peace (excepting, of course, other conductors). But is this, musically, what the doctor ordered for New York in the closing week of its symphonic season? Perhaps, if one thinks in terms of Serge Koussevitzky, Musicae Doctor, as the one who ordered it.

Speaking of myself, in the circumstances that exist, I would rather have a chance to hear Beethoven's "Missa Solemnis" on Wednesday before the Philharmonic Ninth on Thursday, or at least on Saturday between those of Friday and Sunday. But that, I am inclined to believe, would not accord with part, at least, of the purpose. Dr. Koussevitzky might well feel that New York should not be without a Ninth Symphony in this season 1948-49; but since that had been guaranteed a year ago, it is apparent, too, that he feels it should not be without "his" Ninth Symphony.

The Proprietary Profession.

This insight into the workings of the conductorial mind came to my attention some months ago when I chanced to encounter one of the brotherhood during the intermission of a concert. "Leaving so soon?" he queried. "You must hear my Schumann No. 2." I had actually no intention of leaving, but the revelation of the conductor's attitude almost made me want to. Not "You must hear the Schumann No. 2" (which, in fact, was what I wanted to hear) but "You must hear MY Schumann No. 2." He was right: it was his Schumann No. 2. It couldn't have been anybody else's.

Perhaps that is why in this year of a Philharmonic Beethoven cycle we have had two all-Beethoven programs from the NBC Orchestra conducted by Arturo Toscanini. I recognize, of course, that the NBC concerts are prepared primarily for broadcast—that the audiences which hear them in the studio are mere quantities of acoustical matter to give a proper effect for the music on the air. But it is also a fact that the Sunday afternoon concerts of the Philharmonic are also broadcast, if only by a rival network. Students of the Conductorial Coincidence might note, further, that in each case the Toscanini broadcast included a symphony not played by Walter until later. . . . the "Eroica" one week, the "Pastorale" another. Please don't get the impression that I mean comparisons were intended: I only observe that they were inescapable.

The latest instance of the same appeal to the court of public opinion was, one might term it, nolle prossed, when Eugene Ormandy was prevented by illness from pleading his views on three excerpts from Wagner's "Goetterdaemmerung" two days before advocate Leopold Stokowski submitted them to trial with the Philharmonic. As between another aspiring Philadelphia lawyer (Alexander Hilsberg), who replaced Ormandy as counsel, and the dean emeritus of the school which produced them all, there was, of course, hardly a contest.

There is a body of opinion which holds that music is played for the public benefit, to serve a cultural function, to meet an artistic need; for any good reason, indeed, other than display of an interpreter's pride or vanity, vis-a-vis himself or his fellows. Such professional manifestations as these have the virtue, at least, of demonstrating that conductors, too, are human—a point of view from which there is, more than occasionally, dissent.

PITTSFIELD, MASS.
BERKSHIRE EAGLE
R 6 - 1949

Heifetz To Appear as Soloist At Berkshire Festival Concert

LENOX — Jascha Heifetz, renowned violinst, will appear as a soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood this summer. The announcement was made today by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky as he released the concert programs for the 1949 Festival.

Jascha Heifetz

Heifetz will appear with the orchestra the second week of the concerts on Thursday evening, Aug. 4, when he will play the violin concerto of Tchaikovsky's string serenade.

The concerts in the Music Shed will open Thursday evening, July 28, with Vivaldi's concerto for orchestra in Siloti's arrangement, Strauss' "Death and Transfiguration," and Brahms' Symphony No. 2. On Saturday evening, July 30, Dr. Koussevitzky will commemorate the 200th anniversary of the birth of Goethe with Beethoven's overture to Goethe's "Egmont," and Liszt's Faust symphony which was inspired by the text of the German poet. Beethoven's fourth piano concerto with Claudio Arrau as soloist will be on this program. Sunday afternoon, July 31, Leonard Bernstein will conduct Schumann's Overture to "Manfred" and fourth symphony, and Stravinsky's "Rite of Spring."

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will present Tchaikovsky's fourth symphony on the night of Aug. 4 when Heifetz appears as the violin soloist for Tchaikovsky's String Serenade.

On Saturday evening, Aug. 6, Dr. Koussevitzky will present Roussel's suite in F, Milhaud's First Cello Concerto with Gregor Piatigorsky as soloist, "L'Ascension" by Messiaen, who will be on the faculty of the Berkshire Music Center, and the Symphony by Cesar Franck. Sunday afternoon, Aug. 7, Eleaz de Carvalho will conduct as gue William Schuman's symphony f strings, Mandu-carara by Vill Lobos, and Strauss' "Thus Spa Zarathustra."

The third week of concerts w open Thursday evening, Aug. 1 with Leonard Bernstein as gue presenting Schubert's fourth syn phony ("Tragic") and the sevent symphony by Shostakovitch. Sat urday evening, Aug. 13, Dr. Kous sevitzky will present a symphon with chorus which Benjamin Brit ten has just completed and whic will then have its first public performance. This will be preceded b Haydn's symphony in G major, No 88. Koussevitzky's closing program Sunday afternoon, Aug. 14, will consist of the orchestra concerto by C. P. E. Bach, Copland's "Quiet City," Debussy's "The Sea," and Beethoven's fifth symphony.

The programs for two pairs of Bach-Mozart concerts in the smaller Theatre Concert Hall on July 16 and 17, and July 23 and 24, will be announced shortly.

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the past quarter century, as he faced the audience in Symphony Hall after completing his last concert.

N. ADAMS, MASS.
TRANSCRIPT
R 7 - 1949

Beethoven Concert Koussevitzky Finale

Boston Symphony Director to End Career at Tanglewood Aug. 14.

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will end his career as music director of the Boston Symphony orchestra by conducting the orchestra in a peformance of Beethoven's gigantic Fifth symphony at Tanglewood, Lenox, on Aug. 14.

This was disclosed today as the noted conductor announced the programs for this year's Berkshire festival at Tanglewood. Dr. Kuossevitzky has announced that he will retire as conductor at the end of this season and the Tanglewood concerts are the last activities for the orchestra each season so it is assumed that the final concert there this year will mark the termination of Dr. Koussevitzky's 25 years as its director. The fact that he has marked down Beethoven's Fifth as the concluding number for the final concert is regarded as significant because he has used it on oocasions of special significance in past Tanglewood seasons.

Dr. Koussevitzky will continue as director of the Berkshire Music center, the school conducted for advanced students at Tanglewood each summer, and he is expected to appear occasionally as guest conductor with the Boston Symphony, both at Tanglewood and in Boston, in future seasons, although Charles Muench, French conductor, will succeed him as its director in the fall.

Jascha Heifitz, violinist; Claudio Arrau, pianist, and Gregor Piatigorsky, 'cellist, are among soloists who will appear with the orchestra in the nine concerts on the festival program. Leonard Bernstein and Eleazar de Carvalho also will return as guest conductors this season. The concerts will be on Thursday and Saturday evenings and Sunday afternoons, in three series in consecutive weeks.

The programs were announced as follows:

First series, Thursday, July 28: Concerto for orchestra, Vivaldi-Soloti; "Death and Transfiguration," Strauss; Second symphony, Brahms. Saturday, July 30: "Egmont" overture, Beethoven; Faust symphony, Liszt; Fourth Piano concerto, Beethoven, with Claudia Arrau as soloist. Sunday, July 31: Manfred overture and Fourth symphony, Schumann; "Rites of Spring," Stravinsky, with Bernstein conducting.

Second series, Thursday, Aug. 4: String serenade concerto, Tschaikowsky, with Heifitz as soloist; Fourth symphony, Tschaikowsky. Saturday, Aug. 6: Suite in F, Roussel; First 'cello concerto, Milhaud, with Piatigorsky as soloist; "L'Ascension," Messiaen, and Symphony in D minor, Franck. Sunday, Aug. 7: Symphony for strings, Schumann; "Mandu-ca-rara," Villa-Lobos; "Thus Spake Zarathustra," Straus, with de Carvalho conducting.

Third series, Thursday, Aug. 1, Fourth symphony, Schubert; Seventh symphony, Shostakovich, with Bernstein conducting. Saturday, Aug. 13: Symphony in G minor, No. 88, Haydn; Spring symphony, Britten (first public performance). Sunday, Aug. 14: Orchestra concerto, C. P. E. Bach; "Quiet City," Copeland; "La Mer," Debussy; Fifth symphony, Beethoven.

WALTHAM, MASS.
NEWS-TRIBUNE
APR 7 - 1949

Full Program Of Berkshire Concerts Set

The programs for the Berkshir Festival by the Boston Symphon Orchesta at Tanglewood in Leno next summer, are announced by Serge Koussevitzky who is completing his last season as the orchestra's conductor.

The concerts in the Shed will open Thursday evening, July 28, with Vivaldi's Concerto for Orchestra (in Siloti's arrangement), Strauss' "Death and Transfiguration", and Brahms ' Symphony No. 2.

On Saturday evening, July 30, Dr. Koussevitzky will commemorate the 200th anniversary of the birth of Goethe with Beethoven's Overture to Goethe's "Egmont", and Liszt's Faust Symphony which was inspired by the text of the German poet, Beethoven's Fourth Piano Concerto, with Claudio Arrau as soloist, will be on this program.

On Sunday afternoon, July 31, Leonard Bernstein will conduct Schumann's Overture to "Manfred" and Fourth Symphony, and Stravinsky's "Rite of Spring".

The second week of concerts will begin Thursday evening, Aug. 4, with a Tschaikovsky program including the String serenade, the Violin Concerto, with Jascha Heifetz as soloist, and the Fourth Symphony.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
APR 7 1949

PROGRAMS LISTED FOR TANGLEWOOD

Berkshire Festival Concerts Begin on July 28—Britten's New Work Due Aug. 13

The full schedule of programs for the main phase of the Berkshire Festival to be held by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Serge Koussevitzky, next summer at Tanglewood in Lenox, Mass., was announced yesterday.

At the first of the concerts in the Shed, Thursday night, July 28, works to be presented are the Vivaldi-Siloti Concerto for Orchestra, Strauss' "Death and Transfiguration" and Brahms' Second Symphony. Saturday night, July 30, in commemoration of the 200th anniversary of Goethe's birth, Dr. Koussevitzky will conduct Beethoven's "Egmont" Overture and Liszt's "Faust" Symphony, and the program will be completed by Beethoven's Fourth Piano Concerto, with Claudio Arrau, as soloist. Sunday afternoon, July 31, Schumann's "Manfred" Overture and Fourth Symphony, and Stravinsky's "Rites of Spring" will be led by Leonard Bernstein, guest conductor.

Programs of the second week will be as follows: Thursday night, Aug. 4, Tchaikovsky's String Serenade, violin concerto, with Jascha Heifetz, as soloist, and Fourth Symphony; Saturday night, Aug. 6, Roussel's Suite in F, Milhaud's First Cello Concerto with Gregor Piatigorsky as soloist, Messiaen's "L'Ascension" and César Franck's Symphony, and Sunday afternoon, Aug. 7, Schuman's Symphony for Strings, Villa-Lobos' "Mandú-cárárá" and Strauss' "Thus Spake Zarathustra," with Eleazar de Carvalho as guest conductor.

For the third week, the programs will be: Thursday night, Aug. 11, Schubert's Fourth Symphony and Shostakovich's Seventh Symphony, directed by Mr. Bernstein; Saturday night, Aug. 13, Haydn's Symphony in G major, No. 88, and the first public performance of the new "Spring" Symphony by Benjamin Britten, and at the closing concert, Sunday afternoon, Aug. 14, C. P. E. Bach's Orchestra Concerto, Copland's "Quiet City," Debussy's "La Mer" and Beethoven's Fifth Symphony.

Works to be performed at the two pairs of Bach-Mozart concerts, July 16 and 17, and July 23 and 24, in the Theatre Concert Hall, will be announced later.

Bernstein's Second Symphony

Marcus Blechman

Leonard Bernstein, whose Symphony No. 2, for piano and orchestra, is having its first performance Friday by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Koussevitzky.

Composer Describes Work For Piano and Orchestra

By Harold Rogers

Leonard Bernstein read W. H. Auden's poem, "The Age of Anxiety," in the summer of 1947, and almost immediately, he said, the music for a symphony began to sing in him. He's been writing it ever since—in New York, Paris, Israel, Rome, in hotel lobbies, trains, planes, pouring it out phrase by phrase between the heavy demands made upon him as a pianist-conductor.

He finished it last week and has named it his Second Symphony for Piano and Orchestra. He made further changes this week during rehearsals. He will play it with the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Dr. Serge Koussevitzky's direction at its concerts tomorrow afternoon and Saturday evening in Symphony Hall.

"I think it's the best piece I ever wrote," he said. "Each major piece in a composer's career should be better than the last." The symphony is novel in form and employs certain surprising effects that he refuses to release to the public before the première.

* * *

He completed most of the orchestration while on tour recently with the Pittsburgh Symphony Orchestra, working at odd moments in 25 hotels over a period of 28 days. He conducted 25 concerts in this time and played piano concertos in 22 of them. Yet somehow he still found time enough to score a symphony.

The symphony is in two parts, each consisting of three connecting movements. These six movements correspond to the six sections of "The Age of Anxiety." The first part, then, deals with the Prologue, the Seven Ages, and the Seven Stages. The second is devoted to the Dirge, the Masque, and the Epilogue.

The poem tells of four people, three men and a girl, who meet in a New York bar during wartime on All Souls night. They spend the night wandering through the city, responding to its staccato tempo and the artificial stimuli of modern living. The following morning they turn from these frustrations to contemplate "faith in good," aware all the while of their own inability to grasp it or to practice it.

After a contemplative prologue, Mr. Bernstein then develops 14 variations that represent the Seven Ages and the Seven Stages.

"These are not variations on a given theme," he explained, "but variations upon each other. Each new variation seizes upon some feature of the last and develops it—like the reproduction of the amoeba. Each new amoeba is different, but they are all related. Each variation is a completely different piece lasting about a minute. So there are 14 pieces in 14 minutes. As far as I know, this is the first time this has been done in music."

* * *

The symphony's second part opens with the Dirge. In this movement Mr. Bernstein used Schönberg's 12-tone row for the first time in his career. "Only it doesn't sound atonal," he said. "I used it in a tonal, harmonic way."

Next comes the Masque, treated by Mr. Bernstein in the manner of a scherzo. Slightly nightmarish, it is scored for piano and percussion, including harp, celesta, glockenspiel, and xylophone. It represents the wild party in the poem and mounts dizzily to a point where the piano gives out and the orchestra takes over. Then occurs the joke that Mr. Bernstein will not divulge.

The piano, of course, plays a major role in the symphony. It is the protagonist, identified with the four protagonists of Auden's poem.

The Epilogue section tells of the contemplation, by these people, of "faith in good" and of their inability thus far to attain it. The pianist, ergo, does not play. He stands aside to reflect upon the orchestra's expression of "something pure." The elements of purity and of melancholy set up a battle, but the movement builds to a positive statement with purity triumphant. The pianist then signifies his agreement with this statement by a single chord of affirmation. And this is the end.

WORCESTER, MASS.
GAZETTE
APR 7 1949

Programs Listed For Tanglewood

The schedule of programs for the main phase of the Berkshire Festival to be held by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Serge Koussevitzky, next Summer at Tanglewood in Lenox, was announced yesterday.

At the first of the concerts in the Shed, Thursday night, July 28, works to be presented are the Vivaldi Siloti Concerto for Orchestra, Strauss' "Death and Transfiguration" and Brahms' Second Symphony. Saturday night, July 30, in commemoration of the 200th anniversary of Goethe's birth, Dr. Koussevitzky will conduct Beethoven's "Egmont" Overture and Liszt's "Faust" Symphony, and Beethoven's Fourth Piano Concerto, with Claude Arrau, as soloist. Sunday afternoon, July 31, Schumann's "Manfred" Overture and Fourth Symphony, and Stravinsky's "Rites of Spring" will be led by Leonard Bernstein, guest conductor.

Programs of the second week will be as follows: Thursday night, Aug. 4, Tchaikovsky's String Serenade, violin concerto, with Jascha Heifetz, as soloist, and Fourth Symphony; Saturday night, Aug. 6, Roussel's Suite in F, Milhaud's First Cello Concerto with Gregor Piatigorsky as soloist, Messiaen's "L'Ascension" and Cesar Franck's Symphony, and Sunday afternoon, Aug. 7, Schuman's Symphony for Strings, Villa-Lobo's "Mandu-carara" and Strauss' "Thus Spake Zarathustra," with Eleazar de Carvalho as guest conductor.

For the third week, the programs will be: Thursday night, Aug. 11, Schubert's Fourth Symphony and Shostakovich's Seventh Symphony, directed by Mr. Bernstein; Saturday night, Aug. 13, Haydn's Symphony in G major, No. 88, and the first public performance of the new "Spring" Symphony by Benjamin Britten, and at the closing concert, Sunday afternoon, Aug. 14, C. P. E. Bach's Orchestra Concerto, Copland's "Quiet City," Debussy's "La Mer" and Beethoven's Fifth Symphony.

Works to be performed at the two pairs of Bach-Mozart concerts, July 16 and 17, and July 23 and 24, in the Theater Concert Hall, will be announced later.

HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES
APR 9 - 1949

Programs Listed For Tanglewood

Programs for the Berkshire Festival by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood in Lenox, Mass., this summer are announced by Serge Koussevitzky, who is now completing his last season as the orchestra's conductor.

The concerts in the Shed will open on Thursday evening, July 28, with Vivaldi's Concerto for Orchestra (in Siloti's arrangement), Strauss' "Death and Transfiguration," and Brahms' Second Symphony. On Saturday evening, July 30, Dr. Koussevitzky will commemorate the 200th anniversary of the birth of Goethe with Beethoven's Overture to Goethe's "Egmont," and Liszt's Faust Symphony which was inspired by the text of the German poet. Beethoven's Fourth Piano Concerto with Claudio Arrau as soloist will be on [illegible] On Sunday afternoon, July 31, Leonard Bernstein will conduct Schumann's Overture to "Manfred" and Fourth Symphony, and Stravinsky's "Rite of Spring."

—SATURDAY, APRIL 9, 1949

MUSIC

Bernstein Piano Soloist in First Performance of His Second Symphony

By CYRUS DURGIN

A remarkable score, two parts of which express our own times better than any other music I know, received its first performance by Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon. This is the new Second Symphony by Leonard Bernstein, in which the brilliant young composer, conductor and pianist took the keyboard part himself.

Not a symphony in the old-fashioned, conventional sense, nor a piano concerto either, this work is novel both in its form and idiom. It is very personal, and to a degree, symbolic music, for it was inspired by W. H. Auden's intense poem about these times in which we live: "The Age of Anxiety." The layout of the music follows the layout of the verse: a prologue, two sets of seven variations ("The Seven Ages" and "The Seven Stages"), for the first part; The Dirge, The Masque and The Epilogue for the second. The variations do not center around a theme, but are variations on each other. Bernstein himself claims that he knows of no other such form in a symphonic piece. The idiom runs from consonance to extreme dissonance, with a nod at the 12-tone system.

What Auden and Bernstein are talking about is the neurotic instability which besets our minds and hearts, the lack of something to cling to for the future, and the necessity to find something. It is told poetically in terms of a girl and three young men of Manhattan who meet in a Third Avenue bar, talk and talk, drink and drink, go to the girl's apartment for a nightcap, there stage a party, for if they cannot be happy let them be gay, though 4 a. m. finds all tired and needing rest, and in the large sense needing faith.

Bernstein does not supply faith, for his music does not reach a solution, but he represents it by a trumpet theme. The protagonists of the poem he symbolizes by the solo piano which, at the end of The Masque (the party) can say nothing more except to indicate by one convulsive chord in the epilogue that faith will be grasped at, whether or not it can be retained.

There are great pages: the nostalgia of the two clarinets at the beginning; the rich exfoliation of the variations; the inner tumult of The Dirge which, to my mind, is a magnificent musical representation of the fatigue and the drawn nerves afflicting many of us; the spectacular cleverness of the scherzo in jazz which represents The Masque. This is the finest single movement in an American idiom and feeling that ever I have heard. It is set for the solo piano against a large and varied assortment of percussion instruments, and it is a triumph of rhythmic interplay, subtle and unexpected accents, in short a marvelous distillation of the whole style, technic and mood of jazz. And how wonderfully it was played! The epilogue is a bit blown up, and may stand revising, but it is not rudely out of place.

No space is left to talk about the performance, which was superb, nor of Beethoven's "Coriolanus" Overture, Strauss' "Death and Transfiguration" and Ravel's "La Valse," except to say that the last-named was the ultimate in orgiastic three-time.

HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES
APR 9 -

Final Auditions Slated For Berkshire Events

Final auditions for admission to the student orchestras and voice department of the Berkshire Music Center, Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass., will be held this week at the Carnegie Recital Hall, New York.

Voice trials will be held Monday afternoon and orchestral trials on succeeding mornings, Wednesday through Friday.

LEADS LAST OF FRIDAY SYMPHONIES

Post Apr-30

Koussevitzky Makes Final Appearance Notable One

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

For six minutes the clapping, stamping and cheering continued, and then Dr. Koussevitzky, his voice gaining in firmness as he went along, made a little speech in which he expressed his sorrow at parting and his happiness in what these 25 years had accomplished for the Boston Symphony Orchestra, for the American composer and for the young artist.

FIRST FAREWELL

And then it was all over. The conductor who had ministered to it for a quarter of a century, had taken leave of the Friday afternoon audience.

A similar rite will take place this evening and on Sunday afternoon, Aug. 14, the final concert of the 1949 Berkshire Music Festival, when Dr. Koussevitzky for the last time conducts the Boston Symphony as its regular leader. Coming events cast their shadow before. Yesterday's program book announced the orchestra's 69th season, under the leadership of Charles Munch, from Oct. 7 to April 29.

Whether or not Beethoven's Ninth Symphony is the summit of symphonic music, enough people so consider it to make it a fairly obvious choice for an occasion such as this. In point of fact, Dr. Koussevitzky had ended several previous seasons with it, the latest of them that of 1946-47. This time he decided to preface the Ninth with the so-very-different Beethoven First.

Turns to Choirs

For the chorus that the former requires he turned, as in the past, to the combined choirs of Harvard and Radcliffe, as trained by W. Wallace Woodworth, while the solo singers were Frances Yeend, Eunice Alberts, David Lloyd and James Pease. These four made an excellent quartet, individually and in combination. Their task was not always a grateful one, and the same may be said of the choral portion. Had the size of the stage permitted, a larger chorus than that of yesterday would have been to the point, and again these young people were obliged to make up in enthusiasm for that which their voices lacked in natural resonance.

Perhaps if Dr. Koussevitzky had not given us so many performances of the Ninth Symphony, that of yesterday would have conveyed a more special excitment than it did. The Ninth is an old story, as is Koussevitzky's generally eloquent reading of it. It was his farewell that really roused the audience to that special demonstration. Repeatedly the conductor included in the applause the orchestra, the chorus, the soloists and Mr. Woodworth. But most of it was for Koussevitzky.

Delightful One

If the little First Symphony was somewhat snowed under by its mighty successor, it should still be noted that the performance was a delightful one, and it was warmly received by the audience, which had risen to its feet when Koussevitzky first came upon the platform, and stood applauding him until he held up a restraining hand.

That something untoward was afoot yesterday could be noticed on the steps of Symphony Hall, where the would-be occupants of the rush seats in the second balcony began to assemble before 6 o'clock. By 9:30 the quota was filled; yet throughout the morning the crowd kept gathering, and the doors finally closed upon those who had been denied admittance, they lingered forlornly on the steps as though hoping that [illegible] take place.

---

[275]

Symphony by Cesar Franck. On Sun-
7, Eleazar

AUSTIN, TEXAS
STATESMAN

25 YEARS WITH BOSTON SYMPHONY

Incomparable Serge Koussevitsky Retiring for 'Busman's Holiday'

NEW YORK, April 7.—(AP)—The greatest conductor in our time . . . incomparable master of string tone . . . matchless virtuoso . . . the man who has done the most for American music . . .

With such superlatives as these, critics have hailed Serge Koussevitzky in the course of his quarter-century as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra; and it is with such praises ringing in his ears that he has resigned, effective at the end of this concert season.

He explains that, as Boston conductor, "you don't belong to yourself, you don't have the time to breathe, you're not your own man. I don't feel I'm old, or that I'm tired, but I want to have my absolute freedom."

He doesn't look old, though his graying hair is getting thin. With one stray lock of it whipping about as he shakes his head in conversation, he certainly does not act tired. He has a complexion as healthy, and as red, as an American Indian's; his eyes snap. He tramps into the room to meet you with the same stately tread with which he marches from the wings to the podium; but once he sits down and begins to talk, he is as animated as any youngster, thrusting out his arms, counting off points on his fingers, clasping his hands to his chest.

Since he intends to travel abroad, it looks as though for a time this would be not only Boston's loss but also the country's. Next season he will conduct for the first time in South America; and he will visit Palestine, Europe and London, where he has not conducted for 13 years. In the following season he may accept repeated, and repeatedly rejected, invitations to spend three months in Australia.

The double-bass, his own instrument, which he taught in his native Russia and played all over Europe, has had to be given up. "Sometimes I take it out of the case, and then put it back, and the tears come to my eyes," he says.

Though he is leaving Boston, he will remain at Tanglewood, where school and concerts will continue to occupy him about 10 weeks every year. He may teach, he wants to compose, he will start immediately to write his autobiography. The languages he knows are music and Russian, not English, which he speaks only with a decided accent. He will write in Russian, and his wife, who for years was his secretary, will translate, as she has translated his numerous speeches.

It looks like a busman's holiday. At any rate it will not be so confining as what he does now, when a week's vacation is no different from a week's work. On his last trip to New York, for instance, his schedule was: Monday, conduct in Hartford; Tuesday, conduct in New Haven; Wednesday, conduct here; Thursday, conduct in Newark; Friday, a stolen day of rest, though he listened to records, was photographed, and talked to a reporter, among other things; Saturday, conduct here again; Sunday, attend three meetings.

Then began his week off: Monday, rehearse two glee clubs; Tuesday, ditto; Wednesday, rehearse orchestra; Thursday, rehearse orchestra and clubs; Friday, free; Saturday, general rehearsal; Sunday, conduct the B minor mass for which he had been preparing; it's so long that most audiences, though they're a lot younger than the 74-year-old conductor, have to take it in two parts, and in Boston the first section comes in the afternoon and the second in the evening. Then on the following Monday the conductor went back to work!

Koussevitzky has programmed nearly 200 American compositions in his 25 years here. "Festivals" of American music such as he presented this winter in Boston and on tour could not have been offered a quarter-century ago, he says unhesitatingly, simply for lack of the music. About that time some of our big conservatories were being founded, and in Koussevitzky's opinion, "the real history of American music began about 25 years ago."

His part in it has been widely acknowledged, and increased recognition is planned. The Boston symphony is selling RCA Victor-made albums of Koussevitzky at the double-bass, recorded 20 years ago, and proceeds will go to the $250,000 Serge Koussevitzky Fund newly established by the orchestra's board of trustees. In May the conductor will be feted at a New York banquet and concert sponsored by the League of Composers.

—SATURDAY, APRIL 9, 1949

MUSIC

Bernstein Piano Soloist in First Performance of His Second Symphony

By CYRUS DURGIN

A remarkable score, two parts of which express our own times better than any other music I know, received its first performance by Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon. This is the new Second Symphony by Leonard Bernstein, in which the brilliant young composer, conductor and pianist took the keyboard part himself.

Not a symphony in the old-fashioned, conventional sense, nor a piano concerto either, this work is novel both in its form and idiom. It is very personal, and to a degree, symbolic music, for it was inspired by W. H. Auden's intense poem about these times in which we live: "The Age of Anxiety." The layout of the music follows the layout of the verse: a prologue, two sets of seven variations ("The SevenAges" and "The Seven Stages"), for the first part; The Dirge, The Masque and The Epilogue for the second. The variations do not center around a theme, but are variations on each other. Bernstein himself claims that he knows of no other such form in a symphonic piece. The idiom runs from consonance to extreme dissonance, with a nod at the 12-tone system.

What Auden and Bernstein are talking about is the neurotic instability which besets our minds and hearts, the lack of something to cling to for the future, and the necessity to find something. It is told poetically in terms of a girl and three young men of Manhattan who meet in a Third Avenue bar, talk and talk, drink and drink, go to the girl's apartment for a nightcap, there stage a party, for if they cannot be happy let them be gay, though 4 a. m. finds all tired and needing rest, and in the large sense needing faith.

Bernstein does not supply faith, for his music does not reach a solution, but he represents it by a trumpet theme. The protagonists of the poem he symbolizes by the solo piano which, at the end of The Masque (the party) can say nothing more except to indicate by one convulsive chord in the epilogue that faith will be grasped at, whether or not it can be retained.

There are great pages: the nostalgia of the two clarinets at the beginning; the rich exfoliation of the variations; the inner tumult of The Dirge which, to my mind, is a magnificent musical representation of the fatigue and the drawn nerves afflicting many of us; the spectacular cleverness of the Scherzo in jazz which represents The Masque. This is the finest single movement in an American idiom and feeling that ever I have heard. It is set for the solo piano against a large and varied assortment of percussion instruments, and it is a triumph of rhythmic interplay, subtle and unexpected accents, in short a marvelous distillation of the whole style, technic and mood of jazz. And how wonderfully it was played! The epilogue is a bit blown up, and may stand revising, but it is not rudely out of place.

No space is left to talk about the performance, which was superb, nor of Beethoven's "Coriolanus" Overture, Strauss' "Death and Transfiguration" and Ravel's "La Valse," except to say that the last-named was the ultimate in orgiastic three-time.

TRIBUTE GIVEN KOUSSEVITZKY

Arts Foundation Lauds His Great Career

NEW YORK, April 29 (AP)—Serge Koussevitzky was lauded today as "a pioneer in introducing contemporary music" on the eve of his retirement as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Carleton Smith, director of the National Arts Foundation, issued a statement addressed to Koussevitzky, who retires tomorrow. It read:

"You have made an unparalleled contribution to the art of music in America.

"Generations to come will enjoy and treasure the work you have done.

"You have not only established a distinguished standard of orchestral performance. You have been a pioneer in introducing contemporary music. You have taught and inspired young musicians who will carry on your ideals throughout their lives."

The foundation's advisory committee on music includes Dr. Bruno Walter, Roy Harris, Darius Milhaud, Jean Sibelius, Dr. Fritz Busch, Dmitri Mitropoulos, Vladimir Golschamman, Marian Anderson, Lawrence Tibbett, Deems Taylor, Pierre Monteux, Charles Munch and Gregor Piatigorsky.

SACRAMENTO, CALIF.
UNION

9 1949

Serge Koussevitzky Ready to Lay Down Baton

NEW YORK—(AP)—The greatest conductor in our time . . . incomparable master of string tone . . . matchless virtuoso . . . the man who has done the most for American music . . .

With such superlatives as these, critics have hailed Serge Koussevitzky in the course of his quarter-century as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra; and it is with such praise ringing in his ears that he has resigned, effective at the end of this concert season.

He explains that, as Boston conductor, "you don't belong to yourself, you don't have the time to breathe, you're not your own man. I don't feel I'm old, or that I'm tired, but I want to have my absolute freedom."

HE DOESN'T look old, though his graying hair is getting thin. With one stray lock of it whipping about as he shakes his head in conversation, he certainly does not act tired. He has a complexion as healthy, and as red, as an American Indian's; his eyes snap. He tramps into the room to meet you with the same stately tread with which he marches from the wings to the podium; but once he sits down and begins to talk, he is as animated as any youngster, thrusting out his arms, counting off points on his fingers, clasping his hands to his chest.

Since he intends to travel aboard, it looks as though for a time this would be not only Boston's loss but also the country's. Next season he will conduct for the first time in South America; and he will visit Palestine, Europe and London, where he has not conducted for 13 years. In the following season he may accept repeated, and repeatedly rejected, invitations to spend three months in Australia.

THE DOUBLE-BASS, his own instrument, which he taught in his native Russia and played all over Europe, had had to be given up. "Sometimes I take it out of the case, and then put it back, and the tears come to my eyes," he says.

Though he is leaving Boston, he will remain at Tanglewood, where school and concerts will continue to occupy him about 10 weeks every year. He may teach, he wants to compose, he will start immediately to write his autobiography. The languages he knows are music and Russian, not English, which he speaks only with a decided accent. He will write in Russian, and his wife, who for years was his secretary, will translate, as she has translated his numerous speeches.

It looks like a busman's holiday.

—SATURDAY, APRIL 9, 1949

MUSIC

Bernstein Piano Soloist in First Performance of His Second Symphony

By CYRUS DURGIN

A remarkable score, two parts of which express our own times better than any other music I know, received its first performance by Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon. This is the new Second Symphony by Leonard Bernstein, in which the brilliant young composer, conductor and pianist took the keyboard part himself.

Not a symphony in the old-fashioned, conventional sense, nor a piano concerto either, this work is novel both in its form and idiom. It is very personal, and to a degree, symbolic music, for it was inspired by W. H. Auden's intense poem about these times in which we live: "The Age of Anxiety." The layout of the music follows the layout of the verse: a prologue, two sets of seven variations ("The SevenAges" and "The Seven Stages"), for the first part; The Dirge, The Masque and The Epilogue for the second. The variations do not center around a theme, but are variations on each other. Bernstein himself claims that he knows of no other such form in a symphonic piece. The idiom runs from consonance to extreme dissonance, with a nod at the 12-tone system.

What Auden and Bernstein are talking about is the neurotic instability which besets our minds and hearts, the lack of something to cling to for the future, and the necessity to find something. It is told poetically in terms of a girl and three young men of Manhattan who meet in a Third Avenue bar, talk and talk, drink and drink, go to the girl's apartment for a nightcap, there stage a party, for if they cannot be happy let them be gay, though 4 a. m. finds all tired and needing rest, and in the large sense needing faith.

Bernstein does not supply faith, for his music does not reach a solution, but he represents it by a trumpet theme. The protagonists of the poem he symbolizes by the solo piano which, at the end of The Masque (the party) can say nothing more except to indicate by one convulsive chord in the epilogue that faith will be grasped at, whether or not it can be retained.

There are great pages: the nostalgia of the two clarinets at the beginning; the rich exfoliation of the variations; the inner tumult of The Dirge which, to my mind, is a magnificent musical representation of the fatigue and the drawn nerves afflicting many of us; the spectacular cleverness of the Scherzo in jazz which represents The Masque. This is the finest single movement in an American idiom and feeling that ever I have heard. It is set for the solo piano against a large and varied assortment of percussion instruments, and it is a triumph of rhythmic interplay, subtle and unexpected accents, in short a marvelous distillation of the whole style, technic and mood of jazz. And how wonderfully it was played! The epilogue is a bit blown up, and may stand revising, but it is not rudely out of place.

No space is left to talk about the performance, which was superb, nor of Beethoven's "Coriolanus" Overture, Strauss' "Death and Transfiguration" and Ravel's "La Valse," except to say that the last-named was the ultimate in orgiastic three-time.

HE BOSTON HERALD, SATURDAY, APRIL 9, 194

MUSIC

Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, gave the 23d program of the 68th season in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. Leonard Bernstein, pianist, was the soloist. The program:

Overture to "Coriolanus," Op. 62, Beethoven
"The Age of Anxiety", Symphony No. 2 Bernstein
"Death and Transfiguration", Op. 24. Strauss
"La Valse" Ravel

By RUDOLPH ELIE

Leonard Bernstein, our three-letter musical prodigy, has composed a striking successor to his "Jeremiah" Symphony.

It is his Symphony No. 2 for Piano and Orchestra, a 30-minute composition subtitled "The Age of Anxiety," after W. H. Auden's unconstrained lyric of a disordered spirit in a seemingly crumbling social order. It employs the piano, not as a virtuoso now conquering and now conquered by the orchestra, but as a protagonist living, to the full, the events transpiring in the orchestra, which is to say the universe bounded by the poem.

More eloquently, perhaps, than anyone else could, Mr. Bernstein has fully enunciated his program for this work, which tells of the odyssey of four characters in a Third Avenue bar. An ephemeral prologue, spoken by two clarinets, leads to two sets of seven variations, each variation based on its predecessor and not, as is the custom, on an announced theme. These variations represent the symbolic gropings of the character to find some spiritual security.

A grotesque dirge follows, a section that achieves exceptional emotional tension, and this leads directly into one of the most extraordinary symphonic movements in the literature, an apotheosis of the jazz spirit. Set for piano and percussion only, it out-bops any contemporary be-bop, and out boogie's any woogie. Yet it bears no more relation to Jazz at Carnegie Hall than Ravel's La Valse bears to the Viennese waltz. It is, in fact, an inspired commentary on jazz, at once sardonic and tender, at once violent and sentimental.

In the frantic, orgiastic climax, the protagonist of the work exhausts himself, and not until the final moment of the Epilogue does he speak again, and then only to add, in one affirmative chord, his hope of finding faith; a stroke of genius in a work whose wonders follow one another from the beginning.

Although there are suggestions of almost every orchestral idiom in this work exactly, as in an atomic physicist's discovery there are the contributions of every scientific predecessor, this is an exceptionally original work. Its sound (if this may be said without conveying any misconceptions) is a mingling of the sounds achieved by Rachmaninoff, Mahler and Copland. It is romantic in tone, rarely dissonant contrapuntally, entirely (for which be praised!) unscholastic, and almost excessively melodic. Indeed, insofar as melody is concerned, Mr. Bernstein has filled every inch of his canvas with melodic ideas each of them of equal importance, much as Cezanne filled his with details.

But far more important than the technical details, which could—and for some time to come will—fill columns of musical discussion, is the esthetic of this work. Almost alone, among our contemporaries, Mr. Bernstein has written of today for today. His inspiration has come from living and being; he writes here of things he knows and lives. He has taken, as all men of musical genius have done in the past, the musical substances he truly understands. He has fused them with his observation, his emotion, his own special search for spiritual calm, and then allowed his artistic subconsciousness to speak for him. In doing so that subconscious has produced music that looks backward and forward; for being of yesterday and today it may also be of tomorrow.

Needless to say the composer at the piano, Dr. Koussevitzky (to whom this work is dedicated), and the orchestra gave it a magnificent performance. Conductor and orchestra, in fact, were in fine fettle throughout, the Beethoven, Strauss and Ravel getting exceedingly rousing performances. The orchestra is out of town next week, but will return on April 22 to do Bruckner's Seventh Symphony and two Wagnerian excerpts. Incidentally, it might be a good idea to read Auden if it's handy, or at least get to the hall in time to read Mr. Bernstein's notes. It is not "absolute" music (though it stands on its own without program), and Mr. Bernstein makes no bones about it. Nor should he; what he has to say is too acutely apropos.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
APR 10 1949

WINS ARTISTS '49 AWARD

Lilian Kallir, Pianist, 18, Gets Brooklyn Institute Prize

Lilian Kallir, 18-year-old pianist who was born in Austria, has won the American Artists Award for 1949, it was announced yesterday by the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences. A $200 cash prize and an engagement to play in the institute's Major Concert Series on Jan. 10, 1950, were presented to her for her "outstanding recital" at the Brooklyn Academy last November.

Miss Kallir came to this country when she was 10 years old. She studies at the Mannes Music School, has spent two summers at the Berkshire Music Center and has recorded the music of one of her teachers, Hugo Kauder. Last year she won the National Music League Award.

NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
STANDARD-TIMES
APR 10 1949

Long Service Nears Ending

Boston Symphony Loses Koussevitzky

By W. G. ROGERS
Associated Press Arts Reporter

NEW YORK, April 9 — The greatest conductor in our time . . . incomparable master of string tone . . . matchless virtuoso . . . the man who has done the most for American music . . .

With such superlatives as these, critics have hailed Serge Koussevitzky in the course of his quarter-century as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and it is with such praises ringing in his ears that he has resigned, effective at the end of this concert season.

He explains that, as Boston conductor, "You don't belong to yourself, you don't have the time to breathe, you're not your own man. I don't feel I'm old, or that I'm tired, but I want to have my absolute freedom."

Animated as Youngster

He doesn't look old, though his graying hair is getting thin. With one stray lock of it whipping about as he shakes his head in conversation, he certainly does not act tired. He has a complexion as healthy, and as red, as an American Indian's; his eyes snap. He tramps into the room to meet you with the same stately tread with which he marches from the wings to the podium; but once he sits down and begins to talk, he is as animated as any youngster, thrusting out his arms, counting off points on his fingers, clasping his hands to his chest.

Since he intends to travel abroad, it looks as though for a time this would be not only Boston's loss but also the country's. Next season he will conduct for the first time in South America, and he will visit Palestine, Europe and London, where he has not conducted for 13 years. In the following season he may accept repeated, and repeatedly rejected, invitations to spend three months in Australia.

The double-bass, his own instrument, which he taught in his native Russia and played all over Europe, had to be given up. "Sometimes I take it out of the case, and then put it back, and the tears come to my eyes," he says.

To Stay at Tanglewood

Though he is leaving Boston, he will remain at Tanglewood, where school and concerts will continue to occupy him about 10 weeks every year. He may teach, he wants to compose, he will start immediately to write his autobiography. The languages he knows are music and Russian, not English, which he speaks only with a decided accent. He will write in Russian, and his wife, who for years was his secretary, will translate, as she has translated his numerous speeches.

It looks like a busman's holiday. At any rate it will not be so confining as what he does now, when a week's vacation is no different from a week's work. On his last trip to New York, for instance, his schedule was, Monday, conduct in Hartford; Tuesday, conduct in New Haven; Wednesday, conduct here; Thursday, conduct in Newark; Friday, a stolen day of rest, though he listened to records, was photographed, and talked to a reporter, among other things; Saturday, conduct here again; Sunday, attend three meetings.

Then began his week off—Monday, rehearse two glee clubs; Tuesday, ditto; Wednesday, rehearse orchestra; Thursday, rehearse orchestra and clubs; Friday, free; Saturday, general rehearsal; Sunday, conduct the B Minor Mass for which he had been preparing; it's so long that most audiences, though they're a lot younger than the 74-year-old conductor, have to take it in two parts, and in Boston the first section comes in the afternoon and the second in the evening. Then on the following Monday the conductor went back to work!

Koussevitzky has programmed nearly 200 American compositions in his 25 years here. "Festivals" of American music such as he presented this Winter in Boston and on tour could not have been offered a quarter-century ago, he says unhesitatingly, simply for lack of the music. About that time some of our big conservatories were being founded, and in Koussevitzky's opinion, "The real history of American music began about 25 years ago."

His part in it has been widely acknowledged, and increased recognition is planned. The Boston Symphony is selling RCA Victor-made albums of Koussevitzky at the double-bass, recorded 20 years ago, and proceeds will go to the $250,000 Serge Koussevitzky Fund newly established by the orchestra's board of trustees. In May the conductor will be feted at a New York banquet and concert sponsored by the League of Composers.

Leaving Boston Symphony

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY

ELMIRA, N. Y.
TELEGRAM
APR 10 1949

Wants 'Absolute Freedom'

Koussevitzky Quitting —For Busman's Holiday

By W. G. ROGERS

New York—(AP)—The greatest conductor in our time . . . incomparable master of string tone . . . matchless virtuoso . . . the man who has done the most for American music . . .

With such superlatives as these, critics have hailed Serge Koussevitzky in the course of his quarter-century as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra; and it is with such praises ringing in his ears that he has resigned, effective at the end of this concert season.

He explains that, as Boston conductor, "you don't belong to yourself, you don't have the time to breathe, you're not your own man. I don't feel I'm old, or that I'm tired, but I want to have my absolute freedom."

He doesn't look old, though his graying hair is getting thin. With one stray lock of it whipping about as he shakes his head in conversation, he certainly does not act tired. He has a complexion as healthy, and as red, as an American Indian's; his eyes snap. He tramps into the room to meet you with the same stately tread with which he marches from the wings to the podium; but once he sits down and begins to talk, he is as animated as any youngster, thrusting out his arms, counting off points on his fingers, clasping his hands to his chest.

Since he intends to travel abroad, it looks as though for a time this would be not only Boston's loss but also the country's. Next season he will conduct for the first time in South America; and he will visit Palestine, Europe and London, where he has not conducted for 13 years. In the following season he may accept repeated, and repeatedly rejected, invitations to spend three months in Australia.

The double-bass, his own instrument, which he taught in his native Russia and played all over Europe, had had to be given up. "Sometimes I take it out of the case, and then put it back, and the tears come to my eyes," he says.

Though he's leaving Boston, he will remain at Tanglewood, where school and concerts will continue to occupy him about 10 weeks every year. He may teach, he wants to compose, he will start immediately to write his autobiography.

The languages he knows are music and Russian, not English, which he speaks only with a decided accent. He will write in Russian, and his wife, who for years was his secretary, will translate, as she has translated his numerous speeches.

It looks like a busman's holiday. At any rate it will not be so confining as what he does now, when a week's vacation is no different from a week's work. On his last trip to New York, for instance, his schedule was: Monday, conduct in Hartford; Tuesday, conduct in New Haven; Wednesday, conduct here; Thursday, conduct in Newark; Friday, a stolen day of rest, though he listened to records, was photographed, and talked to a reporter, among other things; Saturday, conduct here again; Sunday, attend three meetings.

Then began his week off: Monday, rehearse two glee clubs; Tuesday, ditto; Wednesday, rehearse orchestra; Thursday, rehearse orchestra and clubs; Friday, free; Saturday, general rehearsal; Sunday, conduct the B Minor Mass for which he had been preparing; it's so long that most audiences, though they're a lot younger than the 74-year-old conductor, have to take it in two parts, and in Boston the first section comes in the afternoon and the second in the evening. Then on the following Monday the conductor went back to work!

[277]

PHILADELPHIA, PA.
BULLETIN

APR 10 1949

Farewell Concert: Koussevitzky to Conduct Boston Symphony For Last Time in Phila. Before His Retirement

By Max de Schauensee

TUESDAY night will mark a definite milestone in Philadelphia's musical history, when Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and his Boston Symphony Orchestra will make their customary, yearly appearance at the Academy of Music, in this instance sponsored by the Philadelphia Forum.

This may indeed be Dr. Koussevitzky's last personal appearance in this city, for the end of the present season marks the distinguished conductor's 25th anniversary and final season as musical director of the famed Boston Symphony, whose fabulous reputation he has so faithfully and magnificently sustained. Certainly, this concert will mark his final appearance here with the organization as its permanent conductor. The connection has been one of the most notable in the history of American music.

Sergei Alexandrovitch Koussevitzky was born in Tver, Russia, on July 26, 1874, the son of an itinerant, poor musician. In 1888 he went to Moscow, where he pursued his musical studies, becoming a virtuoso on the double-bass. Completing these studies, he gave many concerts throughout Europe as a virtuoso on this unusual instrument. His inherently fine style and excellent technique commanded deep respect.

In Berlin, he attended classes in conducting under the famous Artur Nikisch, and returning to Russia in 1909, he organized, with the help of his wife's vast fortune, his own orchestra. He gave symphonic concerts in Moscow, St. Petersburg, and, hiring a special steamer, presented innumerable programs up and down the Volga.

Koussevitzky had his troubles with the Russian revolution, but both he and his wife managed to escape to Paris in 1922, where he directed performances of "Boris Godunow" and "Pique Dame" at the Grand Opera. He then founded the "Concerts Koussevitzky," which were given at the Theatre des Champs Elysee, and became the rage of Paris. Anyone who was anybody in the social or artistic world could not afford to be absent from these occasions.

In 1924, Koussevitzky came to America and became the permanent conductor of the Boston Symphony, succeeding Pierre Monteux, who had held the position for a brief period.

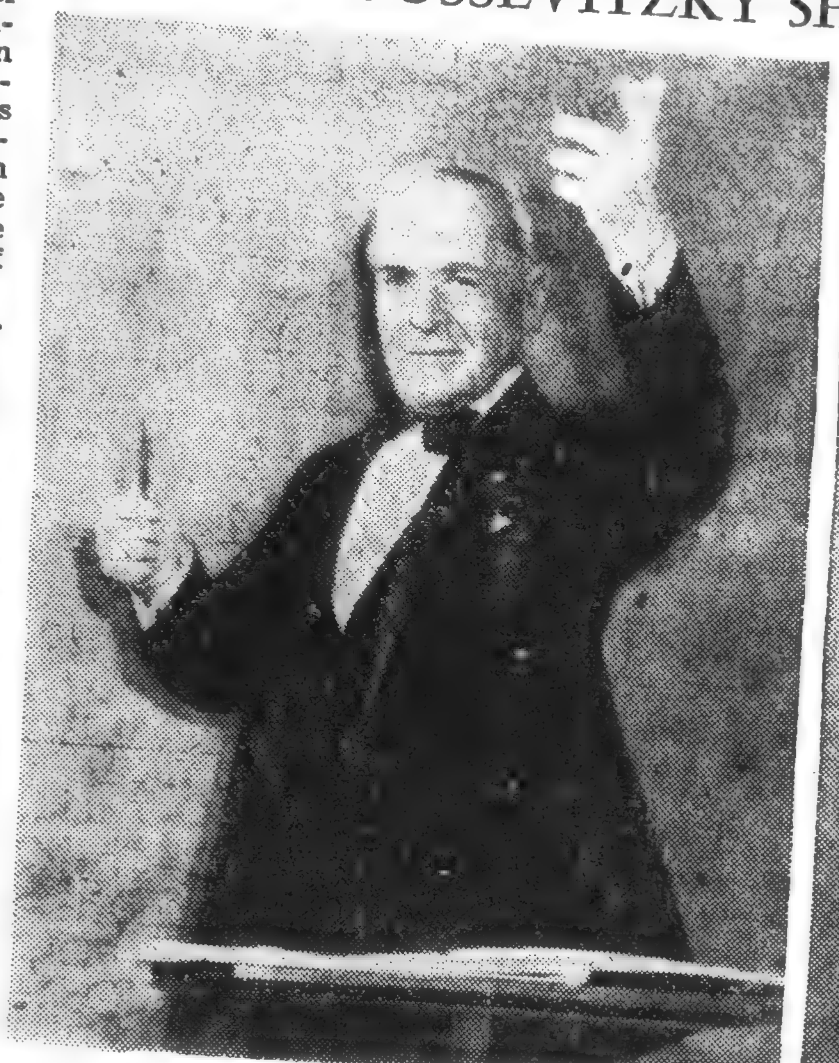
The names of Koussevitzky and Boston Symphony became synonymous, and the orchestra reached the peak of its tonal and technical perfection under the Russian conductor's ever-vigilant direction.

Dr. Koussevitzky will, however, continue his summer activities at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass., where in the Berkshires, he has built up a great musical summer center. He will also retain the leadership of the Koussevitzky Foundation.

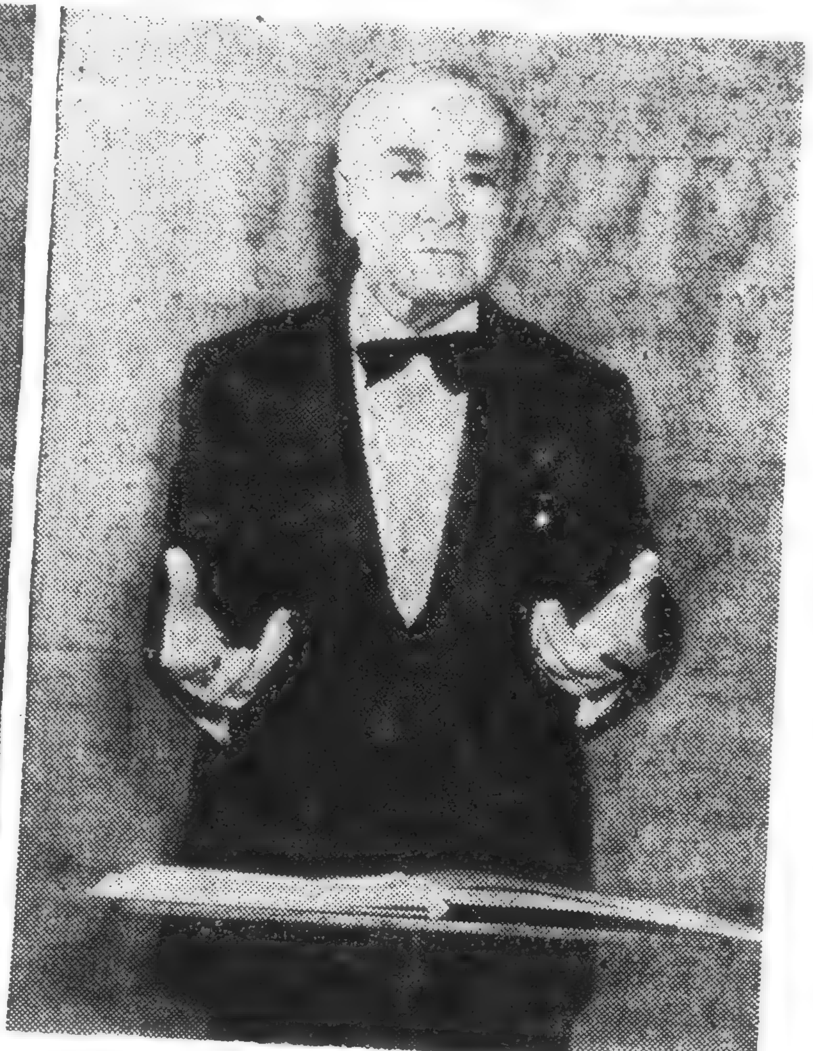
Incidentally, there is no present conductor who has done so much for the American composer and musician. Koussevitzky, when it comes to first performances of American works, leads the field.

It will be a great occasion, and perhaps one tinged with sadness, to welcome the good doctor to the Academy of Music once more next Tuesday evening.

KOUSSEVITZKY SHOWS HIS FORM

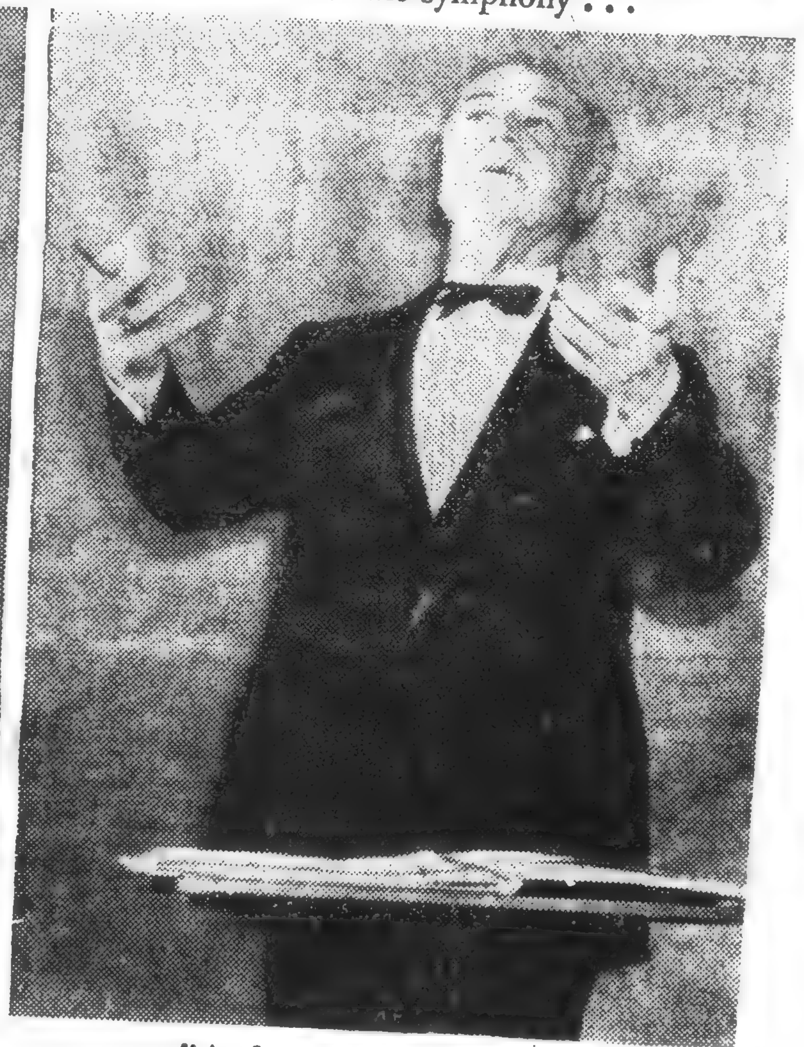


"I want the trombones, forte . . ."



"Crescendo in the symphony . . ."

"Build to the climax . . ."



"And now the finale . . ."

WHITE PLAINS, N. Y.
REPORTER-DISPATCH

[illegible] 1949

Final Auditions Slated For Tanglewood School

Westchester musicians interested in applying for the Tanglewood Summer School are reminded that final auditions for admission to the students' orchestras of the Berkshire Music Center will be held this week in New York by members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who teach at the Center. The Center, which is sponsored by the Boston Symphony, is directed by Serge Koussevitsky, with Aaron Copland as assistant director. This Summer's session, the seventh, will be held from July 4 through Aug 14.

The auditions for orchestral instruments will be held in the Recital Hall of Carnegie Hall as follows: Strings, Wednesday at 10 A.M.; woodwinds, Thursday at 10 A.M.; brass Friday at 10 A.M.; and piano, Friday at 11:30 A.M. Auditions for tympani, percussion and harp will be held backstage at Carnegie Hall on Wednesday at [illegible]

Boris Goldovsky, head of the Opera Department at the Berkshire Music Center, will hold auditions for singers who wish to apply for admission, in the Recital Hall of Carnegie Hall this afternoon. An accompanist will be supplied.

The catalog of the Center and information about the courses may be obtained from Thomas D. Perry, Symphony Hall, Boston 15, Mass.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE

APR 12 1949

Dinner for Koussevitzky

Reservations for the dinner and concert to be given in Serge Koussevitzky's honor under the auspices of the League of Composers on Tuesday night, May 10, at the Waldorf-Astoria Hotel, can be made at Suite 1533, 9 Rockefeller Plaza, New York 20, or by telephoning COlumbus 5-7460. This event marks the completion of twenty-five years by Dr. Koussevitzky as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Both he and Leonard Bernstein, conductor, pianist and composer, will take part in the program. This will include the first performance of excerpts from Marc Blitzstein's opera based on Lillian Hellman's "The Little Foxes." The opera, commissioned by the Koussevitzky Music Foundation, is to be produced in a Broadway theater next fall.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

APR 12 1949

TO HONOR KOUSSEVITZKY

Blitzstein Premiere Highlight of Fete for Conductor

Excerpts from Marc Blitzstein's new opera, "The Little Foxes," will be performed for the first time at the dinner concert in honor of Serge Koussevitzky's silver anniversary as conductor of the Boston Symphony, it was announced yesterday. The event will take place at the Waldorf-Astoria May 10.

Mr. Blitzstein was commissioned to compose the operatic version of Lillian Hellman's play by the Koussevitzky Music Foundation, and it will be produced on Broadway next fall. Reservations for the dinner may be made by calling COlumbus 5-7460.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE

APR 12 1949

Koussevitsky's Final Concert

On Friday evening of this week Serge Koussevitsky will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in its fifth and final Brooklyn concert of the season at the Academy of Music. On a Friday evening in November, 1924, he conducted his first in Brooklyn. That was his first year also with the Boston Symphony. So on Friday of this week he completes 25 years of his leadership of the famous orchestra and of the finest kind of musical contribution to the pleasure of Brooklynites. A quarter of a century of such music as he has brought us is something for which we are deeply grateful to him.

Koussevitsky has fed our sensitivity to delightful sound as no one has since symphony music was first played in this borough, certainly longer than any other musician. And if music shapes the lives of those who hear it—and it cannot help but do so—we are by far the better for his coming here year after year for 25 seasons. We are different people than we would have been without him. And we owe him an immeasurable debt of appreciation.

JOHNSTOWN, PA.
DEMOCRAT

APR 13 1949

Busman's Holiday

Famed Conductor of Boston Symphony Group Will Retire

Critics Hail Koussevitzky Best of Time

—Wide World Photo

Serge Koussevitzky has announced his resignation after 25 years as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, effective at the end of the concert season. Next season he will conduct for the first time in South America. He also will visit in Palestine, Europe and London where he has not conducted for 13 years.

New York, Apr. 12—(AP)—The greatest conductor in our time . . . . incomparable master of string tone . . . . matchless virtuoso . . . . the man who has done the most for American music. . . . .

With such superlatives as these, critics have hailed Serge Koussevitzky in the course of his quarter-century as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra; and it is with such praises ringing in his ears that he has resigned, effective at the end of this concert season.

He explains that, as Boston conductor, "you don't belong to yourself, you don't have the time to breathe, you're not your own man. I don't feel I'm old, or that I'm tired, but I want to have my absolute freedom."

He doesn't look old, though his graying hair is getting thin. With one stray lock of it whipping about as he shakes his head in conversation, he certainly does not act tired. He has a complexion as healthy, and as red, as an American Indian's; his eyes snap. He tramps into the room to meet you with the same stately tread with which he marches from the wings to the podium; but once he sits down and begins to talk, he is as animated as any youngster, thrusting out his arms, counting off points on his fingers, clasping his hands to his chest.

* * *

Since he intends to travel abroad, it looks as though for a time this would be not only Boston's loss but also the country's. Next season he will conduct for the first time in South America; and he will visit Palestine, Europe and London, where he has not conducted for 13 years. In the following season he may accept repeated, and repeatedly rejected, invitations to spend three months in Australia.

The double-bass, his own instrument, which he taught in his native Russia and played all over Europe, had to be given up. "Sometimes I take it out of the case, and then put it back, and the tears come to my eyes," he says.

Though he is leaving Boston, he will remain at Tanglewood, where school and concerts will continue to occupy him about 10 weeks every year. He may teach, he wants to compose, he will start immediately to write his autobiography. The languages he knows are music and Russian, not English, which he speaks only with a decided accent. He will write in Russian, and his wife, who for years was his secretary, will translate, as she has translated his numerous speeches.

* * *

It looks like a busman's holiday. At any rate it will not be so confining as what he does now, when a week's vacation is no different from a week's work. On his last trip to New York, for instance, his schedule was: Monday, conduct in Hartford; Tuesday, conduct in New Haven; Wednesday, conduct here; Thursday, conduct in Newark; Friday, a stolen day of rest, though he listened to records, was photographed, and talked to a reporter, among other things; Saturday, conduct here again; Sunday, attend three meetings.

Then began his week off: Monday, rehearse two glee clubs; Tuesday, ditto; Wednesday, rehearse orchestra; Thursday, rehearse orchestra and clubs; Friday, free; Saturday, general rehearsal; Sunday, conduct the B minor mass for which he had been preparing; it's so long that most audiences, though they're a lot younger than the 74-year-old conductor, have to take it in two parts, and in Boston the first section comes in the afternoon and the second in the evening. Then on the following Monday the conductor went back to work!

* * *

Koussevitzky has programmed nearly 200 American compositions in his 25 years here. "Festivals" of American music such as he presented this winter in Boston and on tour could not have been offered a quarter-century ago, he says unhesitatingly, simply for lack of the music. About that time some of our big conservatories were being founded, and in Koussevitzky's opinion, "the real history of American music began about 25 years ago."

His part in it has been widely acknowledged, and increased recognition is planned. The Boston symphony is selling RCA Victor-made albums of Koussevitzky at the double-bass, recorded 20 years ago, and proceeds will go to the $250,000 Serge Koussevitzky fund newly established by the orchestra's board of trustees. In May the conductor will be feted at a New York banquet and concert sponsored by the League of Composers.

SPRINGFIELD, MO.
LEADER AND PRESS

APR 30 1949

Famed Conductor Puts Down Baton

BOSTON, April 30 — (AP) — Serge Koussevitzky tonight puts down a brilliant baton.

He has lifted it to critical acclaim and devotion from the front rows and gallery for 25 years as conductor of the famed 68-year-old Boston symphony orchestra.

Tonight he makes his farewell appearance as official conductor of Boston symphony before his greatest admirers—the old Bostonians who pass on their symphony seats with their heirlooms and the youngsters who wait in line for the top balcony.

If it's like yesterday afternoon when he gave the same Beethoven program, tonight will be both concert and drama.

The Friday faithful gave him spirited applause—and there were tears on some of the old faces.

This for a man now nearing 75 who as a peasant Russian lad ran away from home because his father would have none of the music the boy kept talking about.

HA RD, CONN.
TIMES

APR 16 1949

Bernstein Work Gets Auspicious Premiere

Special to The Hartford Times

Boston, Mass.—"The Age of Anxiety," a symphony for piano and orchestra by Leonard Bernstein, based on the tortured picture in prose and verses by W. H. Auden, was given an auspicious premiere last week by the Boston Symphony with the composer at the piano.

It might very well be likened to the little girl in the fairy tale with the curl in the middle of her forehead. When it was good, it was very, very good, and when it was bad, it was extremely so. However, it is a work which has haunting quality about it, and the good parts of the "piano symphony" far outnumber those which are not so good.

Mr. Bernstein performed his brain child nobly and with the wonderful freshness of inspiration of a creative artist who had much to say and the excellent technical equipment with which to say it.

* * *

THE ESSENTIAL THEME of the piece is the record of our difficult and problematical search for faith. It is written in two large parts, each containing three small sections.

In Part One, the Prologue introduces three men and a girl in a Third Avenue bar, all of them feeling insecure, clutching at life and drowning their conflicts in drink. They are drawn together by this common urge and begin a sort of forum on the state of man. This entire section consists of a lonely improvisation by two clarinets.

The second section is called The Seven Ages, and this is a series of variations describing the life of man. The four characters are thus engaged in an animated discussion, each seeming to interrupt the other to introduce a new idea.

* * *

A MASQUE finds the group in the girl's apartment, weary, guilty, and determined to keep up the party. Each wants to go home to bed, but is afraid to drop the illusion of having fun. A fantastic sort of jazz is played by the piano and percussion. The orchestra plays four bars of hectic syncopation and then a small piano in the back of the orchestra takes up the jazz theme of the piano in an effort to prolong the illusion, but it vanes in energy as the Epilogue begins.

The Epilogue finds the group exhausted and a feeling of mounting loneliness remains. All at once they throw off the masks and illusions and, in a sudden radiance, accept the situation. To depict this realization of reality, the strings build, with the rest of the orchestra, a stirring crescendo amidst last resounding chords from the piano, a positive statement of the newly recognized faith.

The piano, all through the symphony, is not a character in the story, nor a mere narrator. It is an on looker of life, as one looks at a movie screen. In a sense, however, it takes part in the story, drawing its own conclusions and commenting on what happens.

* * *

IT IS AN UNFORTUNATE thing that in practically all modern music, there is a tendency to introduce odd sound effects. "The Age of Anxiety" is no exception in this respect. However, one can not help but feel that it is a milestone successfully surpassed in present day revolutionary contemporary music.

It is a work with purpose, and it is a purpose of colossal depth, and despite the tremendous and subtle problem it incorporates, it is extremely listenable. The orchestra part is scored with a strange fascination which pulls at one's ears, and the piano, which is the onlooker, plays the role magnificently. As mentioned before, it is a haunting thing.

—F.S.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE

APR 16 1949

Farewell to Koussevitzky

Boston Conductor Is Honored at Concert in Brooklyn

Serge Koussevitzky, who is completing his twenty-fifth and last season as regular conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, bade farewell to its Brooklyn subscribers last night at the Brooklyn Academy of Music. The program, heard by a capacity audience, included Carl Philipp Emanuel Bach's concerto in D for strings; Debussy's "La Mer" and Beethoven's seventh symphony.

Dr. Adrian Van Sinderen, president of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, made a short speech in Dr. Koussevitzky's honor during the intermission, in which he outlined the conductor's distinguished services to music during a career of fifty years and expressed the affection in which he will always be held by his friends at the Academy of Music. Dr. Koussevitzky will make his last Manhattan appearance with the Boston Symphony this afternoon in Carnegie Hall, conducting Beethoven's first and ninth symphonies.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

APR 30 1949

Serge Koussevitzky Says Farewell To Hub Friday Matinee Audience

Tells It 'We Have Worked Together to Create the Greatest Orchestra in World'; Directs Last Boston Symphony Concert Tonight

Boston, Apr. 29.—(AP)—Serge Koussevitzky said farewell to his faithful Friday concert audience today and told it "we have worked together to create the greatest orchestra in the world."

Tomorrow night in Symphony Hall he will direct his last concert as conductor of Boston Symphony Orchestra. He has held the position for a quarter of a century.

This afternoon's program was no sooner concluded than the audience started wholeheartedly to applaud. The orchestra joined in the traditional Boston Symphony way—the string men tapping the backs of their instruments with their bows.

The applause lasted seven minutes before Koussevitzky stayed it with a brief talk.

"I knew it would be hard to separate myself from you, my dear public, and the orchestra," he said. "But lest us be happy that we've had 25 years together. Let us be happy that we have worked together and created the greatest orchestra in the world.

"We have had a tremendous musical evolution in this country.

"We have helped many composers until now we have composers in this country as great as any in the old world today.

"I thank you for your co-operation, your devotion to the orchestra and your confidence in me."

After he finished an informal reception took place.

The Friday matinee audience is a special one at Symphony Hall during the orchestra season. It is composed of many representatives of families which have supported the 68-year-old orchestra since its start.

The program today included Beethoven's first and last symphonies—the first and ninth. It will be repeated Saturday night when Koussevitzky ends his career as conductor here.

His resignation was presented to the orchestra trustees two years ago. They selected Charles Muench, conductor of the Paris Conservatory orchestra, as his successor.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
JOURNAL AMERICAN

APR 14 1949

Koussevitzky At Carnegie

By MILES KASTENDIECK

Koussevitzky turned to Beethoven's Ninth Symphony for his swan song as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The first of two performances took place in Carnegie Hall last night. The other is scheduled for tomorrow afternoon. Charged with all the emotion of the occasion, the event was inevitably a memorable one.

The greatness of Koussevitzky, of the Boston Symphony, and of Beethoven stood out each in its respective way. They had as allies Frances Yeend, soprano; Eunice Alberts, contralto; David Lloyd, tenor, and James Pease, bass, and a joint choir of the Juilliard Chorus and the Collegiate Chorale.

The chorus stole the show. It was magnificent. With its jubilant singing the performances ended in a blaze of tonal glory. Koussevitzky pronounced the benediction of his conductoral career with a beautifully molded interpretation of the adagio in which the orchestra excelled itself.

It took two movements to work up the performance. The opening called for more bite than the refined playing of the orchestra could produce, no matter how Koussevitzky admonished them to give their all. That clarity and precision so characteristic of both orchestra and conductor brought the scherzo into line. Then came the adagio and the finale.

Seldom has the choral finale justified itself as it did in this performance. The soloists coped quite adequately with their problems. The chorus had a variety of tone color and of volume that was singularly impressive.

The First Symphony prefaced the Ninth. The performance was more than customarily neat and brisk.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE

APR 15

Rutgers Honors Koussevitzky

Special to the Herald Tribune

NEW BRUNSWICK, N. J., April 14.—The Rutgers University Award was presented here tonight to Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, retiring conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, upon the conclusion of its thirteenth appearance on the campus of the state university. The award was for "significant participation in the musical life of the university."

[279]

take place.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
SUN

APR 14 1949

The Music Makers

By IRVING KOLODIN

Koussevitzky Bids Farewell in Beethoven Ninth.

IRVING KOLODIN

Serge Koussevitzky kept a rendezvous with destiny last night in Carnegie Hall, conducting the Boston Symphony for the last time before the audience which had first greeted him here twenty-five years ago. They honored him by rising when he entered; but there was nothing honorary in the prolonged tribute that followed his playing of the "Choral" symphony of Beethoven. This was memorable work in any setting; in the demanding conditions of this one, it was a triumph of will, learning and discipline.

As often as he ventured this considerable task—and it has been more than infrequently—Koussevitzky has rarely been so wholly in the spirit of it as he was last night. One has had the feeling sometimes in the past that he was buffeted by its driving power and elusive lyricism, reaching for a ritard here, an accelerando there to provide a foothold from which to master the next crag. But here the progress was sustained from the base to the summit onto the plateau from which Beethoven saw a vista which humanity is yet to achieve—peace in brotherhood.

There are, of course, various ways of playing Beethoven, many of them defensible. But there is one which is unchallengeable: the way of devotion to the letter of the score to which Koussevitzky adhered in this performance. Thus the composer's conception emerged in all its monumental symmetry and proportion, a corpus whose like has yet to be duplicated.

Of the spirit, there was very much too, especially in the incomparable adagio, the more effective for the slight understatement of its overpowering eloquence. For a technical detail, it might be noted that Roman Szulc, the orchestra's fine tympanist, had his instrument in a position where the primordial rhythms of the scherzo could be given ultimate prominence without abusing either the ear or the balance. The orchestra suffered somewhat from being crowded together, but it performed magnificently.

The youthful choir of Juilliard students and Collegiate Chorale members (trained by Robert Shaw) gave lusty, as well as resonant, voice to the setting of Schiller's "Ode"; and the solo quartet (equally youthful) was beyond reproach till that final ecstatic outburst ("poco adagio"), which is treacherous for any quartet. The strong voices of Frances Yeend, soprano, and James Pease, baritone, provided an appropriate frame for Eunice Alberts, contralto, and David Lloyd, tenor, who, if less strong, were no less skillful.

What may be said about the wisdom of intruding two performances of this ponderable work into a week in which three others by the Philharmonic were scheduled many months ago, has been said. It may be added, now, that Koussevitzky left with us a concept of this work enormously to his credit, and no less to Beethoven's. The evening began with the first symphony, conceived in a spirit of lightness and delicacy. In all, as ceremonials go, this was one at a high tide of accomplishment for all.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE

APR 15 1949

CONCERT AND RECITAL

* * *

By Jerome D. Bohm

The Bostonians

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, concert in Carnegie Hall Wednesday night with the assistance of the Juilliard Chorus and the Collegiate Chorale, prepared by Robert Shaw and Frances Yeend, soprano; Eunice Alberts, contralto; David Lloyd, tenor, and James Pease, bass. The program:

Symphonies Nos. 1 and 9............Beethoven

Serge Koussevitzky could not have chosen a more appropriate work than Beethoven's Ninth Symphony for his final appearances here with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The first of these two concerts, given in Carnegie Hall Wednesday night (the last one will take place on Saturday afternoon) found both the distinguished conductor and his wonderful aggregation of musicians in their finest form. Mr. Koussevitzky, it is safe to say, has never given a better account of his abilities; nor has his orchestra ever, it is equally unhazardous to relate, carried out his desires more zealously and with more rewarding results. The subscription audience, which as usual occupied every seat and most of which stood up to greet the conductor upon his first entrance, will surely count the evening among the most memorable in its experience.

Mr. Koussevitzky brought to his discourse unfailing musical perceptiveness, eliciting not only sounds of incomparable sensuousness and at times overwhelming majesty from his players, but conveying every facet of the music's inherent contents with a blend of magisterial poise and incandescent intensity which made for an unforgettable revelation of Beethoven's mightiest creation. This listener, to his great regret, was unable to remain to hear the entire chorale finale. The concert began ten minutes late, and the Ninth Symphony itself followed the First, which opened the concert, only after an intermission of twenty-five minutes. What he was able to hear of it was highly impressive and gave indication that it would bring the work to an appositely triumphant close.

The First Symphony, too, was accorded a telling traversal. The sounds with which it was invested had the gleaming transparency peculiar to this orchestra, and Mr. Koussevitzky's interpretation was brimming in rhythmic and musical vitality. Its youthful effervescence provided an effective contrast to the far more profound, mature utterances of the Ninth Symphony, for which it was, so to speak, the curtain raiser.

OTTAWA, CANADA
CITIZEN

APR 14 1949

Auditions For Music Students

Auditions for students who wish to attend the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood, Massachusetts, this summer, will be held in Toronto next Tuesday, April 19.

Howard Shanet, a member of the faculty at this advanced music school established by Serge Koussevitsky, will be at the Royal Conservatory of Music, 135 College street, Toronto, at 10 a.m. on Tuesday to interview students. The summer session at the Music Center lasts six weeks, from July 4 to August 14 and provides an opportunity for study in connection with the Berkshire Festival concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

PAWTUCKET, R. I.
TIMES

APR 15 1949

Rutgers Honor To Koussevitsky

NEW BRUNSWICK, N. J. (UP)—Serge Koussevitsky, retiring conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, held the Rutgers University award today for "significant participation in the musical life of the university."

Koussevitsky, who received an honorary doctor of music degree from the college in 1937, was presented the award last night at a concert in the university gymnasium. The award, an inscribed bronze medal, was presented by Dr. F. Marmaduke Potter, university trustee.

The conductor and his orchestra have presented 13 concerts in New Brunswick during the 33 years since the Rutgers Concert Series began. A capacity crowd of more than 3000 heard the orchestra play under Koussevitsky's baton for the last time here.

WATERBURY, CONN.
AMERICAN

APR 15 1949

Koussevitsky Given Award

New Brunswick, N. J., April 15 —(UP)— Serge Koussevitsky, retiring conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, held the Rutgers University award today for "significant participation in the musical life of the university."

Koussevitsky, who received an honorary doctor of music degree from the college in 1937, was presented the award last night at a concert in the university gymnasium. The award, an inscribed bronze medal, was presented by Dr. F. Marmaduke Potter, university trustee.

The conductor and his orchestra have presented 13 concerts in New Brunswick during the 33 years since the Rutgers concert series began. A capacity crowd of more than 3,000 heard the orchestra play under Koussevitsky's baton for the last time here.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
WORLD-TELEGRAM

APR 15 1949

Koussevitsky Honored

Special to the World-Telegram.

NEW BRUNSWICK, N. J., April 15.—The Rutgers University Award was presented to Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at a concert in the Rutgers gymnasium last night. It was the 13th concert presented here by Dr. Koussevitsky and the orchestra.

KOUSSEVITSKY CONDUCTS FINAL CONCERT IN R. I.

Boston Symphony Conductor Gets Citation From Brown, $6,462 Check For Fund

Serge Koussevitsky, making his last appearance Tuesday night as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra before a Providence audience prior, to his retirement from that post at the close of the present season, after 25 years, was presented a citation from Brown University, made by Henry M. Wriston, president.

He also received a $6,462 check for the Serge Koussevitsky Anniversary Fund, presented by John Nicholas Brown of this city. The check was the gift of Rhode Island contributors to the fund.

A capacity crowd filled the Metropolitan Theatre for the final concert by the distinguished conductor, and applauded with enthusiasm, both for the presentations and the concert.

The citation read in part, "Few men can truly be called citizens of the world. Fairly to earn that title requires a happy combination of circumstance, talent, and imagination; moreover only an adventurous spirit could carry a man from Imperialist Russia through all the capitals of Europe and then to America, here to crown long preparation and high achievement with a distinguished leadership. . . . Your lifetime of artistic experience, shared with so many peoples, has been joined with remarkably gifted interpretations of music—as diverse as the communities within which it has been played.

"Because your skill, your aesthetic integrity, and your devotion to the public interest hav brought you to a unique positi we delight to honor you."

NEW YORK, N. Y.
SUN

APR 15 1949

Serge Koussevitzky's Farewell Appearance.

Tonight in the Academy of Music and tomorrow afternoon in Carnegie Hall, New Yorkers will have a final opportunity to honor as musical director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, a distinguished gentleman whose visits have graced our musical life for a quarter century. Serge Koussevitzky's first question on arriving in the United States to take over the direction of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was, "Who are your American composers?" There would be much less hesitation about an answer now than there was then; and for this wider knowledge, Koussevitzky himself has been largely responsible. We wish him well in the ease he has won after arduous service; and trust that the new phase of his career will still include an occasional visit to Fifty-seventh street. He will always be welcome.

TUCSON, ARIZ.
CITIZEN

APR 30 1949

Serge Koussevitzky Will Direct His Own Swan Song In Boston Concert Saturday

BOSTON, Apr. 30. (AP)—Serge Koussevitzky, who once turned himself into a symphonic Volga boatman because he wanted people to hear music, Saturday night puts down a brilliant baton.

He has lifted it to critical acclaim and devotion from the front rows and gallery for 25 years as conductor of the famed 68-year-old Boston symphony orchestra.

Saturday night he makes his farewell appearance as official conductor of Boston symphony before his greatest admirers—the old Bostonians who pass on their symphony seats with their heirlooms and the youngsters who wait in line for the top balcony.

If it's like Friday afternoon when he gave the same Beethoven program, Saturday night will be both concert and drama.

The Friday faithful gave him spirited applause—and there were tears on some of the old faces.

This for a man now nearing 75 who as a peasant Russian lad ran away from home because his father would have none of the music the boy kept talking about.

Penniless in Moscow, the lad begged for lessons. He did it with so much spirit that the dignified faculty of the Philharmonic school took him in.

That was the overture to a career famous in Europe and America not only for artistry with an orchestra but for help and friendship to new music and new musicians.

Most recently, Koussevitzky has helped the careers of the young American conductor, Leonard Bernstein and the Brazilian, Eleazar de Carvalho.

During his early days in Russia he chartered a steamer to carry his orchestra many miles along the Volga river, bringing to Russian villages their first symphony concerts.

[280]

NEW YORK, N. Y.
SUN

APR 14 1949

The Music Makers

By IRVING KOLODIN

Koussevitzky Bids Farewell in Beethoven Ninth.

Serge Koussevitzky kept a rendezvous with destiny last night in Carnegie Hall, conducting the Boston Symphony for the last time before the audience which had first greeted him here twenty-five years ago. They honored him by rising when he entered; but there was nothing honorary in the prolonged tribute that followed his playing of the "Choral" symphony of Beethoven. This was memorable work in any setting; in the demanding conditions of this one, it was a triumph of will, learning and discipline.

IRVING KOLODIN

As often as he ventured this considerable task—and it has been more than infrequently—Koussevitzky has rarely been so wholly in the spirit of it as he was last night. One has had the feeling sometimes in the past that he was buffeted by its driving power and elusive lyricism, reaching for a ritard here, an accelerando there to provide a foothold from which to master the next crag. But here the progress was sustained from the base to the summit onto the plateau from which Beethoven saw a vista which humanity is yet to achieve—peace in brotherhood.

There are, of course, various ways of playing Beethoven, many of them defensible. But there is one which is unchallengeable: the way of devotion to the letter of the score to which Koussevitzky adhered in this performance. Thus the composer's conception emerged in all its monumental symmetry and proportion, a corpus whose like has yet to be duplicated.

Of the spirit, there was very much too, especially in the incomparable adagio, the more effective for the slight understatement of its overpowering eloquence. For a technical detail, it might be noted that Roman Szulc, the orchestra's fine tympanist, had his instrument in a position where the primordial rhythms of the scherzo could be given ultimate prominence without abusing either the ear or the balance. The orchestra suffered somewhat from being crowded together, but it performed magnificently.

The youthful choir of Juilliard students and Collegiate Chorale members (trained by Robert Shaw) gave lusty, as well as resonant, voice to the setting of Schiller's "Ode"; and the solo quartet (equally youthful) was beyond reproach till that final ecstatic outburst ("poco adagio"), which is treacherous for any quartet. The strong voices of Frances Yeend, soprano, and James Pease, baritone, provided an appropriate frame for Eunice Alberts, contralto, and David Lloyd, tenor, who, if less strong, were no less skillful.

What may be said about the wisdom of intruding two performances of this ponderable work into a week in which three others by the Philharmonic were scheduled many months ago, has been said. It may be added, now, that Koussevitzky left with us a concept of this work enormously to his credit, and no less to Beethoven's. The evening began with the first symphony, conceived in a spirit of lightness and delicacy. In all, as ceremonials go, this was one at a high tide of accomplishment for all.

OTTAWA, CANADA
CITIZEN

APR 14 1949

Auditions For Music Students

Auditions for students who wish to attend the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood, Massachusetts, this summer, will be held in Toronto next Tuesday, April 19.

Howard Shanet, a member of the faculty at this advanced music school established by Serge Koussevitzky, will be at the Royal Conservatory of Music, 135 College street, Toronto, at 10 a.m. on Tuesday to interview students. The summer session at the Music Center lasts six weeks, from July 4 to August 14 and provides an opportunity for study in connection with the Berkshire Festival concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

PAWTUCKET, R. I.
TIMES

APR 15 1949

Rutgers Honor To Koussevitsky

NEW BRUNSWICK, N. J. (UP)—Serge Koussevitsky, retiring conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, held the Rutgers University award today for "significant participation in the musical life of the university."

Koussevitsky, who received an honorary doctor of music degree from the college in 1937, was presented the award last night at a concert in the university gymnasium. The award, an inscribed bronze medal, was presented by Dr. F. Marmaduke Potter, university trustee.

The conductor and his orchestra have presented 13 concerts in New Brunswick during the 33 years since the Rutgers Concert Series began. A capacity crowd of more than 3000 heard the orchestra play under Koussevitsky's baton for the last time here.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
SUN

APR 15 1949

Serge Koussevitzky's Farewell Appearance.

Tonight in the Academy of Music and tomorrow afternoon in Carnegie Hall, New Yorkers will have a final opportunity to honor as musical director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, a distinguished gentleman whose visits have graced our musical life for a quarter century. Serge Koussevitzky's first question on arriving in the United States to take over the direction of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was, "Who are your American composers?" There would be much less hesitation about an answer now than there was then; and for this wider knowledge, Koussevitzky himself has been largely responsible. We wish him well in the ease he has won after arduous service; and trust that the new phase of his career will still include an occasional visit to Fifty-seventh street. He will always be welcome.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE

APR 15 1949

CONCERT AND RECITAL

* * *

By Jerome D. Bohm

The Bostonians

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, concert in Carnegie Hall Wednesday night with the assistance of the Juilliard Chorus and the Collegiate Chorale, prepared by Robert Shaw and Frances Yeend, soprano; Eunice Alberts, contralto; David Lloyd, tenor, and James Pease, bass. The program:

Symphonies Nos. 1 and 9............Beethoven

Serge Koussevitzky could not have chosen a more appropriate work than Beethoven's Ninth Symphony for his final appearances here with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The first of these two concerts, given in Carnegie Hall Wednesday night (the last one will take place on Saturday afternoon) found both the distinguished conductor and his wonderful aggregation of musicians in their finest form. Mr. Koussevitzky, it is safe to say, has never given a better account of his abilities; nor has his orchestra ever, it is equally unhazardous to relate, carried out his desires more zealously and with more rewarding results. The subscription audience, which as usual occupied every seat and most of which stood up to greet the conductor upon his first entrance, will surely count the evening among the most memorable in its experience.

Mr. Koussevitzky brought to his discourse unfailing musical perceptiveness, eliciting not only sounds of incomparable sensuousness and at times overwhelming majesty from his players, but conveying every facet of the music's inherent contents with a blend of magisterial poise and incandescent intensity which made for an unforgettable revelation of Beethoven's mightiest creation. This listener, to his great regret, was unable to remain to hear the entire chorale finale. The concert began ten minutes late, and the Ninth Symphony itself followed the First, which opened the concert, only after an intermission of twenty-five minutes. What he was able to hear of it was highly impressive and gave indication that it would bring the work to an appositely triumphant close.

The First Symphony, too, was accorded a telling traversal. The sounds with which it was invested had the gleaming transparency peculiar to this orchestra, and Mr. Koussevitzky's interpretation was brimming in rhythmic and musical vitality. Its youthful effervescence provided an effective contrast to the far more profound, mature utterances of the Ninth Symphony, for which it was, so to speak, the curtain raiser.

WATERBURY, CONN.
AMERICAN

APR 15 1949

Koussevitsky Given Award

New Brunswick, N. J., April 15 —(UP)— Serge Koussevitsky, retiring conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, held the Rutgers University award today for "significant participation in the musical life of the university."

Koussevitsky, who received an honorary doctor of music degree from the college in 1937, was presented the award last night at a concert in the university gymnasium. The award, an inscribed bronze medal, was presented by Dr. F. Marmaduke Potter, university trustee.

The conductor and his orchestra have presented 13 concerts in New Brunswick during the 33 years since the Rutgers concert series began. A capacity crowd of more than 3,000 heard the orchestra play under Koussevitsky's baton for the last time here.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
WORLD-TELEGRAM

APR 15 1949

Koussevitsky Honored

Special to the World-Telegram.

NEW BRUNSWICK, N. J., April 15.—The Rutgers University Award was presented to Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at a concert in the Rutgers gymnasium last night. It was the 13th concert presented here by Dr. Koussevitsky and the orchestra.

KOUSSEVITSKY CONDUCTS FINAL CONCERT IN R. I.

Boston Symphony Conductor Gets Citation From Brown, $6,462 Check For Fund

Serge Koussevitsky, making his last appearance Tuesday night as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra before a Providence audience prior, to his retirement from that post at the close of the present season, after 25 years, was presented a citation from Brown University, made by Henry M. Wriston, president.

He also received a $6,462 check for the Serge Koussevitsky Anniversary Fund, presented by John Nicholas Brown of this city. The check was the gift of Rhode Island contributors to the fund.

A capacity crowd filled the Metropolitan Theatre for the final concert by the distinguished conductor, and applauded with enthusiasm, both for the presentations and the concert.

The citation read in part, "Few men can truly be called citizens of the world. Fairly to earn that title requires a happy combination of circumstance, talent, and imagination; moreover only an adventurous spirit could carry a man from Imperialist Russia through all the capitals of Europe and then to America, here to crown long preparation and high achievement with a distinguished leadership. . . . Your lifetime of artistic experience, shared with so many peoples, has been joined with remarkably gifted interpretations of music—as diverse as the communities within which it has been played.

"Because your skill, your aesthetic integrity, and your devotion to the public interest have brought you to a unique position, we delight to honor you."

TUCSON, ARIZ.
CITIZEN

APR 30 1949

Serge Koussevitzky Will Direct His Own Swan Song In Boston Concert Saturday

BOSTON, Apr. 30. (AP)—Serge Koussevitzky, who once turned himself into a symphonic Volga boatman because he wanted people to hear music, Saturday night puts down a brilliant baton.

He has lifted it to critical acclaim and devotion from the front rows and gallery for 25 years as conductor of the famed 68-year-old Boston symphony orchestra.

Saturday night he makes his farewell appearance as official conductor of Boston symphony before his greatest admirers—the old Bostonians who pass on their symphony seats with their heirlooms and the youngsters who wait in line for the top balcony.

If it's like Friday afternoon when he gave the same Beethoven program, Saturday night will be both concert and drama.

The Friday faithful gave him spirited applause—and there were tears on some of the old faces.

This for a man now nearing 75 who as a peasant Russian lad ran away from home because his father would have none of the music the boy kept talking about.

Penniless in Moscow, the lad begged for lessons. He did it with so much spirit that the dignified faculty of the Philharmonic school took him in.

That was the overture to a career famous in Europe and America not only for artistry with an orchestra but for help and friendship to new music and new musicians.

Most recently, Koussevitzky has helped the careers of the young American conductor, Leonard Bernstein and the Brazilian, Eleazar de Carvalho.

During his early days in Russia he chartered a steamer to carry his orchestra many miles along the Volga river, bringing to Russian villages their first symphony concerts.

[280]

LOUISVILLE, KY.
COURIER-JOURNAL
APR 10 1949

Koussevitzky Is Quitting— For More Work

By W. G. ROGERS
Associated Press Writer

Associated Press photo

Serge Koussevitzky has announced his resignation after 25 years as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, effective at this season's end.

NEW YORK, April 9.—The greatest conductor in our time . . . incomparable master of string tone . . . matchless virtuoso . . . the man who has done the most for American music . . .

With such superlatives as these, critics have hailed Serge Koussevitzky in the course of his quarter of a century as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra; and it is with such praises ringing in his ears that he has resigned, effective at the end of this concert season.

He explains that, as Boston conductor, "you don't belong to yourself; you don't have the time to breathe; you're not your own man. I don't feel I'm old, or that I'm tired; but I want to have my absolute freedom."

He doesn't look old, though his graying hair is getting thin. With one stray lock of it whipping about as he shakes his head in conversation, he certainly does not act tired. He has a complexion as healthy, and as red, as an American Indian's. His eyes snap. He tramps into the room to meet you with the same stately tread with which he marches from the wings to the podium; but once he sits down and begins to talk, he is as animated as any youngster, thrusting out his arms, counting off points on his fingers, clasping his hands to his chest.

He'll Go Abroad

Since he intends to travel abroad, it looks as though for a time this would be not only Boston's loss, but also the country's. Next season, he will conduct for the first time in South America; and he will visit Palestine, Europe and London, where he has not conducted for 13 years. In the following season, he may accept repeated, and repeatedly rejected, invitations to spend three months in Australia.

The double-bass, his own instrument, which he taught in his native Russia and played throughout Europe, has had to be given up. "Sometimes I take it out of the case, and then put it back, and the tears come to my eyes," he says.

Though he is leaving Boston, he will remain at Tanglewood, where school and concerts will continue to occupy him about 10 weeks every year. He may teach; he wants to compose; he will start immediately to write his autobiography. The languages he knows are music and Russian, not English, which he speaks only with a decided accent. He will write in Russian; and his wife, who for years was his secretary, will translate, as she has translated his numerous speeches.

It looks like a busman's holiday. At any rate, it will not be so confining as what he does now, when a week's vacation is no different from a week's work. On his last trip to New York, for instance, his schedule was: Monday, conduct in Hartford; Tuesday, conduct in New Haven; Wednesday, conduct here; Thursday, conduct in Newark; Friday, a stolen day of rest, though he listened to records, was photographed, and talked to a reporter, among other things; Saturday, conduct here again; Sunday, attend three meetings.

Then began his week off: Monday, rehearse two glee clubs; Tuesday, ditto; Wednesday, rehearse orchestra; Thursday, rehearse orchestra and clubs; Friday, free; Saturday, general rehearsal; Sunday, conduct the B-minor Mass, for which he had been preparing. It's so long that most audiences, though they're a lot younger than the 74-year-old conductor, have to take it in two parts; and in Boston, the first section comes in the afternoon and the second in the evening. Then, on the following Monday, the conductor went back to work!

Koussevitzky has programmed nearly 200 American compositions in his 25 years here. "Festivals" of American music such as he presented last winter in Boston and on tour could not have been offered 25 years ago, he says unhesitatingly, simply for lack of the music. About that time, some of our big conservatories were being founded; and, in Koussevitzky's opinion, "the real history of American music began about 25 years ago."

His part in it has been widely acknowledged, and increased recognition is planned. The Boston Symphony is selling R.C.A.-Victor albums of Koussevitzky at the double-bass, recorded 20 years ago, and proceeds will go to the $250,000 Serge Koussevitzky Fund newly established by the orchestra's board of trustees. In May, the conductor will be feted at a New York banquet and concert sponsored by the league of composers.

In the World Of Music

The 12th annual Berkshire Festival will open at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass., on July 16, the Boston Symphony Orchestra announces. The festival will climax the 25th season of Serge Koussevitzky as conductor of the orchestra.

Nine concerts will be given in the Tanglewood music shed, through three weekends, on Thursday evenings, Saturday evenings, and Sunday afternoons. The guest conductors of the festival will be Leonard Bernstein and Eleazar de Carvalho. Soloists will be announced.

Before the concerts in the large music shed by the full orchestra Dr. Koussevitzky will conduct four concerts by a smaller orchestra in the intimate theater-concert hall. These concerts will be given on the Saturday evening and Sunday afternoon of two weekends, July 16-17, and July 23-24. Two different programs will be given each weekend. They will be drawn from the music of Bach and Mozart, as in previous seasons, and this year music of Haydn and Schubert will be added.

In connection with the Koussevitzky anniversary, the Boston Orchestra has arranged with RCA Victor to distribute a souvenir album of double bass recordings made by Dr. Koussevitzky in 1929, when he played for the last time the instrument which first brought him fame. The album, containing three vinylite records, will be sold for $10 each. All proceeds will go to the Koussevitzky anniversary fund of the orchestra.

Plans for the third international festival of music and drama at Edinburgh, Scotland, from Aug. 21 to Sept. 11, are rapidly taking shape.

Seven internationally-known orchestras under leading conductors are scheduled. They include the Orchestre de la Suisse Romande under its conductor and founder, Ernest Ansermet, and the Royal Philharmonic Orchestra under Sir Thomas Beecham.

There will be outstanding musicians, soloists, choirs and ballet dancers.

Walter Sharp, president of the Nashville Civic Music Association announced that the three-year-old Nashville Symphony will present all of Beethoven's nine symphonies in its 1949-1950 season.

Berkshire Center to Have Six-Week Summer Session

The Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood in Lenox, Mass. wil have a six-week session this summer, July 4 to Aug. 14, and within this period will be the Berkshire Festival concerts, July 16 to Aug. 14, climaxing Dr. Serge Koussevitzky's 25th anniversary season as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and since it was founded in 1940, director of the center.

Aaron Copland, outstanding American composer, will serve as assistant director under Dr. Koussevitsky and will direct the composition department with Oliver Messiaen, Paris, as a member of his staff. Gregor Piatigorsky, in charge of chamber music, will be assisted by members of the Juilliard String Quartet.

In orchestra and choral conducting, Dr. Koussevitsky will be assisted by Leonard Bernstein, Richard Burgin and Eleazar de Carvalho, with Hugh Ross replacing Robert Shaw, choral conductor on leave of absence. Boris Goldovsky will direct opera productions, of which there will be three. Twenty-five members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will take part in the center program.

In the regular Berkshire Festival, the full Boston Symphony will give nine concerts in the music shed through three weekends, with Mr. Bernstein and Mr. De Carvalho as guest conductors with Dr. Koussevitsky. Before this, Dr. Koussevitsky will conduct the smaller orchestra in four concerts in two repeated programs in the concert hall, featuring work of Bach, Mozart, Haydn and Schubert, July 16 and 17 and July 23 and 24.

Vigorous Dr. Koussevitzky.

The ability of Dr. Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to maintain his vigor on the podium at the age of 75, has evoked numerous tributes from the press.

The famous leader makes his last Hartford appearance as regular Boston conductor at the Bushnell Memorial Monday evening, March 14 in the fourth event of the Bushnell Symphony Series.

Typical of the acclaim which he has been receiving on the eve of his retirement is the following excerpt from a recent review of a Boston Symphony concert by Rudolph Elie in the Boston Herald:—

"His was, in the first place, an incredible physical performance. A man of 75, conducting an orchestra of 110 men with all the vigor, the control, the energy and his years endurance of an athlete half his years. How is this possible? Because of a creative spirit so intense there is no such thing as weariness? Because of an impulse to communicate the musical vision he knows within himself so boundless there is no such thing as physical barrier? I don't know, but it is a source of endless wonder and mystery to me."

TACOMA, WASH.
NEWS-TRIBUNE
APR 17 1949

Schedule For Tanglewood Is Announced

BOSTON, April 16.—The Boston Symphony orchestra programs for the Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood in Lenox, Mass., next summer were announced this week by Serge Koussevitzy, now completing his last season as the orchestra's conductor.

The concerts in the shed will open July 28 with the Siloti arrangement of Vivaldi's Concerto for Orchestra, Strauss' "Death and Transfiguration," and Brahms' Symphony No. 2. On July 30 Dr. Koussevitzky will commemorate the 200th anniversary of the birth of Goethe with Beethoven's overture to Goethe's "Egmont," and Liszt's "Faust Symphony." Beethoven's Fourth Piano Concerto with Claudio Arrau as soloist will be played on this program. On July 31, Leonard Bernstein will conduct Schumann's overture to "Manfred" and Fourth Symphony, and Stravinsky's "Rite of Spring."

The second week of concerts will begin Aug. 4, with a Tchaikovsky program including the String Serenade, the Violin Concerto with Jascha Heifetz as soloist, and the Fourth Symphony. On Aug. 6 Dr. Koussevitzky will present Roussel's Suite in F; Milhaud's First Cello Concerto with Gregor Piatigorsky as soloist; "L'Ascension" by Messiaen, and the symphony by Cesar Franck. On Aug. 7, Eleazar de Carvalho will be guest conductor for William Schuman's Symphony for Strings, "Mandu-carara by Villa-Lobos, and Strauss' "Thus Spake Zarathustra."

The third week of concerts will open Aug. 11, with Leonard Bernstein as guest presenting Schubert's Fourth Symphony (Tragic) and the Seventh Symphony by Shostakovitch. On Aug. 13, Dr. Koussevitzy will present a first public performance of symphony with chorus which Benjamin Britten has just completed and Haydn's Symphony in G major. Koussevitzky's closing program on Aug. 14 will consist of the Orchestra Concerto of C. P. E. Bach, Copland's "Quiet City," Debussy's "The Sea," and Beethoven's Fifth Symphony.

R. I. People Honor Dr. Koussevitzky

Retiring Hub Conductor Touched By Tribute At Final Concert

PROVIDENCE — Serge Koussevitzky, who retires at the end of the current season as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, after 25 years of service, was honored last night during an appearance of the orchestra at Metropolitan Theatre.

John Nicholas Brown of Newport, assistant secretary of the Navy for Air, presented Dr. Koussevitzky with a gift of $6462 from 258 Rhode Island contributors to the Serge Koussevitzky Anniversary Fund. Mr. Brown a trustee of the orchestra, next introduced Dr. Henry M. Wriston, president of Brown University, who gave the conductor a citation from the University which in 1926 conferred the honorary degree of Doctor of Music on Dr. Koussevitzky.

Dr. Koussevitzky was visibly affected by the show of esteem as he stood before a capacity audience of devoted admirers and said:

"Ladies and gentlemen, just 23 years ago I received from Brown University the first recognition of my work. I have again received from Providence, from Brown, from my friends here. With my audiences in Providence, I was always happy. Here is a people that understand music is spiritual food, without which we cannot live, just as we cannot live without bread. I thank you."

Mr. Brown, speaking of the "musical bounty" which the citizens of Rhode Island have received from the orchestra, said: "We have come to realize that the dear perfection which you create is based upon your own immeasurable artistic integrity. These dollars are not enough, for they are material. Our truest gifts to you are appreciation and the good wishes for long life and happiness which comes from the hearts of a grateful Providence."

created the greatest world.

chestra, as his successor.

NEW BRUNSWICK, N. J.
HOME NEWS

APR 15 1949

NOTED SYMPHONY CONDUCTOR HONORED HERE

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, accepts a Rutgers University award from F. Marmaduke Potter, who made the presentation in the absence of Dr. Robert C. Clothier, who by coincidence was in Boston.

Koussevitzky Receives Rutgers Award to Mark Final Appearance

3,000 Attend Concert by Boston Symphony as Famed Conductor Retires From Organization

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, retiring conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was presented with the Rutgers University Award last night as the orchestra completed its 13th appearance on the campus.

Dr. Koussevitzky, who had received an honorary doctor of music from the university in 1937, was given the Rutgers University Award for "significant participation in the musical life of the university."

This was inscribed on the bronze medal, symbolic of the award, which was presented to the conductor by Dr. F. Marmaduke Potter, a trustee of the university and secretary of the Board of Foreign Missions of the Reformed Church of America.

Dr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra have presented 13 concerts in New Brunswick during the 33 years since the Rutgers concert series began and its appearance here was an eagerly awaited event on the musical calendar of the university and the community. The Boston musical organization has appeared more times on the Rutgers concert series stage than any of the world-famous groups which have taken part in the series.

3,000 Attend Concert

As usual, the Rutgers University gymnasium, site of the concert, was filled to capacity with more than 3,000 persons, including students and the faculty of the university and music lovers from New Brunswick and vicinity.

In presenting the award, Dr. Potter, who represented Dr. Robert C. Clothier, president of the university, who was out of town, recalled the conferring of the honorary degree upon Dr. Koussevitzky at the conclusion of another concert here on March 30, 1937, and read the citation which accompanied that degree.

"We cannot let this event pass," Dr. Potter declared, "without expressing again to Dr. Koussevitzky our deep appreciation of the rich contribution he has made over the years to the musical heritage of Rutgers, and thank him for the inspiration which he has conferred—and L use the word advisedly—upon all of us."

Beethoven's "Symphony No. 7 in A major, Op. 92," which concluded the concert, climaxed the program which included C. P. E. Bach's "Concerto in D major for Stringed Instruments," arranged for orchestra by Maximilian Steinberg, and Claude Debussy's "La Mer."

Superbly played by the orchestra, the Beethovan selection, from the opening poco sostenuto movement, through the allegretto, presto and the final allegro con brio movements was an inspiring, thrilling experience.

The gentle, then surging, theme which marks the first movement, after a long introduction in which crashing chords give way to an F major phrase taken up by the oboe, clarinet, French horn and basoon, vigorously and dominantly after its flute introduction rises to a climax, then subsides. The second movement is restrained yet glows with a decisive theme repeated over and over and introduced throughout the orchestra in a variety of rhythmic patterns.

Tempo Swiftly Changed

The third and fourth movements were similar in that they contained rapidly changing tempos moderated by insertions of slow, deliberate character. The presto, written in the form of a scherzo, is almost exhuberant, shadowed with two deep, rather staid passages comparable to a hymn which are played by the oboe, flute and bassoon. But these two moods are quickly dissolved and the orchestra reverts to its former light mood. The final movement sweeps forward, with passages which are light in tone and agitated in character, closing with a satisfying climax.

The Bach selection which opened the program was chosen because it was one of the first which Dr. Koussevitzky conducted. The stately allegro moderato featured the horns with persistent phrases declared by the violins. The English horn replaces the oboe in the second movement which is also played

---

CHICAGO, ILL.
TRIBUNE

APR 17 1949

List Programs for Festival at Tanglewood

The following Berkshire festival programs will be presented next summer by the Boston Symphony orchestra at Tanglewood in Lenox, Mass.:

Thursday, July 28: Serge Koussevitzky conducts the Vivaldi-Siloti Concerto Grosso, Strauss' "Death and Transfiguration," Brahms' Symphony No. 2. Saturday, July 30: Koussevitzky conducts a Goethe program featuring Beethoven's Overture to "Egmont" and Liszt's "Faust" Symphony, while Claudio Arrau plays Beethoven's Fourth Piano Concerto. Sunday afternoon, July 31: Leonard Bernstein conducts Schumann's "Manfred" Overture, Schumann's Fourth Symphony, and Stravinsky's "Le Sacre du Printemps."

WORCESTER, MASS.
TELEGRAM

APR 17 1949

N. Y. Audience Honors Koussevitzky

NEW YORK, Sunday (AP)—Serge Koussevitzky, winding up a full quarter-century as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, made his last scheduled appearance with the visiting Bostonians in Carnegie Hall yesterday.

Created by a rising ovation at the start of the all-Beethoven program and with another at the end, the maestro was presented a platinum evening-dress watch on behalf of his Wednesday and Saturday New York audiences.

On May 2, after his last Boston concert, Dr. Koussevitzky will be guest at a civic dinner in Boston; on May 10 he will be feted at a New York dinner by League of Composers.

Berkshire Staff Named

BOSTON, Feb. 26.—Serge Koussevitzky, in announcing plans for ~~the 1949~~ session of the Berkshire Music center, the summer school of the Boston Symphony orchestra at Tanglewood in Lenox, Mass., said the center will have a six-week session from July 4 to Aug. 14. This will include the period of the Berkshire Festival concerts, July 16 to Aug. 14, which will climax Dr. Koussevitzky's 25th anniversary season.

Koussevitzky will direct the school with Aaron Copland as assistant director. Additions to the faculty include Olivier Messiaen, the Parisian composer who will make his first visit to America to join Copland as teacher of composition. Members of the Juilliard String quarter, Robert Mann, Robert Koff, Raphael Hillyer and Arthur Winograd, will assist Gregor Piatigorsky, who will be in charge of chamber music. Twenty-five members of the Boston Symphony orchestra also will take part in this department.

Included in the faculty with principals of the Boston Symphony orchestra, will be Leonard Bernstein, Richard Burgin and Eleazar de Carvalho assisting Dr. Koussevitzky in the conducting classes and with the student orchestra. Hugh Ross will head the choral department. Robert Shaw, regularly a member of the choral faculty, will be on leave of absence, and Ross will be joined by Christopher Honaas, head of the music department of Rollins college in Winter Park, Fla.

There will be five departments as in former seasons, orchestral and choral conducting, orchestra and chamber music, composition, opera and chorus. The opera department will include a considerably expanded opera and chamber orchestra which will perform for the opera productions and will give concerts from the chamber orchestra repertoire. There will be some 40 school performances, including concerts by all the departments, by members of the faculty and visiting artists, and a major opera production under the direction of Boris Goldovsky in the tradition of Benjamin Britten's "Peter Grimes" (American premiere in 1946), Mozart's "Idomeneo" (American premiere in 1947) and Rossini's "The Turk in Italy" (1948).

The Berkshire Music center was initiated in 1940 by Koussevitzky and is established under the sponsorship of the Boston Symphony orchestra in connection with the concerts of the Berkshire Festival.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE

APR 17 1949

CONCERT AND RECITAL

* * *

Koussevitzky Says 'Au Revoir'

By Francis D. Perkins

Serge Koussevitzky made his last New York appearance as music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall, where the program, as on Wednesday evening, was devoted to Beethoven's first and ninth symphonies. At the end he was fervently applauded by the members of a capacity audience, as well as by the musicians of the orchestra, the choristers and the soloists. His New York listeners also expressed their appreciation of his memorable services during his twenty-five years with the Boston Symphony in a tangible form by the gift of a platinum watch and chain, which was presented to him on the stage by Miss Gertrude Robinson Smith. He thanked them in a short speech, in which he said that he had been always happy to come to New York; he expressed his thanks for the appreciation and support given to him and the artists who had appeared with him during these twenty-five years and closed with "au revoir."

The idea of this gift was originated by Miss Robinson Smith, with Mrs. Charles E. Mitchell and Mrs. N. Penrose Hallowell; a letter circulated among the New York subscribers suggested that each contribute one dollar; the resulting sum was $1,100.

As on Wednesday, the chorus which sang in the finale of the ninth symphony was composed of members of the Collegiate Chorale and the Juilliard Chorus, trained by Robert Shaw; the soloists were Frances Yeend, soprano; Eunice Alberts, contralto; David Lloyd, tenor, and James Pease, bass. The interpretation as a whole had the impressive features which marked the preceding performance, and have already been described; it was an interpretation which provided a fitting climax and close for the quarter-century of concerts here by the Bostonians during Dr. Koussevitzky's regime. One characteristic was the exceptional clarity of instrumental detail in the playing of the orchestra, as well as its instrumental persuasiveness; the choral singing, admirable in tone, also realized the instrumental resources of the music. Mr. Pease gave his opening recitative a well phrased and sonorous proclamation, and soloists were unusually effective in the taxing phrase which each sings in turn near the end.

Miss Robinson Smith stated the subscribers' wish that Dr. Koussevitzky could be with us for another twenty-five years, and the manner of his conducting yesterday suggested that his career should include many coming seasons. As it is, his plans for next season call for a widespread series of appearances. According to unofficial report, these include concerts in South America next fall, three weeks with the Boston Symphony early in the winter and, later in the season, concerts in Cuba, Western Europe and Palestine.

[28]

NEW BRUNSWICK, N. J.
HOME NEWS

APR 15 1949

NOTED SYMPHONY CONDUCTOR HONORED HERE

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, accepts a Rutgers University award from F. Marmaduke Potter, who made the presentation in the absence of Dr. Robert C. Clothier, who by coincidence was in Boston.

Koussevitzky Receives Rutgers Award to Mark Final Appearance

3,000 Attend Concert by Boston Symphony as Famed Conductor Retires From Organization

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, retiring conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was presented with the Rutgers University Award last night as the orchestra completed its 13th appearance on the campus.

Dr. Koussevitzky, who had received an honorary doctor of music from the university in 1937, was given the Rutgers University Award for "significant participation in the musical life of the university."

This was inscribed on the bronze medal, symbolic of the award, which was presented to the conductor by Dr. F. Marmaduke Potter, a trustee of the university and secretary of the Board of Foreign Missions of the Reformed Church of America.

Dr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra have presented 13 concerts in New Brunswick during the 33 years since the Rutgers concert series began and its appearance here was an eagerly awaited event on the musical calendar of the university and the community. The Boston musical organization has appeared more times on the Rutgers concert series stage than any of the world-famous groups which have taken part in the series.

3,000 Attend Concert

As usual, the Rutgers University gymnasium, site of the concert, was filled to capacity with more than 3,000 persons, including students and the faculty of the university and music lovers from New Brunswick and vicinity.

In presenting the award, Dr. Potter, who represented Dr. Robert C. Clothier, president of the university, who was out of town, recalled the conferring of the honorary degree upon Dr. Koussevitzky at the conclusion of another concert here on March 30, 1937, and read the citation which accompanied that degree.

"We cannot let this event pass," Dr. Potter declared, "without expressing again to Dr. Koussevitzky our deep appreciation of the rich contribution he has made over the years to the musical heritage of Rutgers, and thank him for the inspiration which he has conferred—and L use the word advisedly—upon all of us."

Beethoven's "Symphony No. 7 in A major, Op. 92," which concluded the concert, climaxed the program which included C. P. E. Bach's "Concerto in D major for Stringed Instruments," arranged for orchestra by Maximilian Steinberg, and Claude Debussy's "La Mer."

Superbly played by the orchestra, the Beethovan selection, from the opening poco sostenuto movement, through the allegretto, presto and the final allegro con brio movements was an inspiring, thrilling experience.

The gentle, then surging, theme which marks the first movement, after a long introduction in which crashing chords give way to an F major phrase taken up by the oboe, clarinet, French horn and basoon, vigorously and dominantly after its flute introduction rises to a climax, then subsides. The second movement is restrained yet glows with a decisive theme repeated over and over and introduced throughout the orchestra in a variety of rhythmic patterns.

Tempo Swiftly Changed

The third and fourth movements were similar in that they contained rapidly changing tempos moderated by insertions of slow, deliberate character. The presto, written in the form of a scherzo, is almost exhuberant, shadowed with two deep, rather staid passages comparable to a hymn which are played by the oboe, flute and bassoon. But these two moods are quickly dissolved and the orchestra reverts to its former light mood. The final movement sweeps forward, with passages which are light in tone and agitated in character, closing with a satisfying climax.

The Bach selection which opened the program was chosen because it was one of the first which Dr. Koussevitzky conducted. The stately allegro moderato featured the horns with persistent phrases declared by the violins. The English horn replaces the oboe in the second movement which is also played

---

Berkshire Staff Named

BOSTON, Feb. 26.—Serge Koussevitzky, in announcing plans for ~~the 1949~~ session of the Berkshire Music center, the summer school of the Boston Symphony orchestra at Tanglewood in Lenox, Mass., said the center will have a six-week session from July 4 to Aug. 14. This will include the period of the Berkshire Festival concerts, July 16 to Aug. 14, which will climax Dr. Koussevitsky's 25th anniversary season.

Koussevitsky will direct the school with Aaron Copland as assistant director. Additions to the faculty include Olivier Messiaen, the Parisian composer who will make his first visit to America to join Copland as teacher of composition. Members of the Juilliard String quarter, Robert Mann, Robert Koff, Raphael Hillyer and Arthur Winograd, will assist Gregor Piatigorsky, who will be in charge of chamber music. Twenty-five members of the Boston Symphony orchestra also will take part in this department.

Included in the faculty with principals of the Boston Symphony orchestra, will be Leonard Bernstein, Richard Burgin and Eleazar de Carvalho assisting Dr. Koussevitsky in the conducting classes and with the student orchestra. Hugh Ross will head the choral department. Robert Shaw, regularly a member of the choral faculty, will be on leave of absence, and Ross will be joined by Christopher Honaas, head of the music department of Rollins college in Winter Park, Fla.

There will be five departments as in former seasons, orchestral and choral conducting, orchestra and chamber music, composition, opera and chorus. The opera department will include a considerably expanded opera and chamber orchestra which will perform for the opera productions and will give concerts from the chamber orchestra repertoire. There will be some 40 school performances, including concerts by all the departments, by members of the faculty and visiting artists, and a major opera production under the direction of Boris Goldovsky in the tradition of Benjamin Britten's "Peter Grimes" (American premiere in 1946), Mozart's "Idomeneo" (American premiere in 1947) and Rossini's "The Turk in Italy" (1948).

The Berkshire Music center was initiated in 1940 by Koussevitsky and is established under the sponsorship of the Boston Symphony orchestra in connection with the concerts of the Berkshire Festival.

CHICAGO, ILL.
TRIBUNE

APR 17 1949

List Programs for Festival at Tanglewood

The following Berkshire festival programs will be presented next summer by the Boston Symphony orchestra at Tanglewood in Lenox, Mass.:

Thursday, July 28: Serge Koussevitzky conducts ~~the Vivaldi~~-Siloti Concerto Grosso, Strauss' "Death and Transfiguration," Brahms' Symphony No. 2. Saturday, July 30: Koussevitzky conducts a Goethe program featuring Beethoven's Overture to "Egmont" and Liszt's "Faust" Symphony, while Claudio Arrau plays Beethoven's Fourth Piano Concerto. Sunday afternoon, July 31: Leonard Bernstein conducts Schumann's "Manfred" Overture, Schumann's Fourth Symphony, and Stravinsky's "Le Sacre du Printemps."

WORCESTER, MASS.
TELEGRAM

APR 17 1949

N. Y. Audience Honors Koussevitzky

NEW YORK, Sunday (AP)—Serge Koussevitzky, winding up a full quarter-century as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, made his last scheduled appearance with the visiting Bostonians in Carnegie Hall yesterday.

Created by a rising ovation at the start of the all-Beethoven program and with another at the end, the maestro was presented a platinum evening-dress watch on behalf of his Wednesday and Saturday New York audiences.

On May 2, after his last Boston concert, Dr. Koussevitzky will be guest at a civic dinner in Boston; on May 10 he will be feted at a New York dinner by League of Composers.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE

APR 17 1949

CONCERT AND RECITAL

* * *

Koussevitzky Says 'Au Revoir'

By Francis D. Perkins

Serge Koussevitzky made his last New York appearance as music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall, where the program, as on Wednesday evening, was devoted to Beethoven's first and ninth symphonies. At the end he was fervently applauded by the members of a capacity audience, as well as by the musicians of the orchestra, the choristers and the soloists. His New York listeners also expressed their appreciation of his memorable services during his twenty-five years with the Boston Symphony in a tangible form by the gift of a platinum watch and chain, which was presented to him on the stage by Miss Gertrude Robinson Smith. He thanked them in a short speech, in which he said that he had been always happy to come to New York; he expressed his thanks for the appreciation and support given to him and the artists who had appeared with him during these twenty-five years and closed with "au revoir."

The idea of this gift was originated by Miss Robinson Smith, with Mrs. Charles E. Mitchell and Mrs. N. Penrose Hallowell; a letter circulated among the New York subscribers suggested that each contribute one dollar; the resulting sum was $1,100.

As on Wednesday, the chorus which sang in the finale of the ninth symphony was composed of members of the Collegiate Chorale and the Juilliard Chorus, trained by Robert Shaw; the soloists were Frances Yeend, soprano; Eunice Alberts, contralto; David Lloyd, tenor, and James Pease, bass. The interpretation as a whole had the impressive features which marked the preceding performance, and have already been described; it was an interpretation which provided a fitting climax and close for the quarter-century of concerts here by the Bostonians during Dr. Koussevitzky's regime. One characteristic was the exceptional clarity of instrumental detail in the playing of the orchestra, as well as its instrumental persuasiveness; the choral singing, admirable in tone, also realized the instrumental resources of the music. Mr. Pease gave his opening recitative a well phrased and sonorous proclamation, and soloists were unusually effective in the taxing phrase which each sings in turn near the end.

Miss Robinson Smith stated the subscribers' wish that Dr. Koussevitzky could be with us for another twenty-five years, and the manner of his conducting yesterday suggested that his career should include many coming seasons. As it is, his plans for next season call for a widespread series of appearances. According to unofficial report, these include concerts in South America next fall, three weeks with the Boston Symphony early in the winter and, later in the season, concerts in Cuba, Western Europe and Palestine.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE
APR 22 1949

Peabody Radio Awards Given To 3 Networks

A. B. C., N. B. C. Each Get 4, C. B. S., 2; Murrow Wins Prize for News Reporting

Thirteen George Foster Peabody awards and citations for meritorious public service in the radio and television industry were presented yesterday to netwroks, local stations and individuals during a luncheon of the Radio Executives Club of New York at the Roosevelt.

The American Broadcasting Company broadcast the first portion of the proceedings, during which it received four awards, and the National Broadcasting Company broadcast the last portion, during which is also received four awards. Two awards went to the Columbia Broadcasting System. Three citations went to the Rocky Mountain Radio Council and the Lowell Institute Co-operative Broadcasting Council for education through broadcasting, and to station WNEW for its "Little Songs About the United Nations."

John E. Drewry, Dean of the Henry W. Grady School of Journalism, University of Georgia, introduced the winners. The awards were estamlished in memory of Mr. Peabody, benefactor and life trustee of the university. They are administered by the Grady School and a national advisory board.

Edward Weeks, chairman of the Peabody Advisory Board and editor of "The Atlantic Monthly," presented the awards. Arthur Pryor, vice-president of the Radio Executives Club, presided.

The awards were as follows:

Public service by a regional station: Station KNBC (N. B. C.), San Francisco, for its "Forests Aflame" series.

Public service by a local station: Station WDAR (A. B. C.), Savannah, for "You and Youth" series.

Reporting and interpretation of the news: Edward R. Murrow (C. B. S.).

Entertainment in drama: The N. B. C. University Theater and The Groucho Marx Show (A. B. C.).

Entertainment in music: N. B. C., for its programs of "good music," especially the N. B. C. Symphony, Orchestras of the Nation, First Piano Quartet, and Boston Symphony Rehearsals.

Educational program: A. B. C., for "Communism—U. S. Brand."

Children's program: "Howdy Doody," N. B. C. television.

Promotion of international understanding: C. B. S., with special reference to its United Nations programs.

Contribution to the art of television: A. B. C., for "Actors Studio."

The awards were accepted in person by executives of the companies concerned and by Mr. Murrow, but Groucho Marx accepted his by electrical transcription from Hollywood. Because of the time scheduled by the radio companies for their broadcasts, the speaking program began during the meat course, and continued without interruption while the guests went on eating and the walters serving. Each award consisted of a medal bearing a portrait of Mr. Peabody and the insignia of his university.

CONCERT A

N.Y.H.T. 4/23/49

By Arthur V. Berger

NORMAN CAROL, violinist debut recital Thursday night in Town Hall; assisting pianist, Erich Itor Kahn. The program:

Sixth Sonata, in E major.............Handel
Symphonie Espagnole (four movements)...Lalo
Partita No. 3, in E major (for violin alone)
Bach
Caprice No. 24..................Paganini-Auer
Caprice No. 20..................Paganini-Kreisler
Nocturne in C-sharp minor....Chopin-Milstein
Ziegeunerweisen ....Sarasate

Norman Carol, Violinist

Playing of such high quality as that of Norman Carol at Town Hall Thursday night was far indeed from an everyday encounter. The level of perfection he maintained, the sheer, remarkably unforced beauty of his tone and musical line, the distinction and taste in the shaping of a phrase are attributes one seldom expects to find in a twenty-year-old musician making a concert debut.

Mr. Carol had the rare distinction for a youth of eighteen of being invited by Serge Koussevitzky, two years ago, to join the first violins of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. If the musicianship, poise and refinement he exhibited Thursday night were conditioned by this apprenticeship, then one must admit it is a very good thing for an aspiring young artist.

A feature that endeared this young man's playing to me from the start was an extraordinary stability of rhythmic pulse, achieved without the least sign of disquieting accentuation. There was never any sense of the difficulty involved in keeping up this remarkable equilibrium of the temporal flow. Yet the program was, throughout, unrelenting in its virtuoso demands, and to keep the meter under such control through the bravura jumps of the four movements from Lalo's "Symphonie Espagnole" and the Paganini Caprices or the contrapuntal passages of Bach's Partita in E major was no small accomplishment.

Remarkable, too, was the way in which Mr. Carol went through a list of so many show pieces without striving to impress his listeners with the many feats he executed so well. He actually made music out of these pieces. Beauty and elegance were values he never overlooked, and he made no effort to dazzle his audience, though he had all the dexterity needed to do so. Opulence of tone—and there was much of it—was achieved without throbbing and pleading, and his Lalo had expressivity without recourse to needless delays and distortions of the line.

The catalogue of Mr. Carol's qualities includes excellent intonation, strong bow-arm, grasp of numerous tricks of bowing, and so on and on. There has not been so fine a debut recital here in some time. Erich Itor Kahn's accompaniments added to the evening's many pleasures.

[illegible] 17

KOUSSEVITSKY GIVEN WATCH

Audience in New York Honors Hub Conductor

NEW YORK, April 16 (AP)—Serge Koussevitsky, winding up a full quarter-century as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, made his last scheduled appearance with the visiting Bostonians in Carnegie Hall today.

Greeted by a rising ovation at the start of the all-Beethoven program and with another at the end, the revered maestro was presented a platinum evening-dress watch on ogram at the Boston Garden, April Cushing Charity Fund.

behalf of his Wednesday and Saturday New York audiences.

The gift, arranged for by a voluntary committee here, was presented in the presence of the standing audience by Miss Gertrude Robinson Smith of New York and Stockbridge, former president of the Bershire Festival committee.

In accepting what Miss Smith called the "tick-tick," Dr. Kousevitsky said:

"I was always happy to come to New York with my orchestra. I was always happy to play my best here. I know that you have not always liked the new music I have played. But without new music we cannot have old music. Your support was the greatest help to me."

NEW YORK, N. Y.
SUN
APR 18 1949

Walter and Koussevitzky Conclude With Beethoven

Two orchestral seasons came to a conclusion over the week end in Carnegie Hall, and the conclusion was the same in each instance: namely, that there is no work like the Beethoven Ninth Symphony with which to conclude an orchestral season. Serge Koussevitzky conducted it with the Boston Symphony on Saturday afternoon in his final concert as its musical director, and Bruno Walter conducted it with the Philharmonic-Symphony yesterday afternoon to end his cycle of the master's works.

A cheering throng paid its final formal respects to Koussevitzky at the Saturday matinee, and then lingered to observe a tribute on its behalf by Gertrude Robinson Smith, a long-time friend and zealot for the orchestra's well being. In accepting a desk clock inscribed in his memory, Koussevitzky turned his appreciation to the audience itself, which, he noted, has listened to the new music he has presented not always with approval, but always with interest. "Without the new," he said, "there cannot be the old." And, in a final gesture he bid them not good-by, but "Au revoir."

Both performances were identical with those previously reported upon. Eleanor Steeber, Nan Merriman, Raoul Jobin and Mack Harell were the soloists for Walter: Frances Yeend, Eunice Alberts, David Lloyd and James Pease those for Koussevitzky.

TIME MAGAZINE
CHICAGO, ILL.
APR 18 1949

Lonely Music

The moment bright young (30) Leonard Bernstein finished reading Poet W. H. Auden's The Age of Anxiety, "a baroque eclogue" in a Third Avenue bar (TIME, July 21, 1947), he felt a "compulsion" to compose a symphony based on it. For two years, on his busy rounds of baton waving and piano playing, he scribbled away from Taos to Tel Aviv, "in planes, in hotel lobbies." Last week Lennie's Symphony No. 2 for Piano and Orchestra was ready.

As Boston's matinee audience filed into Symphony Hall for a first hearing, Lennie was worried. His new opus had something like 25 themes, most of them growing out of a previous one "like an amoeba splitting off." Said he: "The one weakness may be that it has too much music. There is no padding . . . no trills or flourishes. It's all music."

But when Conductor Serge Koussevitzky got it under way, the audience found No. 2 not at all hard to like. It opened with a quiet conversation between two clarinets—"the loneliest music I know"—symbolizing Auden's characters in the Third Avenue bar. Nearly 30 minutes later, it got to a huge, orgiastic orchestral climax, then resolved into a thoughtful epilogue. Overall, listeners heard more melody and less dissonance than they had come prepared to hear. Standout movement: a rhythmically terrific apotheosis of jazz, with Lennie himself at the piano, backed by bass fiddler and percussion.

When it was over, college students stomped their feet. A few white-haired ladies sat grimly with their hands folded, although most gave Boston-favorite Bernstein a big warm hand. Most could agree with "Koussy" that No. 2 was "real American—extraordinaire!"

EASTON, PA.
EXPRESS
APR 22 1949

Peabody Awards Given For Gains In Radio, Video

NEW YORK, April 22 (INS)—The annual George Foster Peabody radio awards were presented today to networks, stations, individuals and programs for outstanding achievements during the past year.

Two of the awards went to television programs and one to a quiz show.

Edward R. Murrow received the award for outstanding reporting and interpretation of the news in his nightly program on CBS.

The CBS network was chosen for an award for promotion of international understanding, on the basis of several programs. These included Larry Leseuer, "Memo from Lake Success," "Between the Dark and the Daylight," "UN in Action," "Crusade for Children," "As Others See Us," and "An American Abroad."

The award for outstanding entertainment in music went to the National Broadcasting Co. for four programs. These were the NBC Symphony Orchestra, the Orchestras of the Nation, the First Piano Quartet and the rehearsals of the Boston Symphony.

In addition, the NBC University Theatre took the award for outstanding entertainment in drama, and the same network's television program "Howdy Doody" was chosen as the outstanding children's program.

The award for the oustanding educational program went to Robert M. Saudek, vice-president in charge of public affairs for the American Broadcasting Co., for his documentary program "Communism—U. S. Brand."

An ABC television program, "Actor's Studio," took the award for outstanding contribution to the art of television.

Radio and film star Groucho Marx received the award for best entertaining in comedy for his ABC show, "You Bet Your Life."

Awards for outstanding public service went to Station KNBC, San Francisco, for a series of programs, "Forests Aflame," and to Station WDAR, Savannah, Ga., for a series on juvenile delinquency, "You and Youth."

There were three special citations. One was to the Rocky Mountain Radio Council for having done much "to lift education on the air to a higher level of effectiveness, and commercial broadcasting to a similar high level of public service."

Another went to the Lowell Institute Co-operative Broadcasting Council of Boston, Mass., which "in a series of invigorating programs has made an enormous advance in adult education through the medium of broadcasting."

The third was to Station WNEW, New York, "for its initiative in creating 'Little Songs about UN', thus utilizing an unusual broadcasting technique in the interest of international understanding."

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
APR 18 1949

DR. KOUSSEVITSKY RETIRES

Last Saturday's concert at Carnegie Hall was the last New York concert for Serge Koussevitsky before his retirement as head of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. In twenty-five years he has raised that organization to a virtuoso group of the first rank and made the "Boston tone" the envy and hope of many a younger orchestral group. New Yorkers who have heard the Boston in its annual visits here, remembering all those joyful hours that Dr. Koussevitsky made possible, must feel a great regret at his going.

But Dr. Koussevitsky's contribution to music and to the artistic life of our nation was not limited to finished performances of the masters. He was a long and articulate champion of modern music and its creators. He featured their compositions on his programs and through the Natalie Koussevitsky Foundation commissioned them and brought them into being. At the school at Tanglewood he trained singers, instrumentalists and conductors, endeavoring in every way to extend the love and understanding of music. To Dr. Koussevitsky music has been no mere appendage to living, but a function of it. As he saw it, music enriched our lives, gave us greater spiritual awareness and made so many of our other strivings worth while.

It is good to know that Dr. Koussevitsky will still be heard at Tanglewood in the Berkshires and at occasional other concerts. His countless friends will wish him many long years of life and many years of music-making.

PEORIA, ILL.
STAR
APR 19 1949

Tanglewood Music School Auditions Set for Thursday

Howard Shanet, a member of the faculty of the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass., will be in Urbana this Thursday, April 21 to audition and interview students who wish to attend this summer music school. These interviews and auditions will be held at the music department of the University of Illinois, at 1 p. m.

The Berkshire Music Center is an advanced music school established by the famous conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, and sponsored by the Boston Symphony orchestra. Aaron Copland, composer, is assistant director. There is a six-week school session beginning July 4 and ending August 14 which provides an opportunity for music study in connection with the Berkshire Festival concerts of the Boston Symphony orchestra.

Symphony

Trav. Apr 29

(Continued from First Page)

Lines for the usual 300 rush seats began to form at Symphony Hall at 9 A. M. Telephones throughout Greater Boston buzzed with offers to purchase tickets from lucky holders at twice, three times and even four times their price. And no one who held one was known to have given it up.

For his final Friday afternoon concert, Koussevitzky had chosen an all-Beethoven program, including the Ninth Symphony—"Beethoven's last also." He conducted both the orchestra and a chorus in the Ninth performance.

John N. Burk, secretary at Symphony Hall, said that never in the history of the Boston orchestra had there been such pressure for tickets. "We have been pressed all season, from last October, for today's and tomorrow night's concerts. I don't think there has been one ticket turned back. It is a sentimental occasion," said Burk.

He reported that by noon, some 500 or 600 persons had appeared outside the box office to wait for the "peanut gallery" rush seats.

The 74-year-old world-famous conductor will bid an official farewell to active participation in the music world Monday night at a civic dinner in Symphony Hall.

Award to Bernstein

The Boston Symphony Orchestra Merit Award of $1000 for 1949 has been conferred upon Leonard Bernstein for his Second Symphony, "The Age of Anxiety," based on W. H. Auden's poem and presented this season by Dr. Koussevitzky.

The award was established three years ago by Mark M. Hornblit, Boston lawyer. Previous recipients were Aaron Copland and Walter Piston.

Mon. [illegible]

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE
APR 22 1949

Peabody Radio Awards Given To 3 Networks

A. B. C., N. B. C. Each Get 4, C. B. S., 2; Murrow Wins Prize for News Reporting

Thirteen George Foster Peabody awards and citations for meritorious public service in the radio and television industry were presented yesterday to netwroks, local stations and individuals during a luncheon of the Radio Executives Club of New York at the Roosevelt.

The American Broadcasting Company broadcast the first portion of the proceedings, during which it received four awards, and the National Broadcasting Company broadcast the last portion, during which is also received four awards. Two awards went to the Columbia Broadcasting System. Three citations went to the Rocky Mountain Radio Council and the Lowell Institute Co-operative Broadcasting Council for education through broadcasting, and to station WNEW for its "Little Songs About the United Nations."

John E. Drewry, Dean of the Henry W. Grady School of Journalism, University of Georgia, introduced the winners. The awards were estamlished in memory of Mr. Peabody, benefactor and life trustee of the university. They are administered by the Grady School and a national advisory board.

Edward Weeks, chairman of the Peabody Advisory Board and editor of "The Atlantic Monthly," presented the awards. Arthur Pryor, vice-president of the Radic Executives Club, presided.

The awards were as follows:

Public service by a regional station: Station KNBC (N. B. C.), San Francisco, for its "Forests Aflame" series.

Public service by a local station: Station WDAR (A. B. C.), Savannah, for "You and Youth" series.

Reporting and interpretation of the news: Edward R. Murrow (C. B. S.).

Entertainment in drama: The N. B. C. University Theater and The Groucho Marx Show (A. B. C.).

Entertainment in music: N. B. C., for its programs of "good music," especially the N. B. C. Symphony, Orchestras of the Nation, First Piano Quartet, and Boston Symphony Rehearsals.

Educational program: A. B. C., for "Communism—U. S. Brand."

Children's program: "Howdy Doody," N. B. C. television.

Promotion of international understanding: C. B. S., with special reference to its United Nations programs.

Contribution to the art of television: A. B. C., for "Actors Studio."

The awards were accepted in person by executives of the companies concerned and by Mr. Murrow, but Groucho Marx accepted his by electrical transcription from Hollywood. Because of the time scheduled by the radio companies for their broadcasts, the speaking program began during the meat course, and continued without interruption while the guests went on eating and the waiters serving. Each award consisted of a medal bearing a portrait of Mr. Peabody and the insignia of his university.

CONCERT A

By Arthur V. Berger

NORMAN CAROL, violinist debut recital Thursday night in Town Hall; assisting pianist, Erich Itor Kahn. The program:

Sixth Sonata, in E major	Handel
Symphonie Espagnole (four movements)	Lalo
Partita No 3, in E major (for violin alone)	Bach
Caprice No. 24	Paganini-Auer
Caprice No. 20	Paganini-Kreisler
Nocturne in C-sharp minor	Chopin-Milstein
Ziegeunerweisen	Sarasate

Norman Carol, Violinist

Playing of such high quality as that of Norman Carol at Town Hall Thursday night was far indeed from an everyday encounter. The level of perfection he maintained. the sheer, remarkably unforced beauty of his tone and musical line. the distinction and taste in the shaping of a phrase are attributes one seldom expects to find in a twenty-year-old musician making a concert debut.

Mr. Carol had the rare distinction for a youth of eighteen of being invited by Serge Koussevitzky, two years ago, to join the first violins of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. If the musicianship, poise and refinement he exhibited Thursday night were conditioned by this apprenticeship, then one must admit it is a very good thing for an aspiring young artist.

A feature that endeared this young man's playing to me from the start was an extraordinary stability of rhythmic pulse, achieved without the least sign of disquieting accentuation. There was never any sense of the difficulty involved in keeping up this remarkable equilibrium of the temporal flow. Yet the program was, throughout, unrelenting in its virtuoso demands, and to keep the meter under such control through the bravura jumps of the four movements from Lalo's "Symphonie Espagnole" and the Paganini Caprices or the contrapuntal passages of Bach's Partita in E major was no small accomplishment.

Remarkable, too, was the way in which Mr. Carol went through a list of so many show pieces without striving to impress his listeners with the many feats he executed so well. He actually made music out of these pieces. Beauty and elegance were values he never overlooked, and he made no effort to dazzle his audience, though he had all the dexterity needed to do so. Opulence of tone—and there was much of it—was achieved without throbbing and pleading, and his Lalo had expressivity without recourse to needless delays and distortions of the line.

The catalogue of Mr. Carol's qualities includes excellent intonation, strong bow-arm, grasp of numerous tricks of bowing, and so on and on. There has not been so fine a debut recital here in some time. Erich Itor Kahn's accompaniments added to the evening's many pleasures.

KOUSSEVITSKY GIVEN WATCH

Audience in New York Honors Hub Conductor

NEW YORK, April 16 (AP)—Serge Koussevitsky, winding up a full quarter-century as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, made his last scheduled appearance with the visiting. Bostonians in Carnegie Hall today.

Greeted by a rising ovation at the start of the all-Beethoven program and with another at the end, the revered maestro was presented a platinum evening-dress watch on ogram at the Boston Garden, April ushing Charity Fund.

behalf of his Wednesday and Saturday New York audiences.

The gift, arranged for by a voluntary committee here, was presented in the presence of the standing audience by Miss Gertrude Robinson Smith of New York and Stockbridge, former president of the Bershire Festival committee.

In accepting what Miss Smith called the "tick-tick," Dr. Koussevitsky said:

"I was always happy to come to New York with my orchestra. I was always happy to play my best here. I know that you have not always liked the new music I have played. But without new music we cannot have old music. Your support was the greatest help to me."

NEW YORK, N. Y.
SUN
APR 18

Walter and Koussevitzky Conclude With Beethoven

Two orchestral seasons came to a conclusion over the week end in Carnegie Hall, and the conclusion was the same in each instance: namely, that there is no work like the Beethoven Ninth Symphony with which to conclude an orchestral season. Serge Koussevitzky conducted it with the Boston Symphony on Saturday afternoon in his final concert as its musical director, and Bruno Walter conducted it with the Philharmonic-Symphony yesterday afternoon to end his cycle of the master's works.

A cheering throng paid its final formal respects to Koussevitzky at the Saturday matinee, and then lingered to observe a tribute on its behalf by Gertrude Robinson Smith, a long-time friend and zealot for the orchestra's well being. In accepting a desk clock inscribed in his memory, Koussevitzky turned his appreciation to the audience itself, which, he noted, has listened to the new music he has presented not always with approval, but always with interest. "Without the new," he said, "there cannot be the old." And, in a final gesture he bid them not good-by, but "Au revoir."

Both performances were identical with those previously reported upon. Eleanor Steeber, Nan Merriman, Raoul Jobin and Mack Harell were the soloists for Walter: Frances Yeend, Eunice Alberts, David Lloyd and James Pease those for Koussevitzky.

TIME MAGAZINE
CHICAGO, ILL.
APR 18 1949

Lonely Music

The moment bright young (30) Leonard Bernstein finished reading Poet W. H. Auden's The Age of Anxiety, "a baroque eclogue" in a Third Avenue bar (TIME, July 21, 1947), he felt a "compulsion" to compose a symphony based on it. For two years, on his busy rounds of baton waving and piano playing, he scribbled away from Taos to Tel Aviv, "in planes, in hotel lobbies." Last week Lennie's Symphony No. 2 for Piano and Orchestra was ready.

As Boston's matinee audience filed into Symphony Hall for a first hearing, Lennie was worried. His new opus had something like 25 themes, most of them growing out of a previous one "like an amoeba splitting off." Said he: "The one weakness may be that it has too much music. There is no padding . . . no trills or flourishes. It's all music."

But when Conductor Serge Koussevitzky got it under way, the audience found No. 2 not at all hard to like. It opened with a quiet conversation between two clarinets—"the loneliest music I know"—symbolizing Auden's characters in the Third Avenue bar. Nearly 30 minutes later, it got to a huge, orgiastic orchestral climax, then resolved into a thoughtful epilogue. Overall, listeners heard more melody and less dissonance than they had come prepared to hear. Standout movement: a rhythmically terrific apotheosis of jazz, with Lennie himself at the piano, backed by bass fiddler and percussion.

When it was over, college students stomped their feet. A few white-haired ladies sat grimly with their hands folded, although most gave Boston-favorite Bernstein a big warm hand. Most could agree with "Koussy" that No. 2 was "real American—extraordinaire!"

EASTON, PA.
EXPRESS

Peabody Awards Given For Gains In Radio, Video

NEW YORK, April 22 (INS)—The annual George Foster Peabody radio awards were presented today to networks, stations, individuals and programs for outstanding achievements during the past year.

Two of the awards went to television programs and one to a quiz show.

Edward R. Murrow received the award for outstanding reporting and interpretation of the news in his nightly program on CBS.

The CBS network was chosen for an award for promotion of international understanding, on the basis of several programs. These included Larry Leseuer, "Memo from Lake Success," "Between the Dark and the Daylight," "UN in Action," "Crusade for Children," "As Others See Us," and "An American Abroad."

The award for outstanding entertainment in music went to the National Broadcasting Co. for four programs. These were the NBC Symphony Orchestra, the Orchestras of the Nation, the First Piano Quartet and the rehearsals of the Boston Symphony.

In addition, the NBC University Theatre took the award for outstanding entertainment in drama, and the same network's television program "Howdy Doody" was chosen as the outstanding children's program.

The award for the oustanding educational program went to Robert M. Saudek, vice-president in charge of public affairs for the American Broadcasting Co., for his documentary program "Communism—U. S. Brand."

An ABC television program, "Actor's Studio," took the award for outstanding contribution to the art of television.

Radio and film star Groucho Marx received the award for best entertaining in comedy for his ABC show, "You Bet Your Life."

Awards for outstanding public service went to Station KNBC, San Francisco, for a series of programs, "Forests Aflame," and to Station WDAR, Savannah, Ga., for a series on juvenile delinquency, "You and Youth."

There were three special citations. One was to the Rocky Mountain Radio Council for having done much "to lift education on the air to a higher level of effectiveness, and commercial broadcasting to a similar high level of public service."

Another went to the Lowell Institute Co-operative Broadcasting Council of Boston, Mass., which "in a series of invigorating programs has made an enormous advance in adult education through the medium of broadcasting."

The third was to Station WNEW, New York, "for its initiative in creating 'Little Songs about UN', thus utilizing an unusual broadcasting technique in the interest of international understanding."

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
APR 18 1949

DR. KOUSSEVITSKY RETIRES

Last Saturday's concert at Carnegie Hall was the last New York concert for Serge Koussevitsky before his retirement as head of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. In twenty-five years he has raised that organization to a virtuoso group of the first rank and made the "Boston tone" the envy and hope of many a younger orchestral group. New Yorkers who have heard the Boston in its annual visits here, remembering all those joyful hours that Dr. Koussevitsky made possible, must feel a great regret at his going.

But Dr. Koussevitsky's contribution to music and to the artistic life of our nation was not limited to finished performances of the masters. He was a long and articulate champion of modern music and its creators. He featured their compositions on his programs and through the Natalie Koussevitsky Foundation commissioned them and brought them into being. At the school at Tanglewood he trained singers, instrumentalists and conductors, endeavoring in every way to extend the love and understanding of music. To Dr. Koussevitsky music has been no mere appendage to living, but a function of it. As he saw it, music enriched our lives, gave us greater spiritual awareness and made so many of our other strivings worth while.

It is good to know that Dr. Koussevitsky will still be heard at Tanglewood in the Berkshires and at occasional other concerts. His countless friends will wish him many long years of life and many years of music-making.

PEORIA, ILL.
STAR

Tanglewood Music School Auditions Set for Thursday

Howard Shanet, a member of the faculty of the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass., will be in Urbana this Thursday, April 21 to audition and interview students who wish to attend this summer music school. These interviews and auditions will be held at the music department of the University of Illinois, at 1 p. m.

The Berkshire Music Center is an advanced music school established by the famous conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, and sponsored by the Boston Symphony orchestra. Aaron Copland, composer, is assistant director. There is a six-week school session beginning July 4 and ending August 14 which provides an opportunity for music study in connection with the Berkshire Festival concerts of the Boston Symphony orchestra.

Symphony

(Continued from First Page)

Lines for the usual 300 rush seats began to form at Symphony Hall at 9 A. M. Telephones throughout Greater Boston buzzed with offers to purchase tickets from lucky holders at twice, three times and even four times their price. And no one who held one was known to have given it up.

For his final Friday afternoon concert, Koussevitzky had chosen an all-Beethoven program, including the Ninth Symphony—"Beethoven's last also." He conducted both the orchestra and a chorus in the Ninth performance.

John N. Burk, secretary at Symphony Hall, said that never in the history of the Boston orchestra had there been such pressure for tickets. "We have been pressed all season, from last October, for today's and tomorrow night's concerts. I don't think there has been one ticket turned back. It is a sentimental occasion," said Burk.

He reported that by noon, some 500 or 600 persons had appeared outside the box office to wait for the "peanut gallery" rush seats.

The 74-year-old world-famous conductor will bid an official farewell to active participation in the music world Monday night at a civic dinner in Symphony Hall.

Award to Bernstein

The Boston Symphony Orchestra Merit Award of $1000 for 1949 has been conferred upon Leonard Bernstein for his Second Symphony, "The Age of Anxiety," based on W. H. Auden's poem and presented this season by Dr. Koussevitzky.

The award was established three years ago by Mark M. Hornblit, Boston lawyer. Previous recipients were Aaron Copland and Walter Piston.

---

world.

chestra, as his successor.

May 9 - June 8

[283]

Brooklyn Cheers Koussevitzky At Farewell Academy Concert

Eagle – Brooklyn N.Y. 4/16/49

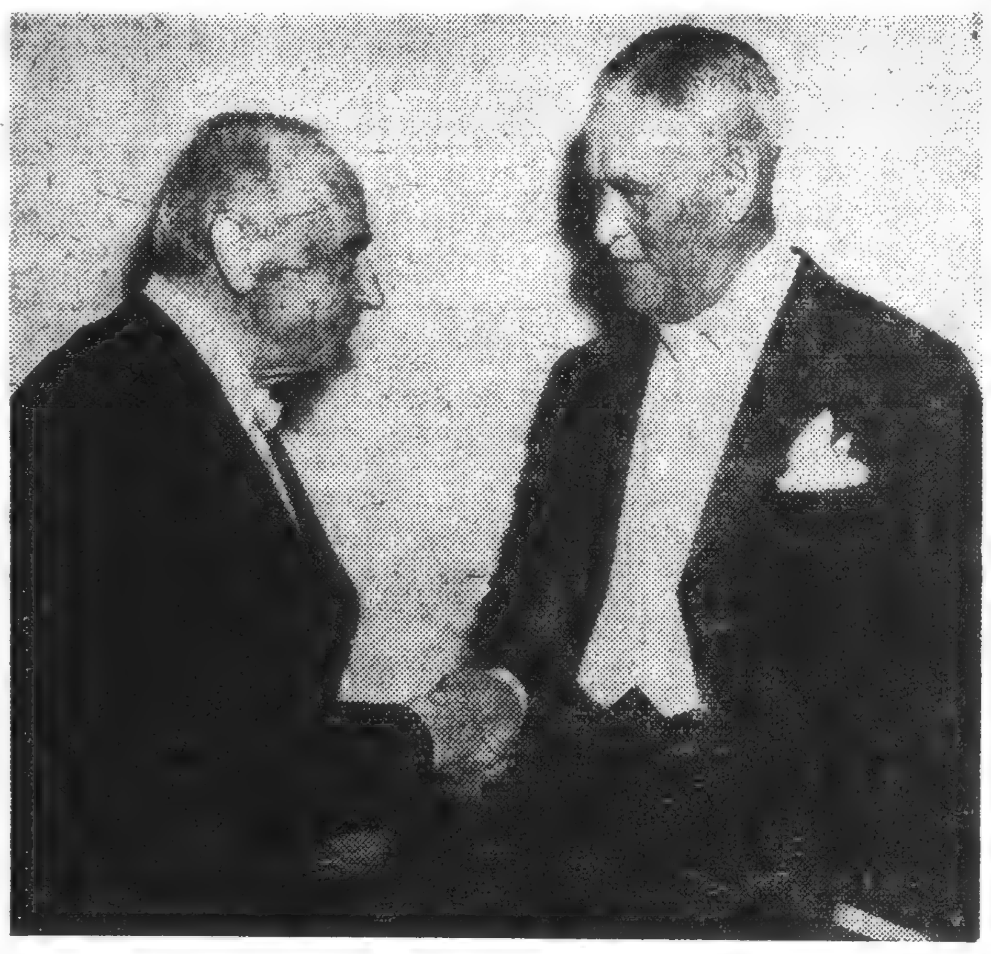
Eagle Staff photo

AT SYMPHONY CONCERT—Some of the audience which crowded the Academy of Music last night for the last Brooklyn concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky.

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky bade farewell to Brooklyn last night when he directed the Boston Symphony Orchestra in its fifth and final concert of the season. The program consisted of the Concerto in D for strings by Carl Philip Emanuel Bach, Debussy's symphonic sketches, "La Mer," and Beethoven's Seventh Symphony in A.

Dr. Koussevitzky, who is 75 years old, is retiring from the directorship of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this year after having served as its director for a quarter of a century. During all those years, he has never failed to direct concerts in Brooklyn each season, and has contributed greatly to the musical progress of the borough.

Marking the occasion, Dr. Adrian Van Sinderen, president of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, made a brief address of appreciation at intermission time. The Boston Symphony concerts are given under the joint auspices of the Brooklyn Institute, the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society and the Brooklyn Committee for the Boston Symphony Concerts.



Eagle Staff Photo

FAREWELL — Dr. Adrian Van Sinderen, president of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, bids Dr. Serge Koussevitzky farewell. Dr. Koussevitzky, who has conducted Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts in Brooklyn for 25 seasons, is retiring this Spring as director of that organization.

'Friend of Music Lovers'

"I greet you tonight on behalf of Brooklyn," Dr. Van Sinderen said, "not only as Dr. Koussevitzky, the famous conductor, but also as Serge Koussevitzky, our friend and the friend of all who love music. We have joy in our memories of your many concerts; we have only sorrow in the knowledge that your ministry of music here must close. Your sunrise was beautiful in promise; your noonday has been one of dazzling light; may you find both peace and joy in the glory of the sunset.

"I hope that wherever you go you will remember that the good wishes and the love of your friends at the Academy of Music go with you and that we hold you ever in deep affection."

The capacity audience rose to its feet and cheered as Dr. Koussevitzky came forward to answer, and it was only by persistent motions of his hands that he quieted the assembly enough to be heard.

Dr. Koussevitzky recalled his earliest concerts in Brooklyn when he had played new music and met only with indifference. "Twenty years ago I played 'La Mer' for you," he said. "It was a fiasco. Tonight you applaud it. The growth of appreciation you have shown has made me happy through the years.

"I regret that I have to stop being as active as I was. But I carry away from these Brooklyn concerts a sense of great musical progress, and it is my greatest satisfaction."

Almost before the audience realized he had ceased speaking, Dr. Koussevitzky had raised his baton, and the orchestra was launched in the opening bars of the symphony. At the close of the symphony, which ended the concert, there was an outburst of applause and cheering that lasted for minutes, and continued as long as Dr. Koussevitzky would return to the stage.

Boxholders and Standees

Every seat was taken for the concert and there was a double row of standees throughout. Among the boxholders was Mrs. Edward C. Blum, who had as her guests, Dr. and Mrs. Charles Nagel, Mr. and Mrs. Henry J. Davenport, Mrs. Edwin Garvin and Victor Proetz.

Dr. and Mrs. Robert Franklin Ives were hosts in Box 2 to Mr. and Mrs. Carl H. Tollefsen, Dr. and Mrs. Cornelius Greenway, Mrs. Amelia Gray-Clarke, and Mrs. C. Franklin Edminster.

Mrs. John S. Stevens, president of the Brooklyn Women's Club, occupied Box 3 with Elizabeth Bischoff, Mrs. W. E. Howes, members of the club, and Dr. and Mrs. H. S. Rasi. Emma Jessie Ogg, the Rev. C. R. Barnes, Mr. and Mrs. Edward M. Fuller and Mrs. William B. Parker occupied Box 5.

Officers of the U. S. Army Station at Fort Hamilton were present in Box 7 as guests of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, while in another box were blind veterans and their escorts from the Red Cross, who came as guests of the Brooklyn Committee for Boston Symphony Concerts.

MUSIC

By Paul Affelder

Koussevitzky Bids Farewell In Final Concert at Academy

Brooklyn bid a tearful farewell to Serge Koussevitzky at the Academy of Music last night, as the noted conductor made his final appearance here with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which he has led for 25 glorious years. Every one in the audience and every member of the orchestra tried his utmost to make this a special occasion, and their combined efforts were highly successful. Not for several seasons have we heard the Boston Orchestra perform with the homogeneity and sheen that marked its work last evening, and we have never witnessed an ovation at a borough musical event to equal that accorded Dr. Koussevitzky.

The concert began with the Karl Philipp Emanuel Bach Concerto in D Major for Stringed Instruments, as arranged for a slightly larger orchestra by Maximilian Steinberg. The opening movement was expansive and the final Allegro was light, and dance-like. But one of the concert's great moments came with the playing of the second movement, Andante lento molto. Dr. Koussevitzky lingered over this section with loving care, making the strings sing each phrase with every bit of soul they could muster from their instruments, yet he saw to it that there was no undue sentimentality to destroy the classic lines.

The Concerto was followed by a work for which this conductor and this orchestra have become famous—Debussy's "La Mer."

Later in the evening, Dr. Koussevitzky told the audience that twenty years ago, when he had played "La Mer" in Brooklyn, it had been a fiasco, but now it was a success. It would be difficult for it to have been otherwise, for this trio of impressionistic musical seascapes was given a truly imaginative and inspired performance, with the orchestra fairly shimmering like waves in the sunlight. The first movement was made to grow from a misty, almost inaudible beginning to its brilliant conclusion. The second movement had its appropriate amount of playfulness, and at the beginning of the final "Dialogue of the Wind and Sea," one felt as if the conductor had whipped the orchestral waves into such a fury that they splashed against the stage.

To round out the program, there was the Seventh Symphony of Beethoven. Now this reviewer has never been a great admirer of Dr. Koussevitzky's way with Beethoven, but last evening, the conductor gave the symphony a reading that was not only in the proper spirit but one which was notable for its crispness and its rather strict adherence to the printed score. Aside from some annoying blatancy in the trumpets, the orchestra was at its polished best in this work.

The standing ovation which greeted Dr. Koussevitzky after the intermission and at the concert's conclusion lasted for some minutes, and showed in what high esteem Brooklyn holds this great musician. He will be sorely missed.

HE NEW YORK TIMES, FRIDAY, APRIL 22, 194

Radio and Television

Peabody Awards Presented at Hotel Roosevelt—Two Video Shows Are Honored

The George Foster Peabody Radio Awards were presented yesterday at a luncheon meeting of the Radio Executives Club of New York held at the Hotel Roosevelt.

Ten awards and three citations were made, and for the first time in the nine years that the awards have been presented television was singled out for recognition, two shows receiving honors.

"Actors Studio," an ABC-TV program, was named as the program making the "outstanding contribution to the art of television." NBC-TV'S "Howdy Doody" was selected as the "outstanding children's program."

Another new award, for "Promotion of International Understanding," went to CBS for its over-all contribution," with special reference to Larry Leseuer and the network's special United Nations programs.

The awards in the radio classifications were:

Public service by a regional station—KNBC, San Francisco.

Public service by a local station—WDAR, Savannah.

Reporting and interpretation of the news—Edward R. Murrow of CBS.

Music—NBC, for the NBC Symphony, the Orchestras of the Nation, the First Piano Quartet and the Boston Symphony Rehearsals.

Education—"Communism—U. S. Brand," an ABC documentary.

Drama—"NBC University Theatre" and "The Groucho Marx Show" over ABC.

Citations were given to WNEW for its "Little Songs About the U. N." and to the Rocky Mountain Radio Council and the Lowell Institute Cooperative Broadcasting Council for their work in behalf of education through broadcasting.

Edward Weeks, editor of the Atlantic Monthly and chairman of the Peabody Advisory Board, read the citations and made the awards. He was presented by John E. Drewry, Dean of the University of Georgia's Henry W. Grady School of Journalism, which administers the awards with the assistance of the National Association of Broadcasters. Carl Haverlin, president of Broadcast Music, Inc., presided.

The first showing of a new filmed documentary on the Berlin Airlift will be made over CBS-TV tomorrow, 9:10 to 9:30 P.M. Titled "The Bridge," the film is part of the general education program being conducted by the Military Governments of France, Great Britain and the United States. The film was produced by Stewart Schulberg.

WNJR, Newark, is the first station in this area to carry "Turning Points," the transcribed dramatic series produced by the United Hatters, Cap and Millinery Workers International Union, AFL. Sponsored by Snyder Hat Stores in Newark, the program is said to mark the first occasion in which an employer of labor has sponsored a trade union radio program. Last night's broadcast from 6:45 to 7 P. M. was the first of a thirteen-week Thursday night series.

The floor show in the Gold Room of the Goldman Hotel, Pleasantdale, N. J., will be telecast Sunday nights from 10 to 11 o'clock by WATV, starting next week. The opening bill will feature Tim Herbert, comedian, and Vickee Richards and Harry Prime, vocalists.

Under a thirteen-week contract, the series will be sponsored by the American Shop in Newark.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE

APR 30 1949

ymphony Concert

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, gave the 23d program of the 68th season in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. Leonard Bernstein, pianist, was the soloist. The program:

verture to "Coriolanus," Op. 62, Beethoven
"The Age of Anxiety", Symphony No. 2, Bernstei
"Death and Transfiguration", Op. 24, Straus
"La Valse", Rave

By RUDOLPH ELIE

Leonard Bernstein, our three-etter musical prodigy, has composed a striking successor to his "Jeremiah" Symphony.

It is his Symphony No. 2 for Piano and Orchestra, a 30-minute composition subtitled "The Age of Anxiety," after W. H. Auden's unconstrained lyric of a disordered spirit in a seemingly crumbling social order. It employs the piano, not as a virtuoso now conquering and now conquered by the orchestra, but as a protagonist living, to the full, the events transpiring in the orchestra, which is to say the universe bounded by the poem.

More eloquently, perhaps, than anyone else could, Mr. Bernstein has fully enunciated his program for this work, which tells of the odyssey of four characters in a Third Avenue bar. An ephemeral prologue, spoken by two clarinets, leads to two sets of seven variations, each variation based on its predecessor and not, as is the custom, on an announced theme. These variations represent the symbolic gropings of the character to find some spiritual security.

A grotesque dirge follows, a section that achieves exceptional emotional tension, and this leads directly into one of the most extraordinary symphonic movements in the literature, an apotheosis of the jazz spirit. Set for piano and percussion only, it out-bops any contemporary be-bop, and out boogie's any woogie. Yet it bears no more relation to Jazz at Carnegie Hall than Ravel's La Valse bears to the Viennese waltz. It is, in fact, an inspired commentary on jazz, at once sardonic and tender, at once violent and sentimental.

In the frantic, orgiastic climax, the protagonist of the work exhausts himself, and not until the final moment of the Epilogue does he speak again, and then only to add, in one affirmative chord, his hope of finding faith; a stroke of genius in a work whose wonders follow one another from the beginning.

Although there are suggestions of almost every orchestral idiom in his work exactly, as in an atomic physicist's discovery there are the contributions of every scientific predecessor, this is an exceptionally original work. Its sound (if this may be said without conveying any misconceptions) is a mingling of the sounds achieved by Rachmaninoff, Mahler and Copland. It is romantic in tone, rarely dissonant contrapuntally, entirely (for which be praised!) unscholastic, and almost excessively melodic. Indeed, insofar as melody is concerned, Mr. Bernstein has filled every inch of his canvas with melodic ideas each of them of equal importance, much as Cezanne filled his with details.

But far more important than the technical details, which could—and for some time to come will—fill columns of musical discussion, is

---

Koussevitzky Conducts His Last Concert Today

BOSTON, April 29 (UP).—Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will retire as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra tomorrow after twenty-five years of leadership that raised it and himself to the highest peaks in the musical world.

Symphony Hall is expected to be packed, as usual, when Dr. Koussevitzky makes his musical farewell as conductor. It will be packed again Monday when a public testimonial banquet is held in honor of the seventy-four-year-old musician and his accomplishments.

He has been asked to remain as conductor, but says: "I think it is best to retire while I can still perform at the top of my ability. It is sad to feel quality going down and down. I want it to be remembered that my last concerts were still at the top."

Crowds Rush for Tickets To Koussevitzky's Farewell

Trav Cy 4/29

A history-making and sentimental event in the music world—the last Friday afternoon appearance of Serge Koussevitzky as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra—took place this afternoon after a frenzied morning on the part of music lovers attempting to buy or argue their way into Symphony Hall.

SYMPHONY

(Continued on Page Fifteen)

WATERBURY, CONN.
REPUBLICAN

APR 29 1949

Composer Gets Boston Symphony Merit Award

Boston, April 28—(AP)—Composer-conductor Leonard Bernstein today received the Boston Symphony Orchestra merit award of $1,000 for his second symphony, "The Age of Anxiety."

The work, based on a poem by W. H. Auden, was first performed by the orchestra four weeks ago with the composer at the piano.

The award was established three years ago. The previous recipients are Aaron Copland and Walter Piston.

Crowds Turned Away From Koussevitzky's Last Matinee

Hundreds had waited in line outside Symphony Hall since 9 o'clock in the morning. At noon there were 600 there, seeking admission. By 2:30 p. m. hundreds had been turned away.

It was Serge Koussevitsky's last Friday afternoon appearance with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Tonight at 8:30 p. m. he leads the orchestra again, for the last time.

The famous, 74-year-old conductor chose an all-Beethoven program for his finale. In the program was Beethoven's "Ninth Symphony," the last of the great German composer.

Koussevitzky Hailed In Moving Farewell

Ha apr 30

By RUDOLPH ELIE

An era in music came to an end yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall, when Serge Koussevitzky, for 25 years the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, came to the final chord of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony. The audience knew it, too, and clamored so long and so insistently that the conductor, his lips trembling in emotion, at last held out his hand for silence. Silence never fell more rapidly or more completely over an audience.

(Continued on Page Six)

TRIBUTE GIVEN KOUSSEVITZKY

Arts Foundation Lauds His Great Career

Post apr 30

NEW YORK, April 29 (AP)—Serge Koussevitzky was lauded today as "a pioneer in introducing contemporary music" on the eve of his retirement as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Carleton Smith, director of the National Arts Foundation, issued a statement addressed to Koussevitzky, who retires tomorrow. It read:

"You have made an unparalleled contribution to the art of music in America.

"Generations to come will enjoy and treasure the work you have done.

"You have not only established a distinguished standard of orchestral performance. You have been a pioneer in introducing contemporary music. You have taught and inspired young musicians who will carry on your ideals throughout their lives."

The foundation's advisory committee on music includes Dr. Bruno Walter, Roy Harris, Darius Milhaud, Jean Sibelius, Dr. Fritz Busch, Dmitri Mitropoulos, Vladimir Golschamman, Marian Anderson, Lawrence Tibbett, Deems Taylor, Pierre Monteux, Charles Munch and Gregor Piatigorsky.

Herald Apr 17

Koussevitzky Honored at Last N. Y. Concert

NEW YORK, April 16 (AP)—Serge Koussevitzky, winding up a full quarter-century as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, made his last scheduled appearance with the visiting Bostonians in Carnegie Hall today.

Greeted by a rising ovation at the start of the all-Beethoven program and with another at the end, Koussevitzky was presented a platinum watch on behalf of his Wednesday and Saturday New York audiences.

The gift, arranged for by a voluntary committee here, was presented in the presence of the standing audience by Miss Gertrude Robinson Smith of New York and Stockbridge, former president of the Berkshire Festival Committee.

In accepting what Miss Smith called the "tick-tick," Dr. Koussevitzky said:

"I was always happy to come to New York with my orchestra. I was always happy to play my best here. I know," continued the conductor who has programmed a great deal of new music, "that you have not always liked the new music I have played. But without new music we cannot have old music. Your support was the greatest help to me."

The program opened with a superb performance of Beethoven's First Symphony, and closed with a stirring Ninth.

FORT WORTH, TEXAS
MORNING STAR-TELEGRAM
APR 24 1949

'Telephone' Will Launch Opera Guild's Campaign

The hilarious operatic miniature, "The Telephone," by Gian-Carlo Menotti, will be the musical feature at the tea to be given at 2:30 p. m. Friday at River Crest Country Club by the Fort Worth Opera Guild, celebrating its first anniversary and opening its campaign for enlarged membership.

The little opera, lasting about 25 minutes, was paired with Menotti's harrowing "The Medium" in New York two seasons ago, to become one of the hit productions of the season.

"The Telephone" is given by two persons, who will be a young New York soprano, Peggy Lee Whiting, and Arthur Schoep, remembered for his fine appearances this season in the Fort Worth Civic Opera Association's productions of "La Boheme" and "The Bartered Bride."

Miss Whiting sang "The Telephone" last summer at the Boston Symphony's Berkshire Music Center, where she had won a scholarship in the opera department. Though a native of Utah, she studied in New York, at the Mannes Music School, where she had leading soprano roles in a number of operas, including Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro" and "Cosi fan tutte."

"The Telephone" describes the tribulations of a young man who desperately tries, before he has to take a train in one hour, to ask Lucy to marry him, but who never gets his question finished because of interruptions by the telephone. Finally he calls her from the station over a public telephone, and gets the right answer.

"Two years ago, when I gave my resignation to the trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra," he said, speaking loudly and firmly in an accent marked but clear, "I knew it would be hard to separate myself from you, my public, and my dear orchestra. But let us be happy," he cried, his voice deepening, "that we have had these 25 years together.

"Let us be happy that we have worked and created the greatest orchestra in the world," he continued, as the applause subsided. "Let us be happy that we have had a tremendous musical evolution in this country, that we have helped many composers until now we have composers in this country as great as any in the old world. I thank you for your co-operation, your devotion to the orchestra, and your confidence in me."

Again the ovation was deafening as Serge Koussevitzky, in the 75th year of his life, stepped down from the conductor's stand and walked off the stage for the last time before the Friday afternoon audience as conductor and music director of the Boston Symphony orchestra. But it subsided quickly then and the audience filed out in silence. For notwithstanding Serge Kouusevitzky's adjuration to be happy, it was not a happy occasion.

It was truly the end of an era, the parting from a man who has been so closely identified with the musical life of this city and this nation for 25 years that many of us know no other and cannot, indeed, imagine any other. For Koussevitsky, the man and artist, the re-creator and genius, has been more than musician; he has been a symbol of the creative spirit of man that has been carried, torch-like, by the great men of every generation to the succeeding generation.

PLEADING FOR ALL

He has done this, not by specially pleading the case of one or another composer, but by pleading for them all. No composer, whether Frederick the Great (for Koussevitzky once performed one of that monarch's symphonies) or Sebastian Bach, Luigi Boccherini or Ludwig van Beethoven, Walter Piston or Lukas Foss, Arnold Schoenberg or Leo Sowerby, ever received anything but Koussevitzky's most devoted and most inflamed performance. If they failed to speak, it was not that Koussevitzky failed; on the contrary, his intense insight, his authority and his unflagging physical force often made them seem what they were not. This incredible conviction mingled with his devotion to all musical art as a whole, is what Koussevitzky has so lavished upon us that, seeing him go, we cannot but feel it won't happen agan in our lifetime.

His final program, itself the beginning and end of the towering musical genius of Beethoven, could not have been more suitably chosen. For these two works, poles apart in spirit, gave Koussevitzky every opportunity to display the thesaurus of his art. The First Symphony, light, engaging, of the most delicate textures and fabrics, was never better or more beguilingly played, nor has the orchestra ever responded more magically. Yet it was but the prelude to the great Ninth, perhaps the peak of the creative musical spirit in man.

HOUR-LONG WORK

This hour-long work was projected with an almost other-worldly quality of spirit. It has been better done, from a technical standpoint, when a large chorus has been employed, the orchestral forces deployed on a larger stage. Yet the emotional quality both of the performance and the occasion far outshone all other performances. And, for that matter, the quartet of soloists, was the best I've ever heard here in this work. The soprano of Frances Yeend soared above all in the fiercely high range called for by the composer; the contralto of Eunicc Alberts was strong and sure and focused; the tenor of David Lloyd was bright, vigorous and clear as a bell, and the bass of James Pease, as he enunciated the recitative that opens the vocal section of the work, was a stirring thing to hear.

The moment the Symphony was concluded the audience (many of whom had waited five hours to gain entrance to the Hall) broke into a prolonged outburst of ovationary applause, cheers and bravos. It was not for 15 or more minutes that Koussevitzky finally called for silence to speak to the audience. And when he finished and had walked from the stage, he had stepped into legend. We shall see him again, yes, but we'll remember him as he was yesterday, at the peak of one of the greatest careers in all music.

NEW YORKER
NEW YORK CITY
APR 23 1949

MUSICAL EVENTS

Hail and Farewell

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY and the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave a reading of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony last Wednesday night, at Carnegie Hall, that will, I daresay, for years remain bright in the memories of those fortunate enough to have been on hand. The fact that Mr. Koussevitzky was making his next-to-last appearance in New York—the last was on Saturday afternoon—may have contributed to the spell of the evening, but I doubt whether it contributed much. What mattered was the manner in which the music was interpreted—the sublimity and maturity of Mr. Koussevitzky's conception, and the response he received from his orchestra, soloists, and chorus. I had the feeling that he was stretching himself beyond human capacity, was striving for something far beyond the limits of the hall, the shape of which even he would not recognize until he reached it. He was a man possessed by a rare ideal of beauty, and possessed, too, by a determination to realize his vision and make it clear and pure for all those present. This is by way of saying that I have never before heard the Ninth performed with such magnificence. Mr. Koussevitzky was nobly assisted by the orchestra; by Frances Yeend, soprano, David Lloyd, tenor, Eunice Alberts, contralto, and James Pease, bass; and by a choir made up of the Juilliard Chorus and the Collegiate Chorale, which had been prepared by Robert Shaw. There were many stirring things about the performance, but none that surpassed the fusion of orchestra and chorus in the last movement. Everybody concerned seemed aware that Beethoven's music and Schiller's words ("All mankind knows all men brothers . . .") conveyed a poignant, desperate message for our troubled time. Mr. Koussevitzky opened with the Beethoven First Symphony, but I suspect that he was eager to get on to the Ninth, for he must have anticipated what was in store for himself and for us.

THE following night, Bruno Walter gave his interpretation of Beethoven's Ninth, with the Philharmonic-Symphony, in one of the concluding concerts of the Beethoven Cycle. Comparisons are odious but unavoidable, and by comparison with Mr. Koussevitzky's performance, on Wednesday, Mr. Walter's came in second best. Mr. Walter's was a fine Ninth; it just wasn't up to Mr. Koussevitzky's. Whereas the Boston Symphony had been aglow and inspired, the Philharmonic maintained its usual high standards and did nothing more. I did not feel that the soloists—Messrs. Harrell and Jobin, Misses Steber and Merriman—were as well matched as the group that had appeared the night before, but individually their voices were excellent, with Mr. Harrell's quite outstanding. Mr. Walter's chorus was the Westminster Choir, and it acquitted itself admirably. To sum matters up, Mr. Walter presented a satisfying Ninth, Mr. Koussevitsky an incomparable one.

I STOPPED by the City Center last Friday night to hear the New York City Opera Company's production of "The Marriage of Figaro," and, on the whole, it was a delightful evening. For one thing, the opera was sung in English, giving the average operagoer at least half a chance to discover just what the devil is going on between the Count and the Countess, Cherubino and the Countess, Marcellina and Figaro, Figaro and Susanna, the Count and Susanna, Dr. Bartolo and Marcellina, and the rest of the ladies and gentlemen who become so extremely involved in one of the most tortuous of all plots. For another, the production had a graceful simplicity and charm, although not as much charm as this season's first production at the Metropolitan. There was a tendency on the part of the cast to leap about in the farcical style often employed in the Metropolitan's productions of "The Barber of Seville," when everyone is at sixes and sevens, all flying arms and legs. The Susanna of the evening, Miss Haskins, sang well most of the time, but she occasionally sounded somewhat thin. Her acting wasn't too good; I was reminded of Blondie, and half expected her to launch into an aria in praise of modern kitchen appliances. Mr. Herbert played Figaro rather broadly, but his performance was on the credit side. Mr. Cassel's Count Almaviva was splendid, although I would have been happier if Mr. Cassel had given us a deeper sense of the sly predicament and the harassed noblesse oblige of that well-drawn symbol of the olden days.

—PHILIP HAMBURGER

Koussevitzky Hailed In Moving Farewell

Ha apr 30

By RUDOLPH ELIE

An era in music came to an end yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall, when Serge Koussevitzky, for 25 years the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, came to the final chord of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony. The audience knew it, too, and clamored so long and so insistently that the conductor, his lips trembling in emotion, at last held out his hand for silence. Silence never fell more rapidly or more completely over an audience.

(Continued on Page Six)

TRIBUTE GIVEN KOUSSEVITZKY

Arts Foundation Lauds His Great Career

Post apr 30

NEW YORK, April 29 (AP)—Serge Koussevitzky was lauded today as "a pioneer in introducing contemporary music" on the eve of his retirement as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Carleton Smith, director of the National Arts Foundation, issued a statement addressed to Koussevitzky, who retires tomorrow. It read:

"You have made an unparalleled contribution to the art of music in America.

"Generations to come will enjoy and treasure the work you have done.

"You have not only established a distinguished standard of orchestral performance. You have been a pioneer in introducing contemporary music. You have taught and inspired young musicians who will carry on your ideals throughout their lives."

The foundation's advisory committee on music includes Dr. Bruno Walter, Roy Harris, Darius Milhaud, Jean Sibelius, Dr. Fritz Busch, Dmitri Mitropoulos, Vladimir Golschamman, Marian Anderson, Lawrence Tibbett, Deems Taylor, Pierre Monteux, Charles Munch and Gregor Piatigorsky.

Koussevitzky Honored at Last N. Y. Concert

NEW YORK, April 16 (AP)—Serge Koussevitzky, winding up a full quarter-century as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, made his last scheduled appearance with the visiting Bostonians in Carnegie Hall today.

Greeted by a rising ovation at the start of the all-Beethoven program and with another at the end, Koussevitzky was presented a platinum watch on behalf of his Wednesday and Saturday New York audiences.

The gift, arranged for by a voluntary committee here, was presented in the presence of the standing audience by Miss Gertrude Robinson Smith of New York and Stockbridge, former president of the Berkshire Festival Committee.

In accepting what Miss Smith called the "tick-tick," Dr. Koussevitzky said:

"I was always happy to come to New York with my orchestra. I was always happy to play my best here. I know," continued the conductor who has programmed a great deal of new music, "that you have not always liked the new music I have played. But without new music we cannot have old music. Your support was the greatest help to me."

The program opened with a superb performance of Beethoven's First Symphony, and closed with a stirring Ninth.

FORT WORTH, TEXAS
MORNING STAR-TELEGRAM
APR 24 1949

'Telephone' Will Launch Opera Guild's Campaign

The hilarious operatic miniature, "The Telephone," by Gian-Carlo Menotti, will be the musical feature at the tea to be given at 2:30 p. m. Friday at River Crest Country Club by the Fort Worth Opera Guild, celebrating its first anniversary and opening its campaign for enlarged membership.

The little opera, lasting about 25 minutes, was paired with Menotti's harrowing "The Medium" in New York two seasons ago, to become one of the hit productions of the season.

"The Telephone" is given by two persons, who will be a young New York soprano, Peggy Lee Whiting, and Arthur Schoep, remembered for his fine appearances this season in the Fort Worth Civic Opera Association's productions of "La Boheme" and "The Bartered Bride."

Miss Whiting sang "The Telephone" last summer at the Boston Symphony's Berkshire Music Center, where she had won a scholarship in the opera department. Though a native of Utah, she studied in New York, at the Mannes Music School, where she had leading soprano roles in a number of operas, including Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro" and "Cosi fan tutte."

"The Telephone" describes the tribulations of a young man who desperately tries, before he has to take a train in one hour, to ask Lucy to marry him, but who never gets his question finished because of interruptions by the telephone. Finally he calls her from the station over a public telephone, and gets the right answer.

"Two years ago, when I gave my resignation to the trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra," he said, speaking loudly and firmly in an accent marked but clear, "I knew it would be hard to separate myself from you, my public, and my dear orchestra. But let us be happy," he cried, his voice deepening, "that we have had these 25 years together.

"Let us be happy that we have worked and created the greatest orchestra in the world," he continued, as the applause subsided. "Let us be happy that we have had a tremendous musical evolution in this country, that we have helped many composers until now we have composers in this country as great as any in the old world. I thank you for your co-operation, your devotion to the orchestra, and your confidence in me."

Again the ovation was deafening as Serge Koussevitzky, in the 75th year of his life, stepped down from the conductor's stand and walked off the stage for the last time before the Friday afternoon audience as conductor and music director of the Boston Symphony orchestra. But it subsided quickly then and the audience filed out in silence. For notwithstanding Serge Kouusevitzky's adjuration to be happy, it was not a happy occasion.

It was truly the end of an era, the parting from a man who has been so closely identified with the musical life of this city and this nation for 25 years that many of us know no other and cannot, indeed, imagine any other. For Koussevitsky, the man and artist, the re-creator and genius, has been more than musician; he has been a symbol of the creative spirit of man that has been carried, torch-like, by the great men of every generation to the succeeding generation.

PLEADING FOR ALL

He has done this, not by specially pleading the case of one or another composer, but by pleading for them all. No composer, whether Frederick the Great (for Koussevitzky once performed one of that monarch's symphonies) or Sebastian Bach, Luigi Boccherini or Ludwig van Beethoven, Walter Piston or Lukas Foss, Arnold Schoenberg or Leo Sowerby, ever received anything but Koussevitzky's most devoted and most inflamed performance. If they failed to speak, it was not that Koussevitzky failed; on the contrary, his intense insight, his authority and his unflagging physical force often made them seem what they were not. This incredible conviction mingled with his devotion to all musical art as a whole, is what Koussevitzky has so lavished upon us that, seeing him go, we cannot but feel it won't happen agan in our lifetime.

His final program, itself the beginning and end of the towering musical genius of Beethoven, could not have been more suitably chosen. For these two works, poles apart in spirit, gave Koussevitzky every opportunity to display the thesaurus of his art. The First Symphony, light, engaging, of the most delicate textures and fabrics, was never better or more beguilingly played, nor has the orchestra ever responded more magically. Yet it was but the prelude to the great Ninth, perhaps the peak of the creative musical spirit in man.

HOUR-LONG WORK

This hour-long work was projected with an almost other-worldly quality of spirit. It has been better done, from a technical standpoint, when a large chorus has been employed, the orchestral forces deployed on a larger stage. Yet the emotional quality both of the performance and the occasion far outshone all other performances. And, for that matter, the quartet of soloists, was the best I've ever heard here in this work. The soprano of Frances Yeend soared above all in the fiercely high range called for by the composer; the contralto of Eunicc Alberts was strong and sure and focused; the tenor of David Lloyd was bright, vigorous and clear as a bell, and the bass of James Pease, as he enunciated the recitative that opens the vocal section of the work, was a stirring thing to hear.

The moment the Symphony was concluded the audience (many of whom had waited five hours to gain entrance to the Hall) broke into a prolonged outburst of ovationary applause, cheers and bravos. It was not for 15 or more minutes that Koussevitzky finally called for silence to speak to the audience. And when he finished and had walked from the stage, he had stepped into legend. We shall see him again, yes, but we'll remember him as he was yesterday, at the peak of one of the greatest careers in all music.

[281]

NEW YORKER
NEW YORK CITY
APR 23 1949

MUSICAL EVENTS

Hail and Farewell

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY and the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave a reading of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony last Wednesday night, at Carnegie Hall, that will, I daresay, for years remain bright in the memories of those fortunate enough to have been on hand. The fact that Mr. Koussevitzky was making his next-to-last appearance in New York—the last was on Saturday afternoon—may have contributed to the spell of the evening, but I doubt whether it contributed much. What mattered was the manner in which the music was interpreted—the sublimity and maturity of Mr. Koussevitzky's conception, and the response he received from his orchestra, soloists, and chorus. I had the feeling that he was stretching himself beyond human capacity, was striving for something far beyond the limits of the hall, the shape of which even he would not recognize until he reached it. He was a man possessed by a rare ideal of beauty, and possessed, too, by a determination to realize his vision and make it clear and pure for all those present. This is by way of saying that I have never before heard the Ninth performed with such magnificence. Mr. Koussevitzky was nobly assisted by the orchestra; by Frances Yeend, soprano, David Lloyd, tenor, Eunice Alberts, contralto, and James Pease, bass; and by a choir made up of the Juilliard Chorus and the Collegiate Chorale, which had been prepared by Robert Shaw. There were many stirring things about the performance, but none that surpassed the fusion of orchestra and chorus in the last movement. Everybody concerned seemed aware that Beethoven's music and Schiller's words ("All mankind knows all men brothers . . .") conveyed a poignant, desperate message for our troubled time. Mr. Koussevitzky opened with the Beethoven First Symphony, but I suspect that he was eager to get on to the Ninth, for he must have anticipated what was in store for himself and for us.

THE following night, Bruno Walter gave his interpretation of Beethoven's Ninth, with the Philharmonic-Symphony, in one of the concluding concerts of the Beethoven Cycle. Comparisons are odious but unavoidable, and by comparison with Mr. Koussevitzky's performance, on Wednesday, Mr. Walter's came in second best. Mr. Walter's was a fine Ninth; it just wasn't up to Mr. Koussevitzky's. Whereas the Boston Symphony had been aglow and inspired, the Philharmonic maintained its usual high standards and did nothing more. I did not feel that the soloists—Messrs. Harrell and Jobin, Misses Steber and Merriman—were as well matched as the group that had appeared the night before, but individually their voices were excellent, with Mr. Harrell's quite outstanding. Mr. Walter's chorus was the Westminster Choir, and it acquitted itself admirably. To sum matters up, Mr. Walter presented a satisfying Ninth, Mr. Koussevitsky an incomparable one.

I STOPPED by the City Center last Friday night to hear the New York City Opera Company's production of "The Marriage of Figaro," and, on the whole, it was a delightful evening. For one thing, the opera was sung in English, giving the average operagoer at least half a chance to discover just what the devil is going on between the Count and the Countess, Cherubino and the Countess, Marcellina and Figaro, Figaro and Susanna, the Count and Susanna, Dr. Bartolo and Marcellina, and the rest of the ladies and gentlemen who become so extremely involved in one of the most tortuous of all plots. For another, the production had a graceful simplicity and charm, although not as much charm as this season's first production at the Metropolitan. There was a tendency on the part of the cast to leap about in the farcical style often employed in the Metropolitan's productions of "The Barber of Seville," when everyone is at sixes and sevens, all flying arms and legs. The Susanna of the evening, Miss Haskins, sang well most of the time, but she occasionally sounded somewhat thin. Her acting wasn't too good; I was reminded of Blondie, and half expected her to launch into an aria in praise of modern kitchen appliances. Mr. Herbert played Figaro rather broadly, but his performance was on the credit side. Mr. Cassel's Count Almaviva was splendid, although I would have been happier if Mr. Cassel had given us a deeper sense of the sly predicament and the harassed noblesse oblige of that well-drawn symbol of the olden days.

—PHILIP HAMBURGER

)r. Koussevitzky with Bruckner Music

Seventh Symphony Presented For First Time in Ten Years

By L. A. Sloper

For his penultimate program as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, heard yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall, Dr. Koussevitzky chose Bruckner's Seventh Symphony, in E major. After the intermission came two items from Wagner, "A Siegfried Idyl" and and the Overture to "Tannhäuser."

Possibly these Wagnerian numbers were included to remind us of the inspiration of much of the first half of the program. Not that we need a reminder. Bruckner's sincere flattery is apparent.

♪ ♪ ♪

This symphony is not often performed, though it is received with warm applause whenever it is offered. It was last heard here nearly 10 years ago. Before that it had been played by Dr. Koussevitzky in 1934, when he received the Medal of the Bruckner Society of America, and in 1936. Previously it had remained on the shelves since the days of Dr. Muck.

Yesterday it had the most persuasive performance I have ever heard, for tonal beauty and lyricism. Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra seemed to surpass themselves in these two particulars, in which they have always excelled. The cellos set the standard at the very begiming with a marvelously full-throated songfulness, and the rest of the orchestra immediately accepted the challenge.

Thereafter through the first two movements the mellowness and expressiveness were maintained, except when the conductor whipped up the brass too mercilessly at the end of the first movement and in the climax of the dirge. There the tonal quality was impaired.

♪ ♪ ♪

If the excellence of the playing seemed less apparent in the last two movements, that may have been because the music itself falls away there in interest. Certainly there was no let-up in Dr. Koussevitzky's demands, nor in the orchestra's response. The final peroration was no less sonorous than the dirge. The performance made us regret still more the impending retirement of the conductor. The applause yesterday had an extra warmth.

Music Plans and Prospects

Roland Hayes will give his annual Boston recital in Symphony Hall Sunday afternoon, Nov. 6. His program will embody the fruits of his recent explorations in the fields of old and new song literature.

♪ ♪ ♪

Final Symphony Program

The final program of the Boston Symphony season, and of Dr. Koussevitzky's directorate, to be given on Friday and Saturday of next week, will consist of the First and Ninth Symphonies of Beethoven. For the ninth the chorus will be provided by the combined Harvard and Radcliffe choirs, and the soloists will be Frances Yeend, soprano, Eunice Alberts, contralto, David Lloyd, tenor, and James Pease, bass.

The last concert of the Sunday series will be given tomorrow afternoon, Dr. Koussevitzky conducting. The program includes Wagner's Prelude to "Lohengrin" and "A Siegfried Idyl" and the Fourth Symphony of Tchaikovsky.

♪ ♪ ♪

Popular Music Concert

The Department of Popular Music at the New England Conservatory of Music will give a concert Monday evening, May 9, at 8:15 in Jordan Hall. Avner Rakov will conduct. Open to the public without charge.

NY Times ap 30

Koussevitzky Leads Last Concert At Boston Tonight After 25 Years

Selects All-Beethoven Program for Finale—Former Students Plan Fete on Retirement

Special to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

BOSTON, April 29—Dr. Serge Koussevitzky gave Boston today its final Friday afternoon concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in his official capacity as conductor. He retires tomorrow night after twenty-five years on the podium.

Amid what one bystander was moved to describe as a "proper Bostonian version of world series enthusiasm," Dr. Koussevitzky presented an all-Beethoven program, including the Ninth Symphony, which the conductor remarked was "Beethoven's last, also." The program will be repeated at his final concert tomorrow night.

The first customers for the 300 "rush seats" in the gallery were reported on hand at 5 A. M. When the first symphony all staff members reported four hours later, fully 200 were waiting.

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky

Students Cut Classes

Many of these were college students, some of whom readily admitted they were cutting classes to attend. Several Harvard students brought along a sofa for comfort, but were prevailed upon to remove it in the interests of more room for the others. Folding camp stools, however, were numerous.

Dr. Koussevitzky received a standing ovation when he appeared for the concert. At the end, the capacity audience applauded and shouted "bravos" for twenty minutes before the 74-year-old conductor was able to respond with a brief speech of thanks.

Russian-born, Dr. Koussevitzky was brought here to conduct the orchestra in 1924 and has been credited with molding it into the most highly perfected and sensitized symphonic ensemble in the world. He was noted for his interest in young composers, and his career brought popular recognition to the music of Stravinsky and Sibelius, and in later years, to the young Soviet composer, Dimitri Shostakovich.

Although he had voluntarily exiled himself from Russia in 1920, after differences with the Soviet, Dr. Koussevitzky has refused to allow politics to affect his musical tastes. He became a United States citizen in 1941.

Virtuoso in Own Right

In his own right, Dr. Koussevitzky also is held to be one of the leading virtuosos of all time on the double bass. He served as the leading double bass at the Imperial Opera at Moscow in his earlier years and also became professor of that instrument at the Moscow Philharmonic Conservatory.

He has composed a concerto for the double bass and orchestra and has transcribed many classics for it and piano. Rising from the poverty of only three rubles in his pocket, Dr. Koussevitzky has achieved both monetary and classical fame in this country. He holds honorary doctorates from both Harvard and Brown Universities.

Although a hard taskmaster with his musicians, he has their respect and is one of the most popular conductors in the fifty-seven-year history of the Boston orchestra.

The orchestra and the city will express its feelings toward Dr. Koussevitzky Monday night with a civic dinner in Symphony Hall. Six of his former students at the Tanglewood School in Lenox, Mass., joined in writing one movement each of a six-movement cantata, which will be presented at the dinner.

Koussevitzky Given 10-Min. Ovation

Gl ap 30

Conductor Recalled 6 Times as Symphony Career Nears End

THEY WAITED IN VAIN—Part of overflow crowd turned away from farewell concert of Serge Koussevitzky, famed conductor, at Symphony Hall.

By CYRUS DURGIN

In this world, all things must end, and Serge Koussevitzky's long and brilliant regime as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is concluded this week. Yesterday afternoon at Symphony Hall he said good-by to the Friday subscribers, and tonight he will take leave of the Saturday audience. He chose to present on these high occasions the same program with which he made his adieux in New York two weeks ago: the First and [illegible]th Symphonies of Beethov...

See KOUSSEVITZKY Page 11

[286]

citation."

SYMPHONY CONCERT

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Anyone attending the Symphony Concerts just now would never suspect that soloists are the exceptions there, rather than the rule. In successive Friday-Saturday pairs we have had as guest-artists Sylvia Marlowe, harpsichordist; Oscar Borgerth, violinist; and Soulima Stravinsky, Nicole Henriot and Myra Hess, pianists. This week there is a 'cellist, Gregor Piatigorsky; while the next Boston pair a forthnight hence will bring two singers, Adele Addison and Nan Merriman. At that time Leonard Bernstein, returning for one more week, will, in response to many requests, repeat the Second Symphony of Mahler, which he revived last year, and with the choirs of Harvard and Radcliffe again assisting.

Dr. Koussevitzky had planned to make this week's an all-French program; but more time was needed for the preparation of the choral number, Florent Schmitt's 42d Psalm, and for it Tchaikovsky's Fourth Symphony, was substituted. Still another change was the replacing of Honegger's Fourth Symphony by the Suite of Roussel. That left from the original list only tne two Cello Concertos: The First of Milhaud, in its initial local performances, and the A minor of Saint-Saens.

Yesterday's concert began and ended vigorously, and in the key of F major. That which came in between was on the quiet side, excepting, of course, the first and third movements of the Tchaikovsky. Milhaud's Concerto, composed in 1934, is a predominantly gentle work. At the outset the cello plays alone and it never has to work very hard to assert itself. The music is amiable, melodic, surprisingly free from harmonic asperities, and in the last movement, marked Joyeux, not too far removed from the music hall. No doubt, it is not exactly easy to play, but Mr. Piatigorsky made seemingly light work of it, and he sailed serenely through the elegant measures of Saint-Saens. This highly agreeable work had not been heard at the regular concerts since 1936 and since we hear so little Saint-Saens nowadays, was most welcome both for itself and for the superb performance if received for soloist, conductor and orchestra.

Roussel's Suite offers a first movement of tremendous energy, that keeps you on the edge of your chair, a lively Gigue, and between them, for the needed contrast, a pleasing Sarabande. This is one of that singular composer's more satisfactory creations, much to be preferred to the noisily inconsequential Third Symphony that Mr. Munch revived for us last year. Yesterday's performance was a fine one.

N. Y. Acclaims Koussevitzky in Farewell Bow

By CYRUS DURGIN

NEW YORK, April 16—The week past has held honors on every hand for Serge Koussevitzky, who is approaching the end of his 25th and last season as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. In Philadelphia, New Brunswick, N. J., Brooklyn and twice in New York, capacity audiences have shown in forceful terms the admiration and affection they have for him as an artist and an individual.

See KOUSSEVITZKY Page 34

KOUSSEVITZKY

Continued From the First Page

The season's final tour of the orchestra, which ended in Carnegie Hall this afternoon, thus has been for the illustrious music director a combination of triumphal progress and a multiple hail and farewell.

Koussevitzky's first appearance on the stage of Carnegie Hall was the signal for a spontaneous rising of the entire audience. At the end of the concert, as conductor and soloists bowed with chorus and orchestra, the intensity of the ovation increased until Koussevitzky returned alone, and then everybody stood up all over again.

A Simple Memento

This time he was followed closely by Gertrude Robinson Smith, a New Yorker who used to be chairman of the former Berkshire Symphonic Festival Committee, and a leading supporter of the Boston Symphony.

"I have been chosen to represent your New York public to show the affection in which they hold you both as an artist and a person. We want to say thank you for the pleasure you have given us over 25 years, and we only wish you were beginning another 25. In this little red case you will find a 'tick-tick'. It is engraved, "To Serge Koussevitzky, 1924-1949."

The "tick-tick" was an expensive platinum watch and chain from Cartier's, for which many individual subscribers to the New York series by the orchestra gave $1 each.

"I have always been happy in coming to New York," replied Koussevitzky, in a voice at first low and heavily breathed after his exertions, but which grew in strength to his ringing last sentence: "I say to you, 'Au revoir'."

He drew a laugh when he remarked: "I knew that all of you have not liked the new music I have played. But it was necessary to play it, for the good of the art and of the young new artists, the composers. For your support in coming to these concerts, for your interest in hearing this music, new and old, I thank you."

This ceremonial was the last in a series over the week. His career and the nature of the Boston Symphony had been summed, in the Philadelphia Academy of Music, Tuesday. Pres. Huff of the Philadelphia Forum, under whose auspices the orchestra appears in that city, made a glowing speech.

Thursday night in the gymnasium at Rutgers University, Koussevitzky had been given the large and handsome bronze medal of the Rutgers Award. This was the second honor he has received from Rutgers, the first having been an honorary doctorate of music, in 1937. The medal was presented by Dr. Potter of the university trustees, in the absence of Pres. Clothier who, by an ironic circumstance, was in Boston that night.

More eloquence, more sentiment and admiration were proffered in the staid Brooklyn Academy Friday, in a speech by Dr. Adrian Van Sinderen, president of the Brooklyn Academy of Arts and Sciences.

Waldorf Dinner May 10

Such tokens of esteem, coming as they do from widely separated communities (except for the river which flows between Manhattan and Brooklyn) is proof positive of the ranks in musical circles occupied by both the Boston conductor and his superlative instrument. But this was not the end. The League of Composers is putting on a dinner for him in the ballroom of the Waldorf Astoria Tuesday, May 10.

For his two last appearances in Carnegie Hall, Koussevitzky has chosen a Beethoven program, consisting of two symphonies, the First, in C major, and the last, in D minor. There is more than meets the eye in Koussevitzky's decision to take his leave with Beethoven's Ninth Symphony. For him this great work, with its choral finale on Schiller's "Ode to Joy," has an especial significance. It represents to him an outpouring of the best in the human spirit. It was not for nothing that he also played this "brotherhood of man" Symphony at Tanglewood in the last tense weeks before the outbreak of the war.

These performances were remarkably well done. The large chorus of 194 voices was drawn from the memberships of the Juilliard School of Music chorus and the Collegiate Chorale, admirably prepared by Robert Shaw. The quartet of soloists were individually able and unusually well balanced. They were Frances Yeend, soprano; Eunice Alberts, contralto; David Lloyd, tenor, and James Pease, bass, and they will be heard in the performances of the Ninth Symphony in Boston that will end the local season week after this.

Many at Symphony Hall Recall 1924 Welcome to Koussevitzky

By MARJORIE W. SHERMAN

With tears running down their smiling faces, Bostonians stood clapping long after the final Friday Symphony of the season was over. Serge Koussevitzky had conducted his last Friday afternoon concert after 25 years in Boston. A great many of his audience yesterday were at Symphony on Oct. 10 in 1924 to applaud him at that first memorable appearance.

Glimpses among the faces turned so intently upon that erect, familiar back as the magnificent Beethoven music swept the hall into the most intense stillness—Mrs. Charles Gaston Smith, who also heard that first concert in 1924. Mrs. Franklin W. Hobbs, another of those who remember every season of Mr. Koussevitzky's long and famous conductorship here—the George Lewises—Mr. and Mrs. Edward Jackson Holmes—the Eben Drapers—Mrs. William Dana Orcutt—Mrs. Arthur Devens—Mrs. Amor Hollingworth Jr.—Mrs. Richard Thorndike—and hundreds more, sharing the nostalgia of an occasion long to be remembered.

PHILA. PA.
Bulletin
[illegible]

Phila. Prodigy A Hit Despite Illness

NEW YORK, April 23.—The critics who lavished rapturous praise on Norman Carol's technique, tone and interpretive capacities when the 20-year-old violin virtuoso made his New York debut in Town Hall Thursday evening might have awarded him another accolade for courage as well if they had known under what physical stress the one-time child prodigy from Philadelphia gave his performance.

Four days before, young Carol had been stricken with the flu at the home of his parents, Mr. and Mrs. Max N. Carol, 6542 N. 18th st., Philadelphia.

He had not touched his violin—a Guarnerius rented from Mischa Mischakoff, concertmaster of the NBC symphony orchestra — from the previous Saturday until the moment he came out from the wings to face his audience.

Although under constant medical care, he had collapsed in the taxicab going from his hotel to Town Hall. A physician friend of the family, in New York to attend the recital, gave him an injection of penicillin and a nurse was hastily engaged for emergency duty back-stage during the recital.

Norman's face was drawn and unsmiling when he came out, but his poise and assurance as he tucked the violin under his chin, raised his bow and nodded almost imperceptibily to his accompanist, Erich Itor-Kahn, dispelled some of the apprehension of his parents

---

BRIDGEPORT, CONN.
POST
APR 29 1949

ORCHESTRA AWARD

BOSTON, April 29. — (AP) Composer-conductor Leonard Bernstein yesterday received the Boston Symphony orchestra merit award of $1,000 for his second symphony, "The Age of Anxiety." The work, based on a poem by W. H. Auden, was first performed by the orchestra four weeks ago with the composer at the piano. The award was established three years ago. The previous recipients are Aaron Copland and Walter Piston.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
SUN
APR 30 1949

Last Koussevitzky Concert

Boston Symphony Orchestra's Conductor Ending Twenty-five Years' Music-making There.

Boston, April 30 (A. P.).—Serge Koussevitzky will retire officially tonight after twenty-five years as conductor of the sixty-eight-year-old Boston Symphony Orchestra. His farewell appearance as official conductor will be made before his greatest admirers—the old Bostonians who pass on their symphony seats with their heirlooms, and the youngsters who wait in line for the top balcony.

This man, nearing 75, as a Russian peasant lad ran away from home because his father would have none of the music the boy kept talking about. Penniless in Moscow, he begged for lessons with so much spirit that the Philharmonic School took him in.

His career has been famous in Europe and America not only for artistry with an orchestra, but for help and friendship to new music and new musicians. Most recently, Koussevitzky has helped the young American, Leonard Bernstein, and the Brazilian Eleazar de Carvalho.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
APR 29 1949

LEONARD BERNSTEIN WINS $1,000 AWARD

Special to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

BOSTON, April 28—The $1000 Boston Symphony Orchestra merit award of 1949 has been won by Leonard Bernstein, it was announced tonight.

The young composer-conductor won the prize for his second symphony, "The Age of Anxiety." This work had its first performance four weeks ago by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Serge Koussevitzky conducting and the composer at the piano.

The award, established three years ago by Mark M. Horblit of Boston, has been received previously by Aaron Copland and Walter Piston. Each won it with his third symphony.

MOBILE, ALA.
PRESS-REGISTER
APR

Composer To Disclose Part Of Modern Opera

NEW YORK — (UP) — Excerpts from Marc Blitzstein's new opera based on Lillian Hellman's "The Little Foxes" will be heard for the first time on May 10 at a dinner and concert in honor of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky in the grand ballroom of The Waldorf-Astoria.

The Blitzstein version of "The Little Foxes" was commissioned by the Koussevitzky Music Foundation and will be produced in a Broadway theater next Fall. Blitzstein will be at the piano to accompany the singers during the program.

Music

Stravinsky and Son Bow in Symphony

By ROBERT BAGAR.

The Stravinskys—pere et fils—had the Boston Symphony in tow last evening in Carnegie Hall, where the program, as would be natural under the circumstances, offered an all-Igor Stravinsky list, conducted by him. Soulima Stravinsky, the son, made his first appearance here, playing the solo part in the Concerto for Piano and Wind Orchestra (with double basses).

The son is the image of the father, with three major differences—he is larger, he has more hair and he is less the sleek ballet-dancer type. His piano performance seemed to be in keeping with the demands of a score which sounds as if it can't make up its mind, although you may safely wager that it parses like anything.

A Nervous, Choppy Work.

Composed during 1923-24, it is a nervous, more or less choppy work, which shivers and jitters enough to prolong a lost week end. Soulima (if he'll pardon the familiarity) did a rather workmanlkie job, much as if he enjoyed his papa's music. The applause was not sensational, however.

The evening's "aural delights"—and there will be voices to challenge those words in quotes—were, for this willing listener, the Concerto in D for String Orchestra and a first concert performance of the "Orpheus Ballet in Three Scenes," which, as you doubtless are aware, is the music to the excellent Balanchine choregraphy introduced to local audiences by the Ballet Society at the City Center last year.

About the most startling thing I can think of to say concerning the Concerto in D is that Igor may well have been listening to Shostakovich, who—we all know—has done some considerable Stravinsky listening himself.

Devilishly Clever Patterns.

Anyway, I find it a high-class piece, which came out of the orchestra with a wealth of fluency and devilishly clever patterns, for all the hop-skip-and-jump sounds of the music. This work was composed in Hollywood, 1946, though it may fail to show any kinship with that Fiorenza of the Western Hemisphere.

Both the Concerto in D and the "Orpheus" are from the pen of a master who has latterly, perhaps, become less exclusively intellectual. The serious and the sycophantic minorities which have adored every step of this musician's way of the gem-studded cross should ponder well on the possibility that we may have a people's poet coming up, or is that idea just too repugnant?

A most provocative evening, which opened with the "Ode in Three Parts," for orchestra.

Turntable Talk

Koussevitzky Recorded With 'Bass Fiddle'

By BRUNO DAVID USSHER

Ordinarily large record manufacturers, such as R.C.A.-Victor, do not deal in limited editions. They figure in unlimited ones. At any rate, there is now a new "L.E." series among Victor's 24 or more categories of waxings. First of this variety bears on the back the legend, "Master of Double Bass" and the front cover bears the inscription " "25th Anniversary Souvenir." The name of Serge Koussevitzky appears in large facsimile. The anniversary, of course, refers to the fact that the Russian-American maestro has been conductor of the Boston Symphony since 1923, a span of public service paralleling the period of greatest musical development in this country. Koussevitsky's interpretations, programs and large array of phonograph records are part of this progress.

KOUSSEVITSKY

In other words, the Koussevitzky of the records is definitely present. What has given way to Koussevitzky, the conductor, is Koussevitzky, the internationally recognized double-bass virtuoso. The latter suffered an artistically logical eclipse when, in 1908, he exchanged the baton for the bow the first time outside Russia as he led the Berlin Philharmonica. In his own country he already had proven his directorial capacities.

Virtuosity Surprises Some

Many phonograph fans have remained unaware of the Boston maestro's command of the double-bass. Unique as this Victor album "L.E. No. 1" is (three 12-inch vinylites of double-bass music), under the circumstances, it is not a strange tribute to a great conductor.

As music, the pieces Koussevitzky plays on the "bass fiddle"—some are his own—do not need or even bear discussion. Tone quality and agility of bow and fingers are models of performance quality, especially as one can easily forgive the 75-year-old maestro a couple of somewhat obvious portamento "slurs."

Much of the time, except for the lowest notes, Koussevitzky draws notes which most cellists would envy. Tonal nuances and lightness are phenomenal in the "Chanson Triste" and "Wiegenlied," or "Lullaby." Double-bass playing of such sustained skill is rare. By the same token, it would have been interesting to have had a demonstration of the more dramatic and nobler moods in the expression of which Koussevitzky, the double-bass virtuoso of yore, must have excelled.

NEWEST ENGLISH ALBUMS DISPLAY BETTER QUALITY

Unusual recording qualities can be observed in recently released English albums. Those interested in choral singing will find Benjamin Britten's "A Ceremony of Carols" a rewarding experience. This album (EDA-86) features the Morristown Boys' Choir, Ivor Sims directing. Besides the Britten songs, the album of three 12-inch disks also offers an "Ave Maria," by Kodaly, and an "Enchanting Song," by Bartok.

Another English set which excels in vocal recording is that of the three Debussy "Nocturnes." As a rule only the first two are heard, the last one, "Sirens," requiring an exceptionally skilled and sensative women's choir. Such a choral personnel evidently was at the disposal of Conductor Sidney Beer. He seems to capture also the mood of the first sketch, "Clouds." His dynamics in the "Festivals," however, sound somewhat mechanical, compared with Stokowski's radio performance Sunday with the New York Philharmonic. Incidentally, one can hardly fail to suspect that a "Faun" lurks also in Debussy's "Clouds." The flute solo echoes that of the famous "Afternoon" piece.

PORT HURON, MICH.
TIMES-HERALD

APR 30 194

Famed Conductor Of Boston Symphony Calls It A Career

Boston, April 30 —AP— Serge Koussevitzky, who once turned himself into a symphonic Volga boatman because he wanted people to hear music, tonight puts down a brilliant baton.

He has lifted it to critical acclaim and devotion from the front rows and gallery for 25 years as conductor of the famed 68-year-old Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Tonight he makes his farewell appearance as official conductor of Boston Symphony before his greatest admirers—the old Bostonians who pass on their symphony seats with their heirlooms and the youngsters who wait in line for the top balcony.

If it's like Friday afternoon when he gave the same Beethoven program, tonight will be both concert and drama.

The Friday faithful gave him spirited applause—and there were tears on some of the old faces.

This for a man now nearing 75 who as a peasant Russian lad ran away from home because his father would have none of the music the boy kept talking about.

Penniless in Moscow, the lad begged for lessons. He did it with so much spirit that the dignified faculty of the Philharmonic school took him in.

That was the overture to a career famous in Europe and America not only for artistry with an orchestra but for help and friendship to new music and new musicians.

Most recently, Koussevitzky has

AND then he tossed off his program—exacting works of Handel, Lalo, Bach, Paganini and Sarasate—"with a positive grasp of style, depth of insight and skill of finger and bow awaited only from the completely mature artist," to quote Noel Straus in The Times.

The Times devoted two-thirds of a column, heavily larded with fulsome adjectives, to the debut. Some of the review ran as follows:

"His work was noteworthy for its refinement of feeling, its poetry and imagination. He possessed a sonorous, warm tone which remained pure even in the most exacting passages. The recital must go on record as the finest heard from any young artist of the season to date."

Equally flattering was Arthur V. Berger in the Herald-Tribune. "Remarkable," said his review, "was the way in which Mr. Carol went through a list of so many show pieces without striving to impress his listeners with the many feats he executed so well."

• • •

IF young Carol is thrilled by his signal success, it does not show in his words or demeanor today. He is still the almost self-effacing youngster who may be seen any day this summer playing "catch" with the neighbors' boys on 18th st. or rooting for the A's and Phillies at Shibe Park. Any day, that is, before and after the annual Tanglewood music festival in Western Massachusetts, where he will continue in his job as a member of the first violin section of the Boston Symphony Orchestra—and by six or seven years the youngest member of the organization.

Whether he will remain with the B. S. O. or will be embarked next fall on a concert career is something that will be decided in the next few months by him and his parents.

[288] present to you this citation."

Tribute Paid Koussevitzky On Final Appearance Here

By RUTH TRIPP

Serge Koussevitzky was honored last night on the occasion of his final appearance in Providence as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

He retires at the end of the current season after 25 years of service.

Metropolitan Theater was crowded to capacity with devoted admirers of Dr. Koussevitzky's great art. Their mingled feelings of regret at the termination of the happy association and gratitude for their good fortune to have shared in the inspiration of the orchestra's music were given forceful expression in a speech by John Nicholas Brown of Newport, retiring assistant secretary of the Navy for Air.

Mr. Brown, who is a trustee of the orchestra, presented Dr. Koussevitzky with a gift of $6462 from 258 Rhode Island contributors to the Serge Koussevitzky Anniversary Fund.

He then introduced Dr. Henry M. Wriston, president of Brown University, who presented Dr. Koussevitzky with a citation from the university which in 1926 conferred the honorary degree of Doctor of Music on the distinguished conductor.

Dr. Koussevitzky was visibly affected as he stood with the humble air of a truly great figure. His simple reply came slowly and deliberate as if he were reviewing, mentally, the accomplishments which had been extolled.

"Ladies and gentlemen," he said, "just 23 years ago, I received from Brown University the first recognition of my work. I have again received from Providence, from Brown, from my friends here. With my audiences in Providence, I was always happy. Here is a people that understand music is spiritual food, without which we cannot live, just as we cannot live without bread. I thank you."

Mr. Brown spoke of the "musical bounty" which the citizens of Rhode Island have received from the orchestra for two-thirds of a century. He continued; "We have come to realize that the dear perfection which you create is based upon your own immeasurable artistic integrity."

In referring to the gift of money he said "These dollars are no enough, for they are material. Ou truest gifts to you are appreciatic and the good wishes for long li and happiness which come from th hearts of a grateful Providence."

The citation which Dr. Wriston presented to the conductor was handsomely bound in leather. Its text follows:

"Few men can truly be called citizens of the world. Fairly to earn that title requires a happy combination of circumstance, talent and imagination; moreover only an adventurous spirit could carry a man from Imperialist Russia through all the capitals of Europe and then to America, here to crown long preparation and high achievement with distinguished leadership. Requisite also is an appropriate medium, a language which can be heard without translation in all the nations of the Western World and much of the Eastern as well. Your lifetime of artistic experience, shared with so many peoples, has been joined with remarkably gifted interpretations of music—as diverse as the communities within which it has been played. Because your skill, your aesthetic integrity, and your devotion to the public interest have brought you to a unique position, we delight to honor you. Therefore, in the name of Brown University, of which you have long been an honorary alumnus, I present to you this citation."

Musical Program

The musical program was one of Dr. Koussevitzky's rarest selection. It included a Sarabande, Gigue and Badinerie by Corelli, arranged in a Suite for String Orchestra by Pinelli "La Mer" by Debussy and the Brahms Symphony No. 1 in C minor, Op. 68.

The audience rose as the conductor entered for the opening number of the program and as he turned to his podium and waited with raised baton, the music seemed to flow quietly from another world. The dignity and tenderness of the Sarabande, the spontaneous gaiety of the Gigue and the speed and delicacy of the Badinerie demonstrated to perfection the accomplishment of the incomparable string section of this great orchestra.

"La Mer" has long been known to be one of Koussevitzky's masterpieces of interpretation. It was played with the utmost interpretive imagination and surpassed anything one could have hoped for in its refinement, its rhythmic impulse and its orchestral color. The musicians were inspired, and this performance was memorable.

The majestic grandeur of the Brahms first, with its soul-satisfying themes, was a wonderful finale to a great occasion. The righteous nobility of the great chorale will always recall the last Koussevitzky concert here with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Its themes rose and fell in hopeful assertion that great music is timeless and that each generation has its great interpreter. Koussevitzky is ours.

OMAHA, NEBR.
EVENING WORLD-HERALD
APR 30 1949

Farewell Tonight for Koussevitzky

Boston (AP)—Serge Koussevitzky who once turned himself into a symphonic Volga boatman because he wanted people to hear music tonight will put down a brilliant baton.

He has lifted it to critical acclaim and devotion from the front rows and gallery for 25 years as conductor of the famed 68-year-old Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Tonight he will make his farewell appearance as official conductor of Boston Symphony before his greatest admirers—the old Bostonians who pass on their symphony seats with their heirlooms and the youngsters who wait in line for the top balcony.

JOPLIN, MO.
NEWS-HERALD
APR 30 1949

Famed Symphony Conductor to Retire Tonight

Boston, April 30.—(AP)—Serge Koussevitsky, who once turned himself into a symphonic volga boatman because he wanted people to hear music, tonight puts down a brilliant baton.

He has lifted it to critical acclaim and devotion from the front rows and gallery for 25 years as conductor of the famed 68-year-old Boston symphony orchestra.

Tonight he makes his farewell appearance as official conductor of Boston symphony before his greatest admirers—the old Bostonians who pass on their symphony seats with their heirlooms and the youngsters who wait in line for the top balcony.

If it's like yesterday afternoon when he gave the same Beethoven program, tonight will be both concert and drama.

The Friday faithful gave him spirited applause—and there were tears on some of the old faces.

This for a man now nearing 75 who as a peasant Russian lad ran away from home because his father would have none of the music the boy kept talking about.

Penniless in Moscow, the lad begged for lessons. He did it with so much spirit that the dignified faculty of the philharmonic school took him in.

That was the overture to a career famous in Europe and America not only for artistry with an orchestra but for help and friendship to new music and new musicians.

Most recently, Koussevitsky has helped the careers of the young American conductor, Leonard Bernstein, and the Brazilian, Eleazar de Carvalho.

Berkshire Festival Opening Set For Boston Symphony on July 16

NEW YORK, Feb. 28—The 12th annual Berkshire Festival will open at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass., on July 16, the Boston Symphony Orchestra announces, The festival will climax the 25th season of Serge Koussevitzky as conductor of the orchestra.

Nine concerts will be given in the Tanglewood music shed, through three week-ends, on Thursday evenings, Saturday evenings, and Sundays afternoons (series A on July 28, 30, and 31; series B. August 4. 6, and 7; series C, August 11, 13, and 14). The guest conductors of the festival will be Leonard Bernstein and Eleazar de Varvalho. Soloists will be announced.

Before the concerts in the large music shed by the full orchestra Dr. Koussevitzky will conduct four concerts by a smaller orchestra in the intimate theater-concert hall. These concerts will be given on the Saturday evening and Sunday afternoon of two week-ends, July 16-17, and July 23-24. Two different programs will be given each week-end. They will be drawn from the music of Bach and Mozart, as in previous seasons, and this year music of Haydn and Schubert will be added.

In connection with the Koussevitzky anniversary, the Boston Orchestra has arranged with RCA Victor to distribute a souvenir album of double bass recordings made by Dr Koussevitzky in 1929, when he played for the last time the instrument which first brought him fame. The album, containing three vinylite records, will be sold for $10 each. All proceeds will go to the Koussevitzky anniversary fund of the orchestra.

"Troubled Island," an opera based on the life of Jean Jacques Dessalines, the Haitian liberator, will be given its first performance at the New York City Center on March 30, directed by Laszlo Halasz.

William Grant Still, Negro composer, wrote the music and the libretto is by Langston Hughes, developed from his own prose play, "Drums of Haiti."

George Szell, now in his third season as conductor of the Cleveland Orchestra, is planning a return visit to Europe this summer. He has been engaged to conduct the Amsterdam Concertgebouw Orchestra on June 30 and July 2, and at the Zurich festival on July 5. Thereafter he will take a vacation in Switzerland.

Walter Sharp, president of the Nashville Civic Music Association announced that the three-year-old Nashville Symphony will present all of Beethoven's nine symphonies in its 1949-1950 season. Conductor William Strickland will undertake the musically ambitious program in two series of concerts. He will give the symphonies in chronological order, importing a quartet of singers to take the solo roles in Beethoven's Ninth or Choral Symphony.

French Composer To Join Faculty at Berkshire Center

The French composer Olivier Messiaen will make his first visit to America this summer to join Aaron Copland as a teacher of composition at the Berkshire Music Center, summer school of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass.

Other members of the faculty under Serge Koussevitzky include the Juilliard String Quartet, Gregor Piatigorsky, Leonard Bernstein, Richard Burgin, Eleazar de Carvalho, Hugh Ross, Christopher Honaas, Boris Goldovsky, and 25 members of the orchestra. The six-week session will be from July 4 to Aug. 14.

The musical program was one of Dr. Koussevitzky's rarest selection. It included a Sarabande, Gigue and Badinerie by Corelli, arranged in a Suite for String Orchestra by Pinelli, "La Mer" by Debussy and the Brahms Symphony No. 1 in C minor, Op. 68.

The audience rose as the conductor entered for the opening number of the program and as he turned to his podium and waited with raised baton, the music seemed to flow quietly from another world. The dignity and tenderness of the Sarabande, the spontaneous gaiety of the Gigue and the speed and delicacy of the Badinerie, demonstrated to perfection the accomplishment of the incomparable string section of this great orchestra.

"La Mer" has long been known to be one of Koussevitzky's masterpieces of interpretation. It was played with the utmost interpretive imagination and surpassed anything one could have hoped for in its refinement, its rhythmic impulse and its orchestral color. The musicians were inspired and this performance was memorable.

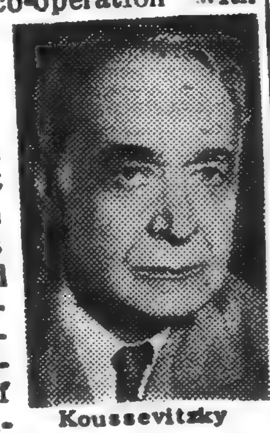
The majestic grandeur of the Brahms first, with its soul-satisfying themes, was a wonderful finale to a great occasion. The righteous nobility of the great chorale will always recall the last Koussevitzky concert here with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Its themes rose and fell in hopeful assertion that great music is timeless and that each generation has its great interpreter. Koussevitzky is ours.

ON THE RECORD

Koussevitzky Double Bass, Schnabel-Fournier Sonata, Busch-Serkin Trio, Some Other Things

By Claudia Cassidy

COLLECTORS IN SEARCH of Serge Koussevitzky's double bass recordings are being rescued by a series of circumstances. Perhaps you remember that when Boston asked its renowned conductor what he wanted in token of admiration and affection in the 25th and farewell season, he said he wanted "a big gift" for his orchestra. That gift was a backlog of financial security, and the fast growing Serge Koussevitzky Anniversary fund is the result. To augment it, a limited edition of 1,000 albums of Koussevitzky recordings has been made available by the Boston orchestra in co-operation with RCA Victor. Each is autografed, holds the portrait of the player with his instrument now hanging in Koussevitzky's Tanglewood home, and features three 12-inch ruby vinylite records of the slow movement from Koussevitzky's double bass concerto, his "Chanson Triste" and "Valse Miniature," and his arrangement of a largo by Eccles, plus a lullaby by Laska. The recordings were made in 1929, and you have to hear what they can do with the double bass to believe it. Pierre Luboshutz is the accompanist. The price is $10, including mailing costs. Address the Boston Symphony orchestra, Symphony hall, Boston 15, Mass.



Koussevitzky

—o—

BEETHOVEN: Sonata No. 3, in A major, Opus 69, played by Pierre Fournier, cellist, and Artur Schnabel, pianist (Victor DM-1231; three 12-inch records). Schnabel's illness has canceled his concerts, and the French cellist is not booked in Chicago so far, but this serene music, superbly played, is an agreeable consolation prize.

BEETHOVEN: Trio No. 4, in D major, Opus 70, No. 1, played by Rudolf Serkin, piano; Adolf Busch, violin, and Herman Busch, violoncello (Columbia MM-804; three 12-inch records.) Good music and good playing, with the ardor of Serkin's glowing piano surging up to make it bloom.

—o—

COPLAND: Sonata for Piano, played by Leonard Bernstein (Victor DM-1278; three 12-inch records.) This remarkable score is almost chameleonic in its response to pianists. Mr. Bernstein gives it a shallow sound, accentuating the jazz, which is the casual approach. On the final side he plays his anniversary sketches, "Aaron Copland," "My Sister, Shirley," and "In Memoriam: Alfred Eisner."

—o—

MEZZO-SOPRANO ARIAS: Sung by Cloe Elmo, with the E.I.A.R. orchestra, conducted by Armando la Rosa Parodi and Ugo Tansini, with Gina Cigna, soprano (Cetra 10; three 12-inch records.) The important thing here is the way Elmo's gorgeous quality makes opera something more vital than a dead language. Some of the excerpts are scrappy, and Cigna is no asset in the "Aida" second act scenes. But the aria from "Adrienne Lecouvreur" is richly sung, and the album also holds Azucena's "Condotta ell'era in ceppi" (the aftermath of "Stride la vampa"), "O grandi occu lucenti," from "Fedora," and Brangaene's warning, also sung in Italian, from "Tristan and Isolde."

—o—

SINGLES: Erna Berger, a lyric soprano with a pure and lovely quality, sings "Et Incarnatus Est" from Mozart's Mass in C minor with the Philharmonia orchestra, under the direction of Joseph Krips, one of Salzburg's conductors next summer (Victor 12-0692). . . . If you missed the joint recitals by Francis Poulenc and the gifted French baritone, Pierre Bernac, Victor 12-0426 has expert reproductions of three "Metamorphoses" and some excursions into the ways of the dromedary, the mountain goat, the grasshopper, etc. . . . Eleanor Steber sings Micaela's air from "Carmen" and Louise's "Depuis le jour" with Walter Susskind and the Philharmonia orchestra. Still a beautiful exuberant voice, sometimes riskily misused.

FAREWELL APPEARANCE: Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, holds a citation presented to him during intermission ceremonies at the Metropolitan Theater last night, as he received congratulations from John Nicholas Brown, trustee of the orchestra. The inset shows Dr. Koussevitzky on the podium. A check for $6462 from Rhode Island contributors to the Serge Koussevitzky Anniversary Fund also was given to the conductor. Last night's appearance was his final one in Providence as director of the orchestra. —Staff Photo

---

SYMPHONY OF ERA CONCERT FEATURE

Vaughan-Williams' 6th, Heard Here for 2d Time, Presented by Boston Orchestra

By OLIN DOWNES

Between two works which the Boston Symphony Orchestra has played here often and well, Dr. Koussevitzky put Vaughan-Williams' Sixth and latest Symphony on the program of the concert that he directed last night in Carnegie Hall.

This symphony, heard for the second time here, greatly impressed a majority of the audience and excited question marks and misgivings on the part of other inquiring persons. What was to be thought of this symphony, conceived during the last years of the war by the septuagenarian dean of the present English school of composition, and by all odds, in this writer's estimate, its most original figure? Was it even to be called a symphony? What place had it in the cycle of Vaughan-Williams' symphonic compositions, and how was one to estimate the place of so curious and unconventional a score in the music of this our day?

The symphony is a profoundly personal document, very deeply felt, put down with entire disregard of immediate effect or of public approval. The years will show how it measures, compared with the earlier works of Vaughan-Williams, the dreamer, the artist to the core of his soul. It is the most emotional music that he has written. It is shaped by experience of living in one of the most catastrophic periods that the modern world has known. It is not exterior music, or in any sense topical. It is music, unstudied in contents or style, of the inner and not the outward world.

Free in Its Form

It is free in its form, now departing from and now, as for example in the scherzo, keeping fairly close to accepted models. But the slow movement and the finale are wholly unconventional in structure; are, indeed, as remarkable for freedom from precedent as they are conspicuous for a logic that emanates from the themes themselves and the specific expressive purpose in hand. In no other work, by even so poetical and subjective—one could add, non-professional composer as this one—does the music show, as here, that it went down on paper in the one inevitable way in which it had to go down, and which permitted of no other.

In four connected movements the symphony is an unbroken succession of ideas and moods. A big orchestra is employed; a stormy picture is unfolded at the beginning. At the end one hears the whispering of a few strings. For the symphony progresses deeper and deeper to the inmost recesses of the consciousness. We know of no other symphony whose finale is so sensitive and intimate in its nuances, so completely of the spirit. One thinks of the words that Renan uttered at the funeral of Turgenieff, that it was as if the reveries of centuries had amassed themselves about his heart.

A symphony utterly amazing for its naive truthfulness and incapacity to pretend or "act up" or dissemble. It is of a fundamental and incorrigible simplicity. "Ich kann nicht anders." Is the form the final form in which the composer, had he the wisdom of God, would have cast his thought? In the very certainty that the Sixth Symphony of Vaughan-Williams is not this lies, we believe, a large part of its greatness. For the artist of vision is always overpowered in a greater or lesser degree by the wonder of what he has to say. This man, perhaps the shyest, the most reticent person we ever have encountered, rests his case simply on what he felt and the impulsion that he had to put it down on paper. The rest is for the future; the composer has no further concern in the matter.

Orchestra Is Superb

The audience was indebted to Dr. Koussevitzky and his superb orchestra for a superlative performance, which reached the heights and depths of the score. One noted in his first movement some especially fortunate touches, a for instance the noble breadth and articulation that he gave the theme which the strings intone over the brass and the harps, a theme which is the apex of the great line of the movement. The slow movement afforded the premonition, in its first measures, of that persistent motive of three repeated notes which the brass later takes from the strings—the imperious summons, sounding through the restless broodings of the other instruments, of which it could be said, as was said of Beethoven's famous motive, "Thus knocks fate at the door." Most sensitive and fraught with the deepest significance of all were the final pages, which at last merged into silence.

The symphony was preceded by the delightful concerto of Philip Emmanuel Bach, with the middle movement which could come out of the score of a Passion by Philip Emmanuel's father. It was followed, no doubt to the intense pleasure of a most appreciative audience, by another splendid kind of a symphony, the Fourth of Tchaikovsky, always sure-fire with an audience, never more so than when played by Koussevitzky and his virtuosos of the Boston Symphony.

PAWTUCKET, R. I.
TIMES
APR 30 1949

wages.

Koussevitzky Wins 20-Minute Ovation

Beloved Hub Conductor Gives Last Matinee; Finale Tonight

BOSTON (UP)—A milestone in music will be reached tonight when Serge Alexandrovitch Koussevitzky gives his final concert as conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra.

Seventy-four-year-old Dr. Koussevitzky, leader of the famed musical group for 25 years, will lay down his baton after the finale of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony.

The Russian maestro will be succeeded next season by Charles Munch of Paris, France.

An overflow audience applauded for 20 minutes yesterday as Koussevitzky gave his last matinee concert as head of the Boston orchestra.

He was called back so many times he finally made a short speech, saying:

"Let us be happy that we have had 25 years together. Let us be happy that we have worked and created the greatest orchestra in the world."

Then he thanked the audience for their co-operation with the orchestra and for their devotion to its maestro.

Koussevitzky will continue to serve during the summer as director of the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood in Lenox, Mass.

AUSTIN, MINN.
HERALD
APR 30 1949

Koussevitzky Lays Down Baton Tonight

BOSTON (AP)—Serge Koussevitzky, who once turned himself into a symphonic Volga boatman because he wanted people to hear music, tonight puts down a brilliant baton. He has lifted it to critical acclaim and devotion from the front rows and gallery for 25 years as conductor of the famed 68-year-old Boston Symphony orchestra.

Tonight he makes his farewell appearance as official conductor of Boston Symphony before his greatest admirers—the old Bostonians who pass on their symphony seats with their heirlooms and the youngsters who wait in line for the top balcony.

During his early days in Russia Koussevitzky chartered a steamer to carry his orchestra many miles along the Volga river, bringing to Russian villages their first symphony concerts.

Boston Symphony Lists Concert Programs Here

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has announced the programs for its next two New York concerts under Serge Koussevitzky's direction in Carnegie Hall. The list for Wednesday night, March 16, includes Carl Philipp Emanuel Bach's concerto in D for strings; Ralph Vaughan Williams's sixth symphony and Tchaikovsky's fourth symphony. Brahms's "Magic" Overture and first symphony; Eric Satie's two "Gymnopedies" and Debussy's "La Mer will be played Saturday afternoon, March 19.

Richard Burgin will conduct the Boston Symphony in its next concert at the Brooklyn Academy of Music on Friday night, March 18. His program includes Weber's overture to "Euryanthe," Brahms's third symphony, the adagio from Bruckner's string quartet and the suite from Rimsky-Korsakoff's opera, "The Tale of Tsar Saltan."

NATION
NEW YORK, N. Y.
APR 30 1949

Records

B. H. HAGGIN

Then a recording (EDA-107, $5.25) of Prokofiev's "Classical" Symphony performed by Münch with the Paris Conservatory Concerts Orchestra. The orchestra is a fine one; the performance excellent and superbly reproduced. However, the Boston Symphony plays with even more brilliance of sonority and execution, and the performance recently issued by RCA Victor has long been one of Koussevitzky's triumphs; also it is beautifully reproduced, even if not with the Decca distinctness and Decca's quiet surfaces; and so I would prefer it.

The RHODE ISLANDER

Providence Sunday Journal MAGAZINE
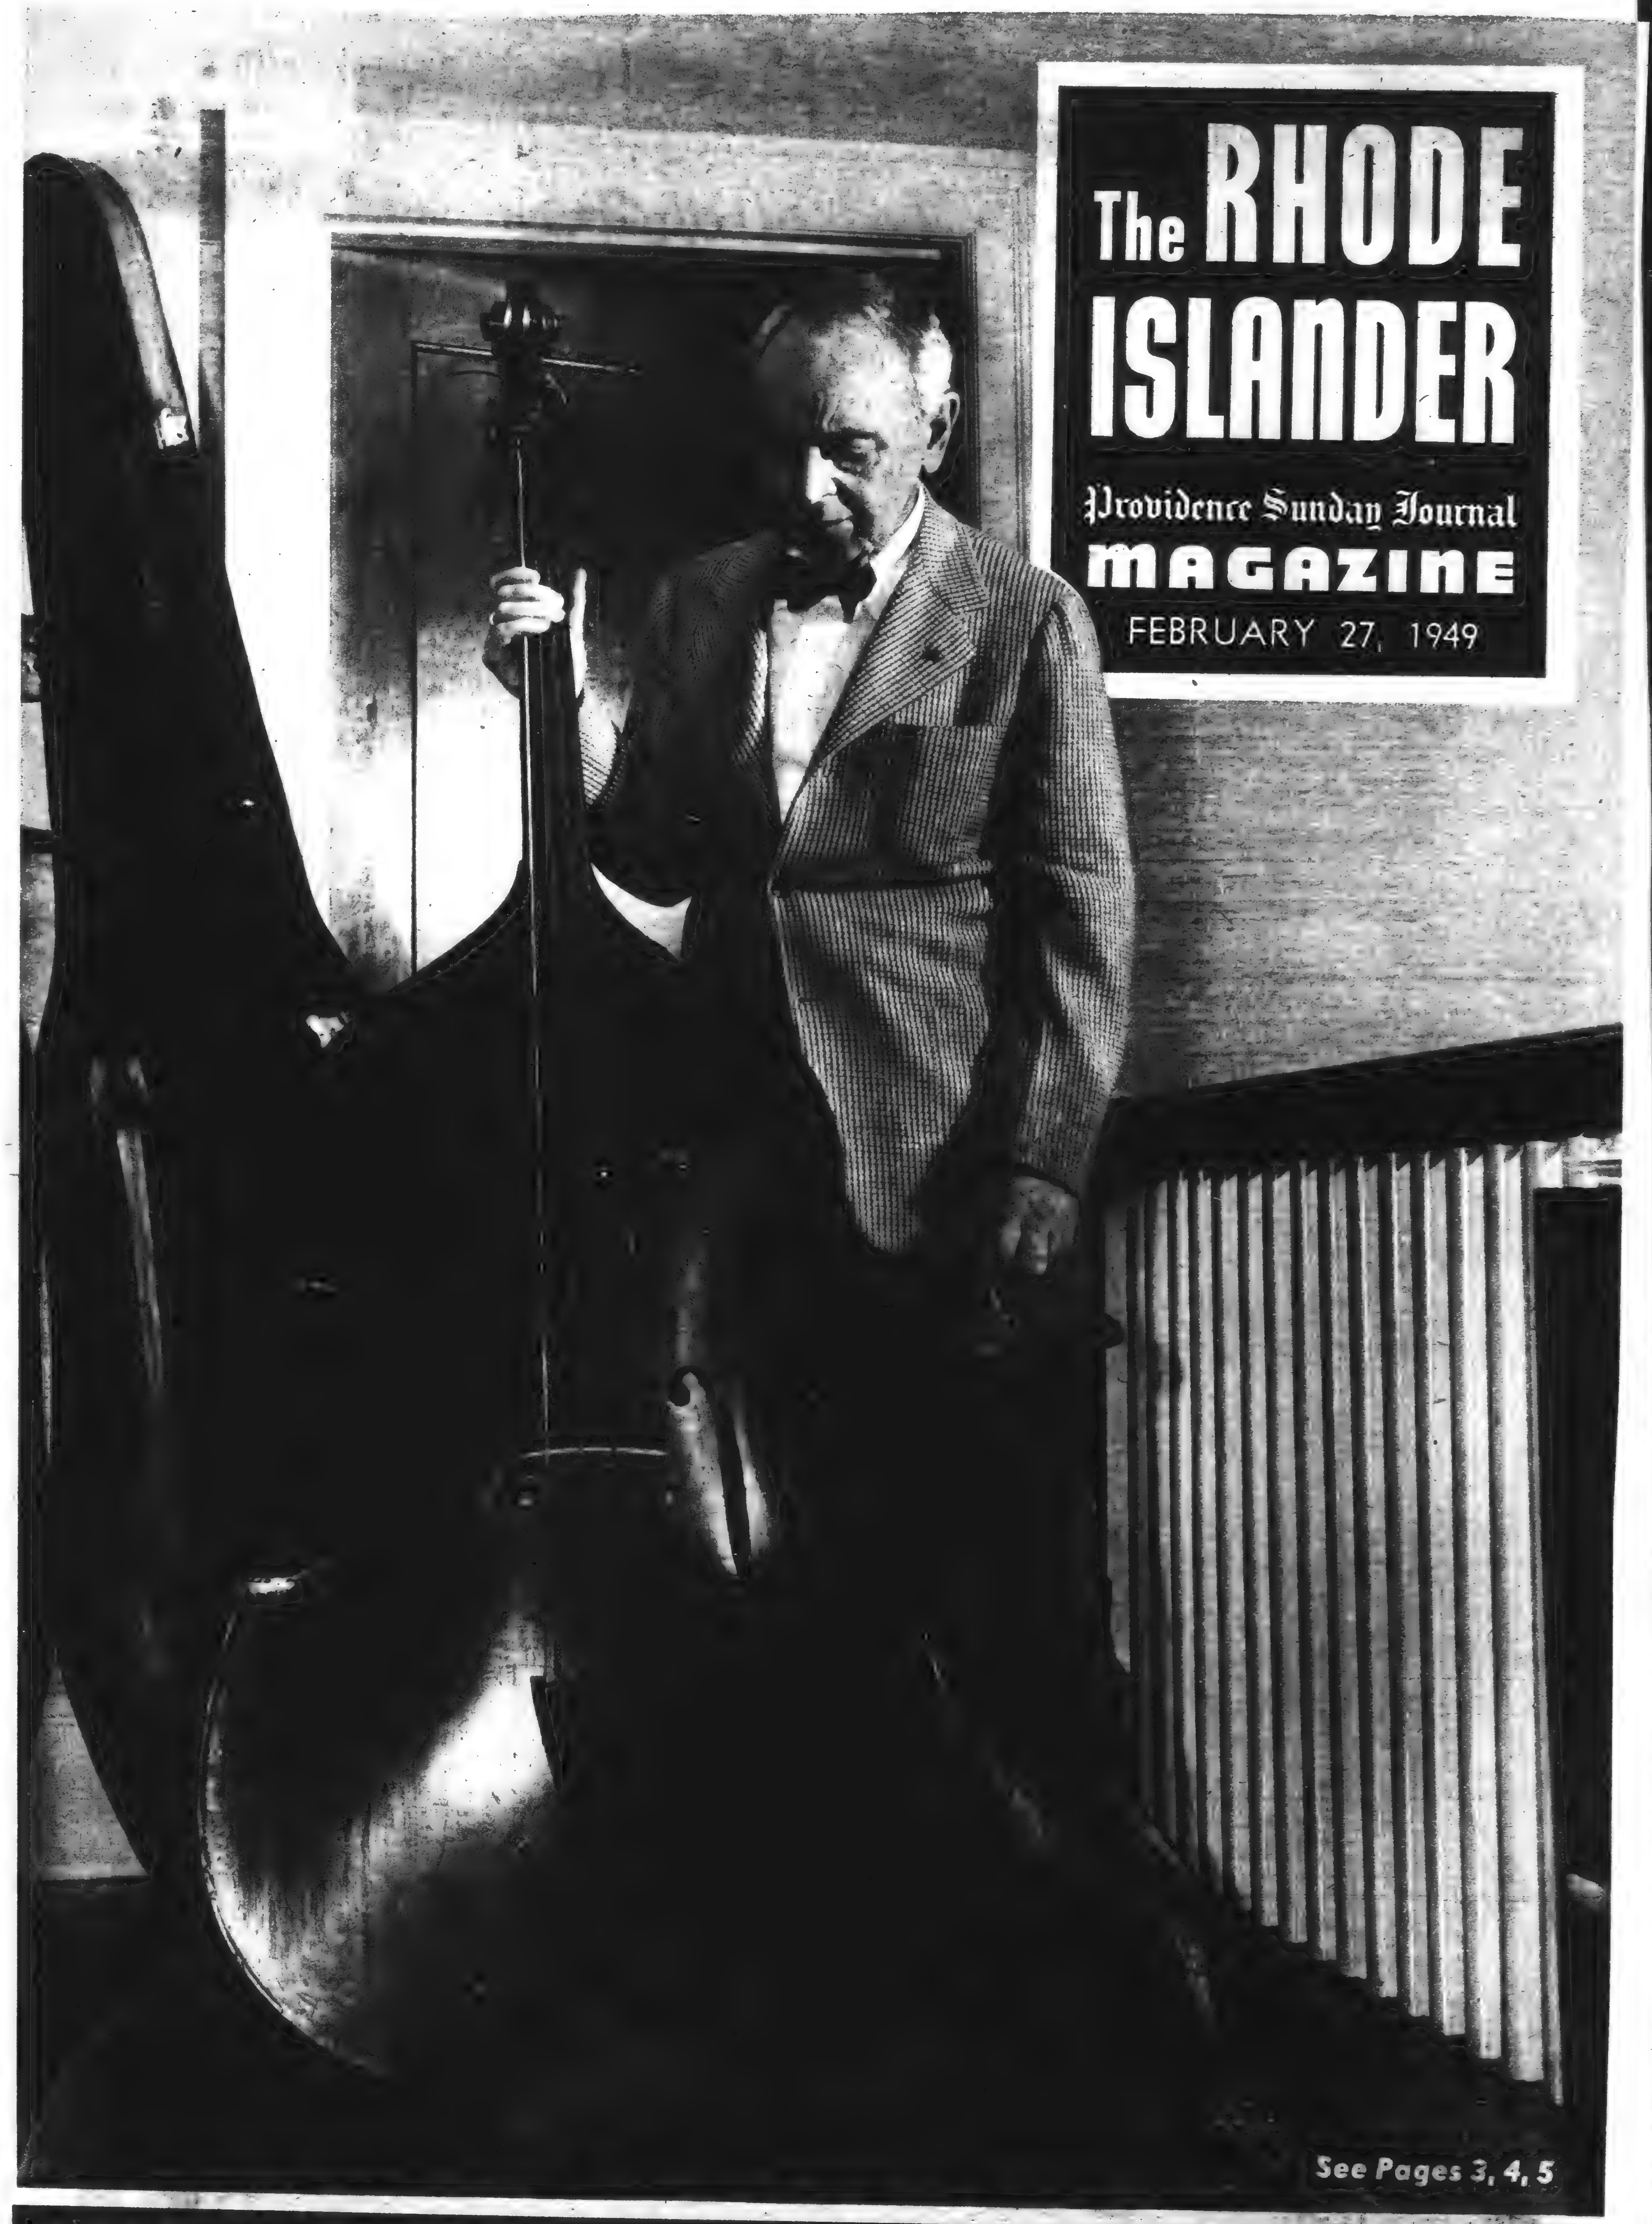
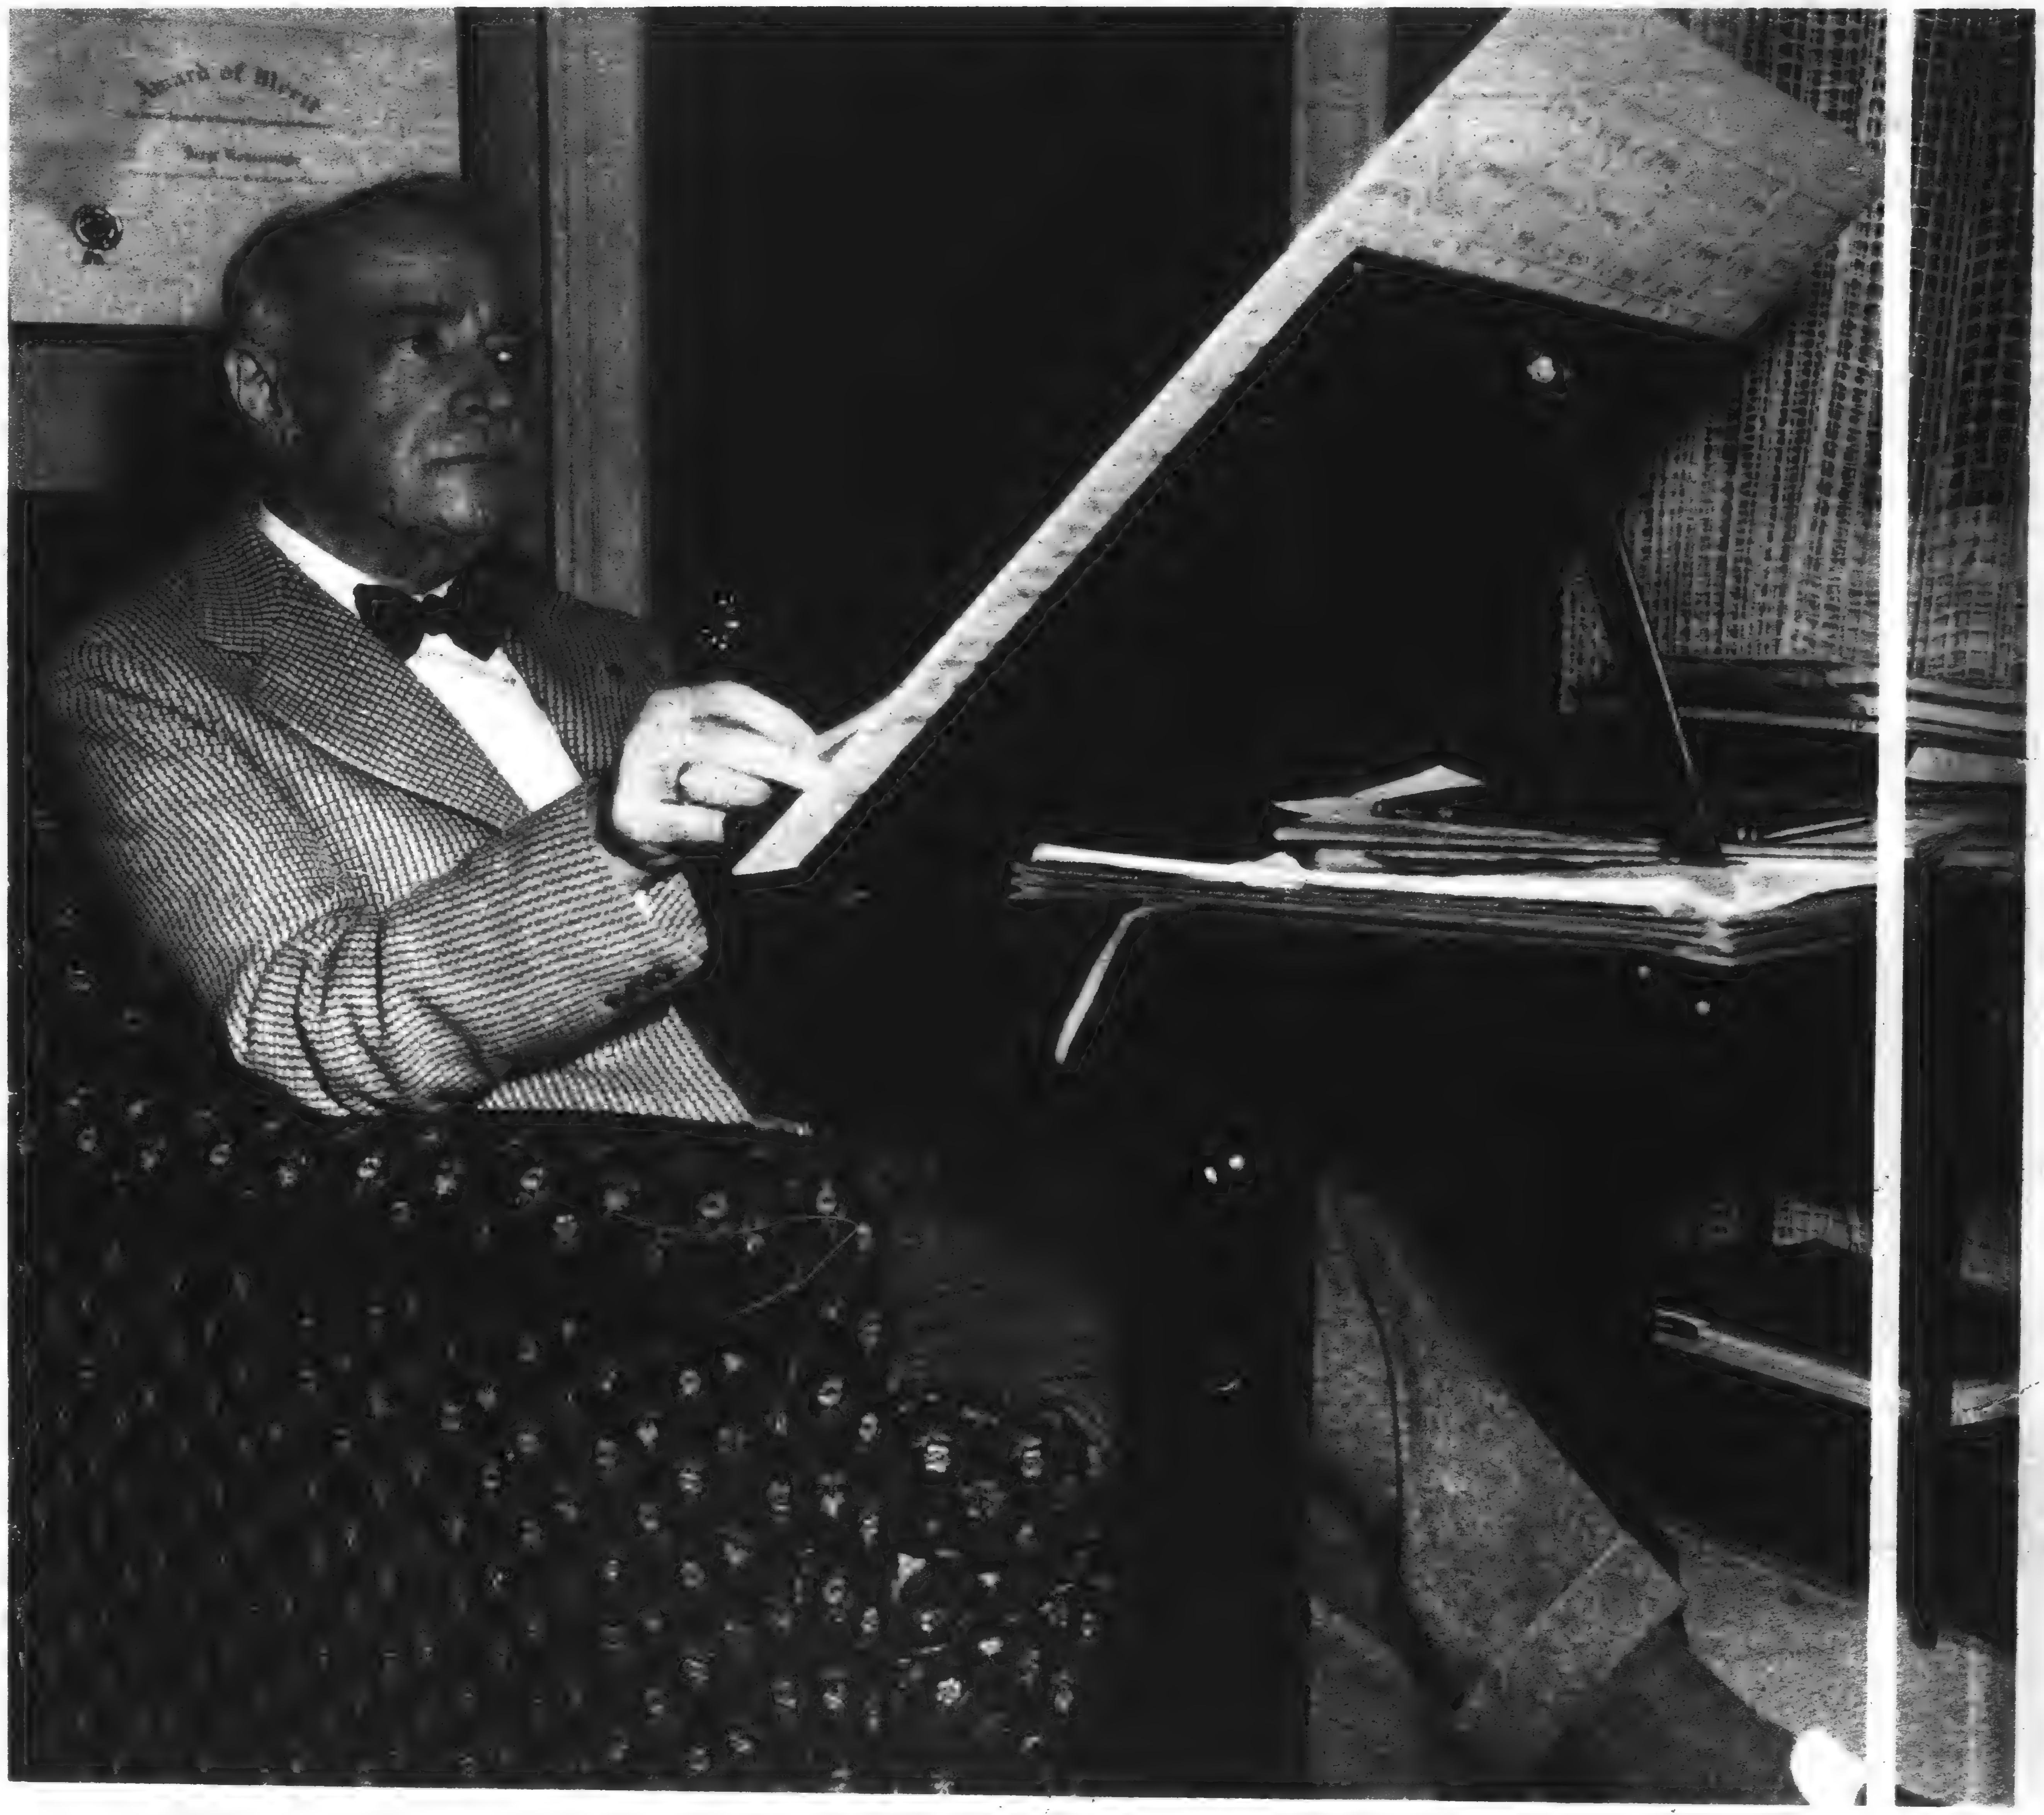
FEBRUARY 27, 1949



See Pages 3, 4, 5

VISIT WITH DR. KOUSSEVITZKY

[291]



INVENTOR. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, studies schedule and score on a stand he devised.

A VISIT WITH SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY

The famed conductor of the Boston Symphony, retiring in June after 25 years with the orchestra, talks about the past and enjoys a little show of magic.

STORY BY G. Y. LOVERIDGE — PICTURES BY HARRY A. SCHEER

ON the second floor of Serge Koussevitzky's Brookline home, at 191 Buckminster Road, is a small study. There, being a few minutes early for our appointment, we waited. The walls were hidden by framed certificates from Brown, Yale, Harvard, Rutgers, Boston University, the American College of Physicians, the Philadelphia Musical Academy, the National Association for American Composers and Conductors, and other organizations. A bookcase with locked glass doors contained musical scores and bound volumes of Boston Symphony Orchestra programs, and was surmounted by a small head of the conductor. Against one wall stood a spinet-style piano, and an armchair was drawn up facing a table with a top adjustable to several angles, for convenience in holding scores for study. At the moment, it held Rachmaninoff's third piano concerto.

Dr. Koussevitzky came in, quietly cordial, and shook hands. He was dressed in sport jacket and sport shoes, gray slacks, white shirt, and blue bow tie, and he seemed to be in the casual, leisurely mood suggested by his attire. But one was aware of contrasts, too—vigor remarkable in a man of 74, a florid, dominating face allied with hands white and gently eloquent.

An inquiry about the adjustable table disclosed that Dr. Koussevitzky had devised it himself. With an inventor's satisfaction he sat at it and demonstrated how the top could be moved backwards and forwards and raised or lowered.

Somebody mentioned opera, which took Dr. Kousse-

Continued on Next Page

On Tuesday night Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will make his last appearance in Providence as active director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, a post he intends to relinquish at the end of this, his 25th, season.

CRITICAL AUDIENCE—Dr. Koussevitzky, his wife and Bemoll—prepare to listen to recording of double bass solo made by virtuoso Koussevitzky more than two decades ago.

A Visit with Koussevitzky

Continued from Preceding Page

vitzky back to his boyhood and one of his finest musical experiences, as a student at the Moscow Conservatory. He was learning to play the double bass, an instrument with which he later achieved renown.

"Marcella Sembrich," he said, "might be called my first teacher. She came to the city in an opera by Donizetti—let me see, what one was it? No matter. I was a poor boy. I bought a ticket for 12 kopecs, six cents, way up in the top seats. When I heard her sing, I could not restrain myself. As soon as the act was over I went all the way down and ran out into the street and around to the stage door and asked to see her. They asked if I knew her. I did not. But they let me go in anyway.

"I knocked at her door. 'Come in,' she said. There she was, not even fully dressed. I began to tell her how wonderful her singing was. I talked in Russian, not thinking whether she could understand."

He struck his hands together in a gesture of surprise and rapture. His eyes shone.

"She understood Russian! I said, 'My admiration for your singing is so great that I could not wait for the opera to be over to tell you.' She was very pleased. She talked to me.

"Years later, when I come to this country, she is in my first audience. She is an old lady then, but she comes to every concert. Afterwards she comes to see me in my artistical room.

"From listening to singers like her I learn."

The conversation turned to conducting, and he remarked that less than a hundred years ago there had been no art of conducting, no developed technique; many conductors had taken up the calling more or less by chance. There is no such haphazard procedure in selecting the proteges, such as Bernstein and de Carvalho, whom he develops at Tanglewood. They must be highly talented and already well-grounded musicians before he begins work with them.

A conductor, he said, ought to do his work at rehearsals, using whatever means he deems necessary to insure the results he wants. At the concert he ought to take the podium with gentlemanly ease and conduct with a minimum of visible exhortation, in order not to distract the listener from listening.

He remarked that some of the younger men wanted to be taught to conduct without a baton. (Koussevitzky uses an almost invisible one.)

"I used to sit by myself," he said frowning, "and think: How would you conduct without a baton? I worked my hands different ways, like this."

He watched his hands dance and struggle in the air, as though they were trying to draw something out of the silence. Then he smiled, pointing his index fingers straight in front of him.

"Then I found a way. Were not these fingers little sticks? I told Bernstein, 'Now I can teach you to conduct without a baton'."

And in connection with his interest in young conductors he said something that is a key to all the rich musical activity at Tanglewood: "A conductor must not work only for his own success. He must work for the success of culture, to spread culture."

He recalled with pleasure that his first honorary degree, a doctorate in music, had been conferred by Brown University, in 1926. Unable to speak English well, he had expressed his thanks by playing solos on the double bass. For many years now he has not played the instrument but there exist a few phonograph records, made two decades ago, that he has only now consented to make public. Recording equipment in those days did not satisfy him. But he was one of the few masters of the double bass, and teachers, pupils and other admirers have been eager to hear the records, so they could obtain some idea of what the instrument can and ought to do.

Had he one of the records in the house? He had. And would he play it? He would. He called downstairs to ask his wife to put it on the phonograph. In a few moments a deep, slow song came up the stair well; it seemed the voice of neither a double bass nor a 'cello, though in range and in execution it reminded one of both. Koussevitzky stood near the doorway, his hands in his trousers pockets, his head bowed, nodding a little as the music proceeded. One could understand, listening, what he had learned from great singers like Sembrich.

In a corner of the landing was a tall leather trunk guarding the venerable instrument itself. Koussevitzky swung the cover aside and removed the silken wrapper, disclosing a double bass of beautiful form and color. "An Amati," he said fondly. The bow was there, too, but he did not touch it to the strings.

Downstairs we listened to the record again, and Koussevitzky remarked jocularly that in 25 seasons as a conductor he had played only three of his own compositions or arrangements. He thought that was very creditable indeed.

In the past, he said, he had had to bend himself to a rigid schedule of engagements, but after this season he would conduct not when he had to but when he wanted to. And perhaps he would even have time to go to the theater for a play or a movie. He has close friends in the theater, such a Katharine Cornell and Ethel Barrymore, but he never has opportunity to see them perform. And there are so many other friends from whom he has been cut off by his duties.

"I have many good friends in Providence," he said. "The audiences there are fine. I like to play for them. But there is one thing." He chuckled. "For twenty years I have been waiting for them to build a suitable hall. Now it is too late for me."

Meantime, Mrs. Koussevitzky had mentioned to photographer Scheer that her husband is fond of magic, an art in which Scheer is proficient. With naive delight, and plainly mystified, Dr. Koussevitzky watched Scheer vanish a marble and produce it from his mouth.

"It is wonderful!" said the conductor.

He observed intently while one of his linen handkerchiefs was being burned and restored by Scheer.

"Ah," he cried, wagging a finger, "this time I notice something! I notice something!"

He grinned and nodded.

The visit ended. As he returned upstairs to his study, Koussevitzky was still smiling to himself.

THE COVER PICTURE . . . shows Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, music director of Boston Symphony Orchestra, examining the Amati double bass that he played when he was foremost performer on the instrument. He does not play now, nor has he for many years. Picture by Harry A. Scheer.

Director Honored: Serge Koussevitzky (left), music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, holds a citation presented him by Dr. Henry M. Wriston (right), president of Brown University, during intermission of the symphony's concert last night in the Metropolitan Theater. In center is John Nicholas Brown, who presented the director with a check for $6462 from Rhode Island contributors to the Serge Koussevitzky Anniversary Fund.

—Staff Photo

Providence R.I.

3/2/49

Serge Koussevitzky Feted In Final City Appearance

Retiring Boston Symphony Conductor Presented Gift of $6462 From 258 Admirers, Receives Citation From Brown University Head

By RUTH TRIPP

Serge Koussevitzky was honored last night on the occasion of his final appearance in Providence as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

He retires at the end of the current season after 25 years of service.

Metropolitan Theater was crowded to capacity with devoted admirers of Dr. Koussevitzky's great art. Their mingled feelings of regret at the termination of the happy association and gratitude for their good fortune to have shared in the inspiration of the orchestra's music were given forceful expression in a speech by John Nicholas Brown of Newport, assistant secretary of the Navy for Air.

Mr. Brown, who is a trustee of the orchestra, presented Dr. Koussevitzky with a gift of $6462 from 258 Rhode Island contributors to the Serge Koussevitzky Anniversary Fund.

He then introduced Dr. Henry M. Wriston, president of Brown University, who presented Dr. Koussevitzky with a citation from the university which in 1926 conferred the honorary degree of Doctor of Music on the distinguished conductor.

Visibly Affected

Dr. Koussevitzky was visibly affected as he stood with the humble air of a truly great figure. His simple reply came slowly and deliberate as if he were reviewing, mentally, the accomplishments which had been extolled.

"Ladies and gentlemen," he said, "just 23 years ago, I received from Brown University the first recognition of my work. I have again received from Providence, from Brown, from my friends here. With my audiences in Providence, I was always happy. Here is a people that understand music is spiritual food, without which we cannot live, just as we cannot live without bread. I thank you."

Mr. Brown spoke of the "musical bounty" which the citizens of Rhode Island have received from the orchestra for two-thirds of a century. He continued; "We have come to realize that the dear perfection which you create is based upon your own immeasurable artistic integrity."

In referring to the gift of money, he said "These dollars are not enough, for they are material. Our truest gifts to you are appreciation and the good wishes for long life and happiness which come from the hearts of a grateful Providence."

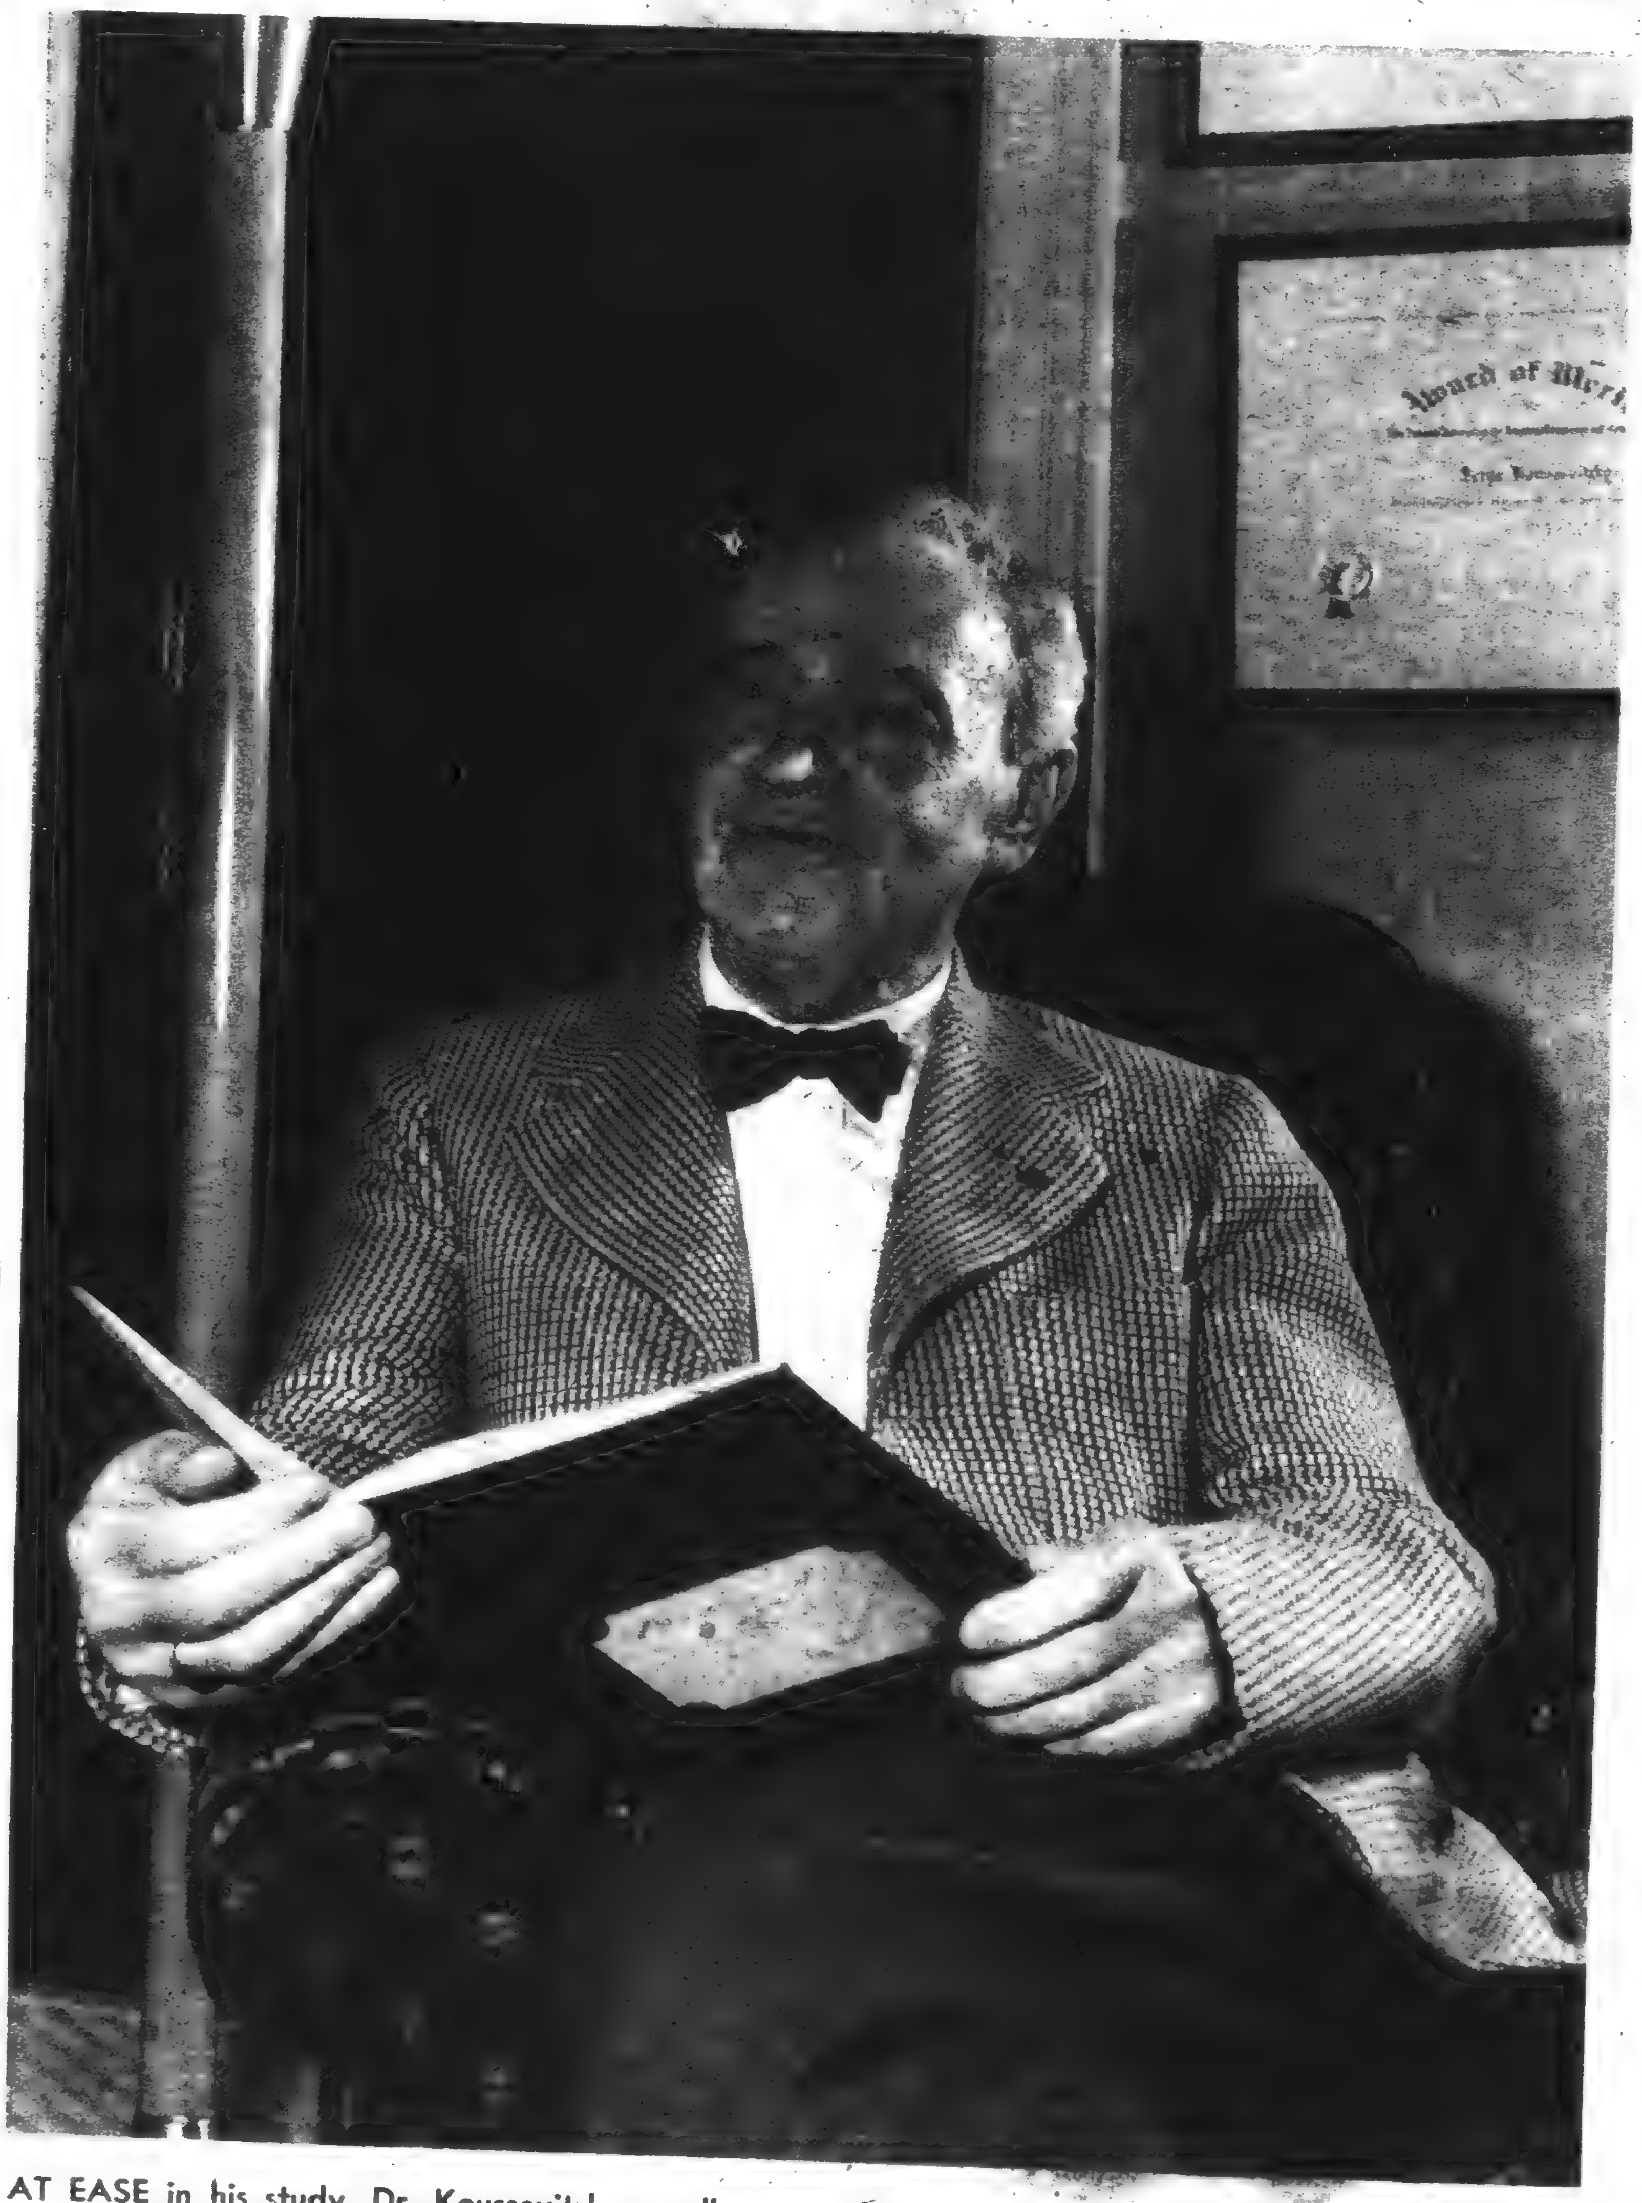
Text of Citation

The citation which Dr. Wriston presented to the conductor was handsomely bound in leather. Its text follows:

"Few men can truly be called citizens of the world. Fairly to earn that title requires a happy combination of circumstance, talent and imagination; moreover only an adventurous spirit could carry a man from Imperialist Russia through all the capitals of Europe and then to America, here to crown long preparation and high achievement with distinguished leadership. Requisite also is an appropriate medium, a language which can be heard without translation in all the nations of the Western World and much of the Eastern as well. Your lifetime of artistic experience, shared with so many peoples, has been joined with remarkably gifted interpretations of music—as diverse as the communities within which it has been played. Because your skill, your aesthetic integrity, and your devotion to the public interest have brought you to a unique position, we delight to honor you. Therefore, in the name of Brown University, of which you have long been an honorary alumnus, I present to you this citation."

[292]

HONORARY DEGREE from Brown University hangs on wall of Dr. Koussevitzky's study in Brookline home.



AT EASE in his study, Dr. Koussevitzky recalls some of the incidents of a long, distinguished career.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
NEWS
APR 29 1949

Maestro Leaves Hub Orchestra After 25 Years

Serge Koussevitzky Relinquishing Boston Symphony Baton

By JAMES MAHONY

Boston, April 29—Serge Koussevitzky retires as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra tomorrow [redacted] leadership that raised it and himself to the highest peaks in the musical world.

Symphony Hall will be packed, as usual, when Koussevitzky bids his musical farewell as conductor. It will be packed again Monday when a public testimonial banquet is held in honor of the 74-year-old musician and his accomplishments.

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY

The accomplishments are amazing as the man himself. He is one of three men in musical history to attain virtuoso rank on the double bass. He is responsible, more than any other man, for the acceptance of the work of Debussy, Stravinsky and Prokofieff.

He raised the Boston Orchestra to international renown. And he probably has done more for American music than any other conductor.

Always on the lookout for composers who could "refresh and vitalize the spirit of man," Koussevitzky encouraged young composers, supported them and defied critics to play their music.

"Once I played the second symphony of a man and the critics didn't like it," he said. "But if I had not played it, there never would have been a third symphony and that one has gone pretty well."

Kept at It

That was the attitude he had in Europe when he ignored whistling and catcalls to present a program by Claude Debussy. Part of the audience walked out when he played Stravinsky's "Rite of Spring." But he played it again. And he played it until it was accepted.

He's done that with American composers. Aaron Copeland, Walter Piston, Roy Harris, Leonard Bernstein, Lukas Foss, Irving Fine and Samuel Barber all owe a good share of their success to Koussevitzky. And it was the Boston conductor's financial help that enabled Benjamin Britton to write the opera, "Peter Grimes."

"Art," he believes, "is indispensable to and inseparable from the life of man."

Lived Up to Beliefs

He lived up to that belief in his abiding passion for music. He founded the Berkshire Center Music School at Lenox, he established the Koussevitzky Foundation to give financial help to struggling composers. And all the time he was shouting, waving and whipping the Boston Symphony Orchestra into an organization that was known as the "most highly perfected and sensitized symphonic ensemble in the world."

Neither he nor the orchestra specialized in any one type of music. They played anything that had merit. And they played it well. Koussevitzky had probably the most extensive repertoire of any living symphonic conductor and he used it continually.

He has been asked to remain as conductor despite his advancing years, but his love of music wouldn't let him.

"I think it is best to retire while I can still perform at the top of my ability," he said. "It is sad to feel quality going down and down. I want it to be remembered that my last concerts were still at the top."

RICHMOND, VA.
NEWS-LEADER

APR 30 1949

Koussevitzky Bids Farewell To Boston Symphony Tonight

BOSTON, April 30.—(AP)—Serge Koussevitzky, who once turned himself into a symphonic Volga boatman because he wanted people to hear music, tonight puts down a brilliant baton.

He has lifted it to critical acclaim and devotion from the front rows and gallery for 25 years as conductor of the famed 68-year-old Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Tonight he makes his farewell appearance as official conductor of Boston Symphony before his greatest admirers—the old Bostonians who pass on their symphony seats with their heirlooms and the youngsters who wait in line for the top balcony.

Koussevitzky

If it's like yesterday afternoon, when he gave the same Beethoven program, tonight will be both concert and drama.

The Friday faithful gave him spirited applause—and there were tears on some of the old faces.

This for a man now nearing 75, who as a peasant Russian lad ran away from home because his father would have none of the music the boy kept talking about.

Penniless in Moscow, the lad begged for lessons. He did it with so much spirit that the dignified faculty of the phiharmonic school took him in.

That was the overture to a career famous in Europe and America not only for artistry with an orchestra, but also for help and friendship to new music and new musicians.

Most recently, Koussevitky has helped the careers of the young American conductor, Leonard Bernstein and the Brazilian, Eleazar de Carvalho.

During his early days in Russia he chartered a steamer to carry his orchestra many miles along the Volga River, bringing to Russian villages their first symphony concerts.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE

APR 3 - 1949

MUSIC ON THE RADIO

More Actual Rehearsing Desired In Boston Symphony's Broadcasts

By B. H. HAGGIN

STRAVINSKY, rehearsing the opening of his Divertimento from "Le Baiser de la fée" with the Boston Symphony, stopped to tell the strings: "Without crescendo. ~~Cold~~—like flutes"; and in the repetition of the passage one heard the strings sound cold—like flutes. At a later point he told the basses: "Stronger. You are covered by the trombones, but I don't want to touch the trombones"; and again, in the repetition of the passage, one heard the basses not covered by the untouched trombones. At one point in the coda he demonstrated what he wanted: "Ta-HUH-ta-HUH-ta-HUH — always short!"; and got it from the orchestra.

This sort of thing at orchestral rehearsals is enormously interesting; but there has been very little of it in the Boston Symphony rehearsals broadcast by N. B. C. that I have heard. I recall Olin Downes, early in the series, talking about how much could be learned by listening to the carving out of each note at these rehearsals; but actually they have been dress rehearsals—that is, final run-throughs after the rehearsals at which each note had been "carved out," and correct sonorities, balances and rhythms established at point after point. And what one has heard most of the time is the orchestra playing with exhortations from Koussevitzky like "Don't hurry!" or "Fortissimo!" or "Pianissimo!"

Stravinsky too, rehearsing Tchaikovsky's Second, was content with an occasional "Forte!", "Crescendo!" and "Diminuendo!" while the orchestra continued to play. What the occasion offered, then, was the pleasure of the music and the orchestra's refinement of sonority and execution. Except when Mr. Downes thought it more important for listeners to be told why Stravinsky admired Tchaikovsky's music, to have a letter of Tchaikovsky read to them that Stravinsky had quoted in his autobiography, and to hear from Mr. Downes—with the music in the distant background — that "these were the words of Tchaikovsky, the neurotic and hyper-involved composer of some of the most furiously emotional music that we know"; that "Mr. Stravinsky also loves this symphony because he finds it so fresh, so truly Tchaikovsky; and as far as I am concerned, and I think you too, I entirely agree with him, and I think you will agree, as he proceeds to rehearse this music with a special devotion, that we do find here, in this early Tchaikovsky symphony, the unmistakable voice, the basic qualities of instrumentation and themes, and the inherent nationalism of the composer of the Pathetic Symphony."

I think N. B. C. should tell Mr. Downes he is mistaken—that the rehearsal is more important.

THE CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR, BOSTON, FRIDAY,

Rush Seaters Jam Symphony Hall Steps

By Lyman W. Fisher, Staff Photographer

Symphony Hall steps were jammed some six hours before Serge Koussevitzky conducted his last matinee concert at 2:30 p.m. today. These music lovers were waiting for the unreserved seats which promised them their last chance to see the famous conductor perform. His final concert will be given tomorrow evening, but those seats are all reserved and taken.

Sun Warms Up Koussevitsky Rush Seaters

Rush seaters crowded on to the wide stairs in front of Symphony Hall early today to be sure of seeing Serge Koussevitsky conduct his next to last concert before retiring.

Those who showed up as early as 7 o'clock this morning wished they had been earlier so that they "could have been first."

By 8:30 there were more than 200 patiently seated on the steps thoroughly prepared with makeshift accommodations for their six-hour wait.

Several Harvard students brought a divan with them, but were persuaded to have it taken away—it took up too much room. Folding chairs were allowed, however, and there were a dozen or so near the door.

A majority of those waiting were students who explained that this was their last time to see their favorite conductor. Mr. Koussevitsky makes his final appearance before retiring tomorrow evening, but all seats are reserved—and taken.

Some of the not-too-experienced rush-seaters were dolefully eyeing their lunch bags as early as 11 a.m., and several decided to munch half a sandwich as early as 11:15. The veteran rush-seat customers, however, paid them no heed and were apparently content to hold off their lunch hour until afternoon.

Although nearly 80 per cent of the early morning group was made up of college and high-school students, there were many housewives sprinkled among the happy group. They worked more industrially over their knitting than did their junior sisters, who seemed to prefer making argyle socks rather than sweaters.

Some of the students admitted skipping classes today, but they did bring their studying along with them. Others had magazines or newspapers. Two art students spent the morning busily sketching the people around them, who seemed to enjoy it as much as the two young artists.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

APR 30 1949

Koussevitzky Leads Last Concert At Boston Tonight After 25 Years

Selects All-Beethoven Program for Finale—Former Students Plan Fete on Retirement

By JOHN H. FENTON
Special to THE NEW YORK TIMES

BOSTON, April 29—Dr. Serge Koussevitzky gave Boston today its final Friday afternon concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in his official capacity as conductor. He retires tomorrow night after twenty-five years on the podium.

Amid what one bystander was moved to describe as a "proper Bostonian version of world series enthusiasm," Dr. Koussevitzky presented an all-Beethoven program, including the Ninth Symphony, which the conductor remarked was "Beethoven's last, also." The program will be repeated at his final concert tomorrow night.

The first customers for the 300 "rush seats" in the gallery were reported on hand at 5 A. M. When the first symphony Hall staff members reported four hours later, fully 200 were waiting.

Students Cut Classes

Many of these were college students, some of whom readily admitted they were cutting classes to attend. Several Harvard students brought along a sofa for comfort, but were prevailed upon to remove it in the interests of more room for the others. Folding camp stools, however, were numerous.

Dr. Koussevitzky received a standing ovation when he appeared for the concert. At the end, the capacity audience applauded and shouted "bravos" for twenty minutes before the 74-year-old conductor was able to respond with a brief speech of thanks.

Russian-born, Dr. Koussevitzky was brought here to conduct the orchestra in 1924 and has been credited with molding it into the most highly perfected and sensitized symphonic ensemble in the world. He was noted for his interest in young composers, and his career brought popular recognition to the music of Stravinsky and Sibelius, and in later years, to the young Soviet composer, Dimitri Shostakovich.

Although he had voluntarily exiled himself from Russia in 1920, after differences with the Soviet, Dr. Koussevitzky has refused to allow politics to affect his musical tastes. He became a United States citizen in 1941.

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky

In his own right, Dr. Koussevitzky also is held to be one of the leading virtuosos of all time on the double bass. He served as the leading double bass at the Imperial Opera at Moscow in his earlier years and also became professor of that instrument at the Moscow Philharmonic Conservatory.

He has composed a concerto for the double bass and orchestra and has transcribed many classics for it and piano. Rising from the poverty of only three rubles in his pocket, Dr. Koussevitzky has achieved both monetary and classical fame in this country. He holds honorary doctorates from both Harvard and Brown Universities.

Although a hard taskmaster with his musicians, he has their respect and is one of the most popular conductors in the fifty-seven-year history of the Boston orchestra.

The orchestra and the city will express its feelings toward Dr. Koussevitzky Monday night with a civic dinner in Symphony Hall. Six of his former students at the Tanglewood School in Lenox, Mass., joined in writing one movement each of a six-movement cantata, which will be presented at the dinner.

on the Aisle

by Claudia Cassidy

SO MANY PEOPLE who could not be there have asked about Lloyd Lewis' funeral that I think it will not be out of place if I tell you it was just what it should have been in just tribute of honor and love. It was simple, quiet, beautiful, rich in comforting things to remember.

We drove out to Libertyville in the cool, sunny morning, and as we drew near the private road we found lines of cars parked and people waiting. The thick woods inside permitted little parking space, so the school bus and a private car or two were available to take you in and out. The police were there, but no one rushed about importantly, giving orders. They were friendly and helpful, you might say neighborly.

Inside, the long, low, brown house clung to the earth as Frank Lloyd Wright meant it to cling, and the little river flowed quietly below. Because there were so many of us, the services, of Quaker simplicity, were held in the garden. Flowers were banked high along the sheltered south wall, and at the bier two men spoke. No one told you the first was Marc Connelly, who wrote "The Green Pastures." No one told you the second was Adlai Stevenson, the governor of Illinois. They were neighbors, who talked quietly of a friend.

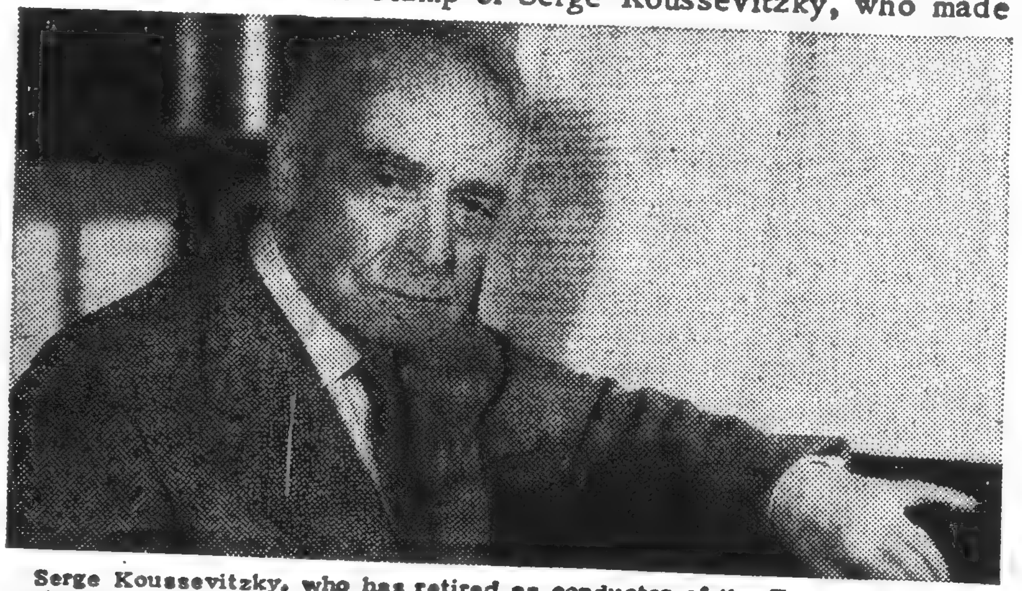
The sun shone and there was no music but the high wind that shook the listeners, yet because of the sheltering wall left the flowers still. And tho you could see the necessary microphone, not even that April wind reminded you of its presence. Mike Todd, who was standing beside us, abruptly said, "Lloyd was about the closest to religion I ever got."

Because it all seemed so right, it had not occurred to me that in a Chicago April few gardens bloom. But this is what had happened. The Lewises had just completed a landing place leading from the house down the little bank to the river. The slope was a havoc of excavation, the garden covered with compost. But when the neighbors heard what had happened, they quietly took over. They smoothed the bank and turfed it, they cleared the garden, and everywhere they planted flowers bravely in bloom.

I thought you might want to know this, because to me it is such a lovely thing to remember.

Boston Orchestra Not Coming Next Season

Don't expect the Boston orchestra next season. Its tour does not come beyond Toledo. Perhaps this is a wise decision, for an era of change is always an era of uncertainty, and whatever that superb orchestra may be under the direction of the gifted Charles Munch, it will not be the same. For a quarter of a century it has borne the stamp of Serge Koussevitzky, who made it an unrivaled instrument of incandescent expression. I shall always be grateful for Tanglewood visits when I heard his concerts by night, and by his courtesy was permitted to attend morning rehearsals when he took that orchestra apart and put it back together, strand by strand, each newly polished and tempered in insatiable pursuit of perfection.



Serge Koussevitzky, who has retired as conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra after 25 years. (Wide World Photo)

Fortunately, Koussevitzky is not quitting Tanglewood. He now has two homes, the lovely Seranak actually at Tanglewood's door, but so exquisitely placed it seems to exist in a miniature Switzerland, and the newer Casa Serena, a tranquil winter place in Arizona. Seranak will find him at home of festival summers, but Casa Serena—I wonder. He wants to get back to his double bass, to compose, to write his autobiografy. But next season will find him conducting in South America, Palestine, Europe, London, possibly Australia. Conducting is his life, which is fortunate, for to many a listener he makes it life for music, too.

I can think of no man who has relinquished a high post with a more remarkable assortment of achievements and expectations. After a fabulous career he is at the peak of his powers, and he has a unique investment in the future, for of all contemporary men to music he has done most to encourage, develop and display new talent.

Next season we are to hear the Houston orchestra for the first time with Efrem Kurtz conducting and Rudolf Firkusny as soloist, while Paul Paray makes his debut here with the Pittsburgh orchestra and the violinist, Szymon Goldberg. Antal Dorati probably will be down with the Minneapolis orchestra and Isaac Stern may be his soloist. They will be welcome. But no orchestra and no conductor will replace Boston's with Koussevitzky. Thanks to Tanglewood, this splendor need not yet recede into treasured remembrance of things past.

Koussevitzky Hailed In Moving Farewell

Herald

By RUDOLPH ELIE

Apr 30

An era in music came to an end yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall, when Serge Koussevitzky, for 25 years the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, came to the final chord of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony. The audience knew it, too, and clamored so long and so insistently that the conductor, his lips trembling in emotion, at last held out his hand for silence. Silence never fell more rapidly or more completely over an audience.

(Continued on Page Six)

Koussevitzky Retires: End of Brilliant Chapter in Music

By CYRUS DURGIN

A chapter in musical history was ended, last night, when Serge Koussevitzky made his final bow on the stage of Symphony Hall and walked out of sight. We shall still hear him in the Berkshires next Summer, and he will be back in Boston from time to time as guest conductor. But his long and brilliant reign as head of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is over.

The splendid symphonic organization, which he brought to new heights of fame and glory, will carry on and we may expect it to do so most effectively. But the especial quality that derived from Koussevitzky's unique personality will not be there. The future will be different.

His 25 years constitute a regime nearly twice the length of any other conductor in the history of the Boston Symphony. During that time he became an interpreter of world-wide fame and absolutely top rank. He is certainly one of the four greatest conductors of the day, and I do not think it an exaggeration to claim he is the most cosmopolitan of them all. Who else can perform with such over-all excellence so many different schools and styles of music?

When Koussevitzky arrived in the Autumn of 1924 he inherited an orchestra which had been improved by Pierre Monteux from the grievous low point of efficiency to which the first World War and the subsequent strike had reduced it. Koussevitzky built the Boston Symphony into the peerless instrument that Henry Prunieres, nearly 20 years ago, called "the best in the world today."

Koussevitzky Discipline

What are the characteristics of the Koussevitzky discipline? A rich, fine tone which has what the late William J. Henderson described as "oceanic depth." The Koussevitzky ear for intense string tone and the balance of strings, wood, brass and percussion is extraordinary. He demands high precision of rhythm, and finesse in phrasing and nuances. Nothing ever is slipshod, nothing casual or unnoticed. He will not spare himself or his players any amount of work to obtain what he considers the best results. But most important, Koussevitzky insists that everything "sing."

In 1924 Koussevitzky was quick to admit little knowledge of contemporary American music. He soon found out, and it was not long before he was recognized around the country as a leading champion of native music. He later pointed out that he regarded it his function to bring out new pieces, and the function of the secondary orchestras to repeat them. That is fair enough, considering the pressure of old and new music upon the program schedule of a top-flight orchestra.

But Koussevitzky did more than that. The composers whom he found to be most gifted he did repeat, and it was under this active care that much by Aaron Copland, Roy Harris, William Schuman, Samuel Barber, Nicolai Berezowsky, Walter Piston, Edward Burlingame Hill, Howard Hanson, Randall Thompson and others came to be relatively familiar at Symphony Hall. There was an indirect effect, too; the example set by Koussevitzky impelled conductors in other American cities to follow.

Became American

All this was in addition to the sizeable quantity of new music from Europe that Koussevitzky introduced until the coming of World War II stopped the source. As for other Koussevitzky benefactions to young musicians, one need only mention establishment of the [illegible]shire Music Center and Koussevitzky Music Foundation, and his special assistance to those two conductors, Leonard Bernstein and Eleazar De Carvalho. This work was the logical extension of the efforts Koussevitzky and his first wife, Mme. Nathalie Koussevitzky, had made in Russia and Europe through the publishing house of L'Edition Russe, which they founded.

Koussevitzky had the good fortune to come to the United States at a time which I believe to have been the beginning both of a musical nascence here and of a freer interchange of music and artists between this country and Europe than there ever had been before. Koussevitzky was a significant symbol of this process. By birth a Russian, by residence and experience a European and by virtue of a flexible temperament a citizen of the world, he represented both European heritage and American enterprise.

Much more than most foreign conductors he fitted in to Boston and the United States. He was interested in us and we in him. He became an American in a good deal more than the literal sense of a naturalized citizen. Not that he ever had his picture taken munching a hot dog or pitching a baseball, but in the sense that his lot was cast with ours, and that he appreciated the artistic potentialities of the country which became his own.

From the beginning Koussevitzky proved an interpreter of vivid personal distinction and a master at arranging programs. In the early years—and occasionally in the later—he might change a program several times until it suited him, but the result invariably was a combination of works that were interesting and contrasted well with each other. No one, including Stokowski, could match him at that.

The Interpreter

His passionate nature led Koussevitzky to passionate music and performance. His sense of tempo and phrasing was boldly his own, and almost always instinctively right, although you could disagree with him now and again. I daresay he is the greatest interpreter of Tchaikovsky the world has yet seen, and he certainly is the conductor par excellence for Debussy, Ravel, Berlioz, Stravinsky, Roussel, Prokofieff, Shostakovich.

His Beethoven and Brahms aroused differing opinions, but I always found them dynamic and fascinating. With Schumann, Schubert and Wagner he was very good, though I felt less overwhelmingly successful. Probably his Bach was romanticized, in the sense that it never was dry, but it always sounded well to me, and so did his Handel and Mozart.

Until Scriabin ceased to attract him, Koussevitzky was the apostle and best performer of that Russian transcendental. The more you think it over, the more you are convinced of the extraordinary range of Koussevitzky's expressive powers. I do not believe that ever in his life he gave so pallid a performance as I have heard Bruno Walter and Toscanini give of music by Debussy.

So now it is time to say goodby to Serge Koussevitzky as the guiding genius of our musical glory. To those of us, who have had the good fortune to follow him through most of his quarter-century, he has left a priceless legacy of memories.

Koussevitzky Wins Ovation

(Continued from First Page)

"Two years ago, when I gave my resignation to the trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra," he said, speaking loudly and firmly in an accent marked but clear, "I knew it would be hard to separate myself from you, my public, and my dear orchestra. But let us be happy," he cried, his voice deepening, "that we have had these 25 years together.

"Let us be happy that we have worked and created the greatest orchestra in the world," he continued, as the applause subsided. "Let us be happy that we have had a tremendous musical evolution in this country, that we have helped many composers until now we have composers in this country as great as any in the old world. I thank you for your co-operation, your devotion to the orchestra, and your confidence in me."

Again the ovation was deafening as Serge Koussevitzky, in the 75th year of his life, stepped down from the conductor's stand and walked off the stage for the last time before the Friday afternoon audience as conductor and music director of the Boston Symphony orchestra. But it subsided quickly then and the audience filed out in silence. For notwithstanding Serge Kouusevitzky's adjuration to be happy, it was not a happy occasion.

It was truly the end of an era, the parting from a man who has been so closely identified with the musical life of this city and this nation for 25 years that many of us know no other and cannot, indeed, imagine any other. For Koussevitsky, the man and artist, the re-creator and genius, has been more than musician; he has been a symbol of the creative spirit of man that has been carried, torch-like, by the great men of every generation to the succeeding generation.

PLEADING FOR ALL

He has done this, not by specially pleading the case of one or another composer, but by pleading for them all. No composer, whether Frederick the Great (for Koussevitzky once performed one of that monarch's symphonies) or Sebastian Bach, Luigi Boccherini or Ludwig van Beethoven, Walter Piston or Lukas Foss, Arnold Schoenberg or Leo Sowerby, ever received anything but Koussevitzky's most devoted and most inflamed performance. If they failed to speak, it was not that Koussevitzky failed; on the contrary, his intense insight, his authority and his unflagging physical force often made them seem what they were not. This incredible conviction mingled with his devotion to all musical art as a whole, is what Koussevitzky has so lavished upon us that, seeing him go, we cannot but feel it won't happen agan in our lifetime.

His final program, itself the beginning and end of the towering musical genius of Beethoven, could not have been more suitably chosen. For these two works, poles apart in spirit, gave Koussevitzky every opportunity to display the thesaurus of his art. The First Symphony, light, engaging, of the most delicate textures and fabrics, was never better or more beguilingly played, nor has the orchestra ever responded more magically. Yet it was but the prelude to the great Ninth, perhaps the peak of the creative musical spirit in man.

HOUR-LONG WORK

This hour-long work was projected with an almost other-worldly quality of spirit. It has been better done, from a technical standpoint, when a large chorus has been employed, the orchestral forces deployed on a larger stage. Yet the emotional quality both of the performance and the occasion far outshone all other performances. And, for that matter, the quartet of soloists, was the best I've ever heard here in this work. The soprano of Frances Yeend soared above all in the fiercely high range called for by the composer; the contralto of Eunicc Alberts was strong and sure and focused; the tenor of David Lloyd was bright, vigorous and clear as a bell, and the bass of James Pease, as he enunciated the recitative that opens the vocal section of the work, was a stirring thing to hear.

The moment the Symphony was concluded the audience (many of whom had waited five hours to gain entrance to the Hall) broke into a prolonged outburst of ovationary applause, cheers and bravos. It was not for 15 or more minutes that Koussevitzky finally called for silence to speak to the audience. And when he finished and had walked from the stage, he had stepped into legend. We shall see him again, yes, but we'll remember him as he was yesterday, at the peak of one of the greatest careers in all music.

Koussevitzky: Hail and Farewell—Theater News—A

Boston Symphony Director Concludes 25 Years' Service

By L. A. Sloper

Serge Koussevitzky's quarter-century tenure as musical director of the Boston Sympohny Orchestra comes to an end this week. Fittingly, his last program consisted of Beethoven's First and Ninth Symphonies. After the Friday afternoon concert he received a prolonged ovation.

The retirement of Dr. Koussevitzky marks the end of an era in the history of the Boston orchestra. His incumbency has brought glory to music in general by the quality of performance and the interpretive standards he has maintained: and to American music in particular by the production of American works and aid to American composers, and by the fine training he has provided for students at the Berkshire Music Center.

When Koussevitzky came to Boston from Europe in 1924 he found an orchestra which already was recognized as one of the best in the world. It had been in existence for more than 40 years—a long time for a musical institution in America. It had achieved eminence under Nikisch, Muck and Monteux.

It had had its setbacks, notably in 1920, in Pierre Monteux's first year, when most of the players walked out as a result of a labor dispute. (The Boston orchestra was then the only one in the country that had not been organized by the musicians' union.) The management won, temporarily, Mr. Monteux undertook the tremendous task or reorganization and drilling, and by the time Koussevitzky arrived, everything was under control.

It has been said that Koussevitzky found the orchestra in bad condition, and had practically to remake it. That is far from the truth. Monteux in the previous four seasons had restored it virtually to its earlier prestige. Richard Burgin came to Boston in 1920 and is still at his post as concertmaster. Other members resigned after a season with Koussevitzky. Still others were replaced. Many stayed on.

New Orchestra Emerges

What is true is that a new orchestra emerged when Koussevitzky had been in charge for a few years. It was younger. It had more vitality, more passion, more lyricism. In other words, it had taken on the characteristics of its new conductor. As the years flowed by, its tone and balance improved likewise. Finally it became one of the most expert, brilliant, flexible and responsive instruments of its kind. So it remains.

As the orchestra has grown, Koussevitzky has grown with it. When he first came, he had mannerisms which he has largely discarded. A New York critic remarked, "When slow movements are played slower, Koussevitzky will play them." (He might have added something similar about fast movements.) I remember that he dragged out the Andante of Schubert's "Unfinished" until it became a Largo. Under a barrage of critical disapproval, he restored its proper tempo next time he played it.

His gestures were often exaggerated. He would reach for high notes, write the melodic line on the air, saw with the cellos. Although these gestures may be a guide to some in the audience, the trouble is that when they are seen by the players, the players are already doing what is demanded.

The conductor still works hard during a performance. He puts as much energy into his conducting as ever. You can still hear him singing the themes. But the overemphasized, unnecessary gestures have been largely put aside.

Personnel Set

The orchestra personnel has been pretty well set for some time now. They all know the maestro's requirements, and he is familiar with their capacities. In general, conductor and men work together as a team. The results are continually amazing. Stay away a week or two and you are always surprised on your return by the superlative tone, expression and power. It is easy to take this sort of playing too much for granted.

Koussevitzky also has grown, or at least changed, in his attitude toward the repertory. He always has been versatile and catholic in his tastes. He has always been reverent toward the classics, but his view of them has matured much of late years. Like all conductors, he has had his own specialties and his own blind spots. There probably has never been another such interpreter of Tchaikovsky. Nobody else that I have ever heard could squeeze so much out of a Tchaikovsky score.

He still plays Tchaikovsky superbly, but other old favorites of his never appear on his programs nowadays. Scriabin is an example. In the early days, it was hardly possible to imagine a season without the "Divine Poem" or the "Poem of Ecstasy." They never appear nowadays.

Plays With Whole Heart

On the other hand, every time it became necessary to present anything by Vaughan Williams, Koussevitzky turned the baton over to Mr. Burgin. But now he himself conducts the "London" or the Sixth Symphony with no apparent distaste. Whatever the piece, Koussevitsky plays it with his whole heart.

Contemporary music has fared exceptionally well at Koussevitzky's hands. No difficulty was too great to be overcome when a new work was in question. True, in certain instances, he discarded some promised novelty before the performance, having found in rehearsal that it did not sound so well as it had to his inner ear in the study. In other cases, new works were played that afterward did not seem worth a repetition.

But let Koussevitzky once become firmly convinced of the merits of a composition, new or old, and he would play it, as he said, "until they like it." Some of these works he has even repeated in the same season. Usually "they" liked them in the end.

Of American music Koussevitzky has offered no fewer than 180 examples, of which 83 were first performances. The beneficiaries include the most famous and the most promising among American composers. This year, of seven performances, six were of American works.

The Harvard and Radcliffe choruses have been the mainstay of the orchestra in choral works. They assisted again in the Ninth Symphony of Koussevitzky's final program, along with Frances Yeend, soprano, Eunice Alberts, contralto, David Lloyd, tenor, and James Pease, bass.

As we say "Hail and Farewell" to Koussevitzky, it is comforting to remember that he does not plan to disappear from the scene altogether. He will continue as director of the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood, near Lenox, Mass., which he regards as perhaps his legacy to the art of music in this country. He also will return, it is reported, as guest conductor of the Boston and other orchestras.

Wide World

Serge Koussevitzky

THE GREAT AGE

There are times when it is better to take things for granted, and other times when it is not. This is one of the times when it is not. The second quarter of the 20th century has seen the flowering in Boston of an art the equal of which has never existed. Last Saturday evening on the platform of Symphony Hall, when the tumult and the shouting stilled after his farewell performance with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky said it in the fewest words and the simplest, and not one word exaggerated: "We have created the greatest instrument that exists or ever has existed, and this has been done in Symphony Hall and in Boston." By "we" he meant, and said he meant, the collaboration of the music-loving public.

All this in the present tense and the future, for the Orchestra will go on under an eminent successor; but Koussevitzky's achievement will sound even more fabulous years hence than it does now. Through an economic earthquake (1929-1933) and a second world war (1939-1945) he built and went on building: Tanglewood, the Berkshire Music Center, concert tours which carried the name of Boston to distant cities in a light which re-goldened its sometimes tarnished fame. He commissioned works from American composers, and the Orchestra's broadcasts and phonograph records traveled into the waste places and brought back tales that sound like Sinbad and Aladdin.

At the same time this flourishing state of the Orchestra also made possible the brilliant achievement of Mr. Arthur Fiedler, establishing the Esplanade concerts in July, free to the people, who come by the thousands and pay voluntarily if they can, and if not, are just as welcome.

Symphony Hall is but the central power plant. Its radiant energy pulsates throughout the community—Boston, New England and that greater community, these United States—like the veins of illumined gold deep in the magic mountain.

Now precisely what is meant by this—exactly what happens? Limit the case to Symphony Hall alone: people by the tens of thousands, the young no less than the middle-aged, pour into that temple, year after year, and there, poured through them, are the noblest works of the art which is the most eminent in our own epoch—music. Its repertory is enormous, and it is, of course, one of the world's great literatures. It does not preach, it does not lecture, it does not dogmatize: what it does is permeate. It incorporates its elevation of thought and feeling into the very tissues of those who listen, and, like the prophet descending from Mt. Sinai, they wist not that their faces shine.

This worship is classless, since the poor that were cast out can come also to the Esplanade and to broadcasts; there is no color line, distinguished Negro artists are welcomed on that stage as soloists; it is nonpolitical, nonsectarian, noncontroversial, yes, and noncompetitive, too, being nonprofit-making. (If you doubt this, try to find the profit!) Is this, then, prophetic of a great society yet to come; is this world of harmonies a foreglimpse of the great society, of human beings living together harmoniously?

Never suppose that gleam has been lost on Koussevitzky. Time and again in the darkest hours of Nazi triumph and world war he has performed Beethoven's 9th Symphony, whose choral finale to the words of Schiller's "Ode to Joy," is a hymn to human brotherhood; and it was with this that he closed last Saturday evening his twenty-five years as conductor of the orchestra. Even in this oft-repeated work, the performers surpassed their previous performances. It was a deeper penetration of the music, and the music penetrated more deeply. To hear this work of two of Germany's greatest poets, when Germany lies in ruins, is to see what is mortal in a nation and what is immortal.

Much of the foregoing is an attempt to word what cannot be worded. Naturally, it falls short. But what can be said is that for a quarter-century we have had here in Boston a great age. It will go on.

UNCLE DUDLEY.

HUNTINGTON, W. VA.
HERALD ADVERTISER

MAY 1 - 1949

Conductor Koussevitzky To Put Down Brilliant Baton Tonight

By FRED BRADY

BOSTON, April 30. (AP)—Serge Koussevtizky, who once turned himself into a symphonic Volga boatman because he wanted people to hear music, tonight puts down a brilliant baton.

He has lifted it to critical acclaim and devotion from the front rows and gallery for 25 years as conductor of the famed 68-year-old Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Tonight he makes his farewell appearance as official conductor of the Boston Symphony before his greatest admirers—the old Bostonians who pass on their symphony seats with their heirlooms and the youngsters who wait in line for the top balcony.

If it's like yesterday afternoon when he gave the same Beethoven program, tonight will be both concert and drama.

The Friday faithful gave him spirited applause—and there were tears on some of the old faces.

This for a man now nearing 75 who as a peasant Russian lad ran away from home because his father would have none of the music the boy kept talking about.

Penniless in Moscow, the lad begged for lessons. He did it with so much spirit that the dignified faculty of the Philharmonic School took him in.

That was the overture to a career famous in Europe and America not only for artistry with an orchestra but for help an friendship to new music and new musicians.

Most recently, Koussevitzky has helped the careers of the young American conductor, Leonard Bernstein and the Brazilian, Eleazar de Carvalho.

During his early days in Russia he chartered a steamer to carry his orchestra many miles along the Volga River, bringing to Russian villages their first symphony concerts.

ATLANTA, GA.
JOURNAL

MAY 1 -

* * *

SERGE AND TOM: Serge Koussevitzky, who once turned himself into a symphonic Volga boatman because he wanted people to hear music, made his farewell appearance as official conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

MAY 1 - 1949

KOUSSEVITZKY ACCLAIMED

Huge Ovation Closes His 25 Years as Boston Conductor

BOSTON, April 30 (UP) — Bostonians applauded wildly, stamped their feet and wept tonight when Serge Koussevitzky took his final bow after 25 years of conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The capacity Symphony Hall audience of more than 2,600 and some 200 singers on stage gave Koussevitzky an eight-minute ovation when he laid down his baton. He accepted a laurel wreath from members of the audience, then tore leaves from it and threw them to his orchestra, which he praised in a brief speech as the "most perfect musical instrument that exists in the world."

Koussevitzky's facial muscles worked nervously as he spoke and again as he took repeated bows during another sustained ovation at the end of his words.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE

MAY 1 - 1949

Koussevitzky Conducts Last Concert in Boston

BOSTON, April 30 (UP) — Serge Koussevitzky gave his final concert as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra tonight and retired after twenty-five years in which he won world renown for himself and the orchestra.

The seventy-four-year-old conductor, who frequently has defied critics by playing the music of composers not yet accepted, chose for his finale a standard work—Beethoven's Ninth Symphony.

Russian-born Koussevitzky will be succeeded next year by Charles Muench, of Paris. Dr. Koussevitzky will continue as director of the Berkshire Music Center which he founded at Tanglewood in Lenox, Mass.

Symphony Hall, which was crowded for his final appearance as conductor, will be the scene Monday of a public testimonial dinner for Dr. Koussevitzky. His accomplishments include the fact that he, more than any other man, was responsible for the acceptance in America of the works of Debussy, Stravinsky and Prokofiev. He is one of three men in musical history to attain virtuoso rank on the double bass.

NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
STANDARD-TIMES

MAY 1 - 1949

15-Minute Ovation Thunders Farewell to Koussevitzky

BOSTON, April 30 (AP)—Serge Koussevitzky closed a glorious quarter-century of American music tonight, leading the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the last time as its conducor and music director.

His resignation, given two years ago, became effective as the orchestra ended its 68th season with a spirited performance of Beethoven's 1st and 9th Symphonies.

The audience, overwhelmingly the regular Symphony crowd, gave its customary rapt attention until the finale note.

Then as one the entire assembly, the orchestra and the choral groups from Harvard and Radcliffe who participated in the 9th Symphony, united in thunderous ovation to the man whom critics have called "the greatest conductor of our time" and the one "who has done most for American music."

The applause lasted about a quarter of an hour before Koussevitzky signaled for quiet and said in his still imperfect English, "My dear friends, it isn't so easy for me to speak but I who hate to look back would ask you to look back with me 25 years.

"We must be happy. So happy, that you, the orchestra and I have done a great achievement. We have worked together and created the most perfect instrument that is in the world. We have helped many young composers and artists. We have developed two generations of these until now we have composers and artists equal to any in the world.

"And it has been in these 25 years, and in Boston, and in Symphony Hall.

"I thank you for your help and your patience. And I know you have been patient for you have not always liked the new music. But you can not have the old without the new. Like it or not, you were here. So I thank you."

Then he left the stage. An informal reception followed in his quarters at the hall.

Among the musical figures joining in the farewell to Koussevitzky were two young composers he had assisted—Leonard Bernstein, the American conductor, and the Brazilian, Eleazar de Carvalho. Like many others, they heard tonight's concert standing up.

Charles Muench, conductor of the Paris Conservatory Orchestra, has been chosen as Koussevitzky's succesor by the Symphony trustees.

The 74-year-old Koussevitzky intends to travel abroad. Next season he will conduct for the first time in South America. But he will be at Tanglewood in Massachusetts' Berkshire Hills during the Summer to conduct a school for musicians and direct a Summer concert series.

He became conductor of the Boston Symphony in 1924.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

MAY 1 - 1949

Koussevitzky Takes Final Bow As Boston Symphony Conductor

74-Year-Old Leader Applauded for 15 Minutes as He Ends 25 Years Service; Bernstein, de Carvalho, Protegees, in the Audience

Boston, Apr. 30 — (AP) — Serge Koussevitzky closed a glorious quarter-century of American music tonight, leading the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the last time as its conductor and music director.

His resignation, given two years ago, became effective as the orchestra ended its 68th season with a spirited performance of Beethoven's First and Ninth Symphonies.

The audience, overwhelmingly the regular symphony crowd, gave its customary rapt attention until the finale note.

Then as one the entire assembly, the orchestra and the choral groups from Harvard and Radcliffe who participated in the Ninth Symphony, united in thunderous ovation to the man whom critics have called "the greatest conductor of our time" and the one "who has done most for American music."

The applause lasted about a quarter of an hour before Koussevitzky signaled for quiet and said in his still imperfect English:

"My dear friends, it isn't so easy for me to speak but I who hate to look back would ask you to look back with me 25 years.

"We must be happy. So happy that you, the orchestra and I have done a great achievement. We have worked together and created the most perfect instrument that is in the world. We have helped many young composers and artists. We have developed two generations of these until now we have composers and artists equal to any in the world.

"And it has been in these 25 years, and in Boston, and in Symphony Hall.

"I thank you for your help and your patience. And I know you have been patient, for you have not always liked the new music. But you cannot have the old without the new. Like it or not, you were here. So I thank you."

Then he left the stage. An informal reception followed in his quarters at the hall.

Among the musical figures joining in the farewell to Koussevitzky were two young composers he had assisted—Leonard Bernstein, the American conductor, and the Brazilian, Eleazar de Carvalho. Like many others, they heard tonight's concert standing up.

Charles Muench, conductor of the Paris Conservatory Orchestra, has been chosen as Koussevitzky's successor by the symphony trustees.

The 74-year-old Koussevitzky intends to travel abroad. Next season he will conduct for the first time in South America. But he will be at Tanglewood in Massachusetts' Berkshire Hills during the summer to conduct a school for musicians and direct a summer concert series.

ENID, OKLA.
NEWS

MAY 1 1949

Well Known Conductor Steps Down

BOSTON, April 30 —(U.P.)— Serge Koussevitzky retires as conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra today after ~~25 years~~ of leadership that raised it and himself to the highest peaks in the musical world.

Symphony hall will be packed, as usual, when Koussevitzky makes his musical farewell as conductor. It will be packed again Monday when a public testimonial banquet is held in honor of the 74-year-old musician and his accomplishments.

Accomplishments Amazing

The accomplishments are amazing as the man himself. He is one of three men in musical history to attain virtuoso rank on the double bass. He is responsible, more than any other man, for the acceptance of the works of Debussy, Stravinsky and Prokofieff.

He raised the Boston orchestra to international renown. And he probably has done more for American music than any other conductor.

Always on the lookout for composers who could "refresh and vitalize the spirit of man," Koussevitzky encouraged young composers, supported them and defied critics to play their music.

"Once I played the second symphony of a man and the critics didn't like it," he said. "But if I had not played it, there never would have been a third symphony and that one has gone pretty well."

PORTLAND, ME.
SUNDAY TELEGRAM

MAY 1 - 1949

Concert Notes

By Helen Havener

New York City.—Anyone who entertained the fallacious idea that Dr. Serge Koussevitzky's retirement from the conductorship of the Boston Symphony Orchestra means a lessening of the great man's activities is obviously due for a surprise.

There are many rumors hereabouts of a contemplated European tour—and a very strenuous one—and of a possible invasion of South American concert centers. But even if neither of these are undertaken the good doctor will be kept pretty much occupied during the next few months preparing for the very heavy concert schedule he has arranged for Tanglewood this Summer.

To be sure he will have the aid of the youthful and energetic Leonard Bernstein to a considerable extent, but he will be batonist for a large proportion of the summer's concerts—and what concerts they are to be with Strauss, Liszt, Brahms, Beethoven, Franck, Milhaud, Benjamin Britten and Villa Lobos to be featured composers, to mention only a few.

Noteworthy among the programs will be that commemorating the 200th anniversary of Goethe's birth, which is scheduled for Saturday night, July 30, with Doctor Koussevitzky conducting, and with the offerings Beethoven's Egmont overture. Liszt's Faust Symphony and Beethoven's Fourth Piano Concerto, the latter with Claudio Arrau as soloist.

Appropos Of Retirements

With several of the outstanding figures of American music retiring from one post or another there is a spate of retirement gifts, speeches and functions at the moment.

Among those thus honored was Bruno Walter, who with the final concert of his Beethoven cycle concluded his services as musical director of the New York Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra.

In tribute to the conductor the society presented him with the full score of Beethoven's Egmont overture and with a collection of Beethoven quartets in "first miniature" score editions. Koussevitzky will be in line for a like function on May 10 when at the Waldorf-Astoria the League of Composers honors him for his 25 years of service to American music as conductor of this Country's major orchestras.

Meanwhile Edward Johnson, whose retirement at the end of next season as the Metropolitan Opera's general manager has been announced, has just been decorated by the Brazilian Government in recognition of his services to music generally and to operatic music in particular. The award was presented by the Brazilian consul general in New York. Its presentation makes Mr. Johnson an officer of the National Order of the Southern Cross.

SALT LAKE CITY, UTAH
DESERET NEWS

MAY 1 1949

Programs Slated At Festival

BOSTON—The programs for the Berkshire Festival by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood in Lenox, Mass., next summer are announced by Serge Koussevitzky who is now completing his last season as the orchestra's conductor.

The concerts in the Shed will open on Thursday evening, July 28, with Vivaldi's Concerto for Orchestra (in Siloti's arrangement), Strauss' "Death and Transfiguration," and Brahms' Symphony No. 2. On Saturday evening, July 30, Dr. Koussevitzky will commemorate the 200th anniversary of the birth of Goethe with Beethoven's Overture to Goethe's "Egmont," and Liszt's Faust Symphony which was inspired by the text of the German poet. Beethoven's Fourth Piano Concerto with Claudio Arrau as soloist will be on this program. On Sunday afternoon, July 31, Leonard Bernstein will conduct Schumann's Overture to "Manfred" and Fourth Symphony, and Stravinsky's "Rite of Spring."

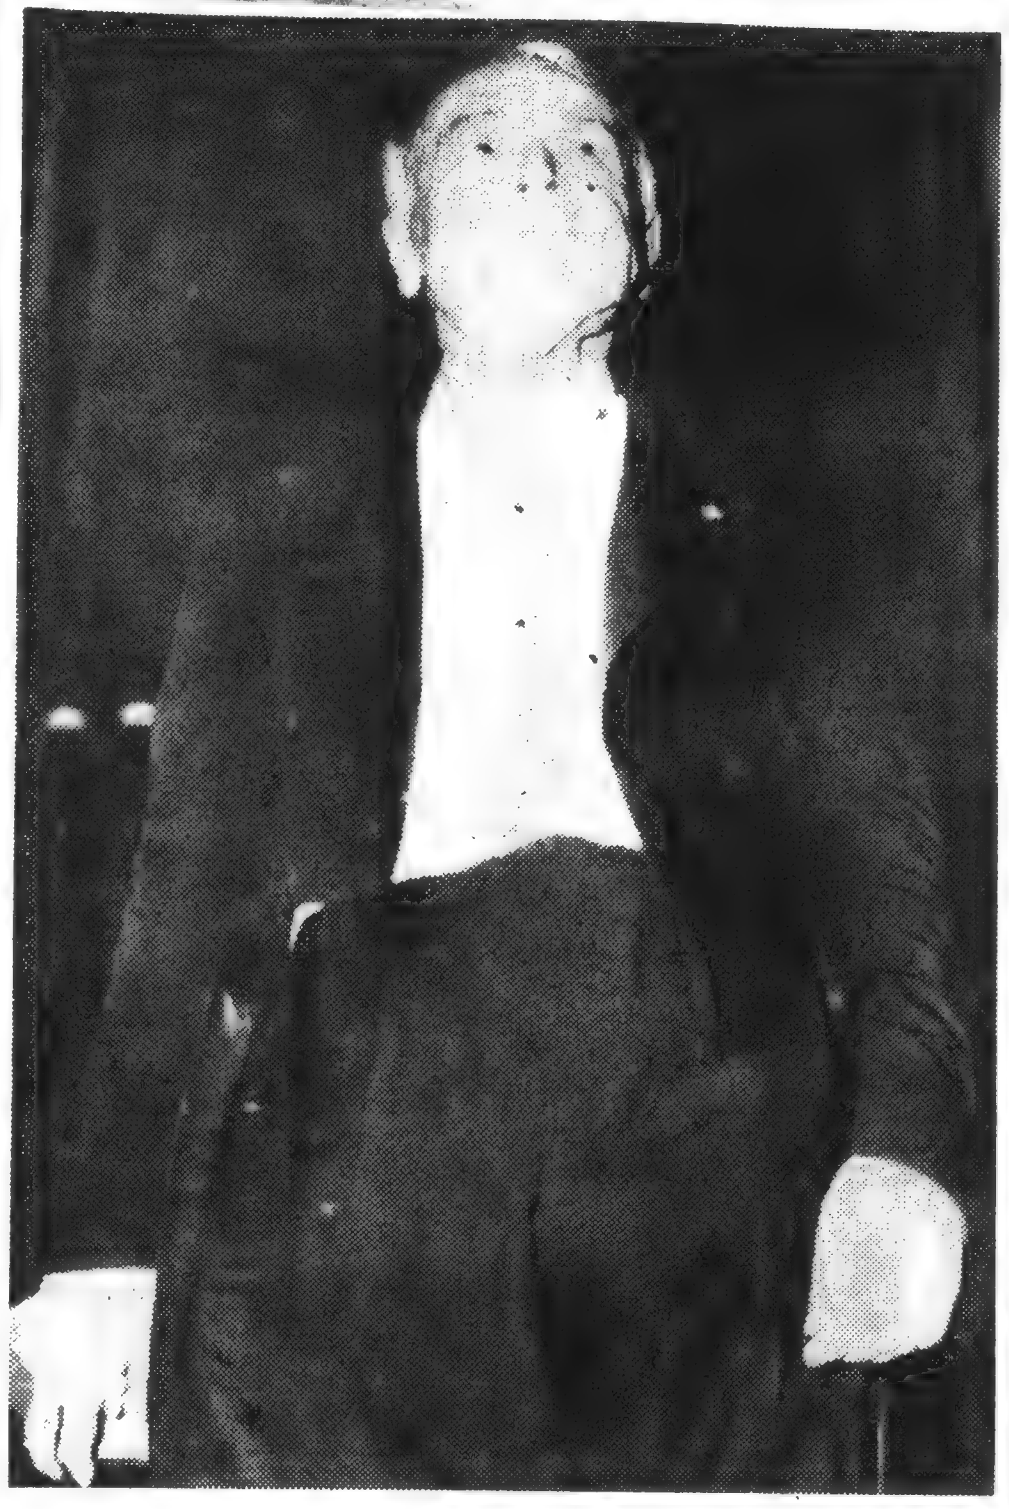
The second week of concerts will begin on Thursday evening, August 4, with a Tchaikovsky program including the String Serenade, the Violin Concerto with Jascha Heifetz as soloist, and the Fourth Symphony. On Saturday evening August 6, Dr. Koussevitzky will present Roussel's Suite in F, Milhaud's First 'Cello Concerto with Gregor Piatigorsky as soloist, "L'Ascension" by Messiaen (who will be on the faculty of the Berkshire Music Center), and the Symphony by Cesar Franck. On Sunday afternoon, August 7, Eleazar de Carvalho will conduct as guest William Schman's Symphony for Strings, Mandu-carara by Villa-Lobos, and Strauss' "Thus Spake Zarathustra."

THE THIRD WEEK of concerts will open on Thursday evening, August 11, with Leonard Bernstein as guest presenting Schubert's Fourth Symphony ("Tragic") and the Seventh Symphony by Shostakovitch. On Saturday evening, August 13, Dr. Koussevitzky will present a Symphony with chorus which Benjamin Britten has just completed and which will then have its first public performance. This will be preceded by Haydn's Symphony in G major, No. 88. Koussevitzky's closing program on Sunday afternoon, August 14, will consist of the Orchestra Concerto by C. P. E. Bach, Copland's "Quiet City," Debussy's "The Sea," and Beethoven's Fifth Symphony.

The programs for two pairs of Bach-Mozart concerts in the smaller theater concert hall on July 16 and 17, and July 23 and 24 will be announced shortly.

WORCESTER, MASS.
TELEGRAM

MAY 1 - 1949



FINAL BOW

Serge Koussevitzky drops his hands to his side as he faced the audience in Boston's Symphony Hall last night after completing his last concert as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Koussevitzky who has held the position for a quarter of a century, received a tremendous ovation which lasted 15 minutes. (AP Wirephoto)

THUNDEROUS TRIBUTE

Koussevitzky Leads Symphony Last Time

BOSTON, Sunday (AP)—Serge Koussevitzky closed a glorious quarter-century of American music last night, leading the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the last time as its conductor and music director.

His resignation, given two years ago, became effective as the orchestra ended its 68th season with a spirited performance of Beethoven's First and Ninth Symphonies.

The audience, overwhelmingly the regular symphony crowd, gave its customary rapt attention until the finale note.

Signals for Quiet

Then, as one, the entire assembly, the orchestra and the choral groups from Harvard and Radcliffe who participated in the Ninth Symphony, united in thunderous ovation to the man whom critics have called "the greatest conductor of our time" and the one "who has done most for American music."

The applause lasted about a quarter of an hour before Koussevitzky signaled for quiet and said in his still imperfect English:

"My dear friends, it isn't so easy for me to speak but I who hate to look back would ask you to look back with me 25 years.

Many Helped

"We must be happy. So happy, that you, the orchestra and I have done a great achievement. We have worked together and created the most perfect instrument that is in the world. We have helped many young composers and artists. We have developed two generations of these until now we have composers and artists equal to any in the world.

"And it has been in these 25 years and in Boston, and in Symphony Hall."

"I thank you for your help and your patience. And I know you have been patient for you have not always liked the new music. But you can not have the old without the new. Like it or not, you were here. So I thank you."

Informal Reception

Then he left the stage. An informal reception followed in his quarters at the hall.

Among the musical figures joining in the farewell to Koussevitzky were two young composers he had assisted—Leonard Bernstein, the American conductor, and the Brazilian Eleazar de Carvalho. Like many others, they heard last night's concert standing up.

Chosen as Successor

Charles Muench, conductor of the Paris Conservatory Orchestra, has been choen as Koussevitzky's successor by the Symphony trustees.

The 74-year-old Koussevitzky intends to travel abroad. Next season he will conduct for the first time in South America. But he will be at Tanglewood in Massachusetts' Berkshire Hills during the Summer to conduct a school for musicians and direct a Summer concert series.

He became conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra in 1924.

TIGHT BINDING

CHICAGO, ILL.
TRIBUNE

MAY 1 - 1949

Boston Orchestra Not Coming Next Season

Don't expect the Boston orchestra next season. Its tour does not come beyond Toledo. Perhaps this is a wise decision, for an era of change is always an era of uncertainty, and whatever that superb orchestra may be under the direction of the gifted Charles Munch, it will not be the same. For a quarter of a century it has borne the stamp of Serge Koussevitzky, who made it an unrivaled instrument of incandescent expression. I shall always be grateful for Tanglewood visits when I heard his concerts by night, and by his courtesy was permitted to attend morning rehearsals when he took that orchestra apart and put it back together, strand by strand, each newly polished and tempered in insatiable pursuit of perfection.

Serge Koussevitzky, who has retired as conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra after 25 years. (Wide World Photo)

Fortunately, Koussevitzky is not quitting Tanglewood. He now has two home~~s, the lo~~vely Seranak actually at Tanglewood's door, but so exquisitely placed it seems to exist in a miniature Switzerland, and the newer Casa Serena, a tranquil winter place in Arizona. Seranak will find him at home of festival summers, but Casa Serena—I wonder. He wants to get back to his double bass, to compose, to write his autobiografy. But next season will find him conducting in South America, ~~Palestine~~, Europe, London, possibly Australia. Conducting is his life, which is fortunate, for to many a listener he makes it life for music, too.

I can think of no man who has relinquished a high post with a more remarkable assortment of achievements and expectations. After a fabulous career he is at the peak of his powers, and he has a unique investment in the future, for of all contemporary men to music he has done most to encourage, develop and display new talent.

Next season we are to hear the Houston orchestra for the first time with Efrem Kurtz conducting and Rudolf Firkusny as soloist, while Paul Paray makes his debut here with the Pittsburgh orchestra and the violinist, Szymon Goldberg. Antal Dorati probably will be down with the Minneapolis orchestra and Isaac Stern may be his soloist. They will be welcome. But no orchestra and no conductor will replace Boston's with Koussevitzky. Thanks to Tanglewood, this splendor need not yet recede into treasured remembrance of things past.

ROCHESTER, N. Y.
TIMES-UNION

MAY 2 - 1949

Koussevitzky Says Farewell

Serge Koussevitzky waves farewell after his final concert as conductor of ~~the~~ Boston Symphony Orchestra, which he directed for 25 years. An overflow Boston audience applauded the 74-year-old retiring conductor for 22 minutes Saturday night. (Acme)

FRESNO, CAL.
BEE

MAY 1 1949

FAREWELL SCORE — Serge Koussevitzky, noted conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who takes leave of his 25 year position, is shown here with his wife, the former Olga Noumoof, as they began their honeymoon trip in November, 1947.

Koussevitzky Makes Final Appearance As Conductor

By Fred Brady

BOSTON, April 30.—(AP)—Serge Koussevitzky, who once turned himelf into a sympathic Volga boatnan because he wanted people to ear music, tonight put down a briliant baton.

He has lifted it to critical acclaim and devotion from the front rows and gallery for 25 years as conductor of the famed 68 year old Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Tonight he made his farewell appearance as official conductor of the Boston symphony before his greatest admirers—the old Bostonians who pass on their symphony seats with their heirlooms and the youngsters who wait in line for th top balcony.

Yesterday afternoon when h gave the same Beethoven program there were tears on some of the ol faces.

This for a man now nearing 7 who as a peasant Russian lad ra away from home because his fathe would have none of the music th boy kept talking about.

Destitute in Moscow, the l begged for lessons. He did it w so much spirit the dignified facu of the Philharmonic School to him in.

That was the overture to a care famous in Europe and America, n only for artistry with an orches but for help an friendship to n music and new musicians.

Most recently, Koussevitzky h helped the careers of the you American conductor, Leonard Ber stein and the Brazilian, Eleazar l Carvalho.

During his early days in Russ he chartered a steamer to car his orchestra many miles along t Volga River, bringing to Russi villages their first symphony co certs.

WORCESTER, MASS.
TELEGRAM

MAY 1 - 1949

KOUSSEVITZKY DINNER TOMORROW

By RAYMOND MORIN

Last night, Serge Koussevitzky conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra in his last Symphony Hall concert. Tomorrow night, the thousand available places in the Boston auditorium will be taken for a civic dinner in his honor.

Additional tables will be placed in the First Balcony Gallery, admitting those who occupy them to seats in the balcony for the exercises following the dinner. The members of the Boston Symphony will attend the ceremonies as guests of the subscribers. Gov. Paul A. Dever will be present, and guests prominent in the civic life of Boston.

Culmination of Career

Although the acclamation will undoubtedly continue through the forthcoming Berkshire Music Festival at Tanglewood, Dr. Koussevitzky may well regard the event of tomorrow night as the culmination of his brilliant career. He is leaving Symphony Hall, the home of the Boston Symphony with whose name his has been synonymous for the past 25 years.

Dr. Koussevitzky's career has made its influence deeply felt on two continents. By an extraordinary coincidence he first conducted an orchestra at the age of seven; the year was 1881 when the Boston Symphony was born.

That he was born for the baton can be sensed every time he mounts the podium. It can even be felt at rehearsals when his cape is removed from his shoulders before he steps to the platform. His presence creates an atmosphere that transforms a familiar setting into a shrine for music.

Happens Time and Again

We have seen this happen time and time again. Last Summer, for example, when the Hawthorne Cottage was dedicated at Tanglewood, the select audience of invited guests was generously sprinkled with celebrities. All eyes moved swiftly as if performing an exercise in identification only to remain focused on Dr. Koussevitzky, as on the central figure of a large tapestry.

Dr. Koussevitzky has stood as a symbol of strength and determination in the world of music. It took courage to abandon a career as a double bass virtuoso to follow the dictates of his childhood. Even at the age of 14 he conducted an orchestra associated with a theatrical troupe, but for practical purposes ran away from his home at Tver, fortified by only three rubles, to seek a scholarship at the Philharmonic School in Moscow.

Even while touring Russia and Germany as a double bass virtuoso, the baton kept beckoning. It was in the concert halls of Berlin that he absorbed the baton personality of Artur Nikisch, who also was destined to conduct the Boston Symphony.

Tremendous Influence

Dr. Koussevitzky became a tremendous influence in the musical development of Russia during the first part of the twentieth century. After a first marriage about which he has told little, he married the wealthy Natalie Oushkoff. When asked by his new father-in-law what he wanted for a wedding gift, he immediately replied that he wanted a symphony orchestra.

He and his orchestra traveled thousands of miles up and down the Volga giving concerts in communities where even the instruments themselves were unknown. The first tour alone cost a personal outlay of more than one hundred thousand dollars.

World War I brought the Volga tours to an end. He was appointed director of the Russian State Orchestras, but that didn't please him. The same kind of artistic interference that has recently been reported from Russia was experienced by Dr. Koussevitzky. He and his wife attempted to leave Russia only to be captured by the secret police. After official wrangling they were finally permitted to leave the country for one year's absence. He never returned.

Paris Period

Thus began the Paris period that lasted for four years from 1920. Dr. Koussevitzky took Paris by storm. As he had done in Russia, he organized his own publishing firm to prevent the neglect of Russian music. While in Russia he had been the propagandist of European music; now he introduced Russian music to Europe.

Through Dr. Koussevitzky, Paris not only became acquainted with Moussorgsky but with its own composers as well. It was he who conducted the first world performance of such works as Honegger's "Pacific 231," and Ravel's orchestration of Debussy's "Sarabande et Danse."

In 1924, the Boston Symphony was at a low ebb artistically. Since 1881, it had thrived and swayed under various conductors. Since 1919, Pierre Monteux had struggled with many hostile elements. His defeat was not due to artistic shortcomings. The orchestra attempted to establish a union through a general strike and failed, causing wholesale resignations. Monteux was compelled to conduct the leftovers.

$100,000 Annual Budget

The orchestra and situation were highly vulnerable to Dr. Koussevitzky's artistic and creative talents when he was asked to become its permanent conductor in 1924. Whereas the New York Philharmonic was struggling along with an annual budget of $7000, Henry Lee Higginson, Boston banker, had from his own pocket provided a guaranteed fund of : million dollars, providing an annual budget of $100,000 for the orchestra.

Dr. Koussevitzky explained to us in an interview some eight years ago just what he required of his players. It was by these standards that he created the new Boston Symphony twenty-five years ago.

"First of all," he said, "we judge his technical ability. His technical equipment must be entirely adequate. Then we judge him as a musician. He must have interpretive insight and judgment. He must be able to subordinate his individuality to conductorship. He must have good sight reading ability—in short, he mus be able to reach our high standard."

Much Can Be Said

There is so much to be sai about Dr. Koussevitzky at th particular time that volum could be added to those alread in print. His zealous assistance the American composer and to composers whose works he h introduced—the great influen of the Berkshire Music Cent for which he is personally r sponsible—his sponsorship of ne artists—and his creation of one the world's greatest orchestras.

Dr. Koussevitzky is leavi Symphony Hall but his spirit w remain as long as the building self stands.

PARKERSBURG, W. VA.
NEWS

MAY 2 - 1949

Bostonians Weep As Koussevitzky Takes Final Bow

BOSTON, May 1 (UP)—Proper Bostonians applauded wildly, stamped their feet and wept last night when Serge Koussevitzky took his final ~~bow after 25 years~~ of conducting the famed Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The capacity Symphony Hall audience of more than 2,600 and some 200 singers on stage gave Koussevitzky an eight-minute ovation when he laid down his baton after his final appearance as conductor.

The retiring maestro accepted a laurel wreath from members of the audience, then tore leaves from it and threw them to his orchestra which he praised in a brief speech as the "most perfect musical instrument that exists in the world."

Koussevitzky himself was dry-eyed, though many wept in the audience, but his facial muscles worked nervously as he spoke and again as he took repeated bows during another sustained ovation at the end of his words.

The 74-year-old maestro, who frequently has defied critics by playing the music of composers not yet accepted, chose for his finale a standard work—Beethoven's Ninth Symphony.

[399]

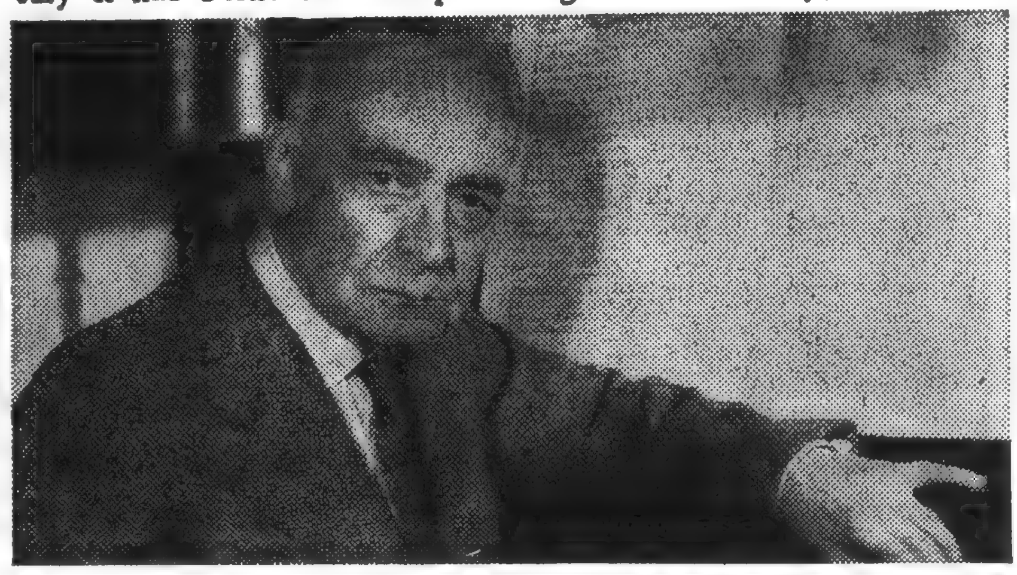
TIGHT BINDING

CHICAGO, ILL.
TRIBUNE

MAY 1 - 1949

Boston Orchestra Not Coming Next Season

Don't expect the Boston orchestra next season. Its tour does not come beyond Toledo. Perhaps this is a wise decision, for an era of change is always an era of uncertainty, and whatever that superb orchestra may be under the direction of the gifted Charles Munch, it will not be the same. For a quarter of a century it has borne the stamp of Serge Koussevitzky, who made it an unrivaled instrument of incandescent expression. I shall always be grateful for Tanglewood visits when I heard his concerts by night, and by his courtesy was permitted to attend morning rehearsals when he took that orchestra apart and put it back together, strand by strand, each newly polished and tempered in insatiable pursuit of perfection.



Serge Koussevitzky, who has retired as conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra after 25 years. (Wide World Photo)

Fortunately, Koussevitzky is not quitting Tanglewood. He now has two homes~~, the~~ lovely Seranak actually at Tanglewood's door, but so exquisitely placed it seems to exist in a miniature Switzerland, and the newer Casa Serena, a tranquil winter place in Arizona. Seranak will find him at home of festival summers, but Casa Serena—I wonder. He wants to get back to his double bass, to compose, to write his autobiografy. But next season will find him conducting in South America, ~~Palestine~~, Europe, London, possibly Australia. Conducting is his life, which is fortunate, for to many a listener he makes it life for music, too.

I can think of no man who has relinquished a high post with a more remarkable assortment of achievements and expectations. After a fabulous career he is at the peak of his powers, and he has a unique investment in the future, for of all contemporary men to music he has done most to encourage, develop and display new talent.

Next season we are to hear the Houston orchestra for the first time with Efrem Kurtz conducting and Rudolf Firkusny as soloist, while Paul Paray makes his debut here with the Pittsburgh orchestra and the violinist, Szymon Goldberg. Antal Dorati probably will be down with the Minneapolis orchestra and Isaac Stern may be his soloist. They will be welcome. But no orchestra and no conductor will replace Boston's with Koussevitzky. Thanks to Tanglewood, this splendor need not yet recede into treasured remembrance of things past.

ROCHESTER, N. Y.
TIMES-UNION

MAY 2 - 1949

Koussevitzky Says Farewell

Serge Koussevitzky waves farewell after his final concert as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which he directed for 25 years. An overflow Boston audience applauded the 74-year-old retiring conductor for 22 minutes Saturday night. (Acme)

FRESNO, CAL.
BEE

MAY 1 1949

FAREWELL SCORE — Serge Koussevitzky, noted conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who takes leave of his 25 year position, is shown here with his wife, the former Olga Noumoof, as they began their honeymoon trip in November, 1947.

Koussevitzky Makes Final Appearance As Conductor

By Fred Brady

BOSTON, April 30.—(AP)—Serge Koussevitzky, who once turned himelf into a sympathic Volga boatnan because he wanted people to iear music, tonight put down a briliant baton.

He has lifted it to critical acclaim ind devotion from the front rows ind gallery for 25 years as conluctor of the famed 68 year old Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Tonight he made his farewell appearance as official conductor of the Boston symphony before his greatest admirers—the old Bostonians who pass on their symphony seats with their heirlooms and the youngsters who wait in line for th top balcony.

Yesterday afternoon when h gave the same Beethoven program there were tears on some of the ol faces.

This for a man now nearing 7 who as a peasant Russian lad ra away from home because his fathe would have none of the music th boy kept talking about.

Destitute in Moscow, the la begged for lessons. He did it wit so much spirit the dignified facult of the Philharmonic School too him in.

That was the overture to a caree famous in Europe and America, no only for artistry with an orchestr but for help an friendship to new music and new musicians.

Most recently, Koussevitzky ha helped the careers of the young American conductor, Leonard Bernstein and the Brazilian, Eleazar De Carvalho.

During his early days in Russia he chartered a steamer to carry his orchestra many miles along the Volga River, bringing to Russian villages their first symphony concerts.

PARKERSBURG, W. VA.
NEWS

MAY 2 - 1949

Bostonians Weep As Koussevitzky Takes Final Bow

BOSTON, May 1 (UP)—Proper Bostonians applauded wildly, stamped their feet and wept last night when Serge Koussevitzky took his final ~~bow after 25 years~~ of conducting the famed Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The capacity Symphony Hall audience of more than 2,600 and some 200 singers on stage gave Koussevitzky an eight-minute ovation when he laid down his baton after his final appearance as conductor.

The retiring maestro accepted a laurel wreath from members of the audience, then tore leaves from it and threw them to his orchestra which he praised in a brief speech as the "most perfect musical instrument that exists in the world."

Koussevitzky himself was dry-eyed, though many wept in the audience, but his facial muscles worked nervously as he spoke and again as he took repeated bows during another sustained ovation at the end of his words.

The 74-year-old maestro, who frequently has defied critics by playing the music of composers not yet accepted, chose for his finale a standard work—Beethoven's Ninth Symphony.

WORCESTER, MASS.
TELEGRAM

MAY 1 - 1949

KOUSSEVITZKY DINNER TOMORROW

By RAYMOND MORIN

Last night, Serge Koussevitzky conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra in his last Symphony Hall concert. Tomorrow night, the thousand available places in the Boston auditorium will be taken for a civic dinner in his honor.

Additional tables will be placed in the First Balcony Gallery, admitting those who occupy them to seats in the balcony for the exercises following the dinner. The members of the Boston Symphony will attend the ceremonies as guests of the subscribers. Gov. Paul A. Dever will be present, and guests prominent in the civic life of Boston.

Culmination of Career

Although the acclamation will undoubtedly continue through the forthcoming Berkshire Music Festival at Tanglewood, Dr. Koussevitzky may well regard the event of tomorrow night as the culmination of his brilliant career. He is leaving Symphony Hall, the home of the Boston Symphony with whose name his has been synonymous for the past 25 years.

Dr. Koussevitzky's career has made its influence deeply felt on two continents. By an extraordinary coincidence he first conducted an orchestra at the age of seven; the year was 1881 when the Boston Symphony was born.

That he was born for the baton can be sensed every time he mounts the podium. It can even be felt at rehearsals when his cape is removed from his shoulders before he steps to the platform. His presence creates an atmosphere that transforms a familiar setting into a shrine for music.

Happens Time and Again

We have seen this happen time and time again. Last Summer, for example, when the Hawthorne Cottage was dedicated at Tanglewood, the select audience of invited guests was generously sprinkled with celebrities. All eyes moved swiftly as if performing an exercise in identification only to remain focused on Dr. Koussevitzky, as on the central figure of a large tapestry.

Dr. Koussevitzky has stood as a symbol of strength and determination in the world of music. It took courage to abandon a career as a double bass virtuoso to follow the dictates of his childhood. Even at the age of 14 he conducted an orchestra associated with a theatrical troupe, but for practical purposes ran away from his home at Tver, fortified by only three rubles, to seek a scholarship at the Philharmonic School in Moscow.

Even while touring Russia and Germany as a double bass virtuoso, the baton kept beckoning. It was in the concert halls of Berlin that he absorbed the baton personality of Artur Nikisch, who also was destined to conduct the Boston Symphony.

Tremendous Influence

Dr. Koussevitzky became a tremendous influence in the musical development of Russia during the first part of the twentieth century. After a first marriage about which he has told little, he married the wealthy Natalie Oushkoff. When asked by his new father-in-law what he wanted for a wedding gift, he immediately replied that he wanted a symphony orchestra.

He and his orchestra traveled thousands of miles up and down the Volga giving concerts in communities where even the instruments themselves were unknown. The first tour alone cost a personal outlay of more than one hundred thousand dollars.

World War I brought the Volga tours to an end. He was appointed director of the Russian State Orchestras, but that didn't please him. The same kind of artistic interference that has recently been reported from Russia was experienced by Dr. Koussevitzky. He and his wife attempted to leave Russia only to be captured by the secret police. After official wrangling they were finally permitted to leave the country for one year's absence. He never returned.

Paris Period

Thus began the Paris period that lasted for four years from 1920. Dr. Koussevitzky took Paris by storm. As he had done in Russia, he organized his own publishing firm to prevent the neglect of Russian music. While in Russia he had been the propagandist of European music; now he introduced Russian music to Europe.

Through Dr. Koussevitzky, Paris not only became acquainted with Moussorgsky but with its own composers as well. It was he who conducted the first world performance of such works as Honegger's "Pacific 231," and Ravel's orchestration of Debussy's "Sarabande et Danse."

In 1924, the Boston Symphony was at a low ebb artistically. Since 1881, it had thrived and swayed under various conductors. Since 1919, Pierre Monteux had struggled with many hostile elements. His defeat was not due to artistic shortcomings. The orchestra attempted to establish a union through a general strike and failed, causing wholesale resignations. Monteux was compelled to conduct the leftovers.

$100,000 Annual Budget

The orchestra and situation were highly vulnerable to Dr. Koussevitzky's artistic and creative talents when he was asked to become its permanent conductor in 1924. Whereas the New York Philharmonic was struggling along with an annual budget of $7000, Henry Lee Higginson, Boston banker, had from his own pocket provided a guaranteed fund of million dollars, providing an annual budget of $100,000 for the orchestra.

Dr. Koussevitzky explained to us in an interview some eight years ago just what he required of his players. It was by these standards that he created the new Boston Symphony twenty-five years ago.

"First of all," he said, "we judge his technical ability. His technical equipment must be entirely adequate. Then we judge him as a musician. He must have interpretive insight and judgment. He must be able to subordinate his individuality to conductorship. He must have good sigh reading ability—in short, he mu be able to reach our high stand ard."

Much Can Be Said

There is so much to be sa about Dr. Koussevitzky at t particular time that volum could be added to those alrea in print. His zealous assistance the American composer and to composers whose works he introduced—the great influe of the Berkshire Music Cen for which he is personally sponsible—his sponsorship of n artists—and his creation of one the world's greatest orchestra

Dr. Koussevitzky is leav Symphony Hall but his spirit remain as long as the building self stands.

LANCASTER, PA.
NTELLIGENCER-JOURNAL

MAY 2- 1949

'Greatest Conductor' Retires This Season

New York—(AP)—

The greatest conductor in our time . . . incomparable master of string tone . . . matchless virtuoso . . . the man who has done the most for American music . . .

With such superlatives as these, critics have hailed Serge Koussevitzky in the course of his quarter-century as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra; and it is with such praises ringing in his ears that he has resigned, effective at the end of this concert season.

He explains that, as Boston conductor, "you don't belong to yourself, you don't have the time to breathe, you're not your own man. I don't feel I'm old, or that I'm tired, but I want to have my absolute freedom."

He doesn't look old, though his graying hair is getting thin. With one stray lock of it whipping about as he shakes his head in conversation, he certainly does not act tired. He has a complexion as healthy, and as red, as an American Indian's; his eyes snap. He tramps into the room to meet you with the same stately tread with which he marches from the wings to the podium; but once he sits down and begins to talk, he is as animated as any youngster, thrusting out his arms, counting off points on his fingers, clasping his hands to his chest.

Since he intends to travel abroad, it looks as though for a time this would be not only Boston's loss but also the country's. Next season he will conduct for the first time in South America; and he will visit Palestine, Europe and London, where he has not conducted for 13 years. In the following season he may accept repeated, and repeatedly rejected, invitations to spend three months in Australia.

The double-bass, his own instrument, which he taught in his native Russia and played all over Europe, had had to be given up. "Sometimes I take it out of the case, and then put it back, and the tears come to my eyes," he says.

Though he is leaving Boston, he will remain at Tanglewood, where school and concerts will continue to occupy him about 10 weeks every year. He may teach, he wants to compose, he will start immediately to write his autobiography. The languages he knows are music and Russian, not English, which he speaks only with a decided accent. He will write in Russian, and his wife, who for years was his secretary, will translate, as she has translated his numerous speeches.

It looks like a busman's holiday. At any rate it will not be so confining as what he does now, when a week's vacation is no different from a week's work. On his last trip to New York, for instance, his schedule was: Monday, conduct in Hartford; Tuesday, conduct in New Haven; Wednesday, conduct here; Thursday, conduct in Newark; Friday, a stolen day of rest, though he listened to records, was photographed, and talked to a reporter, among other things; Saturday, conduct here again; Sunday, attend three meetings.

Then began his week off: Monday, rehearse two glee clubs; Tuesday, ditto; Wednesday, rehearse orchestra; Thursday, rehearse orchestra and clubs; Friday, free; Saturday, general rehearsal; Sunday, conduct the B minor mass for which he had been preparing; it's so long that most audiences, though they're a lot younger than the 74-year-old conductor, have to take it in two parts, and in Boston the first section comes in the afternoon and the second in the evening. Then on the following Monday the conductor went back to work!

Koussevitzky has programmed nearly 200 American compositions in his 25 years here. "Festivals" of American music such as he presented this Winter in Boston and on tour could not have been offered a quarter-century ago, he says unhesitatingly, simply for lack of the music. About that time some of our big conservatories were being founded, and in Koussevitzky's opinion, "the real history of American music began about 25 years ago."

His part in it has been widely acknowledged, and increased recognition is planned. The Boston Symphony is selling RCA Victor-made albums of Koussevitzky at the double-bass, recorded 20 years ago, and proceeds will go to the $250,000 Serge Koussevitzky Fund newly established by the Orchestra's Board of Trustees.

Louis Vyner, conductor of the Lancaster Community Orchestra, leads his musicians through one of the spirited practice sessions that have turned 80 individuals into a well-disciplined ensemble.

HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

MAY 2- 1949

Leonard Bernstein Wins Boston Symphony Award

Boston — (AP) — The Boston Symphony Orchestra's merit award of $1,000 has been presented to Composer - Conductor Leonard Bernstein for his second symphony, "The Age of Anxiety."

It was performed by the orchestra a month ago with the composer at the piano. The symphony is based on a poem by W. H. Auden.

Previous recipients of the award established three years ago are Aaron Copland and Walter Piston.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

MAY 2 - 1949

AS KOUSSEVITZKY BADE FAREWELL TO HIS ORCHESTRA

The conductor (center) shaking hands with Alfred Zighera, a 'cellist, after he led the Boston Symphony for the last time on Saturday night.

Associated Press Wirephoto

BOSTON, May 1 (UP)—Symphony Hall, where Bostonians stamped their feet and wept last night when Serge Koussevitzky retired as leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was transformed into a vast banquet hall today for a public testimonial to the noted conductor.

Music-lovers, who lost their composure in a fifteen-minute ovation when the 74-year-old maestro took his final bow, will shower Dr. Koussevitzky with more compliments and with gifts at the tribute tomorrow night.

The Russian-born conductor, retiring after twenty-five years as conductor of the Boston Symphony, received one of the greatest ovations in Boston musical history when he laid down his baton last night after conducting Beethoven's Ninth Symphony.

The capacity audience of more than 2,600 persons and some 200 singers on stage applauded him for eight minutes, halted while he praised the orchestra as the "most perfect musical instrument that exists in the world" and then cheered for seven minutes more.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE

MAY 2 - 1949

Koussevitsky Says Good By

Associated Press wirephoto

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky (left), director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, saying farewell to the musicians who played for him Saturday night when he conducted his final concert at Symphony Hall in Boston. Shaking hands with the seventy-four-year-old conductor, who retired after twenty-five years with the orchestra, is Alfred Zighera, violoncellist

WORCESTER, MASS.
GAZETTE
MAY 3 - 1949

Serge Koussevitsky Leaves the Podium

THE RETIREMENT of Serge Koussevitsky as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra marks an epoch in the musical and cultural history of New England, and is significant in musical circles throughout the world. To measure achievements within the arts with the words "greatest" and "best" is to use terms on which there can be no universal contemporary agreement. But Mr. Koussevitsky has for some years been ranked by general opinion as the leading orchestra conductor, and the world-wide distinction of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under his leadership, has reached such proportions as to place it beyond challenge.

Therefore, when Mr. Koussevitsky says, "We have worked together and created the most perfect instrument that is in the world," he is not speaking immodestly, but with a deep personal conviction, from the experience of his years of idealistic perfectionism, and his unwavering integrity toward that ideal. He sees, indeed, other elements than his own labors that have contributed to this achievement. Speaking to the audience that had cheered him so affectionately for fifteen minutes, and speaking of all audiences that have supported the orchestra through his 25 years as conductor, he included them in the congratulations, "that you, and the orchestra, and I have done a great achievement."

IT HAS been more than hard work that has brought this tremendous result. Mr. Koussevitsky has brought to it a broad and flexible understanding of the fundamental purposes of music. He has brought, with his dynamic powers of persistence, a sensitive and inspiring genius. And he has brought wisdom, courtesy, and a profound sense of service to the community, to the organization, and to the art of music. He has been more than a maestro; more than a virtuoso. He has been a great human figure, expressing to the fullest of his energy and insight, a great human inspiration.

To succeed him will be an honor. To emulate him will be a duty. To equal him will be to achieve greatness.

BAKERSFIELD, CAL.
CALIFORNIAN
MAY 2 1949

Serge Koussevitzky Ends Brilliant Musical Career

BOSTON—(AP)—Serge Koussevitzky, who once turned himself into a symphonic Volga boatman because he wanted people to hear music, has put down a brilliant baton.

He has lifted it to critical acclaim and devotion from the front rows and gallery for 25 years as conductor of the famed 68-year-old Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Saturday he makes his farewell appearance as official conductor of Boston symphony before his greatest admirers—the old Bostonians who pass on their symphony seats with their heirlooms and the youngsters who wait in line for the top balcony.

If it's like yesterday afternoon when he gave the same Beethoven program, tonight will be both concert and drama.

The Friday faithful gave him spirited applause—and there were tears on some of the old faces.

This for a man now nearing 75 who was a peasant Russian lad ran away from home because his father would have none of the music the boy kept talking about.

Penniless in Moscow, the lad begged for lessons. He did it with so much spirit that the dignified faculty of the Philharmonic School took him in.

That was the overture to a career famous in Europe and America not only for artistry with an orchestra but for help and friendship to new music and new musicians.

Most recently, Koussevitzky has helped the careers of the young American conductor, Leonard Bernstein and the Brazilian, Eleazar de Carvalho.

During his early days in Russia he chartered a steamer to carry his orchestra many miles along the Volga river, bringing to Russian villages their first symphony concerts.

Boston Traveler
MONDAY, MAY 2, 1949

Koussevitzky Farewell

In the history of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Serge Koussevitzky is unique. He alone has wielded the baton for a quarter of a century. He alone has made the orchestra again what it was before the first World War, the greatest orchestra in the world during the world's greatest era of orchestral music.

Only in one art is this century by critical agreement supreme. Other centuries have known greater poets, painters, sculptors, composers, architects and philosophers. No century has known greater orchestras. No city has known a greater orchestra. Our orchestra has never known a greater conductor. That is the pinnacle on which Serge Koussevitzky stood the day he said farewell.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE
MAY 2 - 1949

Koussevitzky Conducts Last Concert in Boston

BOSTON, April 30 (UP).—Serge Koussevitzky gave his final concert as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Saturday night and retired after twenty-five year in which he won world renown for himself and the orchestra.

The seventy-four-year-old conductor, who frequently has defied critics by playing the music of composers not yet accepted, chose for his finale a standard work—Beethoven's Ninth Symphony.

Russian-born Koussevitzky will be succeeded next year by Charles Muench, of Paris. Dr. Koussevitzky will continue as director of the Berkshire Music Center which he founded at Tanglewood in Lenox, Mass.

Symphony Hall, which was crowded for his final appearance as conductor, will be the scene Monday of a public testimonial dinner for Dr. Koussevitzky. His accomplishments include the fact that he, more than any other man, was responsible for the acceptance in America of the works of Debussy, Stravinsky and Prokofiev. He is one of three men in musical history to attain virtuoso rank on the double bass.

DANBURY, CONN.
NEWS-TIMES
MAY 3 - 1949

GRAND FINALE

Serge Koussevitzky, retiring after 25 years as conductor of the Boston Philharmonic Orchestra, acknowledges the ovation given him following his final concert at Boston's Symphony Hall. The 74-year-old conductor was applauded for 22 minutes by the audience and orchestra.

BRIDGEPORT, CONN.
POST
MAY 3 - 1949

$159,000 IS COLLECTED FOR BOSTON SYMPHONY

BOSTON, May 3—(UP) The famed Boston Symphony orchestra was $159,000 richer today following a testimonial dinner tendered Serge Koussevitzky, retiring conductor.

The sum represented a collection taken in Symphony Hall last night where about 1,000 persons gathered to pay tribute to the 74-year-old conductor. He laid down his baton Saturday night after 25 years' service. Charles Munch of Paris, France replaces him.

The Russian-born Koussevitzky, who will remain as the orchestra's music director emeritus, asked that he be given nothing on retiring but that a sum be raised to establish a permanent endowment for the orchestra. However, he was presented with a replica of the famed Paul Revere "Liberty Bowl" in behalf of the citizens of Boston.

MUSIC

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

So long and so closely has Serge Koussevitzky been identified with the Boston Symphony Orchestra that it is difficult to believe that it is all over. True, he will conduct the concerts of this summer's Berkshire Festival, with the customary assistance of his proteges, the Messrs. Bernstein and Carvalho. But at the Symphony Concerts proper he will henceforth appear only as guest. Nor will these guest appearances be confined to Boston. The farewells that have been taking place here and elsewhere are farewells only in a limited sense. Dr. Koussevitzky has resigned. He is not retiring. And that is good news.

Conductor and Band

Perhaps it would have been better if conductor and orchestra had parted company before the notion that they were inseparable became so deeply imbedded, before the band became so definitely a projection of its leader's musical personality. The future is indeed fraught with uncertainty. How will the orchestra sound when Charles Munch has had it for a while? How will Mr. Munch himself perform, as conductor, drill master and program maker? He is a musician of experience and integrity. His tendency to exaggerate, to overdo, to whoop things up—a tendency from which Dr. Koussevitzky has by no means been free, though it has taken a slightly different form—can easily be rectified if he can be convinced that it is in his, the audience's and the music's interest for him to take things more easily. The belief that a composer's points must be underscored, that a lily is not beautiful until it has been gilded, that outward calm on a conductor's part means that he has nothing to say, or that he exercises no real control over his forces, is now widespread.

Audiences like to see their music dramatized for them. That it sounds dramatic is not enough. The conductor must interpret it visually. Gymnastics, and even dancing on the platform, are not objected to. Rather they are enjoyed as part of the show. We were used to the other things in the days of Muck and we had lately had an impressive example of it in Fritz Reiner's bodily repose while conducting that exciting performance of "Salome" at the Opera House.

Didn't Have To Leave

Actually, for Koussevitsky to have terminated his connection with the orchestra any earlier was as unthinkable as it was for him to terminate it at all. He didn't wish to leave, and the trustees would have been reckless to dispense with a conductor who so strongly appealed to all and sundry. Were such an arrangement humanly possible, it would be better for him to remain in charge indefinitely. There should be guest conductors, a highly desirable institution in the case of any orchestra, but in selecting these guests the emphasis should be upon Koussevitzky's peers, not upon his pupils, as has been the case of late. The former were represented in the season just passed only by Ernest Ansermet, and he was with us for but one altogether memorable week.

To count the significant accomplishments and achievements of the notable quarter century that was the Koussevitzkian era would take many articles such as this, and I do not intend to call a halt with this one. Nor is there space today to particularize, according to immemorial editorial custom regarding the season that came to an end last night. That can be attended to next Sunday.

European Tradition

Before Rabaud and Monteux gave us six seasons of French leadership the central European tradition prevailed at Symphony Hall, as it did everywhere else in this country. But Koussevitzky, as a Russian, approached both German and French music from the outside, with the result that his Brahms was better than Monteux's, his Debussy superior to Muck's, and his Tchaikovsky authentic as only a Russian's can be. Toscanini, as an Italian, has the same objective approach, but I'll take Koussevitzky's Brahms and Debussy or Strauss and Ravel ahead of his anytime. At least if Mr. Munch's nationality is French, his blood is not exclusively so.

In addition to Koussevitzky's versatility, there has been the enormous range of his progams. Of late years that range has narrowed; but taking the 25 years as a whole, it is not easy to point to an important composer who has not been given a break. And what Koussevitzky has not done has been attended to by Mr. Burgin and the various guests.

CINCINNATI O.
ENQUIRER
MAY 2 1949

—Associated Press Wirephoto.

MAESTRO DROPS BATON.

Serge Koussevitsky dropped his hands to his side as he completed his last concert as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, a position he has held for a quarter of a century. He received a tremendous ovation lasting 15 minutes.

SIOUX FALLS, S. D.
ARGUS-LEADER
MAY 2 - 1949

DINNER WILL HONOR RETIRING CONDUCTOR

Boston, May 2—(AP)—Serge Koussevitsky, ending 25 years as leader of the Boston symphony orchestra, will be honored tonight at a civic dinner.

The 74-year-old conductor closed his brilliant career as the orchestra ended its 68th season Saturday night. He received a thunderous ovation from a large crowd.

The ceremonies in his honor tonight will be highlighted by the presentation of a cantata by the Alumni association of the Berkshire Music center at Tanglewood, founded by Koussevitsky in 1940.

Six young composers wrote the music to a text by David McCord, a Boston poet.

FORT WORTH, TEXAS
MORNING STAR-TELEGRAM
MAY 2 1949

—Associated Press Wirephoto.

FINIS—Serge Koussevitzky, for a quarter of a century conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, drops his hands to his side as he faced the audience in Boston's Symphony Hall Sunday night. It was his last concert. He received a 15-minute ovation.

HOLYOKE, MASS.
TRANSCRIPT TELEGRAM

MAY 3 - 1949

SYMPHONY GOT $159,000 IN KOUSSEVITZKY FAREWELL

BOSTON, (U.P.) — The famed Boston Symphony orchestra was $159,000 [illegible]day following a testimonial banquet tendered retiring Conductor Serge Koussevitzky.

The sum represented a collection taken at Symphony Hall last night, where about 1,000 persons gathered to pay tribute to the 74-year-old conductor. He laid down his baton Saturday after 25 years' service. Charles Munch of Paris, France, replaces him.

YONKERS, N. Y.
TIMES

MAY 3 - 1949

CONDUCTOR HONORED

BOSTON, May 3. (AP)—More than 2,000 persons honored Serge Koussevitzky at a civic dinner in Symphony Hall last night. The 74-year-old retired conductor of Boston Symphony Orchestra was named conductor emeritus by the Board of Trustees.

"Wherever destiny will lead my life and service to music," Koussevitzky said. "a large part of my soul will remain here, with you and the beloved Boston Symphony Orchestra.

PORTLAND, ME.
EXPRESS

MAY 3 - 1949

2,000 At Dinner For Koussevitzky

Boston, May 3. (AP) — More than 2,000 persons honored Serge Koussevitzky at a civic dinner in Symphony Hall Monday night. The 74-year-old retired conductor of Boston Symphony Orchestra was named conductor emeritus by the board of trustees.

"Wherever destiny will lead my life and service to music," Koussevitzky said, "a large part of my soul will remain here, with you and the beloved Boston Symphony Orchestra."

PAWTUCKET, R. I.
TIMES

MAY 3 - 1949

Ideals Of An Artist

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, one of the great musical directors of all time, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for 25 years, did not make the orchestra's great reputation. It already had it when he became the orchestra's leader, but now that he has retired it is his right and his privilege to tell the musical world what his ambitions were when he assumed control. He wished, he says, "to make it the greatest musical instrument in the world." Many thousands of people, not all Boston people by any means, believe he has done it.

Many who are not professional musicians, preferring to call themselves lovers of music, are likely to be pleased at his description of the orchestra as a musical instrument. The professionals, the men and women who have lived the life of music and made it the major aim of their education, do treat an orchestra as an instrument rather than a collection of performers and instruments. It was the desire of the great conductor of the Boston organization to take this instrument and make its hundred parts into one, its hundred players like a single artist playing on the instrument. Those familiar with Dr. Koussevitsky's concerts feel that he has come nearer that ideal than most conductors have. Some, indeed, believe him the greatest of all conductors.

There need be no debate on that point. It is sufficient that he is a very great artist, that he has enhanced the fame of an organiztion whose fame was great when he became its director. Serge Koussevitzky had his ideals when he came to Boston; he never abandoned them. He set his standards high and never lowered them. That is why he grew in stature among the world's greatest musicians in a period of history when the world seemed to have abandoned the ideal for the brutally expedient, when the director of armies was eagerly sought and the director of music neglected; when the instrument of beauty was set aside to make way for the instrument of killing.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

MAY 3 - 1949

Koussevitzky Honored As 'Very Great American'

Retiring Symphony Conductor Hailed at Civic Dinner in Boston

By G. Y. LOVERIDGE
Journal-Bulletin Staff Writer

Symphony Hall, Boston, May 3.—A famous man, "such as found out musical tunes," was praised in his own generation here tonight. He was, of course, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, who has conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra for 25 consecutive, illustrious seasons and who is now retiring—after a fashion. Farewell appearances the past season in Providence, New York, Boston and elsewhere were rounded off with a solemn yet joyous coda in the form of a civic dinner, in the very hall where Dr. Koussevitzky, sometimes with cajolery but oftener with fire and brimstone, has moulded the great orchestra into his own musical image and has displayed it to an audience both fond and critical.

Poor in Youth

The dinner was an extraordinary event in a life that has commonly been extraordinary. As a boy, Koussevitzky was extraordinarily poor, so that he had to seek out the cheapest seats at musical performances during his student years at the Moscow Conservatory.

He became an extraordinary performer on the doublebass. Of all the Volga boatmen, he was certainly the most extraordinary, floating down for a thousand miles with his orchestra, stopping to deliver great works of music in towns and villages that had known nothing but folk tunes and gypsy melodies.

When he came to this country, it was he, a foreigner, who showed extraordinary sympathy for American composers, encouraging them with performances and commissions. And no less extraordinary is the musical structure he has built and will continue to direct at Tanglewood.

Dinner Held

Tonight's celebration began with a dinner. The floor of the hall was occupied by diners at round tables holding a dozen and rectangular ones holding 30. The foyer was filled with pans of food and with servants. On the platform, at a long table facing the merely ordinarily distinguished, sat the poor Russian boy, accompanied by Mrs. Koussevitzky, Edward A. Taft, Allan Forbes, James B. Conant, president of Harvard; Henry B. Cabot, M. A. Dewolfe Howe, Robert Cutler, the Rev. Theodore P. Ferris, rector of Trinity Church; Lewis Perry, and Richard Burgin, concertmaster and assistant conductor of the orchestra. Many members of the orchestra and their wives attended.

About 8:30 the balconies were opened, and those who came to hear but not to eat took their places, including many a music student from the city's institutions.

"Spiritual Internationalist"

The dinner table on the platform was cleared away and seats for musicians were placed at one side, while the diners sat at the other. Mr. Perry referring to Dr. Koussevitzky as a "spiritual internationalist and a very great American," remarked that "what he had done on the Volga, he has done on the Charles."

A small chorus of women and an instrumental ensemble of 11, directed by Lukas Foss, then presented a cantata, "In Grato Jubilo," with text by David McCord and music by Irving Fine, Daniel Pinkham, Gartner Read, Allen Sapp, Herbert Fromm and Mr. Foss, all former students at the Berkshire Music Center.

Mr. Forbes, on behalf of the citizens of Boston, presented Dr. Koussevitzky a silver bowl copied from one made by the famous Boston silversmith and horseman Paul Revere.

Given Silver Plaque

Then came Mr. Cabot with a silver plaque on which were engraved the names of the trustees. It was a token of admiration for Dr. Koussevitzky's service to music. Mr. Cabot announced that Dr. Koussevitzky had been appointed director-emeritus, and expressed pleasure that he would conduct from time to time even in "retirement."

Dr. Koussevitzky some months ago asked that a fund be raised by those who wished to honor him, the fund to be used to insure that the orchestra will continue, whatever the economic uncertainties of the times. Mr. Perry announced that the fund now stands at $159,000, including a donation of $1000 made tonight.

Reads From Manuscript

Dr. Koussevitzky, putting on his spectacles, spread a manuscript on the small reading desk at the front of the stage. Earnestly and at times vehemently, he reviewed his association with the orchestra and with the people out front. He urged a permanent endowment. "Let us remember," he said, "that music is no longer an entertainment. It is also a science, but a science of the highest spiritual order leading to beauty, joy and peace." He spoke of the religious affinity of music and said, "this very stage has been my altar for 25 years."

"In my farewell to you," he concluded, "Let me quote a line: 'Nothing but the soul can put soul into music, and the soul is God's work.'

"Wherever destiny will lead my life and service to music, a large part of my soul will remain here, with you and the beloved Boston Symphony Orchestra."

At the last line, his voice broke. The audience arose and applauded fervently. Dr. Koussevitzky shook hands again with those on the platform, bowed twice more to the audience still applauding, and went through the little door in the stage which has so often admitted him to the preparing and the performing of his musical devotions.

Farewell, O famous man, and hail!

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

MAY 4 - 1949

KOUSSEVITZKY PRAISED

Petrillo Sends Regrets at Conductor's Retirement

Boston, May 4. — (AP) — Serge Koussevitzky, retired conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, drew a message of high praise last night from James C. Petrillo, president of the American Federation of Musicians.

"Your retirement from this glorious field," Petrillo said in a telegram, "will leave a huge vacuum which will be most difficult, if not impossible, to fill."

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

MAY 3 - 1949

BOSTON IN TRIBUTE TO KOUSSEVITZKY

Retired Conductor Honored by Civic Leaders, Ex-Students at Symphony Hall Dinner

By JOHN H. FENTON
Special to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

BOSTON, May 2—Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, who retired Saturday after twenty-five years as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was honored tonight at a civic dinner in the hall where he rose to international fame.

The customary floor seats at Symphony Hall were moved out to make room for tables, with the head table on the orchestra stage. Extra guests were accommodated in the picture gallery, and persons not dining looked down on the festivities from the galleries.

Of all the presentations, the one that appeared to touch Dr. Koussevitzky most was a six-movement cantata, "In Grato Jubilo," written and presented by former students of his at the Berkshire Music Center, Tanglewood, near Lenox, Mass.

Lukas Foss, pianist of the symphony orchestra, conducted the musical presentation, which involved a women's chorus of eighteen voices and eleven instrumentalists.

Each of the six movements had been composed by a former student. They were Mr. Foss, Irving Fine, Daniel Pinkham, Gardner Read, Allen Sapp and Herbert Fromm. The words were written by David McCord, author of "About Boston." Soloists were Miss Phyllis Curtin, soprano, and Miss Eunice Alberts, contralto.

Allan Forbes, representing the citizens of Boston, presented to Dr. Koussevitzky a replica of the Paul Revere Bowl, and Richard Burgin, representing the orchestra, presented an engrossed, illuminated scroll containing the names of the orchestra members and excerpts from his favorite themes.

For the orchestra trustees, Henry B. Cabot, president, presented a silver platter. Edward A. Taft, chairman of the Serge Koussevitzky Anniversary Fund, presented a scroll containing the names of every contributor. The fund was established at Dr. Koussevitzky's suggestion for the use of the orchestra "in the event of emergency."

Speakers also included the Rev. Dr. Theodore P. Ferris, Rector of Trinity Protestant Episcopal Church; Robert Cutler, president of the Old Colony Trust Company, and Lewis Perry, vice chairman of the dinner.

TIMES

MAY 4 - 1949

Gs

PREPARED TO HONOR KOUSSEVITZKY HERE

The League of Composers yesterday announced details of the musical program to be given at the dinner honoring Serge Koussevitzky in the Waldorf-Astoria next Tuesday. It will include excerpts from Marc Blitzstein's forthcoming opera, "The Little Foxes."

This work was commissioned by the Koussevitzky Music Foundation. The excerpts will be sung by Virginia Card, soprano; David Thomas, baritone, and Shannon Bolin, mezzo-soprano, with Mr. Blitzstein accompanying them at the piano. Another soloist will be Orestes Urfe Gonzalez, who will play a selection on the double-bass, Dr. Koussevitzky's original instrument.

The conductor himself will lead the Tanglewood Alumni String Orchestra in Handel's Concerto Grosso No. 12. Eleazar de Carvalho will direct the orchestra in Peter Mennin's Fantasia for Strings, and Leonard Bernstein will lead it in Roy Harris' Chorale for Strings.

There will be a humorous skit written and acted by Adolph Green, and the Tanglewood Alumni Chorus, under Hugh Ross, will sing Randall Thompson's "Alleluia" and "The Coolin" and "Mary Hynes," by Samuel Barber. Aaron Copland will be the evening's master of ceremonies.

PITTSFIELD, MASS.
BERKSHIRE EAGLE

MAY 4 - 1949

BSO Fund Now Totals $159,000

Koussevitzky Requested Drive For Orchestra

The Serge Koussevitzky Anniversary Fund, established for the use of members of the [illegible] phony Orchestra "in the event of emergency," now totals $159,000 and "more contributions are coming in all the time," George E. Judd, BSO manager, said today.

Although the active campaign ended before the testimonial dinner for Dr. Koussevitzky in Boston Monday night, the fund is still receiving donations from all parts of the country.

When the trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra conferred with Dr. Koussevitzky last fall on plans for his silver anniversary this year, the conductor expressed the wish to establish an emergency fund for the orchestra members, separate from the pension fund which was established in 1904. The Boston Symphony Orchestra was the first of its kind to have a pension fund in this country, Mr. Judd explained, adding there are now 77 pensioners receiving between $20,000 and $30,000 a year.

Mr. Judd further explained that the Koussevitzky Anniversary Fund will be used solely for a "cushion for emergencies," adding that money taken from the fund will be replaced. The fund was started when the BSO distributed four-page letters to season ticket-holders to the Boston Symphony concerts and the response, Mr. Judd said, "was extremely gratifying."

The Boston Symphony Orchestra now gives concerts 47 weeks out of the year, which is a new record for symphony orchestras in the country. The Tanglewood concerts are included in this period.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE

MAY 4 - 1949

Dinner-Concert Tuesday To Honor Koussevitzky

The program for the dinner and concert in honor of Serge Koussevitzky at 7:30 next Tuesday night at the Waldorf-Astoria Hotel has been announced by the League of Composers which, with a group of friends, is sponsoring this tribute to the conductor at the close of his twenty-fifth and last regular season with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Tanglewood Alumni Orchestra, composed of former students at the Berkshire Music Center founded by Mr. Koussevitzky in 1940, will play under the direction of Eleazar De Carvalho, Leonard Bernstein and Dr. Koussevitzky. Hugh Ross will conduct the Tanglewood Alumni Chorus. Marc Blitzstein will accompany three singers, Virginia Card, David Thomas and Shannon Bolin in excerpts from his opera "The Little Foxes," which will be produced on Broadway next fall.

Information about reservations may be obtained from the League at Suite 1533, 9 Rockefeller Plaza, New York 20, or by telephoning COlumbus 5-7460.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
NEWS

MAY 5 - 1949

EVERLASTING MAESTROS

Brooklyn: If you're looking for a lifetime career, folks, that will keep you from ever depending on a security check, become a symphony conductor. Look at the record: Sir Thomas Beecham, 70; Toscanini, 82; Monteux, 74; Koussevitzky, 75; Walter, 73. [illegible]tional strain? Bah!

MILTON J. BERENBACH.

HOOFING TO SLEEP

Brooklyn: I believe most people who think they have to use sleeping tablets are those who hop cabs or buses even when they have just a couple blocks to walk. Why don't you people take good hikes of a couple miles or so every day? That will make you feel tired and relaxed and you'll enjoy a natural slumber.

C. D.

WILMINGTON, N. C.
STAR

MAY 4 - 1949

A Great Composer Retires

Serge Koussevitzky has retired after twenty-five notable years as musical director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. That he has exerted an extraordinary influence during the quarter century of his service on orchestral performance and music appreciation throughout this country is indisputable. Records produced by the orchestra have always been in heavy demand, and radio concerts under his conductorship have drawn large audiences — perhaps the largest of all, with the possible exception of the Philadelphia orchestra.

We find this appropriate tribute to him in connection with his farewell concert: "His incumbency has brought glory to music in general by the quality of the performances and the interpretative standards he has maintained; and to American music in particular by the production of American works and aid to American composers, and by the fine training he has provided for students at the Berkshire Music Çenter."

Too much cannot be said about Dr. Koussevitzky's encouragement to American composers, whose works he introduced to Boston audiences, but even greater praise is his due for the work at Berkshire in behalf of aspiring young conductors and musicians. The Berkshire festival ranks highest among American efforts to cultivate native talent.

There is some division of thought, however, concerning his orchestral effort. The Boston orchestra, under his baton, has attained great prominence and creditable reputation among the world's leading symphony organizations. But while no competent critic fails to acknowledge the fine fruits of his conducting, there are some among them who feel that he made too perfect a machine of the orchestra, that in its very perfection it sacrificed what for lack of a better term may be called musical personality.

We cannot analyze this distinction, being an admirer of his orthodoxy and a devotee in the amen corner of his performance. But we, too, have noted during recent years that the music of the orchestra at times has indeed simulated, if only remotely, the recitations of children who learn the piece by rote and by rote speak it in school assembly. Perhaps it is this quality which has led some astute critics to apply a lack of the aforesaid musical personality to his performance.

However this may be, musical America, in fact the musical world, is losing a great orchestra conductor in the retirement of Doctor Koussevitzky.

HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT

MAY 5 - 1949

Message From Petrillo Praises Koussevitzky

Boston, May 4.—(AP.)—Serge Koussevitzky, retired conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, drew a message of high praise last night from James C. Petrillo, president of the American Federation of Musicians.

"Your retirement from this glorious field," Petrillo said in a telegram, "will leave a huge vacuum which will be most difficult, if not impossible, to fill."

The 74-years-old conductor retired Saturday night after 25 years as leader of the orchestra.

"You have accomplished as much as any single individual in the history of music in this country," Petrillo said. "I want you to know that you are held in high esteem musically and artistically."

CHICAGO, ILL.
NEWS

MAY 7 - 1949

STRAUSS--Don Juan (Tone Poem)--Victor set DM-1289, two 12-inch disks in paper envelope; Flaming music, passionately performed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Serge Koussevitzky. Recording good.

DURHAM, N. C.
HERALD

MAY 6 - 1949

End Of An Era

Sunday, May 1, was a day to remember in the world of music. In Boston on that day Serge Koussevitzky led the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the last time as its conductor. After 25 years he has retired, and those who had assembled in Symphony Hall gave him a tremendous 15 minute ovation to testify once more to the regard with which he is held not only in Boston but the world over.

Koussevitzky made the Boston Symphony Orchestra into one of the world's finest. So great has been his power as a musician, as an organizer, as a leader, that the most particular of critics frequently could find nothing to say about the orchestra except that it was "too perfect."

Not only has the Boston Symphony under Koussevitzky produced glorious music through the years but it has been an astonishing example of the ability of men of diverse temperament so to blend their efforts to a single purpose as to earn from Dr. Koussevitzky the label as "the most perfect musical instrument that exists in the world."

With Koussevitzky's retirement a musical era ends. His career has a lesson for us, for it demonstrates that at least one man, seeking perfection, found it.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE

MAY 6 - 1949

Koussevitzky Gets Platter

Award Marks Conductor's 20th Year With R. C. A. Victor Records

Serge Koussevitzky, who has completed his twenty-fifth and last season as musical director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, received an engraved silver platter commemorating his twentieth year with R. C. A. Victor Records from Brigadier General David Sarnoff, chairman of the board of the Radio Corporation of America, at a testimonial luncheon yesterday in the R. C. A. Building.

The inscription engraved on the platter reads: "Tribute to Dr. Serge Koussevitzky on his twenty-fifth year of distinguished leadership of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and with affectionate recognition of his twentieth year as an exclusive Red Seal Artist with Victor Records."

In his address, General Sarnoff recalled that the first R. C. A. Victor recording made by the orchestra under Dr. Koussevitzky was one of Ravel's second "Daphnis and Chloe" suite, made in the company's studios, then in Camden, N. J., in 1928. Since that year Dr. Koussevitzky has recorded more than 135 works.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

MAY 6 - 1949

NEW KOUSSEVITZKY HONOR

Brig. Gen. Sarnoff Presents a Silver Platter From RCA

Serge Koussevitzky, retiring after twenty-five years as conductor of the Boston Symphony, received another testimonial yesterday. It consisted of an engraved silver platter, presented by Brig. Gen. David Sarnoff, chairman of the board of the Radio Corporation of America. The presentation took place at a luncheon in the RCA Building.

The inscription read, "Tribute to Serge Koussevitzky on his twenty-fifth year of distinguished leadership of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and with affectionate recognition of his twentieth year as an exclusive Red Seal artist with RCA Victor records." Since 1928 Dr. Koussevitzky has recorded more than 135 compositions.

NEWPORT NEWS, VA.
PRESS

MAY 7 - 1949

Maestro's Farewell

One of the longest such associations in American musical history ended last Saturday night when SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY led an all-BEETHOVEN program played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in his farewell as its conductor. The all-BEETHOVEN choice, with the incomparable Symphony No. 9 in D-minor as its principal selection, seems peculiarly appropriate, for BEETHOVEN remains after more than a century the supreme master of majestic, sublime eloquence in the utterance of the symphony orchestra. Mr. KOUSSEVITZKY's retirement closes 25 years as chief pilot of a symphonic ensemble which has been called the finest one in the United States. This continual direction by one master of interpretation undoubtedly has been an enormous factor in the maintenance of the Boston orchestra's reputation for superfine performance. The 15-minute applause after the final cadence Saturday night — ending only when the maestro called for silence so that he could respond in a few words — is easy to understand.

Some critics have called Mr. KOUSSEVITZKY the greatest conductor of the present musical epoch. A biographer a few years ago loudly disputed that and there were threats of litigation over the publication of the book. There are other fine interpreters in the field and quite likely if anyone were to be held superior to Mr. KOUSSEVITZKY it would be the venerable ARTURO TOSCANINI. The point is at least debatable.

But the very greatness Mr. KOUSSEVITZHY has exhibited not only answers the question why he was retained so long by the exacting Bostonians but at the same time raises some apprehensions concerning the future of this orchestra. CHARLES MUENCH, a thoroughly qualified and sensitive interpreter, has been chosen to mount the podium next season. Mr. MUENCH will have to face the challenge which has plagued other musical directors and leaders as well in other fields including Presidents of the United States: the challenge of stepping into the shoes of an acknowledged giant. The New York Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra has floundered ever since Signor TOSCANINI resigned upwards of 15 years ago, with a succession of conductors, two of them replaced by the orchestra's board; with BRUNO WALTER for the last year or so acting as "musical advisor" while a group of guests did most of the conducting; and with two supposedly co-equal conductors booked for next year with Herr WALTER to appear occasionally as a guest. The Chicago orchestra suffered similar disturbances when the lamented FREDERICK STOCK went on to his reward — divided over the qualities of DESIRE DEFAUW until he returned to Europe, engaging ARTUR RODZINSKI (just discharged by the New York orchestra) and then getting rid of him after but a short tenure.

We have more than a suspicion that the real trouble in some at least of these cases lay much more in the audience than in the conductor, and that Boston may profitably do some self-examination. One of the greatest handicaps HARRY S. TRUMAN has had to overcome was the fact that he succeeded FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT as President. It is not at all improbable that the orchestras which have experienced these troubles actually were the victims of just this sort of psychology among the patrons. Accustomed to Signor TOSCANINI, to Mr. STOCK, they would quite likely have found fault with anyone else. M. MUENCH's past in France and his acclaim with other orchestras in this country augur well for his ability; it is inevitable, human beings all being fallible — and unique — that his interpretations should differ from those of any other conductor. Unless the Boston patrons take this into account, there is the tragic possibility of another such period of disruption as has beset New York and Chicago. The patrons, perhaps, are as much responsible for preventing it as the conductor.

NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
STANDARD-TIMES

MAY 8 - 1949

Koussevitsky Bids Farewell to Boston

One of the most touching and most emotionally-charged occasions in the long musical history of Boston occurred last week in Symphony Hall where Dr. Serge Koussevitsky conducted his final concert as musical-director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, thus bringing to an end a golden era of music which has seen the Boston Symphony become generally accepted as the finest instrumental ensemble in the world.

As the orchestra completed its playing of Beethoven's "Ninth Symphony," an ovation from the overflow audience seemed to shake the very foundations of staid old Symphony Hall. Visibly affected, his lips trembling with emotion, Dr. Koussevitsky stood on the podium from which he has thrilled music lovers for a quarter of a century, and then raised his hand for silence. A quick hush fell over the audience.

"Two years ago," said Koussevitsky, "when I gave my resignation to the trustees of the orchestra, I knew it would be hard to separate myself from you, my dear public, and my orchestra. But let us be happy we have had these 25 years together.

"Let us be happy that we have worked and created the greatest orchestra in the world. Let us be happy that we have had a tremendous musical evolution in this country, that we have helped many composers until now we have composers in this country as great as any in the Old World. I thank you for your co-operation, your devotion to the orchestra, and your confidence in me."

Again, the ovation was deafening. The man who, as Rudolph Elie expressed it, "has been a symbol of the creative spirit that has been carried torch-like by the great men of every generation to the succeeding generation," walked to the wings for the last time.

It was, despite the maestro's adjuration to be happy, a sad occasion. However, men like Koussevitsky never really leave us. We feel certain that the great conductor stepped from his podium last week into legend, into that company of musical Titans whose spirit and influence endure forever.

EL PASO, TEXAS
TIMES

[illegible]

Dinner To Honor Koussevitzky

New York. (UP)—Serge Koussevitzky, Leonard Bernstein and Eleazar de Carvalho will conduct the Taglewood alumni orchestra in a concert program at a dinner in honor of Dr. Koussevitzky in the grand ballroom of the Hotel Waldorf-Astoria on May 10.

It will mark the first appearance in New York of an orchestral group from the Summer music center at Tanglewood in Massachusetts. Under the auspices of the League of Composers and other friends, the dinner will be in tribute to the noted composer's silver anniversary with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

MERIDEN, CONN.
RECORD

MAY 4 - 1949

A Queue For Koussevitsky

The queue in front of Boston's Symphony Hall began early on the morning of April 29 when admirers of Serge Koussevitsky lined up to be sure to hear the retiring maestro in his next to the last concert.

Some of the Koussevitsky admirers brought their knitting. The housewives ran to sweaters; the high school and college girls worked for the most part on Argyle socks. It was largely a student audience, and many of the group were doing their homework. Some of them admittedly cut classes to stand in line. By 8:30 there were more than 200 persons waiting to pay tribute to the master whose inspired conducting during a quarter of a century has made the Boston Symphony into one of the world's finest orchestras.

The last time that Boston witnessed an early morning queue was when the Braves were playing the Indians at Braves Field. It's a healthy sign that both Johnny Sain and Serge Koussevitsky have admirers who are devoted enough to sit on a hard stone step for hours just waiting for a chance to pay homage to their heroes.

TULSA, OKLA.
WORLD

MAY 8 1949

Tanglewood Alumni Honor Koussevitzky

Serge Koussevitzky, Leonard Bernstein and Eleazar de Carvalho will conduct the Tanglewood alumni orchestra in a concert program at a dinner in honor of Dr. Koussevitzky in the grand ballroom of the Hotel Waldorf-Astoria on May 10.

It will mark the first appearance in New York of an orchestral group from the Summer music center at Tanglewood in Massachusetts. Under the auspices of the League of Composers and other friends, the dinner will be in tribute to the noted composer's silver anniversary with the Boston Symphony orchestra.

Her, Apr 30

Koussevitzky Wins Cheers Of Society

By ALISON ARNOLD

Serge Koussevitzky yesterday conducted his final Friday afternoon concert in Symphony Hall and the event was both epoch-making and sentimental. The program opened with the First Beethoven Symphony, but it was the Ninth that will remain in the memory of yesterday's audience. The singing, throbbing music was augmented by a chorus of members of the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society and the fusion of orchestra and chorus in the last movement was deeply stirring.

Every seat in the huge hall was filled. Lines for rush seats began to form as early as 9 o'clock in the morning. When the concert was over, the audience rose in one great body. The applause was deafening and was accompanied by cheers and stamping. Dr. Koussevitzky was called back to the platform again and again, and there were many whose eyes were misty as they watched his erect figure bowing his thanks. In fact, he, too, wiped his eyes often.

It was not until he finally spoke a few words that the fanfare quieted.

While their chauffeurs dozed in the spring sunshine outside Symphony Hall, the subscribers listened to the inspiring concert. They wore gay flowered hats and spring suits, and small girls in their first straw bonnets were brought along on this memorable occasion.

Included in the throng were Mrs. Robert Treat Paine, Mr. and Mrs. Edward Jackson Holmes, Mrs. Alvan T. Fuller, Mr. and Mrs. Wallace Goodrich, Mrs. George S. West, Mrs. William Stanley Parker, Mrs. Bayard Warren, Mrs. Alfred R. McIntyre, Mrs. Moses Williams, Mr. and Mrs. Eben Draper, Mrs. Edward A. Taft, Mrs. Sydney Harwood and her granddaughter, Miss Sabra Harwood, Mrs. William Dana Orcutt, Mrs. Hugh Bancroft, Mrs. Philip Lane, Mrs. Amor Hollingsworth, Jr., and Mr. and Mrs. Russell S. Codman.

Also, Mrs. Arthur Bell, Mrs. S. Bruce Black, Mrs. Paul F. Clark and her daughter, Mrs. Robert W. Boas, Mrs. Robert Morris, Mrs. Russell Howell, Mrs. George Parson, Mrs. Harry Stebbins, Miss Claire Fuller, Mrs. Homer F. Livermore and her daughter, Miss Joanne Livermore, Mrs. John T. Bottomley, Mrs. Isabella Grandin, Mrs. Edward Cunningham, Mrs. Jasper Whiting and Mrs. Samuel Eliot.

MUSIC

By Miles Kastendieck

FOR the curious among record collectors several items have turned up. Most highly specialized probably is the 25th Anniversary Souvenir Koussevitzky Album. Though issued by Victor, it is distributed through the Boston Symphony Orchestra only. Only a thousand copies have been issued and the returns go to the Serge Koussevitzy Anniversary fund. This will be a permanent tribute to the eminent conductor's great service during his quarter century in Boston.

The album contains three vinylite discs of Koussevitzky's double bass recordings. As examples of this "lost art" they have special interest as well as special meaning. Three of the numbers are Koussevitzky's own compositions. The other two are Eccle's "Largo" and Laska's "Wiegenlied." The accompanist is Pierre Luboschutz.

These recordings have been chosen by Koussevitzky in the hope that they will show the capabilities of the instrument in a soloist's hands. They are 20 years old but unique and, under the circumstances, of historic value. The artistry of his performance goes without saying.

Early Beethoven

A first recording of Beethoven's Concerto for Piano and Orchestra in E-Flat by Vox will interest Beethoven fans. Composed at the age of 14, it existed for some time in the piano condensation, but only recently has the orchestral score been reconstructed. Since the indications of the scoring were already there, the work as it now stands may be considered reasonably authentic. Its interest, of course, is in the revelation of the embryonic composer.

The pianist, Orazio Frugoni, who owns the score, is the soloist with the Pro Musica Chamber Orchestra conducted by Paul Paray. They give a perceptive interpretation, however conventionally 18th century the music naturally sounds. The slow movement expresses potentialities; the Rondo is disarmingly simple. The album is definitely a collector's item.

The relatively unfamiliar Third Symphony of Tchaikowsky has been made available by Victor in the Beecham version. Its performance with the Royal Philharmonic is typical. Tchaikowsky-ites will undoubtedly want it to supplement the famous three, though they may hear the making of the latter symphonies in this work.

Light and Gay

CERTAINLY another curiosity is the first recording of Milhaud's "Le Boeuf sur le Toit" translated as "The Nothing Doing Bar." An excellent performance by Mitropoulos and the Mineapolis Symphony Orchestra should make it a popular album in the Columbia catalogue. As a matter of fact it has a popular slant. Thirty years ago its jazzy character might have been considered daring. Actually it is based on Brazilian folk music, purposely gay and full of movement. Since it is not to be taken seriously, it is quite fun.

Victor has issued an album of Auber Overtures, played by the Boston "Pops" under Fiedler. They once served to introduce four works representative of opera-comique writing. Though the operas are forgotten, still the overtures survive, filled with the grace and charm and exhuberance of Parisian life of a century ago.

A final recording of Haydn's First Violin Concerto brings a Columbia album of definite value. The reason is a superior performance by Isaac Stern. The music is "authentic," a label used questionably for many of Haydn's solo works.

Columbia's release of Mazart's Symphony in E-Flat gives this work the advantage of a recent recording. In the hands of George Szell and the Cleveland Orchestra it receives excellent treatment.

Both from Boston

KOUSSEVITZKY: "Valse Miniature," ~~etc. Serge~~ Koussevitzky, double bass, with Pierre Luboschutz, piano. (RCA Victor Limited Edition album 1, $10.)

HAYDN: "Missa Solemnis" ("Harmoniemesse"). Ludwig Berberich conducting choir, organ, and orchestra of Munich Cathedral. (Haydn Society, $15.75.)

The above-noted Koussevitzky discs are those swan songs recorded by the eminent conductor in the late Twenties, following which he virtually gave up performance on the instrument. Re-recorded to reinforce the bass, and pressed on Vinylite, the sounds attest both to the remarkable facility of Koussevitzky on the cumbersome instrument, and to his post-Glazunow inclinations as a composer of such items as an andante from a Contra-Bass Concerto, a "Chanson Triste," as well as this "Valse." Also offered are pieces by Eccles and Laska. The six sides are priced at $10, with the profits earmarked for the Koussevitzky Twenty-fifth Anniversary Fund.

Of the Haydn Mass, we know nothing other than it is a first recording and sales are limited to 500 copies by subscription. Specifications are: seven twelve-inch records, on Vinylite, with an orchestral score of slightly larger than the usual miniature size included. No test pressings being yet available, we pass the information on merely as such. Orders should be sent to 179 Cambridge Street, Boston 14, Mass.

THE ORIGINAL
ROMEIKE
PRESS CLIPPINGS
220 W. 19th St., NEW YORK 11, N.Y.
Tel. CHelsea 3-8860

Cir. (28,781)

This Clipping From
NEW REPUBLIC
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MAY 23 1949

MUSIC: Serge Koussevitzky

IN HIS FINAL New York appearance as music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, whose destiny he has shaped for twenty-five years, Serge Koussevitzky conducted an interpretation of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony that was unparalleled in the experience of this witness to many onslaughts upon the unwieldy masterpiece. As technique, the performance bordered upon the miraculous. The first three movements were played with the extraordinarily translucent texture only the Boston orchestra can command. In the choral finale all the problems of balance, coördination and articulation were solved, so that none of the hazards and infelicities of the vocal writing detracted from the effectiveness of the "Ode to Joy." The chorus was splendidly trained, and for once did not seem to get tired. The quartet of soloists—Frances Yeend, Eunice Alberts, David Lloyd and James Pease—did not try to advertise themselves individually, but kept their singing in context, phrasing and inflecting their music with as much unity of purpose and expertness of style as the players in the orchestra.

To hear the Ninth Symphony presented in grammatically adequate fashion was remarkable enough. But for Koussevitzky, executive efficiency was no more than a necessary preliminary condition. Under the stress of what must have been deep emotion, the conductor propounded the mysteries of the symphony and declaimed its affirmations with supreme nobility of spirit and intellectual breadth. I doubt that the Ninth has ever been performed with more reposeful assurance or more transcendent magnificence.

A fortnight later, Koussevitzky repeated the work at the close of his Boston season in Symphony Hall. There were tears in the eyes of many in the capacity audience, as they stood to give him one of the greatest ovations in Boston musical history. For this was the end of an epoch; the future of the Boston Symphony Orchestra might be good, but to thousands of Bostonians it could never be the same without Koussevitzky.

The scope of Koussevitzky's artistic aims and the relentlessness with which he has sought to realize them distinguish him as one of the few really great conductors the United States has possessed. (Stokowski—in his earlier years—Toscanini and Mengelberg are perhaps his only peers.) When he first came to Boston a quarter of a century ago, he was a less experienced conductor than many of his colleagues in this country. His lack of background showed all too plainly in an inept handling of many of the classics, and some Bostonians who still remembered the ripe authority of Karl Muck wondered at first whether the board had not acted hastily in entrusting the orchestra to this handsome, patrician Russian whose chief reputation stemmed from the sophisticated Concerts Koussevitzky, in which each spring in Paris he played a great deal of contemporary music in programs underwritten by his wealthy wife.

But those who looked askance at Koussevitzky because of his limited experience, his wife's money, or his reported malaise in score-reading, underestimated both the conductor's capacity for unremitting work and his fanatical identification with the highest musical idealism. Within three years the orchestra learned to play with a cleanness, brilliance and effervescence no other group except the Philadelphia Orchestra could match. Over the angry protests of conservative subscribers, he continued to play an immense number of new works, until finally even those who did not enjoy it came to learn that one of the major functions of a symphony orchestra is to make known the best works by living composers. He possessed, from the first, a rare intuition about new music, and consistently sponsored and encouraged only the most gifted and best equipped American composers; no single individual has contributed more toward public recognition of the stature of such men as Copland, Barber, Harris, Schuman and Piston. Koussevitzky's Boston career constitutes the longest and the richest chapter in the entire chronicle of the encouragement, presentation and widespread acceptance of American music.

As the years passed, Koussevitzky's musical horizon constantly broadened. Without diminishing his activity on behalf of contemporary music, both American and European, he learned to penetrate farther below the surface of older Central European music, and brought increasing luster to his interpretations of French and Russian scores, at which he had always been adept. The recent Ninth Symphony is a case in point: as one who sang in Koussevitzky's first American performance of it, I can testify to the enormous expansion and enrichment more than two decades of growth have given to his command of the work.

An ardent believer in the artistic future of his adopted country, Koussevitzky has sought to perpetuate his own high standards in the Berkshire Music Center, which he founded and continues to administer at Tanglewood. The educational aspiration of Tanglewood is so visionary that the project ought, according to all known rules, to have been a practical failure. But with the aid of such younger men as Aaron Copland and Leonard Bernstein, who truly share his ideals, the Berkshire Music Center has become one of our most valuable formative influences upon the taste of the younger generation. If Koussevitzky needs a memorial, Tanglewood provides one. But for thousands who have known his lofty achievements throughout a generation, it is superfluous to designate any tangible memorial. Great men are not easily forgotten. CECIL SMITH

9+

LEADS LAST OF FRIDAY SYMPHONIES

Koussevitzky Makes Final Appearance Notable One

Post Ap 30

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

For six minutes the clapping, stamping and cheering continued, and then Dr. Koussevitzky, his voice gaining in firmness as he went along, made a little speech in which he expressed his sorrow at parting and his happiness in what these 25 years had accomplished for the Boston Symphony Orchestra, for the American composer and for the young artist.

FIRST FAREWELL

And then it was all over. The conductor who had ministered to it for a quarter of a century, had taken leave of the Friday afternoon audience.

A similar rite will take place this evening and on Sunday afternoon, Aug. 14, the final concert of the 1949 Berkshire Music Festival, when Dr. Koussevitzky for the last time conducts the Boston Symphony as its regular leader. Coming events cast their shadow before. Yesterday's program book announced the orchestra's 69th season, under the leadership of Charles Munch, from Oct. 7 to April 29.

Whether or not Beethoven's Ninth Symphony is the summit of symphonic music, enough people so consider it to make it a fairly obvious choice for an occasion such as this. In point of fact, Dr. Koussevitzky had ended several previous seasons with it, the latest of them that of 1946-47. This time he decided to preface the Ninth with the so-very-different Beethoven First.

Turns to Choirs

For the chorus that the former requires he turned, as in the past, to the combined choirs of Harvard and Radcliffe, as trained by W. Wallace Woodworth, while the solo singers were Frances Yeend, Eunice Alberts, David Lloyd and James Pease. These four made an excellent quartet, individually and in combination. Their task was not always a grateful one, and the same may be said of the choral

Had the size of the a larger te

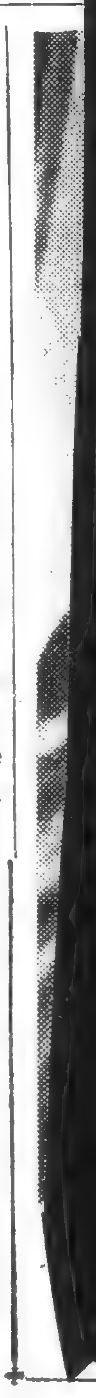
MUSIC

Our Critic's Report of the Week

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH



Those who look to the radio for what is known as classical music have been finding that commodity in increasingly short supply. Last season both the Boston and Detroit orchestras went off the air. And since the former was virtually a year-round proposition, what with the regular concerts, the Pops, the Esplanade concerts and the Berkshire Festival, its disappearance was quite a loss. By way of partial compensation, a half hour of the Monday rehearsal was broadcast during the Symphony season, and Arthur Fiedler's "Sunday at 4:30," a purely local affair, gave way to the RCA-Victor show, a nationwide hook-up over NBC. This program, given by Mr. Fiedler with a portion of the Pops orchestra and Robert Merrill, Metropolitan baritone, as soloist, was awarded a citation by the Musical Courier "as an outstanding example of the type of good music which should be heard more frequently on the air."

Alarmed by Trend

Alarmed by the trend noted above, the Courier is urging its readers to do something about it. The magazine feels, and probably with some justification, that when it comes to registering preferences, approval and gripes, the lovers of Beethoven are less articulate than the lovers of bop, and it suggesting that those who want more good music write to their local stations or to the networks and say so.

The phrase "lovers of Beethoven," that comes so readily to the lips, or the typewriter keys, is not, apparently, an empty one. Recently Boston's WBMS, which broadcasts mostly record music, with the emphasis on the classic variety, polled its monthly program subscribers to see how their tastes ran. With all allowances made, these figures are still illuminating. No less than 12,412 voted for their favorite composer, and Beethoven, with 2376 votes, led his nearest competitor, Mozart, by 774.

Favor Teutons

The results indicated that dead composers are far more popular than live ones, that the Teutonic masters are far in the lead and that relatively few listeners really go for modern music. After Mozart came Brahms, Bach and Tchaikovsky. Then Hayden, Handel, Mendelssohn, Schubert, Chopin, Puccini, Verdi and Rachmaninoff, who was tied with Richard Strauss at 170 votes. After Strauss the living composers rated as follows: Sibelius 94, Prokofieff 52, Khatchaturian 48, Copland 34, Britten 32, Vaughan Williams 20, Shostakovitch and Stravinsky each 16. Least favored among the elder Germans was Schumann, having 92 admirers to his one-time rival Mendelssohn's 308.

However, if Beethoven proved the favorite composer, he still didn't win as symphonist. This is how the symphonies rated: The Brahms First (782), the Beethoven Fifth (728), the Franck, the Beethoven Seventh, the Tchaikovsky Fifth, the Beethoven "Eroica" and the Brahms Fourth. Both Beethoven's Ninth and "Pastoral" beat the "Pathetic" of Tchaikovsky. And those three works, with Mozart's "Jupiter," were ahead of Schubert's "Unfinished," which the record people have found to be the most popular of all. The first Sibelius symphony to be mentioned, No. 2, was 22nd on the list and its special admirers numbered 126. Bruckner and Mahler, who would be near the top in central Europe, didn't do so well. The favorite Mahler symphony, the Fourth, had 72 advocates, while the best Bruckner could muster was a mere 36 votes for his seventh.

It would seem that radio fans do not always react as do either record buyers or concert and opera goers, though there must be plenty of people who fall into all of these categories. We have been told repeatedly that "Aida" is the most popular of all operas. Yet in this balloting it came out sixth, preceded, in that order, by "Carmen," "Tristan," "Traviata," "Don Giovanni (!) and "La Boheme." Surprisingly, Beethoven's "Fidelio" nosed out "Lohengrin," "Tannhaeuser" and "Mme. Butterfly." And according to this list, both "Parsifal" and "Pelleas" have more admirers than "Pagliacci." There were some curious choices here, of works not in the American repertory. Glinka's "Russian and Ludmilla" (38), Delius' "Koanga" and Vaughan Williams' "Hugh the Drover" (both 20), were ahead of "Peter Grimes," "Samson and Delilah," "Thais," "Martha" and "Mignon," each of which had 18 votes out of the 8126 recorded. Nevertheless, last April the Met's "Mignon" filled the Opera House. "Koanga," of which I know nothing, would attract the Delians, however numerous they may be, and the musically curious. They'd hardly make it a sellout. Anyway, we'll never know.

Finally, the most popular overture, tone poem, concerto and operetta were, resceptively, Beethoven's "Leonore," Sibelius' "Finlandia," Bethoven's "Emperoro" and Romberg's "The Student Prince." Second choices were the Mozart "Figaro," Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel," the Greig, and Gilbert and Sullivan's "Iolanthe."

Cain's
FOR CHARCOAL BROILED
STEAKS
STERS

NEW BEAUT
Beac
TREMONT ST

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

MAY 8 - 1949

WORKING PLANS

Koussevitzky Will Keep Busy With Music

By OLIN DOWNES

AT the dinner to be tendered Serge Koussevitzky by the League of ~~Composers~~ Tuesday night at the Waldorf-Astoria, music will be heard by composers whom the Koussevitzky Foundation has variously commissioned. Greetings will come from creative musicians of most of the Western nations whose compositions Koussevitzky has signally advanced in his twenty-five years' service as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Dr. Koussevitzky and two of those who have studied the conductor's art with him—Leonard Bernstein and Eleazar de Carvalho—will direct performances by an Alumni String Orchestra from Tanglewood.

Nor is this all. Excerpts from Marc Blitzstein's new opera based upon Lillian Hellman's "Little Foxes" will be sung, with the composer at the piano. And Orestes Gonzalez, the Cuban double-bass soloist, who studied his instrument with Koussevitzky last summer at Tanglewood, has been invited from Havana, where he has been soloist with the Havana Symphony Orchestra, to participate. Compositions by William Schuman and Peter Mennin will also be heard, and "several other musical surprises"—so runs the announcement—will develop. Toastmaster will be Aaron Copland.

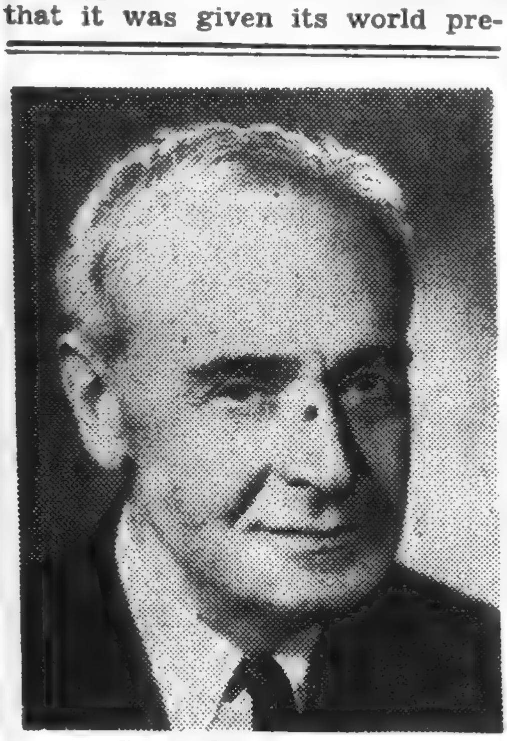
The League of Composers signalizes by this dinner its indebtedness to Dr. Koussevitzky, who in the past has aided its pioneering work in the development of modern music by conducting at certain of its concerts world premières of works by Bartók, Gruenberg and others.

Notable Occasion

It will be a notable occasion, which will serve as a landmark rather than a culmination of a remarkably brilliant career, for Dr. Koussevitzky has not the slightest intention of stopping or resting upon past achievements. He will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in future summer festivals at Tanglewood. Next March he will go to Palestine for a month to conduct there. Thereafter he will direct a special "festival" of modern works, including a number of American scores in Paris and following that a similar series of programs in London.

Further engagements, for which there are a number of invitations, will be limited with regard to their demands upon the conductor's strength and time, and, above all, with regard to the time essential for the development of his music school for the Berkshire Music Center, and the activities of the Natalie Koussevitzky Musical Foundation.

The foundation's history is one of remarkable encouragement of living composers. In its first year, 1942, it commissioned the opera, "Peter Grimes," by Benjamin Britten, which has gone the rounds of many of the great opera houses of the world. In fact it was with the approval of the commissioner that it was given its world première in London before it was performed for the first time in America by Dr. Koussevitzky's forces at Tanglewood, Leonard Bernstein conducting, and later at the Metropolitan. Bohuslav Martinu's Third Symphony, one of his finest orchestral works, came also from this first year of the foundation's work.



Serge Koussevitzky.

The full list of compositions thus obtained and established would be over-lengthy for quotation here. Up to and including the three years from 1942 to 1944 four new works were commissioned each year. The 1943 crop included the Bartók "Concerto for Orchestra"—again a top-ranking composition of a modern master, which was played by most Americans and also abroad, and William Schuman's Third Symphony, which, in this writer's opinion, ranks as his finest offering thus far in this form and also has found wide acceptance. The Second Symphony of Darius Milhaud and the Third of Aaron Copland came the year following.

In 1945 the commissions were increased to eight. A symphonic work by Olivier Messaien in nine parts is yet to be completed. The "Madonna Poema Sinfonico" by Villa-Lobos was given its première, under the baton of Mr. de Carvalho, guest conductor, and the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in December of 1947. Nicolas Nabokoff's symphonic poem inspired by Pushkin, then commissioned, was played by the Boston Symphony under Koussevitzky in Boston and New York.

Other American works were commissioned in 1947, such as Howard Hanson's piano concerto and David Diamond's Fourth Symphony. In 1946 there were only two scores, but they were significant: Walter Piston's Third Symphony and Mr. Blitzstein's opera.

In 1947 Malipiero's Fourth Symphony came from the basket and was later performed by Boston's orchestra; a new symphonic work by Roy Harris was ordered; and also a new work for small orchestra by Arnold Schoenberg, and two other chamber music compositions by Blas Galindo and Earl George. Commissions for last year were for symphonic works by Arthur Honegger and Randall Thompson.

It will be seen from the foregoing that commissions bestowed for new compositions do not mean that the result will be of a merely perfunctory or second-class character. Sometimes a good score comes and sometimes an unsuccessful one. The point is that the Koussevitzky Foundation, wisely administered, has given not only aid and comfort to composers who often badly needed it, but as in the case of Bartók, who was in bad health and straitened circumstances in this country in his last years, inspiration for some of their finest pages.

In Composer's Behalf

In the process of commissioning compositions he has discovered certain creative needs which he will seek to meet in new ways. One of the most important of these, one, indeed, which could hardly be over emphasized, is the need of operatically disposed composers for good librettos. Libretto trouble has proved a principal embarrassment to more than one person commissioned by the Koussevitzky Foundation. The composers capable of writing their own librettos, like Gian-Carlo Menotti, are few indeed, especially in this country, where, apparently, the average librettist labors under the impression that a good opera libretto is the same thing as a good script for a spoken drama!

Of course it is an entirely different form, indeed a different art. To remedy this the Berkshire Music Center will this year offer scholarships to selected poets and playwrights from our universities to come to Tanglewood and work hand in hand under practical conditions of production with the composers and stage directors of the Music Center. There could be no better nor more practical contribution to American music in its present stage than this one, and no better illustration of Koussevitzky's concentrated thought in the direction of the composer can be found.

FLINT, MICH.
JOURNAL

APR 2 4 1949

Plan Tribute To Koussevitzky

Excerpts from Marc Blitzstein's new opera based on Lillian Hellman's "The Little Foxes" will be heard for the first time May 10 at a dinner and concert in honor of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky in the grand ballroom of the Waldorf-Astoria.

The Blitzstein version of "The Little Foxes" was commissioned by the Koussevitzky Music Foundation and will be produced in a Broadway theater next Fall. Blitzstein will be at the piano to accompany the singers during the program.

The tribute, under the auspices of the League of Composers and a group of friends, will mark the silver anniversary of Dr. Koussevitzky as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The diversified musical program which will follow the dinner also will include the participation of Dr. Koussevitzky and Leonard Bernstein, composer-pianist.

LOUISVILLE

Another May festival featuring contemporary American music will be held next weekend at the School of Music of the University of Louisville. Roy Harris, David Diamond, Norman Dello Joio, Irving Fine and Leonard Bernstein will be among the composers represented. There will also be works by Hopper and Keeney, whose first names are not given.

European composers will also be represented. Performers will be students and teachers and members of the string quartet, chorus and orchestra of the Louisville Philharmonic Society.

PASADENA, CAL.
STAR-NEWS
MAY 14 1949

Koussevitzky Will Conduct 2 Concerts at Hollywood Bowl

With the engagement of Serge Koussevitzky, Hollywood Bowl Association has announced its roster of conductors for the 1949 season of Symphonies Under the Stars. The 28th summer season which opens July 12 will have the following conductors: Koussevitzky, for two concerts in September; Artur Rodzinski, opening concert and July 14; William Steinberg and Izler Solomon, five concerts each; Erich Leinsdorf, two programs and one each for Werner Janssen, Franz Waxman, Johnny Green and David Rose.

It will be Koussevitzky's first visit to the West. Last month he retired from the Boston Symphony Orchestra after a quarter century as its music head.

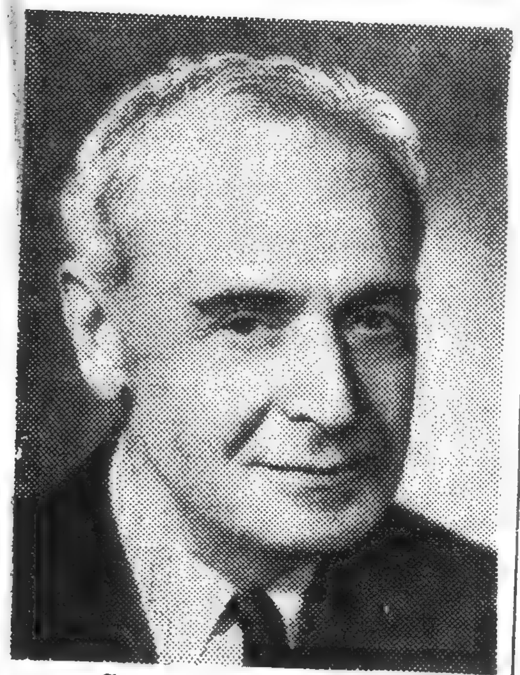
Soloists engaged for the eight-week season include Vladimir Horowitz, Artur Rubinstein and Oscar Levant, pianists. Yehudi Menuhin, violin virtuoso, will be opening night soloist.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
POST
HOME NEWS
MAY 8 - 1949

League of Composers' Dinner For Koussevitzky on Tuesday

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, who retires this season after 25 years as permanent conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will be honored at a dinner and concert given in the Grand Ballroom of the Waldorf-Astoria, Tuesday night. The dinner is under the auspices of the League of Composers and a group of friends. Reservations can be made at Suite No. 1533, 9 Rockefeller Plaza, or by calling COlumbus 5-7460.

Among the attractions scheduled for the program which will follow the dinner are: Koussevitzky will conduct the Tanglewood Alumni String Orchestra; Leonard Bernstein and Eleazar de Carvalho, both Koussevitzky proteges, will also conduct several compositions, commissioned by the Koussevitzky Foundation; excerpts from Marc Blitzstein's new opera, based on Lillian Hellman's "The Little Foxes" and scheduled for Broadway production, are to be heard. The program also will include the presentation of an album of letters from more than 150 composers from all parts of the world.



Serge Koussevitzky.

nière in London before it was performed for the first time in America by Dr. Koussevitzky's forces at Tanglewood, Leonard Bernstein conducting, and later at the Metropolitan. Bohuslav Martinu's Third Symphony, one of his finest orchestral works, came also from this first year of the foundation's work.

The full list of compositions thus obtained and established would be over-lengthy for quotation here. Up to and including the three years from 1942 to 1944 four new works were commissioned each year. The 1943 crop included the Bartók "Concerto for Orchestra"—again a top-ranking composition of a modern master, which was played by most Americans and also abroad, and William Schuman's Third Symphony, which, in this writer's opinion, ranks as his finest offering thus far in this form and also has found wide acceptance. The Second Symphony of Darius Milhaud and the Third of Aaron Copland came the year following.

In 1945 the commissions were increased to eight. A symphonic work by Olivier Messaien in nine parts is yet to be completed. The "Madonna Poema Sinfonico" by Villa-Lobos was given its première, under the baton of Mr. de Carvalho, guest conductor, and the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in December of 1947. Nicolas Nabokoff's symphonic poem inspired by Pushkin, then commissioned, was played by the Boston Symphony under Koussevitzky in Boston and New York.

Other American works were commissioned in 1947, such as Howard Hanson's piano concerto and David Diamond's Fourth Symphony. In 1946 there were only two scores, but they were significant: Walter Piston's Third Symphony and Mr. Blitzstein's opera.

In 1947 Malipiero's Fourth Symphony came from the basket and was later performed by Boston's orchestra; a new symphonic work by Roy Harris was ordered; and also a new work for small orchestra by Arnold Schoenberg, and two other chamber music compositions by Blas Galindo and Earl George. Commissions for last year were for symphonic works by Arthur Honegger and Randall Thompson.

It will be seen from the foregoing that commissions bestowed for new compositions do not mean that the result will be of a merely perfunctory or second-class character. Sometimes a good score comes and sometimes an unsuccessful one. The point is that the Koussevitzky Foundation, wisely administered, has given not only aid and comfort to composers who often badly needed it, but as in the case of Bartók, who was in bad health and straitened circumstances in this country in his last years, inspiration for some of their finest pages.

In Composer's Behalf

In the process of commissioning compositions he has discovered certain creative needs which he will seek to meet in new ways. One of the most important of these, one, indeed, which could hardly be over emphasized, is the need of operatically disposed composers for good librettos. Libretto trouble has proved a principal embarrassment to more than one person commissioned by the Koussevitzky Foundation. The composers capable of writing their own librettos, like Gian-Carlo Menotti, are few indeed, especially in this country, where, apparently, the average librettist labors under the impression that a good opera libretto is the same thing as a good script for a spoken drama!

Of course it is an entirely different form, indeed a different art.

To remedy this the Berkshire Music Center will this year offer scholarships to selected poets and playwrights from our universities to come to Tanglewood and work hand in hand under practical conditions of production with the composers and stage directors of the Music Center. There could be no better nor more practical contribution to American music in its present stage than this one, and no better illustration of Koussevitzky's concentrated thought in the direction of the composer can be found.

HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES
SEP 15 1947

All Time Record Made By Boston Listeners

By CARL E. LINDSTROM

THE BOSTON Symphony Orchestra last season was heard by more people than have ever listened to a symphony orchestra before. These people numbered more than 800,000. The figure does not take into account radio audiences.

It is interesting to note the remarkable growth in the attendance at the Berkshire Festival concerts. Tanglewood set a record of its own this year with a total of 105,000 listeners. Even so, this did not equal the number who heard the Pops and the Esplanade concerts in Boston. There were, of course, more programs in the two Boston series, 58 Pop concerts being attended by 135,000 persons and 21 Esplanade concerts by 250,000.

The 109 winter concerts in the Symphony Hall and on tour attracted a total of 300,000 listeners. There were, besides, six Youth concerts with a total audience of 12,000.

At Tanglewood, not counting the Festival concerts, there were 47 performances given by the Berkshire Music Center before 50,000 listeners.

* * *

THE COMING season—the 67th — calls for as many concerts as previously. There will be the usual tours with concerts in New Haven and New London besides Hartford in this state, and Northampton, Mass., New Brunswick, N. J., Philadelphia, Washington, Pittsburgh, Cincinnati, Bloomington, Ill., and South Bend, Ind.; Chicago, Ann Arbor, Detroit and Rochester.

Among the soloists to be heard are the following newcomers: Ginette Neveu, the French violinist who is about to make her first visit to America; Isaac Stern, the violinist; Nadia Reisenberg, pianist, and Marina Koshetz, soprano. Besides these, Myra Hess, Artur Rubinstein and Witold Malcuzynski will appear as piano solists. Guest conductors will be Charles Münch, Eleazar de Carvalho and Leonard Bernstein.

* * *

THERE IS NOTHING new under the sun except in the field of modern music. And here the ingenuity of composers is inexhaustible. The modern crowd seems to be capable of almost anything except giving a long-suffering and skeptical public something pleasant to listen to.

It is hardly surprising that the latest novelty comes from George Antheil. He has composed a suite entitled "Carnival of the Beautiful Dresses" which is a suite of 13 pieces composed apparently for a style show by the Neiman - Marcus Company of Dallas.

This was given just a week ago, but the pressure of local business made it impossible for your reviewer to attend this historic presentation of Gebrauchsmusik.

Merely a summary of the various sections of this suite will completely satisfy even the most ardent, devotees of modern music.

1. Opening choral (with a hop-skip).
2. A La Valse (with a "romantico").
3. Mexicali (Ed. Note: border Mexican rhythm).
4. Valse Passion (with a dream waltz middle section).
5. Habanera Rumba (for a very soign dress or dresses).
6. Love Affair Waltz.
7. Autumn Fancy (falling leaves, whirling?).
8. Gamin Valse (or music for a beautiful tomboy).
9. Martinique (for the unsophisticate).
10. Grand Climax (where they, the beautiful dresses, all get together—a longish number).
11. Valse of the Female Gamin Who Fell in Love Hopelessly for a Time.
12. Gay American Valse (hale fellows, well met).
13. Finale Rumbetta (what is Rumbetta?)—Why a little tiny rumba not yet full grown.

John Rosenfield in the Dallas Morning News has written of this suite: "Bach wrote cantatas for somebody's birthday. Antheil writes music for a store's birthday.

"Much incidental music has outlived the event that inspired its creation. It is possible that Antheil's "Carnival of the Beautiful Dresses" may be played independent of mannekins. Certainly it should outlast Neiman-Marcus styles which was not supposed to last too long, anyway."

I don't think Antheil or the fashion world have anything to worry about on the ground of permanence.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
MORNING UNION
MAY 7 1949

KOUSSEVITZKY HONORED—At a New York luncheon in tribute to his 25-year leadership of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and his 20 years as a recording artist, conductor Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, left, receives a silver platter from Brig. Gen. David Sarnoff, chairman of the board of the Radio Corporation of America.

KANSAS CITY, MO.
STAR
MAY 9 1949

RETIRING "DICTATOR OF THE BATON" SPARKED BOSTON SYMPHONY REVIVAL

Fiery Russian, Serge Koussevitzky, Shocked Back Bay Brahmins Twenty-Five Years Ago, but Lifted Organization From Musical Doldrums and Built One of World's Leading Concert Aggregations—Defied Both Fascists and Reds.

By W. W. BAKER.
(A Member of The Star's Staff.)

THERE were no late-comers at the concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra the night of April 30. This was perhaps the greatest of tributes to 74-year-old Serge Koussevitzky, whose retirement after twenty-five years of American music became effective as the final chords of Beethoven's "Ninth Symphony" reverberated through Symphony hall in Boston.

The audience must have remembered that one of Koussevitzky's greatest obsessions was the concertgoer who arrives late. They may have recalled a concert conducted by the maestro before an audience of 3,600 in Pittsburgh. There was an unusually large number of late arrivals that night in 1937, and the angry conductor stopped the music and strode from the stage. As he left, he barked to attendants:

"I will not go back there, never! The fools! Better they should stay home in bed. They should have some respect for the art."

Friends placated the conductor, however, and he returned and the concert proceeded.

Sparked Orchestra's Comeback.

Koussevitzky's resignation, given two years ago, became effective at the close of the sixty-eighth season of the orchestra he lifted from the musical doldrums into its present standing as one of the world's leading concert aggregations. The German-born Karl Muck, conductor of the orchestra in World War I, was charged with espionage by New England patrioteers and interned. Six years of strife followed the hullabaloo over the innocent Dr. Muck, and in 1924 the trustees imported the services of Serge Alexandrovich Koussevitzky to blaze the comeback trail.

Serge Koussevitzky on the Podium . . . He Said These Gestures, in the Playing of Sibelius's Second Symphony, Meant "Forte in the Trombones" (Left) and "Chorale in the Finale."

Back Bay Brahmins were a bit shocked by the Russian-born maestro. He was, they decided, exaggerated and showy. Soon, however, they recognized the new leader had elicited from the orchestra an uncannily transparent tone that he alone could master, and that he possessed a repertory larger and more varied than that of any conductor in the country. Twenty-five years of glorious if somewhat stormy music followed for Boston and, with the evolution of the radio concert, for the rest of the United States.

Koussevitzky, who baited two Russian regimes and the Fascists of Il Duce, was born in the Central Russian village of Vyshny Volochek. His mother was a pianist and his father a penniless violin teacher. There was only one course for young Serge, so a few years later he was on the way to Moscow to seek a scholarship at the Philharmonic conservatory.

No. 1 Bull Fiddler.

Serge was late in applying and there were only three chairs vacant: trombone, bassoon and string bass. As the least of three evils, he selected the string bass. Eventually he was to tour Europe as a soloist on the clumsy instrument, and later was acclaimed as the world's No. 1 bull fiddler.

In those days as a mustachioed virtuoso of the bull fiddle, Serge met Natalya Konstantinovna. While sawing away at a Moscow concert, he noticed the girl in the front row, gazing at him in maidenly admiration. The massive string bass took on a new tone. Two years later he married Natalya.

A life as a string bass soloist soon began to pall, however, so Koussevitzky turned to conducting. As a 10-year-old he had practiced conducting before a mute group of chairs and packing boxes, yelling the music at the top of his lungs. Using the money Natalya brought to their marriage, they financed an orchestra and gave a series of concerts in Moscow and St. Petersburg. They chartered a ferryboat and toured the Volga, giving concerts at each town. Their success was immediate, and by 1910 Koussevitzky was the most widely-known maestro in czarist Russia.

In the meantime, he had established a music publishing house, specializing in contemporary works (thus sparing himself the performance royalties). Koussevitzky published many of the early works of Scriabin, Prokofieff, Stravinsky and others.

In Defiance of Czar.

In 1911 Koussevitzky stepped lightly on the toes of the czar and got away with it unscathed. It was the first anniversary of the death of Tolstoi, the voice of the "submerged tenth" of Russia. Czarist police, fearing political demonstration, banned any celebrations. Koussevitzky, opening a concert a few days later, ordered the orchestra to arise and stand silently one minute "in tribute to the memory of a great artist." There were gasps among the conductor's friends, but the incident was overlooked.

The revolution of 1917 put a stop to his self-endowed orchestra and publishing house. The bolsheviks offered him the post as head man of music. He declined, but accepted for a time the conductorship of the Petrograd state orchestra. There he found his dictatorial instincts constantly curbed by bureaucratic rules and regulations. He recalled later one example, an inspection of the orchestra by a minor official:

Pointing to a section of the orchestra, the official inquired, "Who are those people?"

"The first violins," he was told.

"And those?"

"The second violins."

"What," screamed the official, "second violins in a state orchestra? Get rid of them!"

Widely Acclaimed in Europe.

Koussevitzky left Russia in 1922, being granted a passport after declaring he would never conduct or play again in Russia. He was widely acclaimed in Europe before moving on to the United States.

Critics here soon were referring to Koussevitzky as the "dictator of the baton," and stories of his behavior in concert and rehearsal hall are legend in Boston. The impeccably dressed man of the concert hall was far different from the tousle-headed rehearsal conductor, dressed in an old sweater and well-creased slacks. On occasion, the mild-mannered man would become a shouting, gesticulating demon, demanding the seemingly impossible from the 105 men under him—and frequently getting it.

If all went well, he would murmur "fine, fine," and half sit, half lean on the chair placed on the podium, his right foot beating time. Then something would go wrong. His 5-foot 6-inch frame would spark to life. "No, no," he would shout, "that is just noise. I must have music." Silence from the chastized musicians, then:

"So you want me to teach it you? So, if you want, we do it 1,000 times."

Once, at a rehearsal, he fired on the spot a musician who persisted in playing unpleasantly discordant notes. The exasperated conductor finally shouted:

"You are fired, get out, get out!"

The rehearsal was at an end. On the way out the discharged musician passed the maestro's dressing room. "Nuts to you, Koussevitzky," he shouted.

"It's too late to apologize," snapped the conductor.

Befriends Young Composers.

Koussevitzky always has been a great champion of young composers. In January, 1932, he conducted the first public performance of Gershwin's Second Rhapsody for piano and orchestra. This abiding passion to help the young artist led him to establish the Berkshire Music center near Lenox, Mass. He pleaded also for a state department of music to help young composers who would "refresh and vitalize" the spirit of man.

Koussevitzky has made many tours abroad as a guest conductor, and on one he clashed with Mussolini's Fascists. In 1931 he canceled an engagement to conduct a festival at Milan, when Toscanini was being held a virtual prisoner because he refused to play the Italian royal march or the Fascist hymn as the prelude to a concert at Bologna. Koussevitzky called Toscanini's incarceration "an unbelievable outrage."

Koussevitzky's retirement brings to a close an era in American music, but music lovers will find comfort in the fact that he is not leaving the concert scene entirely. He says he will appear occasionally as guest conductor, and will continue as director of the Berkshire center, perhaps to emphasize all the more his creed that "art is indispensable and inseparable from the life of man."

NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
STANDARD-TIMES
MAY 11 1949

150 Composers Laud Koussevitzky

NEW YORK, May 11 (UP)—Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, retiring head of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was presented an album of letters from composers throughout the world last night at a testimonial dinner in his honor.

Presented by the League of Composers and a group of friends, the album contained letters of tribute from 150 composers. Koussevitzky responded by leading the Tanglewood Alumni String Orchestra in a program broadcast around the world by the Voice of America.

PORTLAND, ME.
PRESS HERALD
MAY 11 1949

Koussevitsky Honored At New York Dinner

New York, May 10. (UP)—Dr. [illegible] Koussevitsky, retiring conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra after 25 years was given a testimonial dinner tonight by the League of Composers and a group of friends.

The dinner was followed by a concert, which was broadcast around the world by the Voice of America.

One of the high spots of the dinner was the presentation to Koussevitsky of an album of 150 letters of tribute from composers throughout the world.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE
MAY 9 - 1949

ABOUT PEOPLE

By HELEN WORDEN

Serge Koussevitzky is to be the guest of honor tomorrow night at a testimonial dinner which some New York ladies—especially those interested in music—are giving at the Waldorf-Astoria.

Since Mr. Koussevitzky is conductor of the Boston Symphony I don't see why the ladies of Boston aren't giving the party instead. I remarked as much to two members of the committee—Anne Benkard and Mrs. Charles E. Mitchell. They replied that the affair was figuratively a bow of the head and a bend of the knee to a great musician and an old friend. The price per ticket—eleven dollars, is being spent entirely on the dinner.

"It's Koussy's party," said Mrs. Benkard. "Not a cent is being collected for anything. not even his pet project—Tanglewood."

A young composer once described Koussevitzky as part Paris dandy, part Russian peasant.

His wardrobe is as extensive as his musical repertoire and as daring as his conducting. He sports gay, interesting tweed jackets, stop and look ties and checked pants around his home in the Berkshires. He's not afraid of colors. His evening cape makes you think of a gala at the Paris opera. He always wears white gloves and his full dress is a poem for fit and cut.

That's one side of his character. I saw another at a midnight supper Mrs. Nathan Brill once gave for him in her apartment at the Osborne after a Carnegie Hall concert. He entered the room like a whirlwind, white hair in a cockatoo's crest. He was short, with an eagle nose and florid skin. He talked with great gusto in a thick, soft Russian accent. At supper I sat between him and Jo Davidson. He ate every particle of food on his plate and sent back for more. His conversation revealed him an aggressive thinker with a creative mind. His interests were broad. But I couldn't tell you now, for the life of me, what he talked about. It was his staccato personality, rather than what he said which impressed me.

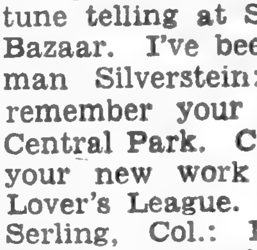
It has been said that he is retiring from work and that, for the remainder of his life, he will take it easy at his Berkshire home. He'll never retire as long as he lives. This very moment he is planing a tour as guest conductor which takes him to practically every country on this planet.

Shaemas O'Sheel, the poet, writes: "I didn't catch the beginning of this porcupine business about which you ask one Frank Solley to tell you more; but if he won't I will.

"Forty years come this summer, I remember standing on top of Slide Mountain in the Catskills while a porcupine sniffed at my shoes. I could have killed him with one blow of a club. That night I woke from sleep in a shallow cave, feeling a weight on my feet; it was a porcupine.

"Whether in the intervening four decades the species has grown more wary of man, I would like to know. And also whether on Slide Mountain the Porcupine Symphone Orchestra still performs.

"Noise that could not be ignored invaded our slumber. This is what we observed in the moonlight: a couple of dozen, perhaps two score, porcupines in a rough circle; all of them were squealing; most of them were doing a tom-tom on the ground with their tails; many of them were very audibly scraping the remnants of sandwich food and so forth from tin cans. George Antheil would have turned sick with envy if he could have heard that cacophony—I raise my hand and swear!" . . .



Shirley Mendenhall: Tobe Davis's address is care Tobe-Coburn School for Fashion Careers, 1 West Fifty-seventh Street, New York City. Robert Fiance: Thanks for your new book, "So You're a Hairdresser." Dave Wallace: Sorry to miss you. Yes, Eugene Speicher is a great artist. So is his wife—in the kitchen. Her dinners are poems. Stephen Millett: I appreciate the information about the builder of the old Custom House, now the Sub-Treasury. Will print it in a separate paragraph Friday, for the benefit of those who raised the question. Emilian T Bayko: This week is very crowded. I'll drop you a line next Monday. Jessica Carey: I'm sorry to miss your fortune telling at St. Bartholomew's Bazaar. I've been in Ohio. Helman Silverstein: Yes, indeed, I remember your flute playing in Central Park. Congratulations on your new work with the Music Lover's League. Maurice Konkel, Serling, Col.: I appreciate the color photo. My best to Dan Hunter and the Colorado NRECA members.

BROCKTON, MASS.
ENTERPRISE-TIMES
MAY 11 1949

World Composers Honor Koussevitzky

NEW YORK, May 11.—(UP)—Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, retiring head of the Boston Symphony orchestra, was presented an album of letters from composers throughout the world last night at a testimonial dinner in his honor.

Presented by the League of Composers and a group of friends, the album contained letters of tribute from 150 composers. Koussevitzky responded by leading the Tanglewood alumni string orchestra in a program broadcast around the world by the Voice of America.

In his letter to Koussevitzky, Finnish composer Jan Sibelius wrote, "My warmest admiring homage, with deep gratitude for the interest he always has taken in my art and for his masterful performances of my works."

German composer Richard Straus wrote "To the master and outstanding interpreter of my works, I send you my heartfelt thanks and greetings for your world renowned great talent."

Leonard Bernstein and Eleazar De Carvalho, two of the conductor's most prominent students, also led the Tanglewood string orchestra. It was the first time the orchestra has been heard in New York. Hugh Ross conducted the Tanglewood alumni chorus.

HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES
MAY 11 1949

Salute Koussevitzky

NEW YORK—(UP)—Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, retiring head of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was presented an album of letters from composers throughout the world last night at a dinner in his honor.

Presented by the League of Composers and a group of friends, the album contained letters of tribute from 150 composers. Koussevitzky responded by leading the Tanglewood Alumni String Orchestra in a program broadcast around the world by the Voice of America.

In his letter to Koussevitzky, Finnish Composer Jan Sibelius wrote, "My warmest admiring homage, with deep gratitude for the interest he always has taken in my art and for his masterful performances of my works."

German Composer Richard Straus wrote: "To the master and oustanding interpreter of my works, I send you my heartfelt thanks and greetings for your world renowned great talent."

WORKING PLANS

Koussevitzky Will Keep Busy With Music

By OLIN DOWNES

AT the dinner to be tendered Serge Koussevitzky by the League of Composers Tuesday night at the Waldorf-Astoria, music will be heard by composers whom the Koussevitzky Foundation has variously commissioned. Greetings will come from creative musicians of most of the Western nations whose compositions Koussevitzky has signally advanced in his twenty-five years' service as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Dr. Koussevitzky and two of those who have studied the conductor's art with him—Leonard Bernstein and Eleazar de Carvalho—will direct performances by an Alumni String Orchestra from Tanglewood.

Nor is this all. Excerpts from Marc Blitzstein's new opera based upon Lillian Hellman's "Little Foxes" will be sung, with the composer at the piano. And Orestes Gonzalez, the Cuban double-bass soloist, who studied his instrument with Koussevitzky last summer at Tanglewood, has been invited from Havana, where he has been soloist with the Havana Symphony Orchestra, to participate. Compositions by William Schuman and Peter Mennin will also be heard, and "several other musical surprises"—so runs the announcement—will develop. Toastmaster will be Aaron Copland.

The League of Composers signalizes by this dinner its indebtedness to Dr. Koussevitzky, who in the past has aided its pioneering work in the development of modern music by conducting at certain of its concerts world premières of works by Bartók, Gruenberg and others.

Notable Occasion

It will be a notable occasion, which will serve as a landmark rather than a culmination of a remarkably brilliant career, for Dr. Koussevitzky has not the slightest intention of stopping or resting upon past achievements. He will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in future summer festivals at Tanglewood. Next March he will go to Palestine for a month to conduct there. Thereafter he will direct a special "festival" of modern works, including a number of American scores in Paris and following that a similar series of programs in London.

Further engagements, for which there are a number of invitations, will be limited with regard to their demands upon the conductor's strength and time, and, above all, with regard to the time essential for the development of his music school for the Berkshire Music Center, and the activities of the Natalie Koussevitzky Musical Foundation.

The foundation's history is one of remarkable encouragement of living composers. In its first year, 1942, it commissioned the opera, "Peter Grimes," by Benjamin Britten, which has gone the rounds of many of the great opera houses of the world. In fact it was with the approval of the commissioner that it was given its world pre-

[305]

WATERBURY, CONN.
AMERICAN

MAY 11 1949

Koussevitzky Given Album Of Letters

New York, May 11 —(UP—Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, retiring head of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was presented an album of letters from composers throughout the world last night at a testimonial dinner in his honor.

Presented by the League of Composers and a group of friends, the album contained letters of tribute from 150 composers. Koussevitzky responded by leading the Tanglewood Alumni string orchestra in a program broadcast around the world by The Voice of America.

In his letter to Koussevitzky, Finnish Composer Jan Sibelius wrote: "My warmest admiring homage, with deep gratitude for the interest he always has taken in my art and for his masterful performances of my works."

German Composer Richard Straus wrote: "To the master and outstanding interpreter of my works, I send you my heartfelt thanks and greetings for your world renowned great talent."

Leonard Bernstein and Eleazar De Carvalho, two of the conductor's most prominent students, also led the Tanglewood string orchestra. It was the first time the orchestra has been heard in New York.

WORCESTER, MASS.
GAZETTE

MAY 11 1949

Composers Pay Tribute To Serge Koussevitzky

NEW YORK, May 11 (UP) — Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, retiring head of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was presented an album of letters from composers throughout the world last night at a testimonial dinner in his honor.

Presented by the League of Composers and a group of friends, the album contained letters of tribute from 150 composers. Koussevitzky responded by leading the Tanglewood Alumni String Orchestra in a program broadcast around the world by the Voice of America.

In his letter to Koussevitzky, Finnish composer Jan Sibelius wrote: "My warmest admiring homage, with deep gratitude for the interest he always has taken in my art and for his masterful performances of my works."

German composer Richard Strauss wrote: "To the master and outstanding interpreter of my works, I send you my heartfelt thanks and greetings for your world renowned great talent."

Leonard Bernstein and Eleazar de Carvalho, two of the conductor's most prominent students, also the led the Tanglewood string orchestra. It was the first time the orchestra has been heard in New York. Hugh Ross conducted the Tanglewood Alumni Chorus.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE

MAY 11 1949

Koussevitzky Honored At Dinner in Waldorf

Serge Koussevitzky, who retired on April 30 after twenty-five years as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was honored last night by 1,000 of his New York admirers at a dinner and concert at the Waldorf-Astoria. The affair was sponsored by the League of Composers and other friends of the seventy-four-year-old conductor.

The concert program, which followed the dinner, included the performance of works commissioned by the Koussevitzky Music Foundation, with the Tanglewood Alumni String Orchestra and Chorus conducted by Dr. Koussevitzky, Leonard Bernstein and Eleazar de Carvalho. Dr. Koussevitzky, who spoke briefly, received an album containing messages from some of the world's leading composers, including Jan Sibelius, Carlos Chavez and Ernest Bloch. Aaron Copland was master of ceremonies.

Although Dr. Koussevitzky is retiring as permanent conductor of the Boston Symphony, he will conduct the orchestra this summer in concerts at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass.,

Yesterday he announced his Tanglewood programs for the Saturday nights and Sunday nights of July 16, 17, 23 and 24. The works scheduled are:

July 16, Bach: Brandenburg Concertos No. 2 and 4, Violin Concerto in E, Concerto for two violins in D minor; July 17, Mozart: Eine kleine Nachtmusik, Symphony No. 36 in C ("Linz"), Violin Concerto No. 5 in A, Symphony No. 40 in G Minor; July 23, Bach: Brandenburg Concerto No. 1, Cantata No. 106 ("Gottes Zeit"), piano concerto in D Minor, Suite No. 3; July 24, Mozart: Symphony No. 29 in A; Sinfonia Concertante for Violin and Viola; Symphonies No. 31 in D ("Paris") and No. 39 in E Flat.

These concerts will be in addition to the regular Berkshire Festival series.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
SUN

MAY 11 1949

League Honors Koussevitzky

Composer's Group Presents Tribute to Conductor at Silver Jubilee Dinner.

By IRVING KOLODIN.

IRVING KOLODIN

A birthday cake with twenty-five candles (each symbolizing a year of his direction of the Boston Symphony), kind words with an even higher sugar content and an album of testimonials from musical personages in many lands were among the honors lavished upon Serge Koussevitzky at a dinner last night in the Waldorf-Astoria. Sponsored by the League of Composers (to memorialize the work he has done for creative artists during his quarter-century as director of Boston's orchestra) it was attended by a thousand or more persons prominent in the city's artistic and cultural life (also the nether-land of music business in between).

Among the absent who subscribed to the sentiments of those present were Richard Strauss from Switzerland, Jan Sibelius from Finland, Benjamin Britten from England and Carlos Chavez from Mexico. These, plus scores of more tributes from native and foreign composers were bound in a volume presented to Dr. Koussevitzky by Aaron Copland, American composer and master of ceremonies for the occasion. In his speech of acceptance, the conductor noted that he was "taking leave of the heavy burden of the Boston Symphony, of its routine and responsibilities; but he was not taking leave of the American composer." Through Tanglewood and his work at the Berkshire Music Center, he said, he expected to continue, as long as he could, the encouragement and assistance necessary to sustain creative life.

In a final word to his "musical children" who have already profited from his endeavors and are now equipped to continue that work, Dr. Koussevitzky abjured them to "strengthen their vision, broaden their outlook, sharpen their understanding" of the means by which musical creation could be encouraged and perpetuated. Among those present who might take the words to heart were Leonard Bernstein, Thor Johnson (present conductor of the Cincinnati Orchestra) and Eleazar de Carvalho of Brazil, all fledglings, at one time, of the Koussevitzky nest. Of other conductors who might be amenable to such advice, one noted only Artur Rodzinski, ex of the Philharmonic and Chicago orchestras, looking surprisingly fit after a recent bout with bursitis at his home in Florida.

No such evening would be deemed complete without music, and there was a small flood of it, ranging from works by composers associated with the Koussevitzky era in Boston—Randall Thompson, Samuel Barber, Peter Mennin and David Diamond—to an even more universal favorite, Handel's Twelfth Concerto Grosso in B minor, directed by Koussevitzky as the evening's finale. Marc Blitzstein offered a preview of the Koussevitzky Music Foundation's most recent commission by playing several excerpts from his setting of Lillian Hellman's "Little Foxes"—due for New York presentation in the fall—with Virginia Card, Shannon Bolin and David Thomas as vocalists. Other participants were William Schuman, president of the Juilliard School, who introduced Koussevitzky with some heartfelt words, and Hugh Ross, who directed a choral ensemble. In a lighter vein, Adolph Green amused with several skittish bits of a musical nature.

The small man responsible for it all absorbed the praise without flinching by reiterating his faith "Without new music there can be no old music" both in words and tone. For some, his direction of the Handel, with an able group of string players trained at Tanglewood, summed up both points effectively.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
MORNING UNION

MAY 11 1949

Federal Support For Music Asked By Koussevitzky

New York, May 10 (AP) — Serge Koussevitzky, the conductor who discovered America's composers for the music world, called on the government tonight to carry on his work.

Koussevitzky, retiring after 25 years with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, asked for a federal "department of fine arts" to continue his work of befriending native creative talent.

Koussevitzky made the appeal before 1000 admirers, including 50 composers, at a silver anniversary banquet for him at the Waldorf-Astoria Hotel.

American composer Aaron Copland presented the 74-year-old maestro with an album of greeting letters from 150 of the world's greatest composers.

Jan Sibelius of Finland praised his "masterful performances;" Richard Strauss from Switzerland lauded his "outstanding interpretations," and Jean Chavez from Mexico mentioned his "undying influence."

Before the banquet audience, Koussevitzky and two of his greatest proteges, Leonard Bernstein and Eleazar de Carvalho, took turns conducting the Tanglewood Alumni String Orchestra.

Koussevitzky will lead the Tanglewood group's Berkshire Festival for the last time this summer before taking leave of conducting.

ALD, MAY 8, 1949

Au Revoir to a Great Man-- Koussevitzky Takes Leave (3)

By RUDOLPH ELIE

It was the day before the first rehearsal of Leonard Bernstein's "The Age of Anxiety." The composer, with the ink hardly dry on his orchestral score, called on Serge Koussevitzky, the atlas-sized composition under his arm. Page by page the 30-year-old composer and the 75-year-old conductor went over the music. All day long they discussed the new symphony; it was Koussevitzky's first look at this complicated music, music that ranged from the newest harmonic inflections to the most advanced rhythmic complexities. More than that, it was music of so contemporary a spirit that it might have appalled one whose tradition lay so far in the past.

The following Friday afternoon, however, after but four rehearsals, Serge Koussevitzky conducted this work in its world premiere in a performance that left the audience astonished. Koussevitzky conducting a whole movement in a jazz idiom that, for rhythmic verve and contemporaneity, made bebop seem naive and pallid? Yet that is what he had done, and that is what he had done throughout his career: brought out new music that, if often incomprehensible to the conservative listener, was never beyond his own perception as a re-creative artist. More than that, he has sought the essential artistic impulse in the new music he has performed and has done his best to argue, for the composer, the validity of that impulse.

DEDICATED LIFE

This, I think, even more than the quantity of new music he has performed, is the greatest contribution Serge Koussevitzky has given to our times, for it must be remembered that he has personally presided over the birth of American music, that he has nourished it and brought it to the eve of its maturity. Perhaps neither he nor we will live to see American music in its most perfect flowering, but it can never be forgotten that he, almost alone, gave the seeds their fertile loam. After all, Toscanini, by not playing new music at all, has repudiated it. Stokowski, in seeking the most bizarre, has hurt it. Others have played it as a largely routine and sometimes cavalier gesture. Koussevitzky alone has dedicated his life to it.

The question of the immense value of his conviction, his sincerity and his devotion to the actual performance of new music cannot be over-emphasized. An audience is quick to sense sincerity and quick to respond to the emotional quality of sincerity. Seeing and hearing Koussevitzky, beside himself to set forth some new work with all the intensity and elevation of spirit that he might bestow upon Beethoven no audience can help but feel, that there must be something to it. Moreover, today's audiences, well aware of the disasters that were Beethoven's or Mozart's or Brahms' at the hands of insensitive audiences, are wary of dismissing any new music. Today's audience always has in the back of its mind the thought that maybe this is good, maybe this is a classic.

SAW DIFFERENCE

When Koussevitzky came upon the scene nearly 40 years ago, romanticism had collapsed of its own weight in the mammoth utterances of Mahler. The music of Schoenberg and Stravinsky had already paved the way for the musical anarchies that were to take place in the 20's as composers, their tonal and, for that matter, social values yanked out from under them, sought a new means of expression. It was an age of the maddest experimentation, of the most eccentric probing. Out of all this almost frantic odyssey, which found composers employing everything from airplane propellors to automobile horns to find new sonorities, everything from 12-tone scales to quarter tone scales to achieve new effects, a handfull managed to survive. Among these an even smaller handful (Stravinsky, Bartok, Hindemith, Honegger, Milhaud, Martinu, Copland, Prokofieff, to name most of them) emerged as the masters.

It would be foolhardy to maintain that Koussevitzky, by repeatedly playing the music of these men, alone caused them to survive, yet his contribution to their survival is enormous. For Koussevitzky, from his earliest Paris days, was one of the very few who perceived the difference between experimenters and creators, charlatans and geniuses.

WON THE BATTLE

Transferring his activities to Boston in 1924, he persisted in performing new music in a city which was, to say the least, shocked. Almost immediately the names of Aaron Copland, Walter Piston and Roger Sessions appeared along, of course, with the European composers whose cause Koussevitzky had made his own. And this was not only the beginning of new music in Boston in the sense of a cause, but the beginning of the American school. American composers, at last, had a conductor and a vehicle sympathetic to their cause, and a conductor who firmly believed in them and in the audiences' capacity to grow with them.

Today, after 25 years, both the new music and the new audience have come a long way. Today, after 25 years, a second generation of American composers has appeared, a generation that seems certain to exceed the first. Today Copland and Piston and Sessions and Harris are the elder statesmen; they are by no means through but the battle they fought will not have to be waged by Bernstein or Foss or Barber or Shapero or Schuman or Diamond or Fine.

Nor will Koussevitzky's battle have to be fought again. He won it, hands down, and the debt of gratitude owed to him by all living composers and all audiences is profound. And so, as he goes on to let the rest of the world see him and hear him—for his third career is only but beginning—he leaves behind him an audience already won over to his view that in order to have the old we must have the new, an audience that has undergone a remarkable education at the hands of a very great teacher. When Charles Muench, whose approach to new music is certainly of the most informed character, arrives to begin his work here the forces of the Philistines will not be arrayed against him. Koussevitzky defeated them utterly.

And in defeating them Koussevitzky erected his own monument as the father of American music in the names of living American composers who, inspired by courage and conviction, created the first indigenous musical culture of this country. He won their battle for them, but he did far more. He gave them dignity.

CLEVELAND, OHIO
PLAIN DEALER

MAY 17 1949

Koussevitzky Steps Down

Serge Koussevitzky has hung up the baton. H retirement marks an end to an era in music i America.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra may achiev even greater triumphs in the future, and probabl will continue for decades to come to be a dominating factor in our musical life, but it will assume a new character. That is inevitable, as th skills, showmanship and personality of the retiring conductor fashioned it in his own image.

Koussevitzky's career in Boston was unusual i its span. He held the baton for 25 years. In musi there is continuously the turmoil of temperament among the artists, but the Boston conductor wa always master of the temperamental elements. Audiences, too, tend to seek new faces. But the spell that Koussevitzky cast in 1924 has never lifted.

Remarkable, too, is the circumstance that excellence of the organization and its performances never declined in that period. Koussevitzky might have succumbed to the human trait of easing up after the whole world had acclaimed his artistry, but the same volcanic energy and meticulous attention to detail characterized every movement of his work.

The orchestra he built, according to musical judgment, attained exceptional qualities, among which were balance and clarity that rival the string quartet, and a beautiful tone quality that has set the goal for all others.

His career would be less significant if he had confined his labors to the orchestra, but his musical interests were broad and his influence felt throughout America, and in other countries as well.

Before coming to Boston, Koussevitzky had given a tremendous impetus to contemporary Russian music. In his 25 years here he gave first performances of countless American works and also assisted young performers.

The Berkshire festivals each summer at Hawthorne's Tanglewood, near Lenox, Mass., are a Koussevitzky project. They bring together hundreds of students and professionals, and have a far-reaching influence in broadening musical interest and in raising standards of performance.

Throughout the 25 years of unsurpassed musical achievement, Koussevitzky dramatized his work by leading a threatrical life. It was his custom to enter the Berkshire festival grounds escorted by motorcycle police with sirens blaring. He was the progenitor of countless legends.

It is difficult to separate fact from legend in the story of his life. He was born in a town on the banks of the Volga, near Moscow. His father was a musician, and the boy received lessons from him at an early age. It is said that as a small child he lined up chairs and pretended to conduct an orchestra.

After studying in the best schools of Russia and Germany he won a reputation as a conductor in Russia, Germany and France. He also appeared as soloist on the double bass, an instrument that rarely is performed in solo parts.

On his retirement the tens of thousands of persons who have visited the concert halls and heard the Boston Symphony on the radio are caught up in the sadness that accompanies the termination of a happy period of life. All must be wondering what music will be like without him.

[306]

END OF VOLUME

END OF REEL

PLEASE

REWIND